vv. 16–22 recount a call to discipleship. To the question about eternal life, Jesus responds with a question, a theological assertion, and an imperative. This last changes the metaphor from market to road: Jesus demands not a purchase but a pilgrimage. He also rejects the implication that in some way the OT is inadequate. Pilgrimage means keeping the second table of the Decalogue (the table on social relations: Ex 20:12–16; Deut 5:16–20) and, in accord with Leviticus, loving one's neighbour as oneself. The omission of the first table is perhaps surprising; but the issue at hand will prove to be social, and certainly Calvin was correct to observe that right action (as depicted by the second table) is proof of right religion (as outlined by the first table; Inst. 2.8.52–3).

The question, 'Which ones?' (v. 18), might imply the unimportance of parts of the Torah: only some commandments are required for salvation. Jesus' response dispels that notion. He quotes the Decalogue and Lev 19:18. The former was thought of as a summary of, or heading for, the whole law (cf. Philo, Spec. leg. 1.1) whereas the latter (or the chapter to which it belonged) was sometimes said to contain the Torah in nuce (Sipra Lev. on 19:1–4). So v. 19 directs attention not to isolated texts but to parts that stand for the whole.

In v. 21 Jesus demands not merely alms but everything. This is not an imperative of the Decalogue or the OT but something new, a novel charge engendered by the nature of discipleship and the greater righteousness announced by 5:20. But what is meant by being 'perfect'? There has always been a tendency to sort Christians into two grades, one more advanced than the other, e.g. in monasticism. But v. 21 does not mean that Christians who sell all will be 'perfect' while others will be stuck with 'a second degree of virtue' (Jerome). Calvin was right: 'Our Lord is not proclaiming a general statement that is applicable to everyone, but only to the person with whom He is speaking.' This passage is a call story, like those in 4:18–20; 8:18–22; and 9:9. The rich man is being invited to follow Jesus in a specific situation. This circumstance determines what is asked of him. One can no more generalize v. 21 than turn 8:22 ('leave the dead to bury their own dead') into a general order to neglect the deceased. Moreover, the continuation in 19:22–6 shows that the rich man loses not perfection but salvation.

What then is meant by 'perfect'? It can hardly be a reference to sinlessness, although such an idea would not have been foreign to ancient Jews. In 5:48 the connotation of completeness is foremost, but whereas there it is the completeness of love, here it is the completeness of obedience: perfection is perfect obedience. The rich man would be perfect if he exhibited wholehearted obedience to Jesus Christ.

In vv. 23–6 Jesus turns from the rich man to his disciples and gives commentary on what has just happened. His point is that God's kingdom is hard to reach if one is rich, for the rich inevitably trust in the security of wealth rather than in God alone. Indeed, in the absurd juxtaposition of the largest native beast in Palestine with a well-known example of a very small opening in v. 24, Jesus speaks about the impossible: 'one impossibility is compared with another' (Jerome).

The disciples' subsequent question, which uncritically presupposes (against the rest of Matthew) that wealth is a sign of divine favour, implies that if not even the rich man, blessed as he is by God, can enter the kingdom, who can? The answer lies in God's omnipotence, which is antithetical to human impotence: regarding salvation only God has strength—just as, with regard to goodness, God and human beings belong to different categories (cf. v. 17). But note that v. 26 speaks only of the possible, not the probable. God's omnipotence does not guarantee anyone's salvation. v. 26 is not comfort for the rich; it does not cancel vv. 23–4.

In vv. 27–30 Peter asks how things stand with itinerants such as himself who have, in contrast with the rich man, forsaken all. Jesus responds first by offering congratulations and promising future reward. But the happy words are soon balanced with the caution of 20:1–16: if the twelve are examples of the last becoming first, they need beware, lest they likewise become examples of the first becoming last.

The crucial v. 28, which alludes to Dan 7:9–27, refers not to a one-time judgement but to lordship. The text is not about Israel's condemnation at the consummation but the disciples' exercise of authority in the future (cf. 20:20–1). As the twelve phylarchs once directed the twelve tribes under Moses, and as Israel was once ruled by judges, so shall it be at the end. Compare the Jewish prayer in the Shemoneh 'Esreh: 'Restore our judges as in former times.'

(20:1–16) The parable, which recounts the events of a single day, falls into two parts. vv. 1–7 (which open with sunrise) describe the hiring of labourers, and vv. 8–16 (which are set in the evening) then recount the story of payment. The point is not to contrast Jews and Gentiles (or Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians); nor is the passage an allegory of human life (childhood, adolescence, etc.) or of world history, or salvation history, or spiritual progress; neither is it a pictorial representation of 21:31—the toll-collectors and prostitutes (i.e. the last) go into the kingdom of God before the Pharisees (i.e. the first). It is also not a supplement to 19:16–30, illustrating how the last (cf. the disciples and those who come at the eleventh hour) become first and how the first (cf. the rich man and those hired at the first hour) become last. The text is rather a parable of the last judgement which functions as a warning against boasting or presuming oneself to be among the first. vv. 1–15 are framed by 19:20 and 20:16, which teach eschatological reversal. So vv. 1–15 mean above all that the promise of reward (cf. the previous paragraph) should not become ground upon which to stand. The last can become first.

Beyond this the parable teaches that God rewards human beings according to an unexpected goodness—although this teaching functions not as encouragement but as warning (cf. 19:30). God's kindness, in this regard analogous to Jesus' moral imperatives, satisfies justice and then goes further. So the less deserving may receive as much as the more deserving. Like the Spirit, the divine grace blows where it wills. That destroys all human reckoning and therefore all presumption. It is a truth that must be absorbed after the heady promises of 19:28–9: hope should never become self-satisfaction.

One might suppose that in 19:16–30 salvation is according to works: one must obey the Torah and Jesus Christ. But vv. 1–15 disallow this simplistic interpretation, for they clearly teach, albeit in a picture, that there is no necessary proportion between human work and divine reward; or, as Isaac the Syrian provocatively put it, 'How can you call God just when you come across the Scriptural passage on the wage given to the workers?' (Ascetical Homilies, 51). Many have even found a Pauline doctrine of grace here.

(20:17–19) This detailed passion prediction summarizes the major events subsequent to Gethsemane. Their order is that of the passion narrative, except in the latter the scourging comes before the mocking. vv. 17–19 move the story forward by taking Jesus closer to Jerusalem and by forecasting for a third time and so emphasizing upcoming events. As compared with the earlier passion predictions (16:21; 17:22–3), the condemnation to death, deliverance to Gentiles, mocking, scourging, and crucifixion are new. As Jesus nears his end, its shape becomes plainer. Also plainer is Jesus' foreknowledge, which is not vague but exact.

This passage is surrounded by two sizeable paragraphs having to do with eschatological rewards. But vv. 17–19 are not a disruptive foreign body; they illustrate 19:30–20:16 in that Jesus is the last (in his sufferings and death) who will be the first (when God exalts him). As for the link with 20:20–3, the passion prediction illumines exactly what 'the cup' there spoken of is. Further, the tragic solemnity of vv. 17–19 is a perfect foil for v. 20: following Jesus' announcement of suffering we do not next read that his disciples showed concern for him—only that some people were preoccupied with their self-centred hopes. The loneliness of the passion narrative is already felt here.

(20:20–8) The two scenes—vv. 20–3 (on false ambition) and vv. 24–8 (on true service)—exhibit parallelism (cf. v. 21 with 23, v. 22 with 23, v. 25b with c, v. 26 with 27) and continue the theme of the third passion prediction, namely, Jesus' death (vv. 17–19). It is not the sons themselves who make the request but their mother. Perhaps the reader should recall 1 Kings 1:15–21, where Bathsheba appears before King David. The king enquires, 'What do you wish?' She in turn asks the throne for Solomon. The LXX uses prosekunēsēn of the mother (v. 16; cf. v. 31) and kathēsetai of the son (vv. 17, 20; cf. v. 30). One can also think of the one other place in the gospel where a mother appeals to Jesus on behalf of a child: 15:21–8, the story of the Canaanite woman. Of that woman too prosekunei is used (v. 25). Is the similarity of the two texts designed to stimulate reflection on the differences between the two supplicants and so instruct one in what sorts of petitions are proper and which not?

The mother's question, which is about eschatological rule and places of honour, recognizes Jesus' destiny and correctly assumes his great authority. But the request is misdirected and takes no account of what has just been predicted. Although crowds will soon hail Jesus as the Davidic Messiah, Jerusalem will see him mount not a throne but a cross—and those at his right and left will be not glorified apostles but crucified criminals (27:38). That Matthew indeed intended an ironic allusion to this last scene seems probable: in both places the Greek wording is the same.

Neither for Jesus nor for Matthew should the 'cup' be equated with 'temptations' or (with reference to 26:27) given a sacramental interpretation; nor can there be any real connection with the drink given to Jesus on the cross (27:34, 48). It is also improbable that 'cup' refers simply to death (although the targums do know the expression, 'taste the cup of death') or martyrdom (as in later Christian texts). In the OT and intertestamental literature 'cup' is often used figuratively in texts about suffering, especially suffering God's wrath or judgement; and that illumines the usage here. The cup that Jesus will drink (cf. 26:39) is the cup of eschatological sorrow, which will be first poured out upon the people of God (cf. Jer 25:15–29). Jesus will face God's judgement.

v. 28, which probably alludes to both Dan 7:13–14 and Isa 53:10–12, is the climax to vv. 20–8. It is the last word Jesus speaks before going up to Jerusalem and shows him to be the Son of Man in whom word and deed are one, the true king whose one aim is to benefit his subjects. The word traditionally translated 'ransom' means deliverance by payment. In the LXX it invariably means 'ransom-price' and appears in various contexts—of the half-shekel poll tax, of payment to save one's life after one has killed another, of buying back mortgaged property, of buying an enslaved relation, and of the redemption of the firstborn. In the present instance the principle of 'life for life' (Ex 21:23) is operative. Like the death of the martyrs in 4 Macc 1:11; 6:28–9; and 17:20–2, Jesus' death has a beneficial effect upon others—here 'the many', by which is meant 'all' (cf. Rom 5:15, 19; 1 Tim 2:6).

If v. 28, as appears, combines Dan 7 and Isa 53, there is an interesting parallel in Mt 8:20. In both the Son of Man is subject, in both he is humbled, and in both Scripture is seemingly alluded to ironically: the Son of Man, against Dan 7, has come not to be served but to serve; and the Son of Man, against Ps 8, does not have dominion, glory, and honour but rather no place to lay his head.

v. 28 is a particularly apt conclusion to 20:20–7. When the mother of the sons of Zebedee envisages James and John sitting on the right and left of Jesus in the kingdom, the reader is reminded of 19:28, where the twelve are promised thrones beside the Son of Man. It is hence fitting that the paragraph culminates in a declaration about the Son of Man. But here, as opposed to 19:28, the subject is not the Son of Man's glory but his service unto death. As in vv. 20–3, visions of grandeur (cf. Dan 7:13–14) give way to forecasts of suffering and death (cf. Isa 53; Dan 7:21–5), for the king cannot sit on his throne until he has, through self-sacrifice, rescued his people.

(20:29–34) Carter (1994: 203) has observed that if chs. 19–20 outline a difficult way of life at odds with 'dominant hierarchical household patterns', a way of 'life that is opposed and misunderstood', our story appropriately follows: 'after the uncompromising demand of chs. 19–20... this pericope underlines that God's compassionate mercy and power are available for all disciples who, in the midst of difficult circumstances, recognize their inadequacy and call for God's help'.

This passage is remarkably reminiscent of 9:27–30. In both Jesus is being followed, two blind men appear, the blind men cry out and say, 'Have mercy on us, Son of David', Jesus touches their eyes, and they see again. There are also striking verbal links (cf. e.g. 20:29, 30, with 9:27). These parallels form a sort of inclusio. The first restoration of sight occurs towards the beginning of the ministry, the second near the end. This gives an artistic unity to the whole gospel. Furthermore, the first takes place before corporate Israel has rejected Jesus, the second after that rejection has become manifest. So despite being rejected, Jesus' charity remains the same throughout. His difficulties do not cancel his compassion.

Is there a lesson in the juxtaposition of 20:20–8 and vv. 29–34? In the former, two privileged insiders (James and John) make a request through a third party (their mother). The request is prefaced by no title of respect or majesty, it concerns the eschatological future, and it involves personal exaltation (to sit at the right and left of the Messiah). In the latter, two outsiders (the blind men) make a request that a third party (the crowd) tries to stifle. That request is prefaced by titles of respect and majesty, concerns the present, and is for something necessary that is taken for granted by most (sight). One might infer that petitions are more likely to be heard when addressed directly, with respect, and for things truly needful.

(21:1–11) This story, which reminds one of 1 Sam 10:1–9 (the finding of donkeys for Saul), pulls forward several threads from the previous chapters—the theme of prophetic fulfilment (cf. 1:22–3, etc.), Jesus' trek to Jerusalem (cf. 16:21; 20:17), his 'meekness' (cf. 11:29), his status as 'king' (cf. 2:1–12), 'Son of David' (cf. 1:1–18), 'the coming one' (cf. 3:11; 11:3), and 'prophet' (cf. 13:57). But vv. 1–11 also offer two firsts—(1) Jesus' public claim (albeit indirect) to messianic kingship, and (2) recognition by 'the crowds' of that kingship (contrast 16:13–14). Together these two firsts challenge Jerusalem to make a decision: who is this Jesus (cf. v. 10)? What follows depends upon the city's answer to that question.

Other texts recount the triumphal arrival (parousia) of a ruler or military hero and contain a standard cluster of motifs: approach of the king, public acclamation/celebration (sometimes with song), entrance into city, cultic activity (including the cleansing of cultic pollution); see e.g. 1 Kings 1:32–40; Zech 9:9; 1 Macc 5:45–54; 2 Macc 4:21–2; Jos. Ant. 11.325–39. 1 Macc 13:49–53, like v. 8, even refers to palm branches. But Jesus' entry is not a military triumph. On the contrary, the Son of David is 'meek' and has not conquered anything. Further, Jesus does not sacrifice in the temple but rebukes the cult. It does not legitimate him; he stands above it (12:6).

(21:12–17) Having entered the capital as king, Jesus next enters the temple, the symbol of national identity, and there, through prophetic deed and scriptural word, declares divine disfavour. The disfavour is not directed against the temple as such but against those who have corrupted it. In the temple the meek king heals those without status (the blind and the lame) and is praised by those without power (children). Opposed to him are men of authority, prestige, and influence. But in truth those who appear to be in charge are not, and judgement will soon overtake them.

(21:18–22) For the third time in three paragraphs Jesus performs a symbolic act. Here that act and its effect are prophetic. The visual parable inaugurates judgement against that for which it stands. That the fig tree ‘near the road’—we should envisage a wild fig tree: Jesus does not curse another’s property—wither is a symbol of judgement (cf. Isa 34:4; Jer 8:13; Hos 2:12). The judgement is not against Israel as a whole but Jerusalem and/or those in charge of the temple. vv. 18–22 are located between two paragraphs having to do with the temple, in the first of which Jesus protests, in the second of which the priests protest against Jesus. So in context this passage shows that the divine wrath has begun to manifest itself against the temple establishment. Beyond this, if 21:13 refers to the temple as ‘a house of prayer’, it is not coincidence that our pericope concerns petition. In Matthew the old temple has been replaced by the church. So the sequence in 21:12–22—judgement of the old place of prayer, promise of prayer’s efficacy within the church—reflects the course of salvation history as well as the deterritorialization of Matthean religion: portable community (cf. 18:20) substitutes for fixed holy space.

(21:23–7) These verses both add to the dramatic tension between Jesus and his opponents and demonstrate the character of the latter. And trailing upon the protest in the temple and the cursing of the fig tree they illustrate why the temple is doomed: the leaders have become deaf to God’s messengers.

This section is less about Jesus—it is certainly not about his debating skills—or the Baptist than it is about the chief priests and elders. Here they enquire of Jesus ‘without reason or respect, a thing that was plain to all’ (Calvin). Further, out of cowardly expediency, they respond to his questions with a lie (‘we do not know’). As if that were not enough, they show themselves to be spiritually less perceptive than those over whom they preside, for the multitudes recognize John’s prophetic status. The effect of all this is to set the passion of Jesus within a moral context. Jesus’ death is not the upshot of an unfortunate misunderstanding by uninformed authorities; instead it is brought about by the plotting of self-serving men of ill will. The passion narrative depicts a struggle between good and evil.

(21:28–32) The polemical parable is allegorically interpreted in vv. 31–2: the father represents God; the first son represents toll collectors and prostitutes, those who were lax in the law but came to obey God through John’s ministry; the second son represents the chief priests and the elders, those who, despite their religious profession, disobeyed God by not believing in John. The main function is to characterize Jesus’ opponents. Chrysostom urged that the two children represent Jews and Gentiles: the former, having heard the law and promised obedience, were disobedient, while the latter, not having heard the law, became obedient in Christ. This interpretation in terms of salvation history has dominated exegetical history. Recent exegetes, however, have rightly begun to question it. Nothing so far in 19:1ff. has directly addressed Jewish–Gentile relations. Indeed, the section has encouraged us rather to think in terms of believing and unbelieving Israel. In addition, the parable is explicitly about different responses to John the Baptist, not Jesus or the Christian kerygma. The most natural interpretation, then, is that which finds in this pericope (1) depiction of a divided Israel; (2) characterization of Jesus’ opponents as hypocrites; and (3) illustration of the first (the chief priests and elders) becoming last and the last (toll collectors and prostitutes) becoming first. In 21:23–5 Jesus asks his opponents several questions. Their answers are: ‘we do not know’ (21:27), ‘the first’ (v. 31), ‘he will put those wretches to a miserable death, and lease the vineyard to other tenants who will give him the produce at the harvest time’ (21:41), ‘Caesar’s’ (22:21), ‘the Son of David’ (22:42), and, finally, silence (22:45). These answers, brief and colourless, are always dictated by the question and empty of insight. Further, two answers confess ignorance (21:27; 22:45) and two are self-incriminating (21:27, 41). Jesus’ opponents are adept at laying traps, but they are also good at falling into them. Jesus’ answers, on the other hand, are uniformly creative, clever, and memorable; and they avoid entanglement either by turning a question back on others or moving the discussion to another level. Jesus’ spiritual authority gives him a rhetorical sovereignty.

(21:33–46) This parable is an allegory about faithlessness and judgement. Its character as an allegory does not mean that it is not true to life—it largely seems to be—or that every element has a symbolic meaning, only that equations for the main elements can be given: the vineyard stands for Israel; the householder stands for God; the tenant farmers stand for leaders of Israel; the fruit stands for what is owed to God; the rejection of servants stands for rejection of prophets; the sending and rejection of the son stand for the sending and rejection of Jesus; the punishment of tenants stands for Jerusalem’s destruction; the new tenants stand for the church.

Our parable and its interpretation combine the traditional motif of the rejection and even murder of the prophets with the traditional metaphor of Israel as God’s vineyard (cf. Isa 5:2). What is new is the joining of the two themes in the service of Christology: the rejection of Jesus is the climax in the story of rebellion against Israel’s God.

This passage is not about God’s rejection of the Jews and the Gentiles’ acceptance of Jesus. The parable identifies the tenants not with the Jews in general but with the Jewish leaders in particular. Further, the context is conflict between Jesus and Israel’s leaders, not Jesus and Judaism; and it is not the vineyard (i.e. Israel) that suffers judgement but those in charge. So the kingdom is taken from the Jewish leaders and given to the church of Jew and Gentile.

(22:1–14) The passage consists of introduction (v. 1), parable (vv. 2–13b), commentary (vv. 13c–14). The parable (perhaps based upon a traditional story; cf. γ. Sanh. 6:23c) contains two parallel sequences. Each recounts three actions of the king.

- 2–3a action of king (invitation)
- 3b response (rejection)
- 4 reaction of king (invitation)
- 5–6 response (rejection and violence)
- 7 reaction of king (punishment: death and destruction)
- 8–9 action of king (invitation)
- 10 response (acceptance)
- 11–12b reaction of king (entrance and question)
- 12c response (silence)
- 13b reaction of king (punishment: binding and casting out)

The whole sequence is dominated by the speech of the king: no one else says anything. Everything revolves around his words.

vv. 1–10 are an allegory much influenced by 21:33–41. The king stands for God; his son represents Jesus (cf. 21:37–8); the royal wedding feast symbolizes the eschatological banquet. The dual sending of the servants is, as in the preceding parable, the sending of God's messengers; the murder of the servants represents the murder of the prophets and Jesus (cf. 21:35–9). v. 7 alludes to the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE. The third sending of servants is the mission of the church, in which good and evil stand side by side until the end. The man without a garment, who stands for a whole class at the last judgement, lacks either good works (cf. Rev 19:8) or a glorious resurrected body (cf. 13:43). His punishment may reflect a tradition about Azazel. According to 1 Enoch 10:4–5, God instructed the angel Raphael to bind Azazel 'hand and foot and throw him into the darkness'. And according to Apoc. Abr. 13:14, the fallen Azazel lost his heavenly garment, which will be given to Abraham. All this is strikingly close to our text. Perhaps we should think of the man's fate as akin to that of Azazel. Just as the righteous will wear garments of glory and so be like the heavenly angels, so will the wicked be unclothed and suffer like the fallen angels.

vv. 11–14 turn attention from outsiders to insiders, from opponents to the church. The evangelist as pastor was all too aware that criticism of others as well as the doctrine of election (cf. v. 14) are both fraught with moral peril; for the former tends to nourish complacency—censure of our enemies always makes us feel better about ourselves—while the latter can beget feelings of superiority. Matthew, however, understood that while censure has its place in moral instruction, and while election is of the essence of Judaism, the two things can foster illusions; and they are no substitute for self-examination and personal effort. So it is that Christian readers of vv. 11–14, who necessarily identify with those at the king's banquet, cannot read the text and feel self-satisfaction. They must instead ask whether they are like the man improperly clothed, whether they are among 'the many' despite profession to be among 'the few'. God's judgement comes upon all, including those within the ecclesia.

(22:15–22) Here begins a series of discussions that runs through the rest of ch. 22. The first pits Jesus against Pharisees and Herodians (vv. 15–22), the second against the Sadducees (22:23–33), the third against a Pharisaic lawyer (22:34–40), and the fourth against the Pharisees (22:41–6). Taken together the four passages add to the negative characterization of the Jerusalem leaders. The first question for Jesus is whether God would have one contribute to the Roman census, a tax upon agricultural yield and personal property, collected through census or registration (Lk 2:1–5; Acts 5:37) and probably amounting to one denarius a year. Although Jewish authorities (including the Sanhedrin) helped farm the tax, many resented it and objected on religious grounds. Indeed, although Roman taxation had been a reality since 63 BCE, the census of 6 or 7 CE, when Judea came under direct Roman control, encouraged a revolt; and resentment of taxation also contributed to the unrest that culminated in the revolt of 70 CE.

Although the story would be coherent without vv. 19–21a, the use of a visual aid adds drama, while the coin being in the possession of Jesus' opponents highlights their insincerity: they have no qualms about using pagan money—and even bring a coin with the emperor's image and blasphemous inscription into the holy precincts of the temple.

Instead of trapping Jesus, the Pharisees and Herodians are trapped by him. Jesus' words distance him from those who oppose supporting Rome. At the same time, the inclusion of giving to God what is his relativizes the political obligation. There is here no firm principle of loyal submission to the state. Implied rather is a reservation regarding the state, a lack of reservation regarding God. While obedience to God can, as in the current instance, coexist with doing what the state requires, obligation to the former overshadows obligation to the latter. So there is no simple or straightforward rule, but the imperative to weigh the demands of two (very unequal) authorities. When those demands are not at odds (as here), obligations to both can be met (cf. Rom 13:1–7; 1 Pet 2:17). In cases of conflict, however, it is manifest which authority requires allegiance. Our text has rightly been cited to curb the powers of the state (e.g. John of Damascus, De Imaginibus 2.12). God, who after all determines what is Caesar's and what is not, is sovereign over the state, albeit in a non-theocratic fashion. In the end, no one can serve two masters (6:24), and all that truly matters is obedience to God. (Beginning with Tertullian, many have identified 'the things that are God's' with human beings. If coins with Caesar's image and inscription belong to Caesar, then human beings created in God's image (Gen 1:26) belong to God.)

(22:23–33) If the Pharisees raise a political issue, the Sadducees (who presumably believe only in the OT's shadowy Sheol) now pose a theological riddle which combines the teaching of the levirate law in Deut 25:5 with the concrete example in Gen 38:8. Although the two parties disagree regarding resurrection, they are one in opposing Jesus.

In 22:15–22 no one cites Scripture. Here, however, Scripture is at the centre, as also in 22:34–40, 41–6. The effect is to uphold Jesus' harmony with the Torah and to display his skill in its interpretation.

The Sadducees' question, which assumes that polyandry is unacceptable and implies that the resurrection is foreign to the Pentateuch, is rejected by Jesus as the product of culpable ignorance and bad theology. The Sadducees deny the resurrection because they imagine the eschatological future others profess to be mundane and terrestrial. But their materialistic view is not the view of Jesus, according to whom Israel's God is the omnipotent who can transform the saints. 'Neither marry nor are given in marriage' means 'Neither do (men) marry nor are (women) given in marriage.' 'In the resurrection' means not 'at the resurrection' but 'in the resurrected condition (of the just)'. The argument moves from the general to the particular. If in general people will be like angels (then a common belief), then the marital bond in particular will be transcended, for angels (who are immortal) live without marriage (not because they are sexless or androgynous—they were typically thought of as male—but because they refrain; cf. 2 Apoc. Bar. 56:14).

In passing, in v. 31, from the manner of the resurrection to its fact, Jesus does not cite Dan 12:1–3 (or other possible biblical proof-texts for the resurrection) but a Pentateuchal text. He accordingly meets the Sadducees (who recognized only the authority of Moses) on their own ground. He cites Ex 3:6. The point seems to be this: God does not say, 'I was the God of Abraham, etc.' but 'I am the God of Abraham, etc.'—even though Abraham and the others are dead at the time of the pronouncement. They therefore cannot have ceased to be.

(22:34–40) A representative of the Pharisees continues the series of hostile challenges begun in 21:23. Again the issue regards Torah, and again Jesus speaks truth without becoming ensnared. His summary of the law and the prophets, which recapitulates the unifying theme of his own words and deeds, simply joins, against all possible complaint, two traditional Jewish summaries, the commandment to love God (part of the Shema, Judaism's closest thing to a creed) and the commandment to love neighbour (which Akiba reportedly called 'the greatest principle in the law', Sipre Lev. 19:18; cf. Gal 5:14; Rom 13:8–10). Together they summarize the Decalogue (cf. Philo, Dec. 19–20, 50–1, 106–10, 121, 154). Jesus, although asked for the greatest commandment, answers with two which are inextricable. ('A second is like it' is purely numerical; the second commandment equals in importance the first.) But Matthew does not clarify how the two commandments to love relate to one another. Evagrius Ponticus argued that love of neighbour is love of God because it is love of the image of God. Theodore of Cyrrhus urged that, as contemplation is to action, so love of God is to love of neighbour: the one is the foundation of and inspiration for the other. We imitate what we love; so to love God is to imitate the One whose love is catholic (5:43–8). Ailred of Rievaulx contended that 'love of neighbour precedes love of God': the latter grows out of the former. Luther argued that while our neighbour is needy, God needs nothing, so true service of God must always be for the sake of the neighbour. Harnack thought that the gospel places love of neighbour beside love of God because 'the love of one's neighbour is the only practical proof on earth of that love of God which is strong in humanity'. While there may be an element of truth in the other proposals, Evagrius' claim resonates most with the rest of Matthew. For there is some sense in which, according to Matthew, God is in others. Especially striking is 25:31–46. In this, Jesus, the functional presence of God (cf. 1:23; 18:20; 28:20), is the direct recipient of acts of love done to others: 'as you did it to one of the least of these...' Service of neighbour is service of Christ, which means service of God. Chrysostom was right: 'to love God is to love one's neighbour'. As the agraphon has it: 'You have seen your brother; you have seen God.'

Often cited as a parallel to our verse is b. Šabb. 31a, where Hillel, in response to a request to teach the Torah while standing on one foot, answered with this: 'What you hate for yourself, do not do to your neighbour. This is the whole law. The rest is commentary.' This is even closer to Matthew than the commentaries indicate; for in Jewish tradition, as in Christian, the Golden Rule (or its negative form) was thought synonymous with Lev 19:18, cited here (cf. Tg. Yer. 1 on 19:18; Sipre Lev. on 19:18).

Lev 19:18 is quoted three times in this gospel, more than any other OT text: at 5:43; 19:19; 22:39. The first citation expands the meaning of neighbour to make it universal: even the enemy is to be loved. The second citation reveals Lev 19:18's status as a fundamental summary of the moral demands of the Decalogue. The third brings the love of neighbour into intimate connection with the commandment to love God and thus, in typically Matthean fashion, fuses religion and ethics.

(22:41–6) Following the narrative introduction (v. 41), Jesus abandons his defensive posture and takes the offensive. He asks the Pharisees two questions (v. 42a). After they return their expected, two-word answer (v. 42b), Jesus asks two more questions, this time quoting Scripture (vv. 43–5). In the narrative conclusion (v. 46) the opponents are unable to respond. This effectively closes off 21:23–22:46, throughout which Jesus has been asked question after question.

Jesus' questions, unlike those of his opponents, go to the heart of things, for they concern Christology. The first question, 'What do you think of the Messiah?' is completed by the second, so that the meaning is: 'Whose son is the Messiah?' The answer of the Pharisees, 'David's', is only half the truth. The other half, unpronounced by Jesus but clear from the rest of the narrative, is: 'God's'. Jesus' argument makes two assumptions: (1) in accordance with Jewish tradition, David composed Ps 110 (cf. the superscription) and (2) Ps 110 is messianic (cf. 23:39). It follows that David wrote about 'the Lord' (i.e. God) speaking to 'my Lord', and that the latter must be the messianic Son of David (cf. v. 42). We have here an apparent contradiction. For how can one standing at the right hand of God and addressed as 'Lord' be David's 'son'? A son may address his father as 'Lord' (cf. 21:29), but a father does not so speak to his son. The Pharisees' silence shows that they have no solution to the riddle, even though it is superficial for the Christian reader, who knows that although the Messiah is of the lineage of David, he is also exalted to God's right hand and reigns as 'Lord'. The 'Son of David'—neither the title nor its content is rejected or denigrated—is a descendant of King David, and his destiny surpasses that of his forebear.

(23:1–39) Ch. 23 does not criticize isolated beliefs or activities; rather its charges amount to a rejection of Pharisaism itself. Surprisingly, however, Mt 23 does not censor the scribes and Pharisees for failure to believe in Messiah Jesus. Instead it convicts them by their own standards. No scribe or Pharisee would have defended hypocrisy, or commended the slaying of God's prophets, or affirmed that preoccupation with the lesser matters of the law should be at the expense of the greater. So the text presupposes that the scribes and Pharisees actually know better: they are hypocrites in the full sense of the word. The presupposition is possible because the scribes and Pharisees, like those in Matthew's community, were heirs to the Jewish tradition. Matthew's Jesus accordingly argues as a Jew with Jews: the leaders have been unfaithful to their own tradition.

Matthew's Jesus here passes from woe to woe; his polemic depicts the scribes and Pharisees as more than hard-hearted: they are already suffering spiritual rigor mortis. Yet surely the best of them were admirable men who faithfully practised their religion and honestly doubted that the Messiah had come. Without either excusing the harsh language or minimizing its historical misuses, one may emphasize the conventional nature of the chapter's polemical rhetoric. Josephus depicted the Zealots or Sicarii as murderers, transgressors of the laws of God and nature, impostors, madmen, hard-hearted wretches, 'bastards' and 'scum' more wicked than Sodom, as men guilty of 'barbarity...avarice...impudent undertakings...wicked practices, impiety...tyranny over others...the greatest madness...wild and brutish disposition' (J.W. 4.377–8; 5.401–19, 442–5; 7.252–74). Those who wrote the Dead Sea scrolls laid every sort of pejorative adjective upon 'the sons of darkness', whom they cursed in their rituals. The thoroughly traditional nature of Matthew's polemic is demonstrated by the many Jewish sources in which opponents are hypocrites (1QS 4:14), blind (cf. Wis 2:21), guilty of economic sins (cf. As. Mos. 5:5), unclean (cf. Jos. J.W. 4.382), persecutors of the righteous (cf. Philo, Leg. ad Gaium, 18.120 ff.), like sinful generations of the past (cf. T. Levi, 14:6), like snakes (cf. 4Q525 5:1–4), destined for eschatological destruction (cf. m. Sanh. 10:1), and the cause of God forsaking his temple (cf. Jos. J.W. 2.539). In Matthew's world one's opponents were, as a rule, these things and much else besides. The language of vilification was as stereotyped as the language of praise. Accordingly we have here no more a fair account of Pharisaic Judaism than we have such an account of Christianity in later pagan polemic. Moreover, the ferocity of rhetoric in Jewish texts shows Matthew's polemic need not signal a break with Judaism. It is no more 'anti-Semitic' than the Dead Sea scrolls.

(23:1–12) These verses condemn hypocrisy (v. 3), religious show (vv. 4–6), and self-exaltation (v. 7). They commend obedience to the truth (v. 3), equality (v. 8), and humility (vv. 11–12). The same vices and virtues have been assailed and praised before, especially in the SM and ch. 18.

'Moses' seat' (v. 2) is ambiguous. It may either refer to a literal chair for synagogue authorities or be a metaphor for teaching authority (cf. the professor's 'chair'). In any case only here are the Jewish leaders presented in a positive light: they should be obeyed. Some have suggested we have here a pre-Matthean tradition out of harmony with the rest of the gospel, others that the command belongs only to the pre-Easter period, still others that it is ironic. It is also possible to regard the 'all' as hyperbole. The sentence indicts the scribes and the Pharisees by parading their inconsistencies. 'Do whatever they teach' is then less practical imperative than proof of a bad character which cannot be excused by ignorance. The focus is not upon Christian obedience but upon the opponents' knowledge, which condemns them. Yet another possibility is that 'whatever they teach you' refers to their reading of Scripture, 'they do' to Pharisaic doctrine and practice.

'Phylacteries' (v. 5) are the two black leather boxes containing parchment Scriptures that, since at least the second century BCE, have been commonly worn on the upper left arm and forehead following the literal understanding of Ex 13:9, 16; Deut 6:8; 11:18. Their ostentatious and superstitious use can be documented (cf. Christian use of medallions and crosses). 'Fringes' (which Jesus himself wears: 9:20; 14:36) consist of blue and/or white threads worn on the four corners of the rectangular outer garment (cf. Num 15:38–9; Deut 22:12). The presumption is that the scribes and Pharisees who make their tassels long (cf. Sipre Num. 15:37–41) do so to gain attention. The attack is not against a scriptural ordinance but its observance for self-glorification.

Unlike the scribes and Pharisees (v. 7) Christian authorities are to shun titles. Such titles are inconsistent with the demand for humility and mutuality and the need to restrict certain appellations to God and Christ. It is implied that the scribes and Pharisees enjoy wrongful flattery and think in hierarchical terms.

(23:13–33) The seven woes, in which the judge of the last day humbles the exalted in illustration of v. 12, draws a firm line between two groups by criticizing one. The scribes and Pharisees, here representatives of emergent rabbinic Judaism, are depicted as hopelessly corrupt. The upshot is edification and self-definition, for the debasement of the church's antagonists both indirectly vindicates the faithful and exhibits, through counter-examples, what the church should not be.

The woes, which commence with halakic disagreements and culminate in the murder of God's messengers, mirror the plot of the whole gospel, in which religious disputes lead to Jesus' death. Further, although ch. 23 strikes the reader as distinctive, this is not because its content is new: the woes constitute a climax, not a novum. All of the major accusations and assertions have already been made (cf. e.g. vv. 13, 15, with 11:21 and 18:7, vv. 13, 15, 25–8 with 15:7 and 22:18, and v. 13 with 5:20). Even the polemical harshness of 23:13–33 is not unique (cf. 22:1 ff.). New is its concentrated repetition alone.

The first woe (v. 13) appropriately prefaces the series as a sort of summary: the scribes and Pharisees, despite their religious efforts, neither enter the kingdom nor allow others to. The second woe (v. 14) indicts the scribes and Pharisees not because they are missionaries, but because their missionary activity, which makes others like themselves, has tragic effects. The problem is not conversion to Judaism but conversion to Judaism without the Messiah.

The third woe (vv. 16–22), which turns to specific halakah, argues first against the distinction between binding and non-binding oaths (vv. 16–19) and secondly asserts that all oaths are binding because all oaths relate themselves to God (vv. 20–22). In 5:33–7 oaths are attacked. Here their use is assumed. Common to both passages, however, is the idea that to swear by one thing is to swear by another. Indeed, both assert that to swear by heaven is to swear by God's throne. Evidently vv. 16–22 presuppose Jesus' criticism of oaths (understood as hyperbole, not halakah?) and present additional criticism of non-binding oaths.

The fourth woe (vv. 23–4) condemns not tithing but a lack of justice, mercy, and faith. The lesser things, however useful or needful, must never eclipse the greater. ‘Strain out a gnat’ refers to straining wine, as in Am 6:6. According to Lev 11:41, ‘all creatures that swarm upon the earth are detestable; they shall not be eaten’. This verse was understood to require the straining of wine so as to keep out small insects. When it is added that the camel, like the gnat, was reckoned unclean (Lev 11:4), the point of v. 24 becomes plain: while the scribes and Pharisees strain their wine and so do not swallow the tiniest bugs that defile—a practice not here obviously rejected—they overlook the large things that defile, that is, they swallow the camel (a proverbially large beast: 19:24).

The fifth woe (vv. 25–6) adds to the charge that the scribes and Pharisees do the less important thing to the neglect of the more important. They cleanse the outside of the cup and plate but neglect the inside. They appear to be righteous (cf. 23:2–7, 23a) but inside are full of extortion and intemperance. (vv. 25–6 are about neither the purity of vessels nor legal matters, nor is v. 25 to be understood literally, v. 26 figuratively. Both verses rather speak metaphorically: the leaders are dirty cups and dishes. That is, they are clean on the outside (they have a righteous appearance) but impure on the inside (cf. vv. 27–8).)

The sixth woe (vv. 27–8) likens the scribes and Pharisees to tombs, which they regarded as unclean. The phrase translated ‘whitewashed tombs’ may refer to monuments or tombstones that were plastered. Porous limestone structures were often plastered with lime to smooth surfaces and add a sheen. One may picture beautiful monuments and their finished splendour.

The seventh woe (vv. 29–33) is the most serious and so climactic. Because v. 33 recalls the Baptist’s words to the Pharisees and Sadducees in 3:7 (cf. also 12:34), Jesus again speaks like John, and his message is that of his forerunner: the Pharisees cannot escape eschatological wrath (cf. Rev 6:15–17). It follows that the character of the Pharisees has not changed, that the ministries of John and Jesus have been in one important way without effect.

(23:34–9) These verses, which record a definite rejection of Jerusalem and Israel’s leaders, outline Jerusalem’s history: (1) a time of overture and rejection, when the city was sent prophets who were murdered (the past, v. 37); (2) a time of abandonment, from the Son of Man’s departure to the parousia (the present, v. 38); (3) the time of repentance and reconciliation, in which the Messiah is welcomed (the future, v. 39).

‘Zechariah, son of Barachiah’ (v. 35) is difficult. Zech 1:1 refers to its author as ‘Zechariah, son of berekyâ’. There is, however, no biblical evidence of his death as a martyr; and, as Jerome observed, the temple was in ruins in his time. The one biblical martyr named Zechariah is the son of Jehoiada, a priest whose story appears near the end of Chronicles. Jewish tradition, however, conflated the prophet Zechariah with the son of Jehoiada, and given that the death of the latter became the popular subject of legends, we may assume the same identification is made in our text. The passage refers to the murders of the righteous from Gen 4 (the first murder in the HB) to 2 Chr 24 (the last murder in the HB).

Ch. 23 concludes by referring to two events that are closely related in the next chapter, the destruction of Jerusalem (v. 38) and the Parousia of the Son of Man (v. 39). ‘Until you say’ probably signals a conditional sentence. The meaning is that when his people bless him the Messiah will come. While Israel’s redemption may be, on the basis of the OT and 19:28, a firm hope, its date is contingent upon Israel’s acceptance of Jesus.

vv. 37–9 temper what has gone before. Without these verses the Jesus of ch. 23 issues nothing but judgements, with no tinge of regret. But the conclusion discloses that the woes are uttered in sadness, that the indignation is righteous. When the threats give way to the image of Jesus as a mother hen lamenting her loss, the reader is reminded of the compassionate Son of 11:28–30. In this way the prophetic judgements are mingled with affection and Jesus becomes, like Jeremiah, a reluctant prophet.

(24:1–35) The introductory scene in which Jesus predicts the temple’s destruction (vv. 1–2) provokes a query concerning the timing of things to come, to which Jesus first responds with warnings and predictions about eschatological tribulation: the beginning of the woes in the world at large (vv. 3–8), the intensification of the woes in the church (vv. 9–14), the climax of the woes in Judea (vv. 15–28).

Much of the traditional end-time scenario is untouched. There is, for example, no account of either the resurrection or the eternal state. Mt 24 is not a detailed blueprint (cf. the chronological imprecision). Interest is elsewhere—(1) in supplying the true ending of the Messiah’s story so that the whole can be rightly grasped; (2) in foretelling and therefore making bearable Christian suffering; (3) in nurturing hope by showing how a good future can issue from an evil present; and (4) in encouraging battle against moral languor. Concerning this last, imperatives appear in vv. 4, 6, 16–18, 20, 23, 26, and 32. So eschatology does not simply console: it also demands discernment and adherence to Jesus’ commands. The eschatological imagination does not displace practical moral concern.

Beyond these generalities the reference of the whole is disputed (a situation largely due to the lack of any direct answer to the question in v. 3). One approach holds that much or most of Mt 24 is fulfilled prophecy—that vv. 3–32 or 35 have to do with the events surrounding the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE within Jesus’ ‘generation’, vv. 36–44 with the parousia, whose date is unknown. A second opinion, which holds that ch. 24 is purely eschatological, is favoured by the ‘immediately’ of v. 29; for if Matthew wrote much after 70 CE, he could not have thought the parousia would follow immediately upon the destruction of the temple, which in turn makes it unlikely that vv. 15–22 depict that destruction. A third option urges that our text refers to both the destruction of Jerusalem and the parousia and holds them in close chronological sequence (which would imply a date for Matthew c.70 CE). A fourth approach also thinks of both 70 CE and the end. Unlike the third, however, it finds not a chronological sequence—the destruction of the temple, then (soon) the end—but a single prophecy with two fulfilments.

It seems best to hold that vv. 4–28 are a depiction of the entire post-Easter period, interpreted in terms of the messianic woes. The discourse concerns the past, the present, and the future. What has happened will continue to happen and indeed worsen (cf. 2 Thess 2:7). Whether the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE is directly referred to in vv. 15–22 or is instead indirectly included in the tribulations of that section remains unclear. But if the former, 70 CE does not exhaust the significance of vv. 5–22, which plainly envisage eschatological events to come. So the answer to the disciples' two-part question in v. 3 is this: the temple will be destroyed during the tribulation of the latter days, which runs from the first advent to the second; and after that tribulation the end—whose date cannot be known—will come.

Ch. 24 interprets the interim between the two advents as the time of messianic woe, when Jesus is absent. But 28:16–20—which recalls this discourse in that it also features a mountain, refers to 'the end of the age', alludes to Dan 7:13, and proclaims the Gentile mission—depicts the age of the church as one of Jesus' consoling and all-powerful presence. The two different perspectives on the same period reflect Christian experience. Jesus is even now the present Lord who rules heaven and earth. But he is also the absent master whose delay permits evil to inflict tribulation.

While it alludes to many OT texts, Mt 24 draws especially upon Daniel: cf. v. 3 with Dan 9:26; 12:6–7, v. 6 with Dan 9:26; 11:44, vv. 9–11 with Dan 7:25; 11:33, v. 15 with Dan 8:13; 9:27; 11:31; 12:11, v. 21 with Dan 12:11, and v. 30 with Dan 7:13. These clear allusions and the explicit citation of 'the prophet Daniel' (v. 15) are proof that, in Matthew, the end-time scenario fulfils the words of Daniel and Jesus simultaneously.

v. 2 prophesies the end of the temple (cf. 26:61; 27:40). This is usually thought of as a fulfilled prophecy for the reader, who knows the events of 70 CE. The declaration does not of itself question the legitimacy of the cult. Other Jewish prophets foretold doom without attacking the Pentateuch. What we have here is a tragic forecast of a disaster fostered by human sin. The destruction of the temple is God's verdict upon the capital.

Regarding vv. 4–5, the first century saw several famous false prophets who made eschatological claims. That any of them (before Bar Kochba) said, in so many words, 'I am Messiah' is not documented. But several of them did identify themselves as the eschatological prophet like Moses, a figure Matthew equated with Messiah. So for him the two things were one. This verse is then about Jewish messianic deceivers.

The climax of the woes concerns three subjects: the abomination which marks the time for flight (vv. 15–20), the shortening of the tribulation (vv. 21–2), and false Christs and prophets (vv. 23–8). 'The desolating sacrilege' (v. 15) is from the prophet Daniel, where it refers to the pagan altar and/or image of Olympian Zeus set up in the Jerusalem temple by Antiochus IV Epiphanes in 167 BCE. Here it could refer to the destruction of the temple in 70 CE, or some future, eschatological defilement and destruction, and perhaps even activities of an antichrist (cf. 2 Thess 2:3–4). In any case the sacrilege sets off a series of frightful events which one should flee. As in 10:23, eschatological flight will be interrupted by the return of the Son of Man (v. 29). Whether one is fleeing from evil or fleeing because God, in response to the abomination, is about to let loose his wrath (cf. Gen 19), is not stated. It is also not stated why one should pray that flight not come on a sabbath. But it is probably because members of Matthew's community still observed the sabbath; and, given the traditional travel restrictions, they would be both hesitant and unprepared for flight on the day of rest.

vv. 24–5 makes three points: (1) Jesus himself has made it plain that signs and wonders are not of themselves guarantees of God's activity: incredulity has its place (cf. 7:21–3); (2) tribulation can be no surprise for it has been predicted and so it must be endured; (3) unlike the false prophets, Jesus' prophecy is true.

v. 28, which ends the review of tribulation, was an old proverb (cf. Job 9:26; Seneca, Ep. 95. 43). Here its meaning may be that the coming of the Son of Man will be as public and obvious as eagles or vultures circling over carrion. Less likely is the thought that the eschatological tribulation will be concluded by vultures devouring the flesh of the wicked dead, as in Ezek 39:17.

The paragraph in vv. 29–31 ends the tribulation and narrates the parousia in the traditional language of the OT theophany so that Jesus' coming is the arrival of God's glory. Having, in v. 28, moved the mind's eye from earth to sky, the text now directs our gaze even higher. This imaginative raising of vision leaves distress behind and prepares for envisaging the good help that comes from heaven (v. 30).

The supernatural darkness of the consummation (v. 29) is richly symbolic. Not only does it belong to the correlation of beginning and end (cf. Gen 1:2), but it is a sign of both divine judgement (Am 5:18, 20) and mourning (Jer 4:27–8) and becomes the velvet background for the Son of Man's splendour (24:27, 30). Moreover, on the literary level it foreshadows the darkness of Jesus' death (27:45) while that darkness in turn presages the world's assize.

vv. 31–2 are the dramatic zenith of ch. 24. The coming of the Son of Man—which takes place neither in desert nor inner room but is universally witnessed—is what 24:3–28 introduce and that for which vv. 32–44 call one to look. 'The sign of the Son of Man' (an unparalleled expression) might be the sign which is the Son of Man himself, or rather his coming. More likely 'sign' means the same as the Hebrew nēs, 'ensign': the Son of Man will signal the eschatological battle by raising an eschatological sign. In Israel a ram's horn was blown to rally the tribes for war. This act was accompanied by the raising of a standard upon a hill. The standard consisted of a wooden pole upon whose top crosspiece was an insignia, most often an animal. In Isaiah the old custom is put to prophetic use: the Lord himself will raise a standard and call for war (Isa 13:2–4), or the root of Jesse will 'stand as a signal to the peoples' (Isa 11:10). The old tradition that the cross will accompany Jesus at his parousia has a straightforward explanation if 'sign' means nēs, for the nēs had a crossbar and would naturally have encouraged Christians to think of a cross.

vv. 34–6 recall v. 3. But the reference to 'generation' has seemed problematic because unfulfilled. Some have referred 'all these things' to 70 CE. But it seems best to think of the eschatological signs as outlined in vv. 4–29: the parousia will come to pass before Jesus' 'generation' has gone. In favour of this is the imminent eschatological expectation of many early Christians (cf. 10:23) as well as Jn 21:20–3, which reflects the belief that Jesus would come before all his disciples had died.

Matthew's last major discourse is the only one to treat eschatology exclusively. But the other four end by turning to the last things. So the pattern of the individual discourses is the pattern of the five taken together: the conclusion is always eschatology. The meaning of Matthew's story is determined not only by its literary ending but by the ending of history itself: if history's conclusion is not Christological, then Christology itself becomes a question.

(24:36–25:30) The declaration of ignorance in v. 36 grounds the entire section: one must be ever prepared for what may come at any time. There follow as illustrations (1) a simile: as it was in the days of Noah, when unexpected judgement suddenly fell, so shall it be at the Son of Man's parousia (vv. 37–9); (2) a description of the division caused by the coming of the Son of Man plus an imperative: one will be taken, one left, so watch (vv. 40–2); and (3) a parable and its application: the Son of Man will come as unexpectedly as a thief, so be ready (vv. 43–4). These sayings and similes preface three long parables—the faithful and wise servant (24:45–51), the wise and foolish virgins (25:1–13), the talents (25:14–30). All three concern the delay of the parousia, preparedness for the end, and recompense at the great assize.

If 24:4–36 should quell uninformed eschatological enthusiasm, the intended effect is not apathy. This is why 24:37–44 seeks to foster an appropriate eschatological vigilance. Ignorance concerning the date of the end (24:36), although necessary, is dangerous, for it can lead to spiritual lethargy. But in Matthew it leads instead to moral preparation. For the parousia (like death) may come at any time. So one must be ever prepared to give an account before the divine justice, from which there is no escape (25:31–46).

24:37–51 conjures up scenes from everyday life—people eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, two men in a field, two women at a mill, a man asleep in his house, a slave doing his duty, a slave not doing his duty. These images of day-to-day existence stand in stark contrast to the unusual, even surrealistic events depicted in 24:4–31—wars, famines, earthquakes, flights, darkened luminaries, a sign in the firmament, the Son of Man on the clouds of heaven. But the transition from the extraordinary to the ordinary serves Matthew's purpose. Those whose imaginations hold the terrors and hope of things to come still live in the mundane present; they must still work in the field and grind at the mill.

24:36 invites the vigilance of eschatological agnosticism. Irenaeus could take the declaration of Jesus' ignorance at face value. But Luke omits the saying, as did certain copyists of Matthew and Mark. Origen wondered whether Jesus was referring to the church of which he is the head. Ambrose attributed 'nor the Son' to Arian interpolation. Athanasius suggested that Jesus only feigned ignorance. But modern theology, emphasizing with the creeds that Jesus was 'truly man', has come to terms with the saying as an expression of kenosis, or the self-emptying of the Son of God.

In 24:40–1 one is taken and one is left. But are the righteous taken to meet the Lord in the air? Or are the wicked removed by angels and cast into fire? The former is more likely: the picture of angels taking the saints to meet the Son of Man was probably common in early Christianity (cf. Mk 13:27).

The parable of the servant (24:45–51) is congruent with an agraphon preserved in Justin, Dial. 47: 'In whatsoever I find you, in this will I also judge you.' But 24:45–51 may be especially for community leaders, for the 'servant' is set over 'fellow servants' to give them their food at the proper time. Such a reading has been popular from the the early church to today.

The parable of the wise and foolish virgins (25:1–13) is an allegory of the parousia of Christ, the heavenly bridegroom: the virgins represent the Christian community, the delay of the bridegroom is the delay of the Son of Man's return, the sudden coming is the unexpected arrival of his parousia, and the spurning of the foolish virgins is the great assize. The parable teaches three lessons: (1) the bridegroom delays and comes at an unforeseen time; this means yet again that no one knows the date of the Son of Man's parousia; (2) the wise virgins, who stand for the faithful, reveal that religious prudence will gain eschatological reward; (3) the foolish virgins, who stand for unfaithful disciples, reveal that those unprepared at the end will suffer eschatological punishment.

Whether or not one uses the word 'allegory', 25:14–30 is filled with obvious symbols. The master stands for Jesus, his slaves for the church, whose members have received various responsibilities. The master's departure represents the departure of the earthly Jesus, and his long absence is the age of the church. His return is the return of the Son of Man. The rewards given to the good slaves stand for heavenly rewards given to the faithful at the great assize, and their joy is that of the messianic banquet. The punishment of the evil slave represents those within the church who, through their sins of omission, condemn themselves to eschatological darkness. Most of this is familiar, but the passage is not otiose. Repetition makes for emphasis. Moreover, new are the notions that Christians have received gifts according to their ability (v. 15) and that it is what they make of those gifts which counts in the end.

(25:31–46) Although reminiscent of earlier parables of separation (13:24–30, 36–43, 47–50), this, the poetic and dramatic climax of the final major discourse, is not a parable but a 'word-picture of the Last Judgement' (Manson 1949: 249). The previous pericopae have enjoined readers to be faithful, to be prepared, and to invest talents. But exactly what these things entail has not been explicit. This passage makes all clear and so culminates Matthew's eschatologically grounded paraenesis. One prepares for the parousia by living the imperative to love one's neighbours, especially the marginalized. By this will all be judged on the far side of history.

The identity of those gathered (panta ta ethnē) is disputed, but they are probably all humanity. For the passage belongs to a long section which is full of paraenesis for believers, and one expects here a solemn appeal to those within the church. It also seems best to identify 'the least of these my brethren' in v. 40 (cf. v. 45) with the needy in general (and not with all Christians or Christian missionaries or leaders). This identification is consistent with the command to ignore distinctions between insiders and outsiders and with Jesus' injunction to love even enemies.

The concept of service to Jesus through service to others goes back to Prov 19:17: 'Whoever is kind to the poor lends to the Lord, and will be repaid in full.' What is new in Matthew is the Son of Man's identification with the needy. This novelty is, however, not explained. Do we have here the real personal presence of the Son of Man in the poor? Or what one scholar has called 'juridical mysticism'? Or the identification of the world's king with his people?

Feeding the hungry, welcoming strangers, and visiting the sick are mundane acts. In this sense 'virtue is not far from us, nor is it without ourselves, but it is within us, and is easy if only we are willing' (Anthony the Great). The Son of Man does not demand supernatural feats but simple, unobtrusive charity. The former but not the latter can easily be counterfeited (24:24). Charity is accordingly the true test of faith.

The Passion and the Resurrection (26:1–28:20)

(26:1–5) vv. 1–2 + 3–4 together constitute the prologue to the passion narrative. They are parallel in structure but antithetical in content. In the first Jesus prophesies his black future. In the second the chief priests and elders conspire against him (cf. Ps 2:2). (The absence of the Pharisees here and hereafter—except only 27:62—surprises; but historically no doubt Jesus' opponents at the end were the temple aristocracy. This also explains why the scribes henceforth appear only in 26:57 and 27:41.)

'After two days' (v. 2) may allude to the Isaac traditions. Gen 22:4 puts the sacrifice of Isaac on the third day, and in Jubilees it is during Passover (17:15; 18:3), while in Ps.-Philo, LAB 32:1–4 Isaac voluntarily offers himself (cf. 4 Macc 16:20). Further, a parallel between Jesus and Isaac is explicit in Barn. 7.2 (cf. already Rom 8:32?), and Mt 26:36 could allude to Gen 22:2–5.

(26:6–13) While Jesus is at the home of Simon 'the leper'—yet another befriended outcast—a woman, with motives unknown, performs an extravagant act which inevitably suggests Jesus' messianic status: he is the anointed one. (Cf. Dodd 1963: 173: 'the idea of an anointing, as of a king or priest, which is also an embalming of the dead', means that Jesus is 'the messianic King whose throne is a cross'.) Because anointing was evidently customary at feasts (cf. Ps 23:5), one may think the woman affectionately anoints Jesus as part of a celebration (cf. Ps 45:7). The use of 'head', however, makes one think of the OT narratives in which kings are anointed. The disciples' pious denigration is not about the act itself but the luxurious waste. Jesus' different opinion rejects utilitarian calculation. He praises the woman's deed as above almsgiving because it shows her 'personal commitment of love for the specific person of Jesus at a time of urgent need rather than an impersonal giving to the general group of the poor always in need' (Heil 1991: 26; cf. Deut 15:11). The situation is akin to 8:21–2, where allegiance to Jesus also means leaving a good deed undone. Here such allegiance means not being prudent with resources, even when they could benefit the poor.

(26:14–16) In contrast with the woman who anoints Jesus, Judas (cf. 10:4) acts treacherously. While she unselfishly gives what she has, Judas seeks his own gain; and whereas her sacrifice is costly, Judas strikes his bargain for a relatively paltry sum. In complete antithesis to everything Jesus has taught, Judas wants money (cf. 1 Tim 6:10). None the less Judas later returns the silver, so his avarice is not unbounded.

v. 15, which anticipates 27:9, stands under the influence of Zech 11:12: 'So they weighed out as my wages thirty shekels of silver.' This text shows that the betrayal is in accord with what God has foreseen. Indeed, the apparent triumph of evil is mysteriously also the work of God—as in Gen 50:20: 'Even though you intended to do harm to me, God intended it for good.' There might also be an allusion to Ex 21:32: Judas reckons Jesus worth no more than a slave. Whether that is so or not the amount is surely intended to be trifling; and his action likens him to the guards at the tomb, whose cowardice leads them to lie: they also take silver from the authorities (28:11–15).

When Judas strikes his bargain Jesus' freedom to speak and act is almost gone. This lends emphasis to what follows, for what Jesus does with time running out has special meaning. In other words, vv. 14–16 not only make the time before the arrest tense with anticipation, they also indicate that the narrative is about to depict Jesus' final free acts and in this way enlarge the significance of those acts.

(26:17–29) Jesus, as a law-observant Jew, celebrates the Passover within Jerusalem. vv. 26–9, which record the foundation of the Lord's supper, interpret the tragedy revealed in vv. 20–5 as redemptive: the betrayed Jesus is a sacrifice whose blood is poured out 'for many'. The passage is enriched by its links with other texts. vv. 26*a* and 27*a* strongly recall the two feeding stories of chs. 14 and 15: the last supper has been foreshadowed by the miraculous multiplications. Our passage has also often been connected with the bread of the Lord's prayer, while 'this is the blood of the covenant' takes up Ex 24:8 and makes the act of Jesus resemble an act of Moses. The reference to 'covenant' might also allude to Jer 31:31. 'For many' and 'poured out' probably advert to Isa 53:12 and so imply that Jesus in his death is the suffering servant of Isaiah.

The connections with Ex 24:8 are perhaps particularly important. Mark and Luke make Jesus' last supper a Passover Seder. Jn 6 links the bread of the eucharist with the manna given to Israel during the Exodus. In 1 Cor 10:1–4 participation in the Lord's supper is likened to drinking from the rock which followed Israel in the desert. And Heb 9:15–22 uses eucharistic language in retelling the story of Moses' covenantal sacrifice. Clearly it was conventional to view the last supper as part of a new exodus. And so it is in Matthew. The last supper is foreshadowed by stories in which Jesus is like Moses and contains parallels with the Exodus narrative: Jesus celebrates the Passover, vv. 17–18 (cf. Ex 12); the disciples do as Jesus directs them, v. 19 (cf. Ex 12:28); and the blood of the covenant is poured out for the forgiveness of sins, v. 28 (cf. Ex 24:8 and the targums on this). The last redeemer is as the first.

The command to eat, followed by 'this is my body', implies participation in the death of Jesus or its effects: just as those who partake of Passover share in the redemption from Egypt, so too those who take and eat share in the benefits of Jesus' atoning death. While so much is clear, bitter debate has centred upon Jesus' words. There is a natural tendency to think of 'blood' and 'body' as correlative: together they are the elements of sacrifice, or the two elements making up a person. But in Luke and Paul the two elements are separated by a meal. Moreover, the Greek 'body' (sōma) can mean simply 'self'.

The identification of the elements with the body and blood of Jesus Christ has made much of the verb, estin ('is'), and taken it literally. But others have found here only figurative representation: the bread symbolizes Jesus or what will happen to him. This accords with the use of 'is' in 13:19–23, 37–9 ('this is that' means 'this represents that'). The truth is that estin has a range of uses and is in itself ambiguous. Moreover, we cannot determine what Matthew believed about the elements—whether, for example, we should think of him as being closer to Luther than to Zwingli—or whether the categories from later theological debates would even be relevant.

The prophecy of abstinence in v. 29 is another passion prediction: it foretells imminent death as well as eschatological victory. So the Lord's supper is not just commemorative but prophetic. One wonders whether the sequence in Ex 24:8–11 underlies vv. 28–9. In Exodus the establishing of the covenant through blood is followed by eating and drinking and seeing God. In Matthew the proclamation of the eschatological covenant through blood prefaces the promise of the eschatological banquet. Already Isa 24:23–25:8 takes up the language of Ex 24:8–11 to prophesy the future and the eschatological feast.

(26:30–5) From this gloomy prophecy of impending events, which is almost an outline of the remainder of the gospel, we learn the future (1) of the disciples—they will all fall away and be scattered but later gathered in Galilee to see Jesus; (2) of Peter—he will deny his Lord three times before the cock crows; and (3) of Jesus—he will be killed but then raised and appear to his disciples in Galilee. Because the last supper is a Passover meal, many have referred 'sung the hymn' to the custom of singing at Passover the second half of the great Hallel (Ps 114–18). But first-century Christian readers may also or instead have thought of hymns sung with or after the eucharist. v. 30 (cf. 21:1; 24:3) alludes to 2 Sam 15:30 where David, who has been plotted against by his trusted royal counsellor, Ahithophel, leaves Jerusalem and goes up 'the ascent of the Mount of Olives'. There the king weeps and prays for deliverance (cf. Gethsemane). That Matthew intends the parallelism follows from 27:3–10, where Judas is modelled upon Ahithophel. Perhaps then it is more than coincidence that Ahithophel wants to overtake David at night (2 Sam 17:1; cf. Mt 26:31) with 12,000 men (17:1; cf. Mt 26:53) so that he can strike (pataxō, 17:2; cf. Mt 26:31) the king and cause all the people with him (meta autou, 17:2; cf. Mt 26:18, 20, 38, 40, 51, 69, 71) to flee (pheuxetai pas, 17:2; cf. Mt 26:56).

v. 31 quotes Zech 13:7. Zechariah's imperative 'smite' becomes in the NT 'I will smite' (cf. Ex 12:13; 2 Sam 17:2, both LXX). This emphasizes God's activity. The promise of restoration in v. 32 (fulfilled in 28:16–20; cf. 28:7, 10), which offers forgiveness in advance, reverses the scattering and so softens the disciples' failure. It alone is not disputed by Peter.

(26:36–46) One can embrace death because one hopes it a good (so Plato's Socrates) or one can resist it because one thinks it an evil (as in Jewish legends about Abraham and Moses). Jesus does neither. Although he recoils from death, or at least crucifixion, his course is fixed by the will of God, and this overrides whatever beliefs or feelings he has about death. For Jesus the issue is not death but submission to the divine will: 'Thy will be done.' (This phrase comes from the Lord's prayer; cf. the address, 'my Father' in v. 39 and 'that you may not come into the time of trial' in v. 41.)

There are three sources of pathos in this passage. First there is the innocence of the one who suffers: like Job, he is not guilty. Secondly, Jesus, although he has plainly prophesied crucifixion for himself, here contemplates a route around suffering. Obviously he is at war with himself. Thirdly, there is Jesus' isolation. Although he comes with his disciples he soon separates himself from them and casts his face to the ground. The physical circumstances are symbolic: Jesus is alone. Despite the threefold meta ('with') linking him to others, his followers, as though indifferent, abandon him for sleep. Moreover, we likewise hear nothing from heaven. It is as if Jesus' prayers go unanswered.

Jesus goes to Gat-šemānī ('oil-press' Heb.), an olive orchard on the Mount of Olives. Following the exposition (vv. 36–8) is an alternating series of triads—three prayers of Jesus and three encounters between Jesus and the sleeping disciples. The three prayers (vv. 39, 42, 44) display much parallelism, as do the scenes in which Jesus speaks with his disciples. The whole is dominated by Jesus' speech. Four times he speaks to his disciples and three times he prays. (Asking for something three times expresses earnestness; cf. 2 Cor 12:8.) The three parallel prayers exhibit a literary technique found elsewhere (cf. Josh 6:12–14). While Jesus' first and second prayers are quoted, his third is just summarized ('saying the same words'). This recalls 20:1–16, wherein we hear the instructions given to the labourers hired at the early hour and the third hour but not the instructions given to those hired at the sixth and ninth hours. Of these last we are simply told: 'he [the householder] did the same'. Similar is 27:39–44, which quotes the mockery of two groups but says of a third: they 'also taunted him in the same way'.

The adverbial use of autou ('here') in v. 36 appears only here in Matthew. Does it allude to Gen 22:5 LXX? In the story of the binding of Isaac Abraham says to his servants: 'Stay here . . . the boy and I will go over there . . .' Is there a parallel between Abraham's faith and Jesus' faith? or between Isaac's sacrifice and Jesus' sacrifice? In addition to the parallels of wording and content just noted both Abraham and Jesus take along three people, Abraham and Isaac separate themselves from others for worship or prayer, both episodes are set on a mountain, and each involves 'trial' (peirasmon; Gen 22:1 LXX: epeiraxen).

The words which convey that Jesus' sorrow is so great as to feel fatal (v. 38) conflate Ps 41:6, 12 || 42:5 LXX with Jon 4:9. His grief, enhanced by his companions' failure to give him companionship and solace, is such that he prays for 'this cup' to pass. In T. Abr. 16:11 the angel of death calls himself 'the bitter cup of death' (cf. 1:3). But in the OT, intertestamental literature, and the Apocalypse, 'cup' is most often used figuratively in texts about suffering, especially suffering God's wrath or judgement (e.g. Ps 11:6; 116:13). And in 20:22 the cup Jesus must drink is neither temptation nor death nor martyrdom but rather eschatological sorrow, which will be first poured out upon the people of God (cf. Jer 25:15–29). It is the same here: the crucifixion belongs to the messianic woes. (Cf. further on this passage FGS κ.)

(26:47–56) The busy story of Jesus' arrest, which is unusually full of characters, pulls together several strands from earlier sections. The setting at night matches the intention of the Jewish leaders to take Jesus 'by stealth' and avoid a riot (v. 4; cf. v. 16). Judas' presence vindicates Jesus' foresight in vv. 21, 25, and 45. That the crowd is 'from the chief priests and the elders of the people' takes one back to vv. 3–5 and 14–16 and likewise to Jesus' passion predictions. Judas' use of 'rabbi' recalls v. 25 and here as there tells us he is no authentic disciple of Jesus. 'They came and laid hands on Jesus' (v. 50) makes for a literal fulfilment of 17:22. Jesus' passivity and non-resistance harmonize with his decision in Gethsemane and his earlier moral instruction (cf. the SM). The two references to Scripture (vv. 54, 56) resonate with the entirety of Matthew. And the disciples' flight shows Jesus, not his disciples, to be the true prophet (cf. vv. 31–5).

The narrative conveys sorrow through irony. Judas is no stranger but 'one of the twelve' (v. 47). The crowd has swords and clubs (v. 47) while the man they seek does not resist evil. Judas, the betrayer, kisses Jesus and greets him (v. 49). And Jesus' own disciples, instead of standing by him, forsake him and flee (v. 56). At the same time, the sorrow is balanced by Jesus' authority and the motif of fulfilment. The Messiah's fate is his own will: he decides not to ask for legions of angels (v. 53; cf. 4:6–7). Moreover, his resolution is determined by the voice of the prophets (vv. 54, 56), which is to say: Jesus' will is God's will.

(26:57–68) Jesus is neither the victim of tragic, impersonal circumstances nor the casualty of the ordinary machinery of justice. He is rather assailed by wicked people. Jesus' adversaries speak falsehoods (vv. 59–60), accuse him of blasphemy (v. 65), condemn him to death (v. 66), and viciously hit and mock him (vv. 67–8). In the midst of this sinful folly Jesus' identity becomes fully visible. He is the Son of God and Messiah who, in accordance with 2 Sam 7:14, builds the temple. He is the king of Ps 110:1 who sits at God's right hand. He is the suffering servant of Isa 50:6 whose face is spat upon. And he is the Son of Man of Dan 7:14 who will come on the clouds of heaven. The passage is, like 16:13–20, a climactic confluence of the main Christological streams which run throughout the text.

The chief literary feature of 26:57–68 is its irony (cf. the irony of 26:47–56). The authorities pass judgement on the one who will some day pass judgement on them. They, by seeking false witnesses, and the high priest, by rending his robe, disobey Moses (cf. Lev 21:10) whereas Jesus, by refusing an oath, lives by his messianic Torah. The authorities mock Jesus' claim to be the Davidic Messiah, the fulfilment of OT hopes, while their very actions bring to pass in Jesus OT prophesies. They accuse Jesus of blasphemy and yet it is they who blaspheme the Son of God. Lastly, those who accuse Jesus of saying that he will destroy the temple of God and in three days build another themselves help fulfil that prophecy; for by sentencing him to death they are creating the circumstance that makes it possible for the temple of his body to be raised in three days. So the Sanhedrin has everything backwards and it ironically acts against its own true interests. This is crystal clear to the reader. It will not, however, be evident to Jesus' persecutors until the parousia.

The Sanhedrin violates Torah (cf. Ex 20:16; Deut 5:20) and does not seek the truth. It rather wants only testimony that will incriminate Jesus. But it does fulfil the requirement of Deut 19:15 by getting two witnesses, and so despite itself the Sanhedrin hears true testimony. The words about the temple should be interpreted neither as an ecclesiastical statement—Jesus will raise up the church—nor an apocalyptic prophecy about the destruction and rebuilding of Jerusalem's temple but as a passion prediction: 'I am able to destroy the temple of God' means 'I am able to lay down my life', and 'to build it in three days' means 'to rise from the dead in three days'. This is how the prophecy is interpreted in Jn 2:21, and 'in three days' inevitably recalls Jesus' other prophecies of resurrection. Paul, moreover, shows us the possibility of speaking of the individual as a temple (1 Cor 3:16; 6:19; 2 Cor 5:1).

When the high priest stands—which is what wicked accusers do in Ps 27:12 and 35:11—he asks the fundamental question of the pericope. Jesus' silence probably alludes to Isa 53:7 (quoted in Acts 8:32), for the language of 26:67 in several respects recalls Isa 50:6. But what explains the transition from the temple saying to Christology? Zech 6:12 predicts that 'the Branch' will 'build the temple of the Lord'. And 2 Sam 7:13–14—given messianic sense in both the Dead Sea scrolls and the NT—foretells a royal figure who will build for God a house and be God's 'son'.

Jesus speaks for the last time of the Son of Man and makes a dramatic public confession. He goes beyond the high priest's question and in effect answers the question left unanswered in 22:45. 'You have said so' has affirmative sense (cf. v. 25; 27:11). Why then the indirect response? First, the wording assimilates the trial before the high priest to the trial before Pilate. Secondly, the use of 'you' puts responsibility upon Caiaphas, who knows the truth: he must live with the consequences of knowing the truth. Thirdly, given his teaching on oaths (5:33–7) Jesus may wish to distance himself from the high priest's language.

Jesus' public confession combines Ps 110:1 and Dan 7:13–14. But 'from now on' is not from the OT. The words are enigmatic because a prediction beginning 'from now on' should introduce a continuous state. Some have thought the expression stresses that Jesus' trial marks the moment of God's rejection of the Jewish people, or that the emphasis is upon the contrast between Jesus' humiliation in the present and his vindication in the near future. It is certainly intriguing that 28:18 implies the fulfilment or proleptic realization of Dan 7:14. On the other hand, 28:11–15 does not imply that the authorities are in any way changed by subsequent events; in no sense can it be said that they 'see' the Son of Man. So then maybe the Greek means in effect 'in the future'. Jesus will no longer be seen as he is now; rather will he be seen when he comes in glory, seated on a throne and riding the clouds. In line with this the verse has to do with public revelation ('you will see', 'clouds').

The scene ends with Jesus passively enduring violence and a ritual of dishonour. This makes him the exemplar of the teaching in 5:38–42. For there Jesus exhorts disciples to eschew violence and not resist evil, and several illustrations follow which borrow language from Isa 50:4–9 LXX, which, as already noted, is again alluded to in the present verse (cf. 27:30). So the OT text associated with turning the other cheek is also associated with the passion of Jesus.

(26:69–75) Earlier in this chapter Judas defects. Later the other disciples flee. Now Peter, retreating from his promise (v. 35), denies his Lord. This is the climax of the disciples' failure. The first to be called is now the last to fall away.

The first accusation is spoken to Peter by a maid, the second to bystanders by another maid, and the third to Peter by bystanders: things become more and more public. Further, the intensity of Peter's denials increases with the accusations: he first denies that he knows what is being said, then he denies with an oath that he knows Jesus, then he denies Jesus with both an oath and a curse (probably of Jesus). Peter's movements, which take him further and further away from Jesus, also add drama: he is in the courtyard, then he goes to the gateway, then he leaves altogether.

In its present context this passage supplies irony by balancing v. 74, where Jesus' prophetic powers are mocked. Although Jesus makes no appearance in our story, it shows that, so far from being a false prophet, he has predicted the events of the evening in detail. 'Before the cock crows, you will deny me three times' (v. 34) comes to literal fulfilment precisely while Jesus is being reviled with 'Prophecy to us, you Messiah!' (v. 68).

Our story also balances the trial, where Jesus, like Peter, who is not far away, faces three sets of accusers (false witnesses, v. 60, the two true witnesses, vv. 61–2, Caiaphas, vv. 63–6). There Jesus is asked whether he is the Messiah, the Son of God. He, although heretofore reticent about his identity, fearlessly confesses that he is. But Peter, who earlier confessed Jesus to be the Christ, the Son of God, no longer acknowledges his Lord: when confronted he becomes a coward. Jesus illustrates the good confession of 10:32, Peter the damning denial of 10:33.

The 'sitting' of v. 69 (cf. v. 58) interests because the disciples sit in Gethsemane (v. 36), the guards (and evidently the high priest) sit at the trial (cf. vv. 58, 62), Pilate sits when interrogating Jesus (27:19), and the soldiers at the cross likewise sit (27:36). All this contrasts with earlier chapters, in which it is Jesus who sits, that is, takes the position of authority and rest (5:1; 13:2; 15:29; 21:7; 24:3; 25:31). But after the last supper he no longer sits or reclines. He instead stands (27:11), falls to ground (26:39), and hangs from a cross (27:35). His posture during the passion reflects his temporary renunciation of authority (cf. 26:53) and the lack of all comfort.

Matthew's gospel does not idealize Peter and the other disciples. Rather does it present them as completely human, as complex and inconstant creatures who resist easy caricature. While on the one hand they leave all to follow Jesus, on the other they forsake and deny him. And Peter, who confesses Jesus to be the Christ, the Son of the living God, in the end denies that he knows him. Such contradictory behaviour should not surprise. The Bible of the Matthean community, the OT, does not free Noah, or David, or Solomon from their sins. Even Moses is said to have disobeyed God when he struck the rock twice. We may assume that Matthew's readers interpreted the disciples' failures as they did the failures of OT heroes: God can use ordinary people for his extraordinary purposes and, when they fall into sin, he can grant them forgiveness. As Peter says in the Acts of Peter 7:20: 'He who defended me also when I sinned and strengthened me with his greatness will also comfort you that you may love him.' Calvin had it right: 'Peter's fall . . . brilliantly mirrors our own infirmity. His repentance in turn is a memorable demonstration for us of God's goodness and mercy. The story of one man contains teaching of general, and indeed prime, benefit for the whole Church; it teaches those who stand to take care and caution; it encourages the fallen to trust in pardon.'

(27:1–2) In fulfilment of the prophetic 20:18–19, the Jewish leaders deliver Jesus to the prefect of Judea. The unexplained act probably assumes that the Jews usually did not have the authority to execute criminals (Jn 18:31): such was the responsibility of the Romans. However that may be, throughout 26:1–56 Jesus has been the active protagonist, and one has the impression that he is in charge of his own destiny. Now this changes: he becomes the passive victim, and the text fixes upon those who act against him.

Tradition, impelled to turn Pilate into either a saint or a devil, has offered two contrasting pictures. In one (mostly Egyptian and Syrian) Pilate is, at the expense of the Jews, presented as an unwilling participant in the death of Jesus: he is innocent of Jesus' blood. Tertullian, Apol. 21, even makes him 'a Christian in his own convictions', and the Coptic church has canonized him. In the other (mostly Western) picture Pilate bears full responsibility for the death of Jesus and is presented as 'an unjust judge'—weak-willed at best, evil at worst. In the Mors Pilati he commits suicide, and his corpse becomes a home for demons. Matthew is closer to this second picture. Pilate's wife, after her dream, warns her husband not to have anything to do with Jesus—but Pilate disregards her; and after Jesus is dead Pilate co-operates with the Jewish authorities to appoint a guard for the tomb. So the declaration of innocence in v. 24 is ironic: despite his words Pilate is responsible. Washing his hands does not make them clean.

(27:3–10) The most obvious formal feature of this interruption is the parallelism between the scriptural quotation (cf. Zech 11:13) and the narrative, a parallelism that underlines fulfilment:

The narrative:	The quotation:
'taking' (6)	'they took' (9)
'thirty pieces of silver' (3,5,6)	'thirty pieces of silver' (9)
'money' (timē) (6)	'price' (timēn) (9)
'the potter's field' (7,8)	'the potter's field' (10)

There are three other early Christian accounts of Judas' death—Acts 1:16–20 and two fragments assigned to Papias apud Apollinarius (of Laodicea) and preserved in catenas to Mt 27 (a short account) and Acts 1 (a long account). Although very different from Matthew and each other, there are common items: (1) money from Judas purchases a property near Jerusalem (Matthew: the chief priests use the money of betrayal; Luke: Judas himself acquires the land); (2) that property was known as 'the Field of Blood' (but whereas in Matthew the name is associated with the innocent blood of Jesus, in Acts it derives from Judas' gruesome end); (3) the fate of Judas fulfils Scripture (Matthew and Luke cite different OT texts); (4) Judas comes to a bad end (Matthew: he hangs himself; Acts: he bursts open; Papias' short version: a wagon runs over him).

What does 'he repented' (v. 3) mean? The accounts in Acts and Papias have Judas die by the hand of heaven: there is no room for authentic repentance. This, and the depiction of Judas throughout much of church history as infamy embodied, have led most to see in Matthew's Judas an everlasting failure doomed for destruction. This accords with 26:24. On the other hand, the verb translated here by 'he repented' is used in Mt 22:29 and 32 of authentic repentance. Further, there are no biblical condemnations or prohibitions of suicide. Indeed, Jewish tradition excuses or justifies the suicides of Saul, Samson, Zimri, and the Roman soldier who killed himself after talking to R. Gamaliel (b. Ta'an. 29a); and Josephus, in telling the story of Masada, refers to the participants' 'free choice of a noble death' (J. W. 7. 320–401). Moreover, if 4 Macc 17:21 states that the deaths of a mother and her seven sons became 'a ransom for the sin of our nation', 12:19 and 17:1 inform us that the deaths of that mother and of one of her sons were self-inflicted: 'he threw himself into the braziers and so gave up his life'; 'she threw herself into the fire so that no one would touch her body'. Are we to think that Judas' suicide atones for his sin (cf. Gen. Rab. on 27:27)?

There is a parallel of v. 4 in 27:24. Pilate, as he washes his hands, declares, 'I am innocent of this man's blood; see to it yourselves.' But the similarities are really differences. Whereas Judas declares his guilt for innocent blood, Pilate denies his; and while Pilate, seeking to avoid responsibility, tells others to 'see to it yourselves', this is what Judas, who acknowledges his responsibility, is told to do by others.

The story of Ahithophel is recalled by v. 5 (cf. 2 Sam 17:23) making Judas akin to the famous betrayer of David. The correlation between Judas and Ahithophel was traditional. Cf. 2 Sam 15:23 with Jn 18:1; 2 Sam 15:31 with Mt 26:36–46 and par., also Ps 41:5 and 11 (which tradition refers to the incident with Absalom and Ahithophel); 2 Sam 17:1–2 with Mt 26:47–56 and par.; Ps 41:9 (attributed to David; cf. b. Sanh. 106b) with Mt 14:18 and Jn 13:18; and 2 Sam 18:28 with Jn 13:18.

To the allusion to Zech 11:12 made with reference to Judas in 26:15, 27:9–10 adds a formal citation of Zech 11:13, which has been prepared for by allusions in vv. 3–8. 'Jeremiah' may be due to textual corruption, or perhaps it is a reference to the entire prophetic corpus, which Jeremiah heads in some old lists, or perhaps the evangelist simply had a mental lapse, or perhaps the text comes from an apocryphon. But the best guess is that the quotation is mixed: words from Jeremiah and Zechariah have been combined. (Mk 1:2 attributes Mal 3:1 + Isa 40:3 to Isaiah, and Rom 9:27 assigns Hos 2:1 + Isa 10:22 to the same prophet.) Jer 18–19 concerns a potter (18:2–6; 19:1), a purchase (19:1), the Valley of Hinnom (where the Field of Blood is traditionally located) (19:2), 'blood of the innocent' (19:4), and the renaming of a place for burial (19:6, 11). Further, Jer 32:6–15 tells of the purchase of a field with silver.

(27:11–26) This passage, which returns to 27:1–2, is crowded with characters—Jesus, Pilate, the chief priests, the elders, Barabbas, Pilate's wife, a crowd. If the subject is the Roman trial of Jesus, which 'sounds less like a formal judicial hearing than a macabre example of oriental bargaining' (France 1985: 388), the focal issue is culpability for Jesus' execution. The main character, the governor, instead of conducting an objective inquiry and justly acting upon the outcome, rather gives cowardly heed to the hostile Jewish leaders and the crowd they have agitated. The effect is to highlight not just the innocence of Jesus but also the fault of Rome's representative and especially the guilt of the chief priests and elders, who manipulate Pilate and stir up the crowd against the Messiah.

The interrogation is in many respects reminiscent of the Jewish trial. The chief priest(s) and elders are present both times (26:57; vv. 12, 20). On both occasions Jesus is called by others 'the Messiah' (26:63; vv. 17, 22). In both Jesus is silent (26:62–3; vv. 11–14). In both he none the less says to his interrogator, 'You have said so' (26:64; v. 11). Both trials deem Jesus worthy of death (26:66; vv. 24–6). And both are followed by scenes of mockery (26:67; vv. 27–31). The correlations convey futility: the new trial corrects nothing of the first. Roman justice does no better than the Sanhedrin.

When Pilate washes his hands (v. 24) he is more concerned with his own innocence than with justice and the innocence of Jesus. His act is hypocritical; he is not free of responsibility. Pilate's declaration against the facts contrasts with the dramatic cry of 'the people as a whole'. 'His blood be on us and on our children' is not a self-curse but a declaration of responsibility—in effect: we acknowledge our involvement if the governor will not. The words are an ironic prophecy (cf. Jn 11:50); for surely Matthew, like so many after him, related the cry to the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE (cf. 23:35). This accords with the Jewish habit of associating disaster with sin—even (despite Jer 31:29–30) the disaster of one generation for the sin of another. 'And our children' accordingly carries literal sense. We have here an aetiology, an explanation in terms of collective guilt for the destruction of the capital. (The exegete must distinguish between the original intention of verses and their effects, especially here; v. 25 does not refer to all Israel—neither Jewish Christians nor the Jewish diaspora are represented by the crowd—nor should we find here a curse for all time. Nor does the verse explain God's supposed abandonment of Jews or of the end of the Jewish mission.)

Concerning v. 26, 10:17 prophesies that missionaries will be flogged; so once more the story of Jesus, the exemplar in suffering, makes his speech come to life. The 'flogging', perhaps intended to recall Isa 53:5, is not described but only referred to. The Roman act of flagellum, of tying non-Romans and slaves to a post and then whipping them with knotted leather straps (which sometimes held pieces of metal and/or bone), often preceded crucifixion, and sometimes prisoners were whipped on the way to crucifixion. The horrendous punishment (not humanely limited to forty stripes, cf. Jewish law) was so severe that it could expose bone and by itself be fatal.

If the main theological theme of this passage is responsibility, the literary method is irony. Things are upside down, and words have unintended meaning. The judge of the world, instead of sitting upon his judgement seat, stands before the bēma of a lesser. The governor does not govern. While the religious leaders of Judaism rail against God's anointed, the truth is revealed to a pagan. The crowds prefer to free a criminal instead of a just man they once acclaimed. The criminal is named 'Jesus, Son of the Father'. Pilate declares his lack of responsibility in word and deed when he is in fact in charge of the proceedings and their outcome. And the crowd willingly accepts responsibility in words which unwittingly prophesy tragedy. As throughout the gospel things are not what they seem, and God's will works itself out in unexpected circumstances.

(27:27–31) This passage (cf. Philo, In Flac. 6.36–40), uncharacteristically full of vivid details, partially fulfils the third passion prediction: 'hand him over to the Gentiles to be mocked and flogged' (20:19) as well as Isa 50:6. It also in several particulars repeats the conclusion of the trial before Caiaphas (see esp. 26:67).

Kings are proclaimed by their soldiers. But when the Roman soldiers give Jesus a robe, a sceptre, and a crown—whose thorns may simulate the light rays supposed to emanate from the heads of divinities—and then hail him king they are making fun of him for their own amusement. Their homage is pretended. Yet in truth the seemingly hapless criminal before them—here Jesus is an utterly passive object—is indeed a king who shall shortly wield all authority in heaven and earth (28:18). In this way the irony of the Roman burlesque is turned on itself, and the scene continues the message of 27:11–26: things are the opposite of what they seem to be.

(27:32–56) This haunting passage depicts Jesus as the suffering righteous one akin to the figures in Ps 22, Isa 53, and Wis 2; and perhaps its outstanding feature is its scriptural language. Although the OT is never once formally introduced, its presence is everywhere:

- 34, wine mingled with gall: allusion to Ps 69:21
- 35, division of garments: borrowing from Ps 22:18
- 38, death between robbers: possible allusion to Isa 53:12
- 39, passersby wag their heads: cf. Ps 22:7; Lam 2:15
- 39–40, mockery: borrowing from Ps 22:7 (cf. 109:25)
- 43, mockery: borrowing from Ps 22:9
- 44, mockery: possible borrowing from Ps 22:7 or 69:9
- 45, darkness at noon: allusion to Am 8:9
- 46, cry from the cross: borrowing from Ps 22:1
- 48, vinegar to drink: allusion to Ps 69:21
- 51–3, earthquake and resurrection: use of Ezek 37; Zech 14:4–5

Matthew does not recount the glorious death of a martyr. Of Jesus' heroic valour and faith we hear nothing. vv. 32–50 do not encourage or inspire but rather depict human sin and its frightening freedom in the unfathomable divine silence. There is terror in this text. The mocking and torture of the innocent and righteous Son of God are not intended to make but to shatter sense, to portray the depths of irrational human depravity. And the patient endurance of God, which is so overdone that the Son himself screams out feelings of abandonment, powerfully conveys the frightening mystery of God's seeming inactivity in the world. vv. 32–50 are the divine absence, a sort of deistic interlude, a portrait (in Luther's phrase) of Deus absconditus in passionibus. They are akin to portions of Job, and like the speech out of the whirlwind they can evoke what Rudolf Otto called the mysterium tremendum. 'Truly, you are a God who hides himself, O God of Israel, the Saviour' (Isa 45:15).

While vv. 32–50 are seemingly devoid of supernatural activity, vv. 51–4 offer an explosion of the supernatural. One cannot but recall the habit of world mythology and literature to encircle the ends of great figures with extraordinary events.

Trees bloomed out of season and powder fell from the sky when Buddha slipped away. The heavens shook when Moses was taken to God (2 Apoc. Bar. 59:3). As Francis of Assisi left the body, larks, otherwise only heralds of dawn, sang at night. vv. 51–4 are in one important respect conventional. At the same time, the Matthean signs have their own special meaning. First, most of them—darkness, end of the temple, resurrection, conversion of Gentiles—are eschatological. It follows that the day of the Lord dawns on Golgotha: the divine judgement descends, and the first fruits of the resurrection are gathered. The end of Jesus is the end of the world in miniature.

Secondly, the miracles come only after Jesus dies. Before then the Son's passivity is matched by God's passivity—so much so that the bystanders can jeer and proclaim God's indifference. But the preternatural events which follow death refute the mockers: their calls for a sign are more than answered. God does indeed fight for the one who has not fought for himself. The mystery is only why God is tardy, why torment and death must come first. Whatever the answer to that eternal question might be, the sequence itself cannot surprise. For the same pattern appears in Jesus' own preaching, in which tribulation and suffering precede vindication and victory (e.g. 5:10–12; 10:17–23; 24:4–34).

There is resemblance between vv. 51–5 and 28:1–11:

The Death of Jesus	The Resurrection of Jesus
An earthquake	An earthquake
Opening of tombs	Opening of tombs
A resurrection	A resurrection
The guards fear	The guards fear
Witnesses to the events (the resurrected saints)	Witnesses to the events (the Roman guards)
go to the holy city	go to the city
There are women witnesses (including Mary Magdalene and another Mary)	There are women witnesses (Mary Magdalene and another Mary)

Clearly the resurrection of the saints foreshadows the resurrection of Jesus.

(27:57–66) The stories about the burial and the guard set the stage for 28:15. The tomb that is filled here (in accord with Deut 21:23, before sundown) is emptied there. The stone that is here rolled across the door of the tomb is there rolled back. The guard that here secures the sepulchre there proves ineffective. The leaders who here worry that the disciples will come and steal Jesus' body there put out the lie that just such a thing happened. And the women who here see all become witnesses there to the empty tomb and risen Lord.

A corpse can be either disposed of dishonourably or given an honourable burial. In view of how Jesus has been treated throughout the passion narrative one would anticipate for him the former. But thanks to Joseph of Arimathea's unexpected and reverent intervention, Jesus receives a worthy entombment. Further, like the kings of Israel, he is buried beside Jerusalem (1 Kings 15:8, 24, etc.).

The apologetic tale of the guard at the tomb (vv. 62–6) refutes the criticism of 28:15, that is, rebuts Jewish slander against the disciples by showing that they could not have stolen Jesus' body—there was a guard and in any case they were nowhere around—and reinforces belief in Jesus' resurrection: given the guard the empty tomb is a very suggestive sign. One can imagine an exchange between Matthew and critical Jews. Matthew: Jesus rose from the dead and his tomb was empty (28:6). Opponent: did Jesus really die? Matthew: a Roman guard kept watch over him; surely he was dead before his body was released (27:36). Opponent: was there a mix-up in tombs? Matthew: the women saw where Jesus was buried (v. 61). Opponent: the disciples, seeking to confirm Jesus' prophecy of his resurrection after three days, stole the body. Matthew: the disciples had fled, they were nowhere near (26:56). Opponent: then someone else stole the body. Matthew: a large stone was rolled before the tomb; it was sealed; and Roman soldiers kept watch (28:62–6). Opponent: the soldiers fell asleep. Matthew: they were bribed to say that (28:12–15).

Ps 2:1 asks, 'Why does the nations conspire, and the peoples plot in vain?' The theme of human impotence versus divine power runs throughout the Bible, and it is part and parcel of vv. 62–6. Jesus' opponents take every precaution to prevent proclamation of the resurrection: they seal the stone and set a guard. But their efforts are futile: 'he who sits in the heavens laughs'. Human beings cannot oppose earthquakes and angels and the power of God.

(28:1–15) The resurrection is the necessary end to Jesus' story. Without it his words are vacant and his opponents exonerated. With it, Jesus is vindicated, his cause and authority confirmed, and his—and so Matthew's—opponents disgraced.

Matthew's account opens with an angelophany (cf. Dan 10:2–14; 2 Enoch 1:3–10) with eschatological motifs (earthquake, resurrection) (vv. 1–8); this is followed by an appearance of the risen Jesus (vv. 9–10) and a story of how unbelievers treated the facts (vv. 11–15). The verbal repetition between vv. 5–7 and 10 makes for emphasis while an additional unifying feature is the artistic correlation between the women and the guards. Both groups gather at Jesus' tomb (vv. 1, 4). Both see an angel (vv. 2–5). Both feel fear (vv. 4, 8). Both leave the tomb in order to tell others what has happened (vv. 8, 11). And both are told by others what they should say (vv. 7, 10, 13–14). The difference lies in this, that while (we assume) the women tell the truth to the disciples, the ineffectual guards (cf. Dan 3:19–23; Acts 5:17–26)—the last nameless walk-ons—lie about the disciples.

The women (cf. 27:55, 61), having observed the sabbath and waited until the following dawn, set forth to visit the tomb on the first day of the week. They become witnesses to Jesus' resurrection as well as to his death and burial. Although 'to see the tomb' is unexplained, visitation of the newly entombed was probably an established burial custom. Sem. 8:1 records the habit of visiting graves 'until the third day' (cf. Jn 11:17, 39) as a precaution against burying someone alive (examples of which are given in Sem.). If this is the premise of Mt 28:1, then the women who go to confirm Jesus' death become instead the first witnesses of his new life. It is not Jesus who is dead but (at least figuratively) the guards ('became as dead men').

vv. 11–15 take up 27:62–6 and 28:2–4 and like them are apologetic. Evidently the Jewish opponents of Matthean Christianity (like Reimarus centuries later) did not dispute the historicity of the empty tomb but rather assigned its cause to theft in the cause of piety. Our story answers that slander in kind: the rumour of theft was a self-serving lie fortified by money. Clearly Matthew's Christian community knew and cared about what the synagogue across the street was saying.

(28:16–20) Matthew's conclusion has the same broad outline as Mk 16:14–20; Lk 24:36–49; and Jn 20:19–23. All four texts presumably go back to the same primitive proto-commissioning.

The resurrection marks the end of Jesus' earthly time and inaugurates the time of the post-Easter church. Accordingly this pericope both looks back to summarize Jesus' ministry as a whole ('all I have commanded you') and looks forward to the time of the church to outline a programme. So the passage functions to relate two periods which, although different, have the same Lord and so the same mission.

In addition to the allusion to Dan 7:13–14 in v. 18, some have also found dependence upon 2 Chr 36:23 (the final sentence in the Former Prophets). This is improbable. More persistent has been the proposal, usually tentative and muted, that the passage evokes Moses. The mountain itself, given its Mosaic associations throughout Matthew, is suggestive, as is the circumstance that Moses ended his earthly course on a mountain. Further, the narrative has close parallels in Deut 31:14–15, 23; and Josh 1:1–9, which are all about God, or God through Moses, commissioning Joshua. Josh 1:2 tells Joshua to 'go' (v. 9) and cross the Jordan. Josh 1:7 enjoins Joshua to 'act in accordance with all the law that my servant Moses commanded you'. And Josh 1:9 (the pericope's conclusion) promises God's presence: 'for the Lord your God is with you wherever you go'. Given the undeniable presence of a strong Moses typology elsewhere in Matthew, one infers that this passage, like the commissioning stories in 1 Chr 22:1–16 and Jer 1:1–10, deliberately borrows from the traditions about Moses. Just as Moses, at the close of his life, commissioned Joshua both to go into the land peopled by foreign nations and to observe all the commandments in the law, and then further promised his successor God's abiding presence, so similarly Jesus: at the end of his earthly ministry he tells his disciples to go into all the world and to teach the observance of all the commandments of the new Moses, and then further promises his assisting presence.

Jesus is interpreted by v. 20 as the authoritative bringer of revelation, and 'all that I have commanded you' refers not to one command or to the SM but to the whole of Jesus' teaching—not just imperatives but also proverbs, blessings, parables, and prophecies. But more than verbal revelation is involved, for such revelation cannot be separated from Jesus' life, which is itself a command. Jesus' final words accordingly unify word and deed and envisage the entire book. The ministry as a whole is an imperative.

This section satisfyingly completes the gospel in part because it is almost a compendium of Matthean theology: 'Galilee' fulfils the prophecies in 26:32 and 28:7 and creates a literary arch with 4:12 that spans the gospel; 'mountain' recalls other mountain scenes, especially 4:8. 'They worshipped him; but some doubted' has been foreshadowed by 14:31–3. 'All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me' echoes 11:27 as well as Dan 7:13–14, which Jesus has elsewhere applied to himself (24:30; 26:64); it further brings to completion the theme of Jesus' kingship (1:1, etc.). 'Make disciples' reminds one of 13:52 (cf. 27:57); 'all nations' terminates the prohibition of 10:5–6 (cf. 15:24); 'of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit' in connection with baptism reminds one of ch. 3, where the Son is baptized, the Father speaks, and the Spirit descends. 'Teaching' recapitulates a central theme and gives the disciples a task heretofore reserved for Jesus; 'everything that I have commanded you' envisages all Jesus has said and done; 'I am with you always' forms an inclusio with 1:23 and is similar to 18:20; 'the end of the age' recurs in 13:39, 40, 49; 24:3, and puts one in mind of Jesus' teachings about the end. The allusions to Moses reactivate the Moses typology.

The climax and crown of Matthew's gospel is profoundly apt in that it invites the reader to enter the story: 28:16–20 is an open-ended ending. Not only does v. 20a underline that the particular man, Jesus, has universal significance, but 'I am with you always' reveals that he is always with his people. The result is that the believing audience and the ever-living Son of God become intimate. The Jesus who commands difficult obedience is at the same time the ever-graceful divine presence.

REFERENCES

- Allison, D. C. (1993), The New Moses: A Matthean Typology (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Bear, F. W. (1981), The Gospel According to St. Matthew (London: Harper & Row).
- Betz, H. D. (1985), The Sermon on the Mount, Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Bornkamm, G. (1963), 'The Stilling of the Storm in Matthew', in G. Bornkamm, G. Barth, and H. J. Held, Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew (London: SCM).
- Bultmann, R. (1963), History of the Synoptic Tradition (Oxford: Basil Blackwell).
- Carter, W. (1994), Households and Discipleship, JSNTSSup 103 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Davies, W. D. (1964), The Setting of the Sermon on the Mount (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Dodd, C. H. (1963), Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Donaldson, T. L. (1985), Jesus on the Mountain: A Study in Matthean Theology, JSNTSSup 8 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- France, R. T. (1985), Matthew (Leicester: Inter-Varsity).
- Gundry, R. H. (1982), Matthew: A Commentary on his Literary and Theological Art (Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans).
- Heil, J. P. (1991), The Death and Resurrection of Jesus (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Hengel, M. (1981), The Charismatic Leader and His Followers (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Luz, U. (1985, 1990), Das Evangelium nach Matthäus, EKKNT 1/1, 2, 2 vols. (Zürich and Neukirchen-Vluyn: Benziger and Neukirchener).
- Manson, T. W. (1949), The Sayings of Jesus (London: SCM).

58. Mark

C. M. TUCKETT

INTRODUCTION

A. The Earliest Gospel. The Gospel of Mark is probably the earliest of the three synoptic gospels to be written. Although it is disputed by some, the most widely held solution today to the Synoptic Problem, the problem of the relationship between the three synoptic gospels, is that Mark's gospel was written first and was then used as a source by Matthew and Luke. That theory will not be discussed in detail here but will be assumed in what follows. (On this, see discussions on the Synoptic Problem in ch. 61, below and e.g. Tuckett 1992.)

B. Author. 1. About the author of the gospel we probably know very little. Ancient tradition calls him Mark, almost certainly intending to identify him as the John Mark mentioned elsewhere in the NT, a member of the primitive Jerusalem church. A tradition going back at least as early as the second-century Church Father Papias also connects Mark with the apostle Peter, so that the gospel is sometimes regarded as in some sense Peter's memoirs. The link with Peter has then also led to Mark's gospel being associated with the city of Rome, perhaps reflecting a situation of extreme suffering by the Christian community there in the persecutions instigated by Nero in the 60s after the great fire of Rome.

2. None of this, however, is certain. It seems very unlikely, for example, that the author of the gospel was a Palestinian Jew. He appears to be rather ignorant about local geography (see Mk 5:1; 7:31), as well as about Jewish customs or laws (see Mk 7:3–4; 10:11–12). He may well have been called Mark, but the name was a very common one in the Roman empire and we cannot simply equate all the Marks we know!

Any link between our gospel and Peter is also hard to establish. It is true that Peter is regularly one of an inner group of disciples (cf. 1:29–31; 9:2–13; 13), and Peter is regularly belittled (cf. 8:33), a fact which some argue is only explicable if Peter had given explicit sanction to the gospel. However, Peter is not unique in all this, and the negative picture is shared with all the disciples; in fact Matthew and Luke have more traditions specifically about Peter (Mt 16:17–19; Lk 5:1–11). The link alleged between Mark's gospel and Peter is probably part of a second-century attempt to give the gospel more status by linking it with the leading apostle.

C. Date. The date of the gospel is also uncertain. The traditional view is, as we have seen, that Mark dates from the 60s. Much depends on the interpretation of ch. 13, where Mark's Jesus looks into the future to what is to come, though for Mark no doubt some of what is predicted has already happened. The language there is at times cryptic, and perhaps deliberately so. The view adopted in this commentary is that Mark is looking back to the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE as an event in his past: hence Mark is to be dated after 70 CE (though probably not long after). For discussion of this, see Mk 13, especially 13:14–20.

D. Place. By tradition, Mark is to be located in Rome. In support of this one can point to the fact that Mark uses Latin loanwords (e.g. for 'centurion' in 15:39) and seems to think in terms of Roman coinage (see 12:42) and the Roman divisions of time (see 13:35). However, although a Roman origin would fit with this evidence, it is not the only possibility. Latin loan-words and Roman coinage would have been influential in other places than Rome in the empire.

The stress on suffering in Mark's gospel (see below) has also been thought to fit a Roman origin. However, it is not absolutely clear that Mark's stress on suffering is necessarily reflecting the situation of his community: it might just as well be due to his wishing to speak to his community about possibilities and dangers which they were not yet facing. See mk 8:34–9:1. Further, a date after 70 for the gospel would mean that it could not be situated directly in the Neronian persecutions. In the end we probably have to be agnostic and say we do not know precisely where Mark comes from or what community he is writing for.

E. Genre. What kind of a text is Mark's gospel? To what genre does it belong? Ever since the second century the book has been known as a 'gospel'. Yet that is a very unusual term for a literary text, let alone an account of the life and ministry of Jesus (see mk 1:1). Older studies had claimed that the gospels were in some sense 'biographies', comparable to works such as those about Socrates (by Plato) or Epictetus (by Arrian). However, early in the twentieth century form critics (Bultmann, Dibelius) argued that the gospels were really folk literature, not to be compared with literary works. The evangelists were simply popular story-tellers who did not impose their own ideas on the material. In particular a text such as Mark displayed none of the characteristic features of biography (nothing on Jesus' personality, psychological development, origins, or education). The gospels were thus without analogy and were sui generis.

Such a claim is very odd in literary terms. Some understanding of the genre of a text is essential if it is to be understood at all. Further, this rather low view of a writer such as Mark has been radically questioned in more recent study. Thus, whilst it remains true that close parallels to Mark are hard to find, in either the Jewish or Hellenistic world of the period, many have swung back to the view that Mark may be seen as in some sense a biography, although not in the modern sense of the word. There is indeed very little on Jesus' background or personality in Mark. Yet equally, ancient writing claiming to give the lives (Gk. bioi) of individuals often lacked some of these features. Thus if one takes a relatively broad spread of ancient 'lives' of individuals, Mark's gospel can be shown to lie within those parameters. (See Burridge 1992.)

Yet this does not determine exactly how the text should be read. It does not, for example, necessarily imply that the text is ipso facto historically reliable. Many other 'biographies' were written with an author's own axe to grind. In this Mark is no exception. Certainly Mark presents us with a highly distinctive account of Jesus' life and some of its implications.

F. Key Themes. 1. As already noted, a key theme of the gospel is suffering: Jesus is the one who supremely fulfils his destiny as the one who suffers and dies, and any disciple of Jesus is called to follow in the same way (see 8:34–10:52). Jesus is also the great miracle worker, though one suspects that Mark would not see this as the most important part of Jesus' ministry. Jesus is indeed the great miracle worker, but miracles must, for Mark, be seen in their proper context: they can never be the basis for faith, indeed without an existing context of faith they cannot take place (see 6:5); further, the one who performs all these mighty works is the one who will end up on the cross.

2. Above all the centre of the story for Mark is the person of Jesus. What is crucial for Mark is the question of Christology. At one level this statement is trite since, for all the evangelists, Jesus is the centre of attention in the story. Nevertheless, for Mark it is above all the question of who Jesus is that is paramount. Further, for Mark, it seems that this cannot be answered simply in words or titles. There is an element of secrecy in the story, so that characters in the narrative do not grasp who Jesus is. The reader is told right at the start what are the most appropriate terms in which to understand Jesus (see mk 1:1), but even then, Mark has more to say: indeed that is presumably why he writes his story, to show what any words of title mean in concrete terms. For Mark, Jesus is supremely 'Son of God', but what Mark understands by this is not fully clarified, even for the reader, until the cross (cf. 15:39). Mark gives us what can be described as a narrative Christology. It is the narrative which, in the end, tells the reader how Mark wishes Jesus to be understood.

3. A theme almost as important for Mark as Christology is that of discipleship. What does it mean to be a follower of the one who is the Son of God in this Markan sense? As already noted, Mark's Jesus gives an extended block of teaching on discipleship as entailing following Jesus in the same way of suffering and death, the way of the cross (see 8:34–10:52). So too the characters of the disciples play a key role in Mark's story. For Mark it is a matter of concern to show something of what is, or should be, involved in being a follower of Jesus within the Christian church.

G. Purpose. 1. Why then has Mark presented his story in the way he has? There is almost certainly no single answer. Mark writes for a variety of reasons and it would be wrong to pin him down to one single purpose. Some quite general factors are no doubt possible: for example, with the spread of the Christian church geographically, and with the passing of time, Christians no doubt needed information about Jesus and his teaching.

2. Nevertheless, Mark's distinctive presentation remains unexplained by such general considerations. As already noted in passing, the traditional view is that Mark writes for a suffering community (perhaps in Rome) to strengthen their faith in a time of intense persecution. This too is possible, though it is noteworthy that, whilst Mark's Jesus has a lot to say about the necessity of suffering, there is very little in the gospel about any positive significance in such suffering. It is just as likely that Mark's very distinctive account, with the cross so central, is making a positive point to his readers quite as much as reflecting the current experiences of his community. The most extreme form of such a theory is that of Weeden (1971) who argues that Mark is involved in intense Christological debates with a group of people he regards as heretics in his community: they advocate a view of Jesus as a divine man, a super-hero characterized by miracles, glory, and power; Mark opposes them with his view of Jesus characterized by weakness, service, and suffering. Weeden also advocates that, in the story, Mark's point of view is represented by Jesus, that of the heretics by the disciples.

3. Weeden's theory is probably too extreme. His view of the role of the disciples in the story is questionable (see Tannehill 1977 and Mk 1:16–20), and the language of 'heresy' in a context such as Mark's is probably anachronistic. Nevertheless, the overall theory may have an element of truth in it. Mark's portrait of Jesus may be intended to modify or correct the views of the readers of the gospel (even if talk of 'opponents' is too extreme). Mark clearly wants to present Jesus in one light and not another (cf. e.g. 10:45: Jesus as Son of Man came not to be served but to serve). Similarly, Mark may be wanting to mould, perhaps change, his readers' views about the nature of Christian discipleship.

4. With his stress on the centrality of the cross, Mark is very like Paul in his views about Jesus and the nature of Christian discipleship. Yet we should not take this for granted, as if Mark could be no different and all first-century Christians were the same. We know from Paul's letters that his own views were frequently controversial and disputed by other Christians within his communities. It may be similar with Mark, whose presentation of Jesus in his gospel is, among other things, a call to his readers to re-evaluate their views about both Jesus and themselves (see also Mk 16:8). How we read the gospel may be in part determined by how we respond to such a challenge.

COMMENTARY

(1:1–13) Introduction There is widespread agreement that the opening verses of Mark form an introduction to the book as a whole. As such they set the scene for the detailed story that is to come. Moreover, in many respects they identify the characters of the story and define the terms in which Mark intends it to be read. As we shall see, the motif of secrecy is an important theme in Mark's narrative: on several occasions characters in the story fail to understand who Jesus is or what his ministry is about. Yet for the reader of the gospel there is no secrecy at all: Jesus' identity is disclosed right from the start. On the other hand, not everything is revealed, otherwise Mark's story would be redundant. Thus Jesus is identified as Son of God in these introductory verses; but the full significance of what it means to be a/the true Son of God is maybe only shown by the ensuing narrative. Older editions of the text, and older commentaries, suggested that the introduction comprised vv. 1–8. However, it is now widely accepted that the introduction goes at least as far as v. 13, if not v. 15. Certainly vv. 1–8 are incomplete without the sequel in vv. 9–13 which serve to identify the person of Jesus.

Almost every aspect of v. 1 is debated. The words 'the Son of God' are missing from some Greek manuscripts, but probably do represent the original text of Mark: the importance of the term for Mark's Christology, and the key place of this opening verse to announce the terms of the story to come, make this highly probable. The 'good news' is in Greek euangelion, or 'gospel'. Elsewhere in the NT, the gospel is the Christian message which is preached; it is not a literary product which is written or read. The same is probably true here, though this verse may have contributed to the process whereby 'gospel' became the term to refer to a written account of the life of Jesus. It is not clear how this gospel is the gospel 'of Jesus Christ'. Is it the good news about Jesus, or the good news preached by Jesus? v. 14 (where Jesus proclaims the good news) suggests that the latter is in mind, though it is not impossible that both are intended. The force of the reference to the 'beginning' is also uncertain. Does this mean that v. 1 refers only to the introductory verses (so that the full 'gospel' then follows)? Or is there a sense in which the whole of Mark's story is only a 'beginning', and it is up to each reader to carry on where the story leaves off to find the complete gospel? The nature of the ending of Mark's story, with its startling abruptness (see Mk 16:8), makes the latter possibility an attractive option. But in any case the opening verse makes it crystal clear to the reader who is the subject of the story to come: it is Jesus who is the Messiah and Son of God. Yet what these terms mean is not yet made clear.

vv. 2–8 serve to set the scene in a wider context. They first bring on to the stage not Jesus himself but the figure of John the Baptist, and in turn John is introduced by a (mixed) OT citation. (v. 2 is a mixture of Ex 23:20 and Mal 3:1; v. 3 is from Isa 40:3. The reference to Isaiah in the introductory words in v. 2 is probably a mistake.) Yet John has little significance of his own in Mark's narrative. Mark tells us nothing of John's own eschatological preaching (as in Mt 3:7–10 and par.), nor of any of his ethical teaching (cf. Lk 3:11–14). The only words John speaks point forward to Jesus (vv. 7–8). Similarly the OT citation (one of the very few explicit citations in Mark) is only brought in to point forward to John. vv. 2–8 are really therefore constructed from the end backwards, where each element points forward to the next. The citation of the OT identifies the time as one of the fulfilment of Jewish eschatological hopes. Moreover, the note in v. 6 of John's clothing may be intended to evoke the clothing of Elijah (2 Kgs 1:8): hence John is cast in the role of an Elijah-figure, and Elijah was the prophet expected to come before the final day of the Lord (cf. Mal 4:5–6). So too the 'wilderness', as the place of John's baptizing activity, was the place from where many Jews expected the final eschatological deliverance to appear. Thus the details of Mark's account serve to place the events to come within a context of the fulfilment of Jewish eschatological hopes. How far all these expectations relate to the historical person of John himself is hard to say. It is not easy to ascribe the words of the saying in vv. 7–8 to the historical John: John may have been expecting the coming of God Himself. Nevertheless, for Mark, the saying now refers to Jesus.

This is made clear in v. 9: the one announced by John is Jesus from Nazareth. Further, Jesus is now baptized by John. Historically it seems very likely that this reflects a real event in the life of Jesus. (Later writers are clearly embarrassed by it: why should Jesus, the sinless Son of God, be baptized for the forgiveness of his sins? However, Mark shows no such embarrassment.) But what the event might have meant in Jesus' psyche we just do not know. The most we can say is that it probably signified Jesus' commitment to John's cause and expressed his agreement with his message. For Mark, the significance of the event is that this is the moment when Jesus' identity is given the absolute seal of divine approval: God himself declares Jesus to be His Son. The reader is now in no doubt: the story to come is the story of the Son of God. The precise meaning of 'Son of God' in Mark is much debated. The words of the voice from heaven here conflate two OT verses in addressing Jesus as 'Son': Ps 2:7 (suggesting a royal figure) and Isa 42:1 (implying an idea of Jesus as the servant); in addition the words 'the beloved' may recall the words of Abraham about Isaac (cf. Gen 22:2). The phrase 'Son of God' can have a wide range of meanings. Later it came to signify Jesus' full divinity as a member of a divine Trinity. But in the first century the term had no necessary overtones of divinity: it could refer to a royal figure (cf. Ps 2:7), or to the nation Israel (cf. Hos 11:1) or to a righteous sufferer (cf. Wis 2:17). Perhaps it would be wrong to press Mark into too rigid a mould here: Jesus is a royal figure (as will be stressed particularly in ch. 15); but as Son of God he is supremely one who will suffer and die. Indeed it may be Mark's intention precisely to spell out in his story the way in which true divine sonship should be seen. The reference to the heavens being 'torn apart' indicates a theophany (cf. Isa 64:1); and the coming of the Spirit again implies the fulfilment of Jewish eschatological hopes (cf. Joel 2:28–31 cited in Acts 2:17–21). The significance of the Spirit being symbolized as a 'dove' is uncertain, but may allude to the creation story in Gen 1:2 where some Jewish exegetes interpreted the words there as referring to the Spirit 'hovering' like a dove. In that case, the story here may again be indicating the start of a new creation.

vv. 12–13 recount the so-called 'temptation' of Jesus ('testing' would be a better description.) The story is much shorter than the threefold temptation story of Jesus in Matthew and Luke. Jesus is in the wilderness for 'forty days' (a time with many OT resonances: cf. Moses in Ex 34:28; Elijah in 1 Kgs 19:8). The 'testing' by Satan is probably to be thought of as a titanic struggle with the powers of evil. The exact details are uncertain (e.g. does the struggle last for forty days? Do the angels minister during, or after, the struggle? What do the wild beasts signify?). But the general thrust of the narrative seems to be that Jesus is victorious in the battle against Satan. Mark probably intends the story to act as the interpretative key for at least part of the narrative to come. Exorcisms and battles with unclean spirits will occupy a significant part of Jesus' ministry. The temptation narrative shows that these are part of a broader eschatological battle with the powers of evil; and also that Jesus is victorious in that battle, as 3:22–30 will show.

(1:14–15) Jesus' Preaching This is something of a transition, in which Mark gives what is probably intended as a summary of Jesus' preaching. John is almost forgotten (his arrest is mentioned only in passing, and no reason for it is given): all attention is focused on the person of Jesus. Yet Jesus' preaching does not focus on himself, but on God. It is the time of the fulfilment of Jewish eschatological hopes ('the time is fulfilled'), and Jesus proclaims the imminence of the kingdom of God. (The verb 'has come near' represents a Greek word which probably implies that the kingdom is very close, but not yet present.) Reflected here are Jewish eschatological hopes for the intervention of God in the affairs of the world to establish himself as king and for his kingly rule to be acknowledged by all. (The 'kingdom of God' is probably meant in an active sense of God ruling as king, rather than as a spatial area over which he rules.) The time is thus one of the imminent fulfilment of eschatological hopes. In the face of this imminent event, people must 'repent', i.e. change their lifestyle in preparation for what is to come, and 'believe in the good news'. It is worth noting that here, as throughout the synoptic gospels generally, the object of faith is not Jesus himself. Here it is the gospel, the good news, which must be 'believed'. Jesus becomes the object of faith after Easter. Thus Mark seems to reflect the pre-Easter situation quite well in that Jesus does not refer to himself explicitly as the focus of the belief of others.

What is announced here is that the kingdom in its fullness is still to come. However, there is a sense in which the events of Jesus' ministry represent the fulfilment of eschatological hopes, so that the kingdom is in part already present in the work and preaching of Jesus. Thus the eschatological claims in Mark have a characteristic dual element: the eschatological events are proclaimed as due to come—and to come soon—but also they have already partly arrived in the person of Jesus.

After the summary statement of Jesus' preaching the story moves on to a different level with the more historical account of Jesus' ministry in Galilee.

(1:16–20) Call of Four Disciples The first event narrated by Mark is the call, and response, of the first four disciples of Jesus. The story is told in an extremely compressed way. No unnecessary detail of information is supplied. It is thus quite pointless to speculate, for example, on why the disciples responded without demur, or whether Jesus had met them beforehand. Mark is not interested in the psychology of the disciples or of their response. Rather, for him the centre of the action is once again the person of Jesus: Jesus is the one who calls and summons others to be his followers with the single authoritative word 'Follow me!'; and those who are summoned in this way obey him without any hesitation. Yet whilst it is the case that Jesus is the central character in the story, it remains the case that the disciples will also occupy a key role in the narrative to come. Much has been written on the role played by the disciples in Mark's story, focusing in particular on the very bad press they get later, when they fail to understand Jesus (cf. 8:17–21) and finally desert him completely (cf. 14:50). (See Weeden 1971; Tannehill 1977.) Here it must be said that the portrait of the disciples is entirely positive: Jesus calls them and they obey him instantly and without reserve. The effect of the story is thus to place the disciples in a good light so that the reader responds to them thoroughly positively. Any negative portrayal of the disciples later in the story will have to be balanced against this initial picture.

The phrase 'fish for people' (lit. 'fishers of men/people') is highly unusual, despite its later popularity in Christian hymns and songs: the phrase suggests a somewhat harsh and negative activity of ensnaring for judgement (cf. Jer 16:16; Ezek 29:4–5). Mark refers to 'Simon' here, and only later (after 3:16) does he use the name 'Peter'. All four men called are fishermen; as such they were certainly not destitute in economic terms, apparently owning boats and probably making a reasonable living (cf. 10:28). Jesus' call to others to 'follow' him by joining him physically in his itinerant ministry is quite unlike that of a Jewish teacher having pupils who study the law under him. It is thus difficult to find any close analogies in the immediate Jewish background for the phenomenon of discipleship in the sense envisaged in the gospels. The theme of the authority of Jesus, which is clearly central for Mark, is continued and developed in the next story.

(1:21–8) An Exorcism in Capernaum The action takes place on the sabbath (though no question of a possible breach of sabbath law is raised here). The pericope consists of the account of the exorcism, which Mark appears to have framed between two notes about Jesus' teaching (vv. 21–2, 27). Such a sandwiching technique is very typical of Mark, who seems to use the resultant structure to allow one part of the sandwich to provide an interpretative key for the other part. The story of the exorcism itself may well be traditional. There seems to be a note of secrecy here, and secrecy is a characteristic Markan motif; but in fact it is really only apparent. The unclean spirit tries to utter Jesus' name (v. 24). The motif can be paralleled in other similar exorcism stories: uttering the other person's name was thought to be a means of overpowering your opponent. Jesus thus silences the demon (v. 25), not to impose secrecy, but in order to stop the demon naming him: the act of silencing is itself the action which gains mastery over the demon. However, as we shall see, Mark develops this motif in a peculiar way later (see 1:34; 3:12). Jesus' activity as an exorcist is well attested. Jesus was by no means unique in claiming the power to exorcize (cf. Lk 11:19), though in the Christian tradition, Jesus' exorcisms are claimed to be the manifestation of the arrival of the kingdom of God (Lk 11:20, cf. Mk 3:22–30). For Mark the emphasis clearly lies on the authority and power shown by Jesus in exorcizing. This is shown in part by the way in which Mark inserts the exorcism story into two notes about Jesus' 'teaching' with 'authority' (vv. 22, 27). The fact that the story itself is not about Jesus' teaching at all suggests that these framing references are secondary; moreover the fact that, so far in Mark's story, Jesus has given virtually no explicit teaching suggests that Mark is at this stage more interested in the fact that Jesus' teaching is authoritative than he is in the contents of that teaching. (The contents will come later, e.g. in ch. 4.)

One other detail should be noted here. Jesus' authority qua teacher is said to be 'not as the scribes' (v. 22). (The scribes were the legislators in Judaism, those who decided how the law should be applied in new situations, and made decisions when different laws clashed; but it is not apparent that Mark knows clearly the differences between the Jewish groups he mentions.) The reference here is left hanging, but the scribes reappear soon, i.e. in 2:6, where they are again opponents of Jesus. This is the first hint of a theme that will dominate the whole gospel: Jesus as the authoritative figure who teaches and exorcizes is the one who as such will clash with the Jewish authorities, and that clash will ultimately lead to the cross. The theme is only hinted at here, but will be developed significantly in the next chapter.

(1:29–31) The Healing of Peter's Mother-in-Law As in previous stories, the extraneous detail is kept to an absolute minimum. Some have suggested that the story may be due to Peter's own recollections: this is possible, but scarcely provable one way or the other. For Mark the story no doubt shows Jesus' continuing authority, here extending to an ability to heal physical illness as well as to exorcize. The story is told in the form of a classic healing story: the description of the illness with a request for healing, the healing itself, followed by a demonstration of the cure or an acclamation. The final phrase ('she began to serve them') might be intended as just a piece of evidence that she really had been cured; alternatively, and more probably, it also shows Peter's mother-in-law performing what is, for Mark, the supreme Christian action of 'serving' others (cf. 10:44–5). In Mark's gospel it is striking how often the women characters are presented in a far better light than the male disciples. Here Peter's mother-in-law does what every Christian is called to do, namely to serve others.

(1:32–4) General Healings and Exorcisms The note about 'evening' (v. 32) indicates that the sabbath (cf. v. 21) is over, and so people are allowed to carry the sick to Jesus. The account is general and the details rather hyperbolic ('all who were sick', v. 32, 'the whole city', v. 33). Mark thinks that this reflects Jesus' usual activity, and it shows the importance Mark places on Jesus' miracles. There is thus no real place for any theory that Mark positively disapproved of this aspect of Jesus' ministry, as some have argued (cf. Weeden 1971); however, as we shall see, there may be a sense in which Mark shows an element of reserve about whether this is the most significant aspect of Jesus' life and work. A characteristic Markan note comes for the first time in v. 34, where Jesus commands the demons to be silent. The motif was present in Mark's tradition (cf. v. 24), but Mark seems to develop it in a peculiar way: now the demons know Jesus' identity and are forbidden by Jesus to make this knowledge public (cf. too 3:12) so that others remain in ignorance. This is then the first appearance of the so-called 'messianic secret' in Mark. In many respects it is somewhat artificial and probably represents Mark's own interpretation of his tradition. (Certainly v. 34 alongside v. 24 indicates that the secrecy motif has been imposed secondarily as a development of the earlier tradition.) The significance of the secret in Mark is debated (see the survey of views in Tuckett 1983). Perhaps the best solution is that, via the secrecy charges, Mark indicates to the reader (for whom there is no secret at all! cf. 1:1) that Jesus' identity must remain a secret to human characters in the story—at least prior to the cross. Jesus' identity is finally recognized by a human being at the cross (cf. 15:39), but not before. Mark may thereby wish to indicate that Jesus' identity can only be truly perceived in the light of the cross. Hence, in the story-world created by Mark, before one gets to the cross, Jesus keeps his identity secret. (See Räisänen 1990.)

(1:35–9) Extension of the Ministry These verses portray a slight interlude in the narrative. Not all the details are entirely clear. Jesus withdraws to a private place to pray (v. 35); perhaps the note underlines the fact that Jesus is ultimately dependent on God for all that he does. Does the withdrawal indicate also an element of reserve on Mark's part about the importance of the miracles? This is possible (cf. too 8:27–30), though in v. 29 Jesus goes out and about not only preaching but also 'casting out demons'. The disciples are said to 'hunt' for Jesus (v. 30). The verb used is rather unusual, indicating perhaps some kind of hostile pursuit. It is possible that this is the first indication in the narrative of the motif which will be considerably developed later whereby the disciples fail to respond properly to Jesus (ctr. Mk 1:16–20). Perhaps then the story hints here at what will come more fully later. The disciples have, it is true, followed Jesus in one sense: but the true following will be shown later to be rather different (cf. 8:34; 10:52). Jesus' response is to go 'throughout Galilee'. Again we have a summarizing statement from Mark, showing Jesus' universal activity in preaching and healing. The reference to 'their' synagogues in v. 39 may be revealing: does this show that for Mark, the Christian community had separated from the Jewish community? Certainly it is likely that Mark was writing for a Gentile audience and this may be one piece of evidence for this.

(1:40–5) A Leper Healed The next story, only loosely connected with its context, shows Jesus healing a leper. (The condition referred to as 'leprosy' in the Bible probably covers a wide range of illnesses.) A number of details in the story are obscure. Jesus' action is said in v. 41 to be due to his 'pity', or compassion; however, some Greek manuscripts say here that Jesus was 'moved with anger'. In view of the fact that it is hard to see why 'pity' might have been changed to 'anger' by a scribe, but very easy to see how the reverse change might take place, some have argued that the reference to 'anger' here may be original. Matthew and Luke also both omit the phrase, which would also be easier to explain if the original reference here was to Jesus' anger. References to pity, or compassion, as the motive for Jesus' miracles in the gospels are rare. However, the reason for any 'anger' here is not clear (cf. also below on v. 43). Touching the leper would render Jesus unclean according to Jewish purity laws. Jesus' action here may thus show him seeking to break down the barriers created within human society by such purity laws. (Cf. further mk 5:21–43.) The reference to Jesus 'sternly warning' the man (v. 43) is also difficult. The verb used is a rare one, usually expressing intense anger. But who or what is Jesus angry with? The man? The leprosy? Evil spirits thought to be behind the illness? Perhaps Mark simply understands the note as referring to Jesus' urgency in sending the man to the priests; but in an earlier version of the story, Jesus' anger might have been thought to be directed against evil spirits.

Jesus commands secrecy in v. 44: the man is to say nothing but to go to the priests to have his cure certified (as required by the law in Lev 14: at this point there seems to be no critique of the law at all). Although these secrecy commands after miracles have sometimes been linked with the messianic secret, they should probably not be so interpreted. Here the secrecy commanded in v. 44 is limited, since the man is to make his cure known to the priests. But in any case v. 45 shows that secrecy is not in fact maintained: the man goes out and proclaims openly what has happened. Perhaps this is one way in which Mark's narrative emphasizes the success of Jesus' activity as a healer: despite Jesus' own attempts to keep things quiet, the news spreads like wildfire! This then is rather different from the secrecy of 1:34 where other people in the story do not come to share the knowledge about Jesus that the demons had. Thus it is probably right to distinguish between a 'messianic secret' which is kept (as in 1:34) and a 'miracle "secret"' which is immediately broken (as here). (See Luz 1983.) The story thus ends on a note of Jesus' great popularity. The very next story will show that such popularity is not universal.

(2:1–3:6) The next section of the gospel comprises five stories showing Jesus in a series of controversies with the Jewish authorities, and this series reaches its climax in the plot to have him killed (3:6). Although it is sometimes argued that the collection is pre-Markan, partly because the plot to kill Jesus seems to come very early, such a theory is unnecessary. The note in 3:6 is not isolated: as we shall see there are a number of details pointing the reader forward to the passion to come (see mk 2:7, 20, as well as the references to Jesus as Son of Man). This series may in fact be Mark's way of indicating very early in his story the course which the ensuing narrative will take. For Mark Jesus is supremely the one who will suffer and die, and this theme dominates the account. The collection here, with all its forward-looking references to the passion, may well be Mark's own composition.

(2:1–12) The Healing of the Paralytic The story in its present form is probably composite: a straight healing story (vv. 1–5, 11–12) has been disrupted by the insertion of a debate between Jesus and the scribes about his authority (vv. 6–10). The healing story itself is fairly straightforward, but it is important to note the reference to 'faith' in v. 5: miracles in Mark generally only occur, and can only occur, in a context of faith (cf. 6:5). Yet it should also be noted that this faith is not necessarily faith 'in Jesus', but rather in God who works through Jesus; moreover, the faith here is not that of the paralysed man himself, but of his friends. This is then not quite the same as some present-day kinds of 'faith-healing' that emphasize the faith of the sick person. The connection between illness and sin is here assumed and not discussed (cf. Jn 9:2–3); though whether this element was present in the original healing narrative is uncertain. Perhaps it was added as simply the motif to generate the following controversy about Jesus' authority.

The debate in vv. 6–10 focuses on Jesus' authority (cf. 1:22), an authority which is questioned by the scribes (again reminiscent of 1:22: thus the implicit opposition between Jesus and the scribes now becomes explicit). The scribes accuse Jesus of 'blasphemy' (v. 7), which is precisely the charge on which Jesus will be condemned to death at his trial (14:64). The historical problems are acute as Jesus has not technically committed blasphemy, an offence which involved uttering the divine name (m. Sanh. 7.5: see mk 14:64). It is possible that, if the account here is at all historical, the scribes may have meant that Jesus was guilty of blasphemy in a looser sense than that defined by Jewish law. However, Mark may not have been aware of such details. For him, what is important is to show that the conflict between Jesus and the scribes here is literally a life-and-death struggle.

The debate is about Jesus' authority, and his authority to forgive. By implication, the story claims that Jesus does have this authority, which is usually the prerogative of God alone (though strictly Jesus does no more than declare God's forgiveness). At this point, Jesus' authority is said to be signalled in part by reference to him as Son of Man. This enigmatic phrase has generated enormous discussion. It is possible that the phrase alone (in Aramaic) simply means 'a man', or 'someone'. Yet this scarcely fits the present context where the issue is the authority of Jesus, not of any human being. Elsewhere in Mark, 'Son of Man' is a term used to refer to Jesus' suffering (cf. 8:31 etc.) and future vindication (14:62 etc.). Although disputed, one very plausible background for the term, certainly at the level of Mark's understanding, is that of Dan

7:13, where a figure described as 'one like a son of man' appears as a symbol for the vindicated people of God in the heavenly court; and since the people concerned in Daniel are presently suffering violent persecution (probably under Antiochus Epiphanes), the figure of Dan 7 may be associated with suffering as well as vindication. (This last point is more disputed.) If so, then the term 'Son of Man' as applied to Jesus by Mark may be intended to evoke this twin idea of suffering and vindication as the role which lies ahead for Jesus.

The present reference to Jesus as Son of Man may seem out of place in such a schema. In fact it is probably thoroughly appropriate. The wider context in Mark is the series of controversies leading to Jesus' death; so here then, Mark may also be indicating allusively (as in v. 7) that the controversy is one which will lead to death: the one with authority is the 'Son of Man', i.e. the one who must suffer and die. Since the reference to 'Son of Man' here makes excellent sense in Mark's literary scheme, and really makes sense only there, it is probably due to Mark himself, though the substance of the saying, without Jesus' explicit self-reference as Son of Man, may be pre-Markan.

(2:13–17) Jesus and Social Outcasts The second of the five controversy stories concerns Jesus' relationship with tax-collectors and sinners. In what may originally have been a separate story, Mark tells of the call of Levi in vv. 13–14. The story, with its stark simplicity and lack of any extraneous detail, is similar in form to the call stories of 1:16–20. Levi appears nowhere else in this gospel (though Matthew evidently identified Levi with 'Matthew', one of the twelve: cf. Mt 9:9; 10:3). Levi is said to be a 'tax-collector': what is probably meant is not someone who collected taxes for the Romans directly, but an employee of Herod responsible for collecting some of the local tolls. Such people had a uniformly bad name amongst Jews, primarily for their unscrupulousness and dishonesty.

Levi's response to the call is to invite Jesus to his house (v. 15): it is possible that the house actually belongs to Jesus—the Greek is ambiguous, speaking only of 'his' house—but this seems unlikely). Again Jesus comes into conflict with the authorities, here 'the scribes of the Pharisees'. The exact nature of the Pharisaic party is debated. They seem to have been an influential group of lay people, deeply concerned to apply the law to ever new situations, if necessary by legislating afresh, and also concerned to maintain a higher than normal level of purity in their everyday lives. Here they accuse Jesus of eating with tax-collectors and sinners. Eating with such people may have signified an offer to associate with them without condemning their faults, and this may have offended a strict law-abiding group such as the Pharisees. The identity of the 'sinners' is even more uncertain. The term might refer to those who did not maintain a Pharisaic interpretation of the law; or it may refer to those who deliberately flouted the law. The former is perhaps more likely: the term is often used in polemical contexts to refer to those who do not belong to the speaker's own in-group; it is then a way of castigating outsiders. If so it may indicate that the Pharisees expected Jesus not to consort with those outside their group, and hence may suggest that in fact Jesus had quite close links with the Pharisees. If that were the case, it might explain better why the Pharisees so bitterly opposed Jesus. For Mark, however, the Pharisees seem to be no longer very relevant for his own community: e.g. in 7:3–4 he has to explain some of their customs for his readers.

Jesus' final reply in v. 17 is enigmatic. Does it imply that there are righteous people who need no call? It is perhaps better taken as ironic. The righteous need no call—but by implication those who think that they are righteous are perhaps thereby showing they are not righteous. Certainly the saying links with the previous story in showing both Jesus' concern with sinners and sin and his unique authority.

(2:18–22) Old and New The next story concerns the issue of fasting. Again the story is probably composite, with vv. 19b–20 representing a secondary allegorizing of an original tradition.

John's disciples and Pharisees are said to be fasting, and Jesus is asked why his own disciples do not. Fasting was required of all Jews at times, though the story here, by singling out the Pharisees and John for mention, suggests that the fasting in question was an extra obligation taken on freely. The very fact that Jesus is asked why his disciples do not join in is a further indication that Jesus may once have had close links with the Pharisees and hence his failure to follow their practices was a matter of surprise to them. Jesus' reply is to refer, in a variety of metaphors, to the totally new situation that now obtains and its incompatibility with the old: it is like a wedding when fasting is simply inappropriate; similarly, the old and the new will not mix, just as one cannot mend a cloak with unshrunk material, or use old wineskins for new wine. By implication, the 'new' is the presence of Jesus in his ministry: as such it is incompatible with the old ways. The new life of the kingdom is one of joy and celebration and renders fasting obsolete. The implicit claim by Jesus is startling in its scope.

vv. 19b–20 probably represent a secondary allegorizing of the tradition, looking ahead (in the story's terms) to the time when the bridegroom (i.e. Jesus) will be 'taken away' (i.e. die). Fasting will then be reintroduced (as we know it was in the early church). These verses may then be looking ahead to the time of the church, and justifying current church practice; but they also draw the reader's attention forward to the moment of the taking away of the bridegroom, i.e. to the death of Jesus. Like the hints in v. 7 and perhaps v. 10, the reader's gaze is directed to the cross which, for Mark, is never far away in the story.

(2:23–8) Jesus and the Sabbath: The Cornfields The final two controversy stories involve sabbath law, the command that one shall do no 'work'. In the first of these stories, Jesus and his disciples go through the cornfields, plucking corn as they go (v. 23). Such action was not in itself illegal, but interpreters of the sabbath legislation decided that reaping and threshing should count as work and hence were not allowed on the sabbath. The presence of Pharisees, apparently spying in a cornfield on the sabbath, strains credulity and is unlikely to be historical. Possibly we have here then a reflection of a debate in the early church about how far sabbath law should be obeyed by Christians (note it is the disciples, not Jesus, who perform the questionable activity); yet it seems equally likely that Jesus himself was engaged in similar debates.

Jesus' first reply (vv. 25–6) refers to the example of David breaking the law by eating the shewbread when he was hungry (1 Sam 21: the reference to Abiathar being high priest at the time is wrong, and Matthew and Luke both omit the note). The example provides some precedent for acting illegally, but scarcely provides a strong argument for breaking such an important law as the sabbath law. The repeated introductions in v. 25 and v. 27 may indicate a seam in the tradition, and v. 27 is more likely to be the original conclusion to the story. The lack of appositeness in vv. 25–6 may betray the secondary origin of this tradition.

Jesus' second reply is far more devastating. v. 27 seems to relativize the whole sabbath law, so that any human need would legitimize not keeping the sabbath. (Jews at the time certainly allowed work on the sabbath if life was in danger, but this verse seems to go much further.) The implication of this saying in relation to the law is very radical. (Matthew and Luke, perhaps because they realize this, both omit the verse.) v. 28 may represent a slight backing away from the radicalness of v. 27: Jesus (as Son of Man) is lord of the sabbath. Does this imply that Jesus can abrogate sabbath law, but not anyone else? (If we took 'Son of Man' as meaning 'a man', then v. 28 would say the same as v. 27: human need would override the sabbath; but this seems impossible for Mark—for him the Son of Man is Jesus and Jesus alone.) Certainly in Mark's eyes it would seem that the one with the unique authority to dispense sabbath law is Jesus alone. Why then is he referred to as Son of Man? Perhaps again, as in v. 10, it is Mark's way of pointing forward to what is to come: the one who claims this authority inevitably clashes with other authority figures, a clash which will lead to suffering and death, the appointed lot of the one who is 'Son of Man'.

(3:1–6) Jesus and the Sabbath: The Man with the Withered Hand In the last of the five controversy stories here, Jesus is again in dispute over sabbath observance. The occasion is a miracle, Jesus healing a man with a withered hand. But in form-critical terms, the story is not a 'miracle story': the focus of attention is not the miracle for its own sake, but the controversy between Jesus and the authorities about his right to heal the man on the sabbath. There is debate about whether Jesus' actions here do in fact constitute 'work' and thus breach sabbath law. Strictly speaking, Jesus is recorded as doing nothing that could be deemed to be work. However, in its present form, all the parties concerned in the debate presuppose that Jesus has worked. Jesus' justification for his action would scarcely satisfy a Jewish opponent. The principle of working on the sabbath to save life was accepted by all; but a man with a withered hand was not in danger of losing his life. Jesus' rhetorical double question in v. 4 would have had a clear answer from Jews: one must of course save life on the sabbath; otherwise one 'does good', which means obeying God's law and not working. Jesus' saying here seems to presuppose a significant extension of the meaning of saving life: his own ministry is an activity of saving life in a radical sense, and hence justifies relativizing the sabbath law. Yet it is hard to avoid the impression that the story here shows Jesus acting in a rather provocative way in relation to his Jewish contemporaries and their sensibilities regarding what was acknowledged as one of the most important parts of the whole Jewish law.

The conclusion to the story—and to the series of five stories—is a plot to kill Jesus (v. 6). The alliance of Pharisees and 'Herodians' seems implausible historically. The Herodians were not a party, but may have been the supporters of Herod Antipas: as such they would normally have been opposed by the Pharisees. It is notable too that the Pharisees rarely make any appearance in the passion narratives themselves. Perhaps the mention of the two groups here is intended by Mark simply to indicate the combined forces of religious and secular power in general. The key point is the note that the authorities plot to have Jesus killed. The controversies are so deep-seated that they will lead to Jesus' death. For the reader, the cross is now clearly in view. Jesus' life and ministry inevitably lead to conflict, suffering, and death. The cross for Mark is an inalienable part of what it means for Jesus to be God's Son.

(3:7–12) General Healings Mark now gives another summary statement about Jesus' activity as a healer and an exorcist, similar to 1:32–4. Jesus' popularity and success are again emphasized. As in 1:34, however, a typically Markan motif recurs in v. 12: Jesus commands the demons not to make known his identity (here as Son of God); other human beings in the story are not allowed to know who Jesus is at this stage. Once again Mark seems to be taking up a traditional motif from exorcism stories (the exorcist silences the demon) and giving it his own peculiar interpretation. As before, for Mark the true nature of Jesus' divine sonship cannot yet be revealed: such knowledge will only come at the cross.

(3:13–19) The Call of the Twelve The appointment of an inner group of twelve disciples is well attested in the earliest Christian tradition (cf. 1 Cor 15:5). Mark does not make a lot of this. The number twelve is probably deliberately intended to evoke the number of the tribes of Israel: the new body round Jesus is the nucleus of a new people of God. The fact that the number is twelve, not eleven, so that Jesus himself is not one of the number, implies an even more privileged place for Jesus. He is the creator and inaugurator of the new Israel. The twelve are said to be 'apostles' here (though the phrase is absent from some Greek manuscripts). Mark uses the term elsewhere only at 6:30. The use of the word may be anachronistic here and reflect post-resurrection usage: it was used in the later Christian church to refer to special authority figures in the movement, but it is doubtful if Jesus himself used the term. The names of the twelve are mainly traditional, and nothing is known of most of them. The extra name of Peter given to Simon is not explained (cf. Mt 16:18); the name 'Boanerges' given to James and John is peculiar to Mark here. Some discussion has taken place over the penultimate name 'Simon the Cananaean' (NRSV). The word for 'Cananaean' has been interpreted as 'Zealot', with conclusions drawn about the possible presence in Jesus' immediate circle of a member of the Zealot party, the political group later very influential in fomenting armed rebellion against the Romans. However, it is almost certain that such a party did not exist prior to the time of the Jewish War in c.66 CE. Hence no conclusions can be drawn about Jesus' possible involvement with the activity of such a group, which is in any case extremely unlikely. The word here may simply imply that Simon was a very zealous character.

The reference to Judas Iscariot once again reminds the reader of the story to come: even at this moment, betrayal and its consequences are not far away.

(3:20–35) Further Controversy This section represents another example of Mark's sandwiching technique: the story of the Beelzebul controversy with the scribes (vv. 22–30) comes between the two halves of the story of the dispute between Jesus and his family (vv. 20–1, 31–5). Mark thereby shows the increasing hostility and alienation experienced by Jesus: the failure of his family to accept him is shown to be akin to the hostility of the scribes. Throughout the gospel, Jesus becomes more and more isolated, as one group after another—steadily getting closer to home—deserts him. The Beelzebul controversy demonstrates the increasing intensity of the hostility from the 'scribes' (cf. 1:22; 2:6). Here they are said to be 'from Jerusalem', one of the first indicators in Mark of what will be a strong distinction between Galilee and Jerusalem, with Jerusalem as the place of hostility and, finally, death. The issue is again about Jesus' authority and power, the scribes accusing him of using demonic power. ('Beelzebul'—the name varies in different manuscripts—was probably originally the name of a minor demon: this period was a time of great flux in beliefs about demonic figures, with no standardized model of a monolithic Devil figure universally established. However, Mark himself does seem to presuppose such a model and evidently regards the two names as referring to the same figure.) Jesus replies at first in a series of images (literally 'parables', v. 23), but all based on the same theme: a power fighting against itself would collapse immediately. By implication, Satan's kingdom is thought of as still standing: hence it cannot be opposed by its own forces—Jesus' power must have other roots.

The saying in v. 27 may have had a separate origin. The presuppositions now seem to be different: Satan is the strong man who has now been bound and his property is being plundered, i.e. by Jesus. The image derives from Jewish eschatology (cf. Rev 20:2): the binding of Satan is a feature of the eschatological end-time. The claim being made here is then that the end-time has arrived: Jesus' exorcisms are not just everyday events, but the final overthrow of the power of Satan. Moreover, Mark's arrangement of the material, with v. 27 following vv. 24–6, suggests that he regards v. 27 as providing the hermeneutical key for the previous verses. Thus, whatever these sayings may have implied earlier in the tradition, Mark regards Jesus' argument in vv. 24–7 as claiming to have won the final victory over Satan. The saying in vv. 28–9 reverts to the issue of Jesus' authority. The Markan version is probably more original than the parallel in Q (cf. Lk 12:10) which speaks of blasphemy against the Son of Man being forgivable. Here all sins are said to be forgivable, except blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. In context the meaning is clear: blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is a denial of the power of Jesus in his exorcisms. By implication, therefore, Jesus exorcizes by the power of the Holy Spirit (cf. 1:12–13), and a refusal to accept this by the scribes is the unforgivable sin. Yet again Mark focuses all attention on the person of Jesus and the authority by which he acts. For Mark the centre of attention is supremely the Christological question of who Jesus is.

(4:1–34) Parables At this point, Mark gives the first extended block of teaching by Jesus. Up to now, Jesus' teaching has been important as illustrating his authority (cf. 1:22); here, for the first time, some content is given. The content here consists mostly of parables. The parables are widely thought to be the most characteristic part of Jesus' teaching, though Mark does not give many examples. Christians very soon interpreted Jesus' parables as allegories, finding significance in each detail of the story, and we can see that process starting as early as Mark himself (see vv. 14–20). The recognition that Jesus' parables were not originally allegories in which every detail of the story has significance is now well accepted in modern scholarship. Some though have taken this to the other extreme, arguing that they have only one single meaning. This is probably too rigid: the parables may have been intended to make more than one point, even if a detailed allegorical interpretation by Jesus is unlikely. It is generally thought that Jesus used parables in order to enhance his teaching and to get his message across. As we shall see, this makes Mark's account of Jesus' speaking about his own parables in vv. 11–12 here extremely difficult to accept as historical.

This section in Mark is almost certainly composite. The large number of (often unnecessary) introductions (cf. vv. 2, 10, 13, 21, 24, 26, 30), as well as the inconsistency in the settings (Jesus speaks to the crowd in v. 2, withdraws to an inner group in v. 10, but still seems to be speaking to the crowd in v. 33) suggest that originally separate traditions have been combined here. For example, some have argued that Mark has taken over a prior collection of three 'seed' parables. Whether there is such a pre-Markan collection here is uncertain. Much depends on one's interpretation of the difficult vv. 10–13 (see below), and whether one judges the ideas there to be non-Markan and hence pre-Markan.

(4:1–9) The Parable of the Sower It is generally assumed that Jesus' parables are true to life and not artificially constructed, unrealistic stories. (Such a broad generalization is unlikely to be true always: sometimes they make their point precisely because what they describe is unexpected and extraordinary.) Much discussion has taken place about whether the details of the parable of the sower are true to life: is the action of sowing seed 'on the path' (v. 4) normal practice? Are the yields of the good earth (v. 8: 'thirty and sixty and a hundred fold') normal or abnormal? Perhaps the issue, at least in relation to the first point, is not too important: this is not a story inculcating good horticultural practice! It is a story about how preaching is received. The story is thus almost inherently allegorical—at least to a certain extent, if not down to the smallest detail. The yields in v. 8 are probably extraordinary: the result of the seed falling on good earth is not just what 'normally' happens, but a divine miracle.

The overall interpretation of the parable can be taken in two quite different ways: it can be assurance to those who receive the 'seed' that all in the end will be well—the harvest will come; or it can be a warning to those who hear the message to ensure that they receive it properly and not be like the three types of unproductive soil. The first interpretation has in its favour the fact that the other two parables in this chapter probably have a similar message. However, there is no reason why all three parables should be saying the same thing; and the fact that all three are included suggests that maybe Mark at least thought they were not simply repetitions of each other in slightly different wording. Further, the considerable detail given to the first three kinds of soil suggests that these are of interest in themselves, and are not simply negative foils to the good soil which is alone the point of the story. Thus it seems likely that the parable is in some sense a warning to people to take care how they receive the preaching of Jesus. It is not just encouragement to the 'good' that all will be well in the end; it is as much a warning to those who listen to make sure that they are 'good soil'. Mark's own interests may come to the fore in his description of the second type of soil (vv. 5–6). The description here is longer than the other three and may have been expanded by Mark: for Mark, 'rootless' Christians are perhaps the cause for most concern. What this might mean in practice is spelt out later (see on v. 17).

(4:10–13) The Theory of Parables These verses are, by almost universal consent, among the hardest in the whole gospel to interpret. vv. 11–12 seem to ascribe to Jesus the view that he teaches in parables precisely in order to hide his meaning and to prevent other people (the crowds) from understanding him. This is what Mark's Greek clearly means, and it is thus virtually impossible to see this as coming from Jesus himself, who (it is usually assumed) used parables to enable understanding, not prevent it. Hence the saying in its present form is almost certainly the product of someone writing later than Jesus. v. 12 uses the words from Isa 6:9 to say that the failure of people to understand Jesus' message is due to divine predestination. Attempts are sometimes made to rescue the saying for the historical Jesus by claiming that the words 'in parables' in v. 11 originally (in Aramaic) meant 'in riddles', and were unrelated to Jesus' using stories ('parables') to enhance his message. Hence Jesus was simply reflecting on the fact that people had not accepted his message (so Jeremias 1963). However, this scarcely solves the problem of what the saying now means in Mark's Greek: at this level it clearly relates to Jesus' use of 'parables', i.e. stories.

The verses suggest a rigid division between a privileged in-group and a condemned out-group. The latter fail to understand the message as a result of a divinely predetermined decision (v. 12). The text cited (Isa 6:9–10) is one of the classic texts used by Christians to seek to explain the failure by others to respond positively to the Christian message (cf. Jn 12:40; Rom 11:8). In the light of hostility experienced, Christians sought to come to terms with apparent failure by 'explaining' their lack of success as due to predetermined action by God. What we see here, therefore, is probably not any reflection of a conscious decision by Jesus, but an attempt at rationalization by a later Christian group in the light of bitter experience of rejection, but struggling to maintain an overall theistic worldview. The sentiments here may be unattractive in one way; but the struggle to reconcile belief in God with apparent failure in the world's terms is a perennial problem for many.

The in-group are said to be those who have received the 'secret' (NRSV, lit. mystery) of the kingdom. The benefits enjoyed by this in-group of disciples are often read out of v. 12 by reversing what is said there: the disciples must 'understand'. Perhaps too, taking into account v. 34, the disciples have been privileged to receive 'interpretation' of the parables which is denied to the crowds. This is sometimes then contrasted with the picture elsewhere in Mark (e.g. 8:17–21), and also in v. 13 here, where it seems that even the disciples fail to understand: hence, it is argued, perhaps vv. 11–12 are a pre-Markan tradition which Mark has radicalized by making even the disciples fail to understand.

This however makes Mark into something of an authorial idiot, including verses with which he apparently patently disagreed and which he immediately had to correct. In fact it is not said in v. 11 (or indeed in v. 34) that the disciples actually understand Jesus. In one sense of course they do, as indeed do the crowds: they 'understand' parables (cf. 3:23; 12:9) in that the latter are not unintelligible nonsense. Nevertheless, they do not lead everyone to faith: in that sense they do not lead to (deeper) 'understanding'. The disciples are in a different position, which is somewhat ambivalent. They do not yet fully 'understand', indeed perhaps they cannot (in the story-world) yet understand—prior to the cross. Yet they are in a uniquely privileged position. They have been given the 'mystery' of the kingdom. Unlike Matthew and Luke, who both talk of 'knowing mysteries' (plur.) here, Mark talks only of a single mystery. Perhaps the reference is primarily Christological: Jesus himself is the mystery, and the disciples are privileged by being called by Jesus to be 'with him' (cf. 3:14). Their understanding can only—but will—come later.

There is thus no need to drive a wedge between vv. 11–12 and the rest of Mark, even though Mark is maybe trying to say more than one thing here. The crowds' failure to understand—a mirror of the rejection experienced by later Christians—is the result of God's will. The disciples' privileged position is also the result of the same will; yet their failure to understand at this stage in the story is not minimized.

(4:14–20) Interpretation of the Parable of the Sower Mark now gives a detailed, allegorical interpretation of the parable of the sower. Jeremias (1963) has shown that the vocabulary here is almost exclusively language characteristic of the early church, not of Jesus. Hence the interpretation is unlikely to be dominical, even though, as argued above, it is likely that the parable did have an inalienable 'allegorical' slant originally, with the different soils all having significance. Some have tried to correlate the different descriptions with characters in the story (Tolbert 1989: e.g. the first group are the Jewish opponents; the rocky ground represents the disciples, etc.). This may, however, read too much into the details; in any case, the warnings implied in the descriptions of the different soils seem to be more directly related to Mark's Christian readers who could only with some difficulty identify with, say, the Jewish opponents in Mark's story. The longest description of the poor soil concerns the rocky ground and those who have 'no root' (vv. 16–17, corresponding to the longest description in Mark's version of the parable itself: vv. 5–6). Perhaps this is the danger Mark feels most acutely: the detailed explanation refers to 'trouble or persecution' threatening initial commitment. It is possible that one sees here a reflection of (part of) Mark's own situation of a community facing the threat of persecution and leading to some followers giving up their Christian commitment. Perhaps too the warning against 'the cares of the world and the delight in riches' reflects other problems within Mark's community (cf. 10:17–22). In this interpretation of the parable in Mark, relatively little space is given to the description of the good soil (v. 20): the aim of the interpretation is thus not so much to give assurance that all will in the end be well, but to warn people of the dangers of the present. As noted on the parable itself, the aim is more that of warning than encouragement.

(4:21–5) Collected Sayings Mark now collects together a series of what originally were almost certainly isolated sayings in the tradition. (They appear scattered in widely different contexts in Matthew and Luke.) vv. 21–2 continue the theme of secrecy and openness. The opening of v. 21 is in Greek literally ‘Does the lamp come . . . ?’ The unusual personification of the lamp, and the significant way in which, for Mark, Jesus has ‘come’ (cf. 1:38), suggests that Mark sees Jesus himself as the lamp. The aim of Jesus’ coming is not in the end permanent secrecy or hiddenness. Rather, any secrecy will in the end result in openness. Exactly when this will happen is not specified precisely here; but the purpose of the sayings seems to stress the inevitable end of any secrecy surrounding Jesus and his person. vv. 24–5 strike a rather different note, with warnings as well as encouragement. Human response is also required in full measure. Perhaps what is in mind is the preaching of the gospel by later Christians. Those who respond positively will be rewarded abundantly; those who do not will forfeit even what they have.

The section as a whole thus combines assurance and exhortation with warning. As with the previous parable of the sower and its interpretation combined with vv. 10–13, there are both encouraging and warning elements in the Christian gospel. But if the warning side has been stressed so far, the encouragement is not forgotten, as the next two parables show.

(4:26–32) Two Seed Parables Mark gives two parables, very closely related to each other and probably (in his view) with very similar meanings. The first, the parable of the seed growing secretly (vv. 26–9), is peculiar to Mark; the second, the parable of the mustard seed (vv. 30–2) is shared with Matthew and Luke who probably also know a Q version of the parable (cf. Lk 13:18–19). Both parables are said to be parables illustrating the reality of the ‘kingdom of God’. Both imply that the kingdom is present in minute, hidden form as a ‘seed’, but that it will be shown in its full glory in the future. The parable of the seed growing secretly (vv. 26–9) uses the image of the harvest, perhaps alluding to the final judgement (cf. Joel 3:13). The parable of the mustard seed (vv. 30–2) uses the image of the birds flocking to nest in the branches of the tree, perhaps alluding to the Gentiles coming into the kingdom (cf. Dan 4:12; Ezek 31:6). The stress in both parables is on the divine miracle and lack of human influence in the process of growth. There is no hint of any long period of time, nor of any idea of the kingdom ‘growing in the hearts of men and women’, an idea popular in nineteenth-century liberal theology. Rather, all the emphasis is on the divine initiative and the assurance of the end result.

This might be thought to contradict the emphasis in the earlier part of the chapter on human responsibility and involvement. In one sense, this is true. But perhaps Mark is emphasizing the other side of the coin here: the kingdom will come in its fullness, and of this the followers of Jesus can be assured. Moreover, the kingdom is something which is present already in hidden form (as a seed) now. The reference may again be to the person of Jesus himself: Jesus in his ministry brings God’s kingly rule into the present as a reality now. As noted before, eschatology for Mark is both futuristic and realized. However, the idea of the presence of the kingdom in an institution such as the church, after Jesus and before the Eschaton, seems foreign to Mark.

(4:33–4) Jesus’ Use of Parables The conclusion of the discourse takes up the division outlined in vv. 11–12. v. 33 is often taken as the tradition used by Mark, apparently implying that parables were used to be understood; this was then glossed by Mark in v. 34, suggesting that only the privileged in-group of disciples are allowed to receive the interpretation of the parables, so that everything remains enigmatic to outsiders. As we saw in vv. 11–12, there is a division between disciples and others, Mark in part reflecting on the mixed responses to the Christian message which have been experienced. And the disciples are in a privileged position. But the division is not clearly one of understanding: even though the disciples have had Jesus explain ‘everything’ to them, they still fail to understand at a deep level who he is and what he is about. The next story will illustrate this. In the narrative, the time for openness is not yet.

(4:35–5:43) Nature Miracles Mark now gives a series of three stories of Jesus’ miracles, showing his power over the forces of nature as well as his ability to heal and to exorcize. Although modern interpreters might wish to distinguish between healing/exorcistic powers and claims to be able to change the course of nature, such a distinction would be foreign to a first-century reader or writer. Both alike show the divine power at work in Jesus. But equally, it is clear from these stories that miracles alone have little evidential value: they cannot create faith where none is present.

(4:35–41) The Stilling of the Storm The story is somewhat artificial: fishermen used to the lake and its ways are terrified by a sudden storm, a storm so severe that they panic, and yet through which Jesus sleeps. But Mark is not interested in such niceties; for him, the story shows Jesus’ ability to deal with the primeval forces of chaos. The ‘sea’ in the OT sometimes stands for the primal chaos which God alone can order and calm (cf. Ps 65:7; 74:13), as well as being used often as a symbol for the sufferings endured by human beings (cf. Ps 107:23–32). Mark’s verb in v. 39, referring to Jesus ‘rebuking’ the wind, is the same as that used in 1:25 where Jesus ‘rebukes’ a demon. Perhaps it is implied that the ability to control the storm shows a victory over the demonic powers of chaos and evil.

The disciples’ reaction is not presented positively. Their question in v. 38 (‘do you not care that we are perishing?’) suggests a harsh accusation against Jesus. Jesus’ reply is to still the storm and then address them with the rhetorical questions ‘Why are you afraid? Have you still no faith?’ By implication they do not. They are as yet blind. They ask ‘Who then is this?’ (v. 41) and cannot provide an answer. They have not yet reached any insight into who Jesus is, despite their privileged position. The negative portrait of the disciples in the story is thus developed a stage further; and even a stupendous miracle such as this has not created any ‘faith’.

The note about the ‘cushion’ in v. 38 has sometimes been seen as a vivid life-like feature, perhaps indicating an eyewitness account. This seems difficult to prove one way or the other: but the detail could just as easily be invented precisely in order to create a vivid narrative and to make it seem life-like.

(5:1–20) The Gerasene Demoniac Mark follows with a story of a further exorcism by Jesus. The story is told with a wealth of circumstantial detail, designed above all to show Jesus' great power in overcoming such massive opposition in the forces of evil. However, a number of details and inconsistencies within the present narrative suggest that Mark may be combining more than one tradition here into a single story. (v. 6 is awkward after v. 2; v. 8 seems an awkward interruption; v. 15 seems odd after v. 14, since the latter presupposes a considerable time lapse.) But whatever the prehistory of the story in its present form, Mark's narrative serves to highlight the terrible initial state of the man, and hence to magnify the significance of the cure effected.

Some details of the passage remain obscure. v. 1 states that the action takes place as Jesus crosses the Sea of Galilee to the country of the 'Gerasenes' (so most MSS), although Gerasa is c. 30 miles south-east of the Sea of Galilee: perhaps this simply indicates Mark's lack of detailed knowledge of Galilean geography. Probably Mark does intend that the incident take place in the partly Gentile territory of the Decapolis.

The battle about the names of the protagonists is similar to that seen before (cf. Mk 1:22–7). The name given to Jesus by the demon ('Son of the Most High God') uses a description of God often used by, or in relation to, non-Jews (cf. Gen 14:18; Dan 3:26; 4:2). Jesus does not here explicitly silence the demon, perhaps because in the story there are no bystanders at this point. The significance of the name of the demon as 'Legion' is not quite clear: it is possible that this is an attempt to evade giving a name. However, for Mark, such niceties are probably lost: for him, the giving of the name may simply show that the demon cannot resist Jesus' demand for a name, and the name itself indicates the huge power of the demon, equivalent to a Roman legion in number, i.e. 6,000 men. The details of the pigs and their destruction grates on some modern sensibilities in relation to animal welfare, though in a Jewish context pigs were regarded as unclean animals. Their destruction would therefore be seen as appropriate. Trying to discover possible natural causes for the pigs' sudden flight is probably a fruitless exercise.

The story ends with Jesus' refusal to accept the man as an immediate follower (v. 18): Jesus' authority here is absolute. Jesus commands him to tell his friends what has happened (v. 19). It is not quite clear if this is intended as implying an element of secrecy (i.e. tell your friends and no one else). Certainly the sequel suggests otherwise: there is no adversative in v. 20, and it implies that the man obeys Jesus in proclaiming publicly what has happened. (Alternatively, one could interpret v. 20 as implying that the man disobeyed Jesus, as in 1:45.) Either way the net result is the same: Jesus' power as an exorcist is publicized freely and everyone is amazed. There is then no hint of any critique of Jesus' activity in this respect.

(5:21–43) The Haemorrhaging Woman and Jairus' Daughter The final unit in this section comprises two miracles: the healing of the woman with the haemorrhage and the raising of Jairus' daughter. The former is sandwiched in between the two parts of the latter story, a Markan technique already noted. Mark clearly wants the two stories to interpret each other. Both focus on the theme of faith as the important precondition for any miracle to occur (vv. 34, 36), as well as being linked to the number twelve (vv. 25, 42; though whether there is any significance in this is not clear).

The condition of the woman with the haemorrhage is described in terms very similar to Lev 15:25 LXX. The woman's condition rendered her unclean, and also anything or anyone she touched would be unclean. Her action in explicitly touching Jesus' clothes thus brings Jesus into the realm of the unclean. Quite as much as dealing with the disease itself, the miracle thus serves to break down the social and religious barriers created by the purity laws (cf. Mk 1:40–5). In an aside, the disciples are shown to be somewhat lacking in insight (v. 31, cf. Mk 4:38). By contrast, the woman comes forward and confesses publicly what she has done. Jesus' reply is to commend her 'faith', which is the necessary prerequisite for the miracle to happen. The miracle does not generate faith; rather, faith must be present for the miracle to occur.

A similar point is made in the story of Jairus' daughter: news of the death of the child (v. 35) leads Jesus to address Jairus and exhort him to 'believe', have faith (v. 36). Jesus tells the crowd that the girl is not dead but sleeping, a statement which produces mocking laughter (v. 40). They show no faith. Perhaps this can then explain the strange feature of the story which follows, i.e. the otherwise inexplicable secrecy command in v. 43: Jesus takes a small group of his disciples together with the girl's parents with him, and raises the child to life; but then he commands secrecy about what has happened! For many such a command is impossible historically (how could such an event be kept secret?), but also difficult to fit into any consistent Markan pattern: elsewhere in Mark commands for secrecy after miracles are regularly broken (1:45; 7:36). Should one assume the same here and see the motif as highlighting by implication Jesus' success (cf. 1:45; so Luz 1983)? But this is not what Mark says. Perhaps the point is that the crowds outside have shown no faith at all in their mocking laughter (v. 40). By implication they already have a very superficial explanation of what will inevitably be the public knowledge of the girl's health: she was simply asleep and not really dead at all. The true nature of the action of Jesus, in rescuing the girl from death itself, is only open to the eye of faith and publicizing it in a context of unbelief will not by itself create faith.

Jesus' words to the girl are given in v. 41. Mark uses the Aramaic words talitha cum, even though he is writing in Greek. Some non-biblical healing stories do use 'magical' formulae, often a jumble of unintelligible words. Here, however, the words are not unintelligible but simply in a foreign language and Mark does translate them. Cf. too 7:34.

(6:1–6a) Jesus Rejected in his Home Town The themes of faith, and the growing opposition faced by Jesus, are continued in the story of the rejection of Jesus in his home town. Jesus has come into conflict with the authorities (2:1–3:6) and with his own family (3:21–35). Now the opposition seems to spread to his own home town (not explicitly stated here to be Nazareth, though cf. 1:9). As in 1:22–3, the occasion is Jesus' teaching (v. 2), and again Mark seems more interested in the negative reaction this provokes than in the actual contents of the teaching. This reaction is articulated in the rhetorical questions about Jesus' origins and his family (v. 3). At one level, all that is said is that Jesus' origins imply that he is a very ordinary person. Whether anything more is implied is not clear. It was very unusual to refer to a Jewish man as the son of his mother, rather than his father. Various possible interpretations of this have been suggested: is this a hint of doubts about the legitimacy of Jesus' birth (Joseph was not really his father)? Is this a hint that Jesus has no human father because he is the Son of God? It is doubtful though if Mark sees any great significance in the words here: any hints of the type suggested are at most extremely allusive. Likewise the mention of Jesus' brothers and sisters (v. 3) is probably to be taken at face value and can only with difficulty be interpreted as referring to, say, half-brothers and half-sisters. The notion of the perpetual virginity of Mary comes from a much later period of Christian history, and Mark shows no awareness of it. Jesus' reply in v. 4 implicitly compares his own position with that of a prophet. The saying may be traditional: Mark nowhere else makes much of the idea of Jesus as a prophet. If anything, the saying is more at home on the lips of the historical Jesus.

The story concludes with the note about Jesus' inability to do any miracle because of the unbelief of the people. (The apparent reference to Jesus' impotence here is toned down by Matthew.) This is the negative side of the positive correlation between faith and miracles seen already in Mark: miracles can and do take place in a context of faith (cf. 2:4; 5:43, 36); conversely, where there is no faith, miracles cannot occur.

(6:6b–13) The Mission of the Twelve Mark records the tradition (probably also found in Q: cf. Lk 10:1–16) of Jesus giving instructions for a 'mission' by the disciples, commanding them to take only the barest minimum by way of clothing or supplies, and with instructions about what to do when they are not accepted. The widespread nature of the tradition suggests that it is old (i.e. pre-Markan), though whether it goes back to Jesus himself is not certain. It seems likely that some Christians did take these instructions to the letter (cf. G. Theissen's suggestions about the existence of 'wandering charismatics' in the early church: Theissen 1978). However, Mark does not make much of it. For him, the story further develops the mixed portrait of the disciples in his story. We have already seen the beginnings of the negative picture that will come more strongly from now on (cf. 1:36; 4:38). But this negative picture is always the counterfoil of a positive side which should not be forgotten (cf. 1:16–20; 3:13): here too the disciples are instructed by Jesus, and they obey his instructions fully and without demur.

Some details remain obscure. Mark allows the disciples to wear sandals (v. 9; Q does not: cf. Lk 10:4). Perhaps Mark is easing an almost impossibly ascetic earlier version to make it more practicable. The significance of shaking the dust off one's feet against unresponsive places (v. 11) may allude to the practice of Jews shaking the dust off their feet when they entered the land of Israel to avoid contaminating the holy land. Does this gesture then imply rejection from the (new) people of God by the disciples? This may have been the case in the tradition. However, Mark seems to know virtually nothing of what may actually have happened on the mission except in the most general terms, and the gesture is not expanded here. So too it seems that Mark envisages the mission as taking place in Jesus' lifetime, and he gives no indication that these instructions are to apply to Christian missionaries in his own situation.

(6:14–29) Herod and the Death of John the Baptist Between the sending out of the twelve on mission and their return (v. 30), Mark inserts the note about Herod's views on Jesus, which leads into a retrospective account of the death of John the Baptist. In literary terms, the insertion serves to fill a gap in the story of the mission (about which Mark seems to have had very little information); but it also serves to intensify the general theme of the fate that awaits Jesus. John is the forerunner of Jesus, and here his violent death is recalled. The reader cannot fail to be reminded of the similar fate that awaits the one to whom John has pointed (cf. too 9:12–13).

The opinions about Jesus echoed in vv. 14–16 may reflect views held by some at the time, though it is unclear whether anyone would have seriously thought that Jesus could be an executed John brought back to life. The structure of the story in the overall narrative (as in 8:28 where very similar opinions are also recorded) suggests that Mark thinks that these opinions are at best inadequate (Jesus is 'one of the prophets'), at worst quite clearly wrong (Jesus is John returned).

The story of John's death itself has a number of bizarre features and is quite unlike Josephus' account of John's death, where John is executed because Herod fears an insurrection. Mark has probably confused personnel in identifying Philip as the (first) husband of Herodias: Philip was in fact Herodias' son-in-law. However, the relationships of the Herod family were so incestuous and tortuous that anyone could be forgiven for being somewhat confused! The picture in Mark's story of Herod as full of respect for John, but feeling morally bound to agree to honour a 'blank cheque' offered to his/ Herodias' daughter, strains credulity. The account in Josephus seems far more plausible. For Mark though, the function of the story is to point to the similar fate awaiting Jesus. Thus the note about the burial of John at the end of the story (v. 29) is reminiscent of the note of the burial of Jesus (15:45–6). Even in the midst of the apparent success of the mission, the shadow of the cross falls.

(6:31–44) The Feeding of the 5,000 This feeding story has a doublet in the account of the feeding of the 4,000 in ch. 8. Several commentators have pointed to a possible parallel structure in the two sequences of events in 6:31–7:37 and 8:1–26: a feeding story (6:35–44; 8:1–10) is followed by a journey across the lake (6:45–52; 8:10), a dispute with Pharisees (7:1–23; 8:11–13), a discussion about bread (7:24–30; 8:14–21) and a healing involving some kind of 'magical' techniques (7:31–7; 8:22–6). However, too much should probably not be made of this. Mark is certainly aware of the duplication in the feeding narratives (cf. 8:17–21), but not of the other parallels which in any case are at times rather weak (there is no miracle in the crossing of 8:10, unlike 6:45–52; the dispute with the Pharisees in 8:11–13 does not concern the law as in 7:1–23). The sequence may be in part traditional (cf. Jn 6, where the feeding story is also followed by the walking on the water: unless one posits John's dependence on Mark, the parallel structure indicates a common tradition available to both evangelists). For the possible significance of the doublet in the feeding story, see mk 8:1–10.

What actually happened is probably impossible to say, though many have tried to do so. The famous 'lunch-box' theory—everyone had brought their own supplies and were encouraged to share what they had brought—can gain a little support from the fact that there is no report of an acclamation from the crowd that a great miracle has occurred. Nevertheless, it is quite clear that Mark himself regarded the event as a miracle. It is probably more fruitful to ask what the evangelist made of the story.

The account is full of many reminiscences, from both Jewish and Christian tradition. The story recalls the giving of manna in the desert, and perhaps the miraculous feeding by the prophet Elisha in 2 Kings 4:42–4. Likewise the note about 'sheep without a shepherd' (v. 34) reminds one of David as the shepherd and the people of Israel as the sheep; since too by implication, Jesus fills the role of the missing shepherd, one recalls various OT passages which speak of the future Davidic leader as a shepherd (Jer 23:1–6; Ezek 34:23).

But the strongest parallel for Mark is probably the Christian tradition of the eucharist: Jesus' actions in v. 41 of blessing, breaking, and giving bread are the same as at the Last Supper (14:22), and bread and fish very soon became eucharistic symbols. Jesus' feeding the crowds here is no doubt seen by Mark as a symbol of the feeding of the new people of God through the Christian eucharist in his own day in his community's worship. This is probably also the relevance of the note about the grass being 'green' (v. 39). This is sometimes taken as an indication of an eyewitness account (and is of course by no means trivial: grass in Palestine would not often be green, but very quickly became scorched and brown in the heat). It may though be a symbolic hint: grass is green in the spring, and for a Christian reader this evokes ideas of Jewish Passover, Christian Easter, and everything associated with them, including (for Mark's readers) the institution of the eucharist. Hence the greenness of the grass may be a further subtle allusion to the eucharistic symbolism and significance of the story.

The gathering of the fragments (in itself a miracle, since more is collected than distributed) no doubt had symbolic significance for John (cf. Jn 6:12), though Mark makes nothing of it. For the possible significance of the numbers involved, see on 8:1–10.

(6:45–52) The Walking on the Water This story was probably already connected with the feeding story in Mark's tradition (see mk 6:31–44). The historical basis for the account, as with the feeding miracle, is probably irrecoverable, though some have again sought to solve the problem of the miracle by a natural explanation (e.g. Jesus was on solid ground in very shallow water and the disciples thought he was actually walking on water). As before, this is certainly not the view of Mark, who doubtless regarded the story as a genuine miracle. God's power to subdue the sea and its forces (see mk 4:35–41) is well attested in the OT, and sometimes described in terms of walking on or through the sea (Job 9:8); so too the miracle of passing through the Red Sea at the Exodus attests to YHWH's power (Ps 77:19; Isa 43:16). The latter motif may provide some link with the feeding story in so far as the latter is redolent of the manna incident: both stories may then show Jesus as a latter-day Moses, feeding people miraculously and passing on/over the sea. This is however more likely to be characteristic of the pre-Markan tradition than of Mark himself who does not generally make much of Jesus as a Moses figure (such a typology is more prominent in Matthew). For Mark, the story may simply illustrate Jesus' power over the forces of nature once more.

Jesus' words to the disciples in v. 51 (NRSV 'it is I') are literally 'I am' (Gk. egō eimi). It is just possible that this is an allusion to the divine name of YHWH himself (the Greek LXX renders the divine name 'YHWH' as egō eimi). However, the Greek is ambiguous (NRSV's translation is perfectly possible) and Mark does not clearly take it as a claim to divinity as such.

A typically Markan motif comes at the end in v. 52. After the general note of astonishment in v. 51 (the expected end of a miracle story), Mark records the inability of the disciples to understand 'about the loaves'. In general terms this portrays the now increasingly negative portrait of the disciples in the narrative: they fail to understand almost everything about Jesus from now on. With 'their hearts . . . hardened', they are almost in as bad a position as the Pharisees of 3:5 (but see further on 8:17–21). What it is about the loaves which they should have understood here is not spelt out explicitly. Clearly Mark sees the two stories as closely linked: both show Jesus' power and authority to act in sovereign freedom and in the power of God.

(6:53–6) General Healings The same power and authority are exhibited in the summary statement which now follows, Mark recording general healings by Jesus in the area. Again there is no hint of a critique by Mark of the miracles performed by Jesus.

(7:1–23) Dispute about Purity Mark now gives a long section of Jesus' teaching, delivered apparently in relation to a dispute raised by Pharisees and some scribes. The section is almost certainly composite: the repeated introductory phrases (vv. 9, 14, 18, 20) and changes of venue or audience (vv. 14, 17) suggest that different traditions are being brought together, a view supported by the fact that some of the traditions do not cohere very well with the wider context in which they have been placed here by Mark.

The initial issue raised is why Jesus' disciples eat with unwashed hands. The 'washing' refers here to ritual purity, not to simple hygiene. Mark then seeks to explain the practice of hand-washing for his (almost certainly Gentile) audience in vv. 3–4. Unfortunately, his explanation is, by universal consent, confused and erroneous: Mark says that hand-washing was incumbent upon 'all Jews', whereas we know that such ritual cleansing was only required of priests at this time. (Such hand-washing was practised by all Jews at a later period, after 100 CE.) Clearly Mark is unaware of some of the details of Jewish Torah observance. There is though the question of why this practice should be expected of Jesus' disciples. It is possible that the story is wholly artificial; alternatively, the implicit assumption made here—that Jesus' disciples would obey such rules—may indicate that Jesus and his disciples were closely connected with the Pharisaic movement and hence were expected, at least by other Pharisees, to adopt the Pharisaic way of life which may well have involved the voluntary taking on of such extra purity requirements. Cf. Mk 2:16, 18.

Jesus' first reply in Mark comes in vv. 6–8. He cites Isa 29:13 to reject the Pharisees' complaint, claiming that their human tradition is jeopardizing the obeying of the Torah itself. The 'reply' is scarcely apposite. It is not said, for example, how the practice of hand-washing has actually led to any abandonment of the written law. Moreover, it is not clear how the Pharisees' behaviour justifies the charge of their being 'hypocrites' (v. 6: generally this refers to saying one thing and doing another, but it is not said that the Pharisees themselves have not washed their hands.) Further, the version of Isa 29:13 cited here is that of the LXX, which differs markedly from the Hebrew text, and which can only make the relevant point (about the human, as opposed to divine, origins of the commands) precisely at the points where the LXX differs from the Hebrew. The saying can thus scarcely go back to the historical Jesus, and the connection with the present context is very artificial. Nor are the sentiments expressed here (maintaining the written law and simply rejecting the later tradition) Mark's last word on the topic. Perhaps Mark simply uses this tradition to castigate Jesus' opponents.

The second reply is even harder to integrate into the context. Jesus refers to the apparent practice of people evading their responsibilities to parents as set out in the Decalogue by appealing to the inviolable nature of an oath which dedicates an offering to the service of the temple. Such practice is condemned here in forthright terms. But other Jews would be equally forthright and would have—and did—stress the primacy of filial obligations. Further, it is not at all clear how this relates to any antithesis between written law and human tradition, since the inviolability of oaths was also part of the written law (Num 30:2). Once again, a separate tradition seems to be incorporated here, somewhat clumsily. For Mark, the prime point again seems to be the polemic against the opponents of Jesus.

Jesus' positive reply to the initial charge, at least in Mark's story, comes in v. 15. However, the extra introduction in v. 14, and the summoning of the crowd, may indicate a further seam in the tradition. Moreover, the question of hand-washing seems now to have been left far behind and the issue is now one of the purity of food on its own. Jesus' saying in v. 15 has been extensively discussed, above all because of its possible implications for determining Jesus' attitude to the law. At first sight, the saying appears to deny that any food in and of itself can be unclean, and hence calls into question all the food laws of Leviticus. Those who see the saying as authentic, but find such a radical claim hard to credit to Jesus, have argued that perhaps the negative statement in the first half of the saying is not to be taken too literally but only comparatively: the antithesis (not A but B) means that one thing (B) is much more important than the other (A), not that the other (A) itself is to be rejected. This is possible, though it is not what Mark's Greek says, and Mark himself clearly understands the saying as implying that Jesus has abrogated the food laws of the OT (cf. v. 19). Others accept this meaning of the saying, but then deny that Jesus could ever have said it, claiming in part that the subsequent controversies in the early church on the food laws are unintelligible if Jesus had ever said anything as clear as this (Räsänen 1982). It seems hard to deny that in some ways Jesus did play free with the law and claimed the right to do so. As such, it may explain part of the opposition and hostility he clearly aroused in the Jewish establishment and also amongst the Pharisees. It may be therefore that Mark's understanding of the saying is not so far removed from Jesus as some have claimed.

But whatever the meaning of the saying on the lips of Jesus, Mark is in no doubt: his explanatory gloss in v. 19 says explicitly that Jesus' saying, backed up by an explanation in v. 18 (which is in fact little more than a restatement of the saying) has 'made all foods clean'. Certainly by now Mark has gone far beyond the claims of vv. 6–8 or 9–13, that the issue is simply one of human tradition over against a valid written law. The written law itself is now questioned.

The positive side of what is required of men and women is spelt out in vv. 21–2. This list of inner thoughts and actions is typical of many Hellenistic ethical instructions. The ethic propounded here would thus be at home in the wider Hellenistic world. But en route to this, parts of the Jewish legal system, especially the purity laws and the social and religious barriers they create, are radically called into question by Mark's Jesus by the end of this section.

(7:24–30) The Syro-Phoenician Woman It is surely no coincidence that Mark follows the controversy with the Pharisees, where Jesus has implicitly claimed to pull down the barriers separating Jews and Gentiles, by showing Jesus explicitly crossing those barriers himself. Jesus goes to the region of Tyre, i.e. to an area which was at least partly non-Jewish. There he meets a Syro-Phoenician woman who is explicitly said to be a Gentile (lit. 'Greek', v. 26). The woman begs Jesus to heal her daughter. The ensuing dialogue creates many difficulties. Jesus' first statement (v. 27) seems rude and offensive, apparently refusing to help and referring somewhat abusively to the woman and (by implication) other non-Jews as 'dogs'. It seems highly likely that in fact Jesus himself did restrict his ministry almost exclusively to Jews and saw himself as primarily involved in addressing, and restoring, Israel. A saying such as v. 27 is not impossible in general terms on the lips of Jesus. (How offensive the reference to 'dogs' is is not certain: it is possible that the dogs concerned are pets and not thought of as distasteful.) Or perhaps the saying is intended to try to evoke a response from the woman.

No doubt for Mark, the woman simply exhibits the necessary response of faith and trust in Jesus. Her initial address of Jesus is in Greek kyrie—which can be translated as simply a polite form (NRSV, 'Sir!'), or as 'Lord!', expressing a much higher Christology. Mark does not elsewhere make much of the idea (common in Hellenistic Christianity) of Jesus as 'Lord', but it may be alluded to here. Thus the woman makes an exemplary response. Again it is noteworthy that a woman responds in a way that the male disciples have failed to do (see Mk 1:31). Moreover, despite any apparent initial reluctance by Jesus to act, the woman's response does create the necessary preconditions for a miracle to occur: hence the girl is healed, and Mark's Jesus has put into practice what was implicit in his teaching about purity immediately prior to this story.

(7:31–7) The Deaf Man Cured There is uncertainty as to whether Mark thinks that the next story, the healing of the deaf mute, concerns a Gentile or not. The route taken by Jesus according to v. 31 (from Tyre through Sidon to the Sea of Galilee) is very circuitous: Sidon is well to the north of Tyre, which in turn is north of the Sea of Galilee. Perhaps Mark does not know very much about Galilean geography (cf. Mk 5:1). It is also not clear if Mark realizes that the region of the Decapolis, where the story is sited, is well away from the Sea of Galilee and also predominantly Gentile. Mark's story seems to suggest a return from Gentile territory. Certainly little in the story itself suggests a Gentile milieu.

The description of the man's condition, having 'an impediment in his speech' (v. 35), uses a very rare Greek word mogilalos. This occurs only once in the LXX, in Isa 35:6. The allusion then seems to be clear: Jesus' action in healing the man is the fulfilment of Jewish eschatological hopes as articulated in such passages as Isa 35. The word Jesus speaks to the man here is given by Mark in Aramaic, as in 5:41. But as in the other context, there is no idea that this word can act as a quasi-magical formula. There is an element of secrecy about the healing: Jesus takes the man aside privately (v. 33) and orders him to be quiet afterwards (v. 36). But this results in even more publicity (v. 37). Rather than trying to impose any real secrecy, the motif here probably simply serves as a means of highlighting the success and popularity enjoyed by Jesus as a result of the cure. (See Mk 1:44–5.) We should probably distinguish between a 'miracle secret' and the messianic secret proper, and see here only an example of the former.

Jesus here uses a technique which could be conceived of as magical (using spittle). Mark shows no embarrassment about this, but it may be the reason why Matthew and Luke both omit the story.

(8:1–10) The Feeding of the 4,000 The story is clearly a duplicate of the earlier story of the feeding of the 5,000. A few details disappear here, but the overall structures of the two accounts are so similar that one is forced to conclude that both reflect the same original tradition. Why then does Mark include both accounts?

Much has been made of the possible symbolism in the numbers involved in the two stories, whereby the story of the 5,000 may reflect the gospel going to the Jews, that of the 4,000 reflecting the gospel going to the Gentiles. Thus, 5,000 and twelve baskets may allude to the five books of the Pentateuch and the twelve tribes of Israel; 4,000 may reflect the four corners of the earth, and the seven baskets the seventy nations of the world. Possibly too the different Greek words for the 'baskets' used to collect the fragments in the two stories may be relevant: it is sometimes said that the word used in the story of the 5,000 implies a more Jewish kind of basket, that in the 4,000 a more common Hellenistic basket. However, the most one can say is that this is possible but by no means certain. The symbolism makes at times for a bizarre set of parallelisms. (Surely 'twelve' would be better as parallel to the number of people, and 'five' to what they are fed with, if the above symbolism were in mind.) Moreover it is not at all clear that Mark thinks that Jesus is among Gentiles (see Mk 7:31). There is nothing in the story itself to indicate that the crowd here is Gentile.

More directly, the story serves in Mark to underline the obtuseness of the disciples. The very fact that the two stories occur so close together in the gospel, and the accounts are so closely parallel, makes the disciples' initial reaction here all the more pointed. They have just witnessed Jesus feed 5,000 people miraculously; exactly the same situation recurs and yet the disciples again ask 'How can one feed these people with bread in the desert?' (v. 4). What they have just experienced should surely tell them how! The duplication in the story thus serves to highlight the growing incomprehension of the disciples. (See Fowler 1981.)

(8:11–13) Request for a Sign The story highlighting the obtuseness of the disciples is followed by a short incident showing the total blindness of the Pharisees. Immediately after Jesus has performed a clear sign of his credentials, the Pharisees come and ask for a sign from heaven! In the present Markan context, the very existence of the request shows the failure of the Pharisees to grasp anything at all about Jesus. Jesus' blanket refusal to give a sign inevitably follows.

Matthew and Luke (and hence probably Q) have a different version of the incident: here Jesus' refusal is qualified by the phrase 'except the sign of Jonah'. Mark may have omitted this (perhaps because it was unintelligible to his audience); but the Markan account is almost certainly pre-Markan: the words of Jesus' refusal are literally: 'if a sign shall be given', reflecting a Semitic oath formula 'May I be cursed if God gives a sign', a feature which Mark is very unlikely to have created himself. Hence Mark's version is not simply due to Mark's own redaction of the Q version. In any case it is likely that the Markan and Q versions mean similar things: both deny, more or less implicitly, that any sign will be given beyond Jesus' own present activity. Once again in Mark, the story shows that miracles cannot engender a positive response to Jesus if no such response is already present.

(8:14–21) Discussion about Bread The section brings to a climax the theme of the disciples' growing obtuseness. They are in a boat with Jesus and worried about lack of food. In general terms the story is clear: they obviously should have realized what Jesus can do by way of feeding large masses, and yet once again they show their lack of trust and faith (vv. 14–16). Some details are, however, not quite so clear. The significance of the 'one' loaf the disciples do have with them (v. 14) is disputed. Some have seen this as a eucharistic allusion to Jesus as the one bread, others more generally as a Christological allusion to the person of Jesus, others to the one bread sufficient for Jews and Gentiles. Mark, however, gives no direct hint. It may simply be another way of highlighting the disciples' obtuseness: they do have one loaf with them and so, since Jesus has fed 5,000 people with twelve loaves, feeding twelve people with one loaf should be relatively easy; the fact that they still worry brings out their total lack of faith.

The warning of Jesus against the 'leaven' of the Pharisees and of Herod (v. 15) seems at first sight out of place. It is not picked up in the ensuing dialogue which focuses only on the issue of lack of food. Again many possible interpretations have been suggested as to what the leaven symbolizes here. Luke takes it as hypocrisy (Lk 12:1), Matthew as teaching (Mt 16:14). Leaven in Jewish tradition symbolizes evil (1 Cor 5:6–8; Gal 5:9). The saying may not, however, be out of place in Mark.

The Pharisees and Herod have been shown to fail to recognize who Jesus is on the basis of what he has done (6:14–16; 8:11–12); moreover, supporters of Herod have joined with the Pharisees in plotting to kill Jesus (3:6). The ‘leaven’ of Herod and the Pharisees is thus probably the unbelief that refuses to recognize Jesus and hence rejects him.

Jesus’ reply to the disciples in vv. 17–21 highlights all the details (right down to the numbers of baskets and the Greek words used in the two accounts) of the feeding stories. The disciples have failed to understand; as a result they show themselves to have hardened hearts, eyes which do not see, and ears which do not hear. By implication, they are similar to the outsiders of 4:12 to whom Isa 6:9–10 is applied. (The language is very similar here, though the allusion is in fact closer to Jer 5:21.) Yet the situation of the disciples is not quite the same as that of the crowds. Jesus gives only a series of rhetorical questions, rather than any blanket statements of their rejection; and the warning of v. 15 remains as a warning: they are not yet in the position of Herod and the Pharisees. This ambivalent position of the disciples comes to the fore in the next two stories.

(8:22–6) The Blind Man at Bethsaida Jesus’ cure of the blind man here has some affinities with the story of 7:32–7 in that both involve use of a ‘magical’ technique (use of spittle). However, the closer parallel is probably with the story of the cure of Bartimaeus (10:46–52). The two stories of healing blindness form an inclusio round a long section of Jesus’ teaching devoted to the meaning of discipleship (8:31–10:45). Probably then Mark intends both stories to illuminate and illustrate Christian discipleship so that the coming to sight of the two men symbolizes the new life and salvation that is available to those who follow Jesus. It is widely agreed that the story here is integrally related in Mark’s narrative to the next story of Peter’s confession: the man receiving his sight serves as an acted parable for the disciples’ coming to insight about who Jesus is. One notable feature of the story is the fact that the man needs two stages in which to be healed. For the possible significance, see Mk 8:27–30. The text at the end of the story is uncertain: many MSS add an explicit command to secrecy, though even the shorter text (implied in the NRSV’s translation) suggests an element of secrecy. The explicit command in 8:30, and the close parallelism between the story of the blind man and Peter’s confession, suggests that a secrecy charge is intended by Mark at v. 26; however, it almost certainly gains all its meaning from 8:27–30, the story that it introduces and that provides for Mark its true significance.

(8:27–30) Peter’s Confession This section is often seen as a watershed in Mark’s narrative. Whether it is a watershed in the ministry of Jesus himself is quite another matter. The work of the form critics suggests that we can place little if any reliance on the chronological sequence of the stories in the gospels: rather, the arrangement of the individual stories is due to later editors. Hence we cannot know where, if anywhere, this story might be placed within the life of Jesus himself. In fact the historicity of the whole story must be somewhat questionable. There may be an underlying tradition: e.g. the reference to Caesarea Philippi, a town well to the north of Galilee, is unlikely to have been invented de novo.

However, the present story, focusing as it does explicitly on Jesus’ identity, with Jesus himself provoking the question of who he is, seems very strange in the life of Jesus: elsewhere Jesus points away from himself to God as the principal actor and focus of concern. The exclusive focus on the explicit Christological question looks more characteristic of Mark than of Jesus.

At the level of Mark, the proper interpretation of the story is much debated. Especially the significance of the secrecy charge in v. 30 is disputed. Does it indicate that, in Mark’s eyes, Peter’s confession is right, or wrong, or half right and half wrong? Some have argued that the secrecy charge, together with the following remonstrance by Jesus against Peter, indicates that, for Mark, Peter is quite wrong: Peter confesses Jesus as the Messiah on the basis of the stupendous miracles that have happened so far in the story—hence for Peter Jesus qua Messiah is the wonder worker; Mark’s Jesus then rejects such a view by putting forward his own view of himself as the suffering Son of Man (so Weeden 1971). Others, however, have pointed to the positive way Mark uses the term ‘Messiah’/Christ elsewhere, including the title to the gospel (1:1): hence Peter’s confession must be viewed by Mark positively.

There is strength in the latter argument. Mark nowhere else indicates any reserve about the term ‘Messiah’, and indeed uses it quite positively in 1:1. There is moreover little indication that Mark positively disapproves of Jesus’ miracle-working activity. Indeed verses such as 8:17–21 suggest precisely the opposite. Further, the structure of the present story would seem to support the view that Peter’s confession is certainly not regarded by Mark as wholly wrong: Peter’s confession is set in clear contrast to the views of other people, which the disciples report in v. 28 (and which in turn echo the views expressed in 6:14–15); by implication these views are wrong and Peter’s view is therefore not mistaken.

However, there may be a real sense in which Peter’s view is not regarded by Mark as expressing the deepest truth about Jesus. At the level of nomenclature, it may be significant that Mark does not have Peter use the term ‘Son of God’ here, and for Mark it is that term that expresses the most fundamental truth about Jesus (cf. 1:1; 1:11; 9:7; 15:39). Further, whatever words, or title, Peter uses to describe Jesus, the sequel does make it clear that Peter has not understood the most important thing about Jesus—that he must suffer and die. There is much therefore to be said for the view that, in Mark’s eyes, Peter gets things only half right here. Peter is thus perhaps in the intermediate state of the blind man of 8:22–6. He has come to some insight about Jesus, and it is a genuine and valuable insight. Unlike some with mistaken views, he recognizes Jesus as Messiah. But whatever Mark thinks of the title itself, words are not enough. Peter evidently does not yet appreciate the proper significance of who Jesus is and what his role in life (and death) is to be. Thus to reach the deepest insight about Jesus, Peter has to be led further: a need which is met by Jesus’ further teaching in vv. 31–8.

This then may also be the significance of the secrecy charge in v. 30. For Mark secrecy is imposed not because others without Peter’s faith are not to identify Jesus. Rather, in Mark’s story, people cannot come to the full realization of who Jesus is until the story is complete and Jesus’ full role as the one who dies on the cross has been finally disclosed (see mk 1:34). Quite irrespective of the correctness of any words or titles used, Peter has not yet come to the deepest insight and understanding, and indeed prior to the cross he cannot. Hence Jesus' identity cannot be divulged—yet. If it is, it will be misunderstood, and precisely such misunderstanding is immediately shown by Peter.

(8:31–3) The First Passion Prediction More details about Jesus' future role are now spelt out by Jesus in the prediction of the coming passion. This prediction is the first element in an extended section of the gospel (8:31–10:45) where Jesus predicts his passion and elaborates on the implications of that suffering not only for himself but also for any would-be followers. The passion itself is predicted three times in Mark's story in relatively quick succession (8:31; 9:31; 10:33–4), which gives added emphasis to the motif; and on each occasion, Jesus follows this up with further teaching on the relevance of this for discipleship. Correspondingly, in this part of the gospel, the stress on Jesus' miracles is reduced and more weight is now placed explicitly on the cross and its significance.

The passion predictions themselves probably owe a lot to later Christian creativity. It is unlikely that Jesus predicted his own trial and death with quite such accurate detail as is recorded here: if he did, the apparently total confusion of the disciples when the events occurred is harder to explain. Jesus may have foreseen in a more general way the opposition his ministry was provoking, and may have realized—and said—that this could lead to violence and even death. Nevertheless, the detail of the predictions, corresponding so precisely to the later passion narrative, is less likely to be genuine.

The passion predictions are all predicated of Jesus qua Son of Man. The stress on the necessity of the suffering of the Son of Man is thoroughly characteristic of Mark. The background of the use of 'Son of Man' in the gospels is much disputed, but if one accepts that it lies in Dan 7, with its twin foci of suffering and vindication, there is no need to see any artificiality in the use of the term here in Mark: Jesus quite appropriately talks of his coming destiny involving suffering and vindication (the predictions are all of suffering and resurrection) in terms of his role as Son of Man (see mk 2:10).

Peter's rebuke, and Jesus' stern counter in v. 33, are widely regarded as based on firm tradition. (It is unlikely that such a negative view of Peter would be invented by later Christians.) Nevertheless, the picture closely matches Mark's progressive story as well: Jesus' role involves suffering, and denial of that is effectively denial of God and of God's chosen way—hence it is demonic. Whoever opposes God is Satanic, whoever that person may be.

(8:34–9:1) The Cost of Discipleship Mark follows Peter's rebuke with teaching by Jesus about the implications of his suffering for any who would join his cause and 'follow' him. Mark is probably using a variety of sayings which come from various origins: certainly the parallels in Matthew and Luke appear in scattered contexts—almost certainly many of the sayings belonged to Q as well, and were preserved in different contexts. The present arrangement of the sayings is thus probably due to Mark himself. The kernel of the collection concerns the physical dangers which will face any would-be follower of Jesus. Just as Jesus' destiny is to suffer and to die, so any disciple of Jesus must be prepared to do the same. The fact that Mark has this teaching addressed to the 'crowd' (v. 34) as well as the disciples may suggest that Mark deliberately intends this message to be taken to apply to a wider audience than just the twelve as contemporaries of Jesus. The same may be implied by the reference to the 'gospel' in v. 35 (in a phrase omitted by Matthew and Luke, and probably due to Mark). The 'gospel' here is parallel to Jesus himself, so that suffering for the sake of the gospel and for the sake of Jesus are virtually synonymous. Mark has in mind the later Christian community preaching the gospel, warning them that they too must be prepared to suffer.

The saying about cross-bearing (v. 34) has been much discussed. It is very hard to locate this saying with such vocabulary in the ministry of the pre-Easter Jesus. Crucifixion was a punishment administered by the Roman authorities for political rebels. It is very unlikely that Jesus could have foreseen his own crucifixion, even if he might have realized that his conflicts with the Jewish authorities would lead to death. It is even more improbable that Jesus foresaw crucifixion as being a real possibility for his followers. It is more likely that the detailed imagery is the language of the post-Easter community, looking back on the manner of Jesus' death and claiming that would-be disciples must be prepared to follow in his footsteps. How literally the saying is meant is also not clear. The very finality of death suggests that some metaphorical element is present: if every disciple literally took up his or her cross and was crucified, the movement would die out immediately! Probably what is intended is a vivid and stark metaphor of the call to give up all security and claims to look after one's own interests, even, if necessary, to the point of death itself.

What these sayings tell us about the situation of Mark's own community is not clear. It is often assumed that sayings such as this imply that it was suffering violence and persecution, with martyrdoms taking place (possibly in Rome under Nero). On the other hand, there is little here that seems to address such a situation with any note of comfort or help. These sayings give little if anything by way of explanation or interpretation for any suffering. Rather, there is only the somewhat bleak and stark call to be prepared to suffer. It may therefore make more sense if Mark's community were in a situation of relative peace and security, and Mark feels that it needs to be roused out of possible complacency and warned of the dangers that can befall any who claim to be followers of the crucified one.

The saying in v. 38 is couched in wholly negative terms as a warning. (The Q parallel has both a positive and a negative element: cf. Lk 12:8–9.) The Son of Man here is a figure exercising a key role in eschatological judgement. This saying and its Q parallel have provided the strongest evidence for the theory that Jesus looked forward to the coming of a Son of Man figure other than himself. However, Mark clearly regarded the two as identical and saw no difficulty in taking Jesus' reference to the Son of Man in the third person here as a self-reference. The eschatological role of the Son of Man may be the other pole in the twin theme of suffering and vindication as in Dan 7: Jesus qua Son of Man is a suffering figure in

v. 31; here Jesus qua Son of Man is the one who will exercise judgement (cf. Dan 7:14).

The final saying in this section, in 9:1, is also much debated. It seems to suggest that the final consummation of all things, and the arrival of the eschatological kingdom of God in power, will come within the lifetime of the bystanders of Jesus. If that is what is meant, the promise has clearly failed to materialize. Precisely for that reason, many have seen here a genuine saying of Jesus, on the grounds that such an unfulfilled prophecy would not be invented by later Christians. Attempts to explain the saying away (e.g. by referring it to the cross, or even the transfiguration story immediately following) seem unconvincing. So too C. H. Dodd's famous attempt to interpret the saying as one of realized eschatology (people will realize that the kingdom has already come, i.e. in the ministry of Jesus) has also failed to convince others. As far as detailed time-scales are concerned, the saying has indeed been an unfulfilled prophecy. Yet Mark himself (and probably Jesus too) is not concerned with detailed time-scales (cf. 13:32). Quite as much as expressing a time limit, the saying also expresses the ultimate certainty of the establishment of God's kingly rule. It is that belief and that faith which is perhaps in the end more important than any detailed chronologies.

(9:2–8) The Transfiguration The possible historical origins of this story are probably irretrievably lost. Whether anything like this might have happened we simply do not and cannot know. Attempts have often been made to see this as a misplaced, or displaced, resurrection appearance story; however, the differences between this and the gospel resurrection appearances are considerable. Mark's understanding of the story is not much easier to determine. In one way it is clear that the account gives a proleptic anticipation of Jesus' future glory, and thereby serves to give the reader assurance of the claim made in 9:1. So too the heavenly voice's declaration of Jesus as God's Son serves to reinforce the true nature of Jesus' identity, the issue explicitly raised in 8:27–30. In one way, the heavenly voice confirms the truth of Peter's confession, since Messiah and Son of God can be, and are, used in parallel in Mark (1:1; 14:62); and indeed the words of the heavenly voice simply repeat (though in a third-person statement rather than in a second-person address) the words of the voice from heaven at Jesus' baptism (1:11). But perhaps the use of 'Son of God' here also serves to deepen the meaning of Peter's confession of Jesus as (just?) Messiah. For Mark, Jesus' sonship is seen supremely in his obedience which leads to death (cf. 15:39); thus the declaration of Jesus as Son of God here serves to reinforce the passion prediction of 8:31 which has just been given.

The precise significance of Moses and Elijah in the story is not certain, and it is noteworthy that Elijah here precedes Moses. (Matthew and Luke both revert to the more 'natural', or certainly chronological, order of Moses followed by Elijah.) Perhaps both appear here as witnesses to Jesus: Elijah as the anticipated forerunner of the Messiah, Moses as the representative of Scripture.

There may also be an element of mild polemic in the story, seeking to counter any claims that Jesus is on a par with Moses and Elijah. This may be the thrust of the implied rebuke of Peter's suggestion that he build three 'booths' for Jesus, Moses, and Elijah. In one way this is another feature of the general incomprehension of the disciples, but it may be implied more specifically that what Peter has failed to understand is that Jesus is so much greater than Moses or Elijah (perhaps reflected too in Peter's address of Jesus as just 'Rabbi' in v. 5: Jesus for Mark is far more than just a Jewish teacher). Elijah was also famous for not having died; and some Jewish tradition also claimed the same for Moses: in such a tradition, both figures were thus translated to heaven without experiencing death. Jesus' path to heavenly glory is, however, via a different route: he must suffer and die first, and the supreme title or term expressing this is his identity as Son of God. By treading this road, he is so much greater. But equally, any follower of his must tread the same road: hence the command of the heavenly voice to 'listen to him' (v. 7), especially to the teaching which he has just given in 8:34–9:1 on the meaning of discipleship.

(9:9–13) Coming Down from the Mountain These enigmatic verses contain a number of exegetical problems. The section is probably composite: vv. 9–10 deal with the theme of secrecy and resurrection, vv. 11–13 with Elijah. v. 9 is the clearest statement in the gospel that the secrecy surrounding the person of Jesus has a temporal limit, and provides the strongest support for the interpretation of the messianic secret adopted here: until the cross, Jesus' identity remains a secret, but after that all will be revealed, for then its true nature will be clear. (Mark probably conceives of the cross and resurrection as a single point in time for these purposes.) The disciples' response in v. 10 seems to imply that they do not understand what resurrection in general means. This seems incredible in historical terms: resurrection was a well-known idea in Judaism of the period. v. 10 is thus either a highly artificial note by Mark to bolster his motif of the disciples' lack of understanding, or it refers specifically to the resurrection of the Son of Man: resurrection was generally thought to be a corporate affair (of all, or of all the righteous): an individual resurrection prior to the End is not so easy to parallel in Jewish thought of the time.

vv. 11–13 focus on the person of Elijah. What seems to be reflected is the expectation that Elijah would reappear at the End (cf. Mal 4:5–6). In Malachi, Elijah appears before the Day of the Lord itself; Christian tradition appears to have taken this schema over and modified it so that Elijah appears as the forerunner of the Messiah, Jesus, though such a twofold expectation cannot be found in non-Christian Judaism of this period. In this Christian modification, Elijah is identified as John the Baptist. The full schema is clearly present in Matthew's parallel to this passage; it is probably present in Mark here as well, though the language is more cryptic. John the Baptist, for example, is not mentioned explicitly, though the allusion seems clear. Whatever the precise background, Mark uses the verses to focus again on the coming passion of Jesus. Elijah's role as a forerunner is made more specific by the claim that 'Elijah' has suffered. In terms of the implied identification of Elijah with John, this suffering has led to violent death: hence a similar fate awaits Jesus. (That such a fate was predicted of the returning Elijah in Scripture (cf. v. 13b) is otherwise unattested. In mind may simply be the suffering the first Elijah endured: cf. 1 Kings 19:2–3.)

(9:14–29) The Epileptic Child This very long story in Mark may represent the coming together of two stories, or of two versions of the same story: cf. the double description of the child's illness (vv. 17–18, 22), and the apparent assembling of the crowd in v. 25, even though the crowd is already assembled in v. 14. The first half of the present story focuses on the failure of the disciples, the second on the faith of the boy's father. Yet fundamental to both parts of the story is the importance of faith—faith not shown by the disciples (v. 19) and the stuttering faith of the father elicited by Jesus (v. 24).

The story has some features of a 'miracle story' in form-critical terms, though the cry of astonishment does not come at the end but at the start of the story (v. 15, in response to the crowd seeing Jesus, perhaps implying that some vestige of his transfigured form still remains). The stress is not so much on the power of Jesus the miracle worker as on the response of the disciples in the story and hence of any would-be disciple in the Christian community. The disciples have been unable to perform the miracle, and their failure leads to Jesus' cry about them and the crowd as a 'faithless generation'. Miracles in Mark can only take place in a context of faith (cf. 2:4; 5:43; 6:5).

The second half of the story focuses on the man's father. The plea to Jesus evokes an almost contemptuous response by Jesus (v. 23) about his ability. It is, however, not quite clear who 'the one who believes' in v. 23 is meant to be. It appears to be Jesus, and yet Jesus is never portrayed elsewhere in Mark as having 'faith', and the sequel focuses on the father's faith. Perhaps it is impossible to be precise and the ambiguity is intentional. 'Faith' in relation to miracles in Mark is not necessarily the faith of the recipient, nor necessarily the faith of the would-be healer alone. Rather, it is a description of the total human context in which a potential miracle might take place. The man's famous reply (v. 24) shows that faith is both a human response and a gift from outside. Cf. 4:11. Human response is essential, but in the end, for Mark, such response is itself a matter of divine grace.

The final two verses are sometimes thought to be an appendix, not closely related to the rest of the story in that they focus on prayer, rather than faith. However, the motif of Jesus explaining privately to his disciples in a 'house' the deeper significance of what has just happened is typically Markan (cf. 4:10; 7:17; 10:10). Moreover, the difference between prayer and faith as the principal focus can be overstressed: faith for Mark is the absolute trust and dependence on God which can be and is reflected precisely in the activity of prayer.

Mark's vocabulary in vv. 26–7, where the boy appears to be dead and Jesus 'raised him' and he 'arose', is similar to other language in the NT used of resurrection. The words can be used quite naturally here, but Christian readers probably saw deeper significance in them: Jesus' action foreshadows the new resurrection life that is available through Jesus to believers in the new age.

(9:30–2) The Second Passion Prediction This is the least detailed of the three passion predictions in Mark, and has the greatest claims to historicity: certainly the very general language has been least explicitly influenced by the details of the passion narrative. However, the key element of the fact that it is as Son of Man that Jesus will suffer and be vindicated remains constant through the three predictions. In v. 32 Mark once again emphasizes the disciples' failure to understand what is said.

(9:33–50) Further Teaching As after the first passion prediction in 8:31, Mark follows the second prediction with more teaching about discipleship, much of it somewhat disparate and linked by catchword connections. The first unit, in vv. 33–7, concerns the importance of humility and the meaning of true greatness. As in ch. 8, the teaching is provoked by a brief note indicating the disciples' failure to grasp the true significance of what it means to be a follower of the crucified one (vv. 33–4, cf. 8:33). This motif may well reflect Mark's own concerns in developing the negative portrait of the disciples, though the reference to Capernaum in v. 33, which scarcely fits the wider context in Mark of Jesus passing through Galilee to Judea (9:30; 10:1), may imply the presence of a tradition here. The kernel of the section is the saying on the first and the last and the supreme importance of becoming a servant of all (v. 35). The saying is a popular one and recurs elsewhere in the tradition (Mk 10:43–4; Mt 23:11; Lk 22:26). For Mark, its significance is further developed in 10:41–5. The word for 'servant' here is perhaps better translated as 'slave'. The saying thus advocates a total reversal of the values of contemporary society: all that is regarded as valuable and honoured in human society is here called into question, and the Christian must adopt the role of the lowest and most despised member of the social community.

This is then illustrated by the saying about the child (vv. 36–7). The saying here is a doublet of the similar saying in 10:15. The interpretation is disputed. Matthew clearly takes the child as an example to be imitated, in particular as an example of humility (cf. Mt 18:3). This suffers from some problems: children are not necessarily always humble; further, children in the ancient world were not necessarily as highly valued as they have become in contemporary Western society. Rather, children were considered to be of very low status and of little value. Hence it is more likely that v. 36 sets up the child as an example of the object of the disciples' action: in their role as servants, they are to be slaves of all, even to the most lowly and least esteemed members of society, i.e. children. In so doing they will be serving Jesus, and by implication, God Himself (v. 37). The last saying is developed elsewhere in relation to Christian missionaries (cf. Lk 10:16; Mt 10:40–2, and perhaps Mt 25:31–46), but the idea that in helping the poor, one is helping God is well rooted in Jewish tradition (cf. Prov 19:17).

The small pericope about the strange exorcist follows (vv. 38–40). The story may well reflect problems experienced in the later Christian church (cf. Acts 19:13–17). The reaction of Jesus portrayed here is surprisingly open, and diametrically opposed to its Q parallel (cf. Lk 11:23) in its attitude to the neutral and those not explicitly committed to the Christian cause: here anyone who is not an active opponent is regarded as 'one of us'; in the Q version, neutrality is condemned fiercely. The story condemns any factionalism or triumphalism within the body of those who would be followers of Jesus. Just as faith is ultimately a gift and not an achievement (cf. 9:24), so what in the end matters is not church allegiance but allegiance to Jesus: the exorcist still carries out his exorcisms in the name of Jesus. Mark thus has a much more open-ended ecclesiology than, say, Matthew does. For Mark, what is crucial is the issue of Christology, the person of Jesus. Everything else is subordinate to that.

The story is followed by a series of sayings, at times only loosely connected by means of catchwords. The first saying (v. 41) may have continued after v. 37 originally, though there is also a catchword link with vv. 38–40 via the use of the word 'name'. But the saying here does represent a shift from v. 37 in that the recipient of the action is no longer the child but the Christian disciple or missionary (as in the parallels to v. 37). The word 'Christ' here seems to be used as virtually a proper name, with all idea of its titular sense (cf. 1:1) forgotten. In its present form, therefore, the saying must reflect the vocabulary and thought of early Christians and not Jesus. For Mark, the saying perhaps continues the thought of vv. 38–40: any positive service, however small and insignificant, will be rewarded. Plaudits cannot be reserved for an in-group of privileged 'church' members.

The reverse side of the idea of reward is that of punishment and this is developed in the series of sayings in vv. 42–8, linked by the common use of the verb 'cause to stumble' (Greek skandalizo). The first saying (v. 42) picks up from v. 41 the motif of treatment given to Christian disciples: the 'child' from before has become a 'little one who believes', clearly a Christian disciple. (Some, but not all, MSS have 'believe in me' here: this would then be one of the very rare occasions in the synoptics, and the only instance in Mark, where Jesus is the object of faith. More typically for Mark, Jesus points away from himself to God as the important object of faith.) Here the threat of judgement is probably directed at other Christian disciples (rather than, as some have suggested, persecutors of the Christian movement): the saying is a warning to followers of Jesus, not comfort for disciples threatened by opponents. In vv. 43–8 the attention shifts from the danger of causing others to stumble to the dangers of causing oneself to stumble (i.e. to threaten one's Christian commitment). In a series of vivid metaphors (which are only metaphors!), Mark's Jesus stresses the extreme nature of the self-sacrifice to which the would-be disciple is called. The thought is in general similar to 8:34–7: the true 'life' of the Christian is far greater than the old life, or even physical life itself, and can call for the ultimate in self-sacrifice at the physical level. The alternative is to be 'thrown into Gehenna' (vv. 43, 45, 47), a valley near Jerusalem used as a rubbish dump which became a symbol for the place of the future destruction of the wicked. The unquenchable fire of v. 48 (several MSS repeat v. 48 in vv. 44, 46) is probably that which destroys: there is no idea of eternal torment and punishment.

The last two verses of the complex (vv. 49–50) are obscure and the connection of thought (beyond the catchwords 'fire' and 'salt') not clear. The image of v. 49 ('salted with fire') is notoriously uncertain. It is possible that both fire and salt are seen as images of purification. Elsewhere in the NT, fire is seen as a process which can be destructive but also purifying (cf. 1 Pet 1:7). The same may be implied here: the physical dangers to which the Christian disciple is exposed can also act as a purifying agent. The appended sayings about salt in v. 50 defy clear exegesis. The general thought may be that Christian disciples must continually show their true nature as followers of Jesus, otherwise they will be rejected. The final exhortation to live at peace with each other recalls the original occasion of the whole complex: disputes about relative superiority within the community are no part of the life of followers of Jesus who must live harmoniously ('at peace') with one another.

(10:1–12) Divorce The next section is somewhat loosely appended and might appear a little out of place in a wider context dealing with specifically Christian discipleship. Some have even suggested that 10:1–31 constitutes a small preformed household code on the themes of marriage, children, and possessions (cf. Col 3:18–4:1; Eph 5:21–6:9). However, this is not necessary: what is presented here is in some ways the ideal for the Christian disciple and the section is not out of place within the broader context of 8:34–10:45.

Jesus is asked about the legitimacy of divorce. The question is in many ways an artificial one coming from Pharisees, since Jewish law clearly assumed that divorce was legitimate, the only discussion being what were the proper grounds for divorce. (The divorce legislation in Deut 24:1–2 is very vague as to the grounds for divorce and deals more with the procedures of the divorce itself.) Yet if, as seems likely, Jesus did express himself very negatively about the whole principle of divorce (it is very deeply embedded in the tradition: see 1 Cor 7:10, as well as what is probably a Q tradition in Lk 16:18/Mt 5:32), some such question must have arisen in Jesus' own ministry. Jesus' reply goes behind the divorce legislation of Deut 24 to the principle of creation itself. He claims that divorce was only instituted as a concession to human failure and that the ideal is life-long, monogamous marriage. Although this could be interpreted as an attack on the law, it is not presented as such here. Nor is it necessarily an attack to demand greater strictness than the law technically presupposes. (Further, some of the Qumran texts adopt a position very similar to that of Jesus here, and no one could accuse the Qumran sectarians of playing loose with the law!) Nevertheless, an important part of the law is here relativized, and this shows the great authority implicitly claimed by Jesus. Yet it is important too to note what is proposed. Jesus' saying is not necessarily a legal ruling which brooks no exception (as it has frequently been taken). Rather, it sets up an ideal, and puts forward the divine purpose in marriage. It is an ideal for the Eschaton. (In Jewish thought the end-time was often conceived as representing a return to the primeval conditions of the creation period.) But in a fallen world, that ideal is frequently not met. To apply Jesus' sayings to this situation as a legal ruling forbidding divorce under all circumstances is probably the worst kind of legalism: in the teaching of Jesus, any ideals of the eschatological kingdom would always have to be tempered by the overriding concerns of compassion and love.

In an 'appendix', Mark's Jesus spells out to the disciples further implications of what he has said. In one way the teaching here is strange, since the issue no longer seems to be that of divorce as such, but of remarriage after divorce. Here any such remarriage is branded as adultery. (Further, the parallel formulation in v. 12, placing a woman's action in divorcing her husband alongside a man divorcing his wife, presupposes the conditions of Roman law: in Jewish law a woman had no such right to institute divorce proceedings.) We may have here a saying of the early church, seeking to interpret the Jesus tradition in relation to the concrete problems faced by Christians in the world. The NT generally does appear to ban remarriage after divorce (cf. Lk 16:18; Mt 5:32). Again, whether that should be taken as rigid and eternal legislation for a fallen world seems rather doubtful.

(10:13–16) The Children This small section is often taken as composite: vv. 14c + 15 seem to interrupt a story about the importance of receiving children with a saying requiring being like children. This pericope was also used later in the early church to justify the practice of infant baptism. Such an application in a later situation is quite natural, but is not hinted at explicitly by Mark, and would clearly be totally anachronistic at the level of Jesus. The saying in v. 15 forms a doublet with 9:37 and many have regarded the latter context as more appropriate. As noted there, the idea of a child as an example to imitate is not easy to interpret. Children in the ancient world were of the lowest status in society (see Mk 9:36–7). Perhaps though this is precisely what Mark (unlike Matthew) has in mind. The Kingdom is for those who are like children in the ancient world, i.e. the poor, the hungry, the dispossessed, those without rights and without any esteem amongst their contemporaries. Followers of Jesus can only receive the kingdom, i.e. accept God's rule as king, if they too become like this: they too must recognize their radical dependence on God for all that they have and all that they are, and they must give up all claims to rights over others in the world, a theme which will be developed further in vv. 35–45. Taken in this way, the saying in v. 15 is not so out of place within vv. 13–16: only if disciples become like children in this sense can they be 'received' by Jesus, i.e. become true followers of the crucified one. As such, the pericope is also firmly in place within the broader context of the general teaching on discipleship in 8:34–10:45.

(10:17–31) Riches and Possessions The section is again composite. The story of the rich young man (vv. 17–22) has been expanded by further sayings about wealth and/or the difficulty of entering the kingdom (vv. 23–7), followed by promises about the rewards due to disciples (vv. 28–31). However, the sayings are so closely related in one way (though significantly different in another) that it is hard to envisage totally independent traditions being used here: more probably, Mark has expanded the earlier tradition in his own way to develop the themes of particular concern to him.

The kernel of the section is the story of the rich young man. The evident embarrassment caused to later Christians (e.g. Matthew!) by the story in which Jesus appears implicitly to reject the notion that he himself is 'good' suggests that we have here a genuine tradition. (Matthew, for example, rewrites the story to have the man ask Jesus 'what good thing must I do?') The man asks about how to 'inherit eternal life', probably meaning the same as to enter the kingdom. (The vocabulary of 'eternal life', or life of the age to come, is rare in the synoptics, though it is greatly developed in the fourth gospel.) Jesus' first reply cites the second half of the Decalogue (but replacing 'Do not covet' with 'Do not defraud'), focusing on those commandments which concern human relationships. The young man's reply indicates that he realizes that obeying the letter of the law is not enough, but his further question ('What more must I do?') perhaps suggests that he is still thinking in terms of a measurable human achievement. Jesus' reply indicates that no such measuring is appropriate: the demand of discipleship is total and absolute.

In the case of the young man, the barrier to his total commitment is evidently his wealth. However, the further development in the teaching now extends the difficulty experienced by rich people in responding to Jesus' call to the difficulty experienced by all. Hence v. 24 says how hard it is for anyone to enter the kingdom. This is then illustrated by the hyperbolic (and perhaps partly humorous) image of the camel and the eye of the needle—though now reverting to the question of riches again. (The slight confusion—is it hard for the rich, or for all, to enter the kingdom?—is what has probably led to some scribes adding a phrase in v. 24 to make it apply only to those 'who trust in riches'.) Entry into new life is thus ultimately not a matter of any human achievement or merit at all. It is in one way impossible for anyone with their own resources to enter the kingdom. In the end, it is all a matter of divine grace (v. 27).

Yet the consequences of the commitment required of the disciple are not lost. Those who give up everything will be rewarded. And indeed Mark's Jesus here implies that there will be reward both in this life and in the age to come. The reference to the rewards in this life indicate that, even though Christians have given up family and possessions now, they will experience a new family and a new social community, i.e. in the church. Mark thus paints a rather different picture from the Q tradition where (at least some) Christians appear to give up all social ties and adopt a wandering life-style with no settled community existence (the so-called 'wandering charismatics': cf. the mission charge in Matthew and Luke). In Mark, Christians are assured of a place in a new social community. However, two features of this new existence are notable. The list in v. 30 of people/things which will be repaid to the disciple largely repeats the list in v. 29 of things surrendered; but (a) no 'father' reappears in v. 30, presumably because God is Father and cannot be duplicated; (b) v. 30 adds a reference to 'persecutions'. This may reflect the situation of Mark's community; alternatively, it may be a warning to them of things that may come. The final promise of 'eternal life' provides an inclusio with the start of this whole complex in v. 17 and the question of the young man about what he should do to obtain eternal life.

(10:32–4) The Third Passion Prediction This is the most detailed of all the predictions and seems to have been written in the light of the details of the passion narrative (a Jewish trial preceding a Roman trial, followed by a mockery involving spitting etc.). As before, the 'Son of Man' reference, and the inclusion of a prediction of 'resurrection', remain constant. v. 32 is a little obscure: how are the amazement and the fear related? And are there two groups of people intended here, or one? Jesus is 'on the way', 'going ahead' of his disciples. In one sense he is simply on a road, but in a deeper sense he is also on the 'way' that leads to Jerusalem which for Mark is the place of suffering and death. Jesus is thus on the way of the cross, and this perhaps is part of the reason why those who 'follow' in this way where Jesus 'goes ahead' are 'afraid'.

(10:35–45) True Service Once again the passion prediction is followed by a feature showing the failure of the disciples to understand the full implications of Jesus' teaching about his future suffering (cf. 8:32; 9:33). Here it is a more extended pericope, the story of the request of James and John for the chief seats in the coming kingdom. The two disciples ask for positions of glory. Jesus' reply is at first a question, asking if they can share his cup and baptism. The image is not explicit but probably refers to intense suffering and death. The 'cup' is used in the OT to refer to divine punishment (cf. Ps 75:8), though such ideas are probably too specific here, and the image may simply refer to great suffering (cf. 14:36). The verb 'baptize' can refer to being overwhelmed or flooded with catastrophes (cf. Ps 42:7; Isa 43:2 for a similar idea, if not the word). James and John's first reply is 'we can', perhaps an indication for Mark's readers of their (past?) martyrdoms. (James was killed very early: cf. Acts 12:2; John's fate is less certain and the traditions vary, some having him live to an old age, other having him martyred, though the latter are admittedly very late.) However, Jesus' reply to them puts their apparent acknowledgement into another light. They perhaps have accepted suffering as simply a temporary prelude to more assured glory. Jesus tells them that suffering will indeed await them, but future glory is not, and cannot, be assured: it is a matter of God's grace. There may indeed be an element of savage irony here too: James and John have asked to be at Jesus' 'right' and 'left'—for Mark's readers there is perhaps an echo of the two robbers, one on Jesus' right and one on his left, on their crosses. That in some sense is Jesus' glory. (Cf. the fourth gospel where this is more explicit.) Perhaps then they really 'do not know what [they] are asking' when they make their request!

As before, the motif of the disciples' failure to understand leads on to further teaching by Jesus. Here it is on the significance of service. True greatness lies not in having a position of authority over others, but in being the slave of all, a theme that has dominated all Jesus' teaching about discipleship in this section of the gospel. And as a final clinching argument, Jesus adduces himself as an example in his role as Son of Man: the Son of Man himself came not to be served but to serve. By implication, any follower of the Son of Man can do no less.

The final half-verse (10:45b) comprises the famous ransom saying and has given rise to intense debate. It is one of the very few verses in the synoptics where Jesus gives any kind of interpretation of his death. Its authenticity is much disputed, as is the precise meaning of virtually every word in the saying. The saying is almost certainly pre-Markan: it assumes that Jesus' death is unique, and yet Mark uses it in a context where Jesus sets himself up as an example to be imitated by others. The background is often taken to be Isa 53, with Jesus here setting himself up as the suffering servant of this Servant Song, offering his life as a sin offering for others. This is, however, unconvincing. The linguistic parallels between this verse and Isa 53 are virtually non-existent. Jesus is not here called 'servant'; nor is the language of 'ransom' the same semantically as that of 'sin offering'. The present verse does not even mention 'sin' as such. The word 'ransom' (Gk. lutron) is in fact used very widely, sometimes in relation to prices being paid, e.g. as the price paid to compensate for a crime, as the money equivalent to the sacrifice of the first-born child, as the money paid to buy back prisoners of war. Hence the idea in later Christian theology of Jesus' death as some kind of price that is paid (e.g. for sin). But the word is also used without any idea of a specific price paid: thus God's deliverance of his people in the Exodus is frequently referred to as his 'ransoming' or 'redeeming' the people of God, with no idea of any price being paid. This may be the underlying idea here: Jesus' death is presented as in some way the rescue, or redemption, of the new people of God. Why this needs a death is not spelt out. Strictly speaking, the preposition translated in the NRSV as 'for' (Greek anti) means 'instead of': hence ideas of substitutionary atonement which have been read into, or out of, this verse. But this is by no means necessary. The word may simply mean 'on behalf of', 'for the benefit of' (like the Greek preposition hyper, which is the most commonly used NT word in this context). Jesus' saying here thus evokes the idea of a new people of God to be created and formed as a result of his life and death. Further, it is by virtue of his role as Son of Man, as the one who must suffer but who will then be vindicated, that this will be achieved. The saying coheres well with a number of other elements which are firmly embedded in the tradition (e.g. Jesus' choice of exactly twelve disciples, perhaps symbolizing the new Israel), and hence may well be genuine.

(10:46–5) Blind Bartimaeus Mark finishes this long section of teaching about discipleship as it started, with a story about the healing of a blind person. As with 8:22–6, this story here almost certainly represents an acted parable: the granting of physical sight to Bartimaeus symbolizes the true 'insight' which is necessary for any disciple of Jesus. Thus the consequence of the miracle is presented in language that is almost certainly deliberately evocative: the miracle is due to Bartimaeus' 'faith' which is said to have 'saved' him, i.e. not only healed him physically but also brought a much deeper and more profound 'salvation'; and Bartimaeus then 'follows' Jesus 'on the way': this is the language of discipleship, and Mark's wording is almost certainly meant to suggest that Bartimaeus becomes a full disciple, 'following' Jesus on the way which Jesus treads, i.e. the way of the cross. It may also be significant that, before he is healed, Bartimaeus calls out to Jesus as 'Son of David' (v. 47). This is a rare term in Mark (used elsewhere only in 12:35–7, and there somewhat negatively), and may be intended to be synonymous with Messiah. The latter is the term Peter uses in 8:29, and Mark may by his story indicate that this is partly correct, but does not express the fullest truth about Jesus. (See Mk 8:29.) Similarly here, Bartimaeus when blind addresses Jesus as Son of David. As such he is partly correct, and certainly shows a sufficient degree of faith to enable Jesus' miracle to take place. But the fuller sight—and the deeper insight into who Jesus really is—follows as a divine gift. Only then does Bartimaeus become a full disciple, 'following' Jesus 'on the way'.

Ministry in Jerusalem

The Passion narrative in Mark is usually adjudged to start at ch. 14, but there is a real sense in which it can be said to start here at the start of ch. 11. Jesus now arrives in the city of Jerusalem, the goal of his journey 'on the way', and for Mark, Jerusalem is supremely the place of opposition and hostility, culminating in Jesus' death. The cross thus now dominates the story. In Mark's account, Jesus' time in Jerusalem occupies apparently one hectic week only (giving rise to the Christian liturgical celebration of Holy Week). In fact it seems very likely that Mark has telescoped things: Jesus seems to be well known in the city (cf. 14:3) and says that he has been teaching continuously in the Temple ('day after day' 14:49). John's gospel implies a much longer stay in the city and this seems historically much more plausible. The same may also be implied in some details of the story that now follows.

(11:1–11) The Triumphal Entry Jesus enters the city in a deliberately unusual way—on a donkey. The later evangelists clearly regard the event as an explicit messianic claim by Jesus, fulfilling the prophecy of Zech 9:9. Mark's understanding of the event is not quite so certain. Any reference to Zech 9 is at best implicit, as the verse is not cited here. Mark probably regarded the crowds' acclamation of Jesus as implying an acclamation of him as Messiah, but again it is not quite explicit: they welcome the 'one who comes in the name of the Lord', and also the coming kingdom of David, which is almost, but not quite, the same as the coming king. (Matthew and Luke make things more explicit here.) Mark probably does understand Jesus' action as implying a royal status, but as with the messianic secret generally, the true nature of Jesus' kingship has yet to be revealed: it will become far more explicit as the cross approaches (see esp. ch. 15).

The earlier details of the story are also ambiguous. The incident about finding the ass may imply a miracle, though this is again rather cryptic here. The words of the disciples (NRSV 'the Lord needs it') are also ambiguous. The Greek word for NRSV's 'Lord' is kyrios, which can be translated as simply 'master' or 'owner'. Nowhere else does Mark clearly refer to Jesus as 'Lord' in a Christologically significant way (though see Mk 7:28), so the word here may simply mean 'our master', or 'its [the ass's] owner'.

As far as historicity is concerned, the story is clearly deeply embedded in the tradition, being present in all four gospels. Some kind of (veiled) messianic claim seems to be implied: coming into the city on an ass (rather than walking) was highly unusual, and riding on an ass was a royal prerogative. On the other hand, it is odd that the incident is never referred to in the trial narratives, where the issue is explicitly that of the possible messianic/royal status of Jesus. Further, the incident seems to have provoked no reaction at all from the Roman authorities, despite the charged atmosphere of the Passover season. It has, however, often been noted that the actions of the crowds (waving palm branches, and using words from one of the so-called Hallel psalms, Ps 118) is reminiscent of actions prescribed for the Feast of either Tabernacles (in the autumn) or Dedication (in the winter). It may therefore be that, if the incident is historical, it took place rather earlier than Mark's chronology implies. Hence Jesus may have arrived in Jerusalem much earlier than the one week prior to his death as suggested by Mark (cf. also above) and by later Christian tradition.

The crowds cry 'Hosanna', literally 'Save now!' Such a meaning appears to have been lost to Mark (and to later Christian liturgy) where the phrase 'Hosanna in the Highest', virtually meaningless if translated literally, becomes simply a general cry of jubilation.

(11:12–26) The Temple and the Fig-Tree The two incidents which now follow, the cleansing of the temple and the cursing of the fig-tree, constitute the most famous example of Mark's 'sandwiching' technique: the story of the incident in the temple is sandwiched between the two halves of the story of the fig-tree. By this device, Mark clearly wants the one story to interpret the other. Hence the fig tree incident provides the hermeneutical key for the temple account, at least as far as Mark is concerned. Thus for Mark, Jesus' action in the temple is probably not a cleansing (as it is traditionally described), but a 'cursing', a final and definitive act of judgement against the temple and, perhaps, Israel.

The fig-tree incident has always caused problems in relation to questions of historicity. Jesus' action here seems highly arbitrary, and a pointless act of gratuitous destruction. It is even compounded by the fact that the tree has no figs and yet it is not even the season for figs (v. 13)! Given all these problems, it is very hard to trace any such incident back to Jesus' own ministry. Probably we have here a symbolic narrative, acting as some kind of acted parable, the historical roots of which are lost completely. What lies behind it may be passages in the OT which speak of God looking for figs from his fig-tree, a metaphor used to refer to Israel and her proper response to God (cf. Jer 8:13); also the image of the fig-tree in fruit is used to represent Israel in the messianic age. The fruitless tree thus represents Israel who should have welcomed her Messiah, Jesus; yet when Jesus comes to the heart of Israel, Jerusalem and the temple, he is rejected, and the tree has no fruit: the result is inevitably judgement.

The temple incident is thus, for Mark, to be taken in the same way as a symbolic judgement on the temple and on Israel. The national dimension is then clearly highlighted in the version of the words placed on Jesus' lips: quoting Isa 56:7 he says that the temple should have been a house of prayer for all the nations. (Matthew and Luke both omit the last phrase.) Set in these terms, the action of Jesus places him on a collision course with Israel herself, and so it is not surprising that the outcome is the renewal of the plot to kill Jesus by the chief priests and scribes (v. 18, cf. 3:6).

Exactly what lay behind this for Jesus is less certain. Some have argued that he had in mind only the renewal of the temple in the new age: his action is thus simply a prophetic sign claiming that the new age had all but arrived (Sanders 1985). This, however, does not really explain why such an action would have been offensive to the authorities (if indeed it was) and why then it led to the plot to have Jesus killed. Others have sought to argue that Jesus was attacking the exploitation and oppression of the poor which the temple system engendered. The issue is debated, but there does seem to be some evidence to suggest that the temple authorities, and the whole system, did lead in many cases to the poor being exploited, poor priests being robbed by richer ones, etc. Hence Jesus' protest may have been against the priestly aristocracy, rather than against the whole Jewish nation. In that case, the move by the authorities against Jesus might become rather more plausible: Jesus and his teaching, especially if it was engendering popular support among the masses, may have been seen as a threat by the upper social classes to the status quo which enabled them to enjoy their position.

The fig tree 'incident' provides the occasion for further teaching on the importance, and power, of faith and prayer. The saying about moving mountains (v. 23) is proverbial and appears elsewhere in the tradition, as does the saying about the unlimited power of prayer (v. 24, cf. Lk 11:9–10; Jn 14:13). Yet such prayer can only be effective in a context of faith, which perhaps rules out such petitionary prayer being a licence for anything. The saying in v. 25 on forgiveness is very close to Mt 6:14 (as well as the petition for forgiveness in the Lord's Prayer), and this may have led some scribes to add v. 26 in some MSS, which is virtually identical to Mt 6:15.

(11:27–33) Jesus' Authority Mark follows the incident in the temple with a series of controversy stories, similar to 2:1–3:6, showing Jesus debating with the various groups of Judaism, though unlike the earlier series, the issue now is mostly Jesus' teaching rather than his actions. The first story brings all the Jewish leaders on to the stage, asking about the source of his authority in doing 'these things' (v. 28; in Mark's context this probably refers to the temple incident, though it may have had a much wider reference earlier in the tradition, referring to Jesus' teaching and other activity in general). Jesus replies with a counter-question (a feature typical of many debates among Jewish teachers), throwing the issue back and asking his questioners what they thought about John the Baptist. This is somewhat surprising: in Mark's narrative John scarcely figures as a person in his own right with his own 'ministry' amongst the Jews of the time: rather, he simply comes on to the stage to point forward to Jesus (see Mk 1:3–8). Similarly his fate prefigures Jesus' coming fate (see Mk 9:11–13). Perhaps we have here a reflection of Jesus' own strong belief that his work was very closely tied to that of John (as probably his decision to be baptized by John also indicates). The Jews' musings indicate John's great popularity among the masses (cf. Mk 1:5). Jesus' final statement is thoroughly in line with the whole of Mark's presentation so far. Just as there are no authenticating signs (cf. 8:11–12), so too there are no verifiable claims or assertions to back Jesus up. Within a context of faith, Jesus' claims can be accepted; without such a context, such claims would be fruitless—hence Jesus' refusal to speak.

(12:1–12) The Wicked Husbandmen The sense of hostile debate continues, though here Jesus takes the initiative by telling a parable, the parable of the wicked husbandmen. Clearly it illustrates the rejection by Israel of God and his messengers down the ages. As it now stands in Mark, the parable is a clear allegory. The language of the opening description of the vineyard clearly echoes the language of Isa 5:1–2 which itself is an allegory of Israel and her dealings with YHWH. The first messengers represent the prophets sent by God, all of whom suffer rejection and violence. Finally the last messenger is the Son, clearly for Mark Jesus as the Son of God, and the killing of the Son prefigures Jesus' own death. The parable thus expresses divine judgement against Israel for her rejection of God's Son. The story seems so heavily allegorized—and Christianized—that many have regarded it as a creation of the early church in toto. However, the story does fit well into the social situation of Galilee at the time of Jesus, when many tenant farmers suffered at the hands of absentee landlords who demanded crippling returns from the land by way of rent. The resentment and anger of the tenants in the story reflects this situation well. It is thus possible that the parable goes back to Jesus. Whether the implied identification of Jesus as the 'son' is also genuine is less easy to gauge. The idea of God as Father is deeply embedded in the Jesus tradition; but how Christologically significant this is at the level of Jesus is harder to assess: so much of the Jesus tradition assumes that others also share, or can share, Jesus' relation to God as son to Father (cf. the Lord's Prayer, Lk 11:2). For Mark, however, Jesus qua Son is unique, and Jesus' sonship is seen most clearly in his suffering and death (cf. 15:39).

An appended saying in vv. 10–11 cites Ps 117:22–3 LXX. The text is cited elsewhere in the NT (cf. Acts 4:11; 1 Pet 2:7), and the image of the stone applied to Jesus (using Isa 8:14; 28:16) is also attested (Rom 9:32; 1 Pet 2:6–8). The presence of the saying here is almost certainly due to the early church, if not Mark himself, adding a note predicting the resurrection as well as Jesus' death: the rejected stone becomes the chief cornerstone (it is not clear if this is the main stone in the foundations or the stone at the apex of the arch).

The reaction of the audience is intelligible, but also noteworthy here: whatever 4:11–12 implies, it cannot mean that parables for outsiders are totally unintelligible gibberish! The audience here 'understand' at one level all too well what, or perhaps better who, the parable is getting at. 4:11–12 must then mean that such people do not in a deeper sense 'see' or 'hear', i.e. they do not respond in faith to the challenge posed by Jesus. Instead they persist in their hardness of heart by further resolving to try and arrest him.

(12:13–17) A Question about Tax The story of mounting hostility continues with a series of incidents where Jesus deals with questions on specific topics posed by various different groups. The first concerns the payment of tax to the Roman authorities and is posed by an alliance of 'Pharisees and Herodians', a grouping recalling the earlier death plot in 3:6 and perhaps thereby indicating for Mark the (literally) mortal nature of the controversy and conflict that is taking place (cf. too 11:18). The question of the legitimacy of paying taxes to the Roman authorities was a very pressing one. The tax concerned was a poll tax imposed on all those in Judea, Samaria, and Idumea in 6 CE when these areas became a Roman province ruled by a procurator. It was deeply resented by the Jews, symbolizing as it did foreign interference in Jewish affairs. It led to active revolt in 6 CE under Judas the Galilean (cf. Acts 5:37), an event which, according to Josephus, led to the rise of the Zealot party in Judaism which was responsible for the Jewish revolt in 66–70 CE. (In fact it is unlikely that such a party existed in any organized form prior to the Jewish revolt; however, it is likely that the simmering resentment which led ultimately to the revolt remained throughout this period.)

The question is, according to Mark, clearly intended to trap Jesus. If he opposes paying the tax, the Roman authorities will arrest him; if he accepts it, he will lose popular support. The precise meaning of Jesus' answer has been much debated. As it stands, it is ambiguous. It enjoins paying Caesar what is Caesar's, and God what is God's, but does not clarify what is Caesar's and what is God's. Certainly it does not specify whose the Roman poll tax is! The saying has sometimes been interpreted as implying a doctrine of two kingdoms—a secular and a religious realm, each with its own sphere of influence. This, however, seems unlikely, especially in a first-century Jewish context. More plausible is the interpretation that takes the second half of the saying as interpreting and radically qualifying the first half: Caesar is to be paid what is his, but this is only under the more universal presupposition and rubric that God as the all-mighty and all-powerful is owed supreme allegiance. If the claims of Caesar and God clash, then the claims of God must always have precedence. The saying thus does not give carte blanche to any claims of the state; but nor does it deny all claims of the state. Rather, it challenges the listener to work out how competing claims of state and God have to be resolved in practice under the general rubric implicit in a monotheistic faith that God in the end must be supreme.

(12:18–27) Resurrection The second question comes from Sadducees and concerns the issue of resurrection. The precise delineation of a 'party' of Sadducees in the first century is not entirely clear. They seem to have been primarily members of the aristocratic, priestly families, and generally conservative in their views. Thus they adhered to the written law only, refusing to countenance innovation in later traditions (as espoused by the Pharisees); in particular, according to Josephus, they did not believe in a resurrection, perhaps because it was not mentioned in the law itself. (Belief in a resurrection developed relatively late in Jewish history, appearing in the latest parts of the OT: cf. Dan 12:2.) Jesus' reply in Mark clearly sides with the Pharisaic viewpoint. (Cf. Mk 2:16, 18; 7:3–4.)

How far the story is historical is not clear. This is the only occasion in the synoptic tradition where Jesus debates with Sadducees. It would no doubt have been useful for later Christian claims about the resurrection of Jesus to be able to appeal to Jesus' own support for at least the principle of resurrection in general. The story in its present form shows some signs of internal dislocation: Jesus' first reply (v. 25) seems to focus on the manner of resurrection life, whereas the second reply (vv. 26–7, slightly awkwardly appended with an extra introduction in v. 26) focuses on the fact of the resurrection. At the very least, an earlier tradition has probably been expanded in the Christian tradition history. Since the real question is the fact of the resurrection, it may be that the reply about the manner of resurrection life in v. 25 is a secondary expansion.

The question posed by the Sadducees is in some ways an absurd one. The issue is the institution of levirate marriage (cf. Deut 25:5–10) which was designed to ensure that a man's name would be preserved and his property inherited. It is uncertain whether such a practice was still current at this period. Jesus' first reply simply states that resurrection life is qualitatively different from present life, 'like angels in heaven'. (For such a difference between present life and resurrection life, cf. 1 Cor 15:35–50; also 1 Enoch 104:4; 2 Apoc. Bar. 51:10.) The answer seems to be more at home in debates (possibly among Pharisees and/or Christians) about the precise nature of resurrection life, and does not seem to recognize the (deliberately) absurd nature of the situation posed by the question.

Jesus' second reply tackles more directly the real question of the Sadducees about the very possibility of resurrection itself. The argument appeals to the words of the OT (Ex 3:6) and claims that since God says he is the God of the patriarchs, and that he is the God of the living not the dead, the patriarchs must still be alive. The claim is somewhat artificial to modern ears, but would have been far less so in a first-century context. So too the argument itself is unrelated to the specific issue of resurrection as such (it could equally well justify a belief in the immortality of the soul: though for many Jews, full existence was assumed to require a body as well as any immaterial 'soul'). Nevertheless the force of the argument is not lost completely and is not unrelated to the previous pericope, focusing as it does on God alone: if God is truly God, then as the God of the living he will not allow his care and concern for human beings to be destroyed by death.

(12:28–34) The Greatest Commandments The third question posed to Jesus is unlike the previous two in that the questioner appears not to be hostile. The person is a 'scribe', and unlike the scribes elsewhere in Mark, he is presented as friendly. This unusual picture indicates that we have a pre-Markan tradition here, a fact also suggested by the existence of what is probably an independent version of this tradition in Lk 10:25–8. (Matthew may know both versions; there are a number of [relatively small] agreements between Matthew and Luke, hence the Lukan version may have belonged to Q.) Notably, in the other two gospels, the scribe is more hostile ('testing' Jesus: cf. Mt 22:35; Lk 10:25).

The question concerns the 'greatest' commandment in the law. Such a question was not foreign to Judaism of the period and several sought to give one command which formed the basis for the whole law and from which the rest of the law could be derived. (Cf. Hillel in b. Šabb. 31a focusing on the Golden Rule of not doing to others what you would not want done to you, or T. Iss. 5:2; T. Dan. 5:3, as here, focusing on the love commands.)

In the synoptic gospels, Jesus' reply articulates the double love command—to love God and to love one's neighbour. These are not peculiar to Jesus: both are taken from the OT law itself (Deut 6:5; Lev 19:18). However, each evangelist deals with the tradition in his own way. In Mark (unlike Matthew and Luke) the love commands are preceded by the words of the Shema (Deut 6:4), the great monotheistic confession of God's uniqueness; also Mark follows Jesus' words by a response from the scribe which echoes, but also interprets, them by focusing on specific aspects of what Jesus has said. It looks then as if Mark's version intends the scribe's response to provide the hermeneutical key for the love commands. Here the words of the Shema are repeated (v. 32): clearly these words are not just seen as an introduction to the command to love God; rather, they evidently articulate for Mark a profound truth about the uniqueness of God, and this may reflect the way in which the tradition was being used in a more Hellenistic environment where polytheism was more of a live issue than in Jewish Israel. The scribe also takes up the love commands themselves, summarizing Jesus' words, but then adding that 'this is much more important than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices' (v. 33). The love commands are thus taken as ethical commands which far outweigh any cultic rites. Such an attitude is quite characteristic of Hellenistic Judaism of the period.

(Mark's version is thus rather different from Matthew's, where the love command is taken as the basis from which the whole of the rest of the law can be derived, cf. Mt 22:40; it also differs from Luke's version, where all attention is on the command to love one's neighbour which is interpreted by the following parable of the Good Samaritan as referring to practical action to help all people, cf. Lk 10:29–37.)

Such an attitude to the cult is of course not foreign to the OT (cf. Hos 6:6) and is at home in Judaism; yet the way in which this story in Mark follows closely on the story of the incident in the temple (11:15–19) suggests that the negative attitude to the cult expressed here is part of a broader polemic and negative attitude to the temple.

The authenticity of the tradition is debated. Some have argued that the Jewish parallels to Jesus' sayings here suggest that the tradition originated in Hellenistic Jewish Christian circles. However, the fact that Jesus' teaching here is not unprecedented within Judaism by no means implies that it is thereby not genuine. Certainly the general attitude of enjoining exclusive focus on God alone, coupled with care and concern for one's fellow human beings is thoroughly consistent with the rest of the Jesus tradition. Nevertheless, the radically different ways in which the double love command is interpreted in the three synoptic gospels should warn us against deducing too much too quickly about what this might imply about Jesus' attitude to the rest of the Jewish law.

(12:35–7) The Messiah and David In the fourth of the mini-controversy scenes, Jesus himself takes the initiative and poses the question about whether the Messiah can be, or must be, a 'son of David'. The dialogue appears somewhat cryptic: on the surface it is a theoretical discussion about 'the Messiah' without ever identifying who the Messiah might be—though no doubt Mark sees it as referring to Jesus! Such theoretical questioning about Jesus' own person seems alien to his ministry and more in place at the level of Mark for whom the issue of Jesus' identity is crucial (cf. 8:29). Also the messianic use of Ps 110 was widespread in early Christianity, but the existence of such use of Ps 110 in pre-Christian Judaism is difficult to establish. Thus the argument almost certainly reflects a post-Easter composition.

Precisely what is implied here is not clear. Jesus raises the question whether the Messiah can be the son of David, and responds by citing Ps 110:1 where David (the assumed author) seems to refer to someone else as his 'lord'. This someone else is taken as 'the Messiah', and the (rhetorical?) question is raised: if he is David's 'lord', how can he be David's son? It seems that 'son' and 'lord' are taken as incompatible. This might then reflect Christian attempts to defend the messiahship of Jesus in the face of objections that Jesus was not of Davidic descent. On the other hand, the notion that Jesus was a 'son of David' is attested elsewhere (albeit not strongly, cf. Mt 1; Lk 3:23–8; Rom 1:3–4) and is nowhere a matter of dispute. So too Mark records Jesus being addressed as 'Son of David' without any hint of critique (10:47). It may therefore be that physical descent as such is not the issue: what is at stake is not Jesus' genealogical credentials, but his authority: Jesus qua Messiah is not subservient to David, but is David's lord. If so, the scene fits well into the present Markan story-line where the context is one of Jesus' authority being constantly challenged in a situation of mounting hostility and rejection.

(12:38–44) Warnings against Scribes Mark concludes this series of controversies with a brief tirade by Jesus against the scribes (vv. 38–40). Mark either does not know, or chooses to ignore, the longer series of woes against scribes and Pharisees which appears in Mt 23 and Lk 11 (and which hence probably derives from Q). Here there is just a single woe, though covering at least two aspects: the scribes are accused of parading their status to curry human favour by wearing special clothes and claiming special seats in public places (vv. 38–9); they are also accused of exploiting widows financially (v. 40). The first accusation is the language of polemic and no doubt reflects as much the bitter divisions between Christians and Jewish leaders in the early Christian church. The charge of financial impropriety is hard to assess. The care of widows (and orphans) in Jewish society was of paramount concern, so the charge here is a serious one. How far it was ever justified, or indeed why scribes as such should be singled out for mention, is not at all clear. (It has been suggested that perhaps some scribes acted as guardians or trustees of estates and took more than their fair share of profits.)

Mark, however, vividly contrasts the behaviour of the scribes with that of a widow who gives a gift for the temple (vv. 41–4). As noted already, women in Mark often function as role models, in contrast to men, for how true disciples should behave (cf. 1:29–31). Here the woman's gift is minute in monetary terms (it has been estimated to be about one sixty-fourth of a denarius, a day's wage for a poorly paid labourer); but it is all she has and hence its value in God's eyes is far greater than the value of anything put in by other, well-off people. Perhaps we are to see here both a negative and a positive example of the love command in practice: the scribes' behaviour indicates that their 'service' to God is sham, and they seek only to profit themselves: they love neither God nor their neighbours. The widow gives her little which is her all: she is the one who is seen truly to love God.

We should perhaps also note another possible interpretation of this story, i.e. that it is an implied critique of the social situation (and of the socially powerful who exploit the situation) which compels a poor widow to give all that she has and impoverish herself. However, the final saying of Jesus implies no such critique by referring to the compulsion the widow is under: rather it seems to refer to her act as a free act of generosity which as such is commended.

The Apocalyptic Discourse

In ch. 13 Mark records an extended block of teaching by Jesus, the so-called Markan Apocalypse, where Jesus looks to the future and predicts what is in store for his followers. Such predictions are a standard feature of much so-called 'apocalyptic' writing. For the authors of such texts, the predictions are placed on the lips of a figure in the past so that what is ostensibly a prediction of what is to come in the future is in fact for the reader often partly a reference to what has already happened. The same is probably the case here: Mark's Jesus looks forward; but for Mark and his readers, part at least of what is predicted has already happened. This serves to confirm the conviction that what is still future for Mark and his readers will indeed happen. Part of the problem of the chapter is to know exactly where the speech switches from Mark's past or present to his future.

Another stock problem of the interpretation of the chapter is to know what general message Mark is trying to convey. Jesus' predictions take the form not just of exhortations to be vigilant because the End may come at any time (cf. vv. 33–7), but also warnings not to get too excited and think that the End is imminent when certain events take place (this is the thrust of at least vv. 5–8, 9–13, 21–3). This then creates considerable tension in interpreting the discourse as a whole. Is Mark's Jesus trying to encourage eschatological awareness and enthusiasm, or is he trying to dampen it down? The line taken in this commentary will be that the latter is the dominant motif (it certainly occupies more space). But maybe precisely by dampening down some sorts of enthusiasm, in particular by pointing away from the likelihood of any preliminary signs to the coming of the End, and by pointing to the suddenness of the End when it comes, the exhortation to constant readiness and vigilance (vv. 33–7) can be asserted.

(13:1–4) The Occasion of the Discourse The discourse is set in the context of the temple and, at least in part, is presented as an answer to the question about the timing of the destruction of the temple. The disciples' comment about the magnificence of the temple building (v. 1) is entirely apposite: the temple was a colossal building, with enormous stones, and represented a triumph in engineering and construction. Jesus here predicts that the temple will be destroyed, an event which of course happened in 70 CE. Such a prediction is deeply embedded in the tradition (cf. 14:57–8; 15:29; Jn 2:19; cf. Acts 6:14), and is almost certainly historical. For Mark, no doubt, the destruction of the temple reflected divine punishment for Israel's failure to respond.

In a further, somewhat artificial, development, Jesus is now asked by the inner group of four disciples to explain what he has just said, and in particular to say when this will happen. It is unclear as it stands whether the questions in v. 4 are asking about the time of one event (i.e. the destruction of the temple), the one question being effectively repeated by the other, or whether v. 4 constitutes two genuinely separate questions, asking about two events, the destruction of the temple and the end of the present world order. It seems likely that vv. 14–20 refer to the destruction of the temple (see below); since this does not cover the whole discourse, it may be that the rest of the chapter, referring to the end of the present world order, is an answer to what is a different question in v. 4b. Hence v. 4 should be taken as asking two different questions.

(13:5–8) The Start of the Troubles The main thrust of these verses seems clear in general: the disciples are not to be led astray by various events into thinking that the End is about to come. The section is thus a warning against overenthusiasm: such events must take place first, but they do not indicate that the present world order is about to end.

Despite the clear nature of the section in general, the details are highly obscure, especially the reference in v. 6 to people coming 'in my name' saying 'I am he!' (literally in Greek 'I am'). As Jesus is the speaker, it is not at all clear what such people might be claiming in saying 'I am he!'. Are they claiming to be Jesus himself returning (perhaps from the dead)? Are their words meant to echo the divine name itself ('I am') so that they are claiming to be quasi-divine beings? Are they coming in the 'name' of Jesus as Messiah and claiming to be the (true?) Messiah? Or are they coming as the Messiah's true agents or representatives? Certainty is simply impossible, except to say that the verse is extremely obscure! A similar warning appears in vv. 21–3, though there it is clearly a reference to messianic claimants other than Jesus. That may be so here as well, in which case the repetition of the warning shows its importance for Mark and may indicate that the presence of such false claimants was felt as a real threat in Mark's own day. Mark may have been faced with competing messianic figures and anxious to identify the true Messiah as Jesus: hence his constant stress on the Christological question throughout his gospel.

The prediction of wars and natural disasters (vv. 7–8) has been used by some to try to date the Markan apocalypse more precisely by when such events occurred. Thus it has been argued that perhaps these verses reflect the events of the years c.68–9 CE quite precisely, when there was great civil unrest in many parts of the empire as well as reports of earthquakes (Hengel 1985). However, the prediction of such events is a standard feature of apocalyptic literature (cf. Isa 13:13; 1 Enoch 1:6–7 (earthquakes); Isa 14:30; 2 Bar. 27:6 (famines); 2 Esd 9:34; 13:31 (wars)), so one need not necessarily see any specific events reflected. In any case the general message is clear: such events constitute only preliminary stages to the End: 'the end is still to come' (v. 7).

(13:9–13) Persecution The same applies to the phenomenon of persecution. Probably we see here a reflection of the experiences of various Christians: they have experienced persecution (though the persecution referred to here clearly covers a wide range—in Jewish synagogues and before non-Jewish rulers), though how far this has affected Mark's own community directly is not so clear (cf. 8:34–8). But such persecution, like wars and natural disasters, is not to be taken as a sign of the End.

Similarly, the gospel must be preached world-wide before the End will come (v. 10). Persecution then seems to be set in a context of missionary preaching: it is evangelization itself which has led to persecution; but such persecution will not stop, and the End will not come, until the gospel has been preached to the whole Gentile world ('all the nations'). Once again the thrust of the section is to dampen down at least some kinds of eschatological enthusiasm, namely the view that regarded persecution as a sign of the End.

(13:14–20) The Desolating Sacrilege With vv. 14–20 the emphasis shifts somewhat. In the two earlier sections, the stress had been on steadfastly waiting and not expecting things to happen. Now the stress is on firm action: 'When you see... then flee!' However, the action concerned makes it very clear that the event concerned cannot be the end of the world and the final judgement; for then any flight would be impossible.

The event itself is described in deliberately cryptic language, using words from the book of Daniel ('the desolating sacrilege' cf. Dan 9:27; 12:11), and Mark himself indicates their cryptic nature by his aside 'let the reader understand'. The desolating sacrilege is 'set up where it ought not to be'. (Grammatically the participle here is masculine in Greek, qualifying a neuter noun: hence the 'thing' concerned is clearly personified in some way.) In Daniel the reference is to the pagan altar setup in the Jerusalem temple by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc 1:54–9). Presumably a similar desecration of the temple is in mind here. Although many have argued that what is reflected here is the threat of Caligula to set up his own statue in the temple in 40 CE (Theissen 1992), it is unclear why people should then 'flee' (certainly no one did). Perhaps more likely is the view that this reflects the destruction of the temple at the end of the Jewish revolt in 70 CE, when Titus' soldiers set up their standards in the temple and offered sacrifices. If so then Mark must have been written after 70 CE and this verse may be the strongest evidence for such a theory. It is sometimes argued against this view that, during the siege of Jerusalem, the city was surrounded and no one could have fled to the hills. But Mark may not have known all the details of what happened in Jerusalem itself at this time, so the lack of precise correspondence between these verses and what actually happened is no bar to the view that Mark is writing after 70 CE. If so, then these verses are part of the answer to the first of the disciples' questions in v. 4.

Certainly the action urged is decisive and quick: all must get away as soon as possible for the suffering will be intense. However, within the broader context it is again clear that this event, however painful and catastrophic, is not a sign of the arrival of the End itself.

(13:21–3) False Messiahs and Prophets The same is implied in the next section which may (cf. above) repeat the warnings of v. 7 of false Messiahs and false prophets. Such people will even produce 'signs and wonders': Josephus records various such prophetic and/or messianic claimants at this period who claimed to be able to perform various miracles. It seems then that we are still in the realms of past or present for Mark.

(13:24–7) The Coming of the Son of Man With the next verse, the scene changes dramatically and quite clearly to the future. Now we have a description of the End itself, and the accompanying signs are described in such a way as to show that (a) they are completely unmistakable as presaging the End, and (b) they are not really preliminary at all: they are part of the End itself. The 'signs' are in fact the total break-up of the present cosmic order: sun and moon failing, and the whole universe collapsing. The description is traditional (cf. Isa 13:10; 34:4) and no doubt is intended as a mixture of 'myth' and reality. The climax is the description of the coming of the Son of Man figure, coming with 'clouds' and 'great power and glory', gathering the elect from the four corners of the earth. The language is clearly inspired by the vision of Dan 7:13–14, though here the Son of Man is now coming from heaven to earth (in Daniel he goes to heaven, to the throne of the Ancient of Days); and his mission is now to collect the faithful (cf. Isa 11:11), presumably to bring them together as the new people of God.

This description, strictly, brings to an end the apocalyptic prediction of the discourse. What follows are various exhortations and comments to the listeners on how they should behave or react to this vista of the future that is held out for them.

(13:28–32) Various Sayings This may have been a collection of originally isolated sayings, only placed here secondarily. Jesus puts forward a mini-'parable' about a fig-tree coming into leaf as a sign of the imminent summer; this is then said to be an image of 'these things' which are a sign of the imminent End. Clearly the reference cannot be to the coming of the Son of Man (vv. 26–7) since this is the End itself; it may therefore be the cosmic signs of vv. 24–5 that herald the coming of the Son of Man (though they are almost part of the same event). The point may then be that these signs are so unmistakable that only when one sees them can one deduce that the End is about to come. Other alleged preliminary signs are misleading.

If that is so, the tone shifts markedly in v. 30—from warning against over-enthusiasm to encouraging eschatological awareness: the End will come within the lifetime of the present generation. Certainly then for Mark, a false enthusiasm based on potentially misleading signs does not preclude a genuine and proper expectation that the End will come—and soon.

v. 31 is yet another independent saying, stressing the abiding validity of Jesus' teaching. Clearly, if it is genuine, it is a massive claim to authority. In its present context, the saying serves to buttress the validity of the claims made by Jesus in the preceding discourse, and to give added assurance to Mark's readers of the truth of his prediction of what is for them still in the future. Yet despite any claims about Jesus' authority, the next verse (v. 32) expresses the limited nature of Jesus' knowledge about any detailed timings. In its present form, the saying is highly unusual in that Jesus refers to himself as the Son in absolute terms, a feature very rare elsewhere in the synoptics, and hence raising the suspicion that this is a Christian post-Easter creation. On the other hand, it seems very unlikely that later Christians would invent a saying in which Jesus confesses such ignorance. Perhaps a genuine saying of Jesus has been glossed by later Christians so that Jesus now refers to himself as the Son. For Mark the saying no doubt serves to assure Mark's readers about their own ignorance: if they do not know exactly when the End will come, they can be assured that neither did Jesus himself.

(13:33–7) The Returning Master As a result Mark's Jesus issues his final call to be continually ready and vigilant. The call is in the form of a parable (vv. 34–6). The parable has various synoptic parallels (cf. Lk 12:35–8, 42–6; 19:11–27), though Mark's story here seems to confuse two images: a man going on a long journey and entrusting servants with various tasks, and a man going out for an evening and expecting servants to await his return. At least two stories seem to be conflated here. The points of time mentioned in v. 35 (evening, midnight, cock-crow, morning) correspond to the four watches of the night on the Roman reckoning and this may indicate Mark's own Sitz im Leben. The message of the section is spelt out in the final verse, which in turn is explicitly said to apply not only to the four disciples of the story-world, but to 'all', i.e. all Mark's readers: 'keep awake', be ready for the End which may come at any time.

This then is the final word of Jesus before the story of his passion and death.

Passion Narrative

Ch. 14 is often thought to be the start of the passion narrative proper. It is sometimes held that the passion narrative as a connected whole was put together very early and that this version reflects an earlier, pre-Markan account. Mark's story may well be traditional—and certainly a number of unevennesses in the present account are probably due to separate traditions being secondarily put together. On the other hand, it is also clear that Mark's present narrative is an integral part of the broader narrative in his gospel and in many ways it forms the climax of what has gone before.

Mark's account is very stark and unadorned. Yet the passion of Jesus was for Christians never a matter of simply 'plain fact' about Jesus' death. Christians believed that Jesus' death was in some sense 'according to the scriptures', i.e. part of a divine plan and somehow 'fulfilling' the OT. Exactly how this 'fulfilment' took place was conceived in different ways by different writers and different parts of the OT are referred to in this context. For Mark, some of the Psalms describing a righteous sufferer are clearly very important, so Mark writes up some aspects of the account of Jesus' passion in the words of these Psalms, especially Ps 22. Perhaps surprisingly, the evangelists do not make much, if anything, of any parallels between Jesus' death and the suffering ascribed to the servant figure of Isa 53. Generally speaking, the gospels are very reticent about ascribing atonement significance to Jesus' death: the story only occasionally implies that Jesus dies 'for us' or 'for our sins'.

(14:1–2) The Plot These verses set the following scene into a chronological framework in relation to the feast of Passover. The chronological details are potentially very significant (was the Last Supper a Passover meal? Did Jesus' trial take place on the feast of Passover itself?). But the exact details are tantalizingly obscure and Mark himself may have been confused.

v. 1 dates the events two days before the feast of Passover, which was at this time the same as the first day of the (seven-day) Feast of Unleavened Bread. Since Jewish days started at sunset, and Jesus was crucified on a Friday, Mark here probably refers to the Wednesday before. The Jews plot to arrest Jesus but say they will not act during the festival for fear of disturbance (v. 2). Yet the story shows them doing precisely that! Could it be that Judas' action (in betraying whatever he did betray) led them to change their minds? Alternatively, this could be an indication that the events concerned took place in a chronology which was rather different from the one presupposed by (some) later parts of Mark's narrative, so that Jesus died before the Passover, as indeed John's gospel implies (cf. Jn 19:31). See further Mk 14:12–16.

(14:3–9) The Anointing at Bethany The story may originally have been independent of the passion narrative: Luke, for example, places a similar story much earlier in Jesus' ministry (Lk 7:36–50). For Mark, the story highlights at least three points:

1. It shows an act of true generosity by the woman, in contrast to the penny-pinching objections of the bystanders (vv. 4–5). The woman uses up a huge amount of oil, at least in monetary terms (300 denarii was almost a year's wages for a labourer). Yet Jesus praises such extravagance: his own temporary presence is more important than the constant needs of the poor (v. 7). The Christological significance is obvious, though how much such sentiments might translate into a contemporary Christian social ethic is by no means so clear!

2. The woman 'anoints' Jesus' head. This is explicitly said to anticipate Jesus' burial (v. 8): this action is the start of the sequence of events that will lead to Jesus' death. What may also be in mind is the fact that Jesus' body was not later anointed: the women went to the tomb to do this on the first Easter Day, but found the tomb empty. Hence Jesus' body was never anointed after his death: the woman's action here therefore anticipates his death by the prior anointing of his body.

3. There is probably further significance for Mark in the story. As we shall see, much of the passion narrative is dominated by the idea that Jesus is a king: he will be mocked as a king, and crucified as a royal pretender. So too he has entered Jerusalem in royal fashion (see Mk 11:1–10). Anointing is also an act associated with a king: Jesus then is portrayed here as the anointed royal figure who as such, goes to his death.

(14:10–12) Judas' Betrayal The account of Judas' betrayal of Jesus is told starkly and briefly here. (It is elaborated considerably in the other gospels.) No details are given and one can only speculate about possible answers to questions such as: what were Judas' motives? What exactly did he betray to the authorities? (Jesus' whereabouts? Aspects of his message?) However, the incident as a whole is scarcely likely to have been invented by later Christians.

Judas' action is described as 'betraying', or 'handing over', Jesus. The same Greek verb is used in the passion predictions (9:31; 10:33; cf. 14:41), where it is implied that God is the subject of the action. Perhaps there is a hint here then that even in Judas' act of treachery, God's plan is actively being fulfilled.

(14:12–16) Preparations for the Passover This is the only story in Mark which serves to identify the Last Supper as a Passover meal. The account of the Supper itself makes no explicit reference to its being a Passover meal; and although some details of the meal are consistent with its being a Passover celebration (the meal is eaten at night, wine is drunk, those taking part recline, Jesus interprets some elements of the meal, a hymn is sung at the end), other essential elements of the Passover celebration are notorious by their absence in the narrative (no mention of the bitter herbs, the passover lamb, the explanation of the ritual in relation to the events of the Exodus from Egypt). There are also chronological difficulties raised by Mark's account in relation to the Sanhedrin trial: capital trials were not allowed on a feast-day, nor indeed on the eve of a feast-day, since a second session was required the following day to confirm the sentence (cf. m. Sanh. 4:1). Hence, if Mark's chronology here is correct, the Jewish authorities must have acted in a highly irregular or illegal way. (See further Mk 14:53–65.)

Such difficulties have thus led many to conclude that this section in Mark is a post-Easter insertion (whether by Mark or an earlier tradition) identifying the Last Supper as a Passover meal. The secondary nature of the pericope may also be indicated by the reference to Jesus coming to the room with 'the twelve' in v. 17—even though according to vv. 12–16 two of them have gone ahead to make the preparations. The chronology implied by John's gospel is, of course, different: there

Jesus dies as the Passover lambs are being killed, i.e. on the eve of Passover, so that Jesus' last meal cannot be the Passover meal itself. The Johannine chronology may well be theologically determined (Jesus' death coincides with that of the Passover lambs, so that Jesus is the true 'lamb', cf. Jn 1:26); but the Markan chronology may be equally theologically determined, though via a different scheme (the Last Supper is the true Christian 'Passover'). Thus while the Johannine chronology is not necessarily accurate in absolute terms, it may be more accurate than Mark's in dating Jesus' death as prior to Passover itself (and indeed this may be hinted at in Mark's own account: cf. Mk 14:2).

Some confusion is evident on Mark's part in the opening time reference in v. 12: the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread would not have been when the passover lambs were sacrificed, but would have started in the evening when the feast of Passover itself began.

The events described here are very similar to the events prior to the triumphal entry into Jerusalem (11:1–6). At the very least, Mark has probably written up both accounts to reflect each other. Speculations about whether Jesus might have made prior arrangements are probably quite beside the point as far as Mark is concerned. For him, the story shows clearly that Jesus is fully aware, and in command, of the situation. It thus illustrates Jesus' full authority.

(14:17–21) Prediction of the Betrayal This may also be secondary in relation to vv. 22–5 (the reference to 'while they were eating' in v. 22 seems to repeat v. 18a); the account is also rather artificial in that, in response to the prediction that one of the disciples will betray him, they ask not who the betrayer is, but only 'Is it I?' In its present form, the story serves to highlight again Jesus' full foreknowledge of what is coming and also his obedience to God's will. Jesus' words in v. 20 echo the words of Ps 41:9 (cited explicitly in this context in Jn 13:18), and show the events taking place 'in accordance with' Scripture. The Son of Man saying in v. 21 again emphasizes the divinely ordained nature of the course of events to come (cf. 8:31): it is as Son of Man that Jesus is to suffer and die, and this is ordained in Scripture ('as it is written of him'). The reference is probably to Dan 7. As in v. 11, Jesus is to be 'betrayed', or 'handed over', a verb implying not only human treachery but also divine intention.

(14:22–5) The Last Supper Mark's account is brief and to the point. As already noted (see on 14:12–16), there are no references to the Passover ritual; almost certainly Mark's narrative has been affected by the celebration of the Christian eucharist in his own community.

The development of the history of the tradition about the events of the Last Supper, and especially Jesus' 'words of institution' over the bread and the wine, is not totally clear and the evidence is complex. There are probably two quite independent accounts of the tradition: Mark's narrative here and Paul's citation of his tradition in 1 Cor 11:23–6. (Matthew's gospel here is probably dependent solely on Mark; Luke's may reflect a conflation of the Markan and Pauline traditions.) Probably neither Mark nor Paul consistently represents the earlier form of the tradition. The saying over the bread ('this is my body') is very brief in Mark. (The Pauline version adds 'which is for you', perhaps assimilating it to the saying over the cup, and also an explicit command to repeat the rite: the latter is probably not original, since it is far easier to envisage such a command being added secondarily than deleted, though Mark may have assumed that such a command was self-evident anyway.) The word for 'body' (Gk. sōma) can mean physical body, but also 'person' or 'self'. The original Aramaic would certainly have had no word corresponding to the Greek verb for 'is'. It is then unlikely that any clear ontological identification between the bread and Jesus' physical body is intended. More likely, what is in mind is that the act of sharing the common bread serves to unite the disciples with Jesus and his cause so that the eating of the bread is some kind of prophetic sign, simultaneously enacting what it signifies, which enables the disciples to be one with Jesus and his cause. For Mark, no doubt, the eating of the bread enables the presence of the risen Lord to be shared and experienced by post-Easter Christians. For Jesus himself, perhaps the act was one whereby he sought to unite his followers with himself in the coming events of the passion. Part of his subsequent desolation may then be due to their failure to stick with him and his having to face his fate in total isolation.

The saying over the cup is longer and the differences between the Markan and Pauline versions are greater. The Markan version seems to equate the cup (or its contents) with Jesus' blood ('this is my blood of the covenant'), whereas the Pauline tradition relates the cup directly to the covenant ('this cup is the new covenant in my blood'), though both clearly agree on the centrality of the covenant idea. The relative age of the two traditions is disputed, but it seems likely that Mark's tradition is in some ways more developed and less original than Paul's: the idea of drinking blood would be abhorrent in a Jewish context; it is easier to see a development from the Pauline version to the Markan, bringing the two sayings into parallel form, than vice versa; also the Markan version as it stands is all but impossible to translate into Aramaic. Hence it is likely that the original form of the saying focused on the covenant established by Jesus' 'blood', rather than on the blood itself (though in any case such an idea is firmly present in Mark as well). Fundamental therefore is the idea of the covenant established by Jesus: the surrender of his life in death (his 'blood') is the means by which a new covenant relationship is established. Further, since in Jewish tradition the covenant is integrally connected with the establishment of Israel as the people of God, the claim about the new covenant here implies the establishment of a new people of God. The final phrase in Mark ('poured out for many') is a clear indicator that Jesus' death is being seen in sacrificial terms. However, Jewish sacrifice was very varied and by no means monochrome. What is not said here is that Jesus' death is a sin offering or a means of dealing with individual sins or sinfulness (Matthew adds 'for the forgiveness of sins' here, but this is clearly secondary). Rather, Jesus' death is interpreted here as a covenant sacrifice, the means by which a new community is created by God's own initiative (see too on 10:45); by drinking the cup, the disciples share in all the benefits established by Jesus' sacrifice, i.e. they take their places as members of the new people of God, the new covenant community.

The final verse here (v. 25) looks ahead to the eschatological future, a feature shared (in general terms) by both Mark and Paul (cf. 1 Cor 11:26). For Mark, Jesus' 'words of institution' look to the present and/or the past. Here the reference is to the future: the special meal is an anticipation of the time of the kingdom. What is probably in mind is the messianic banquet (cf. Isa 25:6), symbolizing the joy of the new age. This may well be the most primitive aspect of the traditions of the eucharist, connected too with the evidently special nature of the meals held by Jesus during his lifetime: the special meal is a foretaste and anticipation of what is to come in its fullness in the future.

(14:26–31) Predictions of Denial Just as Jesus has earlier predicted Judas' betrayal, so now he predicts the defection of all the disciples, especially that of Peter. The story as it stands is probably composite: the citation of Zech 13:7 in v. 27b and the prediction about Galilee in v. 28 seem to intrude before Peter's protestation in v. 29 which would follow much more naturally after v. 27a. Hence vv. 27b–28 are probably an insertion which, in view of the similarity between v. 28 and 16:7, may be due to Mark himself.

The story as a whole serves to highlight again Jesus' full knowledge of what is to come. Further, Jesus is shown here to be a thoroughly reliable predictor of the future: he foresees and predicts Peter's denial right down to the smallest details ('three times', 'before the cock crows twice', cf. v. 72). In turn this serves to establish the reliability of Jesus' other predictions whose outcomes are not recorded in Mark's story. Some of these are no doubt past for Mark (cf. v. 28), some are still to come (cf. 14:62). Peter's denial is in one sense the climax of the story of the deepening and radical failure of the disciples to understand Jesus. Yet v. 28 indicates that this is by no means the end of the story. (See further on the Ending of Mark.)

Zech 13:7 is a verse which may well have been used by Christians originally to 'explain' Jesus' death as in some way in accordance with Scripture. In its present context, however, the stress is as much on the sheep (i.e. the disciples) as on the shepherd who is smitten (i.e. Jesus): the defection of the disciples is as much part of the divine plan as is Jesus' death itself. The text form used here is also unusual: contrary to both the Hebrew and LXX texts, the version here has 'I will strike' in place of the imperative 'Strike!'. Clearly God is now the one who strikes. Thus again, the events to come are shown to be not only the result of human failings and sinfulness: they are also the actions of God himself and part of the divine plan.

(14:32–42) Gethsemane The account of Jesus' agony in Gethsemane is one of the most powerful and poignant stories in the whole of the gospel tradition. Its historicity has been questioned (how could the disciples have known what happened if they were all asleep at the time?). However, it is deeply embedded in the tradition (cf. the echoes of the story in Jn 12:27; 18:11; also Heb 5:7–8, as well as the parallels in Matthew and Luke); further, the picture of Jesus apparently doubting his willingness to face the future is unlikely to have been invented by later Christians. Hence it is very probable that the story has firm roots in the tradition. Perhaps Jesus believed that his mission was now a failure; perhaps too he had expected, or hoped, that his disciples would stay with him and share his lot (cf. 10:39; 14:22), but he now found himself totally alone. For Mark, the story is part of the growing isolation of Jesus whereby he is deserted by his friends and, in the end, feels deserted by God himself (cf. 15:34).

If, however, the story may have firm historical roots, this does not mean that every detail is historically accurate. In its present Markan form the account has some redundancies and repetitions (cf. the way in which Jesus goes away twice and comes back three times), suggesting at least some secondary developments of the story. In particular, the words of Jesus' prayer to God in v. 36 may reflect as much what Christians thought Jesus would have said on such an occasion as anything he did actually say on this particular occasion.

Jesus' words echo the Lord's Prayer (the address to God as Father, 'your will be done'). Jesus' address of God as 'Abba', Father, is noteworthy. Too much has probably been made in the past of 'Abba' as a child's address to its father. Nevertheless, the word is distinctive as showing close intimacy, and the fact that the Aramaic word 'Abba' is preserved here suggests that this was remembered as characteristic of Jesus. However, it is not at all clear how unique this makes Jesus: Jesus himself gave others the same right/privilege (cf. the Lord's Prayer, Lk 11:2), and other Christians certainly followed suit (Cf. Gal 4:6; Rom 8:15). Rather than reflecting any self-awareness by Jesus of himself as a unique Son of God, the use of 'Abba' shows Jesus' close relationship with God which he shared with, and offered to, others. Here it is part of a general picture of sonship as denoting obedience and subservience: Jesus as the implied son is the one who submits to God's will, not his own. The reference to the 'cup' here is probably simply an image of intense suffering (cf. 10:38–9), not of any divine punishment (e.g. for the sins of others): such ideas are foreign to Mark.

As well as showing Jesus' own submission to God's will, the story highlights the failure of the disciples. The Greek word here for 'keep awake' (vv. 34, 37, 38) is the same as that used in the commands to watch in 13:34, 35, 37. By sleeping and failing to stay awake, the disciples are failing to obey the command of Jesus given to all his followers (cf. 13:37). Jesus' willing submission in the end to God's will thus contrasts dramatically with the human failings of his followers.

(14:43–52) The Arrest The story of Jesus' arrest may represent the start of an early account of Jesus' passion: from here the synoptic and Johannine accounts of the passion run closely parallel with each other, and the redundant (i.e. for Mark) reference to Judas as 'one of the twelve' in v. 43 may indicate that Mark is using an earlier tradition here. The account suggests more of a disorganized mob than an official party (cf. the reference to 'swords and clubs'). Judas' action in kissing Jesus may have been intended to identify who Jesus was (though why this should have been necessary is not clear); but in its present form it highlights Judas' treachery: an act of respect and/or affection is used as an act of betrayal. The reaction of one of the bystanders in cutting off the ear of the high priest's slave is told here very briefly. The story is elaborated in the later gospels (it is an action of Peter, the victim is named, Jesus responds to the action), but here it is left in isolation. Jesus' response focuses on the violence of his opponents. The words of v. 49a, referring to Jesus' continued presence in the temple, conflict with Mark's general chronology, since they seem to imply that Jesus had been in Jeru-saalem much longer than the one hectic week implied by Mark. This in turn gives some added support to the theory that Jesus arrived in Jerusalem much earlier than Mark suggests (see mk 11:1–10). Jesus' final words (v. 49b) emphasize once again that everything takes place in accordance with Scripture and hence with God's will. The final note in v. 50 about all the disciples fleeing also confirms that everything happens as Jesus himself has predicted (cf. v. 27).

The small story about the young man running away naked has led to much speculation. Some have seen here a cryptic autobiographical note by Mark himself; however, it is unlikely that Mark was a Palestinian Jew. Possibly the story has been influenced by Amos 2:16. Attempts to see deeper significance in the 'linen cloth' work by the man (e.g. is this a reference to baptismal clothes 'taken off?') are probably fanciful.

(14:53–65) The Sanhedrin Trial The account of Jesus' trial before the Jewish authorities is one where the historical questions of what actually happened are most acute, and almost intractable. The story as it stands gives rise to innumerable historical difficulties. Above all, there is the fact that Mark seems to think of the events described as some kind of formal 'trial', resulting in a death sentence, and yet the authorities seem to have broken a large number of their own rules in conducting a capital trial in the way described. Our evidence for such rules—mostly from the Mishnah—is admittedly from a later time, but infringements implied here include holding a trial on a feast-day, not having a statutory second session on the following day to confirm the sentence, Jesus being condemned to death for blasphemy yet technically he has not blasphemed (see mk 14:64). Some of these problems are resolved if one takes the event as less of a formal trial and more of an informal hearing, as is implied by Luke's account (which may be independent of Mark here) and also by John's (though there are the perennial problems of the historical reliability of John), and if one jettisons the Markan chronology which implies that all this happened on Passover itself (cf. mk 14:12–16).

The Markan account has been somewhat embroidered and one certainly cannot simply read it as a straight transcript of what actually happened. How much Mark himself was aware of this is not certain: did Mark deliberately set out to portray the Jewish authorities as breaking all their rules in order to get Jesus killed? Or was he simply ignorant of the finer points of Jewish legal procedure and unaware of the problems his account would cause for later interpreters? In view of the lack of any explicit hints of irregularities in procedure here, the latter possibility seems more likely.

In terms of historicity, there is also the problem of how later Christians would have had access to any reliable information about what actually happened during the hearing. Maybe some general information was available, but the details must have remained unknown. Perhaps part of the difficulties raised by the accounts is due to some information which may have been available being coupled with a general belief on the part of later Christians that Jesus was fundamentally innocent of any 'charge' brought against him.

Jesus is questioned first about an alleged claim to destroy the temple. As it stands, the account is highly implausible: Jesus is accused by false witnesses who cannot agree—but such testimony should then be rejected. Yet for Mark there is a constant theme of dramatic irony running through this account of the passion: what is at one level false is also at a deeper level an expression of profound truth. The 'falsity' may partly derive from the general belief that Jesus was innocent of any charge (cf. above); it may also be partly due to the fact that the falsity applies not so much to the truth of what is said as to the people making the claims. Jesus' prediction of the destruction of the temple is, as we have seen, deeply embedded in the tradition (see mk 13:2). Here such a prediction is expanded by a contrast between the physical temple, which will be destroyed, and a temple 'not made with hands' which will replace it 'in three days'. For Mark and his Christian readers, the reference is certainly to the spiritual temple of the church, established by Jesus in the resurrection (after 'three days'). For many, such an idea is best explained as a Christian development in the light of the resurrection. However, we now know from some Qumran texts that the Jews at Qumran had a similar interpretation of the 'temple' as the community; moreover, in some of these texts, building this new/metaphorical temple was conceived of as the task of an expected Davidic messianic figure (cf. 4QFlor). Thus Jesus could have conceived his own role as that of a messianic figure whose primary task was to establish a new community as the new people of God, a new 'temple'. With this background of thought, the transition to the next question about Jesus' messiahship, often felt to be difficult to explain, becomes more comprehensible and may thus reflect historical fact rather better than is sometimes claimed.

Jesus' refusal to answer (which could then be taken as a refusal to deny the 'accusation') leads on to the specific messianic question of Jesus' own identity. Jesus is asked explicitly if he is the Messiah, the Son of the Blessed. (The high priest's words avoid uttering the divine name of God.) For the first time in Mark's narrative, Jesus now openly acknowledges his identity. Secrecy is no longer commanded. The reason for Mark may be that the context provides the true hermeneutical key: the one who is Messiah and Son of God is the one who stands as prisoner in the dock and is about to be condemned to death. True messiahship, true divine sonship, for Mark means obedience, suffering, and death. When that is made clear, no secrecy is necessary. Yet, as in ch. 8 when Jesus was alone with his disciples, talk about messiahship is immediately qualified by reference to himself as Son of Man (cf. Mk 8:27–33). For Mark it is the idea of Son of Man that provides the proper key to any talk of Jesus as Messiah. As we have seen on several occasions, 'Son of Man' implies obedience, suffering, and subsequent vindication. Here the stress is on the last of these (cf. too 13:26). The one who is obedient to the cross will ultimately be vindicated by God. Further, the predictions of Jesus which have been fulfilled in the passion itself serve to buttress the validity of this prediction which for Mark awaits fulfilment in the future.

The story in vv. 61–2 clearly reflects key elements in Mark's narrative. How far they are also historical is much harder to say. As we have seen, the sequence from the temple saying to the question of messiahship is plausible. Further, it is almost certain that Jesus was crucified as a messianic claimant (cf. the titulus over the cross). Open messianic claims by Jesus are however very rare in the gospels, and their historicity is suspect. Perhaps the most one can say is that Jesus must have been confronted by such claims at his trial and at the very least refused to deny them (perhaps because they reflected at least some of his positive aspirations, e.g. his wanting to rebuild a new Israel, even if other aspects of messiahship, such as political nationalism, were less appealing).

The high priest claims that Jesus has blasphemed (v. 64). Strictly speaking, Jesus has not, since blasphemy technically involved uttering the divine name (see m. Sanh. 7:5) and this Jesus has scrupulously avoided doing. In terms of history, it may be that Jesus was regarded as having made 'blasphemous' claims or assertions in a loose way, though not necessarily uttering the divine name, and it was this that led the authorities to want him killed, even if they may not have been legally empowered to execute him themselves—hence their decision to involve the Roman authorities. (The whole question of Jewish legal powers to execute at this period is a very vexed one: see the survey in Brown 1994: 363–72.) But for Mark, such legal niceties were probably irrelevant. Perhaps he knew that the question of Jesus' identity as Messiah was a key one in the 'trial', and he clearly believed that the Jews did condemn Jesus to death for what they regarded as blasphemy.

The mockery of Jesus which now ensues involves deep irony. Jesus is mocked as a prophet: yet he has just been shown to be a true prophet in predicting the flight of the disciples; Mark's story is about to show his prediction of Peter's denial being fulfilled very literally; and Jesus has just predicted his own vindication as Son of Man. Mocked as a false prophet (by implication), Mark's narrative shows Jesus to be a true prophet, and his apparent demise is in fact the true and only path that will lead to ultimate vindication by God.

(14:66–72) Peter's Denial The story of Peter's threefold denial spans the account of Jesus' trial. (Mark starts the story about Peter in v. 54, but then adds the trial scene to create a typical sandwich structure.) The net effect is to highlight the contrast between Jesus who stands firm and Peter who capitulates to pressure. Mark goes out of his way to show that the events fulfil Jesus' prediction precisely, even down to the cock crowing twice (cf. v. 30). The final sentence is obscure: the verb translated 'broke down' (NRSV) is totally unclear as to its precise meaning. If we are to see in Peter's tears remorse and contrition, any sequel is left unspoken: this is the last appearance of Peter in the gospel (though cf. 16:7).

(15:1–15) Trial before Pilate The story of the hearing before Pilate raises almost as many historical problems as the account of the Sanhedrin trial. That there was some Roman involvement in the trial and death of Jesus seems undeniable: at the very least we have to explain the fact that Jesus was crucified, and crucifixion was a Roman punishment, reserved primarily for political rebels. The tendency in the Christian tradition, however, is to take the blame away from the Romans and put it on to the shoulders of the Jewish authorities. Undoubtedly we see this process happening here. The scene starts with Pilate abruptly asking Jesus 'Are you the King of the Jews?', and, when met with silence from Jesus, seeking desperately to release him. The picture is quite implausible, both in general and in detail. The picture of Pilate here as weak and vacillating, anxiously trying to please the Jews, in no way squares with what we know from elsewhere of the man, viz., a cruel tyrant who would have not had the slightest compunction in executing an odd Jew or two to keep the peace. So too the Barabbas incident defies explanation: no such custom of releasing a prisoner on a regular basis is known, nor is it really credible. Most likely the account here has been influenced by the tendency to shift the blame away from the Romans and on to the Jewish authorities.

The question of Jesus' kingship, raised here by Pilate, is the one that will now dominate the chapter (cf. vv. 9, 12, 18, 26, 32). The charge of being king of the Jews was almost certainly the charge on which Jesus was crucified by the Romans (cf. the titulus, v. 26): it was in any case a political charge (which would naturally lead to the punishment of crucifixion: cf. above), and moreover it was a charge on which someone like Pilate would feel obliged to act: a royal pretender would clearly pose a threat to political power which Pilate could not ignore. Hence some aspects of the story here are very plausible. However, it is much more likely that Pilate simply ordered Jesus' crucifixion without any compunction at all. For Mark, the issue is no doubt one of Jesus' kingship—yet not so much Jesus' identity as king as the nature of that kingship and of the royal power he exercises.

(15:16–20) The Mockery This is brought out in the mockery scene which now follows, a scene impregnated with almost savage irony. Jesus is clothed by the soldiers in royal clothes—a purple cloak and a 'crown' that is an instrument of torture. The soldiers then do mock homage to him and hail him—for them ironically—as 'king of the Jews'. But the real irony goes one stage further because, for Mark, what is said here in mocking jest is in fact profound truth. Jesus is the king of the Jews. What the soldiers say in jest expresses for Mark the deepest reality.

(15:21–32) Crucifixion Jesus' cross is carried, under pressure, by one Simon of Cyrene: we know nothing of him (though his sons 'Alexander and Rufus' may have been known in Mark's community—hence their mention here). Jesus is then crucified and given a drugged drink. Possibly the story has been influenced by Ps 69:21 (certainly Matthew, who changes Mark's 'myrrh' to 'gall', makes the allusion clearer). Jesus however refuses. The next verse (v. 24), with its reference to casting lots for Jesus' clothes clearly echoes Ps 22:18, just as the note in v. 29 of the bystanders 'shaking their heads' echoes Ps 22:7. Ps 22 has had a powerful (if unstated) influence on the Markan narrative.

The mockery of the bystanders again employs the motif of irony. The charge about the temple is brought up again, including the note about rebuilding a new temple, and the people call on Jesus to save himself and come down from the cross. But the new temple is the new covenant community, brought into being by Jesus' own death so that Jesus cannot save himself if the prediction of the new temple is to be fulfilled. Similarly, the words of the Jewish leaders, 'He saved others; he cannot save himself' (v. 31) are, like the soldiers' mockery in vv. 16–20, both a taunt and simultaneously at a deeper level a profound truth: Jesus is saving others precisely by being where he is and by not saving himself—he cannot save himself if he is indeed to be the saviour of the world.

A final bitter irony comes with the claim that if Jesus, as Messiah and king, could come down from the cross, they would then 'see and believe'. Yet Mark and Mark's readers know that such 'seeing' is not available, nor does it lead to the right sort of 'belief'. Faith for Mark can never be based on miracles: miracles can only occur in the context of already existing faith and commitment (cf. 8:11–12).

(15:33–9) Jesus' Death The same note of mockery, and possible irony, may continue as the story moves to its climax in Jesus' death. Darkness falls, an event which is clearly understood as a divine miracle. (An eclipse of the sun would have been impossible at the time of Passover which would have been a full moon.) Jesus then utters his only words from the cross in Mark, the opening words from Ps 22:1. Some have argued that this 'cry of dereliction' should not be taken too negatively: the citation of the opening words of Ps 22 imply that the later part of the psalm (expressing great hope) is also in mind. This seems unlikely. Mark's account has shown a progressive increase in Jesus' isolation and abandonment by others. He has been abandoned by all his friends, condemned by all human agencies, and now he feels himself abandoned even by God himself. Any reading of the text should not water down or dilute the starkness and harshness of the narrative Mark presents.

Jesus' citation of Ps 22:1 (in Aramaic) is taken as a call to Elijah (why this should be so is not clear: such confusion could only occur if Jesus had spoken in Hebrew—as indeed Matthew claims—not in Aramaic). Perhaps what is in mind is the notion, evidenced in some later Jewish traditions, that Elijah, as the one who did not die, would help the righteous in times of trouble. This, however, seems to have been confused with another tradition of a bystander giving Jesus a drink (cf. Ps 69:21 again), either a drug to ease the pain, or vinegar to aggravate thirst—hence a mocking 'help'. The idea of Elijah as possibly coming to help may also be ironic since, for Mark's Jesus, Elijah had already come, been rejected and killed (cf. 9:11–13).

Jesus' death comes—mercifully quickly in the end for a crucifixion. The events which follow are undoubtedly Mark's own theological interpretation of what has happened. The veil of the temple is torn in two, and the centurion confesses Jesus as Son of God. (The words of the centurion could be translated as saying simply that Jesus was a son of a god. However, for Mark, it seems certain that he intends the centurion to make the ultimate Christological confession: Jesus is the Son (capital S) of God. For what this means, see below.)

The precise identification of the 'veil' of the temple is uncertain. Two possible curtains could be intended: that which stood at the entrance to the temple building, or that which stood at the entry to the Holy of Holies, symbolically preventing God from being seen by human beings. This Markan verse is often taken as referring to the temple as a whole, and the tearing of the veil as a symbol of the destruction of the temple and the end of the Jewish cult (cf. 11:16–19; 13:2; 14:58). This is possible, though it seems just as likely that v. 38 should be taken as integral with v. 39 as well: the tearing of the veil enables one to see now: and in particular it enables the centurion to see who Jesus is: for the first time in Mark's story, a human being now comes to the realization that Jesus is truly 'Son of God'. But what does this mean? At one level the interpretation may be provided by v. 38: the 'curtain' may rather be the one veiling the Holy of Holies, so that, when this is torn in two, the barrier separating God from men and women is ripped apart: God himself is seen. Mark's scene here may thus be vividly and dramatically presenting Jesus qua Son of God as the very representation of God himself.

There is, however, a vital corollary. For the context for the confession of v. 39 is not only v. 38 but the whole scene itself, including v. 37. The centurion sees—a dead man hanging on a shameful cross, and says that this man is the Son of God. If Mark intends by v. 38 to claim that Jesus qua Son of God represents God, then his story also vividly and violently not only says something about what it means to be a Son, it also says something about God. It is not only about Christology, it is also about theology. God is to be seen most clearly and starkly in the abandonment, the weakness, and the powerlessness of the crucified one.

The identity of Jesus has been no secret for the reader from the very start of the story (cf. 1:1). However, the nature and significance of what it means to be Son of God—not only Son but also Son of God—are now spelt out in Mark's narrative. The scene is at one level the climax to which the whole of Mark's story has been leading.

(15:40–7) Burial The note about the women watching from afar (vv. 40–1) prepares for the account of the women coming to the tomb on the first day of the week. As we have noted already, in Mark women often do what the male disciples have failed to do. At least these women have not deserted Jesus completely. The account of the burial of Jesus follows, told simply and with little adornment except for the extra conversation between Pilate and the soldiers which simply confirms the reality of Jesus' death.

(16:1–8) The Empty Tomb The sequel to the story of Jesus' death and burial is in Mark's gospel terse and compressed. By universal consent, the sequel as we have it comprises only vv. 1–8 of this chapter. Continuations of the narrative, either in a short ending or in a longer ending (printed as vv. 9–20 in some English Bibles) appear in some MSS of Mark; but these are clearly not by the author of the text of the rest of the gospel and represent attempts to complete the narrative. Thus the final section we have of Mark's story contains only an account of the discovery of the empty tomb by the women with no actual appearance of the risen Jesus.

The story of the women coming to the tomb to anoint Jesus' body raises a number of well-known historical problems: e.g. if the women had no idea how the stone over the entrance to the tomb could be removed (cf. v. 3), why did they come at all? For Mark, however, such questions are beside the point: the narrative rather shows the miracle of the empty tomb which surpasses all human expectations and thus leads to astonishment on the part of the women.

The 'young man' encountered by the women is 'dressed in a white robe', probably indicating that he is to be thought of as an angel. He tells the women what the empty tomb implies: 'He has been raised; he is not here.' The order of the clauses is striking. The resurrection is almost assumed without question, and the empty tomb interprets it by the (self-evident) fact that Jesus is 'not here'. He is not present. There is thus no sense in which for Mark the empty tomb guarantees the reality of the resurrection or assures the presence of the risen

Jesus. Almost the reverse is the case: the empty tomb is an empty tomb: Jesus is not here to be experienced as a tangible objective proof of anything. If then he is not here, where is he to be found? The next verses provide an answer—albeit enigmatically.

In v. 7, the young man gives a message to the women for the disciples and Peter: Jesus is ‘going ahead’ of them to Galilee, and they will see him there. The specific reference to Peter makes it highly likely that the ‘seeing’ involves a resurrection appearance, with the mention of Peter perhaps referring to a special appearance to Peter (cf. 1 Cor 15:3; Lk 24:34). (Hence the reference is not, as some have argued, to the parousia: cf. Marxsen 1969.) Further, the young man’s last words (‘as he told you’) clearly recall Jesus’ prediction in 14:28. The reference is thus to a meeting between the risen Jesus and the disciples when the latter will be forgiven and restored; their relationship with Jesus, broken by their failure to stick with him, will be renewed. Once again they will become disciples, with Jesus ‘going ahead’ of them, just as he did before (cf. 10:32).

The women’s reaction is, however, to ignore what they have been told. They are seized with ‘terror and amazement’; they flee away, and say ‘nothing to anyone, for they were afraid’. It seems highly likely that, from Mark’s point of view, the women’s reaction is to be regarded negatively. Although amazement and awe in the presence of the numinous (e.g. an angel) is in one sense entirely appropriate, the ‘fear’ shown by the women here seems to be wholly bad. ‘Fear’ elsewhere in Mark is the reaction which contrasts with faith (cf. 4:40); and the women here fail to do what they have been explicitly told to do. There is an almost ironical reversal of the situation earlier in the gospel. Earlier, people were regularly told to be silent about Jesus (and often disobeyed); here, the women are told to speak out openly—indeed the earlier secrecy charge in 9:9 had indicated that the time after the resurrection would be the time for openness; yet they are silent! There seems to be then an underlying pattern of divine command and human failing, which does not stop even here in the story with the resurrection. So too, however much the women in Mark act as correctives to the behaviour of male disciples, in the end they too are shown as failing. Human weakness and failing is thus shown to be universal. But is this Mark’s last word? We must consider the problem of the ending.

The Ending

As already noted, Mark’s text as we have it ends at 16:8. Other endings found in some MSS of the gospel are clearly (on stylistic grounds) secondary additions, mostly being compressed conflation of the resurrection appearance stories in the other gospels. Did then Mark intend to end at 16:8? Many have felt that an ending at this point is unsatisfactory and extremely difficult to conceive. Grammatically, 16:8 ends very abruptly and clumsily in Greek (with a conjunction). More important perhaps is the question of substance. The very existence of the alternative endings in some MSS testifies to a feeling by later scribes that the gospel was incomplete; and even Matthew and Luke, in some sense Mark’s first interpreters, both clearly believed that Mark’s gospel needed completion by the addition of accounts of resurrection appearances. Many modern scholars have felt the same, and hence have argued that Mark’s gospel was not intended to end where it does: It must be that either Mark continued with accounts of resurrection appearances and the ending has been lost (by accident or deliberate suppression), or he was prevented from finishing his work (e.g. by illness, or by being arrested).

Neither of these theories is entirely satisfactory: one would expect a lost ending to be restored, and theories about Mark’s personal circumstances are entirely speculative. In any case such theories depend heavily on preconceived ideas about what a gospel narrative, in particular the conclusion to such a narrative, ‘must’ contain. Without such preconceptions, the onus is probably on the reader to try to make sense of the narrative as it stands and to take seriously the possibility that 16:8 is indeed the intended ending.

It seems clear that the end of the narrative is not the end of the line of events which start in the narrative itself. For example, the prediction of 16:7 of a renewal of the relationship between Jesus and the disciples must, for Mark, have been fulfilled. Throughout Mark’s passion narrative, Jesus has been shown to be a reliable prophet, predicting events to come with great accuracy (cf. on Peter’s denial). The whole literary plot of the narrative therefore demands that Jesus’ predictions are fulfilled, including those not explicitly covered by the narrative itself. Thus the narrative structure created by Mark compels us to believe that the continuation of Mark’s story-world into Mark’s real world has led to the meeting implied in 16:7 having taken place.

Hence too the women’s silence in v. 8 cannot have been absolute and everlasting. Despite it, the message to the disciples must eventually have got through to them so that they met up with the risen Jesus in Galilee. In any case, Mark’s own Christian community must have known of the resurrection of Jesus (cf. the passion predictions which all include predictions of the resurrection as well: again Mark must have believed that they were fulfilled), and this must presume that the message of the young man did (eventually) reach its goal.

Perhaps though the message to the disciples has more significance for Mark than just its surface meaning. They are to meet up with Jesus in ‘Galilee’ where Jesus is ‘going ahead’ of them. For Mark, however, Galilee is the place where discipleship starts, and the path of discipleship is one which leads from Galilee to Jerusalem, which for Mark is the place of suffering and death. Similarly, 10:32 makes it clear that Jesus’ ‘going ahead’ means going ahead on the road that leads to Jerusalem, the place of suffering. The way of discipleship for Mark is the way of the cross (cf. 8:34 etc.). If the disciples are to meet with Jesus in Galilee, then this is not necessarily some glorious panacea that will enable them to forget about the preceding events and mean a glorious, trouble-free existence. It is rather suffering discipleship to which they are called, as indeed ch. 13 has made clear.

Moreover, it is an existence that is perhaps permanently characterized by human failure. Just as the disciples have failed during Jesus’ lifetime, the women have failed even during the apparent success of the era of resurrection; so the Christian readers of Mark may assume that failure will be a constant feature of Christian discipleship. But equally, as Mark’s story implies (but does not state explicitly), failure can be and is overcome. The power of forgiveness and restoration is in the end greater than human failure and its consequences.

Mark's abrupt ending violently shifts attention away from what some of his readers may have expected (and from what some of his later readers such as Matthew and Luke evidently did expect). The era of the Christian church for Mark is not one of power and glory which nullifies the previous suffering and death. Stories of appearances of the risen Jesus might give that impression, and Mark does not recount these. As with the messianic secret in the earlier story, Jesus' true identity is to be seen as the crucified one; Jesus' divine sonship is seen most clearly and starkly when he dies (cf. 15:39). If Jesus is risen, he is risen as the crucified one. The gospel for Mark is thus the good news about Jesus—but it is Mark's Jesus that Mark's gospel is about, and for Mark, Jesus is supremely the Son of God seen most clearly in his suffering and death. Further, Mark's narrative may be only the beginning of the gospel (see 1:1). The rest of the gospel is to be completed by the reader, but the reader can only complete the story by following as a disciple of Mark's Jesus, and that means going to Galilee, being prepared to follow in the way of discipleship as spelt out by him, i.e. the way of the cross. There, and only there, will Jesus be 'seen' and experienced. There is then no happy ending to the gospel. There is certainly no objective account of the reality that informs Christian existence for Mark, namely the presence of the risen Jesus with his people: such would be inappropriate for Mark. Maybe Mark's gospel is indeed unfinished. But perhaps that is deliberate. It is up to the reader to supply the ending—and that is the perennial challenge of this gospel to all its readers today.

REFERENCES

- Brown, R. E. (1994), The Death of the Messiah (New York: Doubleday).
 Burridge, R. A. (1992), What are the Gospels? (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
 Fowler, R. M. (1981), Loaves and Fishes (Chico, Calif.: Scholars Press).
 Hengel, M. (1985), Studies in the Gospel of Mark, ET (London: SCM).
 Jeremias, J. (1963), The Parables of Jesus, ET (London: SCM).
 Luz, U. (1983), 'The Secrecy Motif and the Marcan Christology', ET in Tuckett (1983), 75–96. German original, 1965.
 Marxsen, W. (1969), Mark the Evangelist, ET (Nashville: Abingdon).
 Räisänen, H. (1982), 'Jesus and the Food Laws: Reflections on Mark 7:15', JSNT 16: 79–100, repr. in Räisänen, Jesus, Paul and Torah: Collected Essays (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1992), 127–48.
 — (1990), The 'Messianic Secret' in Mark's Gospel (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
 Sanders, E. P. (1985), Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM).
 Tannehill, R. C. (1977), 'The Disciples in Mark: The Function of a Narrative Role', JR 57: 386–405, repr. in W. R. Telford (ed.), The Interpretation of Mark, 2nd edn. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1995), 169–95.
 Theissen, G. (1978), The First Followers of Jesus: A Sociological Analysis of the Earliest Christianity, ET (London: SCM).
 — (1992), The Gospels in Context: Social and Political History in the Synoptic Tradition, ET (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
 Tolbert, M. A. (1989), Sowing the Gospel: Mark's World in Literary-Historical Perspective (Minneapolis: Fortress).
 Tuckett, C. M. (1983), The Messianic Secret (London: SPCK).
 — (1992), 'Synoptic Problem', ABD vi. 263–70.
 Weeden, T. J. (1971), Mark: Traditions in Conflict (Philadelphia: Fortress).

59. Luke

ERIC FRANKLIN

INTRODUCTION

A. Luke among the Synoptic Gospels. 1. As one of the three Synoptic Gospels, Luke's story of Jesus has much in common with those of Matthew and Mark. Based on the same outline of his ministry, it includes a large number of episodes common to all three and puts emphasis upon many of the same things. It shares with the other two the same overall perspective from which Jesus' life is described and its significance assessed. Jesus is presented as the one who announces the arrival of the kingdom of God, his exorcisms and miracles are interpreted as witnessing to its presence in him and his teaching, often given by way of parables, explains its implications for those who would receive it.

2. Within this common framework, however, Luke's gospel includes many episodes which are peculiar to it and a significant number which, paralleled in one or both of Matthew and Mark, appear in his gospel in a different form and give a particular distinctiveness to his narrative. Among the most important of these are:

(a) Luke's infancy narratives, though agreeing with Matthew's on a number of important points, are, in the story they tell, quite other than his. Preparations for the birth of John the Baptist form a prelude to those of Jesus which they closely parallel—though in a less dramatic way—and with which they are interwoven. Jesus is linked firmly to Israel's prophetic line whose mission he fulfils. Born while all the world is on the move, he is ignored except by a number of Jewish outcasts who alone receive the divine announcement of his birth. Taken to the temple, however, he is recognized by true representatives of its piety who acknowledge that he will cause divisions in Israel but will become a light to the Gentiles, whose response will rebound to Israel's glory.

(b) Luke's narrative introduces Jesus' Galilean ministry with an account of a rejection at Nazareth which Matthew and Mark have much later in their gospels where it becomes Jesus' last visit to a synagogue. Luke's story includes a sermon in which Jesus proclaims himself as the fulfilment of Isaiah's hopes for Israel. He virtually compels his rejection but justifies it on the grounds that no prophet is acceptable to his own. His lack of works at home is defended by pointing out that both Elijah and Elisha gave attention to foreigners. When the townsfolk rise up against him, their attempt to kill him is thwarted and leads only to a furthering of his progress towards his goal.

(c) All three Synoptic Gospels tell of Jesus' one, determined journey to Jerusalem to fulfil God's purposes for him.

Whereas Matthew covers it in two chapters and Mark in only one, Luke devotes some ten chapters to it. Its beginning is marked by a verse of exceptional solemnity (9:51) and frequent references to it remind the reader of its importance. The concept of a journey is obviously significant for Luke. The great majority of its episodes are peculiar to him whilst its contents as a whole offer different aspects of his own particular understanding of Jesus.

(d) Whilst Luke's account of Jesus' teaching in Jerusalem and of his conflicts with the religious authorities there are paralleled in Matthew and Mark, once the passion narrative proper begins with the account of Jesus' last supper, the distinctiveness of his story is apparent. His account of Jesus' actions at the supper is not easily accommodated to theirs and he includes a significant discussion with the twelve which they lack. The agony in the garden and the arrest resemble theirs (though with significant differences) but his story does not have their account of the night examination of Jesus by the Jews. He has but one single session of the council in the morning. No actual condemnation of him to death is made but all is rather regarded as a preparation for the accusations they are to make against him before Pilate, whose unwillingness to accede to their demands is emphasized by a threefold declaration of his innocence. Pilate's favourable judgment is supported by Herod who in Luke alone is given a role in the drama at this point. Eventually, Pilate delivers up Jesus 'to their will' and the Jews take a leading part in bringing him to the cross. His crucifixion scene presents a different picture from that found in Matthew and Mark. Their starkness is mellowed and Luke's, though having the same general contours as theirs, is given in colours that in many ways come closer to those used in John. The cry of desolation is not included and Jesus is serene throughout. He forgives his persecutors, receives the acknowledgment of the penitent thief and promises him a place in paradise, and commends himself into his Father's hands. The picture is of a death which reveals the characteristics that determined the life. What follows can only be a completion of what is now happening. Jesus' exodos, to which 9:31 pointed and which was to be accomplished at Jerusalem, is in the process of being realized.

(e) Whereas Mark expects Jesus' resurrected appearances in Galilee, and Matthew describes his final scene there, Luke's narrative leaves no room for such episodes. At the empty tomb, instead of Mark's promise of a future Galilean happening, Luke has a reference to a past event. All the appearances of the risen Jesus take place in or around Jerusalem. The theologically charged story of the journey to Emmaus is followed by the most materialistic of all the NT resurrection stories. What sets out to show that Jesus really is raised from the tomb becomes the setting for his farewell discourse, which justifies the events as those expected of the Messiah. It grounds in the Scriptures the universal mission that it enjoins. It sees its success as reason for believing in Jesus and as proof of the Spirit's presence in the community. Luke alone has a separate ascension event which both brings the resurrection appearances to a close and also accomplishes Jesus' glorification.

B. Luke's Narrative. 1. Whilst these distinctive episodes serve as a valuable tool in the quest for determining the nature of Luke's work and his purpose in writing, what can be learned from them has to be supplemented, and in part determined, by what the author himself says in his preface (see LK 1:1-4). This is unique in the gospels and in it Luke sets out his aims. His work is offered as an addition to an unspecified number of 'narratives' which have purported to give a basis for an adequate understanding of Jesus. His careful research into the traditions (probably both oral and written) that were available to him results in an 'orderly account' that deepens and maybe even corrects theirs at points. Just what claim he is making for his 'orderly account' is not clear. It is certainly one of providing a firm basis in hard events for the response of faith that Luke hopes to evoke. Luke believes his narrative to be grounded in real history.

2. The gospel's presentation of events, however, is not controlled by historical objectivity. Luke's story of the rejection at Nazareth owes its place at that point in the narrative less to a historical concern than to a desire to make it an introduction to the ministry as a whole. The details of Luke's crucifixion scene suggest that he wants to make it conform to what the gospel says about Jesus' stance during his life. The death sums up the life and reflects what happened in it. Resurrection appearances were all placed in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem because, in the events that happened there, the eschatological hopes of Israel were seen as actually being realized. The mission to the nations of the world had to reach out from there and start with the remaking of the Jewish people (Acts 2:1-13). Luke's desire to present an account of 'the things that have been fulfilled among us' could be achieved only by bathing the events themselves in a light that enabled their full reality, as the author understood it, to be seen. The 'order' of his account was determined less by a concern that asked 'What actually happened next?' than by a desire to unfold and justify the overall movement in Jesus' life that effected the achievement of his status. Luke's gospel becomes the step by step unfolding of his thesis that Jesus is both 'Lord and Christ' and that it is through him that God has fulfilled the promises of redemption that he had made to Israel and, through her, to the world.

3. The Graeco-Roman outlook to which the preface links its author, and the biblical mould in which he casts his work, come together to make his narrative the expression of a faith that itself determines not only the perspective from which the events are described, but also the way they are actually perceived to have happened. Luke's preface makes claims that are both more convoluted and at the same time more profound than one to historical exactitude.

C. The Question of Sources. 1. The gospel's preface speaks of its author's search for traditions and of his knowledge of other narratives with which he could compare his own. All these contributed in some way to the work, though commentators are by no means agreed upon either their number or the extent of their influence upon the gospel's final form. Conclusions reached are to a considerable extent determined by their advocate's study of the gospels as a whole and what this suggests about the freedom with which their authors handled the material at their disposal.

2. The majority view is that Mark is the primary source of Luke's work. The actual manner of its use, however, remains something of an open question. Many of Luke's episodes differ in varying degrees from their parallels in Mark. At what point the differences are such as to make the move from Mark to another source a distinct probability is a matter of fine judgement. Some commentators are so impressed by the unity of the final work that they will maximize Luke's creativity. Others, impressed by what they regard as foreign elements in the gospel (e.g. LK 1:67; 4:23; 11:49), see these as strong evidence for sources. If the latter look to Luke's preface for support, the former regard Luke's creativity as largely determined by his concern to write up his narrative in a biblical mould.

3. The position espoused by this commentary is that Luke most probably used Mark as his primary source and that, where they have parallel episodes, his are the result of a relatively free handling of what is found there. The use of supplementary sources to influence the final shape of Luke's episodes cannot be ruled out. So his reporting of Jesus' rejection at Nazareth is seen as determined by the basic pattern of Mark's episode. Its ending is written up as a commentary on Mark's scene which enables it to further the thrust of Luke's gospel. The speech expresses an understanding of Jesus which makes him the fulfilment of OT expectations and justifies his career on the basis of earlier OT prophetic activity. That Luke is here using a source to supplement Mark must be acknowledged as a possibility, but its function as the expression of ideas which are fundamental to Luke's narrative as a whole makes it more likely to have been the evangelist's own composition. The whole episode, shaped and in part created by him, is put at the beginning of the ministry to serve as its statement and the justification of its course as Luke describes it.

4. Apart from this material parallel to Mark, Luke has some 200 verses, mainly of Jesus' sayings, that, in varying degrees of closeness, are found also in Matthew. The majority of commentators assign this to a source, usually designated Q, which was used independently by the two evangelists (see FGS). Those who take this view tend to believe that Luke has introduced it into his gospel in a relatively unrevised form. That he handled what is accepted as a secondary source with such restraint, however, is unlikely if he used Mark, his primary source, freely. Some, impressed by this argument, therefore accept some form of the Proto-Luke hypothesis which, less favoured than it was, holds that the basis of Luke's work is not Mark but a blend of Q and some other sources into which he fitted a number of episodes which he took from Mark (Caird 1963). This, however, would seem to do less than justice to the unity of the final work. A minority of commentators, impressed by this unity, would actually doubt the existence of Q and would account for the material common to Luke and Matthew by suggesting that Luke knew that gospel and actually made use of it in the composition of his work (Goulder 1989). This suggestion would make Luke an extremely free handler of his sources and would emphasize his creativity to an extent that most interpreters of his gospel would be unwilling to allow.

5. Questions about Luke's sources must remain unresolved. Any serious student of his gospel will regard a synopsis as an indispensable tool, for comparison of his episodes with their parallel forms in Matthew and Mark allows the contours of Luke's stories to be clearly seen; understanding of his stance is helped. Firm conclusions based upon any particular theory of how the gospels are related must, however, be avoided. Though these may make for a sharpened approach, their hypothetical nature must be recognized. To build too much upon them is to construct an edifice upon shifting sand.

D. Luke the Evangelist. 1. Luke's preface suggests that the evangelist writes himself firmly into his narrative. Other gospels do not point to their authors in this way and, though perhaps each leaves a hint of his presence, search for the gospel's setting and the reasons for its production focus primarily upon the community with which it is related. Though some interpreters have approached our gospel in this way, reading it as something of a mirror-image of the community with which it is thought to be associated, the gospel itself does not obviously suggest this approach (though see Esler 1987). It must, of course, make contact with a community of some sort, but it is addressed to it and is the author's response to a situation which is perceived through his own eyes rather than through those of the community itself. Luke's is a personal offering and the address to a person, whatever that may mean (see LK 1:4), suggests that it is the person of the author which determines what is included and the stance which is adopted. His gospel has something of the character of an epistle.

2. The author does not give his name but, from the second century, our gospel has been attributed to Luke who, in Phil 24, is called Paul's 'fellow-worker' and in Col 4:14 is described as 'the beloved physician'. The author of the gospel also wrote Acts and the most obvious reading of his use of the first person plural at various points in the second half of that volume (16:10-17; 20:5-15; 21:1-18; 27:1-28:16) would seem to be that on these occasions he was a companion of Paul.

3. Recent years, however, have seen a widespread questioning of this relationship (Vielhauer 1968). The picture of Paul in Acts differs appreciably from what Paul says about himself. Not only is it hard to fit Acts' biographical details into what Paul maintains, but it suggests a different approach to some of the issues that were at the heart of Paul's beliefs. The author's obvious enthusiasm for Paul is not felt to be equalled by his understanding of him.

4. Luke's description of Paul in Acts has sometimes been defended on the grounds that the apostle's was not always such a rigorous position as his more polemical utterances suggest (Marshall 1980). It is hard, however, to resist the conclusion that it is an interpretation of Paul's own outlook (Wilson 1973). The question is whether it is an illegitimate interpretation or whether it represents a legitimate one by someone who knew Paul, who had learned from his deepest insights, but who did not fully share the implications Paul himself drew from these. He presents Paul as he himself had learned from him, and writes his gospel to reflect this understanding (Franklin 1994).

5. From Paul, Luke learned of God's wide outreach in Jesus, and he received from him his wonder at the gracious inclusion of Gentile outsiders within the people of God. Whereas

Paul, however, emphasized the newness of God's act in Christ and saw its otherness from his earlier dealings with both Jews and Gentiles, Luke saw it as continuous with his earlier and, indeed, his wider actions. Luke himself was almost certainly a Gentile and was most probably one of that group of Gentiles—the Godfearers—who, though greatly honouring the Jewish faith, shrank from circumcision and therefore remained excluded from the covenantal people of God. In Christ he found that inclusiveness which had previously been denied him, and it was this that determined his own picture of God's redemption in Jesus. A student of the Scriptures, he presented Jesus as the fulfilment of their promises.

6. Luke probably wrote his gospel around 80–5 CE, not far from the time Matthew produced his work. They responded to a common situation when the vast majority of the Jewish people had rejected the gospel and when its future seemed to lie with the Gentiles. Jewish refusal raised real problems for anyone who saw Jesus as the fulfilment of the promises contained in the Scriptures. These were probably compounded by the continuing hiddenness of Jesus and the indifference, issuing in occasional hostility, on the part of the Roman power. It was this situation, and probably also some local tensions which are now beyond our ability to describe, that caused Luke to put pen to paper. But his gospel transcends these immediate issues to present to his fellow-Christians a proclamation of God's strange work in Jesus which is set to raise their sights and justify a faith in him as both Christ and Lord (Maddox 1982).

7. Tradition associates Luke with Antioch, and Acts at any rate could suggest connections with that city. He might have written there under the patronage of Theophilus who could as a private person have been impressed by him and have commissioned his work. On the other hand, he could have written, perhaps to that city, from Rome. Luke's work is best understood as written from faith to faith. Directed in the first place at those who were already Christians, it addressed outsiders only indirectly. It set out to give his fellow-Christians a firm foundation for the hope that was in them.

E. Luke's Story. 1. Luke's presentation of the redemptive work of God accomplished through Jesus is controlled by his understanding of its gracious outreach and wide embrace. Jesus' work is one of redemption, of release, of the overthrow of all that holds people in the clutches of powers that restrict the fullness of life that God wills for them (4:18–21; 1:68–79; 6:20–3; 8:26–39; 13:10–17). His God is above all merciful (6:36), reaching out to people in an acceptance that is creative (7:36–50; 19:1–10). The initiative of grace itself creates a response which can, though it is not guaranteed, issue in repentance (15:1–32) and a newness of life that is born out of the disclosure that God's outreach makes possible (8:42–8; 17:11–19; 23:39–43). The Jesus of Luke's gospel is presented as having a special concern for those who are on the fringes of society and of religious respectability. Jesus is said to have made a habit of eating and drinking with tax-collectors and sinners (5:29–32; 7:34; 15:1–2; 19:1–10). Women have an important role. They accompany Jesus and his disciples on the way and provide for them out of their means (8:1–3). They are representative disciples (10:38–42). They are present at the cross, watch at the burial, and are the first believers in the resurrection, for, in contrast to the unbelief of the men, they accept the witness of the two angelic messengers at the tomb (24:1–12). Luke's is the only one of the Synoptic Gospels to mention Samaritans and to present them in a favourable light (10:25–37; 17:11–19). The poor are blessed and, though Luke uses the term as a designation for the disciples as a whole, the sociologically poor are the special objects of God's redemption (1:46–55; 4:18–19; 6:20–1). Their situation demands God's concern and is seen as making them potentially responsive to his outreach. Conversely, riches are for Luke a burden for they encourage an attitude of self-sufficiency, self-satisfaction, and manipulation of others (16:1–8, 19–31). Mammon is tainted (12:13–34; 16:9–15), its possession is a hindrance to a response to God's call. On the other hand, the rich man, though he resists Jesus' command to follow, is not simply dismissed (18:18–27). The tax-collectors must use their money in the service of others; it is not said that they have to become paupers (5:27–32). Discipleship, however, is not easy. Disciples are to take up their cross daily, to be alert, to be open to the demands of the hour, and to use their gifts in the service of their Lord (9:23–7; 12:35–59; 16:1–9; 17:20–18:8; 19:11–27).

2. Luke's understanding of God's redemption as bringing a reversal of fortunes means that the rich, the religiously secure, the proud, and the exclusive will face judgement (1:46–55; 6:24–6; 18:9–14). All these groups are essentially satisfied with where they are, and so remain closed to the opportunities and challenges that Christ brings. They are not open to his radical message of the grace and outreach of God. This is especially true of the leaders of the Jewish people whose rejection of Jesus was for Luke the ultimate tragedy (20:41–4). He can present Jesus as harsh towards the Pharisees (11:37–54) and in his parables Jesus is highly critical of them and of the religious system of which they are a part (10:25–37; 15:1–32; 18:9–14). Yet he remains in dialogue with them and explains their perversity and that of the Jewish nation at large (4:16–30; 14:15–24). His crucifixion is brought about by the religious/political leaders of Jerusalem with little support from them. Yet the rejection of Jesus by the Jews forwards the purposes of God and results in a wider mission (24:46–9). Caught up in God's plans for the world, it can even be seen to have a positive function. In spite of the critical situation, the Jewish nation is not finally rejected by God, and Gentiles have not taken over the place of the Jews in his covenantal people (4:16–30; 13:34–5; 21:14; 23:34; 24:47). The promises of the infancy narratives will not be brought to nothing, for the inclusion of the Gentiles will ultimately rebound to the 'glory of Israel' (2:32, 38).

3. For Jesus stands as the climax of God's redemptive work in Israel. He is the culmination of her servants of God, one with them and the fulfilment of their hopes. Luke pictures him in terms of the OT categories, as eschatological prophet, Messiah, at one with Moses, Elijah, the Servant of Deutero-Isaiah, and John. Like them, he is Spirit-endowed (1:26–38) though, being more than them, is wholly possessed by the Spirit. Jesus is the agent of God, the climax of the old order of servants but, by reason of his complete obedience, exalted by way of death to be at God's right hand and to exercise that Lordship to which the psalmist pointed (20:39–44; Acts 2:32–6). The kingdom of God is now a reality in heaven, and the community on earth lives out of its power (11:1–13) and in the hope of its future revelation (21:29–30). Luke does not expect that revelation to be long delayed. (For a development of these themes, see Franklin 1975.)

COMMENTARY

Preface (1:1–4)

This highly-stylized sentence places Luke's writings firmly in the Graeco-Roman world. Just what genre it suggests, however, is not easily determined. Biographies did not often have prefaces and those of historical writings were usually much longer. It has been suggested (Alexander 1993) that it is like those that introduced semi-popular scientific and technical treatises and which were largely designed to hand on the traditions of their particular disciplines. Others ('many' may be for stylistic effect) have written 'narratives', that is purposefully ordered accounts, and Luke joins his own to theirs, not without a hint that he is offering an improvement. The subject of these narratives is 'the events that have been fulfilled among us'. They are not disinterested accounts but their contents are viewed as the outcome of God's purposes and, probably, as the fulfilment of earlier expectations. The sources for these narratives were 'eyewitnesses and servants of the word', most probably a single group who handed down their witness in the service of the gospel. Luke is not claiming to have been their contemporary: his own 'orderly account' rests rather on careful research.

Theophilus ('lover of God') to whom Luke addresses his work is most likely to have been a real person of some standing and may have been Luke's literary patron. It has sometimes been suggested that he was a Roman official, that he was not a Christian, and that Luke was writing to make a case for Christianity and its political innocuousness. If so, the 'instruction' he had received was false, or at least biased, and Luke was seeking to give him the true picture. Luke–Acts as a whole, however, does not suggest that it was written for non-Christians: it contains too much Christian reflection for that and its stories of the trials of Jesus and Paul express little confidence in Roman justice. Theophilus is more likely to have been one who was knowledgeable about the Christian faith (Acts 18:25) and who was in fact already a Christian. In giving him 'the truth', Luke was seeking to offer him a firm foundation for his beliefs, to confirm them, and perhaps even to strengthen them when they were undergoing some trials. Luke's work is, of course, meant for public consumption and, through Theophilus, he is addressing every reader.

Infancy Narratives (1:5–2:52)

The narratives of the infancy stand in some tension with those of the rest of the gospel. Jesus is accorded a dignity otherwise not bestowed on him before the ascension, the Spirit is active in people in a way which in the narrative proper does not happen until after Pentecost, and Jesus and John are brought together in the closest possible manner which seems to belie their sharp separation later. These differences led possibly the greatest interpreter of Lucan theology of the twentieth century to leave them out from his exposition (Conzelmann 1960). This was undoubtedly a mistake though it remains likely that they were added at the conclusion, if not of the two volumes, then at least of the gospel. They are best understood as the prologue to Luke's whole work, summing up its message, proclaiming it, and giving it a firm basis in Israel's story. To pass from Luke's preface to his infancy narratives is to move into another world. The tight, carefully constructed sentence is followed by a piece where the expansive craft of the storyteller is supreme. Graeco-Roman literary sophistication gives place to a biblical style that makes a fitting vehicle for episodes that in their outlook and atmosphere are one with some of the most characteristic of the OT accounts of God's approach to humankind. They are a pastiche of OT words, sentences, images, and ideas and are formed by a conscious imitation of incidents taken from various parts of Israel's story. The coming of Jesus into the world is the fulfilment of—and of one kind with—that which was begun in God's earlier activity. The narratives exude the spirit of joy, of wonder, and of worship—though also of a certain puzzlement. God's final redemptive work has been brought about through the life, death, and resurrection of the child whose birth these stories celebrate. That is the faith they express.

(1:5–25) The Annunciation to Zechariah The infancy narratives begin in the temple with the promise of the wondrous birth of John the Baptist who was in Luke's eyes the last and greatest of the Hebrew prophets and the immediate herald of the Messiah. His parents are both of priestly stock and represent all that is good in the temple and its piety. Following all the commands of the moral and ritual law, they were 'righteous before God', accepted and acknowledged by him. Law, temple, and prophecy together were to produce John who, while yet in the womb, would acknowledge his Lord and witness to him (1:44). Zechariah was a member of one of the twenty-four orders of priests who twice a year for a week officiated at the temple services. On this occasion he was within the sanctuary itself where the altar of incense stood immediately before the holy of holies. At this holy place, the angel of God appeared to announce a new climactic stage in God's redeeming work. The main emphasis is upon the task assigned to John. OT tradition looked for Elijah to return to restore a people within Israel who would be acceptable to God when he came to establish his righteousness among them (Mal 4:5–6; Sir 48:10). John, having been made a nazirite (Num 6:3) from the womb to show his permanent dedication to God, will do this 'in the spirit and power of Elijah'. Both Matthew and Mark picture John as Elijah returned (Mt 7:12; Mk 1:6). Luke actually avoids saying this. John, as Elisha before him (2 Kings 2:15) would be like Elijah rather than a new Elijah. This is probably because Luke saw Jesus himself in terms of Elijah and did not wish the Elijah typology to be exhausted in John (4:25; 7:15; 9:57–62).

Agents of God in the OT were often said to have been empowered by the Spirit in order to do their work (Judg 6:34; 1 Sam 11:6; Isa 61:1). As the climax of God's agents in Israel, John would be 'filled with the Holy Spirit from the womb'. His was no temporary commission; it was a full endowment to be exceeded only by that of Jesus who would actually be conceived by the Spirit. Yet Zechariah demurs. Even for a faithful servant of the covenant, going forward into its climax in Jesus is not easy and he had to receive a demonstration of its truth which was at the same time a judgement on his lack of trust. Elizabeth conceives but remains hidden for five months, rejoicing alone at the sign of God's favour. The note of time binds her part into that of Mary and means that when Mary comes to visit her, the babe is formed enough to acknowledge the one who is carrying his Lord.

(1:26–38) The Annunciation to Mary By placing it 'in the sixth month' Luke binds the annunciation to Mary into that to Zechariah. The parallelism of the two accounts serves not only to join the events together, as part of God's final coming to his people, but also to put the climax on that to Mary for which the angel's visit to Zechariah is but a prelude. The fulfilment of its promise guarantees that those to Mary will not fail. The annunciation scene to Mary outstrips that to Zechariah in the wonder of the birth, the status of the child, the nature of his work, and the response of the one addressed.

Luke is emphatic that Mary, though betrothed to Joseph, was a virgin. Betrothal meant the entering into the legal contract of marriage though consummation did not normally occur until the time when, probably around a year later, the bride left her father's house to join her husband's. The angel's greeting, 'Rejoice', may have overtones of Zeph 3:14–17 and Zech 9:9 where God announces redemption to Jerusalem and her people. Mary is 'the favoured one' in that her life has revealed a response to God that suggests that she will respond faithfully to his further approach to her. She will conceive and bear a son whom she must name 'Jesus' ('the Lord saves').

The declaration of Jesus' status is unfolded in two stages. Gabriel's initial announcement is made in terms of a reading of the OT account of God's promises to David (2 Sam 7:11–16; Ps 132:11–18). Though these passages said that the promise was to be fulfilled in an ongoing line rather than in a single person, the Psalms tended to apply it to an individual king (Ps 2:7; 110:4) and these were later read as referring to a messianic figure. Jesus is to be the recipient of the promises for he will inherit David's throne, will reign over Israel ('the house of Jacob') for ever, 'and of his kingdom there will be no end'. This last part of the promise suggests a rule wider than over Israel alone. 'Son of the Most High', though found in the Graeco-Roman world, reflects biblical usage where God is addressed as 'Lord of Hosts' (Isa 6:3). Luke uses it more than any other NT writer (1:35, 76; 6:35; Acts 7:48). 'Son of God' could be applied to angels (Job 1:6), to the Davidic king (Ps 2:7), to the individual faithful Israelite (Wis 2:12–18), and, later, to a messianic figure (Dead Sea scrolls). It meant that the one addressed was thought of as having a special relationship with God. Just what the nature of that relationship was, however, it did not specify.

Mary demurs, not like Zechariah demanding some sign to back up the promise, but rather questioning its possibility. This enables a further declaration of Jesus' status which actually strengthens Gabriel's initial statement. God will be wholly operative in Jesus' conception. Whereas earlier agents of God's activity had been possessed by the Spirit to perform a particular task and John had been filled by the Holy Spirit from the womb, Jesus, whose status far exceeded that of John's, was actually to be conceived through the Spirit. His whole creation, his very being, was itself the work of the Spirit. For Luke, the Spirit is essentially the agent and sign of God's eschatological redemptive activity (Acts 2:17–21, 10:44). Jesus, as the one to realize that, is wholly one with the Spirit. The Spirit is associated with God's power (Acts 1:8) which is here said to 'overshadow' Mary.

This total endowment with the Spirit marks Jesus as unique. He is 'holy', that is embraced within God's outreach and reflecting him (Lev 19:2), and 'Son of God'. Though 'Son of God' means the same as 'Son of the Most High', its climactic place here in Gabriel's message suggests that it pushes out beyond the boundaries of the OT imagery. Luke appears to see Son of God as more than a messianic title and endows it with something like Paul's declaration in Rom 1:4 (22:70; Acts 9:20).

In this passage, Luke uses the narrative to present a careful declaration of the nature of Jesus and his work. At the same time, through his presentation of Mary and the relation this has to that of Zechariah in the previous episode, he is able to show the ideal response of the faithful in Israel and to give some picture of discipleship.

Luke insists that Mary is a virgin, and it is this belief that enables the narrative to move to a climax. The declaration of Jesus' sonship does not, however, rest upon that but depends rather upon his total possession of the Spirit which unites him to God. The virginal conception witnesses to his possession of the Spirit rather than being the cause of it. Though Luke's narrative expresses a firm belief in the virginal conception, it is unlikely to present the basis in history for that belief. To focus a young betrothed girl's consternation on child-bearing rather than upon the wondrous nature of the child she is called upon to bear suggests literary and theological concerns rather than strictly historical ones.

Justification of Mary's response on the grounds either that she mistook the announcement for one of an immediate conception or that she had already entered upon a vow of virginity is to import external considerations into the story (Brown 1977). Rather, in it we have Luke's response to the tradition that he shared with Matthew. Luke gives us little help in assessing the historical basis for the tradition. What he has done is, in the light of the traditions he received and of his belief in the OT's witness to Christ, to present in narrative form his proclamation of the significance of Jesus and to see it summed up in his birth.

(1:39–56) Mary Visits Elizabeth Luke binds the lives of John and Jesus together in this episode which enables the child in Elizabeth's womb to acknowledge the status of the one in Mary's, allows Elizabeth to greet Mary, and makes a setting for Mary's song. Mary remains the ideal disciple even as she is acknowledged as 'the mother of my Lord'. 'Lord' is Luke's most characteristic title for Jesus and his favourite address to him. Breaking out of the nationalistic overtones of Messiah ('Christ') it points to the universality of Jesus' sway (Acts 10:36). Since God is also called 'Lord' (2:45, 46), it points to Jesus' close relationship to him though, because its main influence in Luke's usage is provided by Ps 110:1 (Acts 2:34), it retains that subordination and instrumentality that is so characteristic of Luke's Christology.

Luke brings the episode to its climax with the song of Mary. This has much in common with that of Zechariah which follows closely upon it and a number of commentators would see both (together, perhaps, with that of Simeon in 2:29–32) as incorporated by Luke from some source. It is pointed out that they sit only loosely to their contexts, that this is emphasized by a few MSS attributing Mary's song to Elizabeth, that they are not wholly appropriate for their respective singers, and that they are not particularly closely related either to Luke's theology or his vocabulary. However, though full value must be given to these opinions, it remains more likely that Luke himself was responsible for them. They are in fact an appropriate expression of Luke's outlook. Mary's song is strongly influenced by that of Hannah in 1 Sam 2:1–10 which, celebrating the birth of the young Samuel, sees the wonder of God's action in this event as an illustration of the nature of his whole work for his people. Hannah's piety makes her a fitting forerunner of Mary, and Samuel's role as prophet and leader under God in Israel makes his work a type of that of Jesus. In choosing Mary as the mother of his son, God has rewarded her 'lowliness' and lifted her high. His dealings with her become a paradigm of the redemption that he effects through Jesus. The militaristic imagery of vv. 49, 51, and 52 is taken over from Hannah's song and is used by Luke, either of God or of Jesus in 24:19; Acts 13:17; 19:20. It is not out of place in a psalm-like canticle that celebrates God's powerful act of redemption through Jesus in biblical terms. The theme of reversal, taken over here from 1 Samuel, is particularly amenable to Luke who has already, in his two annunciation narratives, focused God's work in Jesus upon his approach to those who, out of a piety which looks to God for fulfilment and hope, are open to receive his redemption. As in the Lukan form of the Beatitudes (see 1K 6:20–6) this redemption is centred upon the sociologically marginalized for, in accordance with the biblical tradition (Ps 34:6; 72:12), it is they who are thought likely to exhibit this outlook. The reverse side of the coin is that those who are 'proud', 'powerful', and 'rich', and who therefore maintain and exploit their self-sufficiency, are unlikely to be open to God's future. In Jesus, that self-sufficiency has been shown to be foolish and blameworthy (12:13–21; 16:19–31). Luke knows that it is those who are dissatisfied with the present who have responded to the gospel whilst those who have felt already fulfilled have missed out on its challenge and therefore on its redemption.

The use of the past tense in the hymn's proclamation of redemption has sometimes been felt inappropriate at this point in the story and so has been seen as evidence for Luke's having taken the hymn from a source. This, however, is to forget the function of the infancy narratives as the prologue rather than the first chapter of Luke's story. They sum up the whole event of Jesus and look at its beginnings in terms of its end. Mary's song is less one that would have been appropriate for her at that point in time than a hymn of praise which, through her, expresses the response of the ideal Israelite who had become a Christian disciple to God's whole work in Jesus.

(1:59–80) The Naming of John The circumcision of Jewish male children on the eighth day marked their incorporation into the people of God (Gen 17:11–12; Lev 12:3). It is not clear that naming necessarily occurred at the same time. Though Luke records a similar pattern of events for Jesus, he is not wholly reliable in his information about Jewish customs as they were practised in Israel itself. The story further emphasizes Luke's interest in the fulfilment of prophecy and adds to the wonders surrounding the child. In challenging what Luke regards as the usual practice about names, it points to the new demands of Jesus; there is not an easy progression from the old to the new. The publicity surrounding John contrasts with the total obscurity that marked Jesus' birth. John will later question Jesus and will wonder whether his ministry measures up to what he expected of the figure for whom his own ministry was a preparation (7:19). In the light of these later events, Zechariah's witness in his song takes on an added significance.

Zechariah's song is essentially a witness to God's action in his Messiah, and the preparatory role of John is emphasized. Like the song of Mary, it comments upon the scene in which it is set only to transcend it and to view the actions of which it is a part in the light of the whole event of Jesus on which Luke looks back. It serves to sum up the significance of Jesus within the setting of God's actions in Israel. vv. 68–75 proclaim these as the fulfilment of God's promises to Israel. Through Jesus and the events surrounding him, God comes to establish his presence with his people and to confirm his covenantal promises. He has 'visited and redeemed his people' and has raised up a 'horn of salvation'. 'Horn' is a symbol of strength. Ps 132:17 talks of a horn sprouting up for David, and the song sees this fulfilled in Jesus who is presented as the consummation of God's promises to Abraham, the ancestor of the whole Jewish people and the receiver of God's unconditional commitment to her. As 'prophet of the Most High' John becomes the preparer for him who is Son. He will 'go before the Lord' who here is really both God and Jesus. Through 'bringing forgiveness of their sins' to the people, he will prepare them to receive what is essentially God's redemption in Jesus who is 'the dawn from on high' who will bring 'light', 'life', and 'peace'. So, in the narrative proper, John will be pictured, both through his baptism and his firm religious and ethical teaching, as preparing the way for Jesus' proclamation of the visitation of God in himself and in redemption.

The proclamation of redemption completed, and the ground prepared for the birth of the saviour, John awaits his proper time and the spotlight now falls on Jesus alone.

(2:1–7) The Birth of Jesus As at the beginning of chs. 1 and 3, Luke is anxious to set the events of God's salvation through Jesus within the context of secular history. Though this has caused some to criticize him for reducing the eschatological dimension of Christianity and for making it into an event within world history (Conzelmann 1960), this relating of the gospel to the world in which it is acted out, and the more positive approach to that world which this displays, is a fundamental instinct that underlies Luke's understanding of Jesus and his work. Unfortunately, the effectiveness of his sortie into world history at this point does not measure up to his reasons for making it. Luke's notice of the census raises many virtually insurmountable problems. We have no evidence for an empire-wide census under Augustus and the likelihood of this including the land of a client king such as was Herod the Great is remote. Indeed, the census held when his son was deposed and Judea was incorporated into the Roman system was seen as such a novelty that it provoked a rebellion (Acts 5:37). Though there is some evidence from Roman sources in Egypt that participants were required to register in their own homes, this meant their present rather than their ancestral abodes. Herod died in 4 BCE and Quirinius was not governor of Syria until 6–7 CE. (See the balanced discussion of the evidence in Evans 1990.) Attempts to reconcile the differences have not met with widespread endorsement. A suggestion that Quirinius served an earlier term as an official in our area and that he was then involved in the census lacks real evidence. Perhaps the best attempt at harmonization is that which suggests that the Greek can be translated to read, 'This registration happened before Quirinius became governor of Syria' (Nolland 1989–93). It is not, however, a natural reading of the Greek and has about it something of the air of desperation (Fitzmyer 1981).

Luke, in contrast to Mt 2:21–3, has Nazareth as the home of Joseph and Mary. The census is used by him as the means of enabling Jesus to be born at Bethlehem where the tradition on which he bases his proclamation places the birth. That, however, does not exhaust the significance he sees in it. The census is of 'all the world'. Jesus is born at the time when all the world is on the move at the behest of one who, given a divine name, allowed himself to be addressed as Son of God and was regarded as having brought security to the world. Jesus, rather than the Roman power, however, is the real means of salvation from external oppression and the guarantee of unity to mankind. The timing of Jesus' birth proclaims his universal significance. The Roman power which, by the time Luke wrote, was uncomprehending of Christianity, often suspicious, sometimes hostile, and always threatening, unwittingly enabled Jesus to be born in Bethlehem, the place of David. The final power belonged, not to it, but to God.

Jesus' birth was nevertheless hidden, ignored by the world in its quest for security. Jesus, cared for by his mother, is placed in a 'manger', which could be either a feeding trough or a cattle stall, because 'there was no room in the inn'. Luke uses the same word at 22:11 for the 'guest chamber' where the company is to eat the last supper. Jer 14:8 (LXX) uses the word when it laments that God is a stranger, like one who stays in a guest chamber for but a night. For Jesus, there is not room even in the guest-place; his birth points forward to the life of one who has nowhere to lay his head (9:58). No doubt the scene is infused with ideas taken from Isa 1:3.

(2:8–21) The Shepherds At the heart of Luke's understanding of the redemption wrought by Jesus was his knowledge that in him the excluded had been included; the outsider had been brought within the people of God. His story will tell of the inclusion of tax-collectors and sinners, of women, of the poor, of the marginalized, and, ultimately, of the Gentiles. So it is right that his infancy narrative should tell of the message of angels to shepherds and that it should be they, rather than the Gentile sages of Matthew's gospel, who should visit the infant Jesus. David was called to Bethlehem from minding the sheep in order to receive anointing at the hands of Samuel (1 Sam 16:11), and later tradition emphasized the graciousness of the action (2 Sam 7:8). After the Exile, the shepherd's task became devalued and, outside the biblical period, was despised. Luke's story does not reflect that belittling, but it does picture them as outsiders, apart from the general ordering of society that was taking place at the time of the census. It is to them that the announcement of Jesus' birth is made.

Jesus is revealed as 'Saviour', 'Messiah', and 'Lord', three terms that sum up what the infancy narratives have said about Jesus and what the gospel as a whole will unfold and justify. The OT spoke frequently of God himself as saviour of his people, the one who would rescue them from their enemies and restore them to a relationship with himself (Ps 106:21; Isa 43:3; 60:16). Occasionally it spoke of his giving a saviour to his people (Judg 3:9; 6:14; 2 Kings 13:5). Jesus now brings the salvation of God himself (1:69). For Luke, it is all-important that Jesus is the Messiah of Israel and that he fulfils OT expectations of him (24:26, 45). 'Lord' is his most characteristic term for Jesus, which sums up his exalted status, his universality, and the devotion he receives from his followers. Proclaimed at the birth, these three terms express the Christian response to Jesus which his career and exaltation will evoke (Acts 2:36; 13:23). The song of the angels recalls that of Isaiah in the temple (Isa 6:3) though now it is Jesus rather than the temple that realizes God's glory and enables it to be reflected on earth. As people on earth receive his 'good pleasure', they share in a 'peace' which, much more than an absence of strife, is a wholeness of person and unity with others. (This represents the reading of the majority of the Gk. MSS. Some have 'peace, goodwill among people'. This reading however destroys the parallelism of the song and tends to make 'goodwill' a human response rather than one derived from a relationship with God. The whole outlook of the infancy narratives centres upon God's outreach to his people and the new possibilities he brings them.)

v. 19 (cf. v. 51) has sometimes been used to support the view that these parts of the infancy narratives rest upon reminiscences of Mary. There is in fact little to support this for we have seen that the annunciation story is shaped by literary rather than strictly historical influences. Mary is vitally important for Luke for she represents the ideal Israelite who becomes a disciple. Mary treasures the shepherd's witness and 'pondered it in her heart'. This last expression has sometimes been interpreted as coming to a right understanding of its significance. More likely, however, in Luke's narrative it retains the idea of puzzlement. Here and in the episode in the temple, Mary has not yet come to a complete understanding of the significance of Jesus. Her greatness was to accept in obedience of faith the divine call, the full implications of which she had yet to enter into.

(2:22–40) Jesus Presented in the Temple This episode allows Jesus to be seen as acknowledging the Jewish religious tradition which was focused in the temple and which ultimately made possible God's final redemption in him. It also enables the temple to make its witness to him. Once more, Luke's purpose in recounting the story controls the way in which he tells it. Here, it has resulted in a slight confusion about the Jewish practices it describes. Three ceremonies are included, those of the purification of the mother, the redemption of the firstborn, and the presentation of a child to the service of God. 'Their purification' is a misnomer, for the ceremony involved the mother alone. After forty days the mother of a male child offered sacrifice as an act of cleansing. Mary makes the offering of the poor (Lev 12:6–8). The redemption of the firstborn is a separate ritual (Ex 13:2, 12–13) though there is nothing to suggest that it could not have happened in the temple and at the same time. Five shekels were paid to the priest. The third element is that of the dedication of the child to God. This was closely related to the redemption of the firstborn, though Luke gives it an emphasis which is no doubt determined both by his understanding of Jesus' significance and by the account of the dedication of Samuel (1 Sam 1:21–8) whose mother's song has already been used as a pattern for Mary's.

It is in the temple that Simeon, who is presented not merely as the ideal observer of the Jewish covenantal obligations, but also as one who is led by them to look for God's further action, comes and acknowledges Jesus as Christ. In the final song of the infancy narratives he makes what for Luke's gospel is the climactic declaration of the wide embrace of the redemption to be worked through Jesus. In words that reflect the Servant Song of Isaiah 49:5–6, Jesus is proclaimed as having a significance for 'all peoples'. He is a 'light' to reveal God to the nations. God's glory which is to be made known to them is to be seen in the child he holds in his arms whose birth in a manger causes the expectations of the earlier songs to be realized in an unexpected way. The salvation of God is to be achieved, not through naked power, but in the surrender of his Son. That salvation will make for the 'glory' of Israel. Her glory will be real but it will come about only as her expectations are confronted and re-formed. Jesus will cause the 'falling and rising of many in Israel' as he challenges their security and questions their confidence. Many will oppose him, but that will reveal the limited nature of their response to the God who has made them his people. Even Mary, the true Israelite, will be pierced by the sword, not only of suffering, but also of judgement as she herself is called to move into a deeper understanding of the implications of Jesus. To be real, the grounds of the confidence expressed in her song have to be reviewed in the light of the babe who confirms it and makes it possible. Finally, Anna makes her witness to 'all those who were looking for the redemption of Jerusalem'. Jesus is the one through whom it will be accomplished, though again not in the manner that they will be expecting. Jerusalem will reject him and will instead follow a way that will lead to disaster (19:41–4). They will seem forsaken by God, but Anna is a reminder that the disaster is not God's last word: Jesus remains for Jerusalem a sign of hope.

(2:41–52) Jesus at Age 12 The last episode in the infancy narratives stands rather apart from the rest and forms something of an anticlimax. It fits Luke's intention to write a narrative, however, and seems to be influenced by the episode of the child Samuel, which also forms a bridge between his dedication and the ministry he is to exercise (1 Sam 3:1–14). It has the character of a legend but is used by Luke to point to Jesus' natural authority and home in the temple, a point that he makes in his account of Jesus' final visit to Jerusalem

(19:45–6). Though the teachers in the temple were 'amazed at his understanding and his answers', their wonder has the potential to turn into hostility. For his parents, too, it represents a learning situation. Jesus rebukes them, though the significance of the rebuke is not entirely clear. NRSV margin suggests the most literal meaning, 'Did you not know that I must be about the things of my Father?' 'In the things of' can mean 'in the house of'. Either way, it represents a challenge to acknowledge him for what he is—son of 'my Father'—and to accept that he is not bound to them or bounded by their expectations. Faithful Israelites are challenged by Jesus to raise their sights and to acknowledge that he cannot be constrained by their own preconceived understandings. He must be allowed to transcend these and move out to the Gentiles. Luke is perhaps here thinking of the conflicts in the early church which had difficulty in coming to terms with the Gentile mission. Like Mary and Joseph, the Jewish-Christian community had to learn not to constrict the freedom of the outreach which God's action in Jesus demanded. This freedom did not, however, mean a lessening of ties with the Jewish people. Jesus lived with his parents at Nazareth 'and was obedient to them'.

Jesus in Galilee (3:1–9:50)

In this section of the gospel Luke's narrative takes on a shape and outlook which, in spite of its distinctive aspects, are closely aligned to those of Matthew and Mark. Luke shares with them a common understanding of Jesus' time in Galilee. After his baptism by John and the Baptist's forced removal from the scene, he begins a ministry that proclaims the advent of the kingdom of God and reveals this in exorcisms and miracles. His understanding of this new approach of God to Israel brings him into conflict with religious leaders, though crowds follow him; in the main, however, without having a real understanding of him. He gathers a band of disciples and out of them chooses twelve apostles. These come to appreciate his messianic role without as yet, however, perceiving that it is focused upon a way of suffering that is to climax in a cross.

(3:1–20) The Ministry of John the Baptist Once again, Luke sets God's saving work within the context of world history. Though its details are not easily unravelled, its general impact is clear—Jesus' ministry was a real event which brought God's redemption into both the Jewish and the wider world. 'The fifteenth year of... Tiberius' would be 28–29 CE. Pontius Pilate was governor of Judea 26–36 CE, being in the succession of Roman prefects who were appointed to rule Judea after Archelaus was deposed in 6 CE. Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great, ruled Galilee until 39 CE. 'His brother Philip' was tetrarch (ruler of one of the four parts into which Herod the Great's kingdom had been divided) of the region to the north and east of Galilee into which Jesus made an occasional sortie. Abilene was an area near Damascus. It does not serve as a setting for any part of the gospel story. 'The high-priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas' is more difficult. Joint office was not permitted. Annas was high priest from 6 CE until he was deposed by the Romans, 15 CE. Caiaphas was in office 18–36 CE. Annas appears only in the Lukan and Johannine writings (Acts 4:18; Jn 18:24).

This historical reference firmly includes John within the action of God to which its sonorous tones point. 'The word of God came to John' uses recognized biblical language to enhance its affect (1 Kings 16:1; 18:1). As far as Luke is concerned, the adult John has as important a part to play as the infancy narratives have already suggested. John proclaims and administers a 'baptism of repentance which issues in the forgiveness of sins'. John himself points to the difference between the effects of his baptism and those brought about through the 'one more powerful than I'. Nevertheless, though Luke is quite clear that his has a preparatory role, the importance of that preparation could hardly be greater. Luke alone of the evangelists includes an account of John's ethical teaching. The crowds who come for baptism are to 'bear fruits worthy of repentance' and specific teaching is given to a number of particular groups. Seemingly rather haphazard in their selection, they nevertheless reflect important ethical requirements of groups of people who were particularly open to exploiting their fellow human beings. Those well provided for are to share their resources, tax-collectors are not to abuse their legitimate authority, soldiers are not to exploit their powers. Contentment with their wages means that the land in which they serve will not be further denuded of its produce for their benefit. John is here made to share that strong social concern which is so evident in Luke's gospel. His further importance is that, by putting forward these demands, he gives a place to ethical obligations which might seem to be overlooked in the free acceptance by Jesus of those whose lives are not always put under scrutiny. John here really acts as a forerunner for Jesus and becomes an important part of God's action in him. He fulfils Zechariah's expectation that he would 'turn the hearts of the disobedient to the wisdom of the righteous, to make ready a people prepared for the Lord' (1:17).

(3:21–4:13) The Baptism and Temptation of Jesus Luke's mention—for it cannot be called an account—of Jesus' baptism is surprising and parts company with those of Matthew and Mark whilst sharing some similarity with John (which is also a mention rather than an account). The story of Jesus' having undergone a 'baptism of repentance with a view to remission of sins' obviously caused some embarrassment to the early church (see MT 3:14–15). Yet Luke's reason for his surprising treatment of the story goes deeper than embarrassment for he does not attempt to deny the fact. Jesus is baptised 'when all the people were baptised'. 'The people' is a loaded term for Luke and is used as shorthand for 'God's true people'. Those who underwent John's baptism are identified as God's own people awaiting his redemption; they have been marked out as his. Jesus identifies himself with them: he unites himself to them so that he can incorporate them into the age of the Spirit.

Conzelmann (1960) saw Luke's handling of the baptism as evidence that he was separating out John and Jesus, identifying John with the age of Israel that was now passing away as Jesus brought a new period of God's action into being. Such an explanation, however, ignores not only the infancy narratives but also Luke's account of John's own ministry. John and Jesus are brought together in the closest possible way and as two players, though in no way equal in God's final act of redemption. The reason for this separation of John and Jesus at this point is rather to serve Luke's Christology. As he does so often, Luke sets significant points of Jesus' career within the context of his prayer. After he is baptized, Jesus prays in an act of surrender and dedication to what his baptism has signified. It is his response to what he has recognized as God's call. The descent of the Spirit and the divine voice of approval come in response to his response. Luke's Christology is one which, emphasizing the divine initiative, points to Jesus' response which is then sealed with God's approval. What is set in motion now will climax in the death and resurrection (Acts 13:34). So the Holy Spirit descends upon him 'in bodily form', that is fully, actively and powerfully. The symbolism of the dove 'remains baffling' (Evans 1955). Most probably it is connected with Gen 1 where the Spirit of God broods over the waters and Gen 8:11 where the dove becomes the harbinger of the covenant God makes with Noah. But these may be guesses born of exasperation. The voice from heaven bestows the divine approval of the course he has entered upon. It probably reflects ideas of Ps 2:7, Isa 42:1–4, and, perhaps, Gen 22:2, 16. A number of MSS of Luke have instead the whole of Ps 2:7. Though the genealogy which follows and which traces Jesus back to Adam may suggest the appropriateness of this reading, Luke elsewhere quotes Ps 2:7 in relation to the resurrection of Jesus (Acts 13:33). It is therefore likely that he himself did not use it of the baptism. Nolland (1989–93) notes that 1:35 would make its idea of a begetting or adoption into sonship inappropriate for this point in time.

It is at this point that Luke includes the genealogy which, in view of the biblical attitude to genealogies and its differences from Matthew's, was designed to be of theological rather than factual significance. Matthew's three groups of fourteen generations is obviously meant to point to a climax in Jesus (Mt 1:17). Luke's does so less obviously. Seventy-seven generations represent eleven weeks, one week short of the twelve which marks finality. Of more significance is the way Luke traces the genealogy back from Jesus via David and Abraham to Adam who is, somewhat surprisingly, designated 'son of God'. Jesus is effecting something for David—the restoration of the people of Israel; for Abraham—the fulfilment of God's promise to him of a wider salvation (Gen 12:3); and for Adam—the restoration of universal sonship which was lost at the Fall. Luke here pictures Jesus as the Second Adam, the restorer of the human race, the means of re-establishing the relationship with God that Adam lost, and the remover of the shackles that had afflicted creation since then (1 Cor 15:20–5; Phil 2:5–11).

Matthew and Mark both have stories of the testing of Jesus by the devil, Mark picturing something of a battle between them, and Matthew telling of a testing of Jesus' Sonship. Luke is closer to Matthew though, like Mark, he has a testing that extends over forty days. The earlier voice from heaven had approved of Jesus' response to his baptism and had proclaimed his Sonship. Now, however, he has that initial response tested. He must make a determined entry upon a way that will really establish his Sonship and enable the restoration of the image of God in people which Adam's disobedience had lost. Our usual understanding of the event is made by following the order of temptations found in Matthew. Luke's account, however, has a different order and climaxes in one to jump down from the pinnacle of the temple. The three temptations tempt Jesus to leave the way of the servant on which he has determined, and which the divine voice has approved, and to assert his Sonship in a different way. That to command a stone to become a loaf of bread is to assert his authority and make use of his status, that to worship the devil is to follow the way of the world and exercise his power, that to jump off the temple's pinnacle is to force God's hand, to leave the way of service and humble obedience and go instead for a dramatic demonstration that would compel recognition of his status. All three temptations would have meant his following in the way of Adam for they would all have involved an exercise in self-assertion. The climax for Luke was that to jump from the temple. It was the complete contrast to the course of action which God's call placed upon him—a way of humble obedience and service leading to a cross which was the necessary prelude to exaltation. The third temptation points to the end of Luke's gospel and its account of Jesus' exaltation which installed him in the Sonship which was his. To have succumbed to the third temptation would have destroyed his Sonship; victory over it set him off on the way that established it. Matthew and Mark both record how angels came to minister to Jesus after his defeat of Satan. Luke does not, for the victory is only beginning to be won. He tells how the devil departs from him 'until an opportune time'. That time will be Gethsemane.

(4:16–30) Rejection at Nazareth Luke's story of Jesus' ministry begins with his distinctive account of the rejection at Nazareth, which all commentators on his gospel agree plays a programmatic role for him (cf. Mt 13:53–8; Mk 6:1–6). The infancy narratives have already hinted at the divisions Jesus' ministry would cause in Israel and, by the time Luke wrote, the people of Israel as a whole had rejected not only Jesus, but also the proclamation of the gospel. The problem this caused for the early church is reflected in the NT as a whole but perhaps nowhere with more urgency than in Luke's writings. For him, that rejection was a tragedy but it raised the questions, not merely of why it happened, but also of the nature of God's response. Did the Jewish rejection of God's Son mean a rejection of them by God? Was it even determined by God and did it come about as a result of God's decision to abandon his ancient people in the making of a new people? Was he establishing a new covenant that brought about the end of the old? Luke's writings certainly wrestle with these questions, though they are seen in their full intensity in his story in Acts. They come to the surface from time to time in his gospel and nowhere more obviously so than in this episode which is written up as a commentary upon the event that is recorded in Matthew and Mark (not however without their own different interpretations of the reasons behind the rejection). Luke shapes this story in the light of the events that have happened down to his own time. It expresses his own understanding of the tragedy. However, though commentators on Luke are all agreed on the importance of this episode, there is a wide variety of opinion on what he was actually saying through it. (For an interpretation which is quite different from the one given here, see J. T. Sanders 1987.)

Jesus, in the synagogue on the sabbath day, uses an OT passage to explain both himself and the nature of the salvation that God is bringing through him. The passage is actually a composite one, taken from the LXX version of Isa 61:1–2 into which is fitted a clause, 'to let the oppressed go free', from Isa 58:6. Luke's Jesus presents himself as the fulfilment of Isaiah's Spirit-filled prophetic figure who proclaimed God's eschatological redemption. What Isaiah's prophet anticipated, Jesus brings into being for, not only is he the final proclaimer of the saving act of God, he is actually realizing it in his own preaching and actions: 'Today, this scripture has been fulfilled in your own hearing.' He proclaims 'good news to the poor', that is to those who, marginalized in the present, are looking for God's redemption (see Lk 6:20–6). The 'year of the Lord's favour' is here. What was anticipated in the year of Jubilee, which took place (at least in theory) every fifty years, when 'you shall proclaim liberty throughout the land to all its inhabitants' (Lev 25:10), is now becoming a reality. The bonds that oppressed God's people are being broken. It is noteworthy that Luke has Jesus leave Isaiah in the middle of a sentence without including 'the day of vengeance of our God'. As in the infancy narratives, Luke understands Jesus' work primarily as one of redemption.

The people of Nazareth respond favourably; his 'gracious words' impress them. 'Is not this Joseph's son?' expresses approval and local pride. Yet it has within it the seeds of misunderstanding and it is but a limited response. So Jesus quotes a proverb (rather more emphatically than the version found in Matthew and Mark) that points to the inevitability of a city's rejecting the prophetic message of one who is its own (v. 24). Familiarity limits expectations and resents challenge. It presumes upon the relationship and assumes that any message of good news must include natural associates within its sphere (v. 23). It fails to recognize the strength of the challenge that is actually being made. Jesus elaborates on the situation and, in doing so, hardens his stance.

Having spoken of the inevitability of rejection by his own, and therefore of his own inability to perform deeds for them, he uses the instances of Elijah's dealings with the widow of Zarephath (1 Kings 17) and of Elisha's with Naaman (2 Kings 5) to show that earlier prophets worked among outsiders even to the seeming neglect of their own. This elaboration has often been seen as a rejection of his own people in favour of a movement out into the Gentile world. It has been understood as an expression of Luke's belief that the ministry of Jesus meant a new action of God which virtually drew a line under his covenantal dealings with the Jewish people. He was establishing a new Israel that now inherited the earlier promises made to the Jews.

Another reading of the significance Luke saw in the references to Elijah and Elisha is, however, possible and is one which does not make such a sharp departure from the positive attitude to the Jewish people expressed in the infancy narratives: the proverb of v. 24 explains the inevitability of the rejection and, indeed almost justifies it; regrettable though it is, it is an understandable response. The OT incidents are used, not to support a rejection of the local people, but to show that prophets of Israel worked outside her borders, that they were often unsuccessful at home and that their lack of success denied neither their calling nor their continuing commitment to Israel. Jesus had not turned aside from Israel, any more than had Elijah and Elisha. The nation's rejection of him had not resulted in its own rejection—either by him or by the God who stood behind him.

Whatever the implications, the sermon provoked a furious response on the part of the listeners who set out to kill Jesus. His challenge to established certainties made them determined to stone him as a false prophet (Deut 13:1) (v. 29). They were unable to destroy him, however, but he, ‘passing through the midst of them, went on his way’. Here, Luke uses a favourite verb to express Jesus’ movement to his goal (9:51; 13:53). The rejection by his own, so far from destroying him, furthers God’s purposes.

(4:31–44) A Preliminary Ministry Luke here seems to be following Mark who begins his story of Jesus’ ministry with a quick survey of what has been called ‘a typical day’. Mark has described the temptation of Jesus in terms of a battle with Satan and this ‘typical day’ presents him as throwing back the power of the demonic world (Mk 1:21–2:12). Having at Nazareth presented Jesus’ work in terms of bringing freedom from oppressive powers, Luke now takes over some of these healings and exorcisms. They show the presence of God’s kingdom in Jesus. In the synagogue at Capernaum ‘his word is with authority’ and this is substantiated by his power over an unclean spirit. The confrontation is real; the demon (or demons, for v. 34 has the plural) uses Jesus’ name and mentions his status in a real effort to unmask him and so constrain his power. But Jesus’ authority—that of the ‘Holy One of God’—overwhelms him. Luke alone adds, ‘having done him no harm’, for the freeing power of God really is redemptive. The witnesses recognize the marvel and ask, ‘What kind of word is this?’ ‘The word’ is a favourite term with Luke, which he uses, as here (vv. 32, 36), to point to the effective power of the gospel.

The healing of Peter’s mother-in-law follows and leads into a general ministry of healing and casting out of demons. Luke once more emphasizes that the demons recognize his divine Sonship and acknowledge his power. Jesus, however, would not allow them to speak ‘because they knew that he was the Christ’ (v. 41). This presents more than an exercise of power; it forbids them from giving a false impression of him. What makes him ‘Christ’ for people will be an acceptance of his way of the cross. Without that acceptance, any ascription of messiahship would be useless.

At daybreak Jesus leaves that place to go on his way. Crowds try to stop him. They act virtually as the continuation of the temptation. Jesus resists. His exorcisms have to be set in a wider context, that of proclaiming and therefore enabling ‘the kingdom of God’ (v. 43). The freeing activity of Jesus which this preliminary work has revealed should be seen in the light of his teaching about the nature of the God who does this and of his relationship with humankind. Only then does it reveal the life of the Kingdom. Jesus must go forward and proclaim the Kingdom even if, by living it himself, it leads him to a cross. It was for this reason that he was sent. So, says Luke, ‘he continued proclaiming the message in the synagogues of Judea’. The latter word here is to be taken as meaning the ‘land of the Jews’ as in 1:5; 6:17. It does not suggest an extended ministry in Judea proper.

(5:1–11) Call of the First Disciples Luke postpones the call of the first disciples, which Matthew and Mark describe as the first act of Jesus’ ministry, to this point, that is until after Jesus has had some dealings at least with Peter. He describes it in a scene which has close links with a post-resurrection episode in Jn 21:4–8. The ‘lake of Gennesaret’ is the sea of Galilee, Gennesaret being the district to the south of Capernaum. The episode centres upon Peter and is really an account of a marvel which becomes for him a moment of disclosure. The unexpected catch of fish points to the nature of the one who made it possible. He discerns the presence of God in Jesus and is moved to make a response that equals that of the prophet Isaiah when in the temple he had his vision of God (Isa 6:5). James and John share in the amazement of those who saw the marvel, though it is not said that they share Peter’s discernment. Though the episode, like that in Matthew and Mark (cf. figs F), describes the call of the inner group of disciples, Luke’s narrative focuses upon Peter. For him, Peter has a very special role which is determined, not merely by that which he is given in the general gospel tradition, but also by the part he plays both in the Acts account of the incorporation of Gentiles into the new community and also in the maintenance of its unity (Acts 10–11; 15). Luke claims Peter as the protagonist of his own understanding of the significance of the event of Jesus. He is aware of Peter’s weakness but he minimizes it. Jesus does not accept Peter’s declaration of messiahship (9:20) but, in the third gospel, Peter does not try to deflect him from his path of suffering. At the last supper, Jesus tells how he has kept Peter from Satan’s clutches and that he will be the one to restore his fallen brethren (22:31–4). Luke therefore softens both the failure of the disciples at Gethsemane and the denial of Peter (22:39–46, 54–62). It is to Peter that Jesus appears first after the resurrection (24:34). The original theophany that Peter experiences makes an impression upon him that, in spite of his failings, never leaves him. It enables him to play the leading role which Luke will later ascribe to him.

(5:12–16) Healing of a Leper The next few episodes where Luke is very close to Mark point to the growing tension between Jesus and the religious leaders in the persons of the Pharisees and teachers of the law. The story of the cleansing of the leper emphasizes Jesus’ willingness to perform the cure in the face of the leper’s own doubt about it. Jesus is bringing precisely that release which the Nazareth sermon promised. It was necessary for a priest to pronounce him free from leprosy before he could take his place again within the community. Lev 13–14 described the sacrificial ritual that effected the restoration. Whatever is meant by ‘a testimony to them’, Jesus is calling attention to himself. The episode’s place at the beginning of a section that points to a growing hostility climaxing at 6:11 suggests that Luke understands Jesus to be already challenging the finality of the Jewish religious institutions. He points the leper into the way of observing the law but from the position of one who already transcends it.

(5:17–26) The Healing of the Paralysed Man In this episode ‘the power of the Lord [which] was with him to heal’ (a distinctively Lucan phrase) is to face its first real challenge: ‘Who can forgive sins but God alone?’ The story raises some difficulties. In the first place, it seems to associate a person’s sickness with his or her sin, a position which the OT itself, in such writings as the book of Job, questions. Secondly, Jesus seems to be appealing to his ability to cure sickness as proof of his greater claims (v. 24). Finally, v. 24 itself reads badly and suggests some haste—perhaps even, as some have suggested, a joining up of two sources. Why, when asked to heal, does Jesus say, 'Your sins are forgiven'? The most likely explanation seems to be that he was encouraging those who were requesting his help to raise their sights and to put the physical need within the wider context of their whole relationship with God. Jesus had earlier left the crowds when they threatened to overwhelm him and confine his mission (4:42–4). Here, he was meeting the need but was setting it in a larger framework. He proclaimed a restoration of a relationship with God that included physical redemption but was not exhausted by it. Physical healing came from the restoration of the kingdom of God. The physical ills of the world pointed to the restriction of God's sway. The prophet Isaiah looked forward to the day when wholeness and harmony would be restored (Isa 35:3–10).

The scribes and the Pharisees recognize Jesus' action and his interpretation of it as a claim to be acting on behalf of God. Strictly, of course, he was saying that God was forgiving the man, but the point was that he was acting with the authority of one who had the mind of God and could speak for him. Jesus is here for the first time called 'Son of Man', his favourite self-designation. Just what he meant by it, however, has produced a lively and still inconclusive debate. Discussion of it would take us far outside the confines of this commentary. More important for our purpose is the Synoptic Gospels' own understanding of it in which Luke shares. Probably influenced by Dan 7:13, it sees Jesus as an earthly figure, authoritative yet unacknowledged, suffering, vindicated, and exalted to heaven from where he will return in glory. Luke emphasizes the amazement of the bystanders, their 'glorifying God', and their awe. For him, the story makes a true witness to the person of Jesus.

(5:27–32) Jesus and Levi Jesus now calls Levi to join his inner group of disciples. He is 'a tax-collector', that is, one of a group of minor officials who were employed to collect indirect taxes, mainly tolls. Working for an alien power and widely extortionate, they were regarded with hostility and were marginalized. Luke has Jesus take a special interest in this group. Levi gives a great banquet for Jesus in his house even after Luke has emphasized that he had 'left everything'. The Pharisees and their scribes complain, for tax-collectors and sinners were those who had opted out of the covenantal people of God; by living outside the Mosaic law, they had excluded themselves from any share in God's future rule. A meal, of course, had sacral significance and Luke sees its function as an anticipation of meals in the kingdom of God. In this perception, he was probably correctly interpreting Jesus' own understanding of his actions. Here, Jesus points to his particular concern to call those whose lives are judged unhealthy by current religious requirements. Luke alone adds 'to repentance'. Though his gospel is one which emphasizes the divine initiative in Jesus and the outreach of God's grace, he is aware that this outlook could lead to an abandoning of ethical principles and play down the need for a response. He therefore points out that Jesus' outreach did lead to repentance (cf. 15:7, 10).

(5:33–9) New and Old Having shown God's new approach in Jesus and the challenge this made to the Jewish religious tradition, this section emphasizes the move forward that was required if it was to be accepted. New material could not be made to fit in with the old: to use it as a patch to complete the old would not work, for not only would it tear the new garment and in effect destroy it, but it would also not match the old. Likewise, new wine needed new bottles. For all his understanding of God's approach in Jesus as the climax of what he had done in Israel, Luke was aware of its radicality and of the jump that was required if members of the covenantal people were to receive it. v. 39, which is peculiar to him, gives his reason for the Jewish failure to respond to Jesus' new challenge.

(6:1–11) Sabbath Controversy Luke writes up these two stories, to be found also in Mark and Matthew, in a way that, though having Jesus less critical of the sabbath than he is in Mk 2:27, nevertheless presents him firmly as the sabbath's Lord. Jesus' disciples break the sabbath law, not only by reaping, but also (in Luke only) by threshing. When 'some' (a Lucan addition that mellows the story's opposition to the Pharisees) object, Jesus reminds them that David himself broke the law (though not the sabbath law) when his followers as well as he were hungry. Luke (unlike Matthew and Mark) adds nothing else but goes straight to what was for him the significance of the story: 'The Son of Man is Lord of the Sabbath'. David showed his superiority to the law: the son of David who is Son of Man, being greater, has an even greater superiority. A further story strengthens the point. Jesus on a sabbath teaches in the synagogue when a man with a withered hand is present. In the light of the previous story, scribes and Pharisees watch to see whether he will compound his refusal to be bound by the law's requirements. He refuses to be intimidated by them. His action raises one further dimension of his attitude to the law. Was the sabbath designed for the benefit of humankind or for its oppression? Admittedly, his question, 'to save life or to destroy...?' (v. 9), puts the alternatives over-sharply and in a way that goes beyond the particular issue. Nevertheless, it makes the point clear and, though maintaining Jesus' freedom concerning the sabbath, makes his action one neither of blatant disregard nor of naked power. The result, however, is their fury and a determination to confront Jesus.

(6:12–49) Jesus' Sermon It is at this point, when opposition is forming and confrontation becomes a certainty, that Luke places his account of Jesus' call of the twelve and follows it immediately with his sermon given to 'a great crowd of disciples' in the presence of a 'great multitude of people' from all over the area. As on other important occasions, Jesus spends the night in prayer. From his disciples, he chooses twelve. Luke's list differs from those of Matthew and Mark in that he has 'Judas son of James' in place of Thaddaeus and describes Simon the Cananaean as 'the Zealot'. This term probably refers to a religious rather than a political zeal. Whereas Matthew and Mark say that Jesus chose the twelve in order to send them out to preach and heal, Luke records no reason for the choice. Instead he simply says, 'He chose twelve of them, whom he also named apostles'. For Luke, the Twelve are not merely a distinct group as in Matthew and Mark, their distinctiveness is found in their being 'apostles', a title which he limits to them. Their importance lies not in what they do but in what they are, namely the foundation pillars of the restored, eschatological Israel that Jesus is bringing into being. So, like Moses before him (Ex 24:1, 3, 12–14), Jesus goes to the mountain, takes with him the leaders of Israel, and comes down to form the people of God. The twelve stand alongside him, witnessing to the nature of the community that is being brought into being as he delivers a sermon that defines its essence. The sermon as Luke gives it has long suffered in comparison with Matthew's (vv. 5–7). The Sermon on the Mount presents a demand for an ethical righteousness the radical nature of which far exceeds that of the law. The demands of Luke's sermon are equally radical but are more focused. They home in upon the need to recognize the nature of the community that Jesus is calling into being and therefore upon the necessity for members of it to respond with mutual love, toleration, and acceptance. The radical demands are seen, not in a high moral tone, but in the overriding concern for love (vv. 27–36), a non-judgemental attitude (vv. 37–42), a life of integrity (vv. 43–5), and a total response to Jesus' call (vv. 46–9).

The Beatitudes which introduce it therefore have a different stance from those found in Matthew (cf. FGS G). Whereas his provide a standard after which members of his community can strive, Luke's state the nature of the new community. They address the disciples directly (NB the second person) as the poor, the hungry, the weepers, and the excluded. Not all are in fact these, though many within the community are. All however are to share in the attitude that characterizes these groups—their looking for God's future and their lack of satisfaction with the present. They look for the Kingdom to redress the inequalities of the present. In the OT the poor are seen as the special concern of God, and the authors of the Psalms of lament can picture themselves as poor in attitude and so as looking for God's vindication (40:17; 86:1). People like these are to be deemed 'blessed' for God can and will vindicate them.

The converse of this is that the rich, the full, the satisfied, and the easily accepted are challenged and made to face the consequences of their lot. This leads to a self-satisfaction and self-sufficiency which is not merely in grave danger of shutting them off from the grace of God but which also encourages a manipulation of their fellow human beings. At a number of points in his gospel, Luke will reveal his strong suspicion of riches and the challenge he believes they present to would-be disciples (14:33; 16:1–15, 19–31; 18:18–30).

Luke's version of Jesus' foundation sermon, then, challenges the community he is bringing into being to be one which, seeing itself as the eschatological people of God, lives out of grace and in hope of God's redemption. It is to be a sign of that hope. Whereas Leviticus called upon Israel to reflect God's holiness which it saw as the defining character of God (Lev 19:2), and Matthew called his community to a perfection which reflected God's own (Mt 5:48), Luke's Jesus calls rather for mercy because it is that which for him lies at the heart of God. The sermon does not judge a section of the community as does Matthew's (Mt 7:21) but rather somewhat wistfully has Jesus exclaim to all: 'Why do you call me "Lord, Lord", and not do what I say?' Luke does not share Matthew's concern to relate the ethical standards required by Jesus to those demanded by the Law (see Mt 5–7). He pictures a community formed by a response to the grace of God revealed in Jesus and one which lives out of the life of the Kingdom which Jesus established and which the community's life itself anticipates. The sermon's demands are therefore radical. The disciples are to become like their master (v. 40): they are not to try to outdo his non-judgemental attitude. Their good fruit must reflect a 'good treasure of the heart'. The true disciple of the Lord hears his call and acts upon it (cf. 8:15).

(7:1–10) The Centurion's Slave This episode, not in Mark, is found also in Mt 8:5–13 (cf. FGS H). Comparison of the two accounts brings out Luke's particular perspective. In his gospel the centurion does not meet Jesus but instead sends elders of the Jews to intercede on his behalf. Their plea for him is based on the fact that he was favourably disposed to the Jewish people and that he was instrumental in the building of this group's synagogue. He was a Gentile, perhaps a Roman officer who, in Galilee, would be in the service of Herod Antipas. He was probably a God-fearer who, though linking himself to the Jewish community and joining in some part of its life, being uncircumcized remained an alien and outside the covenantal people. Jesus accedes to the Jews' request and begins to go with them to the centurion's house. On their way, however, the centurion sends friends to Jesus to make two points on his behalf. The centurion can make no claims on Jesus; that is why he would not presume even to approach him. Even now, he cannot expect him to enter his house. But, secondly, as a man both under authority and also exercising authority, he recognizes the nature of the authority that belongs to Jesus. A word from him is all that is required. That is all he dare ask, but it is enough. Jesus marvels at his faith and says for all to hear, 'Not even in Israel have I found such faith.' The difference from Matthew's version of Jesus' wonder makes clear the significance Luke sees in the story. Mt 8:10, 'in no one in Israel have I found such faith', can be heard as pointing to a lack of faith in Israel, whereas Luke's version rather emphasizes the exceptional nature of the centurion's. The centurion's slave is healed as a result of Jewish faith which has actually made the centurion's own faith possible. In the end, however, that of the centurion outstrips the faith shown by the Jews. His lack of all claims enables the wonder of Jesus' full redemptive power to be freed. The healing takes place from a distance.

(7:11–17) The Raising of a Widow's Son Only in Luke, this story seems to owe its position here to Jesus' appeal in 7:22 to his raising of the dead. The story has strong overtones of Elijah's raising of the widow's son in 1 Kings 17:17–24 and has echoes in Peter's raising of Tabitha in Acts 9:36–42. For Luke, Jesus, like John before him, is foreshadowed by Elijah, the archetype of OT prophecy, as he is by Moses. Luke uses 'The Lord' frequently in his references to Jesus when they, as here, point to his role as Christians understand it. Whilst acting in the past, he is revealed as the community's source and strength, and the one who is the object of its devotion. As Lord, Jesus brings the weeping of the woman to an end (6:21). 'Fear' is the response of awe in the presence of the numinous. They 'glorify God', a phrase that Luke uses to introduce significant responses to the actions of Jesus (2:20; 13:13; 23:47). Jesus for Luke is 'a great prophet', indeed the eschatological prophet. In him, 'God has looked favourably on his people'. The same verb is used in Zechariah's song (1:68) to speak of God's redemption of his people. The true in Israel recognize him.

(7:18–35) Jesus and John Luke's infancy narratives have brought Jesus and John together in the closest possible relationship but have, at the same time, shown how the redemption Jesus brings is in some tension with the OT expectations that John expresses. Baptized by John, Jesus sets out on a course of action that is less obvious than John might have expected. He has embraced a way of surrender and, in his sitting loose to the law, has reached out in a manner that appears to do less than justice to John's prophecy of one with a 'winnowing-fork in his hand' (3:17). John therefore sends two of his disciples to ask whether Jesus really is the one who fulfils the OT hopes and whether in him the final action of God is being realized. In v. 21 Luke points out the wonders that Jesus 'at that time' had been doing. The basis for his response to John is secure. So Jesus appeals to his actions in a list that freely quotes from Isa 35:5–6 and 61:1. For those who have eyes to see, they make his case. v. 23 contains a challenge to, and perhaps a criticism of John. The presence of Jesus demands a willingness to have established beliefs questioned.

Jesus now talks to the crowds about John and his relationship to himself. He begins with a compliment. When they went to hear John, they knew he was not one who would bend with the wind or be ensnared by the power or luxuries of the court. Luke has already told his readers that John had been wrongly put in prison by Herod because he had rebuked him for the evil he was doing (3:18–20). Had they gone out to see a prophet? Jesus gives John a higher status in God's plans than that. He applies to him a mixed OT quotation from Ex 23:20 and Mal 3:1 which, by a slight adaptation of pronouns, makes John the immediate forerunner of himself. He brings this to a climax with a further compliment which is, nevertheless, something of a backhanded one. No one in the world has arisen greater than John, 'yet the least in the kingdom of God is greater than he'. As it stands, this says that John is as yet outside the Kingdom. He still works from within the old expectations. He has not yet come to appreciate the radical challenge Jesus brings to these and the new perspectives from which they have to be viewed. However, this interpretation has been challenged ever since the time of Tertullian. Because the Greek in v. 28 uses comparatives ('lesser', 'greater'), the saying has been taken to refer only to Jesus and John and to their places in the Kingdom. Jesus is younger than John, perhaps originally a disciple of John, perhaps even a servant figure unlike John. He is nevertheless the greater in the Kingdom, though this interpretation would not suggest that John himself was not yet in the Kingdom. This, however, is not the most likely interpretation of the usual NT usage. John has not embraced the outlook of the Kingdom and as yet remains outside it. Those who have acknowledged it are already living within its embrace, out of its grace. They await its future revelation. For John, that embrace awaits the future (13:28).

The part of John in God's redemptive act, however, is emphasized in Luke's comment (vv. 29–30). 'All the people', that is those true Jews who had come to respond to Jesus and so be included within God's redeeming action, 'acknowledged the justice of God', his work of redemption that began through John's baptism that prepared them for their acceptance of Jesus. Those who were to reject Jesus were also the ones who rejected John.

Jesus acknowledges John's part by comparing his contemporaries to children at play. They are like those who fail to respond to all efforts to entice them to take part, whether it be a call to mourn or dance. John challenged them with the demands of God and they accused him of misanthropy. Jesus, on the other hand, presented them with the freeing grace of God and they cast him as a libertine. They will not respond to the challenge found in either proclamation. The section finishes with v. 35 which acts as a counterbalance to the rejection of which vv. 31–4 speak. 'Wisdom' in the OT came (alongside Spirit and Word) to be personified as the expression of God's outreach to humankind in which he made himself known and united them to himself (Prov 8; Wis 7). This verse takes up this thought. God's way is 'vindicated' (the same Gk. verb is used in v. 29), that is acknowledged and praised by all those who through the ministries of John and Jesus have experienced God's embrace and so have recognized his work both in them and in themselves.

(7:36–50) Jesus and the Woman who was a Sinner All four gospels tell of Jesus' anointing by a woman (Mt 26:6–13; Mk 14:3–9; Jn 12:1–8) though all three others link the anointing to Jesus' passion and record a complaint about the waste of money. Whereas Matthew and Mark have an anointing of Jesus' head, Luke, like John, tells of the anointing of his feet. Only Luke speaks of the woman as a 'sinner'. The significance Luke sees in the story depends on the actual meaning of a number of verses which are not easily interpreted. Simon, a Pharisee, invites Jesus to a meal; a woman comes into the room, as was possible on semi-public occasions, bathes his feet with her tears and dries them with her hair. She publicly kisses his feet and anoints them with ointment in an extravagant display of affection. Simon feels that Jesus' acceptance of such affection from one who was a sinner was not consistent with a prophet come from God. Jesus replies by telling a parable of two debtors which makes the point that one who is forgiven much is likely to respond more warmly than one who is forgiven little. So much is clear. The difficulty is in determining how it applies to the two characters. The woman is demonstrating her love. Is this because she has already been forgiven which is what the parable would imply? 'The woman's actions can only be accounted for by reference to something the story does not itself contain' (Evans 1990). On the other hand, v. 47, on a first reading at any rate, does not appear to support this but rather suggests that she has been forgiven because of her love. This is how RSV translates the verse. More recent translations, assuming a consistency in the story as a whole, take the Greek hoti to mean, not 'because' but 'with the result that'. So, REB translates, 'Her great love proves that her many sins have been forgiven.' v. 48 then proclaims her forgiveness which such a translation assumes has already been pronounced to her.

Perhaps however we are trying to force into a time sequence something that cannot be so easily ordered. The woman hears of Jesus and of his proclamation of the outreaching redemption of God. God's recreating acknowledgement of the outsiders is being enacted in him, the one who accepts the title of 'the friend of tax-collectors and sinners'. She responds with love and a warmth which is accepted. The story says nothing about her penitence in any formal sense and to assume this is to assume too much. What she brings is rather a response to a lack of condemnation, to an outreach, to a recognition. It is that response of love that Jesus acknowledges, accepts, and meets with a declaration that God has forgiven her. 'The woman does not love because she has been forgiven, but vice versa' (Lampe 1962). She loves, because in Jesus she meets with acceptance. In turn, her love receives the forgiveness for which he stands.

The parable is addressed to Simon and is looking at them both from Jesus' own point of view whilst engaging with Simon's own stance. It is a condemnation of his judgemental attitude and of his lack of openness. Is it suggesting more and saying that he was discourteous to Jesus? On the whole, this is unlikely. Though the lack of provision for the washing of feet is 'surprising' (Evans 1990) the other omissions would seem to be additional courtesies rather than requirements of the host. The story does not suggest that Jesus was singled out from the other guests; that would have meant a hostility that Simon's address to Jesus (v. 40) does not imply. The contrasts are caused by the woman's actions rather than by Simon's discourtesies. What the contrast emphasizes is Simon's lack of response to Jesus and his message of the gracious approach of God. Simon feels no great need but is rather, if not content, then at least comfortable with the position at which he has arrived. Comparatively, he does need to be forgiven little, but it is that little need that has made him miss out on Jesus' message. He actually needs to learn from the incident.

(8:1–21) Proclaiming the Good News After a fairly static period, Jesus now resumes his itinerant role of proclaiming the good news of the kingdom of God (cf. 4:43; 9:6). The Twelve are with him and some women 'who had been cured of evil spirits and infirmities'. They had been psychologically or physically distressed. Mk 15:41 mentions a group of women who had come to Jerusalem from Galilee with Jesus. Luke brings the mention forward to this point so as to link them with the Twelve in their accompanying Jesus. Mary Magdalene is mentioned first, probably because of her role at the tomb which is noticed in all four gospels. Jesus had cast out 'seven demons' from her—a witness to the severe nature of her illness, though not a pointer to any immorality; she is not to be brought into connection with the woman of the previous episode. Joanna the wife of Herod's steward Chuza, a woman of some social standing, is also mentioned at the tomb. Susanna is not found elsewhere. With other women, they provided for Jesus and the Twelve out of their resources. Women of means are found frequently in Acts. The most significant instance is the mention of Lydia who in Acts 16:15 acted as host for Paul and his companions at Philippi in the first of the 'we' passages in Acts. It is not beyond the bounds of possibility that Luke himself lodged there and perhaps even stayed there after the rest of the party had left (Acts 20:6). Luke may have been looking at the part women played in the ministry of Jesus in terms of his own later experience. He is anxious to point to their presence at the cross (23:49), the burial (23:55), the empty tomb (24:10), and when the community waits for the gift of the Spirit (Acts 1:14). He has no appearance of the risen Jesus to them as does Mt 27:9 and Jn 20:18, but this would seem to be because of his concern to have Peter be the first witness of the risen Lord (24:34).

It is in this setting of Jesus' preaching ministry that Luke places the parable of the sower which for him, as for the other synoptic evangelists, becomes an image of the varied success of the preaching, not only of Jesus, but also of the early church. Jesus tells a parable about a sower and his method of sowing which actually appears to sow seed where there can be no hope of a harvest. A waste of much seed becomes inevitable because of the nature of the ground on which it is allowed to fall. The distinctive feature of Luke's parable when it is compared with the versions given in Mt 13:3–9 and Mk 4:3–9 is his statement that all the good seed yielded 'a hundred fold'. All his good seed produces, if not a spectacular harvest, then at least a bumper one. The reason for this becomes clear in his version of the allegorical interpretation. Before that, however, he includes, as do the other evangelists, a statement in which Jesus is heard giving his reason for the use of parables. It is 'so that looking they may not perceive, and listening they may not understand'. Though this softens Mark's parallel statement (Mk 4:11–12), it shares something of his belief that Jesus' parables were meant to discriminate, to cause discernment in some and to harden others. Jesus' parables were not easy (to imagine they are rather helpful teaching aids is to do them total disservice), and the early church tended to find their challenge difficult to comprehend. This led them to think that they were deliberately obscure and that the key which they used to unlock them was meant for only the chosen few. It is usually accepted that the interpretation of the parable of the sower that follows (vv. 11–15) owes more to the early church than to Jesus himself. Whereas the parable itself is about a sower, the interpretation concentrates not upon him (for he is not even mentioned) but upon the seeds, or rather upon the soils into which the seeds fall. The soils become the hearers, and their attitudes that are described are used to account for the success or failure of the seeds. Most of the seeds are destroyed by the various deficiencies of the soils. Yet the seeds as a whole do not fail. The good soil becomes a symbol for those who exhibit the qualities that the Gentile Luke can appreciate (v. 15). These bear fruit a hundredfold. Luke, in Acts, will go on to show how 'the word of the Lord grew mightily and prevailed' (Acts 19:20). vv. 16 and 17 promise that future. v. 18 warns of the need to hear 'with patient endurance' and discrimination.

The final episode in the section introduces Jesus' mother and brothers. They come seeking him. When Jesus is told of their presence he answers in a way that, unlike Mk 3:31–5, does not exclude them from the relationship but extends it. All those who 'hear the word of God and do it' are to be accounted Jesus' mother and brothers. Translations of the saying that make Jesus claim that his natural relations are the ones who are already doing this depend upon a somewhat forced reading of the Greek (Fitzmyer 1989). Mary and Jesus' brothers are, however, in Acts (1:14) among the earliest disciples waiting for the gift of the Spirit. The last episode in the infancy narratives suggests that Mary too had to face a learning experience. This was realized in her response to the life, death, and resurrection of her son. In this way she lived up to the infancy narratives' picture of her as the ideal disciple.

(8:22–56) Redeeming Works All three Synoptics tell of Jesus stilling the storm (Mt 8:23–7; Mk 4:35–41). It is the sign of Jesus' power over 'the deep', which was for them the ultimate symbol of chaos and the home of forces alien to God. Gen 1:2 told how the Spirit of God tamed the waters at creation, whilst Ps 89:10 made use of the old myth that saw the sea as the abode of the monster of chaos, Rahab. Isa 51:9 associates the same myth with God's victory over the sea at the Exodus. Moses and Elijah were associated with command over seas and rivers (Ex 14; 2 Kings 2:8). Jesus, as God's final act of redemption, now reveals his total power over the deep. All three evangelists regard the action as a point of disclosure to the disciples. In Mark, they awake Jesus with rough words; in Matthew they treat him with great respect. Luke takes something of a middle position; Jesus' rebuke is delivered after he stills the storm and their response is made in its light.

Jesus now arrives 'at the country of the Gerasenes' on the other side of the lake from Galilee. The actual name of the place varies in different MSS and all present problems. The really important thing is that the event takes place in Gentile territory. For Luke, who usually avoids having Jesus make contact with Gentiles, it provides a concrete example of an anticipation of the Gentile mission at which he has hinted so strongly and which he will go on to record in Acts. The story should not be pressed for answers to modern questions that were outside the concerns of its tellers who recount it in terms of symbols that were highly significant for them. The tormented man calls Jesus 'Son of the Most High God', a pagan title that is also used by a spirit-possessed slave girl at Philippi (Acts 16:17). Jesus exercises a power over the demon that makes him reveal his name, 'Legion'. A legion was a unit in the Roman army of something around 6,000 men. The use of the term witnesses to the severity of the possession. The state of the man, his being held in chains and shackles, may well suggest something of the burden of the Roman occupation. The story may have been handed down with the intention of associating Jesus' throwing out of demonic powers with the expectation of the overthrow of the equally oppressive political authorities. The local citizens may well have been understood by Luke as asking Jesus to leave their area because they regarded him as a threat to stability. This would be seen by Luke as one with the situation that he describes frequently in Acts (16:39; 17:14; 20:1).

Jews regarded pigs as unclean, so the request of the demons to be allowed to enter them was one of self-preservation. However, their plea, though accepted, was of little use. The pigs rush down to the sea and the demons are pushed back into the abyss. The previous episode showed that this was not outside the control of Jesus. Jesus does not allow the healed man to go with him. In contrast to his not infrequent commands to silence, Jesus tells him to return and spread 'how much God has done for you'. It was not the 'Most High God' whom Jesus served but the God of the Jews. The Gentile mission had in effect begun.

This healing of a Gentile is quickly followed by an even greater wonder performed for a Jew, 'a leader of the synagogue'. Within that story, however, Luke, as Matthew and Mark, inserts the episode of the healing of the woman with a haemorrhage. Lev 15:25–30 tells how such a tribulation was not merely a physical misfortune, but that it virtually excluded her from her place within the people of God. Anyone touched by such a person was regarded as unclean. Jesus notices that 'power had gone out from me'. This has sometimes suggested to commentators that Luke still worked within the idea of Hellenistic magic that regarded Jesus as possessing a kind of impersonal force that was not entirely under his control (Hull 1974) (cf. 5:17). It should perhaps rather be seen as his oneness with God that becomes a channel of God's outreach to people. Whereas in the OT what was conveyed was the holiness of God that overwhelmed those with whom it made contact (2 Sam 6:6–11), it was the redeeming outreach of God that was bestowed. Luke is perhaps less influenced here by Hellenistic magic than by the admittedly impersonal ideas of God and the Spirit that play a large part in the OT. Jesus' word to the woman raises the impersonal to the level of faith, and the Greek shows that the wholeness that is given, 'made you well', is interpreted at the deeper level of salvation, 'has saved you' (cf. 17:19).

Before he gets to the house, news is brought that the child had died but, when he arrives, he says, 'She is not dead, but sleeping.' Though sleep is a familiar biblical expression for death, so that this passage can be used as a pointer to a Christian understanding of death in much the way that the Johannine story of the raising of Lazarus can be so used (Jn 11), Jesus' words are recounted, not for this, but to point to the nature of the miracle he works. It is a restoration of the girl to life from death. To make this clear, Luke adds the reason for their laughter at him: 'knowing that she was dead'. Whether v. 55, 'Her spirit returned, and she got up at once', reflects the idea of the survival of the soul or spirit through death, or whether it does no more than use 1 Kings 17:22 is not easy to say. Perhaps, in view of 23:43, it is the former. Luke, any more than the rest of the NT, has no clearly worked out pattern of belief about the afterlife. The message of the story is that Jesus brings life from death.

(9:1–50) Climax in Galilee The climax of Jesus' time in Galilee begins with the sending out of the Twelve which, though close to Mark's account (6:7–13), differs at significant points. Luke, unlike Mark but like Mt 10:10, has Jesus refuse them the use of staff or sandals (22:35). All three evangelists record Jesus' command to extreme simplicity, which goes beyond both the normal requirements of a journey and the dress of the cynic wandering preachers which the evangelists would have encountered in the cities of the Roman empire. Whether Jesus saw both himself and his travelling disciples in terms of these cynic preachers (Crossan 1991) is disputed. The extreme simplicity is most likely a contrast even with them and reflects rather his belief in the challenge and nearness of the kingdom of God. Luke differs more significantly from Mark over the contents of the mission. For Mark, they proclaim that all should repent, and therefore repeat what he understands to be at the heart of Jesus' own preaching (1:15). Luke, who does not have this summary, tells rather of Jesus' proclaiming the good news of the kingdom of God (4:43; 8:1; 9:11), and it is this that the disciples also preach. Repentance, though important for Luke (4:32; 15:7), seems to arise out of redemption rather than being understood as a condition of it (7:47). He does not have Mark's statement that Jesus sent them out two by two (6:7), but keeps that for the mission of the seventy (10:1). This seems to be because, unlike Matthew and Mark, he does not see the mission of the Twelve as a pattern for later work which he reserves rather for his account of the seventy. For Luke, the twelve are a distinct group whose work is not extended into that of later disciples.

Mark at this point has an extended account of the death of John the Baptist which Luke does not take over. Luke will later omit an account of Paul's death and, though he will tell of Stephen's, he will emphasize, not that, but the preaching which is his primary witness (Acts 7:55). He will not isolate the death of Jesus as the moment of redemption (see LK 23:32–48). He records Herod's perplexity, however, for it makes a fitting prelude to vv. 18–20. Herod himself (unlike Mk 6:16), is not said to believe that Jesus is John risen from the dead. He rather contrasts Jesus with John and wishes to see him (cf. 23:8 and see also Acts 26:27–32).

The return of the disciples, as in Mark, leads into the story of the feeding of the five thousand. Moses had fed the Israelites in the desert (Ex 16; Num 10) and Elisha had fed 'the people' enabling them to have more than they required (2 Kings 4:42–4). Jesus as the fulfilment of both these prophets would perform a feeding the wonder of which would exceed theirs. At the heart of the story is the dialogue between him and the Twelve. Their perplexity at Jesus' command, 'You give them something to eat', shows that they have not yet come to appreciate his real nature. Luke uses the miracle as a point of disclosure for the disciples. For him, it is the event that enables their growing perception of Jesus to be realized and brought to the level where Peter can make his declaration of Jesus' messiahship (9:20). It becomes an anticipation of the messianic banquet. Like all the evangelists, he seems to be viewing Jesus' actions as having eucharistic overtones though the verbs he uses to describe Jesus, words over the bread and fish do not make this explicit.

Luke's story of the five thousand, unlike those of the other evangelists, leads immediately into Peter's acknowledgment of Jesus as Messiah. For him, there is a strong connection between the two events. Mark has a whole series of stories, including another feeding miracle, between the two and in this he is followed by Matthew. Luke, if as seems most likely he is using Mark as his primary source, has chosen to leave them out. They show a Gentile concern which he will not pursue until his second volume, deal with a question of eating meats which he will resolve in Acts 15, and reveal the disciples in a light less favourable than his own. Once more, as on important occasions, Jesus is at prayer. Mark names the place as Caesarea-Philippi. Luke omits this for he would not have regarded Gentile territory as a suitable context for what was in the first instance a necessary and essentially Jewish recognition. The responses of the crowds are inadequate for, in defining Jesus in terms of a return of John, Elijah, or one other of the prophets, they are not merely undervaluing him but are seeking to keep him and the work of God through him within the terms of their own expectations. Though a less hostile response than that of the religious leaders, it ultimately amounts to the same thing (11:14) and shows an equal failure to move forward into the new outlook that Jesus is bringing. Jesus then asks the disciples to express their own perception of him and their level of commitment. Peter responds, 'The Christ of God.' All three evangelists report Peter's response in terms that express either their own understanding or that of their church (Mt 16:16; Mk 8:29). Luke's form expresses his own belief that Jesus' messiahship fulfils OT expectations when these are rightly understood (24:25), and emphasizes his function as the agent of God. Jesus issues a stern command to silence for, though the confession is right as far as it goes, the content of Jesus' messiahship has to be filled with suffering. It is that alone that is to make it a reality.

There now follows (vv. 21–7) the first of three predictions of the passion (9:43–5; 18:31–4). Jesus says that the Son of Man must be rejected, killed, and 'on the third day be raised'. He must get the disciples to understand the necessity for his death, and to believe that this will lead to his vindication by God. This prediction is of supreme importance for all the evangelists and reflects a belief that was fundamental to the early church (1 Cor 15:3–4). The cross made the resurrection possible and was therefore seen as part of the determined plan of God. It was early given saving significance. How far Jesus himself was actually conscious of the necessity of his death is disputed. The Gethsemane scene suggests that he was not necessarily certain of its inevitability. That he was aware from the beginning that his task was very different from what was expected of a messianic figure, and that his understanding of God's redemption made a clash with Jewish religious susceptibilities inevitable, meant that his rejection and death were a real possibility. But that he went up to Jerusalem deliberately in order to die is much less certain (Moule 1977). The gospels say that the empty tomb did not quickly lead to an understanding that Jesus was raised, and this suggests that his prophecy of a resurrection was far less unambiguous than these passages maintain. These passion predictions have certainly been shaped by the early church, and it is hard to know just how far that shaping extends.

Jesus' revelation of the path of suffering for himself is followed immediately by a call to his disciples to follow the same way. They are to 'deny themselves', the word used of Peter's denial of Jesus, and to take up the cross 'daily'. The last word is a Lukan addition and is sometimes thought to play down the absolute demand that the challenge might otherwise make. Luke demands a daily pursuit of the way that led Jesus to the cross rather than a once for all abandoning of the world. It reflects his more positive approach to the world and also his refusal to make Jesus' own cross into a point of atonement. For him, it is rather one with, though the climax of, his whole life which led to it and which thereby becomes not merely the means of resurrection, but also the means of God's redemption. Luke's version of the command is not a watering down of its absoluteness; it is rather a demand to be remade daily in the image of Christ. It reflects just that concern for daily life that his addition of the same phrase to the bread petition of the Lord's prayer makes obvious (11:2).

The strong demand is justified by an eschatological urgency. Those who refuse to line up with Jesus and his words will find themselves refused by him 'when he comes in his glory'. This verse can hardly refer to anything other than the parousia for it points to the revelation of a glory that had previously been established at his exaltation (24:26). v. 27 brings this urgency to a climax. Unfortunately, the meaning of that climax is not entirely clear. Mk 9:1 speaks of the Kingdom's coming 'with power' and Mt 16:28 suggests that he read this as a reference to the parousia. Luke's omission of 'with power' has sometimes been taken as suggesting that he changed the reference to make it apply, not to the parousia, but to the gift of the Spirit or the growth of the church. However, this is unlikely. Luke expressly associates the Spirit and the mission he enables with 'power' (24:49), and it is precisely this powerful reality of the present Kingdom that makes Luke drop 'with power' from his reference to the return of Jesus. The Kingdom in power does not await the parousia for its establishment. Already established in heaven, the return of Jesus will reveal its reality on earth (see Lk 17:21). Luke, in common with the vast majority of early Christians, anticipated the speedy return of Jesus. Whether this represents a misunderstanding of Jesus' own outlook is a matter that takes us beyond the limitations of this commentary (see Borg 1994; Allison, 1998).

Luke (like Matthew and Mark) links these sayings to the transfiguration by a time reference that is unique in the gospels outside the passion narrative. Some have suggested that this is because the evangelists believed that the promise of v. 27 is fulfilled in its mysterious happening. This, however, is wholly unlikely. Luke presents the transfiguration not as the fulfilment of a promise, but as the anticipation of something greater. The time link is to relate it firmly both to the warning of imminent suffering and to the promise that out of it will come a future glory. The transfiguration becomes a guarantee of that. Luke has 'about eight days after these sayings' in place of Mark's 'after six days'. This may mean little more than a different way of calculating time and like Mark would seem to have Ex 24:15–18 in mind. It may also be mindful of Lev 9:1, a passage that, also concerned with the glory of God, speaks of that glory appearing to Aaron. Luke emphasizes the impact the event has upon the disciples. They 'saw his glory' (v. 32, cf. Lev 9:6) and actually 'entered the cloud' (v. 34). Peter's response, though not a valid one, is regarded as less arbitrary than it is said to be in Mark. His attempt to perpetuate the vision, which is what his request to make 'dwellings' suggests, is less derided than in Mark.

Luke puts emphasis upon the appearance of Moses and Elijah. They also (only in Luke) appear 'in glory'. These two have a strong typological significance for him because, not only were they prophets who suffered greatly in bringing God's redemption to Israel, but Jewish tradition said that both were taken up into heaven. They therefore speak of Jesus' 'departure' (Gk. exodos) which he was 'about to accomplish at Jerusalem'. From the beginning of the ministry, Luke has pointed the narrative towards Jerusalem where its purpose is to be achieved (4:9, 30). From the end of the time in Galilee, this movement will become even clearer. At Jerusalem will occur the events that will accomplish not only Jesus' glorification but also the redemption that God wills for his people.

At the conclusion of the visionary appearance, the voice that earlier came to Jesus (3:22) now addresses the disciples. It expresses the divine approval of Jesus and, in words that follow Deut 18:15, enjoins them to give him their trust and obedience. The three disciples are given a glimpse of the glory that is rightly Jesus' and are themselves therefore strengthened to follow him on the way to his cross and glorification. What they have now seen anticipates both the empty tomb and the ascension, where two men in white will again interpret the events they witness (24:4; Acts 1:11). In Mk 9 and Mt 17, as they come down from the mountain, Jesus commands them to silence about what they had seen until after the resurrection. This is absent from Luke as befits his telling of the story in a way that brings out its divine witness to them. They did, however, keep silence 'in those days'. Perhaps Luke implies that they will use it at an appropriate time which will be—not as in Mark after the resurrection—but at the passion.

The incidents following the transfiguration show, however, just how much these three, along with the rest of the disciples, have to learn. Luke, unlike Mark (cf. Mk 9:14), places the story of the disciples' inability to expel a demon on the following day and thus does not exclude the three from its failure (v. 37). Again, their failure to understand Jesus' prediction of his suffering and their refusal to ask him about it shows how little they have learned (v. 45). The contrast between what Jesus is saying and their inability to enter into it is further strengthened by their discussion about their relative greatness (vv. 46–8) and by the attempt of John, one of the witnesses of the transfiguration, to remain exclusive (vv. 49–50). It is possible, of course, that the exorcist was using Jesus' name in a magical way rather than expressing a genuine response to Jesus. This appears to be the import of a similar situation in Acts 8:14–24. Here, however, in this particular context it seems that Luke is thinking not so much of an opportunist as of one who was not 'following with us', namely a disciple from that wider group that did not travel with them on the road but was influenced and moved by Jesus. Jesus' answer looks for a greater openness and is a rebuke of all exclusiveness. The disciples clearly have much to learn as they follow Jesus on the road.

The Journey to Jerusalem (9:51–19:27)

With 9:51, a verse of exceptional solemnity and loaded with biblical imagery, we enter upon a new section of the gospel that takes Jesus to the very gates of Jerusalem. Though the sense of movement is not always obvious, references to his progress occur from time to time (13:22, 33–4; 17:11; 18:31; 19:11) and show that it is the journey motif which holds this long section together. Geographically, these notices make little sense and together point to a meandering which appears to make little headway. For Luke, their significance is theological rather than factual. They keep Jerusalem as a goal in the reader's mind and point to that city as the climax and focal point of Jesus' ministry. In the light of the infancy narratives, they seek to present that ministry as the climax of God's workings in Israel. With Jesus' movement to Jerusalem, the whole of Israel's history is caught up and brought to a climax in him. In what happens there, Israel is reconstituted and the gift of the Spirit, which his exaltation makes possible, proclaims her eschatological renewal.

Recognizing the importance of this section for Luke, commentators have sought to discover an overarching scheme which gives some coherence and unity to a collection of material that does not easily reveal either a logical development or an easy progression of thought. Schemes which put forward some form of chiasmic structure have not been able to account for the order of all the material in the section. The suggestion that Deuteronomy provided the pattern, though attractive, again falls short of clear demonstration (see Nolland 1989–93; Evans 1990). There are, however, clear links with that book and these are such as to suggest that it is Deuteronomy that gives an insight into the way the material in this section is to be read. Luke has already presented Jesus in terms of the prophet Moses. Clearly visible at the transfiguration as an influence upon Jesus, his experience on Mount Sinai has already been used to shape the events around the choice of the twelve and the delivery of the inaugural sermon (6:12–49). In Deuteronomy, Moses addressed Israel on the way to his ‘departure’ (which in Jewish tradition became an assumption into heaven) and their movement into the promised land. Deuteronomy was seen as his farewell address, which became a contemporary exhortation to every future generation. It spoke about the nature of their God, his own withdrawal, their life in the future, and their attitude as they faced disobedience within Israel and temptations from without. What Deuteronomy does for Moses and historical Israel, the journey to Jerusalem does for Jesus and the community of eschatological Israel that he calls into being. Whilst in this section, Luke tells of a past movement and of the learning situation of those who journeyed with Jesus to Jerusalem, he enables him to speak now as the exalted Lord to those who would travel with him in the present (Moessner 1989).

(9:51–62) Eschatological Urgency ‘When the days drew near’ does little to convey the true awesomeness of the Greek, which is better rendered, ‘As the days were being accomplished’. The wheel is turning full circle and coming to its appointed fulfilment. Jesus’ being ‘taken up’ is achieved not merely by the ascension but also by the resurrection and passion—and indeed by the movement to Jerusalem. All is included within the embrace of this eschatological perspective. Jesus is already being seen in the light of that exaltation. To ‘set his face’ is often used in LXX of a threatening action. Luke however does not follow it with ‘against’ but rather with an infinitive of purpose. The servant in Isa 50:7 ‘sets his face like a solid rock’ in obedience to the Lord’s will and it is this imagery that is uppermost in Luke’s mind.

Samaritans refuse him precisely because his goal is Jerusalem and her people. The time of the Samaritans will come, but it will not be until Acts 8:4 when it will happen as a result both of the renewal of Israel and of the disobedience of many of her people. Jesus, unlike Elijah in 2 Kings 1, has no need of the vindication of a miraculous sign. James and John, in wishing to follow in the way of Elijah, reveal just how much they have still to learn.

The new stage of God’s action in Jesus, and its contrast with the preparatory nature of all that went before, is shown in Jesus’ refusal to allow would-be disciples to act in accordance with the outlook of that earlier age (9:57–62). Discipleship now meant journeying with the Son of Man who had nowhere to lay his head. His call required a response that cut across the law’s demand for care of parents. If it refers to more than fulfilling long-term obligations and is to be taken literally, then it demanded the neglect of what was regarded as the most solemn of all obligations. Luke sees that on which Jesus was now engaged as the climactic point of God’s redeeming activity, which, in the benefits it brings, overrides all other acts of piety and natural ties. Less stark, the final call contrasts the present time with that of Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings 19:20).

(10:1–24) The Mission of the Seventy Luke alone has the mission of the seventy—or is it seventy-two? The MS evidence is fairly divided and it is not easy to conclude what Luke actually wrote. Both numbers are linked to the two OT episodes that might be reflected in Luke’s story. Gen 10 has a list of seventy nations of the world, though LXX has seventy-two. Num 11 speaks of Moses choosing seventy elders upon whom a portion of the spirit that was upon him would rest, but since two others shared the gift, this could be taken as seventy-two. Which of these two episodes influenced Luke’s telling of the story is not certain. That they were sent ‘before Jesus to every town and place where he himself intended to go’ suggests the situation of the world-wide church as it preached and witnessed in anticipation of the return of Christ. On the other hand, the woes against the Galilean towns of vv. 13–15 point to Jewish perversity which was not wholly other than that which caused Moses’ appointment of the seventy elders. The episode is certainly related to the continuing mission to Israel and the varied response that this caused. Luke probably sees it as a pointer to the missionary experiences of his contemporaries as they challenged both Jews and Gentiles.

The message they are to preach is that ‘the kingdom . . . has come near’, though its embrace (‘near to you’, v. 9 but not in v. 11) is limited to those who respond favourably to them. This latter fact suggests that the Kingdom is a present reality and that its nearness is likely to be spatial rather than temporal. Yet it hovers over them rather than actually including them; there is an apartness about it, an otherness which means that their relationship to it is as yet tangential; they are not yet actually within its circle. When the missionaries return (v. 17), and rejoice that they have had power over the demons, the Lord bids them to raise their sights and to see that what has happened on earth is a reflection of, and a pointer to, something even more sublime in heaven; ‘I watched Satan falling like lightning from heaven.’ What is ultimately real and final takes place in heaven and it is this, as it is reflected on earth, that enables the world to be more open to God’s rule. Luke has a strong sense of the transcendence of God’s kingdom. It is the victory in that sphere that enables Jesus to bring about God’s redemption on earth. They are to rejoice that their names are written in heaven (v. 20).

The success of the mission and Jesus’ vision of triumph in heaven cause him to ‘rejoice in the Holy Spirit’ (some MSS have simply ‘in spirit’ and so point rather to his ecstatic state), and to make a thanksgiving to his Father who has brought about this success. In keeping with the Jewish understanding of revelation which thinks in terms of hiding as well as revealing, he points to God’s hiding these things from the wise and revealing them to those who are open to receive (‘babes’). God’s redemption passes by the self-sufficient but is grasped by those who are looking for it. Now follows (v. 22) a saying in which Jesus reveals himself in terms that, going beyond what is usually found in the Synoptic Gospels, comes close to his self-revelation in John. The Father has 'handed over all things' to the Son to give him an authority that is close to his own. That authority is centred on the act of redemption. The Father alone is the one who really knows the Son. Equally, it is the Son alone who really knows the Father. Such is his knowledge of the Father that he is able to make him known to anyone he chooses. Revelation of God through Jesus is not an idea that is elsewhere embraced in Luke. The section ends by pointing out how blessed the disciples are to have shared in this revelatory moment. The whole section has emphasized the reality of the heavenly Kingdom and its influence upon and future presence in the world.

(10:23–37) The Parable of the Good Samaritan At this point we meet the first of the many parables which are such a feature of the central section of this gospel (Bailey 1976; 1980). Luke links the episode firmly to Jesus' revelation of himself (v. 25). A lawyer who would no doubt have claimed that he 'saw', seeks to 'test Jesus', to determine his credentials. Matthew and Mark have a similar confrontation (where Matthew also has 'test') during Jesus' last visit to Jerusalem (Mt 22:34–40; Mk 12:28–31). Luke does not have that episode for, in some way, he sees its purpose satisfied here. Some interpreters believe that he has taken it over as a setting for the parable for which the original context in the life of Jesus was forgotten. This they believe would account for the twist that occurs between the lawyer's question and Jesus' reshaping of it; the parable itself does not follow on from the lawyer's question. On the whole, it is likely that this exhibits undue scepticism. That Jesus was only tested once in this way is not a necessary assumption. The twist between the lawyer's question and Jesus' answer is entirely in keeping with Jesus' radical stance: he was making the lawyer rethink his presuppositions and telling him that the assumptions with which he started out and which determined his question—'What bounds do I draw around my acceptance of others as my neighbour?'—had to be revised in a radical way. Neighbourliness knows no bounds and must proceed from an attitude of spontaneity and self-forgetfulness. The parable was remembered in its setting which actually gave depth and direction to it.

This, of course, does not mean that Luke has not shaped the episode as we now have it. That the commands to love God (Deut 6:5) and neighbour (Lev 18:5) were joined in this way before Jesus is disputed. Luke's concern to point to the strengths of the Jewish faith may have made him put into the lawyer's mouth a belief that originally was said to have been expressed by Jesus himself. It would then have made a way for his statement that the lawyer attempted to 'justify himself', an attitude that for Luke was largely responsible for the tragedy of the Jewish rejection of Jesus. As Luke sees it, the parable overturns the lawyer's stance and puts before him the challenge of emulating that of a Samaritan who was prepared to go to the aid of one who despised him. The parable in its setting calls for an abandonment of all status, privilege, and exclusiveness, that is, of just those things which for Luke stopped the Jewish people from responding to the outreach of Jesus.

For Luke, the parable is an indictment of the lawyer's attitude. Some have seen this as evidence of his alleged anti-Semitism (J. T. Sanders 1987). It reflects criticism, however, rather than hostility. It challenges rather than condemns. The Jewish religious leaders, the priest and the Levite, are there not as objects of attack but as examples of the deficiencies of the best in Judaism. Their proper consideration of the purity requirements of the law (for contact with a possible dead body would have prevented them from functioning in their proper tasks) led them to make a decision which the action of the Samaritan showed to be wrong. As with the lawyer and his question, the attitude inculcated by the law in the end hindered the exercise of that love which it so clearly enjoined. In his infancy narratives, Luke has already shown just what a leap forward was required if the priest was to move into the new outreach of God. Nevertheless, it was in the temple that that outreach began (1:5–20).

(10:38–42) Martha and Mary The Jewish lawyer had to learn to listen to the law which on his own understanding was meant to foster the love of God and humankind. It required a spontaneity of action that went beyond that which could be finely calculated and be seen to be under his own control. Earlier, as the journey was about to begin, the disciples had had to learn to give up status and become like children, to accept outsiders, and to eschew quick retaliation (9:46–56). Now, the fundamental requirement of discipleship is illustrated through the story of Martha and Mary. Two sisters welcome Jesus into their home, the one distracted by the burden of hospitality whilst the other, almost oblivious to its demands, sits listening at Jesus' feet. When Martha complains, Jesus rebukes her and, in the most likely reading, says, 'only one thing is necessary', namely, 'the better part' which Mary has chosen and which will not be taken away from her. Though the 'one thing' has sometimes been taken as suggesting that Martha is overdoing the hospitality, it rather refers to Mary's role of listening to Jesus. This is what had been commanded by the voice at the transfiguration (9:35) and the disciples had already shown how hard it was to do this. Martha, like them and the lawyer before her, wanted to be in control. The whole journey section of the gospel emphasizes the need for listening to the Lord. Only so will disciples be able to follow him on the way.

It is hard not to have sympathy with Martha, for Jesus' rebuke is certainly stern. Some recent readings have pictured Martha's as a leadership role which has been questioned in the story, as it was told by the early church, in favour of a more passive one such as is exercised by Mary (Schüssler Fiorenza 1983). Luke would almost certainly not have taken it in this way. For him, it expresses the absolute necessity of the priority of obedience to the call of Christ which is itself understood as a radical challenge to that self-sufficiency that characterized the outlook of those who refused Jesus or who were not easily open to his call.

(11:1–13) Teaching on Prayer Following a statement of Jesus' own prayer (v. 1) and the commendation of Mary's listening to him, it is an appropriate place for Luke to include teaching about prayer. The disciples' request for such teaching becomes the opportunity for including the Lord's prayer. Its

Lukan form is shorter than Matthew's (6:9–13) and interpreters are by no means united in determining the relationship between the two. Matthew's shows clear signs of use within the Christian community and is most probably the form that was prayed in his church. Luke's is also sometimes thought of as that of his church. This, however, is less likely for it certainly shows his hand and reflects his own theological understanding. It expresses a response to Jesus' teaching that brings out what Luke believes are the essential features of it. 'When you pray, say:' allows for no flexibility. It lays down a standard that must be expressed in all prayer: it says what prayer is about. 'Father' is the direct, confident approach to God that Luke sees as characteristic of Jesus' own prayer (22:42; 23:34, 46) and which his exaltation made possible for those who would follow him (Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6). God's 'name', in accordance with OT imagery, is his very nature which is expressed especially in his merciful outreach to humanity (Ex 33:17–19). To pray for its hallowing, therefore, is to pray that his true nature may be acknowledged by them and his redeeming activity be effective in the world. To pray for the coming of God's kingdom, which for Luke is already a reality in heaven (10:11), is to pray that it may be realized in the world. That for Luke will be at the parousia when what is real in heaven will be revealed to the world and will embrace it (17:24; 8:8). The request for bread (Luke adds 'each day'), which on the surface seems to be the most obvious and immediate of the petitions, is not easily understood. The meaning of the Greek word translated 'daily' is wholly uncertain. The claim that it appeared in a text with the meaning 'daily rations' is not open to verification and therefore can carry little weight. It might mean 'essential', though whether it is then to be understood in a physical or spiritual sense is not clear. It might mean 'bread for the coming day' and have some pointer back to the Israelites in the wilderness and their gathering of the daily manna (Ex 16:4). In the light of the eschatological nature of the prayer as a whole, and following on from the plea for the coming of the Kingdom, many would see it as a prayer for a taste in the present of the eschatological bread of the future Kingdom. May we live daily out of the power of the Kingdom. On the other hand, the following petition about forgiveness and forgiving is wholly about the present. Luke's hand is visible here, for its plea for forgiveness of 'sins' breaks the parallelism of our forgiving of 'debts'. Matthew has 'debts' in both parts of the petition and, because Jesus elsewhere talks of sin as 'debts' (7:41), it is likely that Luke has rephrased it here to make it more intelligible to his non-Jewish readers. The conditionality of the clause seems to owe its severity to Jesus himself and would fit the emphasis of the evangelist's version of Jesus' foundation sermon (6:20–49). Luke's version of the prayer ends with the petition, 'Do not bring us to the time of trial' (peirasmos). This translation would certainly represent Luke's own understanding of the petition's significance and does more justice to its meaning than the weaker 'temptation'. For him, the 'time of trial' was that point when a person is open to the ultimate of Satan's onslaughts such as was expected before the final revelation of the Kingdom. Whereas at Gethsemane, Matthew and Mark see the disciples open to the peirasmos when they fall asleep, Luke regards it as a future fall when they would abandon Jesus and enter into the grip of Satan (22:46; cf. Mk 14:41). Since it would not allow a hope of deliverance but would rather witness to Satan's triumph, any petition for deliverance from his power would be superfluous.

For Luke, the prayer has a strong eschatological orientation. It is one for the open manifestation of the Kingdom and a plea that, meanwhile, the disciples should live under its shadow and out of its strength. So the parable, which talks of the need for urgent and insistent prayer, pictures this under the guise of a determined petition for bread. The parable talks of contrasts. God, who wills to answer the disciples' petitions, is contrasted with an earthly person who is indifferent to his friend's pleas, and a request for physical bread is contrasted with the pleas for the Kingdom's food. If the plea for earthly benefit produces a response, how much more will God respond to those requests for things that are in accordance with his will. The parable says that God is not indifferent, and any suggestion that he is arises out of a misreading of the signs of the times.

The section therefore ends with a further contrast, yet one that this time depends on what actually links God and the best of family life. Earthly parents for all their imperfections ('being evil' is a typical Semitic exaggeration which is used to make the point) give good gifts to their children. How much more will God give the 'Holy Spirit' to those who ask him. For Luke, the Holy Spirit is God's power and strength which enables a response to him and a witness to his Kingdom (Acts 6:10; 9:17, 31). His presence is a sign of incorporation into the eschatological people of God and a guarantee of inclusion in his Kingdom which is to be revealed (Acts 1:8, 11). Though it remains most likely that Luke himself wrote the petition for the Kingdom at 11:2, the few MSS that read, 'May your Holy Spirit come upon us and cleanse us' would not be out of keeping with his thoughts.

(11:14–36) The Beelzebul Controversy Exorcism played a large part in the ministry of Jesus and, indeed, in that of the early church. Demon possession was widely believed in at that time and, as this episode makes clear, Jesus was by no means the only exorcist around. His opponents do not attack him for performing exorcisms, but rather question his motivation and the power by which he was able to do them: he was accused of casting out demons 'by Beelzebul, the ruler of the demons'. Beelzebul appears in some ancient Canaanite texts as 'Baal, Lord of the Heavenly House', a local or Syrian deity who was treated by Hebrew thought as an alien power, hostile to YHWH. 'Beelzebub', which appears in some texts, is a corruption of this, meaning 'Lord of the flies'. With a growing appreciation of the power of YHWH, these other gods were undeified and then treated as hostile agents of Satan. Jesus, therefore, is here accused of being an agent of Satan. On what grounds would they make this charge? Unlike any comparable Jewish exorcists, he did not use prayer or claim to draw on the strength of the Jewish tradition. He acted on his own authority and outside the covenant. Moreover, in his sitting loose to the law and its demands, he could be seen to be despising the covenant itself. All this could make him open to the charge of being a godless person.

He points to the basic nonsense of the charge, for Satan was unlikely to be wishing to destroy his supporters. And were their associates also to be charged with being agents of Satan?

This is basically a non sequitur for, though their activities might look no different from those of Jesus, they themselves presumably still worked within the law and so were not subject to the complaints that were being made against him. More important is his understanding of the significance of his exorcisms. 'The finger of God' is a phrase used in Ex 8:19 by the men of Pharaoh to describe Moses' wonders in Egypt; they were worked by God. If Jesus was doing his works by the finger of God—if he could be acknowledged as a man of God, reflecting his character and his goodness—then his exorcisms, far from witnessing to his service of Satan, witness rather to his being the agent of the kingdom of God. They show that, through him, 'the kingdom of God has come to you'. The translation of REB reads 'has already come upon you' and by allowing for the Greek preposition, epi, does more justice to it. The Kingdom has 'come upon' us, that is arrived to hover over us, to cast its glow over us, to be an effective power out of which we can now live. It is not yet here in its fullness, though we are already living within its embrace. (Cf. further FGS 1.)

If this verse serves as an important witness to Jesus' understanding of the Kingdom, it is equally important as a witness to his understanding of the significance of his exorcisms. They do not prove him, they do not even authenticate him. It is rather he who authenticates them and can enable them to be seen as signs of the presence of the Kingdom. So Jesus sees himself as overpowering Satan. The urgency of the contest is such that a saying (v. 23) is used in a manner that reverses its meaning at 9:50. The same sense of urgency controls the interpretation of vv. 24–6. If it is to endure, Jesus' saving work demands a positive response from those who receive it. So, when a woman in the crowd extols him by way of his mother, Jesus replies by declaring the blessedness of those who not only hear God's word, but actually obey it. If it is to achieve its purpose, grace must be met with a response.

Those who accused him of being in the pay of Beelzebul would not acknowledge what was before their eyes. Jesus himself now accuses those who demand a sign, that is an irrefutable demonstration of proof of his status. Instead, they are offered only the sign of Jonah when he preached to Nineveh (Jon 3–4). The people of Nineveh recognized the force of Jonah's preaching and the justice of his challenge to them. The queen of Sheba recognized the wisdom of Solomon and acted (1 Kings 10). Jesus' contemporaries are able neither to discern nor to respond. The final part of the section uses a saying about a lamp, not this time to talk about a future revelation of what is now hidden (8:16), but to warn that light must be allowed to do its work. It can easily be reduced to ineffectiveness.

(11:37–12:12) Jesus and the Pharisees Jesus in this central section of the gospel is often at meals which for Luke, as probably for Jesus himself, are seen as anticipations of the Kingdom of God. By his teaching, Jesus shows how they reflect or fail to reflect the Kingdom. This passage contains his harshest criticisms of the Pharisees. Much of its criticism is found also in Mt 23 where it is actually heightened and, addressed to crowds and the disciples about the Pharisees, becomes a climactic attack upon them. In Luke, since his criticisms are made at a meal and are given face to face, they do not mark the end of any relationship with them. There is still a dialogue. Jesus' dealings with the Pharisees were often confrontational, for his approach to purity, which was a major concern of theirs, was quite different from their own. Here, when Jesus is invited to dine with a Pharisee, he does not use the water provided to join in the ritual washing that would have been expected of those who were guests. He meets his host's disapproval with a determined attack upon his group. Their inner attitude does not measure up to their concern for externals. Tithing laws were complicated but Luke's point is that the Pharisees expended too much energy on little things such as tithing herbs which would have been better spent on more important commandments such as justice and love. They are like unmarked graves which actually defile people who come into contact with them.

A 'lawyer', who is a professional exegete of the law of Moses and who, by addressing Jesus as 'teacher' appears to acknowledge an affinity with him, resents these attacks but is in turn himself accused. The Pharisees' interpretation of the law puts undue burdens upon people. It is hard to see how their building tombs for the prophets actually continues their predecessors' persecution of them. It would seem to suggest the reverse. Their actions, however, do not really amount to a dissociation of themselves from the outlooks of their ancestors. They are seen rather as hypocritical. The attack is used as an entry into the final charge (11:49) that 'this generation' (which includes those who are contemporary with Luke) will bring to a climax their predecessors' harassment of God's servants by persecuting and killing Christian prophets and apostles. 'The Wisdom of God said' (11:64) is an unusual expression and, if it means more than 'God in his wisdom', reflects a saying of the early church. Abel was the first victim of jealousy (Gen 4:8). Zechariah is usually identified with the priest who was stoned by the people (2 Chr 24:20–2).

This passage, like that in Mt 23, has caused considerable disquiet for interpreters of the NT because it serves as a basis for that understanding of Pharisaism which, by presenting it as hypocritical in the extreme, is wholly unjust to that religious movement within Judaism to which in many ways Jesus was most closely related. In spite of some claims to the contrary (E. P. Sanders 1985) it is likely that Jesus did engage in disputes with them, but the stories of these conflicts have come down to us by way of the early church and reflect the growing hostility that later history encouraged. By the time Luke wrote, Pharisaism and the young church were engaged in a battle for the soul of Judaism. Our gospels reflect the heat this engendered and present a picture of Jesus' dealings with them which is coloured by these experiences.

The final component in this section takes up the earlier attack upon the Pharisees to characterize their basic outlook as 'hypocrisy'. 'Leaven' in the Bible is frequently used as a symbol for a hidden but pervasive corrupting influence (1 Cor 5:6–8). Pharisaic hypocrisy will, however, be uncovered. Meanwhile, the disciples must not fear those who persecute them. Everyone who acknowledges Jesus before human beings will be acknowledged by Jesus as Son of Man before the heavenly host (cf. Acts 7:56). Denial, on the other hand, will bring denial; 12:10 seems best understood as underlining this warning. Everyone who speaks against Jesus is open to forgiveness (cf. Jesus' first word from the cross, 23:34). Blasphemy 'against the Holy Spirit', however, is Christian denial of the truths revealed to them by their possession of the Spirit. Seen supremely as apostasy, it is extended to include a denial of the community brought into being through the Spirit (Acts 5:3). People are not to worry about what to say when they are brought to trial for being Christians. The Holy Spirit will himself direct their witness at this point (Acts 4:8; 6:10).

(12:13–53) Alert for the Kingdom Whilst a large number of interpreters have suggested that Luke no longer believed in the imminence of Jesus' return (Conzelmann 1960), there are a number of sections that suggest otherwise, and here we meet the first of them (cf. 17:21). It begins with a request for Jesus to take sides in a dispute over a family inheritance, and this enables Luke to include some teaching about the dangers of riches and of the attitude that concern for material things can encourage. To illustrate the point that one's life 'does not consist in the abundance of possessions' he includes the parable of the rich fool whose concern for material things and his confidence in them made him forget both the fragility of life and its deeper obligations, 'rich towards God'.

Jesus then turns from this more general teaching to address the disciples. They are 'not to worry about' their life (v. 22). Whilst this might mean 'put no effort into' and thus commend an eschatological detachment from the world, more likely in Luke's context it means 'do not be unduly concerned about'. The parable has pointed out that one has but limited control over one's future, and the teaching which follows stresses God's care. Undue striving for the things of this life actually leads one into the way of the 'nations of the world' which becomes a forgetfulness of God and of the things of the Kingdom. As Evans (1990) expresses it, 'The question then at issue is when a proper concern has become an improper anxiety'. Modern life would suggest the importance of the question, though the ongoing existence of the world and its responsibilities might place the move from one to another at a different point from Luke. Luke sees undue concern for the things of the body and of 'life', that is the business of living in the world, as a definite hindrance to striving for God's Kingdom. Though it is God's 'good pleasure' to give the Kingdom, entry into its sphere demands considerable effort on the part of men and women. It certainly does not allow for one's primary drive to be in the direction of the things of this world. Luke sees a definite either/or, though his challenge to exclusiveness is undermined by his inclusion of Jesus' promise that striving for the Kingdom will bring with it the bonus of these material benefits 'as well'. v. 34 gives the rationale of the antithesis which dominates the whole passage.

Jesus now (v. 35) warns the 'little flock' to be alert and ready for their master when he returns from the wedding banquet. 'The wedding banquet' would seem to be a symbol here for Jesus' enthronement in heaven and points to his return at the parousia. The whole passage carries two convictions. First, the disciples must be ready for a return of Jesus at any moment (v. 40). Secondly, they must allow for a delay that must neither reduce their expectancy nor impede their preparedness (v. 38). Peter's question at v. 41 makes it clear that 'the Lord', that is Jesus as he is worshipped and believed in by those whom Luke addresses, is speaking directly to Luke's contemporaries. The warning is directed to them, in the light of the belief, however

(v. 32), that God is anxious to give the Kingdom to them. The urgency of the response demanded is controlled by the greatness of the gift that they are promised. The promise is real, and this suggests that it will not be long delayed. The element of delay points not to the future but to the past. Time has gone on. Luke's readers are in danger of losing hope and that preparedness that characterized the earliest Christians (1 Thess 4:13–18).

So, in vv. 49–53, Luke includes a passage that points to the need for disciples to respond to the urgency of the times even at the expense of causing divisions within their own families. vv. 49 and 50 contain singularly difficult sayings of Jesus. Set in the context of a particular stage of his ministry, they nevertheless are directed to Luke's contemporaries. What is the fire that Jesus came to bring? In the prophets, fire can be a symbol of purification (Isa 4:4) and, more frequently, of judgement (Am 1:4). Jesus here seems to be referring to the work of the Spirit (Acts 2:19) especially through baptism into the Christian community (3:16). That activity will come about as a result of his own 'baptism' which would be achieved by way of his death and exaltation. A saying at Mk 10:38 understands Jesus' death in this way and links it to the suffering of the disciples. Luke is probably using the same ideas, though, in keeping with his refusal to isolate the deaths either of Jesus or the disciples, he extends its meaning to embrace Jesus' whole way of life which makes his exaltation possible. Luke's readers must be prepared for difficult times.

(12:54–13:35) Jewish Refusal of the Signs of the Times In Palestine, rain clouds come from the west, the Mediterranean, and dry winds from the south or east. People, adept at reading these signs, remain totally insensitive to other signs that are around them. Crises in their lives are settled speedily and before they bring irreversible disasters, yet the greatest crisis of the present is ignored. Luke uses two otherwise unknown episodes to point to the reality of the crisis facing them. Some Galileans were killed by Pilate's men in the temple and some other people, staying in Jerusalem, died when a tower in the city walls collapsed. They were no worse than the people Jesus is addressing who face an equal fate if they do not repent (see Lk 21:20–4). It is now the climactic hour. In a parable, Jesus talks of the last, desperate measures to produce fruit from an unfruitful tree and of the severity of the response that a further failure to produce will bring. 'If it bears fruit next year, well and good; if not, you can cut it down.'

The nature of the problem with the Jewish nation is illustrated by an incident in the synagogue. Jesus, on the sabbath, heals a woman who for eighteen years had been crippled with some spinal injury. The one who had general responsibility for ordering the life of the synagogue objects on the grounds that, since the illness was not life-threatening, the people, who presumably were understood as encouraging Jesus to respond to the need, might seek such healings at times other than the sabbath. In reply, Jesus points out how this attitude denies the rational approach which they in fact exercise in relation to the sabbath law. More seriously, it fails to acknowledge just what is happening in Jesus' ministry. It does not recognize that what is taking place here is nothing less than the defeat of Satan and the establishment of God's rule (13:16). Two further parables make this point. The Kingdom to which the miracle witnesses is like a mustard plant. In its beginnings, it is small and insignificant; when it is grown, however, it becomes a tree that, like that of Dan 4:21, is strong and embraces the nations of the earth. The parable of the yeast makes the same point. What begins as insignificant and virtually unseen, permeates three measures of flour. Gen 18:16 connects such an amount with Sarah's feeding of her godlike visitors. It has been suggested that in ordinary circumstances, the amount would feed more than one hundred people. In any case, the point here is the power of that which seems to have but little beginnings, and the contrast between the beginning and the end. Something strange and not easily comprehended is happening in Jesus' ministry.

So, Luke reminds his readers of Jesus' journey (13:22), of the urgency it proclaims, and the response it demands. The message of the section is summed up in a further parable where people, invited to enter but failing to respond, will not discern the reality of the situation until it is too late (13:25–30). Their pleas of affinity will carry no weight. Jesus' contemporaries will see the patriarchs and the prophets included but they themselves left outside. Their founding fathers will be joined, not by themselves, but by those from the nations. Those who consider themselves first will in actuality be last. Such is the challenge of Jesus.

The first half of the journey comes to a climax (13:31–5) with a challenge to Jerusalem that actually prefigures the events of Palm Sunday (19:29–44). Some friendly Pharisees warn Jesus of his danger. Jesus' reply in 13:32, 33 allows Luke to give his understanding of the significance of the journey and its conclusion. They carry forward what he has already expressed at 9:31, 51. Jesus in his exorcisms and healings is already sowing the seed of the Kingdom. That will happen 'today and tomorrow' and will lead into 'the third day' when Jesus will 'finish his work'. In the light of 9:31, 51, what completes his work is the cycle of events in Jerusalem—the passion, resurrection, and ascension—which will enable both his exaltation and the gift of the Spirit on his people. That may well involve his death, but there is the divine necessity about it. The actual words of 13:32 are 'I am being perfected', which uses the divine passive and means 'God is perfecting me'. Jesus, for Luke, is the eschatological prophet of whom Moses spoke (Deut 18:15) and, since he is the agent of God's renewal of Israel, he must like so many of the prophets suffer, and that nowhere other than in Jerusalem. Luke's gospel begins and ends in that city.

Jesus now (13:34) laments over the city, as he will do when he enters it (19:41–4), for he sees her rushing onwards to complete her history of refusal of God's agents. She will choose instead to follow a path that will lead to her own destruction. Jesus is often understood here as speaking as God's wisdom who reaches out to Israel with a tenderness that expresses her feminine concern (e.g. Wis 6:12–20). He reflects her gentleness and desire to draw humanity into relationship with God. Jerusalem rejects him. When he enters the holy city, only his disciples, and not her people, will acknowledge him (19:37–40). Her acknowledgement must await another day.

(14:1–24) A Sabbath Meal with a Pharisee Jesus, at a meal with a Pharisee, is again critical of the assembly, though this time with far less severity than his previous attack (11:37–53). Here, they watch him not with hostility as in 6:6, but with an interest that rises above mere suspicion. To Jesus' question, 'Is it lawful to cure on the sabbath or not?' their silence, though not assent, acknowledges the correctness of Jesus' stance. His further question (v. 5) would seem to recognize that. Sabbath meals in particular take on the character of anticipations of those in the Kingdom. Jesus now gives reasons why their meals fail in this respect. They reflect pride rather than humility (he records the same deficiency on the part of the disciples at the last supper (22:24–7)). They are exclusive rather than outreaching (vv. 12–14). At this point, a guest proclaims the blessedness of those who will share in the banquet of the Kingdom. He no doubt assumes that he will be one of those, and it is to this attitude that Luke directs Jesus' parable of the rejected invitation which is found, in a different setting and with significantly different details, in Mt 22:1–14. The meaning Luke sees in the parable depends upon the view taken of the 'excuses' which almost certainly express his own ideas. What is suggested of the attitude of those who make them? Do they regard them as legitimate reasons for their non-attendance or are they put forward as excuses born of indifference? Commentators who accept them as reasons suggest that the business deals needed to be completed before the end of the day and that inspection of the merchandise could take place after the deal itself had been agreed. The excuses reflect those of Deut 20:5–7 that allow reasons for not answering the call to take part in a holy war. However, though this might be suggested of the third excuse, it bears little relation to the first two. The parable itself would appear to take them as excuses rather than reasons. Yet the first two are given politely and point to the necessity of the tasks they go to perform. The third, though sometimes seen as less polite, is not really so but, relating to Deuteronomy, assumes its validity. It seems that the excuses appear valid to those who make them. They assume that they will be acceptable to the host. His reaction, which is severe, no doubt caught them by surprise. Where did they go wrong? Their mistake was to presume upon the relationship that demanded more response from them than they realized. They failed to acknowledge the urgency of the summons.

The giver of the banquet reacted fiercely. The invitation was issued to the outsiders of the city and then to those who inhabited the country, to those who rested along the lanes. This double invitation reflects Luke's interest in both the Jewish and the Gentile missions of the church. 'Compel' expresses the urgency of the task. As in 13:22–30, those originally invited will be excluded. Their attitude makes it a self-exclusion. The Jews, the people of God, were failing to see either the truth in Jesus or the urgency of his call. As was suggested in the Nazareth sermon (4:23–4), their confidence in their relationship with God was misplaced.

(14:25–35) The Cost of Discipleship Discipleship may be a response to grace, as Luke's story of Jesus emphasizes, but it makes demands which mean that it should not be entered upon lightly. The requirement to 'hate' is Semitic exaggeration and may reflect an idiom which means 'love less than' as Mt 10:37 correctly interprets it. Luke is certainly emphatic, and the references to 'wife' and 'life itself' may be due to him.

Disciples are to 'carry the cross' in a manner of life which reflects that of Jesus and in a discipleship that goes with him all the way to Jerusalem. They are to recognize the true cost of discipleship and are not to enter upon something that they do not have the resources to pursue. Otherwise, they are in danger of being in the ridiculous position of one who sets out to build a watch-tower—which may be either for the protection of personal property or, more grandly, part of a city's defence—and does not have the resources to complete the operation. A king will not go to war without first realistically assessing both the demands of the task and the resources he needs to meet it. v. 33, like 12:33, expresses the Lucan emphasis upon the complete renunciation of possessions (though see Lk 16:9–13). Salt is 'good' in biblical thought for giving taste where there is none (Job 6:6) and for preserving what otherwise would perish (Num 18:19). Whether salt can lose its flavour has been much debated. The point here of course is the contrast in this respect between salt and discipleship. What is difficult if not impossible for one, is relatively easy for the other. Discipleship which loses its commitment is worse than useless.

(15:1–32) At Meals with Tax-Collectors and Sinners Jesus has already been shown at a meal with tax-collectors and sinners (5:30), and 7:34 has called him their friend. Tax-collectors (rather, 'toll-collectors') and sinners were those who, by their lifestyle, had deliberately opted out of membership of the covenantal people of Israel. They were outsiders. Now, the Pharisees and scribes complain that he not only receives them, but is in the habit of eating with them. They acknowledge that, by this action, Jesus is anticipating their inclusion within the kingdom of God. Not only is Jesus claiming to have God's authority to do this but, in his easy acceptance of them, he is from their point of view belittling the holiness of God. In bypassing the law and its standards in this way, he is in danger of denying the righteousness of God and the very outlook on which the Mosaic covenant was grounded. Luke was very conscious of this complaint, that was addressed not only to Jesus but, later, to the early church and that was in fact a subject of disagreement within the young church. In reply, he brings together three parables of Jesus which may or may not originally have been directed specifically to this issue.

Compared with Matthew's version of the parable of the lost sheep (Mt 18:12–14), Luke emphasizes the shepherd's responsibility for the loss (v. 3), the unconditional nature of the search, and the fact that the joy was brought about by the sinner's repentance. Repentance is emphasized in Luke's gospel (5:32; 7:47) but in this parable, as at 7:36–50, it is the outreach of God that is primary. It is his searching and finding which bring about repentance. The move to restore the relationship enables the repentance even though it cannot compel it. The initiative of God and his part in bringing about restoration is further emphasized in the parable of the lost coin. Again, talk of 'repentance' does not quite fit the stance of the parable. It appears to have been introduced, not because the movement of the parable itself required it, but because Luke was sensitive to the charge that emphasis upon the gracious outreach of God could underplay the necessity for response on the part of those it met.

So these shorter parables lead into that of the prodigal son. Its significance has been variously assessed, depending upon which character is thought to be the central means of giving expression to it. This in turn depends upon how those characters are perceived and how their various actions are understood. Recent interpreters have emphasized the outrageous conduct of the younger son. His initial request of the father has been seen as one which totally disregards the fifth commandment (Ex 20:12), his realizing of his assets as giving little heed to the Jewish belief in the land as God's gift to his people (1 Kings 21:3), his squandering of his money as a sign of his loose living, and his hiring of himself to a Gentile as a witness to his contempt for the covenantal people. This assessment would not appear too negative. The story builds up his offences in a spectacular way to make him a strong foil to the actions of the father which demand some evaluation and on which the point of the story depends. More open to question is the motive which brought about the prodigal's decision to return. v. 17a has sometimes been claimed as a Semitism which carries the meaning 'to repent'. This, however, is by no means clear. The Greek can rather mean 'starting to think straight', that is to stop being in despair and to be logical. v. 17b bases his rethinking on self-centred considerations, and it is these that determine the words of his approach to the father which could as easily give expression to calculation as to genuine penitence. Some interpreters would see a change of heart at v. 21 and think that this is brought about by the father's initiative. This appears to be more in keeping with the story as a whole, though a genuine repentance remains a possibility rather than a certainty.

If this is the reading of the younger son which the story demands, it has implications for an assessment of the father's actions. It is generally agreed that the father's act of running to meet his son and the manner of his embrace would be regarded as demeaning for a Near-Eastern parent. A Jewish parable, often compared with that of the prodigal son, portrays a father who, though equally concerned for his son and anxious for his return, takes an initiative which is nevertheless consistent with his own honour (quoted in Young 1998: 149–50). The father of our parable seems peculiarly indifferent to it. It is not at all clear that those who later join the festivities would have approved of his actions and would not have thought that these were going wholly over the top. It is in the light of this that his earlier dealings with this son have been examined. Jewish law made provision for his actions in dividing his 'living' (the Gk. in 12b is a stronger term than that used in 12a and really suggests 'his means of living'), though Sir 33:19–23 warns against it. A safeguard was possible which, by the use of the phrase, 'From today and after my death', guaranteed the future gift but allowed no use of it until then (see the discussion of the parable in Scott 1989). The father ignores this safeguard. He has acted generously, even foolishly, towards his son's demands.

Luke's use of the parable as the climax of Jesus' reply to the Pharisees places the emphasis upon its last part. Whilst this has sometimes been seen as a Lucan addition—for it certainly serves as a true expression of his understanding of God's relationship with the Jewish people—there seems little reason to demand this. The story of the elder brother serves as the climax of the parable which loses its cutting edge without it. It is this which encapsulates what would seem to be Jesus' own challenge to those who opposed his stance. But how is the elder brother to be assessed? He has often been seen as hard, dutiful but unloving, ungenerous in his actions and dismissive in his judgements both of the brother and his father. vv. 29–30 certainly portray anger, fury even, and resentment. Whilst not meant to present him in a good light, it should not be assumed, however, that they express an outlook that merits instant condemnation. No doubt already critical of his brother, and, indeed, of his father's indulgence of him, he hears of the latest happenings from a servant after a day's work in the fields. Festivities are happening because of events that concern him fundamentally, and he is left to discover them for himself. The father's indulgence of one son amounts to a seeming indifference to the other. But appearances are wrong. The father is as concerned for him as for the other, and all that he has is his (v. 31). He is faced nevertheless with a radical challenge. If he does go in, the learning experience for him will be almost as great as it must be for the younger brother. He will have to see himself and his relationships with both his father and his brother in a wholly new way.

(16:1–13) The Dishonest Steward Ch. 15 has revealed a clear standpoint which is developed in a unified manner. Ch. 16 is very different. Though not as disconnected as is sometimes suggested, the overriding concern with riches does not permeate the whole chapter, and the parable of Dives and Lazarus (vv. 19–31) is not wholly exhausted by this one theme. If the final parable in ch. 15 is one of those with obvious relevance, the first in ch. 16 is noteworthy for its obscurity. It is not evident that Luke himself does justice to it.

Commentators are uncertain of the extent of the parable, for a number of injunctions about the use of money have been appended to it. Because they relate in different ways to the events in the parable itself, they are likely to come from various occasions in Jesus' ministry and to have been brought together by Luke in a somewhat artificial manner. vv. 7, 8a, 8b, and 9 have all been suggested as endings of the original parable. That v. 9 is part of the parable is unlikely. It uses the same Greek word, translated 'dishonest' in NRSV in both instances, in a way that is different from its use in v. 8. The servant is 'dishonest' in our understanding of the term. All mammon (NRSV wealth), however, is called 'dishonest' in the sense that it is material possessions understood as the things in which one puts one's trust and that therefore encourage an acquisitive attitude and a self-reliance; it separates one from God (hence 'unrighteous' is probably a better term). 'The meaning is worldly wealth as opposed to heavenly treasure' (Marshall 1978). If v. 9 were part of the parable, it would be encouraging us to use our wealth gained dishonestly in a way that brought us some benefits: it would be virtually condoning dishonesty! On the other hand, it is unlikely that the parable stops at the end of v. 7. The reason this is sometimes suggested is because of the problem of v. 8. Why would 'his master' commend one who had actually defrauded him even if he had acted shrewdly? The Greek of v. 8 has simply 'the lord' and, since this is the term that Luke uses frequently in the journey narrative to refer to Jesus, the verse is then accepted as a comment by him on the parable. Such a view, however, leaves the parable too open-ended and avoids the shock that is at the heart of so many of Jesus' parables. The real challenge is the master's commendation of the steward. What does this say, not only about the steward but also about the master?

It is sometimes maintained that the master's commendation of the steward does not present a problem. In order to bypass the biblical prohibition of usury, when a loan was made the interest was often added to the capital as a single figure. It is this final figure, that would have included not merely the master's interest but also the steward's legitimate commission, which was being reduced. The master was not being harmed but was actually being made to appear generous to the debtors. Ingenious though this explanation is, it does not account for the parable's description of the steward as 'dishonest'. Moreover, it does not allow for the fact that Jesus' parables are not simple, realistic stories, but rather tales of unusual situations which challenge so much of the accepted and natural order of things.

It seems then that the parable proper ends at v. 8a with 8b being Jesus' own comment on the story. v. 9, 'And I tell you', marks Luke's introduction to the further, but not necessarily related, sayings of Jesus. Read thus, the parable tells a story of an inefficient (v. 1) steward who, facing dismissal for his indolence, meets the crisis with uncharacteristic vigour and ingenuity. The master, though defrauded, recognizes the initiative and, himself working from the perspective of 'unrighteous mammon', actually commends the steward's shrewdness. There is nothing to say that he reinstates him, but sharing in his worldly stance, he can appreciate a sensible move, indeed an ingenious one, when he sees it. 'If only', says the parable, 'the sons of light had the same appreciation of the crisis confronting them in the drawing near of the Kingdom, and the same energy in meeting it.' It is a parable on a par with those of ch. 12.

Luke has the parable addressed to disciples. In its context, they would include those whom Jesus' table-sharing was receiving into the Kingdom, the tax-collectors and sinners. Their reception needed a response and this parable confronts them. v. 9 tells them to 'make friends' by a right use of 'unrighteous mammon'. These friends may be the poor who will inherit the Kingdom; more likely, it is the heavenly court who will then receive them when the things of this world come to an end. Faithfulness with 'unrighteous mammon' means using it in the service of the poor (v. 11). They must free themselves from its shackles. They cannot be slaves to God and to mammon. Luke's use of the parable has reduced some of the eschatological urgency of the original. It shows how parables can be used outside their original context, but it shows too that such a use can all too easily evacuate the parable of some of its shock and challenge.

(16:14–31) Reply to the Pharisees Pharisees ridicule Jesus' challenge to the tax-collectors; they obviously do not expect them to give up attitudes of a lifetime. Luke calls them 'lovers of money' but this charge should not be seen as a considered historical evaluation of them. It is determined more by the demands of the narrative than by historical fact. They are seen as self-reliant, self-satisfied, and, therefore, as dismissive of others. Jesus, however, justifies his call to the tax-collectors. It is true that his coming marks a new age when the grace of the Kingdom is proclaimed and people are rushing into it (v. 16). But that does not mean the end of the law's demands (v. 17). The tax-collectors must adopt a new attitude to the things of this world. Jesus was also criticized for receiving the sinners too freely. Again, however, that does not mean an end of the righteous requirements of the law. At the heart of its commandments about sexual morality was its high standard concerning marriage and divorce. Jesus said little about sexual attitudes, but he did talk about marriage. Luke therefore includes this saying where he actually intensifies the law's demands. His free acceptance of sinners did not mean an indifferent acquiescence in their standards. Grace exposed and recreated those who responded to its gentle outreach.

Luke includes the parable of Dives and Lazarus, for it continues the theme of the dangers of riches and the self-centredness they encourage. It makes its point by taking over a tale that was widely disseminated in the ancient world. Luke himself possibly found it in the source from which he has taken the parable of the dishonest steward. Proclaiming the reversal of fortunes in the future age, it judges those who neglect the poor. Luke has Jesus direct it to the Pharisees, and it may be this parable that has encouraged him to call them 'lovers of money'. Its final verse (31), which is an address of Abraham to Dives, would seem to contain Christian thoughts about the resurrection of Jesus. This widens out the meaning of the parable beyond its concern with money. It becomes a comment on the Pharisees who fail to respond, not only to Jesus himself, but also to the Christian proclamation about him. If they had really understood Moses and the prophets, they would, like the loyally devout Jews of the infancy narratives, have responded to him. As far as Luke is concerned (as he will make abundantly clear through his picture of Paul in Acts), Christianity is the fulfilment of the Jewish faith. A responsive Jew will embrace Jesus as Christ (Acts 26:22–3). At 16:31 a section of the journey narrative which began with 14:1 and which is largely concerned with the tragedy of the Pharisees' rejection of Jesus is completed.

(17:1–10) Teaching for the Disciples Ch. 17 begins the last section of the journey narrative. As befits a journey that ends with the disciples greeting Jesus as he enters Jerusalem (19:37–8), the teaching of this last section is aimed at them. Other characters and incidents are included, but the lessons to be learned from them are directed primarily to the disciples who are travelling on the road to Jerusalem with Jesus and who will, in relation to the twelve, become the nucleus of the renewed people of God.

The section begins with four disparate sayings which talk about life in that community. 'The little ones', that is, its vulnerable members, will inevitably be caused to stumble by the actions of some of their fellow-Christians. They will even be made to lose their faith. The punishment of the one who is responsible for this will be great. The sinner within the community must be rebuked, but forgiveness must follow repentance. Individuals must be constant in their forgiveness of those who ask it of them. They must strive after faith, but must avoid all sense of superiority that arises out of the attitude that God is obligated to them.

(17:11–19) The Ten Lepers v. 11 points to Jesus' continuing journey to Jerusalem in terms that have caused considerable difficulty. The Greek text has a number of variations in attempts to have it make better geographical sense. It may be that Luke's knowledge of the geography of Palestine was hazy; certainly, he was controlled more by literary than by geographical concerns. The odd geographical reference is determined by the need to have a Samaritan leper and Jewish lepers together meet Jesus as he journeyed to Jerusalem. All ten were cleansed, but it is only the one who returns to give thanks who is 'saved' (the Gk. has this significance for Lk 8:12, 36, 50). He is a Samaritan. Like Luke's characterization of the disciples as 'the poor' (6:20), he is an outsider who has been brought in. Christians must retain that sense, and the thankfulness that should go with it, if they are not to become like the Pharisees and cease to act as those who live out of grace.

(17:20–18:8) Eschatological Urgency The passage 12:32–53 had warned the disciples to be alert for the return of Christ. This section takes up this theme and expands upon it, this time, however, climaxing not so much in the warning as in a pointing to the event as an object of hope.

Some Pharisees ask Jesus 'when the kingdom of God was coming'. There is not a straight fit between their question and Jesus' answer for, whereas the former is concerned with the timing of the Kingdom, the reply talks rather about its nature. What is meant by the reply is not easily determined, however, for, as the translations make clear, the meaning in the Greek of its crucial term entos humōn is not unambiguous. Most naturally, it means 'within you' and would seem to suggest that the Kingdom is an inner disposition, attitude, and quality. This however would give to the Kingdom a meaning which would be unique in the NT. Elsewhere, the Kingdom is understood as corporate, an activity of God, something which is being established either on the earth or in heaven and which embraces the whole person. Whilst an inner disposition might do justice to the thought of 'receiving the Kingdom', it does not express the idea of 'entering it' or of its visible manifestation in power. The term should therefore rather be understood as 'in the midst of you'. Jesus' refusal of 'things that can be observed' refers to unambiguous signs that enable the coming of the Kingdom to be deduced, calculated, and guaranteed. 'Look, here it is', or 'There it is', are responses to observable facts that give irrefutable witness to its coming. They guarantee its certainty. Jesus denies this possibility but says that, even if they cannot see it, the Kingdom is already present 'in your midst'. As with 7:22, 11:20, and 16:16, it has to be acknowledged in situations in which it can be discerned but which nevertheless remain less than irrefutable demonstrations of its presence. Jesus answers the Pharisees' question which, though its underlying outlook is quite different, has presuppositions that are not far removed from those of the disciples at 21:7. The different answers meet the different stances of the questioners. Pharisaic scepticism has to be countered in a way that is different from the quieting of disciples' understandable fears.

It is those fears, however, that Jesus now addresses. The disciples will long to see 'one of the days of the Son of Man' and will not see it (v. 22). The use of the plural here is strange. It is used again at v. 26, though there it may simply be occasioned by the use of 'the days of Noah'. Elsewhere in the passage, the single 'day' is used (vv. 24, 30) and this suggests that the plural may have no special significance but simply refers to the period after the initial revelation of the Son of Man in glory. On the other hand, it is possible that it has more significance. If this is so, Luke may be using it to refer to those occasions when, in the ongoing life of the community, a glimpse of the Son of Man is allowed. Luke tells how Stephen has a vision of the Son of Man in glory (Acts 7:56), and it may be that he is thinking of moments like this.

The disciples will long for the revelation of the Son of Man in glory and, in their urgency, may be tempted to fix their hopes on false substitutes. By the time Luke wrote, some disciples were saying that the parousia could be accepted as a present inner experience which had already taken place and which gave them an esoteric understanding and a licence to behave in a way that was unconstrained by the ethical standards of the present order. Paul, in 1 Corinthians, may be combating such an outlook. Luke here has Jesus warn against these untrue, but alluring, substitutes. Disciples must not be led into the false sense of security that they promised and must not enter upon a life of self-indulgence that was based upon nothing other than delusion. Just as Jesus had to suffer and be rejected, those who are his must follow the same path which cannot be avoided (v. 25). The day of the Son of Man will be devastatingly obvious to all and will result in a judgement as severe as that which befell the inhabitants of the earth at the time of the flood and of Sodom at the time of Lot (Gen 19:24–6). The disciples' final question, 'Where, Lord?' (v. 36) seems still lacking in understanding. Its purpose would seem to be to allow the warnings to come to a climax with the proverbial saying of v. 37. Its cryptic but vivid imagery, as anyone who has thrown a piece of bread to gulls on the seashore knows, points to the suddenness of an appearance, the tumult it occasions, the fierceness of the event, and the inescapable certainty that something has happened.

Warning gives way to hope, for it is that which, for Luke, expresses the main significance of the parousia. The parable of the importunate widow (18:1–8) teaches that the disciples should pray for its coming and that they should not lose heart. If even an unjust judge is moved to respond to a widow's cry for vindication, how much more will the just God vindicate those who set their hopes on him? He hears their cries and will vindicate them 'speedily'. v. 8a has sometimes been translated 'suddenly' in support of the theory that Luke did not expect an early paraousia, but the use of the term at Acts 12:2, 25:4, as well as the sense of the parable itself, is against this. The verse promises a speedy vindication of those who long for it, and the sense of the passage as a whole means that this cannot refer to anything other than the parousia. v. 8b, of course, does allow enough time for a loss of faith but, as at 12:35–48, this is already happening. One of Luke's purposes in writing was to combat this.

(18:9–17) Parable of a Pharisee and a Tax-collector and the Incident of the Children Luke has Jesus tell the parable to some who 'trusted in themselves that they were righteous and regarded others with contempt'. 'The ones who trusted in themselves' are those who, when they engaged in self-examination, concluded that they were overall acceptable to God; they had a basic confidence that God would look favourably upon them. To suggest that it expresses a trust in oneself rather than in God would be overstretching the meaning, for this is not what is suggested of the Pharisee in the parable and it is unlikely that Luke read it in this way. The phrase serves as a foil to the 'despising' of others. This, for Luke, is a very strong term and is used by him of Herod's mockery of Jesus (23:11). An attitude that expresses disdain is every bit as bad as open physical mockery. Who, though, are the ones whom Luke sees as addressed by the parable? It is certainly not limited to the Pharisees, but are they included within the addressees? This is, in the end, unlikely. To address it directly to a group that included Pharisees would seem gratuitously offensive and would be in danger of encouraging its other hearers to regard them with something of the outlook that the parable itself condemns. It would not have fitted a Jesus who was often at meals with them. Jesus, rather, uses this parable to address the crowd of disciples, and the incident of the children which follows it actually illustrates the need. Disciples were themselves in danger of becoming as excluding in their way as the Pharisees were in theirs (cf. 9:59–60).

The Pharisee stands apart, 'by himself'. This seems the most likely translation, though the Greek is again ambiguous and could mean 'prayed to himself'. This would then mean that he prayed silently; again, however, it should not be pressed to suggest that his prayer stayed with him and did not ascend to God. The grounds of his confidence are his keeping the rules of his group which, going beyond the requirements of the law which did not require regular fasting, sought to express a purity which exceeded that of most people. He also tithed beyond the requirements of the law. These actions are not condemned. Disciples of John fasted and Luke reports how Jesus accepted the practice for members of the Christian community (5:35). It was the attitude of this particular Pharisee (and it is not suggested that he was typical of all Pharisees any more than it maintains that the one in the parable stood for all tax-collectors) that let him down. His thanksgiving was genuine and was certainly not portrayed as hypocritical. It is an extension of that outlook that is found in the Psalms and expresses a genuine piety (119:65–72). But it has its dangers. Here, the primary one is the separation from humanity as a whole which, in the thanksgiving for one's own acknowledgement by God, denies it to others. So, the tax-collector went away 'justified rather than the other'. His acknowledgment of his sin and his call for mercy make for a bridge between himself and God that the other's attitude did not allow. He was justified, that is, acknowledged by God and open to his reconciling power. Whether his prayer can be counted as penitence is more doubtful, for there is no suggestion that he was turning aside from his actual way of life (cf. the response of Zacchaeus, 19:8). Yet it is precisely this that gives the parable its starkness. He, whilst remaining a sinner, was actually more open to God than was the Pharisee. 'Justified rather than the other' should probably be read as 'more than'. This is how Luke uses the phrase at 13:2, 4, and it makes the startling contrast without either denying entirely the prayer of the Pharisee or approving completely the lifestyle of the tax-collector.

Luke follows the parable with the episode of the disciples and the children. By not having the Markan reference to Jesus' blessing of them (Mk 10:16), he makes the whole point of the story focus upon the rebuke of the disciples. It is to 'such as these that the Kingdom belongs'. It is to those without status and without self-sufficiency that the Kingdom is offered and, indeed, given. It is pure gift and therefore cannot be received unless one takes on the stance of a little child. This should not be seen as simplicity, or innocence, or some other idealistic outlook. It is something much more demanding, namely a consciousness of need, of a total lack of self-sufficiency, and a recognition of one's dependence upon others and so upon God. It is an abandoning of all concern with status. The Kingdom is something that in the end can only be received. Any striving for the Kingdom that is enjoined (12:31) must be exercised only as a conscious response to grace.

(18:18–30) The Very Rich Ruler Luke's is a sympathetic version of the story that is found also in Matthew and Mark. At Mk 10:22 the man is so shocked by Jesus' call to dispose of his goods and follow him that he goes away grieving. Jesus' comments about the snare of riches are addressed to the disciples. In Luke, he is saddened by Jesus' reply for, since he was 'very rich', the demands being made upon him are severe. But he does not immediately go away. Jesus 'looks at him' and tells him about the difficulties that face the rich man's entry into the Kingdom. Luke's version of the story presents a continuing challenge to the ruler. It does not underplay the snares of riches, but, in keeping with what Luke's narrative has said earlier about the tax-collectors (16:1–13) (and with its reporting of the Zacchaeus incident, 19:1–10), it does not rule out the ruler's future response. The suggestion of its impossibility is countered by Jesus (vv. 26–7). Peter's assertion that they have done what the ruler seems unwilling to do is met by the promise of compensation in this age and eternal life in the age to come. They serve as contrasts to the ruler's refusal. That they have not yet perceived the real nature of the demand, however, is made clear by the stark contrast between Peter's outlook and that of Jesus as this is revealed in the following episode.

(18:31–4) The Third Passion Prediction In Matthew and Mark, this prediction occurs at the beginning of the journey to Jerusalem. Luke has now resumed an order of events that is close to theirs, but, because of his long central narrative, this prediction occurs near journey's end. A number of things are significant in Luke's version and show clear evidence of his hand. The events that are to take place are in 'accomplishment' of all the prophetic witness to the Son of Man (the same verb that is used of Jesus' time in Jerusalem at 13:32). Nothing is said (as at 22:66–71) of his condemnation by the Jews. At the conclusion of Jesus' disclosure, Luke alone points to the twelve's total lack of understanding (cf. 9:45). Luke could hardly have given this a greater emphasis. They still have much to learn. Even though he treats them less harshly than Mark (e.g. he does not have the incident found next in Mk 10:35–45), he continues to show how much understanding they lack (cf. 22:24–7).

(18:35–43) The Blind Man of Jericho In order to accommodate the story of Zacchaeus that Luke uses as a climax, he puts this episode at the approach to Jericho rather than at its exit as the other evangelists suggest. Those who rebuke the blind man are disciples who are at the front of the procession and it is these therefore who are themselves rebuked by Jesus' action in stopping his progress in order to respond to the pleas of the blind man and heal him. The blind man follows Jesus 'glorifying God', a response that is used by Luke on occasions he deems significant (2:20; 7:16; 23:47).

(19:1–10) Zacchaeus 'Chief tax-collector' is not found elsewhere in the NT and probably not outside it. It seems coined by Luke to make this episode climactic in Jesus' dealings with the tax-collectors. For the same reason, he describes Zacchaeus as 'rich'. The cards are stacked against him but his response to Jesus is met by a request, not merely to eat with him, but actually to stay with him. Those who hear it 'grumble', the same response that the Pharisees have earlier made (15:2). Now, it is made by 'all', which must include the disciples who are accompanying Jesus. They complain that Jesus has gone in to be 'the guest of a sinner'. Zacchaeus's words in v. 8 are sometimes understood as descriptions of his present actions: they report his current lifestyle, and Jesus' reply is then taken as an acknowledgement of this. Such an interpretation, however, fails to do justice to Luke's previous stories of Jesus' dealings with tax-collectors. Zacchaeus's response is rather a declaration of intent. Jesus proclaims that it makes him a true son of Abraham and means that he is included within God's saving act which fulfils his promises to the patriarch (1:55, 73).

(19:11–27) Parable of the Pounds Luke says that Jesus told the parable in order to combat the belief of some that his arrival in the city would trigger the appearance of the Kingdom. Just what is meant by that, however, is not easily determined for, as the parable stands, it does not point to a delay. The introduction therefore suggests that Luke himself saw the parable as a means of meeting the disappointment caused to some of his contemporaries by the delay of the parousia; Jesus himself did not expect it to be immediate. The parable as Luke tells it is likely to have developed from the one which is included at Mt 25:14–30 where it is also given an eschatological setting. Luke replaces talents with pounds which were coins of much smaller value; he does not differentiate between the disciples' gifts of grace (cf. 8:8), and the ten stand for everybody. He nevertheless deals with only three of the servants. Luke's version of the parable is made more complicated by the addition of a subplot in which the nobleman goes away to receive a kingdom and, on his return, acts as a monarch. Though it is usually read as an allegory of Jesus' ascension and parousia, this is not really obvious, for it is unlikely that Luke would have presented Jesus as a claimant to his throne. He sees his kingship rather as bestowed on him by God because of his obedience and surrender; Jesus certainly does not claim it (3:9–12). The story-line owes much to the events of 4 BCE, when Archelaus went to Rome to claim his father's throne and encountered strong resistance. To picture Jesus in terms of such an incident would be extremely odd. That the nobleman-become-king stands for Jesus is made more unlikely by the third servant's wholly unflattering description of him (v. 21) as rapacious and a fraudster, an assessment that the king does not deny (v. 22). If his reply were to be taken as an accommodation to the servant's assessment of him, that in itself would seem to confirm the judgement. It is more likely, however, that he is described as acknowledging the truth of the servant's description. The king is not a pleasant character.

The parable therefore is unlikely to be an allegory, but is rather, in the words of Evans (1990), 'another of the risqué parables... in which the central figure is a reprehensible character'. In pointing to the demands made by the manner of the Kingdom's appearing in Jesus, Luke has used this device, not only in the parable of the dishonest steward (16:1–9), but also, and with a close parallel, in that of the importunate widow (18:1–8), where one is encouraged to pray for its coming, and the friend at midnight (11:5–8) where one is told to ask to live out of its power. All these use unlikely characters to point to the crisis which the coming of the Kingdom brings to those who would be ready to receive it. Their use emphasizes the radicality of its demands. This does not mean, however, that the third servant is to be admired as someone who refuses to play by the lord's corrupt rules (Herzog 1994). He made a wrong response to the demands of one whose character he had rightly assessed and whose service he had entered into. His lord required of him a commitment and a willingness to venture all which he was not able to meet. Fear and self-protection held him back. For him there might be some excuse. There is none, says the parable, for those who have willingly committed themselves to discipleship in the service of him who is not to be feared but loved and whose treasures do not consist of unrighteous mammon but of the life of the Kingdom itself. Disciples must risk all for the Kingdom and not let its gifts come to nothing either by acquiescing in the present or by despairing of its future (17:22–18:8).

Jesus in Jerusalem (19:28–24:53)

(19:28–44) The Entry into Jerusalem All four gospels tell of Jesus' entry into Jerusalem. Luke's narrative has a number of distinctive features. He emphasizes the connection of the event with the Mount of Olives which stands some 2 miles east of Jerusalem. Like Matthew and Mark, the story begins on the approach to the mount (v. 29) but, unlike them, he has the acknowledgement of Jesus take place on the top of the mount itself, just as Jerusalem is coming into view (vv. 37–8). In Acts the ascension takes place there and, in view of Acts 1:11, this is where Luke expects the return of Jesus (cf. Zech 14:4). In keeping with the last section of the journey narrative, Jesus is acknowledged by the disciples alone (vv. 36, 37). Jesus' reply to the Pharisees (v. 40) suggests that Jerusalem's inhabitants are silent. The disciples stand for her true people and, if they had kept quiet, the stones of the city would have had to respond to Jesus because Jerusalem herself could not have allowed him to enter her unacknowledged. The response, as Luke tells it, addresses Jesus as king but does not have Mark's reference to the coming Kingdom. It stresses Jesus' messianic entry into his inheritance (Zech 9:9) but, in a revised version of the angels' song (2:14), emphasizes that this is first realized in the heavenly realm which is all-important for Luke. What is to happen on earth follows from what happens there (cf. 10:18).

Luke alone tells how Jesus weeps over the city (vv. 41–4). This is the time of her 'visitation', a term which, though in the OT can be one of either judgement or redemption, in the light of 1:68, 7:16, is here to be understood in the latter sense. Because Jerusalem rejects this and follows her own determined path, her destruction is inevitable. Though this is described in terms which are taken from the OT, it suggests knowledge of the Roman destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE. Jewish rejection of Jesus and his way of peace leads them into confrontation with Rome with its inevitably disastrous results. Though the biblical language catches these up into the purposes of God, the description as a whole does not suggest that the events are understood by Luke as actually determined by him. Israel is the cause of her own ruin.

(19:45–8) Jesus and the Temple In Mark, what is usually described as Jesus' 'cleansing' of the temple is pictured as its rejection and, at his trial before the Sanhedrin, false witnesses accuse him of saying that he would destroy it. In Matthew Jesus takes possession of it and it is there that his messiahship is acknowledged; at the trial, false witnesses say rather that he claimed to be able to destroy it. Luke's episode is much shorter. Jesus drives out the money-changers and complains about the temple's misuse. There is no reference at the trial to any threat against it. In the light of the way Luke has reported Jesus' lament over Jerusalem, it seems that he wishes to dissociate Jesus from the destruction of the temple which he knows has already happened by the time he writes. He does, however, share Matthew's picture of Jesus' taking over the temple. It witnessed to him at his infancy and, as a boy, he was already showing his authority there (2:25–51). Now, he reasserts that authority and teaches daily in it. From there the leaders of the nation seek a way to kill him but are as yet helpless because 'the people' (a favourite Lukan term denoting God's covenantal community) were 'spellbound' by what they heard. The temple acknowledges him, the leaders reject him; the people are spellbound by him. At Nazareth earlier, when their expectations were not realized, their wonder soon turned to hostility (4:21–30). Luke's narrative begins to unfold the inevitable progression to the cross.

(20:1–47) Controversies in the Temple In common with Matthew and Mark, Luke now has a number of incidents in the temple where Jesus is in conflict with the leaders of the Jerusalem community. Unlike them, however, he does not include Pharisees in these hostile incidents and he also has Jesus continuing to teach 'the people' who are still presented as favourably disposed to him. As they now stand, these incidents reflect the experiences of the early church and the attitudes these engendered. The first controversy story (20:1–8) concerns the authority of Jesus. Elsewhere, when Jesus is questioned, and even when the question is motivated by hostility, he deals with it seriously (10:25; 17:20). Here, he engages in a form of one-upmanship that would seem to be shaped by later Jewish-Christian debates. The logic behind the appeal to the Baptist is not obvious though the general Christian acceptance of him as a new Elijah (in which however Luke does not share, see Lk 1:5–25) might mean that Mal 3:1 forms a link.

The parable of the wicked tenants (20:9–19) is the only parable to appear in all three Synoptic Gospels in the same setting. Comparisons of the three versions, however, show that it has been strongly shaped by the beliefs of the three evangelists as well as by the oral traditions which lay behind their gospels. Much of that shaping has taken the form of a more thorough allegorization to enable it fully to reflect both the life of Jesus and the history of Israel. Added allegorization, however, has only carried on what was latent in its beginnings. Jesus told a parable that spoke of his place in God's dealings with Israel and which reflected his understanding of his relationship with her. Luke, like Mark, has the vineyard owner send one servant after another in a generous, but ultimately unrealistic, attempt to bring the tenants to a recognition of their responsibilities. In Luke, however, they do not kill any of the servants. This, rather than Matthew's confrontational groups of servants, is at one with the action of sending the son in a last, desperate attempt to bring them to their senses. v. 13 recognizes the wishful thinking that this involves but which is made inevitable by the father's desire to commend rather than impose his authority. Recent interpreters have pointed to the father's change of outlook that is brought about by the killing of the son, and have wondered how far this reflects early church elaboration since it appears scarcely consistent with one who before was unwilling to take revenge. It almost suggests that the father regarded the servants as expendable in a way that the son was not. Certainly, the three evangelists present the father's reactions in different ways. Luke's inclusion of the people's 'God forbid' (v. 16) to the threatened destruction may point to his belief that it was not inevitable. v. 17 with its quote from Ps 118:22 pictures the vindication of Jesus as the climax and he could have seen this fulfilled at the resurrection and ascension. Luke has a reference (v. 18) to Isa 8:14 which is also found joined to the quotation from Ps 118 at 1 Pet 2:8 and occurs again in some versions of Mt 21:42. Individuals who are opposed to Jesus or who merit his wrath will be dealt with firmly. Acts shows how Luke sees this happening (Acts 1:18; 5:6; 12:23).

Jesus' message about the coming of the Kingdom may not have been overtly political (though this is disputed), but it certainly had strong political and social implications. The question about the legitimacy of paying taxes to Caesar (vv. 20–6) recognizes this and is asked in an attempt to discredit him in the eyes either of those who looked for the overthrow of Rome or of the civil authorities who were quick to act against political agitators. Mark's statement that it represents a combined attack of Pharisees and Herodians suggests a fairly even-handed approach. Luke's introduction, on the other hand, shows that he regards it as a deliberate attempt by the Jewish authorities to make Jesus espouse a stance that would enable them to denounce him to the Romans as a threat to the state. This is precisely what they will do later (23:2) when they hand him over to Pilate. Luke sees Jesus' answer as a slick side-stepping of the trap. It gives them no grounds for their later charge which is exposed as perverse and fraudulent. Recognition of this has often led interpreters of Luke's work to suggest that it was written with the aim of rebutting the charge that Christianity was a threat to Rome; claims that it was are seen to arise out of Jewish hostility. Whilst this is true in so far as no Roman official in Acts ever condemns Paul, Christianity is often regarded by them as a threat to Roman stability, and both Jesus and Paul are judicially executed by the Roman power. Luke knows that Rome was perplexed by Christian claims and was always in danger of acting against them. Christians are those who 'turn the world upside down'

(Acts 17:6). Jesus' reply (v. 25), though not unambiguous, left room for a conflict of interests for it said that both God and the state had legitimate claims on the coin and what it stood for. This made for an inevitable tension which could be resolved only by denying the legitimate sphere of one party or by compartmentalizing their claims in a way that did less than justice to the overarching concerns of God.

The Sadducees then put something of a trick question to Jesus (vv. 27–40). Members of the religious and political establishment in Jerusalem, they were conservative in both areas. Using the Mosaic rule of levirate marriage (Deut 25:5) to make their point, they question the sense in which life after death can be meaningful. Jesus' reply points to the newness of God's eschatological, recreative act. It is not simply the continuation of what now is. vv. 35–6 give to Luke's reporting of Jesus' answer a deeper dimension than that found in the other gospels as he struggles to express what he sees as its meaning. This is true also of his handling of the use of Ex 3:6 ('the story about the bush') where he adds v. 38b to what is presented as a typical piece of scribal reasoning which ignores the original meaning of the quotation. The scribes, however, are impressed by this exegetical tour de force. Jesus has outwitted his opponents.

In the light of this victory, Jesus, using the same scribal methods, himself goes on the attack. Psalm 110:1 plays a large part in NT apologetic (Mk 14:62; Rom 8:34; Eph 1:20; Heb 1:3; 1 Pet 3:22). It gives biblical justification for believing in the exalted nature of Jesus. For Luke, the passage exercises a great deal of control over his presentation of Jesus, as Acts 2:34 makes clear. 'Lord' is perhaps his most fundamental title for describing Jesus' relationship to both God and his disciples. Its basis in Ps 110:1 means that he can retain Jesus' subordination to the Father as he describes his role in terms that remain largely functional. Though the passage reflects the usage of the early church, this does not necessarily mean that it was not used by Jesus of himself in an attempt to enlarge his contemporaries' limited expectations about the nature of messiahship. Whether it is believed to reflect his use, however, is ultimately determined by the wider question of whether Jesus himself thought in terms of his own messiahship. On this, there is little scholarly consensus. As though himself dissatisfied with the pedestrian nature of this reasoning, Jesus is said to have gone on to attack the scribes who were responsible for its use (vv. 45–7).

(21:1–38) Jesus' Apocalyptic Discourse All three Synoptic Gospels present this extended discourse as the conclusion of Jesus' ministry and the immediate introduction to the passion narrative. On the one hand, it brings to a climax Jesus' teaching about the Kingdom, the hostility this provokes, and the challenge it makes to the disciples, and, on the other, it acts as the backcloth against which the passion and resurrection of Jesus is to be viewed. It brings all these happenings into relation with the future experiences of the disciples as they face the problems of maintaining faith in the midst of a hostile world. Past and present will together issue in the open revelation of God's kingdom which the appearance of Jesus as Son of Man in glory will establish. The life, death, and resurrection of Jesus have revealed his ultimacy. In the light of this faith, the present of Luke's readers can be seen as contributing to the final revelation of him and of the Kingdom that he guarantees.

Three interwoven strands run through the chapter and determine its structure. These talk about persecutions which the disciples will face in the world and in which they must maintain their witness, historical events whose turmoil will bring a perplexity which is, nevertheless, not devoid of hope, and the expectation of the coming of the Son of Man in glory. History, myth, belief, and imagery come together to create a vision the strength of which is not in its details but in the overall impression it conveys as it takes up the whole event of Jesus and views it from the perspective of the finality and ultimacy that it believes it to be.

Luke's introduction (vv. 5–7) differs substantially from those of Matthew and Mark in that, whereas they have the discourse delivered away from the temple and in some sense over and against it, Luke has Jesus give it in the temple itself and as part of his general teaching to the people (v. 38). He has Jesus pay more attention to the destruction of the temple for its own sake and does not see it as the inevitable prelude to the end of the age (v. 7, cf. Mt 24:3; Mk 13:4). The historical events have an importance in their own right and are not to be seen purely as signs of his coming (v. 8), for the end is not an immediate event (v. 9). Nevertheless, political catastrophes will be preludes to natural ones (v. 11). vv. 12–19, however, break this interconnectedness to concentrate upon the witness of the disciples when they are persecuted and brought to trial because of their allegiance to Jesus and his saving work ('my Name', cf. Ex 33:17–19). These are not merely a prelude to his future revelation but are an inevitable part of their discipleship. Though he may seem absent, Jesus himself is actually present then, seeking to inspire their witness (v. 15) (cf. Acts 7:55). Whereas 13:13 points to their vindication at the parousia, Luke places it in 'the gaining of their souls' (v. 19), that is, in a heavenly life into which the present leads (20:38; 23:43). It is in this sense that the promise of security in v. 18 is to be understood; no part of their real being will be lost or be brought to nothing. Once more we see how the heavenly dimension is very real to Luke and how the ascension of Jesus enables those who follow him to enter into it.

At v. 20 Luke, in line with Matthew and Mark, brings the destruction of Jerusalem, which by the time he writes will have already occurred, into relation with the programme of the last things. Unlike them, however, he does not invest it with the dimension of apocalyptic mystery (Mk 13:14). For him it remains an event that is important in its own right. As with 19:41–4, he describes the historical events of its fall in biblical terms which present them as the fulfilment of prophetic expectations (v. 22). This verse is his closest approach to expressing a belief that God was involved in its destruction; Luke generally does not make this assertion (23:31). The fall of the city begins 'the time of the Gentiles' which is to go on until the point at which its purpose is completed. This suggests an end to Jerusalem's captivity and a restoration of her by God. He has not turned his back upon her but has used even her destruction to further his purposes which will rebound to her ultimate good (2:32). The period of her desolation (which is not necessarily short) will lead into the time of the imminent end when cosmic disasters will occur that will climax with the "Son of Man coming in a cloud" with power and great glory'.

This quotation from Dan 7:13 has been altered by Luke so that the 'cloud' in the singular may bear reference to the ascension of Jesus (Acts 1:9, 11) which for him is both a pointer to, and guarantee of, the parousia. He has no mention of the gathering together of the elect at the parousia (Mk 13:27) for he does not emphasize it as a time of negative judgement upon the world. For him, it is the time of 'redemption' (v. 28) and, since the people are not excluded from Jesus' audience, the hope that this offers is not denied to them. v. 31 (peculiar to Luke in its particular emphasis) sets 'these things'—including the trials and the fall of Jerusalem—against the backdrop of the reality of the Kingdom that has been established through Jesus. Though this present heavenly reality must be their primary compass point for determining their attitude to all that happens, it does not do away with a lively expectation of the appearing of the Son of Man. v. 32 includes that within the events expected in 'this generation'. Luke stretches that to include the period of his own contemporaries, but there is nothing to suggest that it could be extended much further. Meanwhile, they must pray for a faithfulness that will enable them to face his return with confidence (v. 36) (cf. 18:8).

Luke's is a free handling of the tradition which he most probably took over from Mark. Though it is often maintained that he reduces the expectation of an early parousia, there is little in this chapter to suggest it. What he does is to separate out a number of events that Mark sees as leading directly into it. The fall of Jerusalem will have happened by the time Luke wrote and he could look back on times of persecution. The parousia remained his ultimate hope, however, and this continued to impinge directly upon the present. The confidence with which he could proclaim it came from his belief that Jesus, now exalted to the right hand of God, guaranteed the Kingdom as a present reality. Its very nearness in spatial terms meant that its open revelation would not be long delayed in time.

The confidence of the early church that emphasized the hope of the imminence of the parousia was doomed to disappointment (2Pet 3:8–10). The beliefs that determined the apocalyptic images in which those hopes were expressed had to be reassessed as the full significance of God's action in Jesus came gradually to be understood. How far Jesus himself used that imagery, what he meant by it if he did, and how much its use in the Bible depends not on him but on the outlook of the early church, remain important, though hotly disputed, questions. All a commentary on this one gospel can say is that Luke's handling of it shows that he was aware that he was dealing with images that could be reshaped to express new outlooks. Nevertheless, as a first-century man, he did not evacuate them of all historical content or undervalue the radical nature of what they were proclaiming. Luke still looked for a direct and powerful intervention of God in the world and he did not expect it to be long delayed.

(22:1–38) The Last Supper The apocalyptic discourse that bases all its thought upon the reality of the Kingdom leads directly into the passion narrative that shows how it was established. Luke alone of the synoptic writers (22:3, 31–4, 43, cf. Jn 13:2) sets the earthly events of the passion in the context of an eschatological battle with Satan. He emphasizes that it is the passover meal that Jesus shares with the apostles

(22:1, 7, 8, 13). This obviously has some important significance for him (9:31).

Discovering the meaning he gives to it, however, is complicated by the fact that Jesus' interpretative words over the bread and cup(s) are given in two versions with the shorter of them ending at 19a, 'this is my body'. After a period of near-universal espousal of this shorter text, interpreters have moved decisively in favour of the belief that Luke himself wrote the longer text that ends with v. 20 and that one manuscript tradition shortened it (though cf. REB and Evans 1990). In spite of this growing consensus, however, and the weight of manuscript evidence in its favour, there is much to be said for the view that Luke himself wrote the shorter text. The longer version bears all the marks of a hybrid resulting from the contributions of many hands to bring Luke into some sort of conformity with the general eucharistic traditions of the early church. The shorter text is the more distinctive and, indeed, more difficult reading and, if Luke himself is not responsible for it, it is hard to see why anyone should have shortened what he wrote to arrive at this unusual and not easily explained interpretation of Jesus' actions. Its ending reflects the Markan 'bread' word which Luke appears to be following at this point. His earlier description of the beginnings of a passover meal (vv. 15–18) has been influenced by Mark's version of Jesus' eschatological statement that forms the climax of his account (Mk 14:25). The passover meal itself already gave expression to this dimension, and it is this eschatological emphasis that Luke sets at the heart of his narrative. Whether Jesus eats and drinks or abstains (the former being more likely)—for the text is again doubtful—he brings the meal into close relation with his entry into the Kingdom which will be established by his exaltation (vv. 16, 18, cf. 22:69). Luke has one cup (v. 18) to which he gives this eschatological significance. It binds together those who share the meal in an anticipation of their part in the Kingdom. He distributes the bread to 'the apostles' (v. 14, cf. Acts 1:3) and calls it 'my body', 'me', not broken in death, but his living presence that enables them to live out of his life. Luke does not give sacrificial significance to either the bread or the wine, for he does not understand Jesus' death as itself the point of atonement. His narrative of the crucifixion will present it otherwise. In Acts, the eucharist is the 'breaking of bread' (2:42), and the Emmaus episode shows that Luke finds its significance in the way it enables those who participate to share with Jesus in the life of the Kingdom.

Judas breaks this eschatological unity and is wholly condemned. The disciples are in danger of doing so by reason of their seeking after positions of glory (vv. 24–7). Luke gave no place to an earlier instance of this outlook which the tradition contained (Mk 10:35–45), presumably not to spare their blushes but to save it for this dramatic context. In place of that tradition's reference to Jesus' death as a ransom (Mk 10:45), Luke sees his saving work accomplished through his service, climaxing in the cross and controlled by it but, nevertheless, not actually isolated in it. From such a perspective, Jesus can bestow upon the apostles a share in the Kingdom which his father has conferred upon him (vv. 28–30). They will judge Israel and those who are associated with her when she is restored, that is when Jesus' Kingdom is revealed.

Before Jesus can enter his Kingdom, however, he must undergo his final act of surrender and make his climactic response to the way of obedience upon which he embarked when he rejected the blandishments of Satan (4:1–13). Satan is decisively active at this point and is about to release his power against the apostles. Jesus has interceded for Peter (vv. 31–4) and, though he will slip, his faith will not desert him. When he has recovered, he is to strengthen his brethren. Luke will present Peter as the first witness of the resurrection (24:34) and will portray him in Acts positively as the one who will lead the church into its universal witness. Now is the eschatological hour, the time of crisis which calls for a different stance from that which characterized their earlier work for Jesus (9:1–6; 10:1–12). The episode of the two swords (vv. 36–8) is peculiar. Luke is aware of the tradition (which he uses) of some violence at the arrest (22:5) and he is emphatic in his presentation of Jesus as crucified in the midst of evildoers (23:32). He presents Jesus as the fulfilment of Isaiah's suffering servant (Isa 52:13–53:12). v. 37 contains Jesus' only direct quote from there, and the disciples' possession of swords is seen as a part of that passage's witness to him.

(22:39–53) On the Mount of Olives Luke's story of the agony in the garden is shorter than those given elsewhere, not, it seems, in order to reduce Jesus' distress, but to play down the ineptitude of the disciples. Peter, James, and John are not singled out, and Jesus finds them asleep only once and 'because of grief' (v. 45). 'The trial' that they are to pray not to enter becomes, not their time in the garden, but rather what is yet to happen (v. 46). It is a time when Satan is wholly rampant and they are unable to escape his clutches (cf. 11:4). The result of this shortening is to throw all the emphasis upon Jesus' prayer that his will may be aligned to the Father's. The prayer itself expresses confidence in his own constancy. vv. 43–4 are absent from many MSS though they are found in some early writings. Recent interpreters have tended to regard them as additions to what Luke wrote (Nolland 1993). Though doctrinal considerations could have been responsible for either their inclusion or omission, the latter is more likely and they are not out of keeping with Luke's belief that this incident represents the focal point and climax of Jesus' obedient surrender to his calling. Their mention of an angel now brings to mind the absence of angelic succour from Luke's temptation narrative, and his expectation of a renewed struggle with Satan (4:13). This emphasizes the 'stress' that Jesus expected to accompany his 'baptism' (12:49) and, if it fulfilled it, would account for the move into that quiet confidence that characterizes Luke's account of the arrest and trial, and the crucifixion itself.

The time of the disciples' trial begins, even while Jesus is still speaking (v. 47). It is at this point that the atmosphere of Luke's narrative moves away from Matthew's and even more from Mark's in the direction of John's (cf. rgs κ). Jesus is more in control, not obviously as in John, but with a gentle confidence of one who has had his struggles and now moves serenely to complete what has been given him to do. Jesus addresses Judas before he kisses him, stops any resistance, heals the harm done, and sets the actions of those who have come to take him—who in Luke include the chief priests and elders themselves and not merely their officers—within the context of eschatological evil (v. 53). What is happening is invested with cosmic significance. Jesus is fully aware of the shift in aeons that is taking place. Everything he has done has led up to this moment. There is no mention of the disciples' flight (Mk 14:50).

(22:54–65) The Evening Wait Luke has no night session of the council (Mt 26:57–68; Mk 14:53–65) which does not meet, either formally or informally, until the morning. This has the result of removing the mockery of Jesus, which took place during the night, from the members of the council and also of lessening the contrast between Peter's weakness and Jesus' steadfastness. The failure of Peter is made less drastic in both Matthew and Luke by the inclusion of only one cock-crow. The reference to Peter's 'going out and weeping bitterly' (v. 62) is absent from at least one MS. Whilst later hands may have added it to Luke's narrative, it is more likely to be his own conclusion to his dramatic mention of Jesus' glance (v. 61). It marks the beginning of the Lord's rescue of Peter and the preparation for his strengthening of the others (vv. 31–2).

Members of the council are spared the indignity of being involved in the horseplay with Jesus. The cry of mockery, 'Prophecy! Who is it that struck you?' is often pointed to as one of the most important agreements of Matthew and Luke against Mark (Goulder 1989). It has been accounted strong evidence for the belief that Luke knew Matthew and used him in the composition of his gospel. On the other hand, it has been used by others to support the theory that Q contained a passion narrative. Its taunt is appropriate for the Lukan assertion that it was made by the guards who were holding Jesus. Mt 26:68, on the other hand, has it made by the council to a Jesus who is not blindfolded.

(22:66–71) Jesus Before the Council In Luke's gospel, the council meets formally in the morning when the examination of Jesus takes place. It has less characteristics of a trial than have Matthew's and Mark's night session, however, for there are no witnesses, no formal accusations, and no condemnation of Jesus. Whilst this might reflect a greater historical awareness, little can actually be built on it for the differences may simply be the result of theological rather than historical concerns. Luke's gospel gives little basis for any suggestion that Jesus was hostile to the temple which rather acknowledges him as its lord. On the principle of there being no smoke without fire, therefore, he would not want suggestions of Jesus' hostility to the temple to be recorded (cf. Acts 6:13–14). The council rather addresses directly the question of Jesus' status: 'If you are the Christ, tell us'. Jesus' reply has two parts. vv. 67b–8 point to their total perversity. They will neither believe, nor even acknowledge, the truth. They will not accept him as Christ in the manner that they should, but they would like to hear from him a declaration of messiahship which could be reported to Pilate as subversive. Jesus refuses to fall into their trap but answers in a way that defines his status in terms which transcend their categories. From this point in time (emphatic in Luke), he will be exalted to the right hand of God. As opposed to Mark's version of his reply, Luke makes no mention of a future, visible coming (Mk 14:62). Jesus' exaltation will be for the eyes of faith alone. It is that event which forms the contents of both his claims and the disciples' belief. The council acknowledges the significance of the declaration, however, and 'all of them' ask, 'Are you therefore the Son of God?' This for Luke has a deeper significance than 'Christ'. It recalls the second part of the angel's declaration to Mary (1:35) and foreshadows the preaching in Acts (9:20; 13:33). In the light of Mt 26:64, Jesus' reply seems to be an acceptance of the implications of the question and a witness to their recognition of them. Their perversity however makes them disown him and refuse their own insights. Their accusations before Pilate reveal just how great that perversity is (23:2).

(23:1–25) Before Pilate Luke's version of this episode emphasizes Pilate's reluctance to act against Jesus, brings out, therefore, the Jewish initiative in the crucifixion of Jesus, and introduces an appearance of him before Herod. Luke alone has Jesus appear before Herod (vv. 6–12). As an event in history, it makes strange reading for, though it is possible that Roman justice could allow a man to be tried in the place where he lived (Acts 23:34), to hand over responsibility to a non-Roman would be unusual. Pilate, however, seems to be associating Herod with his own involvement rather than handing over the case to him. The purpose of this remains entirely obscure and the incident is therefore best interpreted as a Lukan story occasioned partly by the influence of Ps 2:1–2 which is quoted at Acts 4:25–6 where it is seen as fulfilled in the actions of Pilate and Herod, partly by the appearance of Paul before another Herod (Acts 25–6), and partly by Luke's earlier references to Herod's interest in Jesus. At 9:7–9, Herod is both perplexed by and interested in Jesus, and at 13:31 is reported as being hostile to him. By including him, Luke (since he leaves Pharisees out of the hostile actions in Jerusalem itself), is able to present what is happening as the outcome of the whole career of Jesus and, at the same time, to emphasize the perversity of the Jerusalem authorities whose insistence brings about his death, not, however, without their contributing to the divine plan. The Roman power unwittingly enables God's plan to be fulfilled at the death of Jesus just as it did at his birth. Herod does not even have that dignity. He himself joins in the mockery of Jesus. Yet his encounter does not leave even him unaffected (v. 12).

When Pilate asks him if he is 'the Messiah, the king of the Jews', Jesus' reply is probably meant by Luke to be taken in the affirmative, for it is as such that he is crucified (23:38). Pilate, like the Jewish leaders, has completely misunderstood the implications of what he mouths. Yet he three times declares Jesus innocent (vv. 4, 15, 22) of the charges they bring against him, for Luke is at pains to show that Jesus' role was not a political one. All is to be kept on the level of the religious. Pilate succumbs to the Jewish pressure but his surface acceptance of their charge (v. 38) shows the incredibility of it and, unwittingly, witnesses to the truth.

v. 13 reintroduces 'the people' who have been absent since 21:38 where they were presented as favourable to Jesus. Now, however, their mood changes and they are included among those whose 'voices prevailed' (v. 23). The people share in the perversity of their leaders but they remain dignified with that term and, even as they contribute to the fulfilment of the divine plan (Acts 4:27–8), they avoid the excesses of their leaders (23:35) and remain dissociated from their more grotesque actions (23:27, 48).

v. 25 brings the scene to an end with a Lukan comment on the magnitude of the tragedy. The Jews as a whole (v. 18) asked for a murderer to be released and to be given Jesus to do with 'as they wished'. It is they who crucified him (Acts 3:13–15); the representatives of the political power do not come to the surface again until 23:36 when they join in mindless mockery (cf. 22:63–4; 23:11).

(23:26–49) The Crucifixion Luke alone of the evangelists has a Jewish crowd accompany Jesus to his execution. 'A great number of the people' follow him, including some women who, perhaps taking on a role that was not uncommon on such occasions and which may originally have had some quasi-religious significance, lament on behalf of the one who was going to his death. Addressing them as 'daughters of Jerusalem', he speaks to them as representatives of the true among the people of that city. They are to lament the future, for a time of great distress is coming (Hos 10:8). What that occasion is can be determined only from the cryptic saying of v. 31. If it is to be given a specific reference, that is most likely to the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE. Compared with Jesus, Jerusalem and her people take on the characteristics of a dead tree. 'They' who will treat her harshly will be the Romans or, perhaps more likely, a combination of the powers who together brought Jesus to his cross. Luke has earlier twice brought the suffering of Jerusalem in relation to both Jesus' own and those of the disciples (19:41–4; 21:20–4). Jesus himself remains the true son of Jerusalem.

Luke's crucifixion scene is distinctive. Whilst this might be the result of his use of special sources, the overall unity of outlook between this scene and the gospel as a whole suggests that any sources that he did use were handled freely so as to become effective vehicles for the expression of his own particular insights. What happens at the cross, as Luke tells its story, is completely at one with his gospel's presentation of Jesus as he moved determinedly towards it.

Jesus' plea for the forgiveness of his persecutors (v. 34) is textually doubtful and, on the textual evidence alone, would most likely have to be regarded as an addition to what Luke himself wrote. It would then be seen as either included because of the availability of a tradition unknown to Luke, or added as appropriate in the light of Stephen's response to his persecutors as this is found at Acts 7:60. It is just that response, however, that makes it most likely that Luke himself included Jesus' prayer. He describes Stephen's martyrdom in terms of Jesus' own, and it is wholly unlikely that he would have had him outstrip Jesus in that merciful outlook that he has earlier declared to be of the essence of God himself (6:36). Acts 3:17 also suggests ignorance as a mitigating factor for the Jews and, since Jesus' prayer is in Luke made primarily on their behalf, Peter is there again drawing on Jesus' example. The plea is virtually demanded by Luke's overall presentation of Jesus.

The story of Jesus and the criminal (vv. 39–43), which Luke alone has, is again wholly at one with Luke's total picture. To call the criminal 'penitent' goes further than the story itself suggests. His plea is rather a recognition of that which in Jesus has drawn the outsider to him in a response of hope which, in turn, was always acknowledged and included in a greater work (7:36–50; 8:43–8; 17:11–19). This episode is entirely in keeping with those earlier stories of Jesus' open acceptance of the outsider. The new dimension in Jesus' promise is determined by the difference in the shared circumstances of the one to whom it is made and of the one who makes it. To suggest that it points to a new situation brought about by the saving cross (Fitzmyer 1985) does less than justice to Luke's distinctive understanding of the place of the cross in the redeeming work of Jesus. For him, the cross is the climax and determining fact of Jesus' whole ministry which, taken up at the ascension, becomes God's outreaching redemptive act. He does not isolate the cross to make it the point of atonement or to suggest that something is achieved by it in itself. As earlier (16:19–31; 8:55; 20:38; 21:19), Luke seems to allow for the continuity of life through death. 'Paradise', originally meaning a park or garden, came to be regarded as a perhaps temporary abode of the righteous departed after death. For Luke this is appropriate, for he regards the ascension as the point of Jesus' entry into his kingdom.

With v. 44, Luke (as Mark) moves into the final stages of Jesus' crucifixion. However, there are big differences at this point. Like Mark, he has the three hours of darkness which signifies the awesomeness of what is taking place. He places the tearing of the temple's curtain before Jesus' last cry rather than at his death (Mk 15:38). The temple's holy of holies gives place to Jesus' whole life rather than to what is achieved through death alone, for it is that life as a whole which becomes the place where God is known. Jesus' crying 'with a loud voice' (v. 46) is not, as in Mark, one of desolation (see Mk 13:33–6), but of confidence. Jesus quotes, not Ps 22:1, but Ps 31:5. The agony, which is real, is caught up into the obedience that enables a secure confidence. The compulsion that has driven Jesus has allowed him to maintain the certainty of God's vindication. His last cry expresses the surrender born of the knowledge of a course well run. Like Mark, Luke has Jesus 'breathe his last'. He records a real outpouring, a complete emptying of himself.

In Luke, unlike Mark, where his response is to the death of Jesus (Mk 15:39), the centurion witnesses to 'what had taken place', that is to the whole demeanour of Jesus as he hung on the cross. By his response, he 'glorifies God', that is he makes what Luke regards as an appropriate witness to the significance of the event which causes it (7:16; 18:43). NRSV and REB both give his witness as 'This man was innocent'. This is without doubt a translation that does less than justice to Luke's meaning (Doble 1996). The Greek is dikaïos, a word that Luke has used earlier to describe the status of the true in Israel who, being open to God's ways, acknowledged Jesus as the redeemer of his people (1:6; 2:25). The word as used by Luke witnesses to a religious rather than a judicial status. It is a word with strong LXX influence. Used in the Psalms of the righteous person who is the taunt of enemies but who is vindicated by God (Ps 37, cf. 5:12; 34:19; 55:22; 118:20), it is developed in Wis 1–6 to give a picture of the persecuted righteous one who is vindicated by God, lives through death, and will witness the discomfiture of his enemies (2:12–20; 3:1–9; 5:15–20). Closely aligned with this picture in both Psalms and Wisdom is that of the suffering servant of Isa 53 who is called dikaïos and is said to be both justified by God and the one who serves many well (LXX). Luke's picture of Jesus on the cross recalls that of the servant in that he is clearly set with the transgressors, makes intercession for his captors, serves those who are crucified with him, and awaits God's vindication which will make him the vindicator of others. Luke does not take over the idea of the servant as sinbearing nor that of his death as vicarious, but the close links with that picture make Jesus more than an example. He will actually make many like him.

Luke pictures Jesus as more than the first martyr and as more than an example. He is the redeemer who in Acts, through his name and through the Spirit, reproduces his likeness in those who follow him.

Luke's narrative ends more positively than Mark's in that the crowds 'beat their breasts' and Mark's women are joined in their witness of the events by 'all his acquaintances'. Using the language of Ps 38:11, this is probably intended to include the apostles who are not reported as fleeing at the arrest and who at Acts 1:21 are said to have been constantly with him.

(23:50–24:12) The Tomb Luke's account of the events at the tomb is closer to Mark than to either Matthew or John. Joseph is described as a member of the council rather than as a Christian. He lays Jesus in the tomb, the women watch what is happening and then go away to prepare spices so that they might anoint him after the sabbath rest is over. Whereas Mark says that the women watch 'where' Jesus is laid, for it must not be thought that they later were to go to the wrong tomb, Luke, though sharing this concern, says 'how' he was laid, that is, unanointed. Anointing of the corpse was necessary to hinder the process of decomposition which would almost certainly have begun before the delayed anointing by the women. Luke does not name the women at this point. They have watched Jesus on the cross, seen the burial, prepared the spices, will witness the empty tomb and receive the message of the two men. In Luke, the women are the faithful witnesses. The 'two men' are angelic beings who also appear at the ascension (Acts 1:10). The message of the angels is for the women, rather than given to them in order to be passed on to the disciples (Mk 16:7). There is no command to go to Galilee, for Luke insists that all must happen within the environs of Jerusalem (24:49). The women respond to the message and 'remember'. They acknowledge its truth and their names are now given. The apostles, however, do not believe them. v. 12 is textually doubtful and it could be taken over from John; its 'linen cloths' are in his account and were not used earlier by Luke (23:53). On the other hand, its thought is entirely at one with Luke's picture of Peter who was to be kept from Satan's clutches (22:31–3). He does not share the scepticism of the others which represents the nadir of their discipleship. The women are the first witnesses to the resurrection; Peter is ready to be the first witness of the risen Lord (24:34). In Luke, the women play the part which, in the Fourth Gospel, is reserved for the beloved disciple (20:8).

(24:13–49) Resurrection Appearances Luke's resurrection narratives are quite distinctive and reflect his own particular concerns. The form in which he narrates them is determined by the fact that he alone of the evangelists witnesses to an ascension event which is separated out from the resurrection, brings the resurrection appearances to an end, and takes up the physical body of Jesus into heaven. The ascension becomes the point at which it is deemed appropriate to 'worship' him (24:52). Until then, his followers neither recognize the significance of the resurrection, nor appreciate the full import of his life. The resurrection appearances become points of teaching and convincing. In themselves, they are 'something of a half-way house' (Evans 1970).

The Emmaus story (24:13–27) tells of Jesus' appearance to two otherwise unknown disciples who, somewhat apart from the rest, are making a 7-mile journey from Jerusalem. It plays the part in the resurrection narratives that the mission of the seventy plays in the body of the gospel (10:1–24). Like that episode, it roots actions which will be at the heart of the life of the Christian community in the life of Jesus. To ask how two people could walk 7 miles without recognizing someone who was not only familiar to them but was also at that time in the forefront of their concerns, is to misread the nature of Luke's story, which is told, not so much as to describe a past encounter, as to show how the eucharistic meals of his church unite them to the living presence of the risen Lord. Acts will put the 'breaking of bread' at the heart of the life of the young community (2:42). That formed the climax of the action of Jesus at the last supper as Luke tells of it (22:19a), and it is that action that realizes and discloses his presence after the resurrection (24:35). The story, both in its characters and its significance, stands somewhat apart from the gradual development that marks Luke's narrative as a whole. It really conveys the actions of one who is already ascended and contemporary with Luke's community. Jesus' witness to himself which he gives within the story speaks of him as being already 'glorified' (v. 26). This, however, does not suggest a different source which is not fully in line with Luke's own outlook, nor does it put a question mark against the ascension as the point of glorification. The story reflects the times and outlook of the life of the community as Luke would have it be after the ascension. His own understanding made the time between the resurrection and the ascension a period of teaching and convincing. He had to place it then. But, unlike the rest of the stories, it speaks not of a past event but of one that is contemporary with every age. Jesus, unrecognized, travels with his church on its pilgrimage and in its perplexity. Its heart is warmed as it hears the Scriptures (v. 32), but Jesus himself is discerned in 'the breaking of the bread'.

Jesus now appears in what is in fact the most unashamedly materialistic of all the resurrection narratives. Lacking the unwillingness of Thomas actually to put the witness of Jesus to the test (Jn 20:26–8), the story tells how Jesus himself answers their doubts by eating in front of them. If it is accepted that the Emmaus story reflects Luke's thoughts about the later church and her relationship with her Lord, this story, which leads straight into the ascension, reveals Luke's emphasis upon the actual physicality of the Lord's body in a way that outstrips the thinking of the other NT writers. Everything in Luke depends upon the certainty of the resurrection. Whilst this story may be composed in the service of combating Gnosticism (Talbert 1966), it is more likely described in this way in order to maintain the reality of the eyewitness testimony. The women beheld his death, burial, and the empty tomb. Disciples do not believe their testimony for they need more certain evidence. When Jesus does appear to them—even after his appearance to Peter—they still need convincing. Others had been summoned from the dead (1 Sam 28:13). Jesus, however, was no ghost but was the very person with whom they had walked, lived, and engaged from those early days in Galilee. They have to become convinced and reliable witnesses to the resurrection (Acts 1:22). Jesus now 'open[s] their minds to understand the scriptures'. For Luke, it is fundamental that Jesus' whole career fulfilled the Scriptures—but it needed the risen Jesus to make the real connection, for they do not obviously find their fulfilment in his life. They do so only when they are read with the prior conviction that Jesus is the Messiah, and, even then, there is more tension between the promise and the fulfilment than Luke allows. Jewish ignorance of that connection was not necessarily blameworthy (Acts 13:27). Jesus commands the disciples to remain in Jerusalem until after the gift of the Spirit, for that event will accomplish the eschatological renewal of Israel which, from Luke's point of view, must take place before the universal witness can be begun. They will be clothed with 'power from on high', for the Spirit will empower their witness and move it out until it becomes world-wide (Acts 6:10; 9:17; 10:47; 19:21).

(24:50–3) The Ascension It is not certain that this passage describes an ascension of Jesus, for the two crucial clauses that would make it so are omitted from some MSS. That Jesus 'was carried up into heaven' and that the disciples 'worshipped him' are not included in a number of versions. After a long period when they were described as additions, introduced to bring the gospel to a firm conclusion, the majority of commentators now opt for their integrity. They believe that the two clauses were omitted because, with their inclusion, the gospel passage seemed to be at variance with the more obvious description of the ascension with which Luke begins Acts. It is just that contradiction, however, that makes it difficult to accept the ending of Luke as another account of the one event. The real problem is that, whereas Acts talks of Jesus' period of teaching and confirming as lasting forty days (Acts 1:3), Lk 24 has this final scene on Easter day itself. This time difference should not, however, be pressed. We have already seen that the Emmaus story stands somewhat outside the sequence of events, and it is this that actually sets the timing whilst itself causing difficulties for including everything within the one day. Time is subservient to what Luke was certain had to be done between the resurrection and the ascension. The forty days of Acts 1:3 witnesses to this same emphasis and should no more be pressed than the time sequence in Lk 24. Other differences between the two accounts are minimal. The cloud is emphasized in Acts because it not only receives Jesus, but also veils him from the disciples. It is their perplexity that dominates the Acts story and that is countered by the gift of the Spirit and the success of the mission. In the gospel, Jesus has already demonstrated his credibility. The ascension sets the seal on that. It represents in story form the fundamental belief that Jesus is Lord. What the infancy narratives proclaimed, what the voice which accepted his response to his baptism acknowledged (3:22), what Moses and Elijah at the transfiguration discussed in glory (9:31), and what everything from 9:51 has moved towards is now completed. The whole of that life is now caught up into God's presence. Jesus blesses his community and that blessing is brought into the present. Acts will show just how effective that has been. The disciples worship. The gospel ends as it began, with the praise of God in the temple.

REFERENCES

- Alexander, L. (1993), The Preface to Luke's Gospel, SNTSMS 78 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Allison, D. C. (1998), Jesus of Nazareth (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Bailey, K. E. (1976), Poet and Peasant (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- (1980), Through Peasant Eyes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Borg, M. J. (1994), Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship (Valley Forge: Trinity).
- Brown, R. E. (1977), The Birth of the Messiah (London: Geoffrey Chapman).
- Caird, G. B. (1963), Saint Luke (London: Penguin Books).
- Conzelmann, H. (1960), The Theology of St Luke (London: Faber & Faber).
- Crossan, J. D. (1991), The Historical Jesus (San Francisco: Harper).
- Doble, P. (1996), The Paradox of Salvation, SNTSMS 87 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Esler, P. F. (1987), Community and Gospel in Luke-Acts, SNTSMS 57 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Evans, C. F. (1955), 'The Central Section of St Luke's Gospel', in D. Nineham (ed.), Studies in the Gospels (Oxford: Blackwell).
- (1970), Resurrection and the New Testament (London: SCM).
- (1990), Saint Luke (1990), TPI NT Commentaries (London: SCM).
- Fitzmyer, J. A. (1981; 1985), The Gospel According to Luke, AB (New York: Doubleday).
- (1989), Luke the Theologian (New York: Paulist Press).
- Franklin, E. (1975), Christ the Lord (London: SPCK).
- (1994), Luke: Interpreter of Paul, Critic of Matthew, JSNTSup 92 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Goulder, M. D. (1989), Luke: A New Paradigm, JSNTSup 20 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Herzog, W. R. II (1994), Parables as Subversive Speech (Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox).
- Hull, J. M. (1974), Hellenistic Magic and the Synoptic Tradition (London: SCM).
- Lampe, G. W. H. (1962), 'Luke', in Peake's Commentary on the Bible, ed. M. Black and H. H. Rowley (London: Nelson).
- Maddox, R. (1982), The Purpose of Luke-Acts (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Marshall, I. H. (1978), The Gospel of Luke (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- (1980), The Acts of the Apostles, Tyndale NT Commentaries (Leicester: Inter-Varsity Press).
- Moessner, D. P. (1989), Lord of the Banquet (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Moule, C. F. D. (1977), The Origin of Christology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Nolland, J. (1989–93), Luke, WBC (Dallas: Word).
- Sanders, E. P. (1985), Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM).
- Sanders, J. T. (1987), The Jews in Luke-Acts (London: SCM).
- Schüssler Fiorenza, E. (1983), In Memory of Her (New York: Crossroad).
- Scott, B. B. (1989), Hear Then the Parable (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Talbert, C. H. (1966), Luke and the Gnostics (Nashville: Abingdon).
- Vielhauer, P. (1968), 'On the "Paulinism" of Acts', in L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn (eds.), Studies in Luke-Acts (London: SPCK).
- Wilson, S. G. (1973), The Gentiles and the Gentile Mission in Luke-Acts, SNTSMS 50 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Young, B. H. (1998), The Parables (Peabody: Hendrickson).

INTRODUCTION

A. Special Features of the Gospel of John. 1. In comparison with the Synoptics, John's gospel is much more unified in content and style. It has sometimes been called 'seamless, woven in one piece' (cf. Jn 19:23). The differences between John and the Synoptics have been used in both positive and negative ways, especially concerning their reliability. But one should not forget all that unites John with the other gospels: it is about Jesus' public life, death, and resurrection, with concrete biographical indications that may not always satisfy a modern historian.

2. My view is that John in his structure and in many details has been inspired by Mark, perhaps even by Luke (or common traditions behind Luke and John). But John also has his own information, which allows him to treat his material in a sovereign way (Kieffer 1987–8; 1992). He wants primarily to show that Jesus really is the Messiah and the Son of God (cf. Jn 20:31). Matthew has already dared to group Jesus' preaching into five or six longer discourses in order to favour his own theological purpose; John is even bolder when he freely organizes his material according to his theological views, making no stylistic difference between what Jesus, the Baptist, or he himself has to say.

3. The Johannine presentation is permeated with contrasts between light and darkness, life and death, truth and falsehood, heaven above and the earth below. Ambiguous expressions are used to create a kind of suspense. Subtle ironic devices suppose that the reader is shrewder than those who meet Jesus without understanding. The Master who stands in the centre of the text is described with the help of lively metaphors. His encounters, his words, and his miracles often have both a concrete and a metaphorical meaning. One could speak of a kind of progressive 'metaphorization' of words and deeds in the Johannine text (Kieffer 1989). Sayings of Jesus in the Synoptics, and even in the Gospel of Thomas, are stamped by simple images and parables. In John these give way to long and complicated monologues and dialogues, with a rather limited vocabulary used very skilfully.

4. In the Prologue Jesus Christ is identified with the Word of God. Already in the beginning of his activity he cleanses the temple, a symbolic action that, like the miracle at Cana in ch. 2, announces that the new cult around the risen Christ will replace Jewish feasts and ceremonies. In chs. 3–4 the discussions with Nicodemus and the Samaritan woman show that the Son of Man, who comes from above and will be elevated on a cross, will give his Spirit, independently of Jewish and Samaritan places of worship. In chs. 5–6 the reader is informed about Jesus' life-giving power. The polemic with the Jews in chs. 7–8 and the healing of the blind man in ch. 9 concern Jesus' identity, a subject that continues throughout chs. 10–12. In the farewell discourses in chs. 13–17 Jesus finally reveals for his disciples his deep connection with his Father and the Spirit whom he will send after his death and resurrection (chs. 20–1). Despite his main theological purpose, the evangelist shows a vivid interest in geographical and historical details, which makes his gospel sometimes a better source of historical information than the Synoptics.

B. The Gospel of John in a Historical Perspective. 1. The unity of the gospel is sometimes marred by contradictions: twice Jesus brings his activity to an end (10:40–2 and 12:37–43). Jesus' first sign in Cana is followed by different signs in Jerusalem, but in 4:54 a miracle in Galilee is called the second one. In 7:3–5 Jesus' brothers speak as if the Master had not done any signs in Jerusalem, despite 2:23 and ch. 5. In 16:5 Jesus seems to ignore the questions Peter and Thomas had already put in 13:36 and 14:5. In 14:31 Jesus says, 'Rise, let us be on our way', yet he continues his farewell discourse. In 20:30–1 the reader is given a conclusion but the book continues in ch. 21. Some of the contradictions are not very important, but it is impossible to ignore the question of an evolution behind our present gospel.

2. Different theories have been proposed: (1) Rearrangements: the best known hypothesis is that originally ch. 6 was placed before ch. 5. Bultmann (1971) proposes many other rearrangements, which are hardly acceptable. (2) Sources: in his commentary Bultmann also proposes three different sources behind our gospel: a sign-source, a Gnostic source, and a passion narrative source. Moreover he thinks that a later redactor has reworked the gospel, adding to it sacramental and traditional eschatological material (for other source analyses, see Fortna 1970; 1988; Boismard 1977). I am sceptical about the possibilities of reconstructing different sources behind the Gospel of John. (3) Different editions: with other exegetes such as Lindars (1972), my belief is that parts of the gospel have been added in a second edition, e.g. chs. 6; 15–17; 21. Probably the evangelist himself reworked his gospel in a process of 're-reading' to which others also have contributed. (4) The history of the Johannine community: in Brown (1979) we find a reconstruction of the history of the Johannine community. Between 50 and 90 there were two groups, one centred around a man who had known Jesus and would become the 'beloved disciple'; this group accepted Jesus as a Davidic Messiah. Another group was critical about the temple cult and understood Jesus against a Mosaic background. The fusion of these two groups was the catalyst for the development of a high Christology, which was expressed in a first version of the gospel. About 90 CE the community became more anti-Jewish under the influence of converted pagans. This was reflected in a new version of the gospel. Around 100 CE a faction gathered around the author of the Johannine letters and fought against the Docetists who overinterpreted the divine aspect in the gospel and neglected Jesus' humanity. Such reconstructions are interesting but are difficult to prove. They simply project contradictions in the Johannine literature onto a historical axis.

3. My own view is that the main author, whom I call 'the evangelist', tries to unite his community by transmitting the testimony of the beloved disciple. This person is presented in such a way that the reader who knows the synoptic tradition can identify him with John the son of Zebedee. Historically it is possible that somebody other than the apostle John was the mediator, but the evangelist wants us to identify the beloved disciple with the apostle. This is quite in agreement with an old tradition we find in Irenaeus (Adv. haer. 2.22.5; 3.1.1; cf. Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 5.20. 4–8). The final version of the gospel was probably produced about 90–100 in Ephesus (see details in Hengel 1993).

C. Structure. 1. The first part (1:19–12:50), now often called 'the book of signs', is regularly distinguished from a second one called 'the book of glory' (13:1–20:31; see Brown 1966). In that outline ch. 21 is usually considered as an appendix written by a member of the Johannine school (and 7:53–8:11 as a non-Johannine text; see JN APP). It is difficult to come to a consensus concerning the first part. One can state that it is punctuated by seven miracles (two at Cana and Capernaum, two near the Sea of Galilee, two in Jerusalem and one at Bethany near Jerusalem), and by different tableaux and discussions (the meetings with the Baptist and his disciples, with Nicodemus and with the Samaritans, the temple cleansing in Jerusalem, the disputes in Jerusalem, the acclamation near Jerusalem, the anointing at Bethany). One can often find chiasmic and concentric schemes in the text, but it is difficult to establish the author's plan with their help alone.

2. The whole book may be considered as a unity. If the geographical indications are studied, four cycles become apparent. A first grouping (1:19–3:21) leads from the region across the Jordan (1:28) to Cana (2:1, 11) and Capernaum in Galilee (2:12), and finally to Jerusalem (2:13, 23). A second grouping (3:22–5:47) starts in Judea, probably across the Jordan (3:26), and takes the reader through Samaria (4:4) to the second stay at Cana in Galilee (4:46) and finally to Jerusalem (5:1). A third grouping (6:1–10:39) starts on 'the other side' of the Sea of Galilee (6:1–16; cf. 6:17, 22, 25) and leads again to Jerusalem in Judea. The last grouping (10:40–21:23) carries one from the region across the Jordan (10:40) to Jerusalem (12:12), through Bethany (11:1), and finally back to the Sea of Tiberias in Galilee (see Gyllenberg 1960; 1980; Kieffer 1985). The regions across the Jordan and on the other side of Galilee are somehow starting-points. Galilee and Samaria are, with the exception of the end of ch. 6, regions where Jesus is well received, whereas in Judea violent discussions during Jewish feasts lead to various threats to kill him (5:18; 7:1, 19–25; 8:37, 40; 10:31–9; 11:53).

3. If one considers more closely the Christological aspects in the Fourth Gospel, one can observe a dramatic progression from Jesus' initial signs and encounters (2:1–4:54), his works and discussions at Jewish feasts in Jerusalem (5:1–10:39), the climactic sign of raising Lazarus and the bridge section on the coming of Jesus' hour (11:1–12:50), to Jesus' farewell at the Last Supper (13:1–17:26), and finally his hour of passion, death, and resurrection (18:1–21:23). The Prologue and the encounter with the Baptist can be considered as two Christological introductions, and both 20:30–1 and 21:24–5 as two conclusions (see a slightly different version in Mlakuzhyil 1987).

4. In presenting the material I shall draw attention to these different geographical and dramatic groupings without putting them into the centre of the commentary; proper analysis of the structure and development of each single scene is more important.

D. Suggested Outline.

Prologue: The Word became Flesh and Revealed the Father (1:1–18)

First Book: Jesus Reveals his Glory to this World (1:19–12:50)

1:19–3:21: First geographical grouping:

The Baptist's Testimony (1:19–34)

Jesus' First Disciples (1:35–51)

The First Sign at the Wedding in Cana (2:1–12)

Temple Cleansing in Jerusalem (2:13–25)

Dialogue with Nicodemus (3:1–21)

3:22–5:47: Second geographical grouping:

The Baptist's Last Testimony (3:22–30)

Jesus Comes from Above (3:31–6)

Jesus' Work in Samaria (4:1–42)

The Second Sign at Cana: The Healing of the Royal Official's Son (4:43–54)

Jesus Heals a Lame Man: He Gives Life to Whom he Wishes (5:1–47)

6:1–10:39: Third geographical grouping:

Jesus Feeds 5,000 and Walks on the Sea: He is the Bread of Life (6:1–71)

Jesus at the Festival of Booths (7:1–8:59)

Jesus Restores Sight to the Blind Man (9:1–41)

Jesus is the Door and the Good Shepherd (10:1–21)

Jesus at the Festival of Dedication (10:22–39)

10:40–21:25: Fourth geographical grouping:

Back across the Jordan (10:40–2)

Jesus who Raises Lazarus Must Himself Die (11:1–54)

Jesus is Anointed and Acclaimed before his Death (11:55–12:36)

Faith and Unbelief (12:37–50)

Second Book: Jesus Reveals the Glory of his Death and Resurrection to the Disciples (13:1–21:25)

Jesus Washes the Feet of his Disciples and Points out the Traitor (13:1–30)

The First Part of the Farewell Discourse (13:31–14:31)

The Second Part of the Farewell Discourse (15:1–16:4a)

The Third Part of the Farewell Discourse (16:4b–33)

Jesus' Prayer to his Father (17:1–26)

Jesus' Passion, Death, and Burial (18:1–19:42)

The Risen Christ (20:1–21:25)

COMMENTARY

Prologue: The Word became Flesh and Revealed the Father (1:1–18)

In a kind of overture the narrator gives his readers the impression that his story will be told 'from a transcendent and eternal vantage point' (Stibbe 1993: 22–3). The author uses subtle imagery to sum up main themes in the following work. As elsewhere in the Jewish tradition, light, life, and darkness, which are elements of the creation, are meant to symbolize spiritual realities. Life and light which were created in the beginning by the word of God (Gen 1) are manifested in the Word both before and after creation. The theme of light leads to that of the visible glory of the Word (v. 14) whereas the theme of life gives birth to that of the fullness from which believers receive (v. 16). The prologue begins with what appeals to the ear, the Word, and finishes with what the eye cannot see, God (v. 18). Through the Word, who is both light and life, the invisible and unheard God is revealed.

There has been much discussion about a pre-Christian or Christian hymn which the author may have used and adapted to fit his purpose. On these hypotheses, vv. 6–8 and 15, on the Baptist, are generally considered as later additions (see different reconstructions in Rochais 1985; cf. Schnackenburg 1977–9: i). But these views are open to objection; the whole prologue may have been written by the same author in a kind of solemn prose, with chiasmic phrases which are developed by amplifications and contrasts. Moreover there is a kind of concentric construction with a centre in vv. 12–13 and different sentences that correspond to each other around this centre. This is especially clear for vv. 6–8 and 15 on the Baptist, but also for the beginning in vv. 1–3 and the end in vv. 17–18 (cf. Culpepper 1979–80).

The evangelist may have had in mind the gospel of Mark: 'The beginning of the good news of Jesus Christ, the Son of God' (Mk 1:1). He wanted to prolong this 'beginning' by going back to God and the creation. In his prologue he mentions John the Baptist who in Mark opens the gospel proper. But, like Mark, he gives the reader a key to interpret his book: it will be about the revelation of Jesus who is both Christ and the Son of God, Jn 1:18 (see the purpose of John's book in 20:30–1; cf. Hooker 1974–5).

(1:1–11) The evangelist shows first how the Word which was with God came to what was his own. vv. 1–2, the author alludes to Gen 1:1, but describes what was before the creation. If he has Mk 1:1 in mind, he wants to show that the gospel begins with the Word which was with God. God's Wisdom is created at the beginning (Prov 8:22), but John tells us about the uncreated Word. John usually uses pros with an implication of movement and one might therefore translate 'the Word was turned towards God' (so the Fr. TOB). This could be paralleled by an alternative translation of eis in v. 18: 'the only Son, who turns towards the Father's bosom'. Such a translation could fit the gospel's description of the Son's orientation towards the Father. But the preposition eis in v. 18 is probably used in place of en. The parallelism between vv. 1 and 18 favours therefore the usual translation of v. 1, 'was with God'. The Greek verb ēn has three different meanings in v. 1: an existential (the Word was), a relational (was with God), and an identificational (the Word was God). Theos, 'God', is used without the article, which is normal in a predicate, but the author could have used it if he had wanted to underline a complete identification of the Word with God. Jesus is God (1:1, 18; 20:28), but normally it is his Father who is theos with a precedent article in Greek. v. 3, the expression hō gegonen, 'what has come into being' at the end of v. 3 probably must be taken together with v. 4, which was the normal interpretation among the Church Fathers before the heretics of the fourth century used it to prove Jesus' inferiority. Moreover, the joining of 'what has come into being' to v. 3 would yield a strange Greek sentence, which would be correct only if the expression were changed to hōn gegonen. There is a parallel text in IQS II:11: 'without Him not a thing is done'. The author now describes the Word's function in creation, as either the instrument by which God created, or as the fountain-head which made creation possible. The whole creation is marked by God's Word and reveals God, in opposition to later Gnostic speculations where the world is created by an evil demiurge. The Word in John is both an instrument and a model, similar to Col 1:16, 'all things have been created through him'. But in this text creation is also 'for him', whereas in John the goal of creation is the Father. vv. 4–5, 'What has come into being in him was life.' One could also translate: 'In what has come into being, there was life'; 'In what has come into being, he was life'; or 'What has come into being, was life (alive) in him'. But the NRSV translation best fits the context. Life and light have in these verses soteriological connotations: the creating Word of God is the fountain-head of spiritual life and light for all people. The author is specially interested in a moral choice between light and darkness. The image of a cosmic battle corresponds to human-kind's spiritual struggle, and therefore the translation 'did not overcome it' fits the context better than 'did not understand it' or 'did not accept it'. vv. 6–8, these verses interrupt the cosmic viewpoint and introduce the description of the Word's incarnation. In a similar way Luke introduces Jesus' birth by the preparatory birth of John the Baptist (Lk 1–2). The expression para theou in v. 6 can mean, as in classical Greek, 'from God' or, as in later Greek, 'by God'. John the Baptist is only a witness to the light of the Word, whereas Jesus himself is the light (Jn 3:19; 8:12; 9:5; 12:35–6). Jesus' testimony is greater than the Baptist's (5:36). This is probably an attack against disciples of the Baptist who considered him as a messianic figure (see also John's negative utterances about himself in 1:20–7). vv. 9–11 could be translated, 'There was the true light that enlightens everyone who is coming into the world,' but in that case 'everyone who is coming into the world' would be redundant. Another translation could take the remote 'Word' as the grammatical subject of the sentence (as in vv. 10–11), but NRSV is probably right when it considers the just-mentioned 'light' as the subject of a periphrastic construction. Theologically it is the light of the Word who comes to a world created through him. Therefore one can say that he comes to what is his own (v. 11). Some exegetes think that vv. 9–11 describe the presence of the Word in Israel during the OT period and that v. 12 alludes to the faithful remnant of Israel. But the concentric structure of the prologue makes it more probable that vv. 9–11 describe the time of Jesus' activity, since they correspond to v. 14 about the Word who became flesh. John's testimony in vv. 6–8 introduces vv. 9–11 and his testimony in v. 15 confirms v. 14. Moreover, in the rest of the gospel those who reject Jesus' witness can easily be identified with his own people who did not accept him. What v. 5 describes as a cosmic conflict is in vv. 9–11 applied to the human world, which does not recognize or accept Jesus.

(1:12–13) All that was said about the Word before vv. 12–13 and that which follows after has its centre in those who received the Word and became children of God. This agrees with the aim of the entire gospel that 'through believing you may have life in his name' (20:31). The contrast between those who receive him in v. 12 and those who do not accept him in v. 11 is fundamental throughout the gospel. In 1:19–12:50 different attitudes in relation to Jesus are described, in 13:1–17:26 everything is concentrated on the disciples, 'his own', whom Jesus has loved to the end (13:1). Those who become disciples are allowed to be called 'children of God' and are in relationship with the only one who in the Fourth Gospel is called 'God's Son'. v. 13, children of God cannot be born in a carnal way. The Greek has 'blood' in the plural, which might allude to the rabbinic doctrine (derived ultimately from Aristotle), that man's seed, considered as 'blood', is in the act of conception mixed with woman's blood. The mention of 'the will of man' reflects the prevailing idea that the male was the only active party in procreation. Some MSS have changed the plural 'bloods' into the singular in order to allude to the virgin birth of Jesus.

(1:14–18) The evangelist finally shows how the Word become flesh has revealed the Father. v. 14, in contrast to what is said in v. 13 about the 'carnal will', the Word that was with God becomes flesh. The author repeats logos, 'the Word', that he mentioned in v. 1, but has had in mind all the time. The concrete word sarx, 'flesh', is used probably in order to refute Docetic views similar to those we meet in John's letters (1 Jn 1:2–3; 4:2; 2 Jn 7). 'Lived among us', or literally 'put up his tent among us' is used of Wisdom in Sir 24:10. The temple in Jerusalem replaced the tabernacle in the desert as a dwelling-place for God. God's Wisdom is thus present in Israel and in its temple, but the presence of the Word in the flesh is physical. 'Among us' and 'we have seen' underline the Johannine witness to God's initiative. The Word's glory is dependent on the Father's presence in his only Son (cf. 17:5). Monogenēs can mean 'only', 'unique', 'precious' (cf. Heb 11:17 about Isaac), or 'born from the one'. It is used four times in John (1:14, 18; 3:16, 18), and once in 1 Jn 4:9. It seems to sum up the very special relationship between Jesus and his Father. 'Full of grace and truth' is best connected with 'only son', rather than with 'glory'. The expression reflects God's revelation to Moses as 'merciful and gracious' (Ex 34:6), i.e. 'full of loving initiative and of fidelity'. In the Word made flesh humanity can meet God's glory. v. 15, in vv. 6–8 John testified to the light, but now he attests that the one who came after him in fact ranks ahead of him because he precedes him in time as God's Word. This anticipates v. 30. v. 16, the verse resumes what was said in v. 14, but concentrates on the word charis, 'grace'. Even if the preposition anti normally means 'instead of', the context favours NRSV 'upon' (cf. Philo, De posteritate Caini, 145). The word plērōma, 'fullness', does not yet have the later Gnostic meaning of the pantheon of deities, but the normal one (as in e.g. LXX Ps 23(24):1). 'We' are all those who in v. 12 become children of God, in contrast to v. 11, 'his own people'. v. 17, what was given by Moses is not depreciated (as it often is in Paul), but 'grace and truth', already mentioned in v. 14, are considered as of higher dignity and fulfil the former revelation. The prologue now makes it explicit that the Word is identical with Jesus, the Messiah. v. 18, in contrast to Moses, who could not see God without dying (Ex 33:20), Jesus is said to be in the Father's bosom and is himself 'God' (probably the original reading, attested already in P⁶⁶ and P⁷⁵). The 'bosom' expresses the intimacy Jesus shares with his Father (see 13:25 on the beloved disciple), in his pre-existence, his mission on earth, and his return to the Father (cf. 17:5). He is therefore the proper revealer of God. Those who adhere to Jesus can in their turn see God (14:8–9).

First Book: Jesus Reveals his Glory to this World (1:19–12:50)

(1:19–3:21) First Geographical Grouping

(1:19–34) The Baptist's Testimony In 1:19–51 the evangelist develops some aspects of the prologue by means of a more concrete introduction to Jesus' activity. The testimony of the Baptist and the first disciples' discovery of Jesus introduce the reader to different features of the gospel's Christology. In contrast to the Synoptics the Gospel of John does not mention the events that surround the Baptist's activity and does not describe how Jesus was baptized by him. The evangelist wants the reader to see the decisive difference between the Baptist and Jesus, with the help of the former's testimony concerning himself (vv. 19–28) and concerning Jesus (vv. 29–34).

(1:19–28) The evangelist first lets the Baptist testify that he is not the Messiah, the prophet, or Elijah. v. 19, 'the Jews' in the Fourth Gospel is often used negatively for the authorities who are opposed to Jesus, especially the Pharisees and high priests, but sometimes also for ordinary people (6:41, 52). The expression can be treated in a neutral way (e.g. 5:1) or even have a positive connotation (4:22). The Jews are sent from Jerusalem, the centre of resistance to Jesus' message. They are associated with two religious factions, priests and Levites, probably as specialists on Jewish purifications which are so important in chs. 1–2. In v. 24 a second group is that of the Pharisees. vv. 20–1, just as in vv. 6–8 the Baptist underlines what he is not; there he was not the light, here he is not the Messiah, Elijah, or the prophet. The Hebrew māšīaḥ and the Aramaic mešīcha, which in 1:41 and 4:25 are transcribed in Greek, mean 'the anointed one', a word derived from the anointing of kings. In Dan 9:25 a future anointed agent of God is expected and in the Dead Sea scrolls two such messianic figures are looked forward to, 'one of Aaron and one of Israel', i.e. a priestly Messiah and a kingly Messiah, who would be a descendant of David (see 1QS 9:11). In Lk 3:15 people also wonder if the Baptist is the expected Messiah. According to Mal 3:1 and 4:5 (HB 3:23), Elijah would be sent as a messenger to prepare the way of the day of the Lord. In the Synoptics the Baptist is normally identified with Elijah as the forerunner of Jesus the Messiah (Mk 9:13 par. and Lk 1:17; 7:27). In the Fourth Gospel Jesus himself seems to be a figure like Elijah (see 1 Jn 1:27), as he is in some Lukan texts (Lk 4:24–6; 9:51; Acts 1:2, 9–11). The expectation of the prophet is derived from Deut 18:18 and is also present in 1QS 9:11 ('until the coming of a prophet'). It plays an important role especially in 1 Jn 4 and in Samaritan theology. vv. 22–3, in his self-presentation the Baptist quotes only Isa 40:3 and not Mal 3:1, unlike the Synoptics which identify him with Elijah. The evangelist adapts the citation to the only role the Baptist may assume, that of a voice preparing the way of the Lord. vv. 24–5, 'Now they had been sent', the Greek text can also be translated: 'Also some Pharisees had been sent', as a partitive. Some MSS have added the article hoi in the beginning of the sentence: 'Those who were sent were Pharisees'. In any case, the author does not describe the situation during Jesus' time when the Pharisees often were opposed to the priests and the Levites. After 70 CE the Pharisees could more easily be identified with 'the Jews'. The new question put to the Baptist supposes that in order to be allowed to baptize he must be a kind of messianic figure. It may reflect discussions between Christians and the followers of the Baptist (see also 3:22–3; 4:1–2). vv. 26–7, just as in the Synoptics, the Baptist underlines that he baptizes only with water. Instead of mentioning Jesus' baptism with fire, however, here he points out their inability to recognize the one who stands among them. In a way similar to the synoptic tradition he stresses his unworthiness in comparison to Jesus, but with different words (Mk 1:7–8 par.). v. 28, Bethany across the Jordan is difficult to locate and has therefore been changed to Beth-barah (see Judg 7:24) by Origen and in some MSS after him.

(1:29–34) Now the evangelist refers to the Baptist's testimony about Jesus. In vv. 29–31, different days in Jesus' first week are mentioned: 'the next day' in 1:29, 35, 43, and 'on the third day' in 2:1. There will also be a last week before Jesus' death (12:1–19:31), and a week of appearances after the resurrection (20:1, 19). The evangelist replaces the synoptic baptism of Jesus (Mk 1:11 par.) by the Baptist's double testimony before the people of Israel: about Jesus as the Lamb of God (Jn 1:29–31), and about Jesus on whom he has seen the Spirit descend (vv. 32–4; Richter 1974). The image of the lamb has, in the tradition behind the gospel, a double connotation: both the Suffering Servant (see 12:38), who is like a lamb led to the slaughter (Isa 53:7), who bears our infirmities, and is crushed for our iniquities (Isa 53:4–5)—both 'bear' and 'take away' are possible translations of the Hebrew word nāsā in Isa 53:4, 12—and the passover lamb, alluded to at the death of Jesus (Jn 19:31, 34). Even if the passover lamb has no atonement function in Judaism, it receives this in the Christian tradition by its association with the death of Jesus and of the Suffering Servant (cf. 1 Cor 5:7 and 1 Jn 3:5). v. 30 resumes the same thought that was expressed in the prologue (v. 15). If the expression 'after me comes a man' alludes to Elijah, Jesus is considered as the hidden Elijah, who already existed before the Baptist. But the latter also underlines Jesus' pre-existence (cf. 8:58), and, in contrast, his own ignorance (v. 31). vv. 32–4, in the Synoptics the Baptist testifies to the baptism with the Holy Spirit before his encounter with Jesus. In the Fourth Gospel both the descent of the Spirit on Jesus and the baptism with the Holy Spirit are described as the object of the Baptist's witness. The scene culminates with the confession that Jesus is the 'Son of God', a reading already present in P⁶⁶ and P⁷⁵, which probably is better than 'the Elect of God' we find in other MSS. As in the Synoptics the dove is a symbol for the Spirit; John adds that the Spirit remains over Jesus. In contrast to the Baptist's mission as a mere witness, Jesus is sent by his Father with a unique task and message.

(1:35–51) Jesus' First Disciples The text tries to link together two traditions, one on the Baptist's own activity and one concerning his meeting with Jesus, which in its turn results in the first disciples' encounter with Jesus. Two days are described: one when Jesus meets two of the Baptist's disciples and Andrew's brother Simon, vv. 35–42, and another when he encounters Philip and Nathanael, vv. 43–51. In both episodes a disciple expresses his joy to have found the expected Messiah (vv. 41, 45). Jesus invites some of them to 'come and see' (v. 39) or to 'follow' him (v. 43). The whole text underlines the concrete and the symbolic meaning of different ways of 'seeing' Jesus or of 'being seen' by him, of 'coming' to him and of 'finding' him.

(1:35–42) Jesus first meets two disciples of the Baptist, and then Simon, vv. 35–7, in vv. 29–34 the Baptist testified before a larger crowd, whereas in vv. 35–7 his witness is directed towards the two disciples who leave him for Jesus. v. 38, the address 'Rabbi', usual in Matthew and Luke, is explained in Greek (didaskale, teacher). In Jn 3:26 the Baptist is also addressed as 'Rabbi', but elsewhere in the Fourth Gospel the title is reserved for Jesus. v. 39, 'Come and see' is usual in rabbinic literature, but gets a special meaning here by the double sense of menein, 'to stay' and 'to remain' with Jesus, and by an exact indication of time ('the tenth hour'). vv. 40–2, as the evangelist is probably acquainted with the Gospel of Mark the anonymous disciple is best identified with one of the sons of Zebedee (see Jn 21:2), and presumably with the apostle John, since James had already died in 44 CE. Andrew confesses that Jesus is the 'Messiah'; as in 4:25 the reader is given the Greek equivalent, christos. Simon Peter is the son of John, as in 21:15–17 (contrast Mt 16:17, in Aramaic bar-yōnā). Jesus calls Simon 'Cephas', which is explained by the Greek petra, 'rock', as in Mt 16:16–18. But the Fourth Gospel puts the renaming of Peter early, after his brother's confession rather than his own. Matthew seems to have combined Simon's confession at Caesarea Philippi with the change of name in order to emphasize his importance in the church.

(1:43–51) Jesus now meets Philip and Nathanael. vv. 43–4, according to Mk 1:29 Simon and Andrew lived in Capernaum, but the Fourth Gospel seems to correct this by locating them at Bethsaida across the Jordan, which according to Jn 12:21 is in Galilee (more properly Gaulanitis). As in the synoptic tradition, Jesus explicitly calls a disciple to follow him (cf. Mk 2:14 par.). Philip is one of the twelve (Mk 3:18 par.) but probably not identical with the evangelist Philip (Acts 6:5; 8:4–8, 26–40; 21:8). v. 45, the Hebrew name Nathanael means 'God gives'. Some have tried to identify him with Matthew or Bartholomew, but he rather represents all Jews who understand the great gift of God. The particular man Jesus from Nazareth is seen as a messianic figure announced by Moses and the prophets (cf. Lk 24:37). But there may also be an allusion to a prophet like Moses in Deut 18:15–18. Jesus is the son of Joseph (as in Lk 3:23 and 4:22, but in contrast to Mk 6:3 where he is the son of Mary). v. 46, a typical Johannine irony makes Nathanael admit in the following discussion that something good comes from Nazareth (see Jn 1:49). v. 47, truly (alēthōs) underlines the signification of 'Israelite', perhaps as 'one who can see God', horōn ton theon (e.g. Philo, De mutatione nominum, 81). v. 48, the fig tree symbolizes in rabbinic literature the place where one studies the Torah (see Eccles. Rab. 5:11). That Jesus knows 'under' which 'tree' Nathanael was can also be compared with Daniel's prophetic knowledge (Sus 54, 58). v. 49, the title 'Son of God' has in the Fourth Gospel a much profounder meaning than in the Jewish tradition, where it can be applied to an angel, a king, Israel, a judge, or a just man. Also the title 'King of Israel' fulfils an important purpose as will be shown in the discussion with Pilate (Jn 18:33–8a) and in the inscription on the cross: 'King of the Jews' (19:19–22). vv. 50–1, the reader is invited to expect greater things, that Jesus will soon reveal his glory (2:11), a beginning that will be concluded with the glorification on the cross. The final words of Jesus are still addressed to Nathanael, but also include all encounters with Jesus. By interpreting the gospel, the reader will see heaven opened. The angels of God ascend and descend not upon a ladder as in the dream of Jacob/Israel (Gen 28:12), but upon the Son of Man, who is the link between the Father and the world of humankind. The believing community will be able to see the unique revelation of the Son of Man (Neyrey 1982).

(2:1–12) The First Sign at the Wedding in Cana In 2:1–4:54, which leads the reader from Cana back to Cana, the reader is confronted with Jesus' initial signs and works in Galilee, Jerusalem, and Samaria. In 2:11 the narrator draws attention to the account of the miracle in Cana by calling it the first of Jesus' signs. The healing of the official's son is considered as the second sign (4:53). In 20:30 the evangelist indicates that he has chosen only a few signs of Jesus. There have been learned and rather contradictory hypotheses about a 'signs-source' which the evangelist might have used (Fortna 1970; 1988). The actual gospel invites the reader to count the different miracle-stories that are reported. One can easily come to the number seven before Jesus' death and resurrection: after the first two signs we have the healing of a lame man in 5:1–9; the feeding of the five thousand in 6:1–13; the walking on water in 6:16–21; the healing of a man born blind in 9:1–12; and as a climax the raising of Lazarus in 11:1–44, which anticipates Jesus' own death and resurrection. The main point of the wedding in Cana is therefore Christological and not to underline the sacramental aspects of water, wine, or wedding, or to show how important Jesus' mother is. The messianic time is inaugurated when Jewish purifications give way to the revelation of Jesus' glory (Olsson 1974). The miracle has been compared with stories about Dionysus, but OT models, such as the feeding miracles of Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings 17:1–16; 2 Kings 4:1–7, 42–4), are closer to it.

(2:1–2) It is difficult to know whether the author already has the Twelve in mind or only the disciples named in ch. 1. Their invitation is mentioned after that of the mother of Jesus who has a special connection with Galilee (cf. 1:46). She is never called Mary in the Fourth Gospel, perhaps in order not to confuse her with other Marys (11:1; 19:25). The third day may be an allusion to the day of resurrection, but it also completes Jesus' first week. vv. 3–5, in preparation of the miracle Jesus' mother takes the initiative, both before and after her son's answer. Jesus addresses his mother with 'woman', which has no derogatory significance (see also 19:26). By his apparent rebuke ('what concern is that to you and to me?'), Jesus wants her to understand that a miracle in Cana will lead to the hour of glorification on the cross. vv. 6–8, the water jars are made of stone because they are used for purifications. The quantity of water is enormous for a private person, 120–80 gallons, but the miracle of the wine has rather an illustrative function. The number 'six' may symbolically express incompleteness, and the jars filled to the brim completeness. The second injunction of Jesus in v. 8 indicates indirectly that the miracle has taken place. vv. 9–10, we do not get the reaction of the guests, but the steward expresses their astonishment. Ironically enough the one who is normally responsible for the meal does not know where the wine has come from, whereas his servants know. There is a comic aspect to the story in the allusion to the guests' drunkenness. The bridegroom appears in the story only here, but soon the Baptist will speak of Jesus himself as the bridegroom (3:29). The wine's quantity and quality hint at the time of the messianic wedding (cf. Am 9:13–14; Isa 25:6; 54:4–8; 62:4–5). vv. 11–12, the reader is given the narrator's viewpoint on the miracle, and an echo from vv. 1–2, with the happy conclusion that the disciples believed in Jesus. The 'brothers' make an appearance here, accompanying Jesus to Capernaum. In 7:3–5 they will show a rather sceptical attitude towards him.

(2:13–25) Temple Cleansing in Jerusalem v. 13 is a rather abrupt transition from the sign in Galilee to the cleansing of the temple in Jerusalem, whereas vv. 23–5 describe the narrator's understanding of the people's reactions and forms a bridge to the following discussion with Nicodemus. The narrator's point of view is 'an enlightened, post-resurrection' one (Stibbe 1993: 51), which is especially apparent in vv. 17 and 22. In the synoptic tradition the cleansing of the temple is the main cause of Jesus' arrest, whereas in the Fourth Gospel the raising of Lazarus has that function. Therefore the temple scene is placed much earlier as an illustration of how Jewish institutions (as already seen in the case of Cana), are meant to be replaced by Jesus. The actual scene is described in a way which differs markedly from the synoptic account. Through the reactions of the Jews and the disciples the purification of the temple becomes a sign of the destruction and raising of another temple, Jesus' body. The metaphors go in two directions: from Jesus' zeal for the house of God to his body, and from his risen body to the cleansing of the temple.

v. 13, the Passover is mentioned also in 6:4 and 11:55. Here it introduces Jesus' allusions to his last Passover when he will die and rise from the dead. vv. 14–16, in the Fourth Gospel people sell not only doves as in the synoptic tradition, but also cattle and sheep, which was quite possible to do in the outer area of the temple (hieron) at the time of Caiaphas. The whip of cords, not mentioned in the synoptic tradition, is probably only meant for cattle and sheep. The money-changers are named kermatistai in v. 14, but in v. 15 kollubistai as in the synoptic tradition. They exchanged Roman and Greek coins, with the image of the emperor (cf. Mk 12:16) or of gods, for Tyrian money which was allowed in the temple area. Unlike the synoptic account, in John Jesus does not cite Scripture (Isa 56:7; Jer 7:11) but speaks with authority about his own Father's house (cf. Lk 2:49). vv. 17–18, the evangelist contrasts the disciples' understanding of Jesus' messianic action (in the light of Ps 69:10 where the present tense is replaced by the future) and the negative attitude of the Jews who ask him to legitimate his behaviour by signs. This request for 'signs' here and in Jn 6:30 is similar to the synoptic one (cf. Mk 8:11–12 par.). vv. 19–22, in contrast to vv. 14–15 Jesus speaks now of destroying the inner temple area (naos). The eschatological catastrophe for Jerusalem and its temple became an important item in the lawsuit against Jesus (cf. Mk 13:2 par.). Perhaps he was also charged for his prophecy about its reconstruction. 'The third day' may be inspired by Hos 6:2. By a typical Johannine misunderstanding the Jews continue to think of the forty-six years of rebuilding the temple. According to Josephus (Ant. 15.380) Herod started it about 20/19 BC. The scene would then take place about 27/8 CE, a satisfactory Johannine chronology to fit Jesus' death on the 14 Nisan in the year 30. vv. 23–5, the reference to Passover and Jerusalem resumes what was said in v. 13. The author has mentioned only one sign in Jerusalem, but he probably includes what has happened in Cana. By his close relation to the Father Jesus has a profound knowledge of people and therefore cannot trust their rather superficial faith.

(3:1–21) Dialogue with Nicodemus This scene contrasts Nicodemus' earth-bound understanding with Jesus' wide perspective on God and the Spirit. The mysterious origin and direction of the wind prepares the reader for the heavenly things that Jesus is about to reveal. The Son of Man will be lifted up on the cross as a link between heaven and earth, and as a sign of God's love. The text moves from the night in the beginning of the dialogue to the light which those who do what is true will receive. Three short questions of Nicodemus receive three answers which progressively become longer and in vv. 16–21 end up in a kind of commentary (by Jesus or by the evangelist). Nicodemus in this chapter still hesitates before Jesus' claims. In 7:50–1 and 19:39 he will spiritually evolve and become a secret disciple of Jesus.

vv. 1–2a, Nicodemus, a Pharisee, a teacher, and a 'leader of the Jews' (cf. 7:26, 48, 50–1), is presumably a member of the synedrion, a legal assembly which may at this time have comprised c.70 members representing three groups: the chief priests, the elders, and the scribes, of whom some were Pharisees. He encounters the personification of a higher wisdom. In Lk 18:18 a certain ruler also questions Jesus, but in the Fourth Gospel the discussion with an important representative of the Jewish faith takes place at the beginning. 2b–3, Nicodemus, like the people in Jerusalem, is probably impressed by the Jesus' signs (Jn 2:23), but he still has to learn in what sense Jesus 'has come from God'. Jesus answers him with a solemn double 'Amen', a revelation formula characteristic of the Fourth Gospel. He does so indirectly by speaking of how one is able to 'see' (in v. 5 to 'enter') the kingdom of God. Only in these two verses does the Fourth Gospel mention the synoptic theme of the kingdom of God, but in 18:36 Jesus answers Pilate that he is king in a kingdom which is not from this world. According to the ideas of that time a child was conceived by his father. In a similar way a child must be born from above (cf. 1:12–13 and 1 Jn 3:9). But the answer of Nicodemus shows that the evangelist also considers the mother's contribution to birth. The Johannine sayings are similar to the synoptic theme of becoming like a child in order to enter the kingdom (Mt 18:3 par.). vv. 4–8, the Greek expression anōthen in the Fourth Gospel generally means 'from above' (Jn 3:31; 19:11, 23), but Nicodemus interprets it as 'again', which is quite possible in Greek. Moreover, the evangelist lets him imagine the irony of an old person entering his mother's womb. Jesus alludes to Christian baptism, which the Baptist has already predicted in 1:33 (cf. also 7:38–9). There is no textual evidence supporting Bultmann's hypothesis that 'and water' has been added by a redactor (Bultmann 1971: 138). In order to explain the difference between natural birth and birth as a child of God (cf. 1:12–13) Jesus opposes flesh and spirit. The short parable on the 'wind' (the same word as 'Spirit' in both Hebrew, rûah, and Greek, pneuma) prepares the reader for the mysterious origin and destination of the Son of Man which will be revealed in the following verses. vv. 9–15, the third question of Nicodemus in v. 9 is short and gives Jesus an occasion to reveal who he is and how he will influence humankind's rebirth. But before that Jesus rebukes the teacher of Israel for his lack of understanding (vv. 10–11), an indirect attack on the Jewish contemporaries of the evangelist who do not accept the Christian testimony. As Son of Man Jesus is pre-existent and will ascend to heaven (v. 13), which is far more difficult to understand than the more earthly matter of baptism Jesus was speaking about (v. 12). At the end of v. 13 most MSS, of different text types, add 'who is in heaven'. This difficult reading may be original and have been suppressed in important Alexandrian witnesses (among them P⁶⁶, P⁷⁵, and B). It underlines that even during his life on earth Jesus still has direct contact with heaven and can therefore testify to what he has seen (v. 11). The 'we know' in v. 11 contrasts with the 'we know' in v. 2. Nicodemus' solemn declaration about what he knows as a representative Jew is insignificant in comparison with Jesus' personal knowledge of God. Nicodemus can now disappear and let Jesus reveal heavenly things about the Son of Man (vv. 13–15) and about the Son of God (vv. 16–18). Jesus is the light that attracts all believers (vv. 19–21). In the Jewish tradition we have different heroes who have seen heavenly visions (e.g. Enoch, Isaiah, Daniel), but only Wisdom, the Word, or the Spirit are presented as coming from God. The perspective of crucifixion (v. 14) in the gospel tradition is a common way of introducing the theme of the Son of Man. In Num 21:9 the serpent is placed upon a pole, but already in the targums the serpent is put in an elevated place (see Neofiti 1 and Pseudo-Jonathan; cf. Wis 16:6–7). That the Servant of God is exalted and lifted up in Isa 52:13 may also have contributed to the interpretation of the crucifixion as an elevation and a glorification. To see or enter the kingdom of God (Jn 3:3, 5) is reformulated in v. 15 as having eternal life. vv. 16–21, after the prologue this is the first time the evangelist speaks of God's initiative. It is also the first time the theme of 'loving' is introduced, which will play an important role in the rest of the gospel. In v. 16 we have a kind of gospel in miniature, where Jesus' death is combined with God's love for humanity, in order to give it eternal life. v. 17 develops what is hinted at in v. 16a, whereas v. 18 gives some precision on the importance of faith which was mentioned in v. 16b. The idea of a judgement, which was implicit in v. 18, is developed in vv. 19–21 with the help of the sharp contrast between light and darkness. The whole section is concentrated on the sending of the Son and the double way people respond to it. In 12:46–8 the evangelist will evoke the last judgement, whereas here the judgement is already present in this life. In 3:16, 18 Jesus himself reaffirms what was said about God's only Son in the prologue (1:14, 18). In the rest of the gospel Jesus often speaks of himself simply as the Son. In the beginning of the dialogue with Nicodemus baptism was evoked (cf. Mk 16:16), in the end all is concentrated on faith.

(3:22–5:47) Second Geographical Grouping

(3:22–30) The Baptist's Last Testimony In the beginning of this scene different rites of purification with water are mentioned: the Baptist's, the Jews', and Jesus'. They serve to introduce the Baptist's second testimony about Jesus the Messiah. vv. 22–4, the evangelist does not indicate precisely where in the Judean countryside Jesus is baptizing. The discussion in v. 26 alludes to Jesus' meeting with the Baptist across the Jordan. Perhaps the evangelist supposes that Jesus is now baptizing there, a normal starting-point for his ministry. He will return there in 10:40–1. The Baptist has gone to 'Aenon near Salim', probably near Scythopolis (Lagrange 1936: 92–3). His move permits Jesus to take his own initiative, though this is partly corrected in 4:2. Contrary to the Synoptics, the Fourth Gospel does not describe the Baptist's imprisonment and death. vv. 25–6, the evangelist only mentions different kinds of baptisms, without indicating their differences. He also alludes to conflicts between disciples of John and disciples of Jesus. He lets the Baptist himself solve the conflict. vv. 27–30, the Baptist does not directly answer the question put to him, but he simply describes his own function as subordinate to that of Jesus. The evangelist reworks here the synoptic tradition where Jesus calls himself the bridegroom (Mk 2:18–22 par.), and makes this the object of the Baptist's testimony. In Jn 1:20 the Baptist denied that he was the Messiah or Elijah, but now he seems to allude to Mal 3:1 and consider himself as Elijah who is sent ahead of the Messiah (cf. Mk 1:2 par.). The Baptist, in Jn 1:23, was presented as a voice crying in the wilderness. He decreases now to the degree that his joy is fulfilled by listening to the bridegroom's voice. The 'friend of the bridegroom' corresponds to the šōšebîn mentioned in the Mishnah (m. Sanh. 3:5). According to 1 Macc 9:39 there was more than one such friend.

(3:31–6) Jesus Comes from Above The Johannine style marks the whole gospel and makes it difficult to decide whether vv. 31–6 belonged originally to the dialogue with Nicodemus, or are a continuation of the Baptist's testimony, or finally are the evangelist's personal summary of 3:1–30 (which is most likely; a similar difficulty occurs at Jn 2:16–21). The contrast between earthly things and heaven is the point of departure for a meditation about the difficulties of accepting the Son's own testimony. v. 31, this verse reflects the contrast between 'earthly things' and 'heavenly things' in v. 12. It also makes clear that vv. 3 and 7 are fulfilled in Jesus who is the one 'who comes from above' and 'is above all'. vv. 32–3, as in the prologue, the evangelist underlines the testimony which comes from spiritual insight and hearing. This witness is not accepted by all (cf. v. 11), but those who receive it set a seal on it, which means they recognize that God speaks the truth through the testimony of Jesus. v. 34, by accepting the testimony of the one who has been sent, the believer can verify that he speaks the words of God. The Spirit was mentioned in vv. 5–8. In our verse it is not clear who is meant by 'he' who gives the Spirit, but in the context it is more likely that it is God than Jesus. The expression ou gar ek metrou is not good Greek, but probably means that God lets his Spirit remain over Jesus

(cf. 1:32). This sense is also specified by the following verse. vv. 35–6, for the first time the Father's love for the Son is mentioned (cf. 5:20; 10:17; 15:9–10; 17:23–4, 26). In the expression 'has placed all things in his hands' (cf. 10:28–9; 13:3) the Greek en does not mean 'by means of his hand' but is used for eis. In the gospel different powers are given to the Son by his Father: to judge (5:22, 27), to have life in himself (5:26), to have disciples (6:37; 17:6), to speak God's words (12:49; 17:8), to receive the name and the glory from God (17:11–12, 22), to have authority over all people (17:2). Here what is given into his hand is the message pertaining to different responses to the Son. Therefore humankind is divided into two groups. The power of Jesus' hand protects those who believe and gives them eternal life (cf. vv. 15–16), but becomes implicitly also God's hand that punishes those who do not believe.

(4:1–42) Jesus' Work in Samaria The theme of the new cult that Jesus inaugurates is now further developed by his encounter with Samaritans, who stand outside normal Jewish faith. The dialogue with the Samaritan woman gives the reader more profound instruction on the living water (vv. 7–14) which Jesus the Messiah and true teacher can give (vv. 16–26). After the woman's testimony (vv. 27–30) and the dialogue with the disciples on spiritual food and the mission's result (vv. 31–8), Jesus meets the Samaritans who come to believe in him (vv. 39–43). Jacob's well, the woman's many husbands, the food that the disciples bring to Jesus, the time of harvest, are concrete starting-points for discussions about spiritual matters. With the exception of vv. 1–3 there is no reason to consider this narrative as composite (as e.g. Bultmann 1971: 176 ff. does; for arguments against him, see Olson 1974).

(4:1–3) These three verses try to explain Jesus' return to Galilee, where he fulfils his second miracle. His departure seems to be the consequence of the Pharisees' negative reaction to his success in Judea, but that reason remains unsatisfactory, because the Pharisees also had some influence in Galilee. Perhaps the author (or a redactor?) wants the reader to understand that just as the Baptist left Bethany for Aenon, so Jesus has to leave Judea because of the Pharisees, who are the controlling authorities in Jerusalem (cf. 1:24). The author also corrects 3:22, 26 by noting that Jesus did not baptize himself. In the rest of the gospel neither Jesus nor his disciples baptize. Many good MSS have in v. 1 kyrios, 'the Lord' in place of 'Jesus', but this is probably a correction in order to improve the text where Jesus is twice the subject.

(4:4–15) These verses describe Jesus' first dialogue with the Samaritan woman. vv. 4–5, in the Fourth Gospel the Greek (e)dei, 'must', often indicates a work or an operation according to God's will (see 3:14, 30; 9:4; 10:16; 12:34; 20:9). Jesus has come to Samaria in order to do God's work. Sychar is not mentioned in the OT, but is probably Sôker which is in the Mishnah and the Talmud. One can identify it with the modern 'Askar, about 1.5 km. from Jacob's well. The evangelist alludes also to Sikem, today Tell Balata, when he mentions 'the plot of ground' given to Joseph (cf. Gen 33:19; 48:22; Josh 24:32). v. 6, 'about noon', literally 'at the sixth hour', as in 19:14, a rather unusual time to travel. The Greek word pēgē in vv. 6, 14, seems to indicate that the well is supplied by a living source of water. It is probably covered with a stone, so Jesus can sit on it (Gk.

epi, 'upon'). Although there are many wells in Genesis, not one is directly called 'Jacob's well'; however, Jacob meets Rachel at a well (Gen 29:1–12). In 1:51 the evangelist has already alluded to Jacob/Israel. vv. 7–15, Jesus' words, 'Give me a drink', and the mention of Jacob's well, are probably meant as an allusion to two scenes in the OT: the demand for water in the desert (Ex 17:2) and the gift of water at Beer (Num 21:16), which is celebrated by a famous song: 'Spring up, O well! Sing to it' (Num 21:17). In the LXX and in the targums 'Beer' is considered as a 'well' and not as a place. In the targums the place Mattanah is interpreted as 'gift'. Therefore the targum Pseudo-Jonathan considers the well as God's gift. In the Dead Sea scrolls the well is a symbol of the law given to Israel (CD 6:4–11), whereas Philo considers it as an image of wisdom (De ebrietate, 112–13; De somniis, 2.267–71). This is more or less the background of Jesus' first dialogue with the Samaritan woman. Jesus' demand for water is only an introduction to the counter demand of the woman for living water (v. 15). The water Jesus can give is a 'gift of God' (v. 10). Those who drink of it will never be thirsty (v. 13). Jesus is greater than the ancestor Jacob, because his teaching will replace the law or wisdom that the Jews or the Samaritans regard as God's gifts. The fullness of grace that was mentioned in the prologue (1:16) becomes very concrete in the image of the living water, which becomes a spring gushing up to eternal life (v. 14). In a similar way Paul alludes to the spiritual drink from the spiritual rock that followed the people in the desert (1 Cor 10:4). The theme of living water appears often in the OT as an image of salvation (e.g. Isa 12:3; 55:1; Ezek 47:1–12; Zech 14:8; Sir 24:21). What is new in the Fourth Gospel is not only that the faithful are thirsty but that the spring of water (a symbol of Jesus' teaching and of his Spirit) is now in them as God's gift. Some ancient authorities omit the remark in v. 9 on the Jews and the Samaritans, but there are good attestations for it in different textual traditions. The observation is very similar to others in John.

(4:16–26) The evangelist now describes Jesus' second dialogue with the Samaritan woman. vv. 16–18, that the woman has had six men is strange; it reflects the Jews' negative attitude towards Samaritans who are thought to remarry more often than is normally allowed to a woman (two or three times). On this natural level the purpose of the text is to show Jesus' prophetic knowledge. But the distinction Jesus makes between the five husbands and the last one who is not her husband can also favour a symbolic interpretation of the text. The woman represents the Samaritan people, just as Nicodemus in ch. 3 represents the leaders of the Jews. According to Josephus (Ant. 9.288) the Samaritans were composed of five different nations, each one having its special god. The woman's five husbands could symbolize these five gods whom the Samaritans had formerly worshipped, and the one who is not the husband could be YHWH whom the Samaritans are only partly linked to, because they worship him at a different place from that of the Jews (see v. 22). A minor problem with this interpretation is that 2 Kings 17:24–34, on which Josephus' story is built, tells us of five nations two of whom had two gods each (making seven altogether). vv. 19–20, the woman identifies Jesus with the coming prophet (Deut 18:15–18), who will vindicate the place of worship on Mt.

Gerizim, the mount of blessings (Deut 11:29) where the Samaritans thought Jacob had his heavenly vision (Gen 28:11–17). The Samaritans call him tāhēv ('the one who will come again') and consider him as a teacher and political leader rather than as a kingly Messiah. vv. 21–2, the evangelist underlines that Jesus himself is a Jew (cf. v. 9) and that salvation comes to the nations through the Jews (cf. Isa 40:1–31 and the synoptic tradition). But at the same time Jesus questions the two places of worship, Mt. Gerizim and Jerusalem. vv. 23–4, 'in spirit and truth' is a double phrase with a single sense, similar to 'Spirit of truth' in 14:17; 15:26; 16:13. It means an openness towards the Spirit whom Jesus gives (3:6; 4:14) and the truth that he reveals (11:14, 17; 14:6). 'God is spirit' has nothing to do with the Enlightenment description of the nature of God, but underlines that God will give his Spirit through his Messiah. The new cult revealed by Jesus will supplant Jewish and Samaritan worship, as much as it replaces Jewish purification rites (1:33; 2:6–11; 3:25–30) and the temple cult in Jerusalem (2:13–22). vv. 25–6, when speaking of the Messiah the woman goes beyond normal Samaritan expectations. The purpose of the dialogue is to have her recognize Jesus not only as the expected prophet but also as the Jews' Messiah. In 1:41 Andrew asserted that he had encountered him; in 1:19–23 and 3:28–30 the Baptist admitted that he himself was not the Messiah. To the Samaritan woman Jesus explicitly reveals that he is the Messiah. When he answers egō eimi, one cannot avoid seeing a link with the absolute use of the revelation formula in 8:24, 28 and 13:19.

(4:27–38) The evangelist portrays Jesus' dialogue with the disciples. vv. 27–30, the woman's missionary activity among her people makes it possible for them to be 'on their way' to Jesus. In the meantime Jesus is engaged in a dialogue with his disciples. That the woman leaves her jar has been interpreted in various ways (readiness to leave everything; desire to forget her past actions; wish to come back; readiness to go to her people). The best explanation is probably that she now relies on Jesus' promise in v. 14. vv. 31–4, unlike the dialogue with the Samaritan woman, Jesus here is not the initiator, but the misunderstanding concerning the food to be eaten is similar to that of the water to be drunk. Whereas Jewish traditions could regard Wisdom as the substance of a meal (e.g. Prov 9:5; Sir 24:21), Jesus considers the will of God (cf. 5:30; 6:38) to be his food. The will of the Father is that the one he has sent (i.e. his 'apostle') completes his messianic work (cf. 5:36; 17:4). In the Fourth Gospel all missionary activity starts with the Father and leads back to him. vv. 35–8, the harvest is mentioned in the synoptic parables on the growth of the kingdom of God (Mk 4 par.). The Fourth Gospel adapts Jesus' words to the actual situation in Samaria. He uses two proverbs, one on the interval between sowing and harvesting (v. 35a), and one on the difference between the sower and the reaper (v. 37). Concerning the first proverb Jesus says that a miraculous event has occurred, as he has just sown the Father's message in Samaria and can already gather a harvest. That this proverb forms an iambic trimeter is probably accidental. The other proverb is often used in a negative way in the OT (e.g. Deut 20:6; 28:30; Job 31:8; Mt 25:24), but Jesus gives it a positive meaning in Jn 4:38: both sower and reaper can rejoice together (v. 36). Who are the others who have laboured? Several answers have been given: the prophets in the OT; the Baptist and his disciples; Philip in Samaria (Acts 8:4–8). But the most natural interpretation in the context is to consider Jesus and his Father as those who have laboured, and the disciples as those who after Jesus' exaltation on the cross (cf. 12:32) will harvest what they have not sown. In this sense what is told in Acts 8 is only the result of the work Jesus has done in Samaria as the Father's 'apostle'. In a similar way the mission to the pagans in 12:20–1 is related to Jesus' work (cf. 7:35).

(4:39–42) Finally we get information concerning the Samaritans' meeting with Jesus. The evangelist has skilfully let the woman inform her people while the disciples had the discussion with their master. Now the Samaritans themselves meet the prophet and Messiah, and can, during two days as eye-witnesses, confirm the testimony of the woman. The evangelist is much concerned about how people come to faith by the testimony of the disciples (cf. 17:20), and about those who believe without having seen (20:29). There are now many more who come to a personal faith in Jesus as the Saviour of the world (cf. 3:16–18). In this way the schismatic Samaritans manifest a deeper understanding than the Jews in Jerusalem (2:23–5). The title 'Saviour', Sōtēr, is used for Jesus especially in later NT writings, as it could be associated with the cult of the emperor. Naturally for the evangelist Jesus is a Saviour in a more profound sense than the emperor, since the world has been created in and by him, the Logos (1:3–14).

(4:43–54) The Second Sign at Cana: The Healing of the Royal Official's Son Twice the narrator recalls the first sign at Cana (4:46, 54). The two miracles take place when Jesus comes to Galilee and in both the reader is reminded of that location (2:1, 11 and 4:43–7, 54). The narrative model is similar: Jesus' mother and the royal official ask the Master to interfere but his attitude is at first negative (2:4; 4:48). When both insist Jesus finally decides to intervene (cf. 2:5, 7–8 with 4:49–50). The miracle is described through the people's reactions (cf. 2:9–10 with 4:51–3) who come to believe in Jesus (2:11; 4:53). In contrast to the following miracles in John there is no sceptical discussion before or after the intervention. Thus the narrator suggests that Jesus was successful in Galilee, in contrast to what happened in Judea. If the royal official is a pagan we can observe that faith now spreads not only to the schismatic Samaritans but also to the Gentiles. The miracle illustrates how Jesus is a source of life, a theme which was important in 3:1–4:14, and will be continued in chs. 5–6.

There are strong links between the Johannine scene and the account of the healing of the centurion's son or servant in Matthew and Luke (Mt 8:5–13; Lk 7:1–10; see Neirynck 1984a), but the evangelist has also other information. He seems to have reworked his material with the help of the narrative of the healing of a Gentile woman's daughter in Mk 7:24–30 (cf. Mt 15:21–8).

(4:43–5) These verses have been composed either by a redactor or by the evangelist in a later edition of his gospel. He seems to have a direct knowledge of Mk 6:1–6 (both, alone in the NT, have the expression ἐξέλιθεν ἐκεῖθεν, 'he left that place'). He reworks the tradition of Mk 6:1–6 par. and has the prophet's 'own country' allude not to Nazareth but to Judea or perhaps more precisely to Jerusalem. The contrast in vv. 43–5 gives a positive description of Galilee and a negative one of Judea. Only after the miracle of the bread are there negative reactions also in Galilee, but Jesus is never threatened with death as he is in Judea. According to 7:42 the Messiah comes from Bethlehem in Judea. So it is in Judea that Jesus as prophet and Messiah has no honour. vv. 46–7, 54, the Greek word basilikos (a 'royal') could designate a person of kingly dignity, but in the context it is probably a person who serves the king as a soldier or in his household. If he is a soldier he is a pagan like the synoptic centurion. A new introduction to the miracle indicates its link with the first sign. Like the centurion in Mt 8:5, but unlike the one in Lk 7:3–10, the royal official begs Jesus himself and not through intermediaries. vv. 48–50, in Matthew and Luke the centurion's words provoke Jesus' admiration and willingness to heal the son. In John the royal official is first criticized like all the others who are eager to see signs and wonders. The evangelist wants the reader to come to faith without seeing miracles (20:29, 31), but he also knows that Jesus revealed his glory by accomplishing his work. vv. 51–3, the royal official gets a confirmation of the miracle by his slaves on his way home. Perhaps the evangelist is aware directly or indirectly of Luke's different delegations from the centurion. For the reader it is important to have the miracle controlled by the father so that the glory of Jesus becomes manifest to all, including the official's household (cf. Acts 10:2; 11:14; etc.). The faith that the official had in Jesus' word is now strengthened.

(5:1–47) Jesus Heals a Lame Man: He Gives Life to Whom he Wishes Chs. 5:1–10:39 describe Jesus' confrontation with the Jews, both in Jerusalem and in Galilee. In Jerusalem the hostility leads to different threats to kill him (5:18; 7:1, 19–25; 8:37, 40; 10:31–9). His activity is presented in the framework of Jewish feasts which Jesus replaces by his own person. The exegetes who place ch. 5 after ch. 6 have not been able to give decisive arguments for their hypothesis; but it is possible that ch. 6 has been added in a second edition of the gospel, causing some tensions in the presentation of the material.

The evangelist has created a subtle contrast between the healing of the man at the pool Beth-zatha in ch. 5 and that of the blind man at the pool of Siloam in ch. 9. The former is merely a passive object of Jesus' work, whereas the latter illustrates the active response of a man with a growing faith. The special technique of the evangelist transforms the healing at the pool Beth-zatha into a kind of illustration of the transformation from death to life. The sick man is healed (vv. 9, 15) but Jesus himself is threatened by imminent death (v. 18). Nevertheless, this threat is ineffective, because the Father raises the dead, and the Son can give life to whom he wants (v. 21). This theme introduces the consideration regarding the dead who come out of their graves (vv. 28–9). The negative judgement on those who do not believe is evoked (vv. 29, 45–7). The opposite theme is that of the Father's love for his Son (v. 20), and the joint life-work of the Father and the Son (vv. 17, 21, 26). Jesus is described as the life-giving Son who is not obliged to observe the sabbath laws.

(5:1–9a) The evangelist describes first the healing, which has some similarities with that of a paralysed man at Capernaum in Mk 2:1–12 par. v. 1, 'a festival', without definite article before heortē, is probably the original reading and vaguely indicates one of the Jewish feasts. In v. 9 it is considered a sabbath, which makes it unnecessary to identify it with Passover or Pentecost. v. 2, the Copper Scroll (3Q15 11:12–13) refers to Bethesdaṭayin and its water basin, which seems to confirm Bēthesda, but Beth-zatha (NRSV) seems to be more satisfactory, as Bethesda may have been substituted because of its meaning, 'house of mercy'. Even less satisfactory are the variants Bēthsaida, Bēzatha, Belzetha. Near the temple area and St Anna's church archaeologists have found two connected pools, but the five porticoes are missing. At the time of Hadrian there was a cult devoted to the healing god Asklepios. v. 3, the Greek xēroi designates those who have malformed limbs, or who are 'paralysed', whereas chōloi are those who are lame (in one foot or both feet). The addition in vv. 3b–4 concerning the angel who stirs the waters is old but not original. It may go back to a local tradition and is inspired by v. 7. vv. 5–7, Jesus takes the initiative to heal the sick man, who in a naïve way describes his situation. Contrary to the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus does not require him to believe but asks only if he wants to be made well. The stirred water may be due to a system of pipes conducting the water from one pool to the other, or is a confusion with movement of water at the pool of Siloam. The addition in v. 4 attributes it to an angel. v. 8, Jesus' admonition is nearly identical with that of Mk 2:9, 11, one of the many indications that the author of the Fourth Gospel had a direct knowledge of Mark (Kieffer 1992). v. 9a, in a similar way the evangelist mentions the sabbath rather late in the narrative on the healing of the blind man (9:14). From 2:13 onwards the Jewish feasts play an important role in Jesus' stay in Jerusalem. By walking the man shows that he is healed, as in Mk 2:12, but there the mat he carries has a natural function. Contrary to the two first miracles the healing does not lead to faith in Jesus, but to violent discussions in vv. 9b–18.

(5:9b–18) The fact that Jesus healed on a sabbath leads to difficulties with the Jews. vv. 10–11, as early as Jer 17:21 and Neh 13:19 it was not permitted to carry a burden on a sabbath (cf. also the Mishnah, Šabb. 7:2). The healed man refers to Jesus' authority in response to the prohibition. vv. 12–14, Jesus disappears for a while in order to allow a discussion to be raised with the man who was healed (cf. a similar device in ch. 9). When he meets him in the temple, Jesus seems to establish a link between sickness and sin, just as in the synoptic tradition (Mk 2:5–12 par.), but contrary to Jn 9:2–3. The sick man is depicted in a rather negative way, in contrast to the blind man in ch. 9, who is an example of how to believe in Christ. vv. 15–18, thanks to the healed man identifying Jesus, the evangelist can introduce his main theme of the Jews' persecutions. Jesus' provocative statement is reinforced when he compares his activity with God's creative work even on a sabbath. For the first time the Jews want to kill him as a blasphemer. This will be stated even more clearly in 10:33.

(5:19–47) Jesus Gives the Jews a Thorough Answer

(5:19–30) In the first part of his long answer Jesus elucidates v. 17 on the joint work of the Father and the Son. It anticipates the sign of Lazarus' resurrection and Jesus' own resurrection. vv. 19–20a, just as in 1:51; 3:3, 5, 11, the formula 'very truly' (in the text a double amen) introduces here and in vv. 24–5 a solemn revelation. At that time a son learned much from his father; the work of the Son is presented as entirely dependent on that of the Father. This goes beyond what is said of Moses in Num 16:28. The evangelist uses here the word phileō for the Father's love for the Son, but elsewhere agapāō (3:35; 10:17; 15:9; 17:23–6). vv. 20b–23, the 'greater works' are those mentioned in vv. 21–2: to give life and to possess the power to judge now (v. 22; cf. 3:31–6). This is intended to anticipate what will happen at the end of the world (vv. 28–9). As the agent of God Jesus is worthy of the same honour as the Father (v. 23; cf. 15:23). vv. 24–5, in 3:15 it was faith in the Son of Man that led to eternal life, now it is belief that the Father has sent the Son. In both cases the believer accepts the one who has been sent. As in 4:23, the link between the future and the present is underlined. The evangelist describes the present situation with the help of eschatological expressions. Later Gnostic speculations reinterpreted this passing from death to life in the framework of the soul's delivery from its imprisonment in the body (e.g. Ap. John, 30:33–31:25). vv. 26–7, v. 26 reformulates v. 21 with the help of creational terminology (cf. the prologue). Just as in the Greek translation of Dan 7:13–14, there is no definite article before Son of Man; so one could translate 'a son of man', but the context shows that the evangelist refers to the early Christian tradition of Jesus' coming as eschatological judge. This is an exception in the Fourth Gospel, where the theme of the Son of Man is normally connected with Jesus' pre-existence, incarnation, death, and resurrection (cf. 1:51; 3:13–15; 6:27, 53, 62; 8:28; 12:23, 34; 13:31). vv. 28–30, without sufficient reason vv. 28–9 have been considered as redactional (e.g. Bultmann 1971: 261). On the contrary, the entire passage in 5:19–30 shows the connection between future and present judgement. There is a subtle correspondence between vv. 19 and 30, 20 and 28–9, 21–3 and 26–7, 24 and 25. The evangelist wants to show that the traditional last judgement already begins in this life. The resurrection of life is for those who have done good (v. 29) and believe in Jesus and his Father (v. 24). The resurrection of condemnation is for those who have done evil (v. 30; cf. 3:18). We meet this double resurrection also in Acts 24:15 (cf. Dan 12:2), whereas other Jewish traditions let the unrighteous remain in their graves. According to John the resurrection will take place at the voice of the Son of Man, whereas in 1 Thess 4:16 Paul uses Jewish apocalyptic imagery: the commandment from God, the archangel's call, and the sound of God's trumpet. In John Jesus' judgement follows the Father's decrees (cf. v. 30).

(5:31–47) In the second part of his answer Jesus is concerned about the fourfold testimony that justifies the great claim he makes to judge and to give life, as his Father does. vv. 31–2, an implicit objection to what Jesus has hitherto said could be: 'You consider yourself as judge, but we judge your testimony as not valid' (cf. 8:13). Therefore Jesus relies upon the supreme testimony of his Father. At the same time the evangelist perceives that the Son's testimony has great value, because Jesus knows where he has come from and where he is going (cf. 8:14). vv. 33–6, the Baptist's testimony to truth in 1:19–36 was only a human testimony and cannot therefore be compared to the greater one of the Father, which leads to the third testimony, the Son's works (cf. 10:25; 14:10–11). The Baptist is again presented as inferior to Jesus: only a shining lamp, but not the light (cf. 1:7–8). In v. 35 the audience is implicitly criticized for not having understood the Baptist's witness

(v. 33). This could also imply that the Baptist is now dead. vv. 37–8, the evangelist continues to move in a kind of circular demonstration: only a positive relation to the Son who has been sent can enable you to grasp the testimony of the Father! Those who have not heard the voice of God or seen him are implicitly contrasted to Jesus who has both seen and heard the Father (cf. 1:18; 5:19, 30; 6:46). Those who believe in Jesus see how the Father's testimony is present in the Son. vv. 39–40, 'to search' is a technical expression (Heb. dāraš). One could also translate ereunate as an imperative (so Origen, Tertullian, and probably the Egerton Papyrus 2 from the second century). But the indicative goes better with 'because you think'. The fourth testimony is that of Scripture, but the Johannine community knows by experience that many Jews cannot discern its testimony. vv. 41–4, one of the reasons for their shortcomings before the different testimonies is a lack of love for God and for his glory (cf. 12:43). Jesus underlines his own contempt for human glory, a theme that we also find among philosophers who prefer to speak the truth than to earn human glory (e.g. Dio Chrysostom, Or. 32:11). But the evangelist is moreover especially interested in the Son's and the Father's glory (Gk. doxa; cf. 1:14; 2:11; 7:18; 8:50, 54; 9:24; 11:4, 40; 12:41, 43; 17:5, 22, 24). Jesus also contrasts his own coming from the Father with those who come in their own name, perhaps an allusion to antichrists (cf. 1 Jn 2:18). At Jn 5:44 MSS as early as P⁷⁵ and P⁶⁶ leave out theou, 'God', but this is probably due to the copyists' error, and overlooked because its abbreviated form resembled too much the final vowels in the preceding word monou ('alone'). vv. 45–7, in Jewish tradition Moses is often depicted as Israel's intercessor or advocate before God (cf. Ex 32–4; Deut 9–10; Aurelius 1988). In John he is turned into the accuser of those who do not believe in Jesus, because they do not really read what Moses has written. The evangelist either alludes to the coming Prophet (Deut 18:15; see Jn 1:21; 4:18; 7:40), or more generally to the books of Moses, as in 5:39. The audience reads the Scriptures in a superficial way and does not see how the Father's testimony becomes evident in Jesus' mission and work, to which even Moses testifies.

(6:1–10:39) Third Geographical Grouping

(6:1–71) Jesus Feeds 5,000 and Walks on the Sea: He is the Bread of Life Ch. 6 is a well-defined unit about Jesus as the bread of life. Even vv. 51–9 belong originally to this unit (against Bultmann's redactional hypothesis, see Kieffer (1968: 152–4)). Possibly ch. 6 has been inserted between ch. 5 and ch. 7 after a first sketch of the gospel, or in a second edition, causing an interruption of the discussion in Jerusalem from ch. 5 to ch. 10. Nevertheless, chs. 2–4 have prepared the reader for Jesus' travels to Galilee. The whole of ch. 6 can also be considered as a concrete example of how Moses wrote about Jesus (5:46).

The approach of Passover in ch. 6 anticipates the last Passover in chs. 13–17, where the evangelist replaces the words spoken over the bread and the wine with the washing of the disciples' feet. As in ch. 5, a miracle is the occasion of a long discussion. The stage-setting begins with Jesus' stay on a mountain and the contrast between the five barley loaves and two fish on one side, and on the other the superabundant food for the five thousand people (vv. 1–15). The greatness of Jesus is also expressed by his walk on the sea during a storm and his leading of the disciples to the land (vv. 16–21). The following discussion (vv. 25–59) is introduced by vv. 22–4, and because of the contents and the different protagonists can be divided into four parts (vv. 25–7, 28–40, 41–51, 52–9). Jesus opposes the perishable food to that which endures for eternal life. Even the bread that Moses gave in the desert is contrasted to the bread of life that the Father gives from heaven. The concrete allusions to Jesus' flesh and blood (vv. 52–9) give rise to sharp reactions from the crowd and the disciples. Peter's confession contrasts with Judas' future betrayal (vv. 60–71).

Ch. 6 has much in common with the two miracles in Mk 6:30–52 par., and even with Mk 8:11–13 (the sign requested), Mk 8:14–21 (discussion on bread), Mk 8:27–30 (Peter's confession), Mk 8:31–3 (the Son of Man's rejection). The evangelist seems to follow Mk 6:30–52 and 8:11–33, omitting the duplicate feeding miracle in Mk 8:1–10 par., but adding his own material and his personal theology.

(6:1–15) The evangelist describes the feeding of the five thousand. vv. 1–4, only the Fourth Gospel underlines in this context the crowd's interest in Jesus' signs. That prepares the reader for Jesus' criticism in vv. 26–7. The location of the miracle is more vague than in the Synoptic Gospels. The starting-point of Jesus' journey seems to be Capernaum, mentioned in 2:12 and 4:46. If John follows Mark, the 'other side of the Sea of Tiberias' is not too far away from Capernaum, so that people can arrive on foot ahead of Jesus (Mk 6:33). But in Jn 6:23 one gets the impression that the place is also near Tiberias (mentioned only in John). Still, most important is the location on 'the other side', perhaps the pagan area of Decapolis or Bethsaida (cf. 1:44; 12:21). The 'mountain' has a symbolic meaning of proximity to God's authority, as in Mt 5:1 and 28:16. That Jesus sits down with his disciples (probably the twelve mentioned in 6:71) possibly underlines his special function as a teacher (cf. Mk 4:1; 9:35; Mt 5:1). The miracle takes place shortly before Passover, an indication that is absent in the Synoptic Gospels. It is possible that parts of the Johannine text were used in a Christian Passover feast where the eucharist was celebrated. Therefore Jesus' words are reformulated as a kind of homily on readings from the Jewish synagogue. vv. 5–9, in the first synoptic feeding miracle (Mk 6:30–44 par.) the disciples take the initiative, whereas here and in the second feeding (Mk 8:1–10 par.) it is Jesus who does so. In John the Master does not ask collectively all the disciples but only Philip. Andrew also intervenes and mentions the boy with the five loaves and the two fish, whereas in the first synoptic account the disciples themselves had the five loaves and the two fish (in the second, seven loaves and some fish). It is clear that the author of the Fourth Gospel has made the stage-setting more dramatic by indicating Jesus' test. He also underlines Jesus' sovereign attitude and knowledge. v. 10, if John follows Mark, he replaces the finer word anakinomai ('sit down') with the more common anapiptō found in Mk 6:40 and 8:6. The grass is also mentioned in the first miracle of Mark and Matthew; in Mk 6:39 it is even 'green', which suits the Passover in John. v. 11, as in most synoptic accounts of the feeding of the people, the evangelist uses words that recall the eucharist during Jesus' last meal. John underlines the thanksgiving in connection with the bread (cf. Lk 22:19; 1 Cor 11:24), whereas the fish play a minor role. Strangely enough he does not mention that Jesus broke the loaves, a detail we find in all other descriptions of the feeding miracles and of Jesus' eucharistic meal. vv. 12–13, as in all feeding miracles the evangelist emphasizes that the people were satisfied and that there was much left over. In the first synoptic feeding miracle there were twelve baskets of fragments of bread and fish, in the second only seven. In John Jesus himself orders the people to gather what is left. Again the evangelist is only interested in the bread. vv. 14–15, after the miracle the people think that Jesus is the expected prophet according to Deut 18:15–18 (cf. Jn 1:21; 4:19; 7:40). Only the Fourth Gospel mentions that the people want to make him a king, which Jesus refuses because he is 'king' in a quite different sense (cf. 18:33–4).

(6:16–21) Jesus Walks on Water. In Mk 6:48 Jesus comes to the disciples in the morning, in John when it is dark (Jn 6:16). The disciples have rowed 'twenty-five to thirty stadia' (v. 19, lit. tr.), about 5 or 6 km.; that means that they are in the middle of the sea. The stage-setting separates Jesus from the crowd and prepares the disciples for the following heated discussions where they have to decide about their own relationship to their master (vv. 60–71). We can compare two kinds of synoptic texts: Jesus walking on the sea (Mk 6:45–52 par.) and Jesus stilling the storm (Mk 4:35–41 par.). In both cases there is a strong wind blowing which Jesus calms, but in the first case Jesus is apart from the disciples whereas in the second case he is with them, sleeping in the boat. It is possible that both stories go back to the same event. In Mk 6:45–52 the evangelist shows that the disciples do not really recognize the saving epiphany of Christ, whereas in Mt 14:22–33 the scene is concluded with the disciples' confession: 'Truly you are the Son of God'. In John the epiphany is in the foreground, with the formula 'it is I, egō eimi'. This sentence is used in John either with a complement, or without, as here. In three cases, in 8:24, 28, and 13:19, the absence of a complement makes the expression allude to ānī hū which designates YHWH in Deut 32:39; Isa 43:10; 52:6. It is possible that even in Jn 6:20; 18:5–6, 8, there is more than a simple statement 'it is I'. The miraculous landing during a storm is similar to that which is attributed to YHWH in Ps 107:23–30. There may also be an allusion to Jewish passover readings on the crossing of the Red Sea under Moses' guidance (Giblin 1983).

(6:22–4) The introduction to the discussion is awkward and may reflect a redactor's work (cf. Jn 4:1–3; 4:43–5). The diminutive plōiarion ('a little boat') is used three times instead of the former plōion (in vv. 17, 19, 21–2). The words 'after the Lord had given thanks' in v. 23 are found in different old textual traditions and are probably original, but the designation kyrios reflects a Christology of the Lord which the evangelist normally reserves for the texts after the resurrection. The discussion with the people can take place only if they come to Capernaum where Jesus and the disciples have landed. But the author also wants the crowd to discover that Jesus had not used the disciples' boat (v. 22). The boats which come from Tiberias (v. 23) are meant to create a link between the unspecified place where Jesus fed the people and the locality of the discourse. The textual tradition in v. 23 is rather confused.

(6:25–7) These verses introduce a discussion on seeking Jesus in a wrong way (cf. 7:34–6), instead of looking for the eternal life he can give. In vv. 14–15 the people considered Jesus as the Prophet and wanted to make him a king, but now they address him as a teacher. In the following discussion he will speak as a revealer of wisdom. The reader already knows the extraordinary way in which Jesus came to Capernaum, but the Master rebukes the people for seeking him because of the signs and the food. The food he wants to give is salvation offered by God in the Son of Man. The allusion to the eucharist will come later in Jesus' discourse. In Isa 54:9–55:5 the Lord invites his people to be fed by his word. In a similar way Jesus speaks of a spiritual hunger. In v. 27 the seal which the Father has set (cf. 3:33) consists in his attestation of the Son's role, perhaps an allusion to 1:32.

(6:28–40) In this passage Jesus speaks about God's work and the bread of heaven. The citation in v. 31 is decisive for the whole discourse up to v. 59. vv. 28–9, as often in the Fourth Gospel the discussion is carried on with the help of a catchword, in this case 'the work of God', in v. 28 in the plural and in v. 29 in the singular. The people have not understood that the point is not to achieve many things but to let God do his unique work through a living faith in the Son he has sent. vv. 30–1, even if Jesus has already given a sign by feeding the crowds, they want a further sign from heaven, as requested in Mk 8:11–13. They express their solidarity with the Patriarchs, and especially with Moses and his signs (cf. Ex 16:4–5). v. 32–3, in v. 31 the people had quoted Ps 78:24 (combined with Ex 16:4, 15): 'He gave them bread from heaven to eat.' In a typically rabbinic way Jesus underlines that 'he' alludes to the Father and not to Moses; one ought to say 'gives' and not 'gave', as the consonants n-th-n in Hebrew can be read both as nāthan ('he gave') and nōthen ('he is giving'). So God is the origin of both the manna and the true bread which gives life to the world. The God of the OT is called 'my Father'. Jesus' mention of 'true bread', as opposed to both manna and ordinary bread, is reminiscent of the Lord's prayer, addressed to the Father for bread for tomorrow (Mt 6:9–13). In v. 33 the Greek definite article ho may refer to Jesus ('he who comes down') or better, as in NRSV, to the bread ('that which comes down'; cf. v. 34). v. 34, just as the Samaritan woman had a very limited understanding when she said 'give me this water' (Jn 4:15), so the people's simple demand 'give us this bread always' is only a starting-point for Jesus' fuller revelation in the following verses. v. 35, in Greek egō eimi can be used in different contexts. It can answer the questions: 'Who are you?', 'What are you?', and 'Of whom are we speaking?' In the first case it underlines a person's identity, in the second his or her qualifications, and in the third that one recognizes him or her. In vv. 35, 41, 48, 51, we have to do above all with this third kind of understanding: it is Jesus who is the bread of which we are speaking (cf. also 8:12; 10:7, 9, 11, 14; 15:1). 'The bread of life' means the bread which gives eternal life (cf. v. 27: 'the food that endures for eternal life') and is synonymous with 'the living bread' in v. 51. Similar expressions are found in Isa 55:1–2 (to thirst and be hungry for the word of God). Perhaps there is even a subtle allusion to the contrary statement in Sir 24:21: 'Those who eat of me will hunger more, and those who drink of me will thirst more.' In vv. 31–5 the author has passed from the OT 'bread from heaven' to 'bread of God' and finally to 'bread of life' (cf. Joseph and Asenath 16.8–9). v. 36, this critique is similar to that in v. 26. It interrupts Jesus' self-revelation, which will be continued in the following verses. Since this corresponds to a typical Johannine technique there is no reason to displace the verse, as Bultmann (1971) and Brown (1966) do. vv. 37–40, in these verses v. 38 is in the centre of a composition where v. 36 is the opposite of v. 40 and vv. 37 and 39 express a similar idea. v. 37 introduces the main theme: the Father gives the believers to Jesus. The three other verses describe the connection between the Father and the Son (v. 38; cf. 5:30), and the relationship of the believers to the Father and to the Son. Even if there is no direct link between vv. 36–40 and the theme of the bread of life from heaven in vv. 35 and 41, these verses give information on connected themes about Jesus being sent from heaven and the difficulty of believing in his self-revelation. 'Everything' in v. 37 corresponds to Aramaic kol dē. The evangelist likes to consider believers as the totality of people who have been given to Jesus by the Father (cf. 6:39; 17:2, 24). In Mt 18:14 it is the Father's will that not one of these little ones should be lost, whereas in Jn 6:39 it is the will of the Son. The Father's will is that believers should have eternal life, but it is the Son who will raise them on the last day (cf. v. 44), a rather unique affirmation in the NT. Contrary to 5:28–9 here the evangelist mentions only the believers' resurrection. In v. 40 to see the Son is nearly synonymous with believing in him.

(6:41–51) repeats certain affirmations made in vv. 28–40, but at the same time prepares the reader for the identification of the bread with Jesus' flesh in vv. 51–8. vv. 41–2, the evangelist replaces the crowds by the 'Jews' who murmur (egoggyzon; cf. vv. 43, 61), as did the people in the desert (Ex 16:2, 7–12). He probably thinks of Galileans who know Jesus' family and therefore challenge his heavenly origin. They resist Jesus, but without threatening him with death as the Jews in Judea do. They call him 'the son of Joseph', as in 1:45 and Lk 4:22, whereas in Mk 6:3 par. Jesus is 'the son of Mary'. Jesus' mother has been already mentioned in 2:1–12 and will be present at the crucifixion in 19:25–7. vv. 43–7, Jesus answers in an indirect way by speaking of his heavenly Father's work in those who believe (cf. vv. 37–40). In v. 44 the Father draws the believers to Jesus, whereas in 12:32 it is the elevated Jesus on the cross who draws all people to himself. Probably the evangelist is alluding to love's power to attract (cf. Hos 11:4; Song 1:4; Jer 31:3 (= 38:3 LXX)). As in v. 40 Jesus himself will raise the dead. The quotation in v. 45 from Isa 54:12–13 LXX is very free (perhaps with the help of Jer 31:34). Just as in the prologue, the evangelist in vv. 46–7 encourages the reader to rely on the Father and on the Son who alone has seen him. Once again the believer is said to have eternal life (cf. 3:15–16, 36; 5:24; 6:40). vv. 48–51, in v. 31 Jesus had emphasized that it was God and not Moses who gave the manna. Now he underlines that the manna, in contrast to the bread from heaven, could not prevent the ancestors from dying. In v. 49 Jesus says 'your ancestors' as if he himself were not a Jew. The evangelist writes from a later perspective when Jews and Christians were already separated (cf. 7:19; 8:17; 10:34). To eat of the bread in v. 50 prepares for the eating of Jesus' flesh in v. 51. The Greek word sarx ('flesh'), like sōma ('body') in the other eucharistic texts, is a translation of the Aramaic besār. Possibly the evangelist chose sarx in order to underline that the Word really became flesh and blood (cf. 1:14). Implicitly Jesus alludes to his own death which gives life. In vv. 35 and 48 Jesus spoke of 'the bread of life', in v. 51 he speaks of the 'living bread', just as in 4:10 he mentioned the 'living water'. These metaphors describe Jesus as the Saviour of the world (cf. 4:42). The discussion has moved from the scriptural texts on the manna to the Son who has been sent from heaven in order to give life to believers.

(6:52–9) This explicit statement on the eucharist is the climax of the whole discussion and leads to strong reactions in vv. 60–6. v. 52, the Jews' negative reaction at the content of v. 51 is the starting-point of Jesus' even clearer statements in the following verses. vv. 53–4, in contrast to v. 51 Jesus also emphasizes the importance of drinking the Son of Man's blood, which is even more provocative (cf. v. 35). He uses both a negative and a positive formulation to characterize those who do or do not partake of the Son of Man's life. In v. 40 the importance of faith was underlined for those who will be raised by Jesus, whereas here it is the importance of the eucharist. v. 55, the reading alēthōs (adv. 'truly') is probably original, since it is attested in different textual traditions, in contrast to alēthēs (adj. 'true', NRSV), which probably arises from an early alteration in the Alexandrian traditions. The use of alēthōs as specifying the predicate is typically Johannine (cf. 1:42; 4:42; 6:14; etc.; Kieffer 1968: 152 ff.). 'Flesh' and 'blood' underline again Jesus' real humanity. vv. 56–7, just as he will in the image of the vine and the branches (15:1–11), Jesus stresses the mutual abiding of the believer and himself. The expression 'the living Father' is rare (cf. Gos. Thom. 3), but may have been coined in parallel with 'living bread' in v. 51. The Greek preposition dia with accusative normally means 'for the purpose of', but in our context it has nearly the meaning of 'by', 'through' (cf. 1 Jn 4:9). There is a link between the sending of the Son and the fact that the believer can live through the Son (who himself lives through the Father, cf. 5:26). In vv. 55 and 57 the future life is mentioned, whereas in v. 56 the present relationship is in view. v. 58, the evangelist sums up what has been said hitherto. The shortest reading 'the ancestors ate' is probably original, as the copyists were tempted to add words borrowed from v. 49 ('the manna' and 'in the wilderness'). v. 59, because of the absence of an article in en synagōgēi one could translate 'in an assembly', but since John probably knows Mk 1:21–8 he is thinking of the synagogue at Capernaum.

(6:60–71) After the mention of the Jews' repeated complaints we now get the disciples' reactions. The miracles at Cana resulted in faith (2:11; 4:53), whereas the healing of the lame man in Jerusalem provokes the Jews to such a degree that they seek to kill Jesus (5:18). The miracle of the bread and the following discussion meet both positive and negative responses, but this time even some of Jesus' disciples leave him. v. 60, 'many of his disciples' will leave Jesus in v. 66 and are distinct from the twelve in vv. 67–71. One can also translate: 'who can listen to him?' (the Greek autou can refer either to 'his teaching' or to Jesus). v. 61, the evangelist often stresses that Jesus knows what people are thinking or doing (e.g. 1:47–8; 2:25; 6:64). v. 62, there is no main clause in the conditional sentence, therefore different ways have been proposed to complete it: 'then the offence will be even greater'; 'then the offence will be diminished'; 'then the offence will be both greater and diminished'. This last suggestion fits the context best, because the ascension of the Son of Man will be as mysterious as his descent from heaven and the consumption of his flesh and blood. In this interpretation v. 62 corresponds not only to v. 61, vv. 48–50, or 51–8, but to the whole foregoing discussion. v. 63, the flesh and blood of the Son of Man must be understood in the light of Jesus' connection with the living Spirit of God (cf. 3:5–8; 4:24; 7:38–9). Jesus lives through the Father (v. 57) and after the resurrection will transmit this life through the eucharist. v. 64, the remark on Jesus' knowledge refutes possible objections concerning the choice of Judas. v. 65, the Father's action is mentioned in v. 44 (cf. also 6:37; 8:47). v. 66, The strange Greek expression apēlithon eis ta opisō is also used in 18:6 and means literally 'they went away, backwards'. In Isa 1:4 and 50:5 a similar Hebrew expression means 'to leave'. v. 67, the twelve are mentioned here and in vv. 70–1 for the first time and will appear also in 20:24. It is possible that they already are understood to be with Jesus in 6:3. The narrator assumes that the reader knows them as a chosen group, but (in 1:35–51) he describes the call of five disciples only. The question with mē (not: lit. 'Not also you wish to go?') introduces here not the expected negative answer but an indecisive one. vv. 68–9, Peter answers in the name of the twelve. He says rhetorically, 'to whom can we go?'; he accepts what Jesus has said in v. 63; he makes a solemn declaration about Jesus, similar to that at Caesarea Philippi in Mk 8:29 par. 'The Holy One of God' is the best reading, whereas many MSS have changed the text under the influence of Mk 8:29; Mt 16:16; and Jn 11:27. As the evangelist has already shown that Jesus is the Messiah, he stresses here another aspect of Jesus. vv. 70–1, the evangelist knows that according to the Synoptics Jesus chose the twelve (cf. 13:18; 15:16), even if he does not describe the circumstances of their call (cf. Mk 3:14 par.). The devil is named Satan in 8:44 and 13:2. Judas betrays Jesus under the influence of Satan (cf. 13:2). In the Synoptics and in Jn 12:4 and 14:22 Judas is called Iscariot, whereas here and in 13:2, 26 this is his father Simon's surname. Perhaps the original name was Scarioth (Codex Bezae; cf. Kieffer 1968: 201–4).

(7:1–8:59) Jesus at the Festival of Booths With the exception of 7:53–8:11, which originally did not belong to the Fourth Gospel (see JN APP), these verses form a narrative unity devoted to Jesus' stay in Jerusalem during the festival of Booths (or Tabernacles). Some verses describe how Jesus the Messiah replaces the Jewish rites at Tabernacles, both the ceremony with water (7:37–9) and the celebration of light (8:12). At the same time the conflict with the Jews in Jerusalem is increasing: they do not understand Jesus' identity and therefore discuss in a polemical way the Messiah, the son of David, the law of Moses, their kinship with Abraham. In 7:32 and 7:45 the reader is for the first time informed that the Pharisees and the chief priests try to arrest Jesus but do not succeed. This anticipates their new initiatives in chs. 9–12 where they finally achieve their plans. In 7:15–24 the discussion in ch. 5 is continued, just as 7:37–9 extends the theme of water in chs. 1–4. The theme of the light in 8:12 will be in the centre in ch. 9, and the relation of Jesus to God, discussed in chs. 7–8, will be treated extensively in chs. 13–17.

The chronological indicators, the content of the discussion, and the people's different interventions can help us to divide the text into seven sections: (1) Jesus hesitates to go up to Jerusalem at the festival of Booths (7:1–13). (2) Jesus' teaching and Moses' law (7:14–24). (3) The mysterious origin of Jesus (7:25–36). (4) Jesus, Messiah and prophet (7:37–52). (5) The Father's testimony to Jesus (8:12–20). (6) Jesus' return to his Father (8:21–30). (7) Jesus and Abraham (8:31–59). These sections are organized into three scenes. About the middle of the festival Jesus suddenly appears at the temple (sect. 2–3). The next scene is on the last day of the festival (sect. 4). The third scene is introduced in 8:12 with a vague indication, 'again', and takes place in the treasury of the temple (cf. 8:20; sects. 5–7). The three scenes are linked together with the help of three main actors: Jesus, the people, and the official authorities (see among others Rochais 1993).

(7:1–13) Jesus hesitates to go up to Jerusalem at the festival of Booths. His secret journey from Galilee to Jerusalem and its temple is only a reflection of his even more mysterious journey from the Father to this world and back to him (cf. vv. 25–36 and 8:21–30). But what Jesus expresses clearly is not understood by the Jews, who know only his human origin and instead of seeking God rely upon their law (cf. 7:14–15). v. 1, 'After this' (Gk. meta tauta) is a typical Johannine transition (cf. 5:1, 14; 6:1; 19:38; 21:1). Sometimes it is changed to meta touto (2:12; 11:7, 11; 19:28). The variant reading 'was not at liberty' is probably not original, since it is less well attested in different textual traditions than NRSV's 'he did not wish'. Jesus' hesitation is due to the threat in 5:18. vv. 2–5, between the Passover in ch. 6 and the festival of Booths in chs. 7–8 is a time-span of about six months. Jesus' brothers have already been mentioned in 2:12. In the Synoptics they are named: James, Joses, Judas, and Simon (Mk 6:3; Mt 13:55). A comparison with Jn 19:25 makes it probable that in the Fourth Gospel they are half-brothers or cousins. In Mk 3:21, 31–2 Jesus' relatives fail to understand his mission. In a similar way the brothers in John are incredulous, in contrast to the beloved disciple. The disciples may be either those named in 2:23 and 4:1, or (better) those who left him in 6:66 and want to see a spectacular sign in Jerusalem (cf. 6:14–15). The sceptical brothers seem to reformulate a sentence of Jesus that we find in the Synoptics (Mk 4:22 par.). The evangelist knows that Jesus will in fact show himself to the world (cf. 18:20). vv. 6–9, as in 2:1–11 Jesus wants to keep the initiative. He knows that when the time of his clear manifestation will come, it will provoke hatred from the world, a theme developed in 15:18–25. Only here does the evangelist use the word kairos ('time') and not his usual hōra ('hour'), perhaps under the influence of Mk 1:15 par. In v. 8 P⁶⁶, P⁷⁵, and B have oupō ('not yet') in place of ouk ('not'), but that seems to be an early correction in order to avoid a contradiction between what Jesus says in vv. 6–8 and what he finally does. vv. 10–13, in v. 10 the NRSV's 'as it were' renders hōs which we find in many important MSS, but which is missing in others. It might have been added very early in order to soften the meaning. The Jews in v. 11 probably represent the official authorities, as in v. 13. They want to seize Jesus (cf. vv. 32 and 45). They are not identical with the crowds in v. 12 or the people of Jerusalem in v. 25 who react in quite different ways. The 'complaining' in

v. 12 is probably a 'muttering' as in v. 32, unlike the stronger complaining recorded in 6:41, 43, 61. Very early the Jews accused Jesus of deceiving the crowds (cf. v. 47 and Mt 27:63–4; in Lk 23:2, 5 this even becomes a legal charge). Later Jewish and Christian sources refer to Jesus as a magician who has seduced Israel (b. Sanh. 43a; 107b; Justin, Dial. 69; 108). John answers those accusations. Jesus himself warned against those who would lead the disciples astray (Mk 13:5–6).

(7:14–24) These verses compare Jesus' teaching with Moses' law. In 2:13–22 Jesus had cleansed the temple and spoken of his risen body as the new temple. In chs. 7–8 he is showing how he replaces the law of Moses and the Jewish festival of Booths. v. 14, the evangelist distinguishes between the beginning of the festival which Jesus does not want to attend (v. 9), the middle when he is teaching (v. 14), and the last day (v. 37) when he cries out his solemn message. It is impossible to know which day is meant in v. 14 (the third, the fourth, the fifth?), but perhaps it is on a sabbath (cf. vv. 22–3). Jesus' teaching in the temple of Jerusalem is given greater esteem than that in the synagogue at Capernaum in 6:59. v. 15, as the word grammata (learning) also appears in 5:47 some exegetes want to insert vv. 15–24 immediately after 5:47 (see Bultmann 1971: 268 ff.). But in 5:47 the word means what Moses has written, his 'teaching', and in 7:15 the instruction in the Scriptures, the 'learning'. vv. 16–18, Jesus' self-defence is similar to that in 5:19, 30, 41, 44: he does not speak on his own, he does not do his own will, or seek his own glory. Only in the Fourth Gospel is Jesus' teaching directly attributed to God who has sent him. To do the will of God is the necessary presupposition for recognizing that Jesus seeks only God's glory. He is true, as God himself is true in 3:33 and 8:26. This implies also the negative statement that there is no falsehood (adikia) in him. This word is not found elsewhere in John, but we have it in 1 Jn 1:9 and 5:17. v. 19, Jesus speaks as if he himself was not a Jew (cf. 8:17; 10:34). The text is written from a later perspective when Jews and Christians had parted their ways. To keep the law is to do God's will. Therefore the Jews go against his will when they want to kill the one whose teaching comes from God. Possibly there is also the reflection of a later polemic against Jews who are proud of their law but circumcise on a sabbath (v. 22). v. 20, the crowd is divided concerning Jesus (v. 12), and therefore, unlike the authorities, does not make plans to kill him. But they think he is possessed, an assertion we find in Mk 3:20–2, and which Jesus will refute in Jn 8:48–52; 10:20–1. vv. 21–3, Jesus defends his healing of the lame man on a sabbath (5:1–9) by citing the circumcision the Jews themselves practise on a sabbath (cf. the Mishnah, Ned. 3:11; Šabb. 18:3; 19:2). He uses a rabbinic argument, qal wahômer, which proceeds from a lesser case (circumcision of a man's foreskin) to a greater one (the healing of a man's whole body). A similar argument is found in b. Yoma 85b and t. Šabb. 15:16. The remark concerning the patriarchs can reflect a later Christian polemic against Jews who attributed circumcision to Moses' law, whereas it originated in the time of Abraham (Gen 17:10; 21:4; see also Paul's argumentation in Gal 3 and Rom 4). v. 24, if the aorist krinate is the original reading, one ought to translate, 'Cease judging by appearances'. In 8:16 Jesus will speak of his own judgement as a valid one, because it is entirely dependent on his Father's judgement.

(7:25–36) The discussion turns towards the question of Jesus' origin. vv. 25–7, the people of Jerusalem (Hierosolymēitai) are in the NT named only here and in Mk 1:5. In contrast to the people who have come to Jerusalem for the festival they are informed about the authorities' plans to kill Jesus (5:18; 7:19). As they let Jesus speak openly they seem to accept him as the Messiah. Ironically the evangelist notices that the people of Jerusalem both know and do not know where Jesus comes from. Their expectation of a hidden Messiah corresponds to elements of Jewish literature, as attested by Justin (Dial. 8:4; 110:1; cf. 1 Enoch, 48:6; 4 Ezra 13:52). vv. 28–9, Jesus' answer is introduced by a solemn 'cried out' (ekraxen; a verb used for Jesus in 7:37 and 12:44, and for the Baptist in 1:15). The audience knows only Jesus' human origin and not that he comes from God, who alone is true (cf. 17:3; 1 Jn 5:20). In 5:46 Jesus said that if they really believed in Moses they would also believe in him. Now he is contrasting his own knowledge of God and of his origin in God with their lack of knowledge. vv. 30–2, those who try to arrest him are probably inhabitants of Jerusalem. They do not succeed because the 'hour' has not yet come, just as the official actions from the authorities in vv. 32 and 45 are without result. But some of those who came up to Jerusalem have a more positive attitude towards the signs of Jesus. Here the evangelist reflects the Christian conception that by his miracles Jesus proved himself to be the Messiah, which corresponds to Jewish expectations according to Josephus (Ant. 18.85 ff.; 20.168 ff.). The favourable attitude of the crowd provokes the Pharisees and the chief priests to send the police which are at the disposal of the official council (cf. 18:3). v. 33, for the first time Jesus describes his death as a departure in order to go to God (cf. 8:14, 21–2; 13:3, 33, 36; 14:4–5, 28; 16:5, 10, 17). The theme of the 'little while' before the death will reappear in 12:35 and 13:33. In 14:19 and 16:16–20 it is transformed into the 'little while' the disciples will not see Jesus and then see him again. All these passages express Jesus' sovereign power over human time, which is short in comparison with the time before his incarnation and after his return to his Father. v. 34, hitherto the Jews have sought Jesus in a negative way, in order to arrest him (7:11, 19–20, 25, 30). Now seeking has a positive quality but is frustrating when one cannot find Jesus (cf. Gos. Thom. 38). Perhaps the evangelist alludes in an ironic way to the synoptic saying, 'search, and you will find' (Mt 7:7; Lk 11:9). The Jews will not find Jesus if they refuse to recognize his divine origin. In a similar way Wisdom says: 'They will seek me diligently, but will not find me' (Prov 1:28). There is no need to understand hopou eimi egō ('where I am') in connection with the formula egō eimi we have encountered before. The present tense stands probably for a future, 'where I shall be' (after my departure). vv. 35–6, the Dispersion among the Greeks may designate the area of the Decapolis. The evangelist is interested in those outside Judaism who believe in Jesus (e.g. the Greeks in 12:20–2; other people in 10:16; 11:52; 17:20–4). The Jews' naïve interpretation of the words of Jesus contains an ounce of truth: they prophesy that the teaching of Jesus will be spread among the Greeks.

(7:37–52) Jesus is both the Messiah and the prophet. Even if this part of the discussion takes place on a day other than that of vv. 14–36 we meet the same three aspects: Jesus' teaching

(vv. 37–9), the people wondering about who Jesus is (vv. 40–4), and the authorities' project to arrest Jesus (vv. 45–52). v. 37, NRSV, JB, and TOB link 'and let drink' (kai pinetō) in v. 37b with 'who believes' in v. 38; others, such as many Greek Fathers and P⁶⁶, prefer to relate it to v. 37a: 'come to me and drink'. In the first interpretation one can connect 'out of the heart' (lit. belly) in v. 38 with Jesus or the believer, in the second it is more natural to connect it with the believer. Because of v. 39 and the witness of P⁶⁶ we prefer this second reading. The last day is either the seventh or the eighth. On the seventh day there was a procession with water from Siloam to the temple, and a ceremony of light in the women's court (cf. Sukk. 3–5). These ceremonies were missing on the eighth day, but people could still mentally associate them with Jesus' teaching (see vv. 37–9; 8:12), just as in chs. 4 and 6 one can see the connection with Isa 55:1, 'Everyone who thirsts, come to the waters'. During the water ceremony people sang, 'With joy you will draw water from the wells of salvation' (Isa 12:3; b. Sukk. 48b). The water was not drunk but was taken up to the temple. The combination of these two passages of Isaiah shows that the believer can now drink the water of salvation from Jesus. vv. 38–9 Bultmann (1971), Brown (1966), and Schnackenburg (1977–9: ii) think that the waters flow from Jesus; NRSV, Barrett (1978), and Lindars (1972), from the believer. The comment on the Spirit in v. 39 favours the second interpretation. The believer who receives the living water from Jesus has it in his heart (lit. his belly) through the influence of the Spirit. The water becomes in the believer 'a spring of water gushing up to eternal life' (4:14). Those who favour a Christological interpretation often establish a link with 19:34, but there blood and water come from Jesus' side (pleura) and not from his belly (koiilia). These exegetes are obliged to consider v. 39 on the Spirit as secondary. It is difficult to know which passages of Scripture the evangelist is alluding to in v. 38, perhaps such texts as Prov 18:4; Isa 58:11; Sir 24:30–4. In a Jewish environment it is usual to compare the Spirit with water (e.g. 1QS 4:18–21). In the later Midrash, Gen. Rab. 70:8, the water at the festival of Booths symbolizes the Spirit. In the early Christian tradition the Spirit is linked with the water of baptism (Jn 1:35; 3:5). Paul makes explicit the connection between drinking water and being baptized in water (1 Cor 12:13). There may therefore be an implicit allusion to Christian baptism even in Jn 7:39. In the Fourth Gospel the Spirit is given after Jesus' death and resurrection (cf. 14:16, 26; 15:26; 20:22). vv. 40–4, the discussion on Jesus' messianic origin, which began in vv. 25–31, is now continued. Some people think that Jesus is the prophet like Moses (Deut 18:15; cf. Jn 4:19–29; 6:14). The evangelist wants to show that he is both the prophet and the Messiah. He also implicitly accepts that Jesus comes both from Galilee (cf. Isa 9) and from Bethlehem (v. 42). He seems to be informed about Jesus' birth at Bethlehem but wants to underline that his divine origin is much more important (cf. vv. 25–31 and 8:14–19). Those who want to arrest him could be the men whom the Pharisees and the chief priests had sent out in v. 32 (cf. also vv. 45–9). vv. 45–52, there is some irony in the statement that the temple police could not arrest Jesus, because they were impressed by his teaching. The Pharisees therefore stress that the authorities, in contrast to the vulgar crowd, do not believe in Jesus. Nicodemus is a Pharisee who probably belongs to the synedrion (cf.

Jn 3:1). His prudent advice, which may be based on Lev 19:15 and Deut 1:16–17 is rejected by his colleagues, because Jesus comes from Galilee, contrary to messianic prophecies (see Jn 7:40–4). Despite the fact that the prophet Jonah came from Galilee, the Jews can assert v. 52, that the Scripture nowhere affirms that a prophet will arise from Galilee. Moreover Galileans are often considered as unclean by the inhabitants of Jerusalem because they live in close proximity to pagans.

(7:53–8:11) see JN APP.

(8:12–20) In 7:25–52 the Jews discussed the qualifications of the Messiah and the prophet, whereas Jesus underlined his own divine origin. Here Jesus speaks of his Father's testimony, a subject he has already treated in 5:31–8. In 8:21–30 he will allude to his going back to his Father, and in 8:31–59 he will invite the audience to become his disciples. v. 12, this solemn declaration is similar to Wisdom's disclosure (e.g. Prov 8–9). In Wis 7:26 wisdom is described as a reflection of God's eternal light. Light in the Jewish tradition is often an image of salvation (e.g. Isa 9:2; 42:6; 60:19). The people have to choose between two ways, between light and darkness (e.g. Jer 21:8; Deut 30:15; 1QS 3:3). In the Synoptics Jesus fulfils the prophecies concerning the future light (e.g. Mt 4:16; Lk 1:78–9; 2:32), and his disciples are in their turn 'the light of the world' (Mt 5:14). Even if we have there a similar formulation to v. 12, Jesus' self-revelation is of a higher order: in him the world meets the fountainhead of light (cf. Jn 1:5, 9; 9:5; 11:9–10). There is also an implicit allusion to the festival of Booths with its ceremony of light in the women's court (see above). Jesus fulfils the deeper meaning of the feast. vv. 13–15, contrary to the Pharisees' objections against his own witness (cf. 5:31), Jesus argues first that they judge by human standards, knowing neither where he comes from nor where he is going. vv. 16–18, the reading alēthinē ('right') attested in v. 16 by among others P⁷⁵, B, D, and W is probably original, since it is different from the nearby occurrences of alēthēs ('valid', NRSV) in vv. 13–14, 17. Jesus' second argument is that he is not alone when he judges or gives his testimony. So there are two witnesses, as the Jewish law prescribes (cf. Num 35:30; Deut 17:6; 19:15). But in fact it is through Jesus that the audience is given information on the Father's testimony. Just as in 5:31–47, the arguments are circular: only those who accept Jesus' divine origin can understand both his and his Father's witness, and conversely those who accept the witness of each can see in Jesus the Son whom the Father has sent. It is possible that the sentence, 'I judge no one' (cf. 3:17) encouraged an editor to insert the pericope on the adulteress in this Johannine context. vv. 19–20, the audience has hitherto not really understood the relation between Jesus and his Father. The reason is that they know neither Jesus nor his Father. This time the discussion is near the treasury of the temple (the Greek preposition en is scarcely used here in the sense of 'inside'). The treasury is probably the room for the people's gifts, near the women's court (cf. Mk 12:41).

(8:21–30) Jesus' return to his Father is unique. v. 21, the discussion continues with a vague 'again he said to them', as before, in v. 12. A new aspect in comparison with 7:32–6 is that the audience will die in their sins, because they do not believe (cf. v. 24). v. 22, according to vv. 30–1 many of the Jews believed in Jesus. But others do not understand what Jesus is saying about his return to the Father. In 7:35 they thought he would go to the Greeks, now that he intends to commit suicide. But Jesus will freely give up his life without committing suicide (10:11, 17–18). v. 23, in Jewish apocalyptic literature there is a contrast between this world and that to come. In the Fourth Gospel God and the world from above replace the world to come. The Johannine dualism between two worlds is different from later Gnostic systems because it is moral (Jesus' message from above is rejected) and not cosmic (even this world was created by God). v. 24, the egō eimi has no complement (see Jn 6:16–21). It is possible that this 'I am he', spoken as it is during the festival of Booths, is also an allusion to YHWH (cf. Sukk. 4:5). v. 25, the words tēn archēn can mean 'at all' (NRSV) and be an expression of exasperation. But since archē is important in the theology of the Fourth Gospel (1:1–2; 2:11; 6:64; 8:44; 15:27; 16:4) the literal translation 'at the beginning, which is what I tell you' might be better, with the force, 'I am the One at the beginning, which is what I keep telling you' (see Miller 1980). vv. 26–9, the judgement of condemnation supplements the promise of salvation in 3:17 and 12:32, 34. It will be more explicit with the sending of the Helper in 16:8. Jesus once again underlines his close link with the Father: he says what he has heard from him, he is not left alone, and he does what pleases the Father (see 5:19–47). But the egō eimi in v. 28 concerning the uplifted Son of Man, which extends the thought of v. 24, adds a new dimension to the question of Jesus' identity. Only believers will be able to recognize the divine 'I am' revelation on the cross. v. 30, the Jews who believe in Jesus still need further teaching, as is shown by vv. 31–59.

(8:31–59) The question of truth in vv. 32, 40, 44–6 gives rise to a discussion about Jesus and Abraham. vv. 31–2, in 5:31 Jesus criticized the audience for not having God's word abiding in them. Now he admonishes the Jews who believe in him to abide in his word (cf. also v. 51), if they want to be truly his disciples. This anticipates the teaching Jesus will give his disciples after his last supper (chs. 15–17). There are different ways to believe in Jesus, the superficial way as in 2:23–5 and 6:14–15, 26, and the deeper way of real discipleship that is described here and in 13:35; 15:8–9. The truth that makes the disciples free is not obtained by their own investigations but is revealed from above. v. 33, the Jews often boasted of being the descendants of Abraham, which Paul criticizes by showing that the pagans are also included in Abraham's faith (cf. Galatians and Romans). But already the Baptist (Mt 3:9; Lk 3:8) had attacked the Jews' superficial attitude when he noted that God can raise up new children to Abraham (cf. also Jesus' critique in Mt 8:11–12; Lk 13:28–9). The Jews have often been politically dependent on foreigners but they have kept their own religion. vv. 34–8, the Jews cannot be free if they sin by wanting to kill Jesus, who declares what he has seen in the Father's presence. There is a sharp contrast between the disciples who share all the rights of the Son, and the slaves of sin who have no rights. In a similar way Paul opposes the son of the free woman, Sarah, and the son of the slave woman, Hagar (Gal 4:21–31; cf. also Heb 3:5–6). In v. 38 NRSV understands poieite as an imperative: 'you should do what you have heard from the Father'. Because their father in v. 44 is identified with the devil, it is probably better to take poieite as a present indicative and translate: 'you do what you have heard from your father'. vv. 39–40, since the explicit identification of their father with the devil has not yet been made, the Jews continue to consider Abraham as their father. This causes Jesus to reply that they should then do the good deeds that were connected with his faith (cf. Jas 2:22). Abraham believed in God and relied on God's truth, which is contrary to their intention to kill the one who tells them the truth from God. In my opinion both este (you are) and poieite ('you would do') in v. 39 are original. Different MSS have tried to improve the poor Greek of this sentence. vv. 41–5, Jesus still does not explicitly say who their father is. The Jews insist on their legitimate claims to be the children of God, probably in contrast to all Gentiles (cf. 1 Thess 4:3, 5). There might be an implicit accusation that in this respect they are different from Jesus whose father is unknown (cf. the accusations of Celsus in Origen, Contra Celsum, 1:28, and later Jewish literature). But this point remains uncertain. If God were their Father they would accept Jesus who comes from him (cf. 5:43). Jesus now gives the explicit reason for their resistance: their father is the devil (cf. 1 Jn 3:8), who is the father of lies and a murderer from the beginning. Probably the evangelist alludes to Cain who was from the evil one and killed his brother (1 Jn 3:11–12). The strong contrast between truth and falsehood resembles the one we find in the Dead Sea scrolls between the spirit of truth and the spirit of deceit (e.g. 1QS 3:18ff.; cf. also the Man of Lies in 1QpHab 2:2; 5:11). vv. 46–47, since Jesus does not sin when he speaks the truth about God, those who do not believe in him cannot have God as their Father. vv. 48–51, the Samaritans were considered by the Jews to be an unclean people (cf. Jn 4:9). They could be considered as 'illegitimate children' (8:41), but also as possessed by a demon. The evangelist, unlike the Synoptics, does not explicitly present Jesus as an exorcist, but it is possible that he is here alluding to the scribes' accusations that Jesus drives out demons with the help of Beelzebul (Mk 3:22–30 par.). Jesus refutes the Jews by stressing his own interest in God's glory (cf. 5:44) and appeals to God's judgement. vv. 52–3, just as in the discourse on the bread of life, Jesus promises eternal life to his disciples. Without knowing it the Jews indirectly speak the truth: Jesus is greater than Abraham who died, just as he is greater than Jacob (4:12). vv. 54–6, Jesus once again affirms that his glory comes from his Father and that he keeps his Father's word. The Jews' question in v. 53 allows him to affirm that in fact he is greater than Abraham, since the latter rejoiced that he could see Jesus' day. Perhaps the evangelist is thinking of Gen 17:17 when Abraham laughed at the promise of a child. The comparison with Gal 3:16 shows that in Isaac Abraham could greet his descendant, the Christ. There are also texts that underline Abraham's prophetic knowledge of the future (cf. Heb 11:13 and the Jewish texts quoted in Str-B ii. 525–6). vv. 57–9, the evangelist is interested in chronology, but 'fifty years' is a conventional indication. Some MSS have transformed it into forty years in order to fit Lk 3:23. Since Abraham is the most important figure for the Jews, they now ask how Jesus can have met him. Jesus answers with an egō eimi formula different from that in vv. 24 and 28, because it is part of a normal sentence. He contrasts Abraham's birth with his own sovereign being that transcends time. One might compare Ps 90:2, 'Before the mountains were brought forth . . . you are God.' Jesus has been able to see Abraham because he was before him. This assertion is considered as a blasphemy and therefore the Jews want to stone him (Lev 24:16). Jesus escapes from them in the same way as before (7:30, 32, 45).

(9:1–41) Jesus Restores Sight to the Blind Man As in ch. 5, a miracle takes place in a pool on a sabbath day, and provokes violent debates. But whereas in ch. 5 Jesus was directly the revealer, the progressive insight of the blind man is in the centre of the controversies in ch. 9. The motif of his blindness from birth is enriched by the themes of night and sinfulness. In contrast to that, Jesus is the light of the world. His divine work among humankind is symbolized by the mud he makes with his saliva (cf. Gen 2:7). The blind man must wash his eyes in the pool of Siloam. At the festival of Booths the water of salvation was fetched from Siloam (see Jn 7:37–9). The evangelist underlines that Siloam means ‘Sent’ (v. 6), so that Jesus who has been sent by his Father (v. 4) is also present in this water. There may be a hint at the importance of water in Christian baptism. The blind man comes to a complete faith in Jesus. In contrast to him some of the Pharisees remain in their sin. Certain aspects of the story recall synoptic miracles on blind people (Mk 8:22–6; 10:46–52 par.; Mt 9:27–31; 12:22–3 par.), but on the whole the evangelist seems to rely on his own information.

The scene is well organized: a discussion between Jesus and his disciples (vv. 1–5) introduces the proper miracle (vv. 6–7). The man blind from birth is interrogated on different occasions, first by his neighbours and those who have met him (vv. 8–12), then by the Pharisees (vv. 13–17), and after the enquiry from his parents (vv. 18–23), a second time by the Jewish authorities (vv. 24–34). After all these interrogations he finally meets Jesus himself who is revealed to him as the object of faith, and who criticizes the Pharisees (vv. 35–41).

(9:1–5) From the information in v. 8 one can guess that the blind man was sitting as a beggar at the entrance to the temple. The discussion between Jesus and the disciples gives the meaning of the miracle story in advance; it replaces the synoptic description of how blind people ask to be cured (Mk 10:47–8 par.; Mt 9:27–8). Jesus’ answer to the problem of suffering is similar to that in Lk 13:2, but different from Jn 5:14. Jesus does not accept rabbinic discussions concerning who has sinned (see the examples in Str-B ii. 527–9), but stresses God’s ability to transform difficult situations. Jesus has to do the work of his Father before he himself will be condemned to death. The NRSV is probably right when it chooses as original the apparently contradictory ‘we’ and ‘me’ in v. 4. vv. 6–7, in the first two miracles Jesus’ mother and the royal official took the initiative (2:3; 4:47). At the pool of Beth-zatha and here it is Jesus who initiates the miracle. In 5:6 Jesus asked, ‘Do you want to be made well?’ Here he simply accomplishes the miracle as part of God’s plan.

(9:6–12) The evangelist combines two kinds of synoptic miracles, those by contact (the mud on the eyes in v. 6), and those by distance (the healing at the pool in v. 7). In Mk 7:33 and 8:23 Jesus heals with the help of saliva, which at that time was considered as a remedy (cf. Tacitus, Hist. 4.81 and Suetonius, Vesp. 7). But in John Jesus makes mud with the dust of the earth, which might symbolize his creative power (cf. Gen 2:6–7; Job 10:9; Irenaeus, Adv. haer. 5.15.2). The blind man seems to represent the Christians who by their baptism (cf.

3:5) are able to ‘see’ the one who has been sent by the Father. vv. 8–12, just as in the miracle at Beth-zatha, and in contrast to the two first miracles in Galilee, there are at first negative reactions to Jesus’ action. But in the end the healed one will come to an explicit faith. In contrast to all those who hesitate concerning his identity, the once-blind man confesses what Jesus has done for him. He does not mention that the mud was made with the help of saliva. He only knows that the healer is called Jesus, but does not know where he is. This prepares the reader for his arrival in v. 35. In v. 11 the Greek word aneblepsa, which properly means ‘I saw again’, is used of the one who was born blind (cf. Dittenberg, SIG 1173. 15–18).

(9:13–17) By the information in 1:24; 3:1 and especially in chs. 7–8 the reader is accustomed to consider the Pharisees as Jewish authorities who sometimes are also simply called ‘the Jews’ (see 9:18, 22). The evangelist seems to describe the judicial capacity of the Pharisees in the light of their importance in the bêt din after 70 CE. Their power in the Sanhedrin before 70 was rather limited. The healing and the making of mud by Jesus could be interpreted as works that were forbidden on a sabbath (cf. Šabb. 7:2). The Pharisees who doubt Jesus’ origin from God go against what Nicodemus formerly had admitted (3:2). The healed man considers Jesus as a prophet, just as some in the audience will do in v. 31. But both in the OT and the NT a sinner can also perform miracles which lead people astray.

(9:18–23) The parents of the man witness that their son was born blind, but prefer to let him speak of the miracle on his own behalf. They represent the Christians who after 70 CE hesitate to confess Jesus as the Messiah, because they might be put out of the synagogue. Later Jewish documents distinguish between three forms of exclusion, two temporary ones, for a week or for at least thirty days, and a more decisive one, the ‘ban’ (hērem). It is possible that such a definitive exclusion was first introduced about 80–90 with the birkat hamminim, a prayer of ‘benediction’ (= ‘malediction’) against pagans, perhaps even against Christians. The apostasy in 9:22; 12:42; 16:2 might refer to this severe exclusion from the Jewish community (cf. Forkman 1972: 87–114), even if some scholars today contest this interpretation.

(9:24–34) ‘Give glory to God’ in v. 24 means simply to speak the truth (cf. Josh 7:19; Sanh. 6:2). The authorities now accuse Jesus of being a sinner, just as some of the Pharisees had already done in 9:16. The once-blind man, on the contrary, is of the same opinion as the other Pharisees in v. 16. He implicitly opposes Jesus’ authority to that of the law (cf. 5:17). Ironically he remarks in v. 27 that they perhaps want to be Jesus’ disciples. They naturally reaffirm their own fidelity to Moses (cf. Mt 23:2: ‘the Pharisees sit on Moses’ seat’). They claim that Moses has spoken to God, whereas Jesus’ origin is obscure to them, despite all that has been said in chs. 7–8. The evangelist reflects here the conflict which took place in his time between disciples of Jesus and those of Moses (cf. 5:45–7). The man becomes more adamant and explicitly states that Jesus comes from God (vv. 30–3; cf. 3:2), reaffirming what Jesus himself had maintained after the miracle at Beth-zatha (5:19–24). The audience refuses to be taught by a man born in sin, but Jesus has already denied this interpretation in vv. 2–3 and he will affirm in v. 41 that on the contrary it is the unbelieving audience which is sinning.

(9:35–41) During the whole controversy Jesus was absent, but his miracle was the main subject of discussion. The healed man has progressively become more confident about Jesus' origin from God. He is now prepared to confess his faith in him who reveals himself as Son of Man. A few MSS such as P⁷⁵ and Sinaiticus omit the whole of v. 38 and the beginning of v. 39. Contrary to Brown's hypothesis on a liturgical addition (Brown 1966) the text is original since it is well attested in different textual traditions. Jesus' revelation to the blind man is similar to his self-disclosure as Messiah to the Samaritan woman (4:26). The healing of the blind man concludes with an emphasis on the sign of faith. Jesus speaks of the actual judgement which will also be the Son of Man's final judgement (cf. 3:17–21 and 5:27–30). He alludes to Isa 6:9–10, a text that the Synoptics apply to the reception of God's rule (Mk 4:12 par.). In the early Christian communities this text was also used against Jews who did not believe in Jesus (cf. Acts 28:25–8 and Jn 12:39–40). Jesus employs the word 'blind' in two ways: inability to see, and unwillingness to understand. The Pharisees who do not want to understand are immersed in a deeper moral and spiritual blindness than those who are physically blind from birth.

(10:1–21) Jesus is the Door and the Good Shepherd The shepherd's care for his sheep is a frequent theme in the synoptic tradition: Jesus has compassion for the crowds who are like sheep without a shepherd (Mk 6:34; Mt 9:36), or are sent into the midst of wolves (Mt 10:16; Lk 10:3). There may be ravenous wolves who come in sheep's clothing (Mt 7:15). In the parable of the lost sheep according to Mt 18:12–14 Jesus describes God's care for all those who might get lost. In Lk 15:3–7 the same parable, directed against the Pharisees and the scribes, is applied to a sinner who repents from his sins. The little group of disciples is addressed by their master as a flock to whom the Father is giving the kingdom (Lk 12:32; cf. Mt 25:32–4). Finally Jesus alludes to his death with the help of Zech 13:7: 'I will strike the shepherd and the sheep will be scattered' (Mk 14:27; Mt 26:31), a situation which is also described in Jn 16:32.

In these verses two main lines from the synoptic tradition are developed: Jesus is identified with the shepherd as in Mk 14:27 par. He takes active care of his sheep as in Matthew and Luke. But the perspective is different: Jesus speaks of the shepherds who do not fulfil their vocation, and alludes to the OT expectation of God becoming Israel's true shepherd in the future (cf. Isa 40:11; Jer 31:10; Ezek 34:11–16). This prospect could also be applied to David who shepherded the people of Israel (2 Sam 7:7) and became the figure of the predicted Messiah (cf. Jer 23:4–8; Ezek 34:23–4; 37:24). But in Jn 10 Jesus is less a messianic figure than one sent by the Father who loves him. In Jn 21:15–17 Jesus' function as a shepherd will be transmitted to Peter if he loves his master (cf. Acts 20:28–30 on Paul).

In Jn 10 the shepherd does not seek what was lost but keeps his sheep from all dangers. He is even willing to give his life for them, struck as the shepherd is in Zech 13:7. More clearly than in the Synoptics Jesus himself takes the initiative to give his life (cf. Isa 53:5–8 and 1 Pet 2:24–5).

A special feature in John is that even the gate through which the sheep pass becomes important, giving rise to another parable on thieves and bandits. Contrary to Bultmann's (1971) opinion, there is insufficient reason to think that this theme derives from Mandaean literature.

(10:1–3a) The solemn 'very truly' introduces a narrative which in v. 6 is called a 'figure of speech' (paroimia), and which corresponds to a synoptic parable, something always difficult to understand (Mk 4:11–13 par.; cf. Jn 16:25, 29). Both words translate the Hebrew māšal, with the difference that the Johannine paroimia prepares for Jesus' self-revelation in 10:7–18. The first parable in vv. 1–3a contrasts the man who enters by the gate, and the thief or the bandit who climbs in by another way. The normal image in this type of parable would be the burglary of a house or a palace (cf. Lk 12:39), but the evangelist has obscured this by speaking from the beginning of a sheepfold and a shepherd. One can associate this in the Synoptics with the narrow gate that leads to life (Mt 7:13–14; Lk 13:24–5). The evangelist possibly thinks of a sheepfold close to a house and of the shepherd's own sheep in contrast to others (vv. 3–4).

(10:3b–6) The second parable is about a shepherd who knows his own sheep by name and can therefore lead them out of the sheepfold, in contrast to the stranger whom they do not follow. Comparison should be made with Ezek 34:11–16, where God in the future will be the shepherd of his people. Since in both parables the gate and the shepherd remain unidentified the audience (i.e. the Pharisees of 9:40 and others) at first does not understand.

(10:7–10) The obscure figure of speech is partly explained by Jesus' self-identification with the gate. But he avoids a total allegorization of the first parable by not elucidating who the gatekeeper, the thief, and the bandit are. Jesus is the gate in two ways: first, in vv. 7–8 he is the gate through which the shepherds have to go to reach the sheep. The thieves and the bandits (possibly identified with the Pharisees and all the false prophets who have preceded them), do not want this. Secondly, in vv. 9–10 he is the gate through which one can come in and go out to find pasture. Here it is not the shepherd who goes through the gate but the sheep. This is similar to the synoptic narrow gate which leads to life, and Jesus' saying: 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me' (Jn 14:6–7; cf. also Ps 118:20). In order to understand how the gate leads to pasture one has to consider the function of Jesus as shepherd. He guides his sheep to life just as he earlier promised living water and bread from heaven. In opposition to this the thief comes only to kill and destroy (v. 10).

(10:11–18) vv. 11–13 form a short parable, in addition to what had been said in vv. 1–5. There the shepherd was opposed first to the thief and the bandit, then to the stranger. Now a second theme is developed: the hired hand runs away, vv. 12–13. New aspects are introduced: the wolf who attacks the sheep and scatters them takes over the negative function of the thief and the bandit. Jesus identifies himself with the good shepherd, in contrast to all those who in Israel did not behave as such (cf. Ezek 34; Zech 11:4–9; CD 13:9–10). In a similar way, in 6:32–40 he was the true bread from heaven and in 15:1 will be the true vine. In contrast to the hired hand he is willing to give his life for his sheep, as there is a deep solidarity between him and them. This is expressed with the help of reciprocal knowledge, which had been foreshadowed in vv. 3–4 and will be described in 15:1–11 as a reciprocal abiding in love. In 10:16 suddenly the perspective is widened with the reference to ‘other sheep’, probably an allusion to pagans (cf. 7:35; 11:52; 12:20–2). It is not clear whether the one flock will also be in one sheepfold. In vv. 15, 17, and 18 Jesus’ leadership is anchored in the plan and love of his Father. In v. 18 there is even an allusion to Jesus’ initiative in his future resurrection.

(10:19–21) Just as the Pharisees had different opinions concerning the miracle in ch. 9, the Jews (who include the Pharisees of 9:40) are now divided into two groups. As in chs. 7–8 some believe that Jesus has a demon, which in vv. 22–39 will lead to even sharper accusations. Those who defend Jesus do so by referring to his healings of the blind.

(10:22–39) Jesus at the Festival of Dedication During the festival of Dedication (Gk. ta egkainia, Heb. hănukkâ) Jesus is surrounded by Jews who are not his sheep, and therefore cannot understand either his unity with the Father or his identity as Messiah and God’s Son. In contrast to those who hear Jesus’ voice they try to stone him for blasphemy. Jesus is strong by virtue of all his links with the Father and therefore nobody can snatch his sheep out of his hand. He is simply doing his Father’s work, being the Messiah (vv. 22–30), and God’s Son (vv. 31–9).

(10:22–30) Jesus is truly the Messiah. vv. 22–3, the Festival of Dedication took place three months after the Festival of Booths, with similar ceremonies (cf. 1 Macc 4:47–59; 2 Macc 10:6–8). Winter in the Near East is particularly the month of December. Jesus comes back to the temple which he left after the Jews had attempted to stone him in 8:59. According to Acts 3:11 and 5:12 the portico of Solomon was a gathering place for the first Christians. Josephus records that it ran along the east side of the temple (Ant. 15, 396–401; J. W. 5, 184–5). v. 24, since in 12:13 a verse from Ps 118 is quoted, and in 10:9–10 another verse seems to be alluded to, ‘gathered around’ may be due to Ps 118:10–12 where the word occurs three times. In the discussion in chs. 7–8 the audience was divided concerning Jesus as Messiah, despite the demand from the brothers of Jesus that he should make himself more widely known (7:4: en parrhēsiāi einai). Therefore the audience in 10:25 wants him to tell them plainly (parrhēsiāi) if he is the Messiah. vv. 25–8, Jesus has already explicitly said to the Samaritan woman in 4:26 that he is the Messiah, and to the blind man in 9:35 that he is the Son of Man. His teaching has been so clear that Peter could confess him as ‘the Holy One of God’ (6:69). Moreover, during the festival of Booths some people were able to understand that he was the Messiah (chs. 7–8). But the audience in ch. 10 does not want to come to faith (cf. Lk 22:67); it wishes only to accuse Jesus, because it has no positive relation to him. Some exegetes would like to connect vv. 27–30 about the sheep with v. 15a, but the evangelist may have consciously wanted to link together chs. 7–10 with the help of two themes: seeing (ch. 9) and listening (ch. 10). For those who are able to understand, Jesus the good shepherd replaces both festivals. Those who refuse to understand are blind (ch. 9), and do not belong among his sheep (vv. 26–7). According to v. 28 Jesus gives his sheep eternal life (cf. v. 10), and he can protect them against those who want to snatch them away, such as the wolf in v. 12. vv. 29–30, according to the translation in NRSV the things the Father has given Jesus are greater than all; according to JB and TOB it is the Father who is greater than all. If in the original reading the definitive article had been the masculine hos there would probably not have been any problem. Therefore the neuter ho in our MSS is original and at the same time the masculine meizōn is also original: ho patēr mou ho dedōken moi pantōn meizōn estin (cf. Birdsall 1960; Lindars 1972: 369–70; Schnackenburg 1977–9 ii, 385–6). The literal translation is ‘The Father is, as to what he has given me, greater than all’. ‘What he has given’ is a typical Johannine expression (6:39; 17:2, 24), which underlines the Father’s initiative. Jesus’ strength comes from his Father who is greater than all. There is a profound unity between both (cf. 5:19–20; 7:16–18), which in 17:11 will also include believers.

(10:31–9) The evangelist continues to stress that Jesus is God’s Son. vv. 31–3, first in v. 33 the Jews indicate blasphemy as the reason why they want to stone Jesus (cf. Lev 24:16). As in 8:59 it is an attempt to kill him without official trial. In the synoptic tradition Jesus is accused of blasphemy when he forgives sins (Mk 2:5–7 par.), and when he speaks of the coming Son of Man seated at the right hand of the Power (Mk 14:62–4 par.). Probably all propositions that questioned God’s uniqueness were considered as blasphemy in Jesus’ time (cf. 5:18). Ironically the Jews speak the truth: for the evangelist Jesus is in a certain sense ‘God’. ‘Good’ is used in 2:10 of the wine, and in 10:11, 14 in reference to the shepherd. The good shepherd is sent by the Father, and therefore his work exhibits the Father’s goodness (cf. v. 25). vv. 34–6, Jesus uses an argument a fortiori: if the Scripture refers to those who received the word of God as ‘gods’, the one whom God has sanctified cannot blaspheme when he says that he is God’s Son. The argument holds only if you accept that the one sent by God is of a higher standing. Just as in 7:19 and 8:17 Jesus speaks of ‘your’ law, as if he himself were not a Jew. The ‘law’ here is synonymous with Scripture (cf. 12:34; 15:25). Jesus quotes Ps 82(81):6a LXX. In the psalm the subordination of the pagan gods to Israel’s God is described, but Jesus’ point is that ‘god’ can also be applied to those other than Israel’s God. In Ps 82:6b ‘the sons of the Most High’ may have facilitated the transition from ‘gods’ to ‘God’s son’. Perhaps the word ‘sanctified’ is used in v. 36 to fit in with the festival of Dedication during which Num 7:1–89 was read (cf. Meg. 3:6). In Jn 17:18–19 Jesus sanctifies himself for the disciples’ sake so that they may be sanctified in truth. vv. 37–9, Jesus resumes the question of his works, first in a negative formulation (v. 37), then in a positive one (v. 38). The latter is surprising because it invites the Jews to believe at least in Jesus’ works even if they do not believe in him. There may be a hint here of the evangelist’s fatigue in finding new arguments for his contemporaries in favour of faith in Jesus. In fact, it is not easy to understand the deep unity between Jesus and his Father (v. 30), or the mutual ‘indwelling’ (cf. 14:10–11; 17:21). As in 7:30 and 8:20, 59 Jesus is able to escape from their hands, but his inability to engage with the Jews will lead to the final plan to put him to death (11:53, 57).

(10:40–21:25) Fourth Geographical Grouping

(10:40–2) Back across the Jordan In comparison with what happens in Jerusalem the events across the Jordan are positive. Even across the Sea of Galilee Jesus is not threatened with death. We have seen a positive attitude towards him both in Galilee and Samaria. After the dramatic episodes at the two festivals in Jerusalem Jesus must retire to the 'friendly' place where John first baptized. To Galilee, which he left after ch. 6, he will return only after his resurrection (ch. 21). By mentioning the place across the Jordan the evangelist can make a final comparison between Jesus and the Baptist. The latter has not done any miracles and therefore could not be the Messiah. The number of people who come to Jesus and believe in him in the place where he had called his first disciples verifies that the testimony of the Baptist was true. This is an invitation to the reader to believe in Jesus, the crucified and risen one.

(11:1–54) Jesus Who Raises Lazarus Must Himself Die The raising of Lazarus is the seventh and most important sign, since it directly foreshadows Jesus' own death and resurrection. Lazarus' illness both does and does not lead to death. Therefore Jesus can successively say that his friend has fallen asleep and that he is dead (vv. 11, 14). The reason is that Jesus has his own view on what real life is about. The passage from death to life corresponds to the transition from unbelief to faith. This is clear when, despite her brother's death, Martha confesses her faith in the Lord. Lazarus in his tomb embodies the power of death. When he comes out of the tomb and is unbound (vv. 43–4) he is an illustration of the capacity of faith. Jesus accomplishes the work of light among humanity: those who walk with him do not stumble (cf. vv. 9–10) in the dark.

But the death and raising of Lazarus also suggest beforehand what will happen to Jesus who goes to Judea in order to die and be raised from the dead (cf. vv. 7–16). People think that Mary goes to the tomb to weep there, but she meets Jesus (vv. 31–2). She prefigures Mary of Magdala who weeps at the tomb where the risen Jesus is revealed to her (20:11–16). Like her sister Martha she knows that if Jesus who is the resurrection and life (v. 25) had been there, her brother would not have died (v. 32). Jesus weeps and is deeply moved by Lazarus' death, which forecasts his own departure (vv. 35–8).

But there are also contrasts between the deaths of Lazarus and Jesus: Lazarus has been dead for four days (v. 39) but Jesus will rise on the third day (cf. 2:19–22). The reader is invited to join those who believe that the risen Lord will give them eternal life. Through his death and resurrection he will gather into one all the dispersed children of God (v. 52).

The scene is well composed: after a delay (vv. 1–16) Jesus goes to Bethany and meets Martha (vv. 17–27), and Mary (vv. 28–32) separately. He then goes to the tomb (vv. 33–41a), and raises his friend (vv. 41b–44). In vv. 45–54 the evangelist describes the consequences of Jesus' ultimate sign.

(11:1–16) Jesus delays his intervention in Bethany because it is linked to his own death. In the Synoptics Jesus restores to life two persons who have just died, Jairus' daughter and the son of a widow at Nain (Mk 5:21–43 par.; Lk 7:11–17). In John Lazarus dies while Jesus is absent, but has been buried for four days before Jesus arrives and raises him. The revival is therefore more dramatic. vv. 1–2, in Lk 16:19–31 another story is told about a poor man, Lazarus, who dies and is honoured in heaven in contrast to the rich man who before his death had no pity for him. In Lk 10:38–42 Mary and Martha are also named in another context. John alone speaks of their brother Lazarus, and he identifies Mary with the anonymous woman, who according to Mk 14:3–9 and Mt 26:6–13 anointed Jesus in the house of Simon the leper at Bethany (in Lk 7:36–50 the woman is a sinner). vv. 3–6, because the sisters speak of 'whom you love' (hon phileis) some exegetes want to identify Lazarus with the beloved disciple, but for him the evangelist uses (with one exception) the verb agapaō. Jesus knows that Lazarus will die but it will not be a definitive death. It will reveal God's glory in his Son. The two days of delay are necessary to prepare the statement in v. 17 that Lazarus had been in the tomb four days. vv. 7–10, the decision to go to Judea establishes a link between Lazarus' death and Jesus' imminent condemnation. In 9:4 Jesus declared explicitly that he was the light of the world. Now he states it indirectly by calling the sun the light of the world. According to ancient physics the light was in the human eye (cf. Mt 6:22–3; Lk 11:34–5). There is therefore an interplay between the sun or Jesus and the human eye. One can compare Gos. Thom. 24: 'There is light within a man of light.' vv. 11–14, as in other languages, in Greek one can use the euphemism 'to sleep' for 'to die' (cf. Mt 27:52; 1 Thess 4:13–15; 1 Cor 15:18, 20). But the evangelist likes to play on words (see Jn 3:4). This permits him to allude to the raising of the dead while using the word 'awaken'. Jesus finally tells them plainly that Lazarus is dead. vv. 15–16, the evangelist presupposes that Jesus' presence would have prevented Lazarus from dying (cf. v. 21) and thus from being raised. Thomas (which in Aramaic means 'twin') plays an important role in the Fourth Gospel (cf. 14:5; 20:24–9; 21:2) and in the Gospel and the Acts of Thomas. An old Syriac tradition which is scarcely reliable considered him as Jesus' twin and identified him with Judas, a brother of Jesus according to Mk 3:18. On the spiritual level Thomas is right that the believer dies with Christ (e.g. Rom 6) but he has not yet understood what Jesus meant in vv. 9–11. Perhaps the evangelist is suggesting that for Thomas there is nothing beyond Jesus' death (cf. 20:24–9).

(11:17–27) In Bethany Jesus first meets Martha. v. 17, the four days Lazarus has been in the tomb prove according to Jewish conceptions that the soul has definitively left the body (cf. Str-B ii. 544–5). In v. 38 it becomes clear that the tomb is a cavity, either in the soil or, more probably, in the rock, with a stone in front of it (cf. 20:1). vv. 18–19, the evangelist clearly distinguishes between two places, the Bethany across the Jordan, where the Baptist first baptized (1:28), and the Bethany near Jerusalem, generally identified with today's Eizariya. This second Bethany is named in the Synoptics in relation to Jesus' entry into Jerusalem (Mk 11:1 par.) and the anonymous woman in Simon's house (Mk 14:3 par.). In Lk 24:50 Bethany is also the place from which Jesus is carried up to heaven. Thirty days of mourning was usual for women. To console them was one of the important Jewish duties (cf. Str-B ii. 592–607). vv. 20–2, Mary stays at home, probably in order to take care of the guests. In v. 29 we learn that she did not know that Jesus had arrived. As in Lk 10:38–42 Martha is the one who takes the initiative. She expresses her confidence in the power of Jesus. vv. 23–6, the dialogue between Jesus and Martha is built on a major misunderstanding: Martha thinks that Jesus is speaking about the resurrection at the end of time, but Jesus asserts that he himself is the resurrection and life, so that soon Lazarus will be raised. Those who believe in Jesus will be able to overcome their own physical death. v. 27, Martha expresses a complete faith in Jesus, the faith which the evangelist himself wants to promote (cf. 20:31).

(11:28–32) In ch. 4 the meeting with the disciples followed the dialogue with the Samaritan woman and prepared for the meeting with the Samaritans. In a similar manner the dialogue with Martha gives way to a short meeting with Mary, in order to introduce Jesus' visit to the tomb (vv. 33–41a). Martha calls Jesus 'the Teacher'. In 1:38 the Greek didaskalos translates the Hebrew rabbi and in 20:16 the more solemn rabbouni. Jesus is also called 'teacher' in 3:2 and 13:13–14, and 'rabbi' in 1:49; 4:31; 9:2. More often he is addressed as kyrios, 'Lord' (11:21, 32). Mary weeps—and suddenly sees Jesus, anticipating what Mary of Magdala will do at the Lord's tomb. Like her sister, she affirms that Jesus could have healed her brother, but the dialogue does not continue.

(11:33–41a) Jesus comes to the tomb. vv. 33–5, the transition from the scene with Mary to the next scene is smooth. The Jews who followed Mary come to Jesus and are weeping with her. The NRSV 'was greatly disturbed' translates the Greek enebrimēsato, which implies anger. The hypotheses that have been produced about a possible Aramaic or Syriac background (cf. Black 1967: 240–3) do not sufficiently explain our actual text. Probably Jesus' anger is not so much directed against the lack of faith of those who are weeping (so Bultmann 1971: 407) as against the power of death he is now confronted with (cf. 12:27; 13:21). Jesus' own sorrow is real (cf. v. 35), but at the same time he envisions his fight against Satan, the ruler of this world (cf. 13:27, 30; 14:30). vv. 36–7, as with all that Jesus says and does, his weeping can be interpreted in opposite ways. The negative interpretation of Jesus' tears leads us back to the polemical situation after the miracle with the blind man (chs. 9–10). vv. 38–41a, the preparation for the miracle underlines the contrast between the real death of Lazarus and the glory of God revealed to those who believe, but only the disciples have formerly heard about this (v. 4). Martha's statement concerning the decay of her brother's corpse can be interpreted as a friendly warning, because Jesus has not yet told her explicitly what he plans to do.

(11:41b–44) In 2:7–8; 4:50, and 6:10 we have already encountered Jesus' orders in preparation for the miracle. Here he commands people to take away the stone, and Lazarus to come out. The loud voice reminds us of what was said in 5:28–9. Jesus looks upwards (cf. 17:1; Mk 6:41; Lk 18:13) in an attitude of prayer to his Father, in agreement with his practice in some miracles in the synoptic tradition (cf. Mk 6:41 par.; Lk 3:21; 9:28). Still here as in Jn 9:31 the miracle is presented as God's answer to Jesus' prayer. In Mk 14:36 Jesus addresses God with 'abba', an Aramaic expression that corresponds to the simple patēr in Jn 11:41 (cf. Lk 11:2). In place of asking God's help Jesus expresses his profound link with the Father (cf. 12:27–30; ch. 17), who glorifies his Son and is glorified by him. Just as the voice from heaven in 12:20 is for the people's sake, so is the mention of his prayer. The strips of cloth in v. 44 may correspond to the othonia in 19:40 and 20:5–7, and the soudarion (head cloth) to the one mentioned in 20:7. The evangelist does not concern himself with how Lazarus can come out of his tomb before the strips of cloth were unwound.

(11:45–54) The raising of Lazarus provokes opposing reactions. vv. 45–6, the faith of many Jews is counterbalanced by the unbelief of those who denounce Jesus to the Pharisees. vv. 47–8, John simplifies by associating the chief priests of the Sanhedrin with the Pharisees alone. The main concern of the council is to avoid the destruction of the holy place (which at the time the evangelist wrote had already happened). In Mk 14:1–2 the plot of the chief priests and the scribes to arrest Jesus precedes the anointing at Bethany and the eucharistic meal, but the official hearing comes later (Mk 14:53–65 par.). John on the contrary places an official meeting of the council before the anointing at Bethany. Later there will be different hearings but no formal verdict. In this way Jesus is sentenced to death in his absence, whereas in the hearings he sovereignly answers the questions of his judges (cf. Jn 18:19–38). vv. 49–53, according to Josephus (Ant. 18.35, 95) Caiaphas was chief priest from 18 to 36 CE, and naturally not only in the year Jesus was crucified. Ironically Caiaphas prophesies the truth, but the evangelist adds that Jesus will die not only for the Jewish nation but also for all the dispersed children of God (cf. 10:16). There may be a conscious contrast between Jesus' gathering of the children, and the council's gathering in v. 47. Jesus' death is implicitly a propitiating sacrifice (cf. 1:29; 19:14, 36), but the evangelist especially underlines his obedience to the Father (cf. 10:17; 13:1–33; 19:30). v. 54, according to 7:51 the council's death sentence is illegal (cf. 7:51). Just as Jesus in 10:40 retired across the Jordan, so he leaves Bethany for Ephraim, perhaps the modern Et-Taiyibeh, about 20 km. north of Jerusalem. Thus these two quiet places enclose the supreme sign of the raising of Lazarus.

(11:55–12:36) Jesus is Anointed and Acclaimed before his Death. It is not easy to know how the evangelist organizes the material between the raising of Lazarus and the last supper discourses. In 12:37–50 he seems to comment on the whole first part of his work. In 11:55–12:36 he relates what happened shortly before Jesus' last supper. After the festival of Dedication in 10:22–44 we encounter in 11:55 and 12:1 the mention of Passover, which is resumed in 13:1. It will also be named in the interrogation before Pilate in 18:28, 39; 19:14. vv. 11:55–12:36 seem to be a kind of summary of what happened when Jesus' last Passover was near.

Three different scenes prepare the reader for what soon will happen to Jesus:

1. The anointing at Bethany in 11:55–12:11 shows that Jesus' future burial will not be accidental but is already prepared for by Mary's pious action.
2. In connection with the anointing, the solemn acclamation near Jerusalem in 12:12–19 points Jesus out as Israel's king in a deeper way than the crowds can grasp.
3. The discourse with the Greeks and the people in 12:20–36 gives a final meaning to Jesus' imminent death. It shows how death leads to life (vv. 20–6), how Jesus goes through a kind of 'Gethsemane' (vv. 27–30), and how a struggle between light and darkness is now going on (vv. 31–6).

In different ways these three scenes attempt to illuminate the two aspects of death and life that are revealed in Jesus' last Passover. The meal in the presence of the raised Lazarus is the context for Jesus' revelation of his approaching burial. The acclamation near Jerusalem allows a big crowd to meet the one who has raised Lazarus. The Greeks and the people witness Jesus' distress before his death but also his acceptance of the decisive hour.

In ch. 11 Lazarus was in a certain sense in the foreground, now on the contrary it is Jesus himself who occupies centre-stage. He is anointed and acclaimed, and he takes the initiative to obtain and ride a young donkey. In contrast to Mary's affectionate attitude we encounter Judas's mean remarks, which anticipate his future betrayal. The crowds who praise Jesus behave in a way quite different from the caustic Pharisees and the high priests who plan to put Lazarus to death. Many want to see Jesus, who informs them that a grain of wheat must die in order to bear fruit.

(11:55–12:11) In Mk 14:3–9 and Mt 26:6–13 the anointing at Bethany comes after the acclamation in Jerusalem and is dated differently from John: two days before Passover, when the high priests and the scribes have already decided to kill Jesus. In Lk 7:36–50 a sinner in Galilee anoints Jesus, but there is no connection with Jesus' burial. vv. 55–7, since Jesus had left Bethany for Ephraim after the raising of Lazarus, these verses introduce a new scene at Bethany. As early as 2:13 and 6:4 we met the formula that the Passover of the Jews was near, so that Jesus' official life in John comprises at least two or three years. According to some estimates about 100,000 pilgrims came every year to Jerusalem. Josephus evidently exaggerates when he writes that in the 60s 2,700,200 people were sanctified by 256,500 sacrifices (J. W. 6. 422–5). The purifications could start a week before Passover, and were accomplished according to Ex 19:10 and Num 9:6–12 (cf. also Pesah. 9:1 ff.). Contrary to 7:11 the people are looking for Jesus in a positive way, but the authorities have already decided to kill him (vv. 53, 57). Still they will wait until Judas has betrayed him (13:18–30; 18:2–3). 12:1, the six days before Passover indicate that the anointing at Bethany is connected with Jesus' last Passover, just as the death and raising of Lazarus is. 12:2–3, as in Lk 10:38–42 Martha serves Jesus, and Mary is sitting at the Lord's feet, but now in order to anoint them and wipe them with her hair, just as the sinner in Lk 7:38 (who moreover bathes them with her tears and kisses them). In Mk 14:3 and Mt 26:7 an anonymous woman pours the ointment on Jesus' head. In John the scene seems to have different functions: Mary's action anticipates Nicodemus' kingly burial of Jesus in 19:39. It introduces the acclamation of Jesus as anointed king of Israel (even if the anointing is done to the feet and not the head). Jesus himself interprets the anointing in v. 7 in connection with his future burial, but since the tomb is the place from which he will rise it is also a preparation for his glory. Mary who anoints and wipes Jesus' feet anticipates also the scene where Jesus will wash and wipe his disciples' feet. Judas has a similar negative function in both scenes (12:4–7; 13:2, 21–30). The fragrance of the perfume may symbolize the fame of Mary's good action and correspond to Mk 14:9 and Mt 26:13, 'what she has done will be told in remembrance of her'. The rare word pistikos found in both Mk 14:3 and Jn 12:3 probably means 'pure'. Only John indicates a measure of one litra, 327 grams, which is an enormous quantity, corresponding to the kingly amount of myrrh and aloes in 19:39. 12:4–6, the MSS do not agree on whether Judas or his father Simon is called Iscariot (see Jn 6:71). v. 5 probably depends on Mk 14:4–5, but there 'some' criticize the waste of ointment (in Mt 26:8 'the disciples'). Judas keeps the common purse as in 13:29, but moreover steals from it, an information we do not have in the Synoptics. Perhaps the thief and bandit in the parable of the shepherd in 10:1–5 has influenced the story here. 12:7–8, one can translate v. 7, aphes autēn, hina eis tēn hēmeran tou entaphiasmou tērēsē auto, as NRSV does (adding 'she bought it'), but perhaps better 'leave her alone, so that she might perform this for the day of my burial'. In Mk 14:8 it is clear that the woman has anointed Jesus beforehand because neither at his burial nor on the day of resurrection could the women do it. But since in Jn 19:38–40 Nicodemus comes with a mixture of myrrh and aloes, it is best to understand Mary's anointing in John as a symbolic precedent that Nicodemus will complete later on. The whole of v. 8 is found in Mt 26:11, whereas Mk 14:7 adds 'and you can show kindness to them whenever you wish'. Perhaps it is only a coincidence that Matthew and John omit the same words. 12:9–11, these rather ironical verses underline the link between the two scenes at Bethany, and between what happened to Lazarus and will happen to Jesus. To kill Lazarus, the living sign of Jesus' future resurrection, is to extend the decision taken in 11:47–53. Nothing is said about the authorities' success in their new plans.

(12:12–19) In all four gospels Jesus' last days are introduced by the people's acclamation. In the Synoptics the messianic homage is directly linked to the following temple cleansing, which shows Jesus' zeal for God's house (cf. Mark 11:1–19 par.). In Mark and Matthew moreover the Master curses a fig-tree, a symbolic action against those in Israel who are unfaithful. All this leads to the trial against him. Since John has put the symbolic cleansing of the temple at the beginning of Jesus' official activity, the raising of Lazarus becomes the chief reason for arresting Jesus. In the Synoptics there are two stages in the scene of acclamation: first Jesus sends out two disciples to bring a donkey or a colt to him, and then he rides on it and is acclaimed. In John we have first an acclamation outside Jerusalem, and then Jesus finds himself a young donkey to sit upon (vv. 12–15). v. 12, 'The next day' is counted from the time reference at 12:1, i.e. Sunday before Passover. Two groups are present, those who had come to the festival, and those who had witnessed the raising of Lazarus (cf. vv. 17–18). v. 13, the branches of palm trees are probably conceived as a lilab, used at the festivals of Booths and of Dedication. 'Hosanna' means 'save!', a prayer used in Ps 118:25–6, particularly at the festival of Booths. In Luke Jesus is acclaimed as 'the king', in John as 'the King of Israel' (cf. Jn 1:49). In contrast to Mk 11:10 and Mt 21:9 neither David nor his son are mentioned. Thus John underlines Jesus' royal function without linking it to David's dynasty (cf. 18:33–8). vv. 14–15, due to different interpretations of the Hebrew and the Greek text of Zech 9:9, the young donkey (onarion) in v. 14 and the donkey's colt (pōlos onou) in v. 15 are in Mk 11:2 and Lk 19:30 a colt (pōlos), in Mt 21:2, 7 both a donkey and a colt (onos and pōlos). The word 'comes' is used in both Ps 118:26 and Zech 9:9, and may explain the link between both quotations. v. 16, the disciples understand the events better after Jesus' resurrection, as in 2:17, 22. vv. 17–19, these verses attempt to link the acclamation with the raising of Lazarus. In contrast to the positive attitude of the crowds, we have in v. 19 the Pharisees' impotence. 'The world' (ho kosmos) corresponds to Hebrew kol hā'ôlām and means 'all people'. But perhaps there is also an allusion to the theological theme of Jesus' coming to this world (1:9–10; 3:16–17). Ironically the Pharisees anticipate Jesus' own prophecy that he will draw all people to himself (12:32).

(12:20–36) Jesus Speaks about his Imminent Death Some Greeks ask to see Jesus through the mediation of the disciples (cf. 1:44–5). Jesus reveals the mystery of his imminent death to them and to the rest of the audience. The grain of wheat that dies in the earth symbolizes the rich future harvest. The voice from heaven is a sign addressed to the audience, so they will understand that the Son of Man who will be lifted up is really the light present among them. vv. 20–6, these verses show how Jesus' death will lead to life. The Greeks are either proselytes or God-fearers like Cornelius in Acts 10–11. Already in 7:35 the evangelist alluded to the mission among the Greeks. The intermediaries Philip and Andrew both have Greek names. The hour which formerly had not yet come (2:4 and 7:6, 8; cf. 7:30; 8:20) is now at hand. It is not only the hour when Jesus will be arrested, but also the hour of his glorification (cf. 13:1–32). From now onwards the crucifixion will be seen in the light of Jesus' future resurrection and glorification. Paul uses the simile of the grain to illustrate humankind's future resurrection (1 Cor 15:37–58), whereas in John it has to do with the missionary harvest (cf. Mk 4:1–9). The Christian community will not 'remain alone' (lit. tr.) after Jesus' death but will be united in the same faith. The logion on loving or hating one's life is in the Synoptics expressed in at least three different ways: Mk 8:35 and Lk 9:24; Mt 10:39; Lk 17:33. The Johannine formulation 'love' and 'hate' may be more original than the synoptic 'save' and 'lose', but the evangelist has probably added 'in this world' and 'eternal life'. The other logion in v. 26 also has parallels, in the synoptic theme of 'serving' and 'following' (Mk 8:34 par. and 10:43–5 par.), but John stresses the importance of serving Jesus (and not only humankind) and of being honoured by the Father (cf. 14:23; 16:27, where the believers are loved by the Father). vv. 27–30, these verses correspond in some respects to the synoptic scene at Gethsemane (Mk 14:34–6 par.). The evangelist probably knew Mark's text: he alludes to a garden across the Kidron (18:1), he names the cup (18:11), and is inspired by Mark's mention of the hour (Mk 14:35). v. 27, in John the Lord's trouble before his imminent death has already been expressed in Jn 11:33, 38. But typically enough, the Johannine Jesus does not hesitate to accept the hour which is approaching. v. 28, the glorification of the Father's name seems to allude to the first part of the Lord's prayer (Mt 6:9; Lk 11:2). The voice from heaven reminds us of the voice at Jesus' baptism and transfiguration (Mk 1:11 par.; 9:7 par.), but the message is typically Johannine: God is glorified by Jesus' work on earth (cf. 17:4) and he will be glorified by Jesus' acceptance of the hour (cf. 17:5). vv. 29–30, thunder in the OT is often a manifestation of God's voice (e.g. in Ps 29:3; Job 37:4). The angel can remind us of Luke 22:43, but in John he appears for the benefit of the audience and not in order to comfort Jesus. The crowd needs Jesus' interpretation to understand what is going on. Thus Jesus' private agony is transformed into a public confession of his obedience to his Father's will. vv. 31–6, the ruler of 'this world', understood here in a negative way, will be judged by Jesus' death (v. 31). vv. 32–3, Jesus is lifted up on the cross from which he exercises his Lordship by attracting all people, a thought already adumbrated in v. 19. This attraction is dependent on the Father's will (cf. 6:44). vv. 34–5, the audience ironically speaks the truth when it stresses the common expectation that the Messiah remains forever (e.g. T. Levi, 18:8; cf. de Jonge 1972–3). Jesus, the Son of Man, will indeed remain forever with the Father, but as light in the world his time is limited. v. 36, the audience has a unique opportunity to become children of light (cf. 'children of God' in 1:12). Jesus' sudden departure expresses symbolically that the period in which he instructed the people is now finished. It is also a transition to the next section, concerning unbelievers whose eyes are blinded.

(12:37–50) Faith and Unbelief In 3:31–6 we saw a passage that could be understood as words of Jesus, or of the Baptist, or that could simply be the evangelist's commentary on the foregoing discussion. In vv. 37–50 it is even clearer that the author speaks on his own behalf, quoting what Jesus had said, in order to conclude the first part of his gospel. We meet a faint echo from the Prologue: the light that has come to the world, the words that come from the Father, Jesus' glory, the importance of faith. The text is divided into two parts: the people's faith and unbelief, with a quotation from Isaiah as the starting-point (vv. 37–43; cf. Rom 10:16); different sayings of Jesus on faith and unbelief (vv. 44–50). Many commentators underline the repetitive character of these verses, and some attribute them to a less gifted redactor. As the audience is not named some have also proposed displacing the passage. But in my opinion all these theories neglect an important feature of Johannine technique, where repetition is used to stress the implied author's point of view.

(12:37–43) The many signs do not lead to faith, contrary to the other mention of signs in 20:30–1. vv. 38–40, two quotations from Isaiah are combined: 53:1 and 6:10. The first is taken straight from the LXX, while the second one follows neither MT, nor the LXX, nor the Aramaic targum. It does, however, coincide with the LXX in the three last words: 'and I shall heal them'. John omits the reference to the hearing ears, and reverses the order, starting with 'he has blinded their eyes' before the hardened heart. He has different words from the LXX for 'he has blinded', 'he has hardened', 'understand', 'turn' and even 'so that'. Moreover God is the subject ('he has blinded'), whereas in the LXX it is the people. In Acts 28:26–8 the quotation of Isa 6:9–10 is linked to the unbelief of the Jews and the acceptance of the Gentiles. vv. 41–3, it is possible that John, like Isaiah, alludes to a proclamation among Gentiles (cf. v. 20), with the regret that so many Jews (and probably even Christians) do not dare to confess Jesus because of both fear of the authorities (cf. a similar remark in 9:22), and vain human glory (cf. 5:44). In v. 41 John has a wording that recalls the targum on Isa 6:1–5, where it is said that the prophet saw only ‘the glory in the shekina of the King of the aeons’. The glory of God in v. 41 may be either that of the pre-existent Christ, or better, an anticipation of the glory that Jesus has come to reveal (cf. Abraham’s joy to see Jesus’ day in 8:56). vv. 44–50, without indication of time and place Jesus suddenly cries aloud as in 7:28, 37. These verses could have come as part of the scene described in 12:20–36, but they are here integrated into the author’s general commentary on the first part of his work. In connection with the two quotations from Isaiah Jesus speaks of faith and unbelief. vv. 44–6, Jesus sums up what he has said earlier on his being sent as the light into this world (cf. 1:5; 8:12; 12:35–6). A new theme in v. 45 is the link established between seeing Jesus and seeing the Father (also in 14:9 and cf. 13:20). In v. 46 those who believe in Jesus are now assured that they will not remain in the darkness. vv. 47–8, those who do not believe are said to be judged not by Jesus but by his words at the last judgement (cf. 3:18; 5:24). vv. 49–50, Jesus stresses once more that what he says comes from the Father (cf. 5:30; 7:16–17). This could be compared with what is said about the ‘prophet like [Moses]’: ‘I will put my words in the mouth of the prophet, who shall speak to them everything that I command’ (Deut 18:18). ‘Eternal life’ is the goal of believers, as in 5:24 and 6:54.

Second Book: Jesus Reveals the Glory of his Death and Resurrection to the Disciples (13:19–21:25)

(13:1–30) Jesus Washes the Feet of his Disciples and Points out the Traitor A kind of rereading of 13:1–14:31 seems to have been at the origin of the new well-composed unity of 13:1–17:26. One can distinguish five subdivisions (see, among others, Schnackenburg 1977–9: ii): Jesus’ last meal (13:1–30), the first part of his discourse (13:31–14:31), the second part of his discourse (15:1–16:4a), the third part of his discourse (16:4b–33), and finally his prayer to the Father (17:1–26). The first and the second part correspond respectively to the fifth and the fourth, with the third at the centre of the whole concentric structure. The passage on the last meal can in turn be divided into five items: the introduction (vv. 1–5), the dialogue between Jesus and Peter (vv. 6–11), the footwashing as an example (vv. 12–17), Jesus’ words about the disciples (vv. 18–20), Jesus’ designation of the traitor (vv. 21–30). In the Synoptics the last supper is a passover and eucharistic meal, without footwashing and without longer discourses (with the exception of Lk 22:25–38). It is possible that the concentration on the footwashing made it difficult for John also to have a eucharistic meal. He does not agree with the Synoptics on the date of the Passover, since in his gospel Jesus’ death takes place on the day of Preparation, when the Passover lambs are slaughtered (cf. Jn 19:31, 36; cf. Ex 12:21, 46). In ch. 6 he has inserted his own conception of the eucharist, possibly in a second edition of the gospel.

The footwashing in John is not a symbol for the institution of the eucharist, but it is similarly linked with Jesus’ sacrificial death. A cosmic drama is described in connection with the festival of the Passover: Jesus who has come from the Father and will return to him has loved his disciples to the end, as is shown by the symbolic action of the footwashing. But Judas leaves the circle of disciples in order to betray his master (cf. Richter 1967).

(13:1–5) In a skilful way the evangelist combines the introduction to the second book (v. 1) with the introduction to the footwashing (vv. 2–3). In the Greek text vv. 1–4 can be taken as a single long sentence, in view of the double eidōs (‘knowing’) in vv. 1 and 3. It is in the light of Jesus’ close knowledge of his Father’s purpose that we have to consider the meaning of the footwashing. The Son’s Passover is ‘to pass over’ from this world to the Father from whom he came. The footwashing has therefore a soteriological aspect. vv. 1–3, v. 1 points forwards to the cross, whereas v. 2 underlines how Jesus’ love for his disciples is really eis telos, which means both ‘to the end’ and ‘perfect’. This is realized both in the footwashing and in the acceptance of imminent death. In v. 2 the aorist genomenou is a variant reading for the present ginomenou. It is the more difficult reading, but can be translated [‘as the meal’] had already begun’. The link between the footwashing and Jesus’ death is stressed by the mention of Judas’s betrayal. The Father has given all things into Jesus’ hands because he loves him (3:35). Nobody can snatch them out of his or his Father’s hands (10:28–9). vv. 4–5, after the first three theological verses the evangelist describes what Jesus actually did. That he takes off (Gk. tithesin) his outer robe may be an allusion to the good shepherd who lays down (tithesin) his life for the sheep (10:11). Footwashing was a sign of hospitality (cf. Lk 7:44), but normally it was the servants who performed the act and not their master (cf. Jos. Asen 7.1).

(13:6–11) In a dialogue with Peter we get a first approach to the meaning of the footwashing. Peter, disciple from the beginning (1:40–4), confesses that Jesus is the Holy One (6:67–8.). In chs. 18–21 he has a prominent place, but his insight is sometimes deficient compared with that of the disciple whom Jesus loves. In ch. 13 we have a similar lack of understanding. The dialogue with Jesus prepares for the prophecy of Peter’s defection in 13:36–8. vv. 6–8, in 2:22 and 12:16 the evangelist underlined that the disciples would understand after Jesus’ resurrection. Now the Lord seems to say that even his explanation in 13:12–20 will later on require a deeper understanding. Since Jesus in 14:3 refers to the place he will prepare for them, the ‘share’ (Gk. meros) might allude to that which Peter will have with the Father (cf. 17:24). vv. 9–11, because Peter does not understand the deeper meaning of the footwashing he asks for more washing, a misunderstanding similar to those we have met in chs. 3 and 4. In v. 10 JB and TOB omit, with some ancient authorities, ‘except for the feet’. But the longer reading accepted in NRSV is probably original, since the difficult text invited copyists to omit the words. How ought one to understand ‘one who has bathed’? In my opinion it is primarily an allusion to the Jewish bath before the festival of the Passover (cf. 11:55 and 13:1). Those who have already purified themselves by a bath need now only a footwashing, as is normal when one is received at a Jewish home. By association Jesus passes from bodily to moral cleanness, which allows him to implicate Judas. The sharing with Jesus mentioned in v. 8 and the explanation given in vv. 12–15 invite the reader also to associate the footwashing with Christian baptism.

(13:12–17) Jesus gives a fuller explanation of the footwashing as an expression of his own love (cf. vv. 1–3), and as an example for later disciples. In these verses there are several contacts with synoptic sayings (Mk 10:42–5; Lk 6:40; 22:27; Mt 10:24). vv. 12–14, in John kyrios, ‘Lord’, is often nearly synonymous with ‘teacher’. But in the passages after the resurrection and in 6:23 and 11:2 it designates the risen Lord. Jesus uses a typical argument a fortiori: what the person of higher status has done must also be practised by the one of lower status. v. 15, this is the only time Jesus calls one of his actions an ‘example’ to follow. In the changed social circumstances of the church, footwashing was practised only sporadically. It seems therefore to have been understood more as a spiritual example. vv. 16–17, John uses the word ‘messenger’ (apostolos) only here, but he has a developed theology of mission: Jesus who has been sent by his Father sends his disciples into the world in order to lead the believers to the Father (Dewailly 1969). ‘If you know these things’ is probably a commentary not only on v. 16 but on the meaning of the footwashing.

(13:18–20) Jesus speaks of both the traitor and the sending of his disciples. vv. 18–19, the treason of Judas preoccupies the evangelist (see vv. 2 and 10; cf. 6:70). He indicates two motives why Jesus chose him: the first is that the Scripture must be fulfilled, the second is that Jesus’ prophetic knowledge about Judas will help the disciples to believe. The quotation of Ps 41:10 belongs to the passion narrative (Mk 14:18), but is here adapted to the context, differing both from MT and LXX. For the formula ‘I am’, see Jn 8:24. v. 20, this verse continues the reflection in v. 16. The evangelist has often expressed the intimate connection between the Father and the Son, e.g. in 5:17–30; 7:17–18 and 12:44–50. It is therefore not surprising that whoever receives Jesus receives the Father. In 14:9 the same idea is expressed with other words: to see the Son is to see the Father.

(13:21–30) Jesus points out the traitor, who in turn leaves the group of disciples. vv. 21–2, the solemn announcement of the betrayal is similar to that in the Synoptics (Mk 14:18 par.), but John introduces the whole scene by indicating for the third time how Jesus is troubled before his passion (cf. 11:33; 12:27). vv. 23–5, the beloved disciple, who is explicitly introduced here for the first time (cf. 19:26; 20:2; 21:7), is asked to mediate Simon’s question to Jesus, whereas in Mk 14:19 and Mt 26:22 each disciple asks Jesus directly. vv. 26–7, Mk 14:20 par. probably describes the special passover ceremony of dipping into the same bowl of spices, whereas in John it is the eating of an ordinary piece of bread (cf. v. 18), which in this gospel alone Jesus hands over to Judas. The Hebrew sāṭān (‘the adversary’; cf. Job 1–2) is elsewhere in John replaced by the Greek diabolos (‘devil’, in 6:70; 8:44; 13:2), or by ‘the ruler of this world’ (12:31; 14:30; 16:11). vv. 28–9, as some disciples misunderstand Jesus’ words in v. 27 (‘do quickly what you are going to do’), the drama increases. v. 30, because Jesus is often described in John as the light of this world, Judas’s departure during the night has probably a symbolic meaning.

(13:31–14:31) The First Part of the Farewell Discourse Both in Greek and Jewish literature there is a special genre called ‘testaments’ (see e.g. Plato’s Phaedo, Paul’s speech in Acts 20:17–35, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs). Before his death the hero foresees his friends’ sorrow but encourages them to be united in love and to keep his message. In 13:33 we have a main outline of the first discourse: the disciples cannot follow now, which is shown in 13:36–8; in 14:1–14 Jesus announces that he is going to the Father; in 14:15–24 he indicates how the Holy Spirit, the risen Christ, and the Father will later on be with the disciples. The whole discourse is introduced by Jesus’ announcement of his departure, and is concluded by different logia on the Spirit and on peace. The text is wrestling with the difficult question of God’s presence with the disciples after Jesus’ departure. In contrast to the reciprocal love between the Father, the Son, and the disciples, the text describes the powerless hostility of the ruler of this world (see Jn 14:30–1). The discourse is interrupted by different interventions of Peter, Thomas, Philip, and Judas (not Iscariot).

(13:31–8) Jesus Announces his Departure and Peter’s Future Defection vv. 31–2, the aorists in these verses make Jesus speak retrospectively at the time of fulfilment. The omission of v. 32a in important MSS is probably due to the similar endings en autō. The evangelist wants to impress his reader through repetitions of the same theme. In 11:4 he underlined how the Son of God was glorified through the illness of Lazarus. In 12:23, 27–8 Jesus spoke to the crowds about the arrival of his hour of glorification. Now, when Judas has left, he says the same thing to his disciples. In 17:1–5, in his prayer to the Father, he will be much more explicit: the Father has given him authority over all people through the glorification on the cross; the Father is glorified by the work the Son has accomplished, and he will glorify his Son with the glory he had before the world existed. In 13:31–2 part of this is expressed only briefly. In the Johannine use of doxazō (‘glorify’) there is a subtle combination of the Greek doxa, ‘honour’, and the Hebrew kābōd (‘glory’). Through his resurrection Jesus elevated on the cross is both honoured and glorified with his Father. v. 33, ‘Little children’ is not employed elsewhere in the gospel, but is usual in 1 John. This affectionate designation prepares the personal message on love in vv. 34–5. Jesus’ time on earth can be called short in comparison with his eternal stay with the Father (cf. 7:33; 14:19; 16:16–19). The words to the Jews to which Jesus refers (7:33 and 8:21–30) function differently for the disciples, because the latter will be able to follow him later on (14:3). vv. 34–5, the departure makes Jesus think of the task the disciples will have in the world (see Jn 13:6–11 on the meaning of the footwashing). In John the ‘commandment’ (Gk. entolē) in the singular is used for the mission Jesus received from his Father (10:18; 12:49–50), or for his assignment to the disciples (13:34; 15:12). In the plural it specifies Jesus’ or his Father’s prescriptions (14:15, 21; 15:10). The love commandment is ‘new’ in that the reciprocal love is founded on Jesus’ own love (13:1–4; cf. 1 Jn 2:8; 2 Jn 5). In 15:9–12 it will even be based on the love of the Father for Jesus. In our text the reciprocal ‘glorification’ of the Father and the Son is the background for the love between the disciples. John has nothing to say about the love of one’s enemies (Mt 5:43–8; Lk 6:27–8). It is possible that the word ‘new’ also alludes to the new covenant mentioned in Lk 22:20 and 1 Cor 11:25, with its OT link to Jer 31:31–4. For the Jews a commandment is normally associated with a covenant. Jesus' love unto death is in that sense the starting-point of a renewed covenant. vv. 36–8, Peter takes up what Jesus said in v. 33. This gives the Master an opportunity to touch upon the theme 'to follow'. In the first instance Peter will not lay down his life for his master but deny him three times (cf. 18:17; 25–7). According to 16:32 all the disciples will abandon Jesus. But afterwards Peter will follow him unto death (21:18–19). Jesus' prediction is part of the synoptic tradition (Mk 14:29 par.), but John alone alludes to Peter's future perfect discipleship.

(14:1–14) Jesus is Going to his Father v. 1, as the imperative is used in 1a, both occurrences of pisteuete in 1b are probably to be taken as in the imperative (as NRSV) rather than the present indicative, just as in v. 11. v. 2, the 'many dwelling places' (Gk. monai pollai) resemble those found in 1 Enoch 39:4; 45:3; 2 Enoch 61:1 ff., and other Jewish texts, but distinctively the evangelist does not insist on the different kinds of dwellings in heaven. The main point for Jesus is 'abiding' (Gk. menō) in his Father's house (cf. 2:16). In v. 2a one can translate the Greek hoti with 'for': 'if it were not so, I would have told you; for I go', or better as NRSV with 'that' ('if it were not so would I have told you that I go . . . ?'). Jesus then alludes to what he has already said about his special way to the Father (cf. also 12:26), a theme he will develop in vv. 4–12. v. 3, the first Christians expected Jesus to return at the end of time. The evangelist anticipates this return in the spiritual presence of the risen Lord among his disciples (cf. vv. 15–23). There are some points of contact between this verse and 1 Thess 4:16–17 where Jesus will descend from heaven to meet the faithful, and all finally 'will be with the Lord for ever'. Perhaps John suggests that Jesus' return takes place in a sense when disciples die. vv. 4–5, Jesus describes the way to the goal he has proposed in vv. 1–3. Thomas, who in 11:16 did not fully understand Jesus' purpose, even now hesitates about the goal and the way of which Jesus speaks. v. 6, this verse does not mark out Jesus' identity, but it describes who he ought to be for the faithful disciples: a leader on the way which leads to eternal life with the Father, because Jesus himself has revealed the truth he has learned from him. v. 7, most MSS have pluperfect in both verbs of 7a, indicating a condition contrary to the facts: 'If you had known me, you would have known . . .'. This variant, which is accepted in TOB, seems to have arisen under the influence of 8:19. Therefore the reading adopted in NRSV, with a perfect and a future tense ('if you know me, you will know . . .'), seems to be preferable, even if there are fewer witnesses in its favour. Those who see Jesus by faith can see the Father who has sent him (cf. 6:40; 12:45). v. 8, Philip is naïve when he thinks that he can already see God's glory (cf. the similar demand of Moses in Ex 33:18). vv. 9–11, Jesus once again explains the special relationship between himself and the Father: to see or to hear Jesus is to see or to hear the Father. In a more ontological meaning Jesus is in the Father and the Father in him. Even his works manifest his deep link with the Father. In short, his whole person is a revelation from the Father (cf. 3:34; 7:17–18; 8:28; 12:45, 49). vv. 12–14, the works of the disciples presuppose Jesus' missionary activity (cf. ch. 4 and 12:20–6) and his glorification with the Father. They are 'greater' only because they are done in the name of Jesus. Several ancient versions and some MSS omit v. 14, either by accident or because it was considered as a repetition of v. 13. Moreover it could be thought to contradict 16:23. In the different farewell discourses the words 'in my name' are used five out of seven times in connection with prayer. On three occasions Jesus speaks of prayer in his name: here, in 15:16, and in 16:23–6. In this text Jesus underlines the importance of faith and of his departure to the Father. In the second text he speaks of the missionary work of the disciples, and in the third of their prayer after his resurrection. Here Jesus is the one who hears the prayer, in the two other texts it is the Father. In his own prayer Jesus replaces the formula 'in my name' with 'in your name' (17:11–12, cf. 17:6, 26). There is therefore a close link between the names of Jesus and of his Father, just as there is a reciprocal relationship between the Son and the Father. In the synoptic material we have only one explicit text about prayer in the name of Jesus (Mt 18:19–20), but in Acts the disciples baptize and do miracles 'in his name'.

(14:15–24) The Holy Spirit, the Risen Christ, and the Father will be with the Disciples Soon After Jesus' Glorification v. 15, the imperative tērēsite ('keep!') is well attested in the MSS but fits the context less well than the future tērēsete ('you will keep'), accepted by NRSV from several important witnesses. Jesus underlines that to keep his commandments is to remain in his love. On 'commandment' (entolē) in the plural, see Jn 13:34. vv. 16–17, one can distinguish five passages on the Helper: here, 14:26; 15:26–7; 16:7–11; 16:13–17, all well integrated in their context. The word paraklētos is a verbal adjective, often used of one called to help in a lawcourt. In the Jewish tradition the word was transcribed with Hebrew letters and used for angels, prophets, and the just as advocates before God's court. The word also acquired the meaning of 'one who consoles' (cf. Job 16:2, Theodotion's and Aquila's translations; the LXX has the correct word paraklētores). It is probably wrong to explain the Johannine paraklētos on the basis of only one religious background. The word is filled with a complex meaning: the Spirit replaces Jesus, is an advocate and a witness, but also consoles the disciples. He encourages them to remember Jesus' work and leads them into the whole truth. He has his own personality (see Johansson 1940; Betz 1963; Franck 1985). In this text the Spirit of truth is considered as 'another Advocate' (or better, 'Helper'), with an allusion to Johannine traditions where Jesus himself is the first advocate with his Father (1 Jn 2:1). The Helper is a Spirit of truth, as in 16:13. In 1 Jn 5:6 the Spirit is simply identified with truth, because he is a witness (cf. Jn 15:26). He is naturally dependent on Jesus who is the truth (14:6), i.e. the revelation from the Father. The Spirit of truth in John has often been compared with the same phrase used in Qumran texts (1QS 3:18; 4:23). But there he is a spiritual force who influences man's moral dispositions, whereas in John the Spirit mediates truth. Still the fight of Beliar against the angelic figure of truth in 1QS 3:18–4:26 is similar to that of the 'world' which refuses to accept the revelation of God's truth in Jesus. In ch. 14 it is the Father who gives the Spirit at the demand of Jesus (vv. 16 and 24), whereas in chs. 15 and 16 Jesus himself sends the Spirit (15:26; 16:7). But as the Father sends the Spirit in Jesus' name (14:26) one can say that even in ch. 14 the Spirit is implicitly sent by Jesus. After the Master's departure the Helper will be permanently with the disciples. vv. 18–21, Jesus comments on the 'little while' (13:33) when the world will no longer see him. The disciples will in the near future see the risen Christ and understand their reciprocal indwelling and love, but also the love from the Father. There is a parallelism between vv. 15–17 on the Helper and vv. 18–21 on Jesus: the world cannot receive the Spirit (v. 17a) and cannot see Jesus (v. 19a). The disciples on the contrary know the Spirit who abides in them (v. 17b), just as they have their life in Jesus (v. 19b). Those who love Jesus keep his commandments (v. 15), and conversely those who keep his commandments love him (v. 21a). The evangelist is convinced that the Spirit is given after Jesus' glorification. In a certain sense Jesus himself returns with the Helper. But the disciples will also have the joy of meeting him as the risen Christ. The Father's and Jesus' love to which they will respond by their own love will be a new presence of Jesus. It is possible that the evangelist even has the definitive return of Christ in mind (cf. Jn 14:1–3). Augustine expresses this paradox nicely: 'Now we love when we are believing in what we shall see; but then we shall love when we see what we have believed in' (In Johannem, 75:4). vv. 22–4, Judas seems to misunderstand the word 'reveal' and thinks that Jesus is speaking of a public manifestation. Perhaps the evangelist is reflecting the problem of why the risen Christ was seen only by the disciples (cf. Acts 10:40–2). Jesus answers indirectly by repeating what he has said on love in vv. 15 and 21, but now he adds that the Father will also be with them. Since 'the Word became flesh and lived among us' (1:14) the Father and the Son are both present with those who receive the revelation in faith and love. They worship God in spirit and truth (4:24). But those who do not love Jesus and his commandments also reject the Father who has sent him.

(14:25–31) These verses round off the first farewell discourse by adding new material. v. 25, 'I have said these things to you' occurs six other times: in 15:11; 16:1, 4, 6, 25, 33. Normally the formula concludes a passage, either directly as in 16:4, 33, or indirectly by introducing a summary of what has been said (here; in 15:11; 16:1, 25). In 16:1–4 and 25–33 the formula is repeated in order to frame a passage. v. 26, the 'Holy Spirit' is mentioned in 1:33 and 20:22, but only here is he identified with the Helper. As a teacher the Helper is entirely dependent on what Jesus has said (cf. 16:13). v. 27, in the OT friends who are parting wish each other peace (e.g. 1 Sam 20:42; 29:6–7). Jacob blesses his sons at the end of his farewell speech (Gen 49:28). The peace that Jesus gives to his disciples is a kind of blessing, anticipating the peace he will give after his resurrection (20:19, 21, 26), when the disciples will receive the Holy Spirit (20:22). In this way the evangelist stresses the spiritual presence of Jesus and his Spirit among his disciples. This prevents their hearts from being troubled, something the Pax Romana was not able to do. vv. 28–9, a new aspect in this summary is that the disciples ought to rejoice at Jesus' departure, because the Father is greater (cf. 10:29). This caused problems when the patristic writers discussed the relationship between Jesus and his Father. John often stresses that the Father and the Son have everything in common and love each other, but still the Father is the origin of the Son's sending and is also the goal of his mission. vv. 30–1, as in 12:31 the ruler of this world is mentioned, but Jesus underlines that he is powerless before the Son's loving obedience to his Father.

The final words indicate that the (first) discourse is concluded.

(15:1–16:4a) The Second Part of the Farewell Discourse The actual farewell situation that has dominated 13:31–14:31 is suddenly interrupted in ch. 15, where the timeless union between the Master and his disciples is in the foreground. Perhaps this is a later insertion, added when the community reflected on its union with Christ. There was in ch. 6 (which might also have been added later) a subtle allusion to the eucharist. The parable concerning the vine leads the thought in the same direction. In Mk 14:25 par. Jesus says: 'Truly I tell you, I will never again drink of the fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom.' John seems to have meditated on this text and the significance of the eucharist. The believer has to eat the bread from heaven in order to live for ever (6:58–9). In a similar way he has to abide in Jesus the true vine, if he wants to bear fruit. But still there is no precise indication here of the eucharist itself. The text in 15:1–16:4 has been subtly adapted to the context. The commandment to love in 15:11–17 has been touched upon in 13:34 and 14:15, 20–1. The answering of prayer in 15:7, 16 has its counterpart in 14:13–14, while the complete joy in 15:11 will be referred to again in 16:24. The world's hatred mentioned in 15:18–16:4 has been touched on in 14:17–27 and will be taken up again in Jesus' prayer in 17:14–16. What is said about the Helper in 15:26–7 naturally has connections with the other four mentions of him (14:16–17, 26; 16:7–11, 13–15). This shows that the text has been reworked to fit into the larger arrangement of chs. 13–17. Above I have suggested that it is in the centre of the whole composition, which would not be surprising if it echoes a profound reflection on the meaning of the eucharist. The text is well structured: the first part on love (15:1–17) starts with the short parable of the vine and its explication in vv. 1–10, which is further developed in vv. 11–17. The second part on hatred (15:18–16:4a) describes the world's hatred (vv. 18–25) and the Helper's testimony (vv. 26–7), and concludes in 16:1–4a. There are many similar texts in the Synoptics: on the vine (Mk 12:1–12 par.; Mt 20:1–16; 21:28–32; Lk 13:6–9) and a number of logia: the hatred of the world (Mk 13:13 par.); the servant and his master (Mt 10:24); the Spirit who witnesses (Mk 13:11 par.); the disciples who witness (Mk 13:9 par.); the disciples who are killed (Mk 13:12 par.).

(15:1–10) The Parable on the True Vine Explained by the Master In ch. 10 we saw how Jesus in the parable of the sheepfold identified himself with both the gate and the good shepherd. In the parable of the vine we meet the same technique, but this time the identification in vv. 1 and 5a frames the parable. Unlike the synoptic tradition the Johannine parable (Heb. māšāl) mixes up the explanation with the narration. vv. 1–5a, whereas Jesus in v. 1 presents himself as the true vine and his Father as the vinegrower, in v. 5a he underlines the link between himself, the vine, and his disciples who are the branches. Subtly Jesus moves from the cleansing of the branches by his Father (vv. 1–2) and by his own proclamation (v. 3) to their abiding in him (v. 4). There is in the Greek a wordplay between 'he removes' (airei), 'he prunes' (kathairei) and 'you have been cleansed' (katharoi este). In spite of the use of the designation of Israel as the true vine in Jer 2:21 (LXX), it is more probable that the evangelist wants in v. 1 to contrast Jesus as the true vine to Israel which has been deceitful (cf. Isa 5:1–7; Borig 1967). In v. 4 the reciprocal indwelling of Jesus and his disciples leads to the description of the negative consequence if they live apart from him. vv. 5b–10, in v. 5b Jesus reformulates what he said in v. 4. In v. 6 we get the negative picture of one who does not abide in Jesus: he is thrown away, withers, and is burnt, probably an allusion to the last judgement (cf. Mk 9:43–7 par.). In vv. 7–8 the abiding of the disciples in Jesus leads to two positive consequences: the efficacy of their prayer and the glorification of the Father. In vv. 9–10 the theocentric aspect of the parable is stressed: the disciples' love is rooted in the reciprocal love of the Son and his Father. Thus the parable of the vine visualizes different subjects and objects of love (from the Father to the Son, from the Son to the disciples, from the disciples to the Son and the Father) which have already been touched upon.

(15:11–17) These verses underline the commandment of love, in connection with the parable of the vine. The evangelist seems to have taken vv. 7–10 as his model, but in reverse direction: vv. 12 and 14 take up the link between love and obedience to Jesus' commandments, as in v. 10. In v. 15 the Father and Jesus' love for his disciples are mentioned, as in v. 9. In v. 16 we have the combination of prayer and bearing fruit as in vv. 7–8. v. 11 seems to be at the centre of the whole passage (i.e. vv. 1–17), with the mention of joy in connection with reciprocal love (cf. above 14:28). But at the same time the formula, 'I have said these things' separates vv. 12–17 from vv. 1–10. Twice Jesus speaks of his commandment to love one another (vv. 12, 17). In v. 12 Jesus' love is indicated as model and ground ('as I have loved you'). v. 13 describes Jesus' own sacrificial attitude (cf. 13:1), an example for his friends (v. 14). In vv. 15–16 the Master stresses his sovereign choice of disciples (cf. 6:70; 13:18), whom he calls his 'friends'. In the OT Abraham and Moses are God's friends (Isa 41:8; Ex 33:11). Philo calls wise men 'friends of God' and not his slaves (De Migr. Abr. 45; Leg. All. 3:1). Jesus' gift implies an obligation on the disciples to bear fruit. Just as in vv. 12–17, the reciprocal love between disciples in 1 John is seen as a consequence of God's love (e.g. 1 Jn 2:29; 3:7, 11, 18, 22–3; 5:2–4).

(15:18–16:4a) The Disciples are Warned against the World's Hatred; but are at the same time encouraged by the Helper's testimony and Jesus' words. 15:18–25, the 'world' has different meanings in John: it is created by God's Word (1:10) and is the object of his love (3:16–17; 17:18); it needs Jesus as its Saviour (4:42). But when it refuses God's revelation it is considered as hostile. The evangelist underlines the relationship between Jesus and the disciples in a future missionary situation. They must then remember that they are meeting the same hatred that Jesus and his Father have met (vv. 18–19). Though they have just been called 'friends' (v. 15) they are still servants who must share their master's lot (v. 20; cf. 13:16). There is perhaps a slight irony in v. 20b: they will keep your words as well (and as badly) as they kept my words. Already in the synoptic tradition the logion on the master and his servants is linked to a situation of persecution (Mk 13:13 par.), but John adds to it his specific theme about the world's ignorance (v. 21). In vv. 22–5 Jesus sums up the confrontation he had had on the festival of Booths (chs. 7–8). Behind these verses one can imagine the harsh discussions which the Christians had with the 'Jews' who excluded them from their synagogues (cf. 16:1–4). The disciples are to be encouraged by the fact that they will meet the same difficulties as their master. In v. 24 the accusative object of 'they have seen' is probably the 'works' (not 'me and my Father'). In v. 25 Jesus uses the word 'law' for the scriptures, and moreover keeps his distance by calling it 'your' law (cf. 8:17; 10:34). The 'fulfilment' quotation is probably taken from Ps 69:5 (= Ps 35:19), since this psalm is alluded to also in Jn 2:17 and 19:28. 15:26–7, unlike the two first logia on the Helper, this logion seems to interrupt the flow of thought. The remark on the exclusion from the synagogues in 16:1–4 would be a natural continuation of 15:22–5. Nevertheless one should remember that the Helper comes in order to remind the disciples of Jesus. Here his witness confirms the words and works mentioned in vv. 22–5. John's gospel gave rise to a dogmatic dispute concerning the introduction in the west of the filioque in the Nicene Creed. The eastern church insisted on the fact that in v. 26 the Spirit of truth 'comes from' (ekporuetai) the Father, whereas the western church underlined that both the Father (14:16, 26) and the Son (15:26; 16:7) 'send' (pempo) the Helper. In v. 27 the evangelist stresses the importance of the disciples' witness in connection with that of the Spirit. 16:1–4a, the future exclusion from the synagogue was alluded to in 9:22 and 12:42, but now it is Jesus himself who foretells it in order to help his disciples. We have met a similar positive motive concerning Jesus' predictions in 13:19 and 14:29. In the synoptic tradition Jesus prophesies that his disciples will be persecuted (see Mk 13:3–13 par; Mt 10:16–42). But there the disciples will be brought to trial and will be beaten in synagogues, whereas in John they will be excluded from the synagogue, which probably marks a later time (see also above on 9:18–23). The 'Jews' think that they are worshipping God by killing the disciples (v. 2), but ironically enough it is the disciples who will worship him. The reason for the persecutors' shortcomings is their lack of knowledge of God and of Jesus. In v. 4a 'their', which is found in many MSS and is accepted in TOB and NRSV, is probably original; it has been omitted in some MSS because of another 'their' in v. 4b. The expression 'their time' is similar to 'your hour' in Lk 22:53.

(16:4b–33) The Third Part of the Farewell Discourse In 16:4b–33 the reader is called back to the farewell perspective of 13:31–14:31, but he is also reminded of the hostile world which was condemned in 15:18–27. Before his departure Jesus tries to console his disciples by speaking of the joy that they will receive from the Helper. The difficult time they have to go through can be compared with a woman's labour, but when the child is born, the feeling of joy entirely dominates. This section repeats things that have been treated in ch. 14, but adds some new aspects. The Helper now has a clear forensic function that he did not have before. The short time mentioned in 14:19 is developed in 16:16 into two different periods. The author also recalls the world's hatred that was discussed in 15:18–25. Since the dominant aspect of this section is consolation, one can rightly call it a 'speech of consolation before Jesus' departure'. For the community after Easter it is also an important encouragement in their missionary work (see Painter 1980–1).

One can distinguish four parts: (1) In vv. 4b–11 the same question is dealt with as in 14:1–12, but as if it had not been spoken of before. Concerning sin, righteousness, and judgement the Helper will have a threefold indictment against the world. (2) In vv. 12–15 we meet the same encouragement about the Spirit of truth as in 14:25–6. (3) In vv. 16–24 the short time mentioned in 14:18–21 is developed with more details. It is concluded with a logion on prayer that reminds us of 14:13–14. (4) vv. 25–33 are framed by the words, ‘I have said these things [or this] to you’. We get a clear conclusion here both for vv. 4b–24 and for the two first parts of the farewell discourse. Logia on prayer and on peace, which have already occurred in ch. 14, are added and prepare the reader for the Son’s prayer in ch. 17.

(16:4b–11) Jesus’ Departure and the Helper’s Mission v. 4b, by retaining ‘from the beginning’ from 15:27 and by changing ‘you have been with me’ to ‘I was with you’, the author (or a redactor) links the second and third parts together. vv. 5–6, the new discourse seems to ignore that in 13:26–14:11 Peter, Thomas, and Philip have already put questions to Jesus. In v. 6 the word lypē, ‘sorrow’, is introduced for the first time in John and will be taken up in 16:20–2, where the theme of joy is also developed. The main purpose of the new speech is to console the disciples in their sorrow. vv. 7–11, the Helper comes to replace Jesus who goes to his Father. As in 14:27–8 the disciples are asked to rejoice in Jesus’ departure (v. 7). A special reason for this might be that the Spirit will first be given after Jesus’ resurrection (7:39; cf. 20:17, 22). vv. 8–11, the Helper is an advocate for the disciples whom he consoles, but an accuser and a judge in a trial against the world. In 15:26–7 the logion about the Helper interrupted the development on the world’s hatred. In 16:8–11 the Helper is more specifically the one who accuses the world. The Greek word elengchō in v. 8 has a general meaning of ‘to show’ or ‘to prove’. The Helper will accuse the world of unbelief (v. 9), a sin already highlighted on many occasions (e.g. 1:11; 3:19, 36; 8:24; 10:37–8; 15:22–5). The Master’s righteousness will be proved by his glorification (v. 10; cf. 5:30), and his victory is a judgement on the prince of this world (v. 11; cf. 12:31; 14:30; 16:33). We encounter here a cosmic trial against sin and evil. What takes place at the end of the world in the Synoptics is anticipated already by the action of the Helper in the Fourth Gospel.

(16:12–15) The Spirit as the Disciples’ Guide v. 12, The sentence, ‘I have many things to say you,’ separates the following logia on the ‘Spirit of truth’ from those on the ‘Helper’ in vv. 7–11. Since Jesus has not yet been glorified, his disciples cannot bear all he would like to say. vv. 13–15, in vv. 7–11 the ‘Helper’ was presented as the accuser of the world, now the ‘Spirit of truth’ is seen in his function of transmitting Jesus’ teaching to the disciples. As at 14:26 the Spirit is dependent on what Jesus has said, but now he also will glorify the Son (just as the Father glorifies him). A strong link is established between the Father, the Son, and the Spirit of truth. For the evangelist the ‘truth’ is that which Jesus has received from his Father (see 14:6). Therefore the ‘Spirit of truth’ acts in relation to Jesus just as the Father does. The Son has been charged to accomplish the Father’s work, but after Jesus’ departure the Spirit makes his work present among the disciples, because it is ‘the spirit that gives life’ (6:63; cf. 1 Jn 3:24; 4:13). But he does not add new revelations to those of Jesus.

(16:16–24) ‘The little while’ Before and After Jesus’ Death In 7:33; 12:35, and 13:33 Jesus has already spoken of the little while he was spending among humankind. According to 14:19 the world, unlike the disciples, would no longer see Jesus. This is developed in a new way here. v. 16, Jesus speaks of two different periods, one before and one after his death. vv. 17–18, with the help of rhetorical repetitions, the evangelist underlines the puzzle of Jesus’ saying. vv. 19–22, in a sovereign way Jesus knows what the disciples are discussing. His answer in v. 19 resumes what he already said in v. 16. After a solemn introduction (‘very truly’) he proclaims that there will be a first period of sorrow for the disciples and of rejoicing for the world, but afterwards a second period when their pain will be changed into permanent joy. In order to illustrate what will happen at his own hour, Jesus alludes to the hour of a woman’s labour, an image used in the Synoptics to picture the eschatological afflictions (Mk 13:17 par.; cf. also Isa 66:7–10).

(16:25–33) Conclusion on Love, Prayer and Peace v. 25, ‘I have said these things to you’ introduces the end of the third part of the discourse, just as it did in 14:25 for the first part. The Greek word paroimia, ‘proverb’ or ‘figure’, was used in 10:6 without further explanation. In 16:26, 29 it is contrasted to ‘plainly’ (parrhēsiai), which gives paroimia a meaning of ‘enigmatic speech’. The Hebrew māšāl, which lies behind the synoptic word ‘parable’, is probably also the background of the Johannine ‘figures of speech’. What Jesus has said in enigmatic language will later on be clearer thanks to the gift of the Spirit. vv. 26–7, in 14:13–14; 15:7, 16; 16:23–4 there were similar logia about how the Father or the Son hears the disciples’ prayer. Now it is added that the Father himself loves them, just as they love Jesus and believe in him. But even their faith and love are divine gifts. Instead of ‘from God’ some important MSS read ‘from the Father’, probably by assimilation to the following verse. v. 28, Jesus sums up what he has already said on different occasions about his coming from the Father and going back to him (see especially the Prologue and chs. 3; 7; 8). vv. 29–30, the disciples misunderstand Jesus’ plain speech; thinking that they understand his divine origin, they nevertheless will not accept his painful way back to his Father. Their self-confidence is as exaggerated as that of Peter in 13:36–7. vv. 31–2, Jesus perceives in advance that the disciples will ‘be scattered’, an allusion to Zech 13:7 (‘Strike the shepherd, that the sheep may be scattered’), which has already occurred in Jn 10:12. The evangelist seems to know Mk 14:27 par., but forgets that according to his own account the beloved disciple is not ‘scattered’ with the others (cf. Jn 19:26–7). v. 33, Jesus’ prophecy will later on be a consolation for the disciples who abandoned him. As in 14:27 Jesus assures them of his peace despite all the persecutions they will meet. The farewell discourse is concluded with the main motive of consolation for the disciples: their master’s victory over the world (cf. 16:11).

(17:1–26) Jesus’ Prayer to his Father In the sixteenth century this chapter was for the first time explicitly called precatio summi sacerdotis, ‘the prayer of the high priest’, by D. Chytraeus, but some Church Fathers had already used similar expressions. Yet in John Jesus is not really a high priest as he is in Hebrews, even if his death according to Jn 17:19 is a kind of sacrifice. One can compare Jesus' prayer to Jacob's benediction in Gen 49, to Moses' prayer in Deut 32–3, or to similar prayers in Jewish intertestamental literature (e.g. Jub. 1:19–20; 20–2). But in a certain sense Jesus' prayer is unique, since he has already left the world and is coming to his Father (see Jn 17:11); the prayer has a kind of timeless aspect. Bultmann's (1971) proposal to insert it between 13:1 and 13:30 and other hypotheses of displacement have not been successful.

In the farewell discourse we have on different occasions encountered Jesus' encouragement to his disciples to pray in his name (14:13–14; 15:16; 16:23–6). Jesus' last prayer is directly addressed to the Father and the formula 'in my name' is replaced by 'in your name' (vv. 11–12). It is also the name of the Father that Jesus has made known according to vv. 6, 26. The link between Jesus' name and the Father's name is reinforced, when Jesus in his prayer expresses the reciprocal relationship between himself and his Father.

The words, 'Father, glorify your name', which in 12:27–9 resemble the first demand in the Lord's prayer in Mt 6:9 and Lk 11:2, are further developed here (vv. 1, 6, 11–12, 26). The two last demands of the Lord's prayer are also alluded to in vv. 11 and 15: 'do not bring us into temptation' and 'rescue us from the evil' (or 'the evil one', Mt 6:13; cf. Lk 11:4). Even doing the will of God is hinted at in v. 4 (cf. Walker 1982). Just as in both 11:41–2 and 12:27–9, Jesus expresses in this chapter his profound unity with the Father and his dedication to his mission. In Jesus' prayer we meet the same sovereign attitude as in 13:1–30, with references to what has been said in the farewell discourse. Different literary forms are combined: demands (vv. 1b, 5, 11b, 17, 24), commentaries on prayer (vv. 9–11a, 15–16, 20–1), indications on the presuppositions of prayer (vv. 2, 13, 18–19), a confession of faith (v. 3), summaries on the work Jesus has accomplished on earth (vv. 4, 6–8, 12, 14, 22–3, 25–6a).

There have been many discussions on the structure of Jesus' last prayer (see Schnackenburg 1977–9: iii; Malatesta 1971; Segalla 1983). I am not convinced by the arguments of those who consider some verses as redactional. Segalla is probably right in stressing the missionary aspect in vv. 17–19, but I am sceptical about his rather artificial concentric construction. Therefore I propose the following structure:

1. Jesus asks the Father to be glorified (vv. 1–5).
2. Jesus prays for the disciples (vv. 6–19).
 - a. The disciples have been chosen (vv. 6–11a).
 - b. The disciples are protected (vv. 11b–16).
 - c. The disciples are sanctified (vv. 17–19).
3. Jesus prays for the unity of all the believers (vv. 20–3).
4. Jesus prays for the disciples' love (vv. 24–6).

(17:1–5) Jesus Asks the Father to be Glorified Two themes are interwoven: 'glorification' in vv. 1, 4–5 and 'eternal life' in vv. 2–3. v. 1a, the short introduction establishes a link between Jesus' farewell discourse and his last prayer. Probably the whole of ch. 17 was conceived when chs. 15–16 were added to the first part of the farewell discourse. To look up to heaven is a common posture of prayer both in the Jewish and the Graeco-Roman world (cf. also 11:41). v. 1b, the address 'Father' is the same as that in Jesus' prayers in the Synoptics. It will be repeated in vv. 5, 21, 24. In v. 11 the evangelist adds 'holy' and in v. 25 'righteous'. As in 12:23 and 13:1, the 'hour' has come, contrary to what was the case in 2:4; 7:30; 8:20. It is the hour of Jesus' crucifixion and glorification. In 17:1 the Son glorifies the Father as a consequence of being himself glorified, whereas in 13:31 it seems to be the reverse. But the difference is only apparent, as in both passages the accomplishment of Jesus' work is presupposed. It is difficult to decide whether sou ('your') after the second hyios ('Son') is original or not. v. 2, since v. 5 speaks of Jesus' glory before the world existed, the authority over all people (lit. all flesh) could be from the creation or from his incarnation (cf. 1:1–3, 14). But in the context of the 'hour', it is more normal to think of the crucifixion and the resurrection (11:51–2; 12:32; cf. also 5:20–7). The Greek panho, 'all that', corresponds to Hebrew kol āšer, and denotes 'humankind' that has been given to Jesus. The evangelist often underlines that it is the Father who is the origin of all gifts to Jesus (cf. 3:35; 5:22–7; 6:37; 12:49; 17:6, 8, 11–12, 22). v. 3, on 'eternal life', see Jn 3:15. Because this verse is a kind of confession of faith, many commentators consider it a later addition, but the style is typically Johannine and the verse fits well into the context. In 5:44 Jesus confessed his Jewish faith in 'the one who alone is God' (cf. Isa 37:20). Despite its very high Christology, the Fourth Gospel remains in the framework of monotheism (Hartman 1987). vv. 4–5, whereas vv. 2–3 describe the importance of Jesus' work for humanity, vv. 1, 4–5 deal with different aspects of Jesus' and his Father's glorification. v. 4 redefines Jesus' work on earth as a glorification of his Father; v. 5 resumes the perspective of divine pre-existence in the Prologue (cf. 1:1–3).

(17:6–11a) The disciples have been Chosen All those whom the Son has received from his Father (see vv. 2–3) are in vv. 6–19 described as disciples, and in vv. 20–3 as future believers. v. 6, probably there is an allusion to the Lord's prayer, 'hallowed be your name'. In v. 26 the same idea is expressed with 'I made your name known'. In the OT the Lord's name remains enigmatic (e.g. Ex 3:14), but Isa 52:6 promises that 'my people shall know my name'. According to 1:18 no one has ever seen God, but the Son has made the Father known. Likewise in 1:11–12 there is a sharp contrast between the world and those who belong to Jesus. vv. 7–9, before the explicit demand in vv. 11b–19, Jesus summarizes in vv. 6–11a his work among the disciples. They have been given to him by his Father (vv. 6, 9) and, quite differently from the audiences in 8:21–9 and 10:22–39, they have believed that he and his words came from God. This positive description, which contradicts 16:32, presupposes a post-resurrection perspective. It is also after Jesus' departure that the disciples will meet difficulties in their mission in the world in which they remain. vv. 10–11a, as in 16:15 and in ch. 10 Jesus stresses his strong links with the Father to whom he soon will return.

(17:11b–16) The Disciples are Protected Two verbs in the imperative punctuate Jesus' prayer for the disciples: 'protect' (v. 11b) and 'sanctify' (v. 17). They will be continued by the demand for all believers 'to be one' (v. 21). The three expressions are close to one another and encourage the readers to keep together communities that are threatened from the outside (cf. 1 Jn 2:24; 3:11–24). v. 11b, the adjective 'holy' is used only here for the Father (otherwise for the Spirit). It prepares the reader for what in vv. 17–19 will be said about the sanctification of Jesus and the disciples. In the Greek text the sing. hōi ('the name that you have given me') is probably original. The reading pl. hous ('the disciples that you have given me') is probably due to the influence of v. 6. As Jesus has revealed the Father's name, one can also say that this has been given to the Son. In other texts Jesus' (13:34–5; 15:12) or the Father's (15:9) love has been presented as the origin and model of human love. Now the unity between the Father and the Son is the fountain-head of the unity among the disciples, as it was in the parable of the vine in ch. 15 (cf. also 17:20–3). v. 12, here also it is the name that has been given, not the disciples. The future protection is similar to that which Jesus himself gave to his disciples. That nevertheless the unnamed disciple could betray his master is explained by a reference to 'the scripture'; this is reminiscent of Ps 41:10 which was quoted in 13:18. The Greek expression ho hyios tou apōleias, 'son of perdition', is Semitic (cf. 2 Thess 2:3) and suggests perhaps that Satan had an influence on him (cf. 6:70; 13:2, 27). It is even possible that the Johannine community considered Judas as a kind of prototype of the antichrist (cf. 1 Jn 2:18–22; 4:3). vv. 13–16, as in the farewell discourse, Jesus speaks both of the joy he has transmitted to his disciples and of the world's hatred. In the same way as in the last petition of the Lord's prayer, there is an ambiguity as to whether the Greek ek tou ponērou in v. 15 means from 'the evil' or 'the evil one', Satan. Since 'the ruler of this world' occurs several times (12:31; 14:30; 16:33), it is probable that it is he who is referred to. vv. 14 and 16 underline that the disciples share their master's fate in their relationship to the world.

(17:17–19) The Disciples are Sanctified The truth that comes from the Father through the Son will be their weapon in missionary work. vv. 17–18, in vv. 14–15 the word of God protected the disciples, but now 'the word of truth' sanctifies them. The meaning of 'sanctify' is determined by the fact that the Father has sent his Son (cf. 10:36). v. 19, the preposition hyper ('on behalf of', 'for') and the reflexive emauton ('myself') give the word 'sanctify' a meaning other than in v. 17. It now implies a 'sacrifice' for their sake (cf. also 10:11, 15; 15:13). We should remember that the death on the cross will coincide with the sacrifice of the paschal lambs (19:31, 36; cf. 1:29, 36). vv. 20–3, not only the disciples' protection (v. 11), but also the future believers' unity (cf. also 10:16) is important. One can guess that difficulties similar to those described in the Johannine letters are important obstacles to the missionary activity of the church. By showing Jesus at prayer for the future church, the evangelist invites today's reader to apply this prayer to a fragmented church struggling to unite; a kind of fusion takes place between the times of Jesus, the evangelist, and the reader. vv. 20–1 can more easily be applied to future believers than can vv. 22–3. Even in Moses' farewell speech in Deut 29:14–15 there is a distinction between those present and others: 'I am making this covenant, sworn by an oath, not only with you . . . but also with those who are not here with us today.' vv. 22–3, vv. 22b and 23 repeat with some modifications what was said in v. 21. The glorification and the perfect unity are destined for the disciples who will soon gather round the risen Lord. Their unity has its fountain-head in the Father and the Son; as their union is a prototype of later communities, these are also included in the prayer.

(17:24–6) Jesus Prays for the Disciples' Love v. 24, Jesus wants his disciples to share his eternal glory (cf. 14:2–3). A new point is that the Father loved the Son before the creation of the world (cf. also v. 5). The same mystery of Jesus' pre-existence is hinted at in the Prologue. In 1 Jn 4:8 'God is love'. The reading ho, 'that [which you have given me]' is more difficult and attested in several ancient traditions. It is therefore probably original and has been changed into the easier reading hous ('those [whom you have given me]'). But the meaning is nearly the same. vv. 25–6, Jesus returns to the concrete situation in which the disciples are still living. The Father is called righteous, because on the one hand the world already is judged (cf. 16:10–11), and because on the other hand the Father loves the disciples who believe in Jesus' words. The Master sums up what he has already said in vv. 6, 8, 11–12, 23. 'I will make it known' probably alludes to the Helper who comes in Jesus' place (cf. 14:26–7; 16:13–14). In v. 23 the Father's love for Jesus and the disciples was mentioned; in v. 26 the same thing is said in a more expressive way, concluding chs. 13–17. These chapters started with the expression of love in the footwashing, found their centre in ch. 15 around reciprocal love illustrated by the parable of the vine, and are concluded with a prayer for love before the sacrifice of the passion narrative takes place.

(18:1–19:42) Jesus' Passion, Death, and Burial In the four gospels the passion narratives follow a similar structure: arrest, trial before the Jewish and Roman authorities, condemnation, crucifixion, and burial. The four evangelists record the disciples' deceitful behaviour, and specially Judas's treason and Peter's three denials. The Jewish and the Roman officials threaten Jesus, the soldiers mock him as a Jewish king, whip and torment him. But with the help of quotations from the Scriptures, the evangelists underline how Jesus' humiliation fulfils a divine plan. They know that his death will lead to victory on the day of his resurrection. They are believers who transform the cruel story into an edifying narration for the reader. He or she is reminded of the difficulties the disciples meet after their decision to follow Jesus. Judas's treason and Peter's denial are warning examples. That the crowd wants Jesus crucified and the criminal Barabbas released is a tragic fact. But there are also positive roles which the reader can meditate upon: the women who are present during the crucifixion (in John also Jesus' mother and the beloved disciple); the disciples who bury Jesus with piety; in the Synoptics Simon of Cyrene who bears Jesus' cross, and the centurion who confesses that Jesus was innocent (Luke) or God's Son (Mark–Matthew). The passion narrative is therefore not an ordinary historical account of what happened, even if there are many aspects which can be related to contemporary Roman and Jewish legal proceedings and to the punishments they inflicted (see Brown 1994).

In the Fourth Gospel the crucifixion coincides with the hour of Jesus' glorification (cf. 3:14; 8:28; 12:32–3); by his death Jesus will be glorified with his Father (13:31–2; 17:1–5). Therefore the evangelist stresses the majesty of Jesus despite his humiliation. Already when he is arrested, the repeated 'I am he' causes the soldiers to step back and fall to the ground.

The interrogations before the high priest and before Pilate are occasions where Jesus continues his public teaching. On the cross Jesus makes arrangements for his mother and the beloved disciple (19:25–7). He fulfils the scriptures by saying 'I am thirsty' (19:28) and comments upon his own work on earth by saying 'It is finished' (19:30). The burial is that of a 'king'.

A comparison between the gospels shows that Matthew follows Mark but adds his own material in order to augment the dramatic effect of the narrative. Luke is less dependent on Mark than Matthew because he has his own information. He underlines more than Matthew and Mark that Pilate considered Jesus to be innocent. The author of the Fourth Gospel probably knows Mark's account (contra Brown 1994), but he has much material of his own which he applies in a very free way. He has already used certain aspects of Mark's passion narrative earlier in his gospel; others do not fit his own main theological purpose. He tries to show that Jesus was sentenced to death as the king of the Jews and not as a bandit. Like Luke he emphasizes Pilate's knowledge of Jesus' innocence. He underlines the responsibility of the Jewish authorities, but tries to diminish that of Pilate, even if he also criticizes him for his lack of integrity. He eliminates Jesus' desperate cry and stresses the Master's regal character in the face of death. In place of groups who mock Jesus he recounts the affectionate scene between Jesus' mother and the beloved disciple.

That John omits that the curtain of the temple was torn in two and the darkness at the moment of Jesus' death has been used as an argument against his dependence on synoptic texts. But such a mention was unnecessary since he had a theological equivalent in the temple cleansing in Jn 2:13–22 and in his descriptions of the battle between darkness and light. The symbols of water and blood flowing from Jesus' side were more suitable to his own purpose of describing Jesus' death as a glorification.

It is impossible to reconstruct with certainty the documents that Mark used. If John knew Mark, it is remarkable that he dared to correct him, just as Luke does in his own way. In many regards John's account is more satisfactory than Mark's with its meeting of the Sanhedrin at night. In John the meeting before Annas during the night is only a preparatory inquisition. The evangelist seems to be better informed than the Synoptics when he has Jesus die on 14 Nisan, when the paschal lambs were slaughtered to be eaten that evening (i.e. the beginning of 15 Nisan).

Some Jewish and Christian scholars have tried to transfer the whole responsibility of Jesus' death to the Romans. They are right when they criticize Luke's and John's apologetic motives in connection with Pilate's sentence, but still the Jewish authorities probably had their own share in the arrest of Jesus. It is historically doubtful whether there was ever an official gathering of the Sanhedrin before Pilate's judgement. In any event, Christians ought to combat all anti-Semitic feelings in connection with the trial against Jesus.

The Johannine passion narrative is well organized: (1) Jesus is arrested (18:1–11) and Annas interrogates Jesus while Peter denies him (18:12–27). (2) The trial before Pilate (18:28–19:16a) is divided into seven scenes by the alternation between what is happening outside or inside Pilate's headquarters. (3)

Jesus is crucified and dies (19:16b–30), which gives the author the chance to provide a theological commentary (19:31–7) and describe Jesus' burial (19:38–42).

(18:1–11) The arrest of Jesus is linked in different ways to the interrogation before Annas in 18:12–27. In both scenes Peter is active: in the first scene as an over-courageous defender of his master, in the second as a coward who denies him. In the first scene the question of Jesus' identity is raised, in the second that of his teaching; the two aspects are complementary. By introducing the passion narrative with the arrest and not with the spiritual fight at Gethsemane, John can show Jesus' majesty in the face of his adversaries. vv. 1–3, in a first edition of the gospel v. 1 probably followed immediately after 14:31. The references 'across the Kidron' and 'garden' can be fitted in with the synoptic topography: 'to the Mount of Olives' (Lk 22:39) and 'a place called Gethsemane' (Mk 14:32; Mt 26:36). The Johannine garden is then simply a plantation of olive trees. Whereas the synoptic Judas points Jesus out by a kiss, in John he only indicates the place, which, since the Johannine Jesus had been in Jerusalem several times, was known to Judas. A speira ('detachment') is composed of 600 soldiers. Their presence is strange, since Pilate in 18:29–30 does not seem to be informed about it. Perhaps the evangelist only wanted to show symbolically how Jewish police and Roman soldiers collaborated in their actions against Jesus. vv. 4–8a, the evangelist often underlines that Jesus knows everything in advance (cf. 1:47–8; 6:6, 61, 64; 13:1). In contrast to the Synoptics Jesus in John takes the initiative himself to go to Judas and to the others. Jesus is also called 'of Nazareth' in the inscription in 19:19. Since John with the help of egō eimi sometimes suggests Jesus' divinity (see Jn 8:24, 28; 13:19), there may be here more than a simple statement 'I am he'. This is at least suggested in v. 6 when all fall to the ground because of the revelation of Jesus' identity. Judas is stereotypically called in vv. 2 and 5 the one 'who betrayed Jesus'. The Jews take over his role when they hand Jesus over to Pilate (18:30, 35). Pilate in his turn will hand him to the Jewish authorities (19:16). vv. 8b–9, Jesus indirectly accepts becoming their prisoner when he asks that the disciples be allowed to go. This time it is not Scripture but Jesus' own words that are fulfilled. The quotation is not exact, but one can refer to 6:39; 10:27–8; 17:12. Still there is a change of perspective, since these three texts are concerned with eternal life, whereas the concern here is with the disciples' escape from actual dangers. vv. 10–11, unlike the Synoptics John indicates the disciple's identity (Simon Peter) and that of the slave (Malchus). In a subtle way the evangelist alludes to the Gethsemane scene by referring to the cup that the Father has given him to drink (cf. esp. Mt 26:42).

(18:12–27) Jesus' questioning before the high priest Annas is organically linked with Peter's three denials, in order to augment its dramatic aspect (Fortna 1977–8). Since a kind of trial by the Sanhedrin has already taken place in 11:47–50, the evangelist alludes only to a gathering before the present high priest Caiaphas (see vv. 24, 28) but fills it out by mentioning a more private questioning before Annas, the former high priest. vv. 12–14, the Roman soldiers and the Jewish police work together (cf. vv. 1–3). The evangelist is well informed about the relationship between the two high priests. Annas was high priest 6–15 CE and in normal fashion retained his title. He was influential even later, since his five sons became high priests (Josephus, Ant. 18.26, 34; 20.198). The evangelist probably knows that Caiaphas was not functioning as high priest only for that year (according to Josephus, Ant. 18.34–5, 95, he held office from about 18–37 CE). Caiaphas's prophecy in 11:50 and 18:14 seems in 18:8–9 to be applied to the disciples: they can escape because Jesus gives his life for them. vv. 15–18, even if the reading 'another disciple', without the definite article, is original, the evangelist is probably thinking of the beloved disciple whom he introduced in 13:23 and who will reappear in 19:26. If he is identical with John, the son of Zebedee, as chs. 1 and 21 suggest, one wonders how a simple fisherman came to be known to the high priest. But the evangelist has his own reasons to present the things in this way. Whereas this disciple follows Jesus into Annas's courtyard, Peter, whom he introduces there, becomes a renegade. The reference to the woman who interrogates Peter occurs also in Mk 14:66 par., but uniquely in John she guards the gate. Only John indicates that it was cold and that the fire was made of charcoal. vv. 19–21, the high priest Annas tries to show that Jesus is a false prophet (cf. 7:45–52). Ironically enough he asks Jesus about his disciples, at the very moment when Peter is denying him. Jesus answers only the question about his teaching, which has been quite open (cf. 7:4; 11:14). One would expect Annas also to interrogate those who had heard Jesus' teaching but he seems not to be interested in the truth. vv. 22–4, in Mk 14:65 members of the Sanhedrin spit on Jesus and the guards beat him. In Lk 22:63 only the guards insult Jesus. Jn 18:22 is a kind of combination of both: only one of the police strikes Jesus. In John alone Jesus insists that he has not offended the high priest (cf. Ex 22:27 and Acts 23:5). vv. 25–7, Peter is still in the courtyard just as he is in Lk 22:55–62, whereas in Mk 14:68 he goes out into the forecourt and in Mt 26:71 he proceeds to the porch. That one of the slaves was a relative of Malchus intensifies Peter's denial in the Fourth Gospel. The cock crows once, as in Matthew and Luke, whereas in Mk 14:72 he crows twice, in accordance with Jesus' prophecy at Mk 14:30. Contrary to the Synoptics John does not report anything about Peter's reaction after the third denial, but in Jn 21:15–17 Jesus will ask Peter three times if he loves him. The third time Peter feels hurt.

(18:28–19:16a) In a subtle way the trial before Pilate moves from a first accusation that Jesus is a criminal (18:30) to the charge that he made himself 'Son of God' (19:7), and finally that he claims to be a 'king', which is a revolt against the emperor (19:12). Three times Pilate declares Jesus innocent (18:38; 19:4, 6), but the Jewish accusers try by every means to have him condemned to death. The alternation of the seven scenes is highly dramatic: the accusers are outside Pilate's headquarters and Jesus is inside but comes out in the end as the mocked king of the Jews.

1. 18:28–32. Ironically enough, the Jews want to be able to eat the Passover without ritual defilement, but they are actively pursuing the death of Jesus, who is the real paschal lamb (cf. 1:29, 36; 19:31, 33). As they accuse Jesus of being a criminal, Pilate asks them to judge him according to their own laws. The Jews are therefore obliged to make a precise request for the death sentence, which only the Romans could grant. In his discussions with the Jews Jesus has already stated that when they seek to kill him, they are acting against their own law (7:51; 8:37–47). The evangelist stresses that Jesus knew he would be lifted up on the cross (3:14; 8:28; 12:32–3), the normal Roman punishment. Pilate, who was governor in Judea from 26 to 36 CE, had his headquarters (praetorium) probably at Herod's palace near the Joppa Gate, and not at Antonia, the Hasmonean palace (Benoit 1961: 332–3).

2. 18:33–8a. The question in v. 33 and Jesus' answer in v. 37 are similar to Mk 15:2 par., but the rest of the dialogue is typically Johannine. The Greek substantive basileia, normally translated 'kingdom' or 'kingly rule', seems in these verses to mean 'royal dignity'. The Jews have informed Pilate about Jesus' claims to be the Messiah with royal dignity. Jesus accepts the title King of the Jews (cf. 1:49) with a quite special meaning: his royal dignity comes from his Father who has sent him to testify to the truth (cf. 8:32–47). His royal dignity is similar to that of a shepherd to whom the sheep listen (10:16, 27). But Pilate does not belong to them and is therefore sceptical about truth.

3. 18:38b–40. Pilate seems to conclude that he has to do with typical Jewish questions and that Jesus therefore is innocent. In the Synoptics the bandit Barabbas is likewise released and Jesus condemned to death (Mk 15:11 par.). The custom of an amnesty at Passover is also mentioned in Mk 15:6 and Mt 27:15, but uniquely in John it is Pilate himself who refers to the custom. Contrary to the Synoptics, John postpones the Jews' shouting 'crucify him' in order to increase its dramatic effect (cf. Jn 19:6).

4. 19:1–3. The four gospels agree on two humiliations: one before Caiaphas or Annas (Jn 18:22–3), and one before Pilate (in Luke before Herod). The Roman soldiers dress him as a king with a crown of thorns. In Mt 27:28–9 they even put a reed in his right hand, mocking his royal power. In John they strike Jesus on the face, in Mk 15:19 and Mt 27:29–31 they strike his head with a reed, spit upon him, and kneel down in homage to him. In all three gospels the soldiers say ironically, 'Hail, King of the Jews!' Matthew and John seem both to depend on Mark whom they dramatize in different ways. John leaves out the spitting and the ironical kneeling which he probably considers offensive. Since Pilate continues to consider Jesus innocent, the flogging is only a kind of warning.

5. 19:4–7. As in Lk 23:14, 20–3 Jesus' innocence is underlined, but only in John does Pilate come out of his headquarters with the mocked royal Jesus. The words 'here is the man!' may be an allusion to 'Son of Man', which in Aramaic means precisely 'a man'. But John has given the expression a deeper meaning, with Dan 7:14 as a model (see esp. 5:27). In fact, during the trial in the Synoptics Jesus alludes to the coming of the Son of Man (Mk 14:61–2. par.). That the simple word 'man' can hint at 'Son of Man' becomes even clearer in the following scene, where Jesus is accused of having claimed to be the 'Son of God' (Jn 19:7). A first climax is reached with the authorities' double 'Crucify him!' It is now clear that the accusation against Jesus is religious, but in the further trial it will be given a political character (vv. 12–16a).

6. 19:8–11. 'Son of God' is a worrying expression to Pilate, who wants to know more about Jesus' origin. Jesus' silence is also a motif in Mk 15:3–5 par., where it concerns a refusal to respond to the authorities' accusations. In v. 9 Pilate's lack of sincere enquiry deserves only silence in reply. He therefore reformulates his question as one about power. Jesus discloses a paradox: Pilate who has his power from above thinks that he can exercise it over the one who comes from God! Jesus thus reveals that he fully accepts God's will. Once again Pilate's guilt is diminished in comparison with that of Judas and of the Jewish authorities.

7. 19:12–16a. The seventh scene is decisive for Jesus' crucifixion. vv. 12–13, 'friend of the emperor' (Gk. philokaisar) was in fact an honorific title given to Herod Agrippa I. Contrary to what Jesus said to Pilate about his royal dignity, the Jews now present him as a man with political ambitions that go against the emperor's interests. In the Greek text it is unclear whether Pilate or Jesus sat on the judge's bench. But since Pilate is afraid of Jesus' power (v. 8), it is unlikely that he would mock him. In any case, Pilate's judgement is not a formal one. The Aramaic Gabbatha in v. 13 ('bald head?' 'eminence?') does not really correspond to the Greek Lithostrōton (Stone Pavement). It was usual to have stone pavements inside palaces and outside in the courtyards. vv. 14–16a, normally the word paraskeuē means the preparation day for the sabbath (cf. vv. 31 and 42). But in v. 14 it seems to be the preparation day for the Passover, that means 14 Nisan (cf. 18:28). It coincides in John with the preparation day for the sabbath. When Pilate in v. 5 said 'Here is the man', the Jewish authorities replied with a double 'Crucify him!' When in v. 14 he presents the mocked royal Jesus with the words, 'Here is your King!', they cry out twice, 'Away with him!' and add, 'Crucify him!' The Johannine irony comes to a climax when the Jewish authorities seem to forget all their own messianic expectations in favour of their loyalty towards the Roman emperor.

(19:16b–42) Jesus' Crucifixion, Death, and Burial

(19:16b–30) We can distinguish five moments in this part: in vv. 16b–18 Jesus carries his cross; in vv. 19–22 Pilate has an inscription written; in vv. 23–5a the soldiers divide Jesus' clothes; in vv. 25b–27 the women and the beloved disciple are standing near the cross; in vv. 28–30 Jesus finally dies. The different scenes are separated by repeated words in the beginning and at the end of each scene: 'Jesus' in vv. 16b–18; 'write' in vv. 19–22; 'soldiers' and 'clothes' in vv. 23–5a; 'mother' in vv. 25b–7; 'finished' in vv. 28–30. vv. 16b–18, the Jewish authorities to whom Pilate hands Jesus over in v. 16a have not themselves the right to crucify him but let the Roman soldiers do it (cf. v. 23). John underlines that Jesus carries the cross by himself, without the help of Simon of Cyrene (Mk 15:21 par.). Some exegetes think that the evangelist alludes to Isaac who carries the wood of the burnt offering (Gen 22:6). In the normal way, Jesus would have carried only the cross-beam (patibulum), on which he will be nailed at Golgotha and elevated on the pole which already stands there. The Greek kranion, 'skull', is a correct translation of the Aramaic Golgotha and probably denotes a hillock. Only John emphasizes the fact that Jesus is in the middle between the two others. vv. 19–22, the Fourth Gospel alone stresses that the inscription (cf. Mk 15:26 par.) had a universal character by being written in three languages, and that Pilate himself had ordered it. John adds here 'of Nazareth' (cf. 18:5) in order to stress the origin of the 'King of the Jews', but in v. 21 he has the shorter formula of Mk 15:26. The evangelist considers Pilate's initiative as prophetic. Since the charge in Mt 27:37 and Lk 23:38 is placed over Jesus' head, the tradition has not represented the cross as crux commissa, in the form of a T, but as crux immissa. vv. 23–5a, the Greek himation normally designates a robe in the singular (cf. vv. 2, 5), and all kinds of clothes in the plural. But since the chiton in v. 23 is a tunic under the robe, himatia seems to be a robe just as in 13:4. In Mk 15:24 par. there is only an allusion to Ps 22(21):18, whereas John quotes the Psalm according to the LXX. He distinguishes between the 'clothes' (the robe) and the 'clothing' (the tunic), whereas the psalmist only used parallel expressions to designate the same object. In order to underline God's protection the tunic is not divided, which probably has a symbolic meaning of unity similar to that in 21:11. vv. 25b–27, in Mk 15:40–1 par. the women are at a distance, which is more probable during a crucifixion. But in John they stand near the cross to hear Jesus' words. The name of Jesus' mother is not indicated, as in Jn 2:1–12 and 6:42, probably in order not to confuse her with the three other Marys: Lazarus' sister (ch. 11) and the two Marys named here. In the Greek text 'Mary the wife of Clopas' could be in apposition to 'his mother's sister', but as the women are contrasted to the four soldiers, it is more likely that they also are four. In Mk 15:40 par. the mother of Jesus is not named at all. Mary Magdalene appears in all four gospels. Commentators who want to harmonize John with the Synoptics identify 'the wife of Clopas' with the synoptic 'Mary, the mother of James and of Joses'; 'his mother's sister' in John is then identical with Salome (Mk 15:40) and the mother of the sons of Zebedee (Mt 27:56). In that case Jesus' aunt Salome would be the mother of James and John. The scene where Jesus entrusts the beloved disciple to his mother would have a basis in a family relationship if this disciple were John, the son of Zebedee. But these are guesses, which do not fit Lk 8:3 and 24:10 (cf. also our remark above on 7:3). There is no textual reason to see in Jesus' mother and in the beloved disciple representatives of two different communities, the Jewish-Christian and the Gentile-Christian (as Bultmann 1971: 673). Mary is not yet the 'mother of the Church' of later Catholic tradition. According to chs. 14–16 the Helper would lead the disciples into the whole truth. In a similar way the mother of Jesus and the beloved disciple transmit Jesus' message: they are together ideal representatives of the Christian faith (cf. also 19:35 and 21:24). vv. 28–30, once again the evangelist stresses Jesus' sovereign will in fulfilling the Scripture, alluding probably to Ps 69:22 ('for my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink', cf. Mk 15:36 par.). Only John underlines that Jesus is thirsty, which is said only indirectly in the Psalm. In Mk 15:36 the sponge is put on a stick, but in John it is on a branch of hyssop, an allusion to the paschal meal (cf. Ex 12:22). Even the words 'it is finished' have in Greek a meaning of fulfilment: probably the work of his Father (cf. 14:31; 17:4). Jesus willingly (cf. 10:18) gives up the spirit which remained upon him in 1:32. He accomplishes for the first time his promise in 7:37–9, giving the Spirit to the faithful around his cross. In 20:22 the risen Christ will be more explicit about the gift of his Spirit.

(19:31–7) There have been many discussions on the composition of this theological commentary. Some believe that vv. 34b–35 on blood and water are later additions to the soldiers' action in vv. 31–4a and to the fulfilment of the scripture in vv. 36–7. Others think that even vv. 34a and 37 are additions. All these reconstructions are merely hypothetical. The evangelist himself distinguishes between two actions: the breaking of the legs in vv. 31–3 and the piercing of the side in v. 34. In vv. 35–7 he comments on both actions. vv. 31–3, the sabbath coincides with 15 Nisan (cf. v. 14). According to Deut 21:23 a corpse hung on a tree must be buried before nightfall. For purity reasons this is especially important before Passover. Only John has the breaking of legs (crurifragium), which was used either as punishment, or as here in order to hasten suffocation. v. 34, Jesus' pierced side is also mentioned at the resurrection in 20:20–7. The soldier determines if Jesus is dead. Immediately after death, blood and a watery substance from the lungs, can emerge. The evangelist stresses the paradox that two important components of life appear in Jesus' dead body. If the evangelist is informed about 'mixed blood' that was thrown at the altar on Passover (cf. Mishnah, Ohol. 3:5; hul. 2:6; Pesah. 5:8), we would have here a further allusion to Passover. But probably it is better to compare 1 Jn 5:6–8, where Jesus Christ is said to have come by water and blood, which means by his baptism and his death. According to Jn 6:53–6 blood is connected with the eucharist, and according to 3:1–15 water with baptism. The evangelist may be alluding these two sacraments. The Spirit who is mentioned in 1 Jn 5:6–8 is also present at Jesus' death in Jn 19:30. The Church Fathers thought that even the church was born out of Jesus' side, but in contrast to Paul the evangelist does not develop the theme of Jesus as a new Adam. v. 35, similarly to 21:24 we have one who testifies, the beloved disciple (cf. 18:15–16 and 19:25–6), and another who states that his testimony is true, probably the Johannine community. It is unclear whether 'he knows that he tells the truth' is said of the Johannine group, the beloved disciple (preferable), Jesus or God (less probable). vv. 36–7, the quotation in v. 36 alludes to Ex 12:46 and is at the same time dependent on Ps 34(35) LXX. Jesus dies as the passover lamb whose legs are not broken (cf. Jn 1:29, 34), but also as the righteous man of Ps 34 (cf. Lk 23:47). It is more difficult to see how the soldier who pierced Jesus' side fulfils the scripture. In v. 37 there is a quotation of Zech 12:10b (Heb. text), similar to that of Rev 1:6. Possibly the first Christians utilized Zech 12:10b to point out Jesus whose hands had been pierced with nails. John applies the quotation to the pierced side.

(19:38–42) The narrative concerning Jesus' burial was important for the first Christians, because of the connection between the empty tomb and the resurrection (perhaps implicit in 1 Cor 15:4). In the four gospels we have a similar main narration: Joseph of Arimathea asks Pilate for permission to bury Jesus. John, however, adds the figure of Nicodemus and other details. vv. 38–9, according to Mk 15:43 and Lk 23:50–1 Joseph is a respected member of the council who is waiting expectantly for the kingdom of God. In Mt 27:57 he is a rich man who had become a disciple of Jesus. John's Joseph is similar to Matthew's, but his Nicodemus resembles Joseph in Mark and Luke. The evangelist does not clearly say that Nicodemus had become a disciple of Jesus, but his sympathy for Jesus has developed since 3:1–21 and 7:50–2. Fragrant spices weighing 100 lb. are just as impressive as 1 lb. of costly perfume used by Mary to anoint Jesus in 12:3–8. vv. 40–2, Nicodemus fulfils what Mary had done in advance: Jesus gets a kingly burial. One can compare the quantity of spices used at the death of Herod (Jos. Ant. 17.199; cf. also Jer 34:5). The linen cloths (Gk. othonia) are also mentioned in Jn 20:6–7, whereas in 11:44 they are called keiriai, 'strips of cloth', different from the cloth round the face. In Mk 15:46 par. it is a single linen cloth (Gk. syndōn). Some have tried to combine John and the Synoptics: the synoptic syndōn could be the material out of which the Johannine cloths are made, or the Johannine cloths in fact only one single piece. Others think that a syndōn was fixed with the help of strips of cloth. Historically it is more probable that the spices were carried to the tomb at the burial than on the day of the resurrection (Mk 16:1–2 par.). John alone indicates that the tomb was near the place of crucifixion. The next reference to the garden will be at 20:1.

(20:1–21:25) The Risen Christ In the canonical gospels Jesus' resurrection is both the object of faith and a concrete event. Unlike the apocryphal Gospel of Peter (39–44) the gospels do not describe exactly how Jesus rose from the dead, but they insist on two aspects: the empty tomb and the appearances to the disciples. John reflects more than the Synoptics on how all certainty about Jesus' resurrection is linked to faith (cf. 20:27, 29). The two conclusions in 20:30–1 and 21:24–5, for example, summarize the relation between the witness of faith to the signs performed by Jesus and belief in him as Messiah and God's Son.

In recent commentaries it has been usual to consider ch. 21 as a later addition by a redactor, because 20:30–1 seems to be a natural conclusion of the whole gospel. Since the 'we' in 21:24–5 is distinguished from the beloved disciple, it has been suggested that a later redactor is responsible for ch. 21, and even for other additions in the gospel. But there are objections to this position: the narrative technique in ch. 21 is very similar to that in chs. 1–20, and the style is nearly the same. Just as themes in chs. 13–14 are completed or replaced in chs. 15–17, so ch. 21 develops aspects that have been adumbrated (e.g. the theme of following Jesus) or introduces new material. The main author ('the evangelist') may have reworked his first sketch of the gospel and added new material to it (e.g. chs. 6; 15–17; 21). He has kept 20:30–1 as commentary on the revelations in Jerusalem, but he wanted to complete these with an appearance by the lake of Tiberias. This gave him the opportunity to inform the reader about the disciples' activity in Galilee that we find in the Synoptics. A redactor may then have reworked this chapter, especially the new conclusion in vv. 24–5.

The whole gospel is given a kind of unity by the alternation of different places where Jesus is present: Galilee, Judea, and 'the other side'. Three times we pass from Galilee to Jerusalem, and in the end once from Jerusalem (12:12–20:31) to Galilee (ch. 21). The week of Jesus' resurrection in chs. 20–1 corresponds to the first week in 1:19–2:11 and to the last week in Jesus' life in 12:1–19:42. In ch. 20 Jesus appears to his disciples in Jerusalem as in Lk 24; in ch. 21 he appears in Galilee as it is hinted at in Mk 16:7 and Mt 28:7, 10, and described in Mt 28:16–20.

The following seven sections can be distinguished: (1) Mary and two disciples at the tomb (20:1–10); (2) Mary sees the Lord (20:11–18); (3) the disciples see the Lord (20:19–23); (4) Thomas sees the Lord (20:24–9); (5) first conclusion of the book (20:30–1); (6) Jesus shows himself to the disciples by the Sea of Tiberias: (a) the miraculous catch of fish and the meal; (b) Peter and the beloved disciple (21:15–23); (7) second conclusion of the book (21:24–5). The relationship between chs. 20–1 and the synoptic texts is very complicated (see Neirynck 1984b; 1990).

(20:1–10) Mary and Two Disciples at the Tomb The evangelist wants to frame the running of the two disciples to the tomb with two narratives on Mary Magdalene. She reports first on the empty tomb, then (in vv. 11–18) on Jesus' resurrection. Inconsistencies in ch. 20 are due to the author's many references to synoptic material that he supplements with his own information (cf. Neirynck 1984b). vv. 1–2, Mary Magdalene was first introduced near the cross in 19:25. In Mk 16:1 there are three women at the tomb, in Mt 28:1 two, and in Lk 23:55–24:10 more than three. In Mark and Luke they come with spices to anoint Jesus, but in the Fourth Gospel this has already been done. Possibly the evangelist has special information concerning Jesus' first appearance to Mary alone (cf. Mk 16:9). The stone was not mentioned at the burial, in contrast to Mk 15:46 and Mt 27:60, 66. In Mk 16:4 par. it was rolled away (in Mt 28:2 by an angel). John probably refers to the angel's message in Mk 16:7 when he has Mary inform Peter and the other disciple. The Johannine Mary thinks that grave-robbers or the authorities have stolen the body, whereas Mt 28:11–15 mentions the allegation by the Jews that the disciples stole the body. The 'we do not know' is an inconsistency deriving from the synoptic account about several women at the tomb. vv. 3–8, we find a similar tradition in Luke: in Lk 24:12 (which is original despite the lack of attestation in the Western tradition) Peter goes to the tomb, while in Lk 24:24 it is 'some disciples'. The 'other disciple' in John is presumably the beloved disciple (see Jn 13:23; 18:15). He has more insight than Peter (cf. 13:23–5; 19:26–7), whom he outruns, but still he respects Peter's privilege to go in first. The linen wrappings which are left and the cloth rolled up by itself indicate that the body was not stolen but rather rose miraculously. Whereas Peter only looks at them, the other disciple can decipher the signs by faith. vv. 9–10, as in 1 Cor 15:4 the resurrection fulfils the Scripture, but no precise passage is referred to. There is an apparent inconsistency when even the other disciple, who believes, does not understand Scripture (cf. 2:22; 12:16). Perhaps the evangelist wanted to point out that even he had to increase in understanding. The two disciples go home and allow Mary to meet Jesus alone (vv. 11–18).

(20:11–18) Mary Sees the Lord This narrative is close to the synoptic account, where several women see God's angels, and even Jesus himself, on their way to the disciples in Mt 28:9–10. John seems to have fused together two different scenes from Mt 28:1–10: Mary sees first two angels (Jn 20:12–13), then the Lord himself (vv. 14–16). vv. 11–13, it is possible that exō, 'outside', has been added to improve the text. Mary remains outside the tomb, unlike the disciples in vv. 7–8 and the women in Mk 16:5 and Lk 24:3. She bends over to look in as the beloved disciple does in Jn 20:5, but instead of the linen wrappings she sees two angels. They are witnesses of Mary's desolation, but unlike the synoptic accounts they have no message for the disciples; Jesus himself will provide it in v. 17. Only John indicates that the angels are sitting where Jesus' head and feet had been located. This supposes a tomb of the arcosolium type, where there is more room for the corpse than in the kōkīm type, where the body is put into a wall cavity. vv. 14–16, Mary thinks that Jesus is the gardener who has taken away the body. Jesus addresses her in the same words as did the angels in v. 13, but adds 'For whom are you looking?' When he calls her by her name, she recognizes him as her teacher, in a way similar to sheep recognizing the voice of their shepherd (10:3–4). The Aramaic rabbouni (cf. Mk 10:51) is by its length more solemn than the simple rabbi (see Jn 1:38). v. 17, the present imperative mē mou haptou can be translated either 'do not continue to touch me' or 'do not touch me'. The evangelist seems to be commenting on Mt 28:9 where the women take hold of Jesus' feet in a gesture of worship. The reason why Mary ought not to hold on Jesus is that he is on his way to the Father. In the Fourth Gospel the resurrection and the ascension seem to coincide. Therefore Mary needs to hear that after Jesus' appearances, faith, in the absence of physical contact, is the only important thing (see the scene with Thomas in vv. 24–9 and cf. 14:22–3). Jesus calls the disciples 'brothers' in a different sense from that of his sceptical natural family at 7:4 (cf. Mt 28:10). The risen Christ associates the disciples in his community with God the Father, but also marks a difference by referring to him with the pronouns 'my' and 'your'. v. 18, in Mk 16:7 and Mt 28:7 the angel(s) give the women the mission to inform the disciples concerning Jesus' later appearance in Galilee. In Lk 24:33 the two disciples from Emmaus return to Jerusalem to meet the eleven. But in John, Mary reports both on her meeting with Jesus and on his message.

(20:19–23) The Disciples See the Lord In the Christian tradition it remains unclear how often the risen Christ manifested himself to his disciples. Paul names five appearances: to the twelve, to more than five hundred brothers and sisters, to James, to the apostles, and last of all to himself (1 Cor 15:5–7). According to Mk 16:7 Peter and the other disciples would meet Jesus in Galilee; in Mt 28:16–20 this is described as a farewell scene where the eleven disciples are sent out to the whole world (cf. also Mk 16:14–18). In Lk 24:36–49 Jesus appears to them in Jerusalem, wishes them peace, shows them his hands and feet, and eats the fish they give him. He gives them a mission to all people and promises them the gift of the Holy Spirit. Jn 20:19–23 and 21:13 resemble the Lucan narrative in many respects. v. 19, just as in Lk 24:29, 36–53, Jesus appears in Jerusalem in the evening of the day he rose again. John alone mentions that the door was locked, perhaps in order to underline that the risen Christ is no longer bound by normal space conditions. The peace greeting prolongs what Jesus had said in his farewell discourse (Jn 14:27; 16:33). v. 20, the hands and the side are also mentioned in vv. 25 and 27, whereas in Lk 24:39 Jesus shows his hands and feet. vv. 21–2, the missionary work of the disciples depends on the mission of the Son and on the gift of the Holy Spirit. In his farewell discourse Jesus had promised that he would send the Helper. A first gift of the Spirit was already described in 19:30, but now the disciples are so to speak 'baptized' by the risen Christ's Spirit. v. 23, as Lk 24:47–49, the forgiveness of sins is linked to the gift of the Spirit and the disciples' missionary work. But John transforms the Lukan understanding of forgiveness with the help of material similar to Mt 16:19 and 18:18. Matthew stresses Peter's and the other disciples' power to 'bind' and 'loose' certain rules in the assembly, whereas John speaks of retaining (binding) sins or forgiving them. Despite the present and the future tenses in many MSS, the variant apheōntai (perfect passive, 'they are forgiven') is probably original. The Christian tradition early linked together Matthew and John in its understanding of penance.

(20:24–9) Thomas Sees the Lord Thomas' encounter with Jesus is modelled on the previous scene. His experience is meant to help all future believers who have not seen the risen Christ. vv. 24–5, the same expression, 'one of the twelve', is applied to Judas in 6:71. The Greek didymos means both 'twin' and 'double' or 'twofold'. In 11:16 and 14:5 Thomas had difficulties understanding Jesus, now he hesitates when confronted by his resurrection. The disciples relate their vision of the Lord, as Mary did in v. 18. In the original Greek text the 'mark' of the nails is first typos, and then probably topos ('place'). The MSS have muddled the two words. The palpable marks have an apologetic function for the reader. vv. 26–7, the week following the resurrection corresponds probably to the first week in 1:19–2:1 and to the last week in Jesus' life in 12:1–19:31. Just as in the previous appearance to the disciples, Jesus enters despite the shut doors. Jesus accepts Thomas' daring demand, but tactfully the evangelist does not describe its fulfilment. v. 28, Thomas' doubts give way to a climax in Johannine Christology. In 13:13–14 Jesus used 'teacher' and 'lord' as synonyms, but now 'my Lord' designates the risen Christ. 'My God' resumes the description of Jesus in the Prologue as 'God' (1:1, 18). In the OT Lord and God are associated terms (e.g. Ps 7:2–3; 30:3). This is more likely to be the background than the pagan acclamation of the emperor as Lord and God (but see Suetonius, Dom. 13: 'dominus et deus noster'). v. 29, besides 13:17, this is the only formula using 'blessed' in John. It concerns the future believers (cf. 17:20–4) who have not seen Jesus. Thomas should have believed without seeing the marks. Still his clear confession is an act of faith, as was that of the hesitant Nathanael at the beginning of the gospel (1:43–51).

(20:30–1) The author suddenly expresses himself in a first epilogue to what he calls this book. v. 30, the word 'sign' is a key for the reader to understand both the risen Christ's appearances and their link with the 'signs' during his public life. Those who presuppose a sign-source behind this gospel consider vv. 30–1 as its natural conclusion. But we have seen that the Fourth Gospel forms a unity despite its redactional problems. In this case the 'signs' are not only the seven miracles we have enumerated, but also other scenes and words of Jesus. These signs are no riddles, since the reader is from the beginning informed about the Word, Jesus Christ. But the reader has to penetrate the mystery of Jesus' revelation of his divine glory. v. 31, it is difficult to decide whether the original subjunctive was an aorist pisteusēte or a present pisteuēte. In the first case one could translate as NRSV, 'that you may come to faith', in the second case, 'that you may continue to believe'. In 19:35 the variant that has the aorist tense seems to be preferable, but in our verse both variants are well attested. It is not certain that the evangelist himself would in this case make a clear distinction between the two tenses. In any event, he seems to address Christian readers, whom he wants to gain life in Christ by deepening their faith in Jesus as Messiah and Son of God.

(21:1–23) In this chapter Jesus reveals himself a third time to the disciples, but now by the Sea of Tiberias. The evangelist wants to complete the appearances in Jerusalem with the data of Mk 16:7 and Mt 28:7, 10, 16–20. He also completes Jn 1:35–42 with the help of what we know about the occupation of the disciples from Mk 1:16–20 par. The evangelist has read either a source similar to Lk 5:1–11 or that text itself. There a miraculous draught of fish is combined with the disciples' call. Our passage has a similar relationship to Lk 24:41–3 where the risen Christ eats a piece of the fish.

The author has used different kinds of material but has put them together into a well-organized unity. In a first scene we meet seven disciples who on the word of the Lord catch many fish. In the second scene the risen Christ gives Peter a special mission and speaks about the beloved disciple's destiny. The first scene describes different actions, whereas the second consists of a dialogue between Jesus and Peter. The two scenes are linked together through the different relationships between the risen Lord and the two main disciples.

(21:1–14) The miraculous catch of fish and the following meal are closely interrelated. v. 1 the typical Johannine 'after these things' does not indicate a chronological but a thematic progression (cf. 6:1). The same formula 'to show oneself' as in 7:4 is now used in reference to the risen Christ (in 21:14 in the passive form). Strangely enough the word 'disciples' occurs seven times in vv. 1–14, matching the seven disciples named in v. 2. In 6:1 the Sea of Tiberias is mentioned as a synonym for the Sea of Galilee. v. 2, the use of 'together' (Gk. homou) is different from that at 4:36 and 20:4, but similar to Luke's in Acts. Three of the seven disciples occur in Lk 5:1–11: Peter, James, and John. Peter and Thomas have been important in the appearances in Jn 20. Nathanael who is mentioned in 1:45–51 is now presented as coming from Cana in Galilee, perhaps under the influence of the wedding in ch. 2. In the synoptic tradition James and John are often presented as sons of Zebedee (Mk 1:19–20 par.; 3:17 par.; 10:35 par.). With Simon and Andrew, who were named in Jn 1:35–42, they form a special group. We have seen that the anonymous disciple in 1:40–2 is best identified with John, one of the sons of Zebedee. He will be called the other disciple, or the one whom Jesus loved, in the rest of ch. 21. The two other disciples in 21:2 could then be Andrew and Philip (see 1:40–4; 6:7–8; 12:22). vv. 3–4, as in Lk 5:5 they have fished during the night. Why they do this after the appearances in Jerusalem has no importance for the author. Despite Greek epi, 'on' (the beach) in many MSS, eis is probably original, but has here the same meaning as en or epi.

In contrast to v. 12 the disciples at first do not recognize Jesus, though he has already revealed himself to them in Jerusalem. But in this case ch. 21 is not concerned to be consistent with ch. 20. vv. 5–6, Jesus addresses the disciples with tenderness, by using a diminutive form paidia (cf. 1 Jn 2:14, 18), similar to teknia in Jn 13:33 (and 1 Jn). The right side signifies blessing, prosperity. In Lk 5:4 Jesus says: 'Put out into the deep water'. Since the miraculous catch has missionary aspects both in Lk 5:10 and in Jn 21:15–17 'to haul in the fish' may allude to this symbolic meaning. In Lk 5:6–7 the partners in the other boat have to come and help. vv. 7–8, as in ch. 20 the beloved disciple understands more quickly than Peter. Respect for the Lord makes Peter do contradictory things: he puts on some clothes before he jumps into the water, probably in order to reach Jesus first (cf. Mt 14:28). The other disciples are only secondary characters, who go with Peter (v. 3) and drag the net (v. 8). vv. 9–10, in a subtle way the story of the catch moves into one of a meal, resembling Lk 24:41–3. But John does not explicitly say that the risen Lord himself ate: he only prepares the fish and the bread (v. 9) and gives them to the disciples (v. 13). v. 11, in the Greek text (anebē, 'went up') it is not clear whether Peter went back to the boat (NRSV; TOB; JB) or went up on the shore (Bultmann 1971). The 153 fish have been interpreted as the totality of the kinds of fish known at that time (Jerome, In Ezekiel 14. 47.9–12). A better explanation is to see 153 as the sum of all the numbers up to 17. Moreover there were 12 baskets filled with the fragments of the 5 loaves in 6:13, and that makes a total of 17 (cf. Lindars 1972). Other exegetes have proposed calculations based on gematria, the value of Greek or Hebrew letters, but this leads to arbitrary hypotheses. In any case, the evangelist symbolically suggests a totality of people recruited through missionary work. vv. 12–13, the author describes in concrete terms how the risen Lord gives the true bread from heaven that was mentioned in ch. 6 (see Hartman 1984). That the disciples do not dare ask Jesus contrasts with Thomas's behaviour in 20:24–9. v. 14, the evangelist frames vv. 2–13 by resuming v. 1 and adding that this revelation was the third one to the disciples (taking into account 20:19–23, 24–9). It is impossible to make this agree with Mk 16:7 and Mt 28:16–20, where the appearance in Galilee is the first one to the disciples (cf. Mk 16:14).

(21:15–23) The comparison between Peter and the beloved disciple which was hinted at in the first scene becomes explicit in the second one. vv. 15–17, the Greek sentence in v. 15 can be understood in three different ways: 'Do you love me more than you love these things?' (toutōn is then understood as a neuter pronoun); 'do you love me more than you love those (persons)?'; 'do you love me more than those do?' (this is best in the context). The three questions and the three answers are formulated differently and lead to a climax where Peter feels personally hurt. In a certain sense he makes up for his three-fold denial in 18:15–27. Jesus addresses Peter three times as 'son of John', just as he did in his first call (1:42). At that time Peter loved his master whom he was willing to follow (cf. also 13:36–8). There Jesus called him Cephas or Peter, 'rock' (from Aram. kēfā and Gk. Petra). After the three denials Peter must three times confess his love if he is to be the shepherd of Jesus' flock. vv. 18–19, now Peter is ready to follow Jesus: as the pastor of Jesus' sheep he will give his life, just as the Master himself laid down his life for them (cf. 10:15, 17–18). In v. 19 the author explains what Jesus prophetically formulates in v. 18: Peter will die on a cross (on Peter's death as martyr under Nero, see 1 Clem. 5:4). vv. 20–3, in a natural way Peter asks about the destiny of the beloved disciple, who was first explicitly mentioned as such in 13:23. The answer is even more mysterious than that concerning Peter: he will remain until Jesus comes. In his comment in vv. 23–4 the writer (probably a redactor) suggests that the beloved disciple will finally die, but that he will remain until Jesus comes. This has a symbolic meaning: his message will remain.

(21:24–5) Probably a redactor, who had already reworked the preceding verses, is responsible for this second conclusion to the gospel and perhaps also for 19:35 to which he alludes. By speaking of 'we' he designates the group who has approved the testimony of the beloved disciple, reflected in the gospel. The evangelist has transmitted the message and testimony of the beloved disciple, whom he wants the reader to identify with John, the son of Zebedee. As Christians must still wait for Jesus' return, the witness of the beloved disciple helps them even after his death and completes Peter's pastoral function. The words 'many other things' amplify what was said in the first conclusion in 20:30.

Appendix: 7:53–8:11

This passage, though canonical, does not properly belong to the Gospel of John, since it is missing in the oldest textual witnesses (e.g. P⁶⁶, P⁷⁵, Sinaiticus, Vaticanus, old translations). Most MSS that have the text put it after Jn 7:52, probably because of the words 'neither do I condemn you' in 8:11, which can be compared with 8:15. Some MSS, however, place it after 7:36, 7:44, or 21:25; the Ferrar group after Lk 21:38. Several witnesses mark the text as doubtful.

Papias seems to allude to it in c.130 CE, if we can trust Eusebius, H.E. 3.39.17. In the fourth century we find it in a simpler form in the Syrian Didascalia Apostolorum, 8.2, and in Didymus' commentary on Eccl 7:21–2. The style reminds us of Luke and the story may be compared with Lk 7:36–50. It could be called a biographical apophthegm, in which a saying of Jesus has been developed into the story of a woman caught in adultery. Just as in the Synoptic Gospels, here Jesus does not reject the law directly but criticizes those who apply it mechanically. The law must be interpreted in the light of God's mercy for sinners.

(7:53–8:11) Jesus teaches in the temple as he does every day in Luke (Lk 19:47; 20:1; 21:37). He goes to the Mount of Olives as in Lk 21:37. Just as in the synoptic tradition, the scribes and the Pharisees suddenly come to test the Master. The woman seems to be married, as the text emphasizes that she had committed adultery. 8:3b–6, the legal basis of the accusers' action is not specified, but it may refer to Lev 20:10 and Deut 22:21. According to the Mishnah (Sanh. 7:4; 11:1), an adulterous betrothed girl should be stoned and a married woman strangled, but this legislation is later than the time of our text.

Jesus' silence makes the story more lively. Perhaps what he was writing referred to Jer 17:13: 'Those who turn away from me shall be written on the earth'. The accusers are not the appropriate persons to be judges. vv. 7–8, 'without sin' does not imply only sexual sins. Jesus' saying is in harmony with Mt 7:1: 'Do not judge, so that you may not be judged' (cf. Lk 6:37). The accusers have to face God's judgement upon their own sins. According to Deut 13:9 the witness should be the first to throw a stone. vv. 9–11, as the elders in the Sanhedrin have not been mentioned before, presbyteroi designates probably the oldest men. Perhaps there is even an allusion to the elders of Sus 28 and 41. With much skill the author has delayed the dialogue with the accused woman to the end of his story. In the synoptic tradition Jesus can forgive sins (cf. Mk 2:5; Lk 7:46). Something similar is suggested here, when Jesus says: 'from now on do not sin again' (cf. Jn 5:14), which supposes her contrition.

REFERENCES

- Aurelius, E. (1988), Der Fürbitter Israels: Eine Studie zum Mosebild im Alten Testament, CBOTS 27 (Stockholm: Almqvist-Wiksell).
- Barrett, C. K. (1978), St John: An Introduction with Commentary and Notes on the Greek Text, 2nd edn. (London: SPCK).
- Benoit, P. (1961), Exégèse et Théologie (Paris: Cerf), i.
- Betz, O. (1963), Der Paraklet (Leiden: Brill).
- Birdsall, J. N. (1960), 'John X.29', JTS 11:342–4.
- Black, M. (1967), An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts, 3rd edn. (Oxford: Clarendon).
- Boismard, M. E., and Lamouille, A. (1977), L'Évangile de Jean (Paris: Cerf).
- Borig, R. (1967), Der wahre Weinstock, SANT 16 (Munich: Kösel).
- Brown, R. E. (1966), The Gospel According to John, I–XII (Garden City, NY: Doubleday).
- (1970), The Gospel According to John, XIII–XXI (Garden City, NY: Doubleday).
- (1979), The Community of the Beloved Disciple (New York: Paulist).
- (1994), The Death of the Messiah: From Gethsemane to the Grave: A Commentary on the Passion Narratives in the Four Gospels (2 vols.; New York: Doubleday).
- Bultmann, R. (1971), The Gospel of John, German original (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1941).
- Culpepper, R. A. (1979–80), 'The Pivot of John's Prologue', NTS 27: 1–31.
- de Jonge, M. (1972–3), 'Jewish Expectations about the Messiah according to the Fourth Gospel', NTS 19: 246–70.
- Dewailly, L. M. (1969), Jésus-Christ, Parole de Dieu, 2nd edn. (Paris: Cerf).
- Forkman, G. (1972), The Limits of the Religious Community (Lund: Gleerup).
- Fortna, R. T. (1970), The Gospel of Signs: A Reconstruction of the Narrative Source Underlying the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- (1977–8), 'Jesus and Peter at the High Priest's House: A Test Case for the Question between Mark's and John's Gospels', NTS 24: 371–83.
- (1988), The Fourth Gospel and Its Predecessor: From Narrative Source to Present Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Franck, E. (1985), Revelation Taught: The Paraclete in the Gospel of John (Uppsala: Gleerup).
- Giblin (1983), 'The Miraculous Crossing of the Sea (John 6, 16–21)', NTS 29: 96–103.
- Gyllenberg, R. (1960), 'Cykliska element i Johannesevangeliet's uppbyggning', TT 65: 309–15.
- Gyllenberg, R. (1980), RBI:s Studiebibel, Nya testamentet (Stockholm: Verbum), 177–9.
- Hartman, L. (1984), 'An Attempt at a Text-Centered Exegesis of John 21', ST 38: 29–45.
- (1987) 'Johannine Jesus-Belief and Monotheism', L. Hartman-B. Olsson, Aspects on the Johannine Literature, CBNTS 18, (Uppsala: Almqvist-Wiksell), 85–99.
- Hengel, M. (1993), Die johanneische Frage: Ein Lösungsversuch (Tübingen: Mohr). ET, The Johannine Question (London: SCM, 1989).
- Hooker, M. D. (1974–5), 'The Johannine Prologue and the Messianic Secret', NTS 21: 40–58.
- Johansson, N. (1940), Parakletoi: Vorstellungen von Fürsprechern für die Menschen vor Gott in der alttestamentlichen Religion, im Spätjudentum und Urchristentum (Lund: Gleerup).
- Kieffer, R. (1968), 'Au delà des recensions? L'Évolution de la tradition textuelle dans Jean VI, 52–71', CBNTS 3 (Lund: Gleerup).
- (1985), 'L'Espace et le temps dans l'évangile de Jean', NTS 31: 393–409.
- (1987–8), Johannesevangeliet (2 vols.; Uppsala: EFS).
- (1989), Le Monde symbolique de S. Jean, Lectio divina, 137 (Paris: Cerf).
- (1992), 'Jean et Marc: Convergences dans la structure et dans les détails', in A. Denaux (ed.), John and the Synoptics. BETL 101 (Leuven: Leuven University Press), 109–25.
- Lagrange, M.-J. (1936), Évangile selon saint Jean, 6th edn. (Paris: Gabalda).
- Lindars B. (1972), The Gospel of John (London: Oliphants).
- Malatesta, E. (1971), 'The Literary Structure of John 17', Bib. 52: 190–214.
- Miller, E. L. (1980), 'The Christology of John 8:25', TZ 36: 257–65.
- Mrakuzhlyl, G. (1987), The Christocentric Literary Structure of the Fourth Gospel, AnBib 117 (Rome: Pontifical Institute).
- Neirynck, F. (1984a), 'John 4, 46–54: Sign Source and/or Synoptic Gospels?', ETL 60: 367–75.
- (1984b), 'John and the Synoptics: The Empty Tomb Stories', NTS 30: 161–84.
- (1990), 'John 21', NTS 36: 321–36.
- Neyrey, J. (1982), 'The Jacob Allusions in John 1:51', CBQ 44: 586–605.
- Olsson, B. (1974), Structure and Meaning in the Fourth Gospel: A Text-Linguistic Analysis of John 2:1–11 and 4:1–42 (Lund: Gleerup).
- Painter, J. (1980–1), 'The Farewell Discourses and the History of Johannine Christianity', NTS 27: 525–43.
- Richter, G. (1967), Die Fusswaschung im Johannesevangelium (Regensburg: Pustet).
- (1974), 'Zu den Tauferzählungen Mk 1:9–11 und Joh 1:32–34', ZNW 65: 43–54.
- Rochais, G. (1985), 'La Formation du prologue (Jn 1, 1–18)', ScEs 37: 5–44, 161–87.
- (1993), 'Jean 7: Une confrontation littéraire dramatique, à la manière d'un scénario', NTS 39: 355–78.
- Schnackenburg R. (1977–9), Das Johannesevangelium (Fribourg), i–iii (1, 4th edn.; ii, 2nd edn.; iii, 3rd edn.). ET, The Gospel According to St John (3 vols.; New York: 1968–82).
- Segalla, G. (1983), La preghiera di Gesù al Padre (Giov. 17): Un addio missionario Studi Biblici, 63 (Brescia: Paideia).
- Stibbe, M. W. G. (1993), John (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Walker, W. O. (1982), 'The Lord's Prayer in Matthew and John', NTS 28: 237–56.

61. The Four Gospels in Synopsis HENRY WANSBROUGH

Outline

- A. Gospel as a Literary Genre
- B. The Basic Interrelationship of the Gospels
- C. Proposed Solutions to the Synoptic Problem
- D. John and the Synoptic Gospels
- E. The Features of the Several Gospels Compared Trial Pericopae:

- F. The Call of the First Disciples
- G. The Beatitudes
- H. The Second Sign at Cana or Capernaum
 - I. The Controversy over Beelzebul
 - J. The Walking on the Water
- K. Jesus' Prayer in the Garden

A. Gospel as a Literary Genre. 1. Mark opens with the words, 'The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ' (Mk 1:1). A modern reader would unhesitatingly see the writing that follows as the gospel of Jesus Christ. In fact the concept of 'gospel' is not without its problems. We shall begin with the name 'gospel' before going on to examine the use of the term.

The English word 'gospel' (originally 'godspell' or 'good tidings') is the translation of the Greek euaggelion, but it is not obvious that the writers of the four documents applied this term to their writings. Luke at any rate never uses the noun (except in Acts), though he frequently uses the corresponding verb for the activity of spreading the good news (e.g. 1:19; 4:18). He seems to consider his work rather in terms of a narrative (diēgēsis) or an orderly account (1:1–3). Both noun and verb are used frequently by Paul, who may rely on one or both of two backgrounds. In the religious cult of the emperors the term was used of a piece of imperial good news of salvation, such as a victory or the birth of an heir, which was flashed round the empire, and to which the various provinces, city-states, and other political units were expected to respond with congratulatory gifts. The elements of novelty, salvation, joy, and response, as well as the religious connotations, would have made the term a suitable one for Paul to use for 'my gospel' (Rom 16:25; Gal 1:11). Paul may also, however, be drawing on the use of the word in Isa 61:1, 'the Lord has anointed me to bring good tidings to the afflicted'. This usage may go back to the proclamation of Jesus himself; it certainly occurs on his lips in Mt 11:5 and Lk 4:18 (see Stuhlmacher 1983).

Neither Luke nor John uses the noun, and when it began to be used as a title of the four writings is disputed. Koester (1989: 380) holds that the term was 'always and everywhere understood as the proclamation of the saving message about Christ or the coming of the kingdom' until Marcion in the mid-second century applied it to the written works. In his six usages apart from the heading, Mark certainly uses the term for the proclamation of the saving message, so that in his first verse also it is reasonable to take it in this sense rather than as 'The beginning of the written record' (see Mk 11–13). In Matthew the word is used twice for Jesus' own proclamation of the kingdom (4:23; 9:35) and twice with the addition of 'this gospel' (24:14; 26:13); in the former case the whole gospel message seems to be meant, and in the latter Matthew may possibly intend to restrict Mark's meaning to the particular incident of the gospel message, the anointing at Bethany. Stanton (1992a), on the other hand, argues persuasively that usages of the term as early as the Didache, 8:2; 11:3; 15:3–4, seem to refer to our written gospel texts, and argues further that as soon as more than one of them existed they must have been known as something!

Finally it is important to realize that none of the four gospels originally included an attribution to an author. All were anonymous, and it is only from the fragmentary and enigmatic and—according to Eusebius, from whom we derive the quotation—unreliable evidence of Papias in 120/130 CE that we can begin to piece together any external evidence about the names of their authors and their compilers. This evidence is so difficult to interpret that most modern scholars form their opinions from the content of the gospels themselves, and only then appeal selectively to the external evidence for confirmation of their findings.

2. As recently as 1970 the type of writing now called 'gospel' was considered to be without parallel in the ancient world. Norman Perrin (1970–1: 4) could write assertively that it was 'the unique literary creation of early Christianity. This is a statement I would make with confidence. . . . If we are to come to terms with this genre we must concentrate our attention upon the Gospel of Mark'. Perrin sees a gospel as being a narrative of an event from the past, in which interest and concerns of the past, present, and future have flowed together, since the events of Jesus' ministry are interpreted in the light of the writer's own time and of things expected of Jesus' future coming.

In 1987 Christopher Tuckett could, with misgivings, still give as the majority opinion the view that there was no close parallel to the genre of the gospels. In the last decade, however, it has become clear that the literary genre of 'gospel' can no longer be considered as completely unique. To enable a reader or listener to understand a document it must be possible to a certain extent to categorize it into a known type. Tuckett (1987: 75) wittily gives the example of 'Vicar gives directions to Queen? Just the opposite', to be understood as a newspaper headline or as a crossword puzzle clue for REV-ER-SE. The features of a particular genre of literature form a conventional set of expectations, a sort of implied contract with the reader that enables the reader to categorize the document. The expectations are not necessarily always identical in all respects with what the reader finds, but at least provide a family resemblance. BurrIDGE (1992) has shown that the gospels fall within the varied and well-attested Graeco-Roman concept of biography. Of this genre there are many subdivisions, inevitably including cross-border borrowing with other genres, such as political propaganda, encomium, moralistic encouragement, and travelogue. Even religious biographies in the broad sense were not unknown. The respectful atmosphere found in the gospels, 'tinged with praise and worship' (ibid. 211) occurs also in such works as Tacitus' Agricola and Philo's De vita Mosis. What is, however, unique to the gospels, and constitutes them as an unprecedented subgroup, is the importance and salvific claim of their message, expressed most clearly by Jn 20:31, 'these things are written that you may believe . . . and that believing you may have life'. It is not, then, an unprecedented type of writing, so much as the conviction of the writers that their subject and message had the power to change the world for those who accepted them, that is unique. But this does not exclude the gospels from the broad category of Graeco-Roman biography.

B. The Basic Interrelationship of the Gospels. The three gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke are clearly related very closely to one another, much more closely than John is related to any of them. They share the same basic outline, roughly the same order of events, the same way of telling stories and relating sayings, and even the basically same portrait of the good news of the kingdom and its preaching by Jesus.

This similarity among the first three gospels is best seen by contrast to John. The geographical outline is different: in the first three gospels Jesus goes to Jerusalem only once during his ministry, for the final week, whereas in John he pays several visits to Jerusalem. The order of events is different, for example the cleansing of the temple comes early in John, introducing Jesus' ministry (Jn 2:13–22), whereas in the other three gospels it forms the climax (Mk 11:15–19). John relates many fewer miracles, but almost invariably these are developed by means of a subsequent long discourse of Jesus or by a controversy that brings out the sense and meaning of the event (for example the cure at the Pool of Bethesda continues into a discourse on the works of the Son, Jn 5; the multiplication of loaves flows into the bread of life discourse, Jn 6:1–15, 22–66). While the Jesus of the first three gospels turns attention away from himself to the kingship of God, in John the kingship of God is mentioned only in 3:3–5; the Johannine Jesus teaches about his kingship only in 18:6, and otherwise concentrates rather on his gift of eternal life. In the first three gospels story-parables are an important vehicle of teaching, whereas the fourth gospel barely uses them, preferring instead extended images such as that of the Good Shepherd (Jn 10:1–18).

The similarity between the first three gospels may be roughly described in terms of the number of verses shared. Of Mark's 661 verses, some 80 per cent feature in Matthew and 60 per cent in Luke. Conversely, only three pericopes of Mark (the seed growing secretly, Mk 4:26–9, the healing of the deaf-mute, Mk 7:31–7, and the blind man of Bethsaida, Mk 8:22–6) have no equivalent in either Matthew or Luke. Time and again such long stretches show almost verbatim agreement between Matthew and Mark or Mark and Luke that some literary relationship at the textual level must be postulated between them. Similarly Matthew and Luke have some 220 verses in common, mostly of sayings-material, so that some literary relationship between these two is undeniable. The possibility of viewing these three gospels together has led to the appellation Synoptic Gospels, and the difficulty of reaching an agreed solution to account for their interrelationship has been dubbed the 'synoptic problem'. The issue is so complicated that some scholars regard it as little more than an intellectual game. Brown (1997: 111) opines that 'most readers of the NT find the issue complex, irrelevant to their interests, and boring'.

Three proposed solutions to the synoptic problem will be outlined (c), which will be tested in a discussion of six pericopes (F–K).

C. Proposed Solutions to the Synoptic Problem. 1. The Griesbach Hypothesis. Truly scientific study of this problem did not begin until in 1776 J. J. Griesbach produced a critical edition of a Synopsis of the Gospels, printing the gospels in parallel columns and thus enabling the reader to see in detail the similarities and differences between them. His conclusion, published in 1789, was that Mark was nothing but a combination of Matthew and Luke. The same conclusion had been reached slightly earlier by the little-known Oxford scholar Henry Owen in 1764, so that this view is sometimes called the Owen–Griesbach hypothesis. It later fell into obscurity, but has been revived by William R. Farmer in 1964, and has since become known strictly as the Two-Gospel Hypothesis. For brevity and to avoid confusion it will here be named the Griesbach theory.

The theory is that the first gospel to be written was that of Matthew, the most Semitic of the gospels, written for Christians of Jewish extraction. Next, for Christians of Gentile origin, but still before the destruction of Jerusalem, Luke was written. Finally Mark combined the two. The fundamental argument for this hypothesis, both for Griesbach and for Farmer, lies in the order of pericopes. Wherever Mark departs from Matthew's order, he supports Luke's; if there is a difference between the order of Matthew and Luke, Mark zigzags between the two, following first one, then the other. In addition, the supporters observe, Mark always proceeds forward, never turning back in the order established by Matthew and Luke. These observations are correct, but are not enough to prove the point that Mark combines Matthew and Luke, for in the same way the order of Matthew and Luke can be explained at least as well (see c.2) if Mark is taken as the starting-point.

Support for the theory is claimed also from the material within pericopes. Mark has many double expressions, of which half occur in Matthew and half in Luke. The paradigm case is Mk 1:32, 'That evening, at sunset', where Matthew has in the corresponding passage (8:16) 'That evening', and Luke (4:40) 'when the sun was setting'. The explanation given by the Griesbach theory is that Mark takes one phrase from each of the other gospels and combines them. There is a number of instances of this phenomenon (e.g. Mk 1:42, 'the leprosy left him, and he was made clean'; Mk 8:3, 'his leprosy was made clean'; Lk 5:13, 'the leprosy left him'; similarly at Mk 10:29, 'for my sake and for the sake of the good news').

The Griesbachian explanation, however, is not compelling. Opponents claim, with good evidence, that duality of this kind is a feature of Mark's own style, specifically a feature of his oral style, in which a certain repetitiveness aids the hearer (see E.1). Rather than Mark combining his predecessors, he serves as a quarry for his successors; the phenomenon noted could equally well be the result of Matthew taking one of Mark's two elements and Luke taking the other. It might seem that here again the argument may run either way, except for another observation. On many occasions Matthew keeps both Mark's elements while Luke has only one (Mk 4:5, 'other seed fell on rocky ground where it did not have much soil'; Mt 13:5 has both elements; Lk 8:6 has only 'some fell on the rock'); on many occasions Luke keeps both elements while Matthew has only one (Mk 4:39, 'the wind ceased and there was a dead calm'; Luke, 'they ceased and there was a calm'; Mt 8:26 has only 'and there was a dead calm'; similarly at Mk 6:36); on many occasions Matthew and Luke choose the same half of the double expression (Mk 2:25, 'were hungry and in need of food'; Mt 12:3 and Lk 6:3, 'were hungry'; similarly at Mk 3:26; 12:23). Double expressions occur also in Mark even in those few passages where there is no parallel in Matthew or Luke (Mk 4:28, the double 'head'; Mk 8:24, 25, the double 'looked' in each verse). How widespread a feature it is of Mark's own style has been fully documented by Neirynck (1988). There is therefore no need to postulate that it derives from the combination by Mark of Matthew and Luke.

The greatest difficulty for the Griesbach theory is, however, why Mark should have written a gospel (and why the church should have accepted it) in which he deliberately omitted so much that is valuable: the infancy stories, the beatitudes, the Lord's prayer, the resurrection appearances, and many other important and favourite passages which had already been included in Matthew and Luke.

2. The Two-Source Theory. Since it was extensively proposed by C. Lachmann in 1835, seconded by C. G. Wilke and H. Weisse in 1838, the Two-Source theory has won overwhelming acceptance, at least as a working hypothesis. It still holds the dominant position in NT scholarship. The theory is that Mark is the first gospel, and was used independently by Matthew and Luke, neither of whom knew each other's texts. The large quantity of material shared by Matthew and Luke (but not by Mark), mostly sayings material, derives from a common source. Since an article by J. Weiss in 1890 this common source has been known as 'Q' (Neirynck 1978; 1979). The acceptance of this common source has been greatly assisted by the mention by the early second-century Bishop Papias (quoted by Eusebius) of a collection of Sayings of the Lord in Aramaic made or used by Matthew. Although few scholars accept all Papias' evidence, his mention of the collection of sayings has been widely taken to support this theory.

Despite the hypothetical nature of the very existence of Q, studies have progressed which have established what this document would have been like, e.g. Piper (1995), magisterially summed up by Kloppenborg (2000). It was caricatured by Meier (1994: 181) as a 'grab bag', without any coherent theology or genre. Its most striking feature was, however, that it contained no account of the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus, and indeed showed no interest in these events, containing no hints that they were to occur. Kloppenborg suggests that Paul's stress on these events could be a deliberate corrective to their neglect in this very early document. The most important stress is on the threat of the coming judgement; this frames the whole document (Luke 3:7–9, 16–17 and 19:12–27; 22:28–30), as well as many of the fourteen sub-units isolated by Kloppenborg. Combined with this is a 'deuteronomic' criticism of the continual rejection of the prophets (Luke 6:23; 11:47–51; 13:34–5), and a promise of fulfilment through 'the one who is to come' (Luke 7:18–23; 13:35). Many of the sections isolated show a common structure, beginning with programmatic sayings, introducing a series of imperatives and concluding with affirmations of the importance of its message (Luke 6:21–49; 9:57–10:24). Kloppenborg (2000: 187) likens it to the 'widely attested genre in Near Eastern literature', the instruction or sapiential discourse. According to some scholars (e.g. Burton Mack) the principal function of its authors is social critique and the destabilization of a corrupt society, after the manner of itinerant Cynic teachers. There is reference to the rule of God, but—by contrast to the canonical gospels—there is no interest in exegesis of the Torah. This carefully elaborated characterization is, however, obviously secondary to proof of the existence of Q. The strongest arguments for this theory are the order of pericopes, the detailed editing, and the mutual independence of Matthew and Luke.

With Mark as starting-point it is possible to explain the order of pericopes in Matthew and Luke. However the crucial point here (by contrast to the Griesbachian zigzag claim, see b) is that whenever they diverge from Mark's order it is possible to give clear and plausible reasons for this divergence. Matthew follows Mark's order of pericopes strictly except when he is composing two series, the collection of miracles in Mt 8–9 and the discourse on mission in Mt 10. For these two collections he takes material that occurs later in Mark (Mk 1:40–5; 3:9–13; 3:13–19; 4:35–5:43; 13:9–13). It is quite clear that Matthew is a careful and orderly teacher who likes to assemble into complete collections all the material on one subject. Thus all the changes in Matthew's order are explained as anticipations in accordance with his teaching methods. Luke's changes of the Markan order are not to be explained so simply and schematically, for Luke is far more creative in his writing and independent of his sources than is Matthew. So he puts the rejection of Jesus at Nazareth (Mk 6:1–6) earlier and builds it up into the programmatic opening speech with which Jesus begins his ministry at Nazareth (Lk 4:16–30). On the other hand Luke postpones until 5:1–11 the call of the first disciples (Mk 1:16–20) and builds it into an important lesson in discipleship (see f). Luke's most far-reaching change in order is the construction of the great journey to Jerusalem (9:51–18:14), by which he locates much of Jesus' teaching on the final journey to his death at Jerusalem. All other distracting geographical names are there suppressed, to subserve the typical Lukan concentration on Jerusalem, where Jesus will die as a prophet and from where the gospel will spread to the ends of the earth. Luke's order varies so widely and imaginatively from that of his predecessors that Luke's supposed rearrangement of Q's order was mocked in 1924 by B. H. Streeter as that of a 'crank', a charge disputed by Goulder (1984). An alternative explanation of Luke's order is given in the same volume by H. B. Green (1984). A full explanation of the changes in order by Matthew and Luke, on the hypothesis of Markan priority, is given by Tuckett (1984a).

The argument from the detailed editing can hardly be briefly summarized. Some impression of it will be given by the pericopes discussed below (f–κ). The outlines, however, are:

(a) There are numerous occasions when both Matthew and Luke improve the grammar and style of Mark's unsophisticated Greek; it seems perverse to argue in the opposite direction that Mark deliberately roughens a more cultured presentation.

(b) Some features of Markan style and composition appear also in Matthew and Luke where and only where Mark uses them. It is more reasonable to suppose that Matthew and Luke derived them from Mark than that Mark adopted all the instances from both Matthew and Luke. One example of this is the Markan afterthought-explanation with a past tense of eimi and gar ('for they were fishermen'); this is a feature of Markan style which occurs in Matthew and Luke only in passages parallel to those of Mark: in Mk 2:15; 5:42; 16:4 the construction occurs only in Mark; in Mk 1:16, 22; 6:48; 14:40 it is paralleled in Matthew, in Mk 10:22 it is paralleled in both Matthew and Luke.

(c) There are several theological differences between Mark, Matthew, and Luke which may perhaps point (though uncertainly) in the direction of a development from Mark to Matthew and Luke rather than in the opposite direction. Thus Matthew and Luke show a distinctly more explicit Christology than Mark. Again, Mark is highly, even shockingly, critical of the disciples' lack of faith and understanding; Matthew and Luke both weaken this criticism, in a way that might be expected to have occurred at a time when reverence for the first leaders of Christianity was increasing.

The mutual independence of Matthew and Luke is a point crucial for establishing the extent and indeed the existence of Q. If Luke knew Matthew (or vice versa), the links between Matthew and Luke can be accounted for without the intervention of any Q. The large number of minor agreements (some calculate there are as many as 1,000) between Matthew and Luke against Mark demands some explanation in the sources. It may, however, be approached at various levels:

1. The minor agreements. In texts of this length it is quite possible that many agreements may occur where Matthew and Luke make the same change to their version of Mark by sheer coincidence. This will especially be the case where they share the same principles, either linguistic (objection to Mark's primitive historic present and wearisomely repetitive conjunction kai/kai euthus = 'and/and immediately') or theological (increasingly explicit Christology or reverence for the disciples). It cannot be considered surprising that two Christian writers sometimes share the same reaction to a primitive Christian text. It requires explanation only if the identical expression of this becomes remarkable by its frequency or its extent. There can be no verdict on the likely frequency of such similarity, and little agreement on the significance of individual cases. The most striking single case is Mt 26:68 || Mk 14:65 || Lk 22:64, where both Matthew and Luke have 'Who is it that struck you?', lacking in Mark. So difficult is this of explanation that determined advocates of the theory that Matthew and Luke are totally independent of each other sometimes turn to the desperate expedient of declaring all the MSS corrupt. There are, however, scholars who are prepared to rebut the claim for each passage that Luke knew Matthew, e.g. Tuckett (1984b). Another significant minor agreement is in the order of pericopes: an important support for the Q-theory is the claim that the Q-material always occurs in different places in Matthew and Luke. But in three instances both these gospels have material in the same sequence: the Baptist's preaching of repentance (Mt 3:7-10; Lk 3:7-9) comes between the same triple-tradition pericopes; the testing in the desert (Mt 4:1-11; Lk 4:1-13) occurs in both between the baptism and the first proclamation in Galilee; the parable of the leaven (Mt 13:33; Lk 13:20-1) in both follows the parable of the mustard seed.

2. Clusters of agreement between Matthew and Luke occur in a limited number of pericopes. Since B. H. Streeter it has been accepted that there are passages where the agreements between Matthew and Luke against Mark are so pronounced that there must be literary contact between them apart from Mark, either directly or at least through Q; these are known as 'Mark-Q overlaps'. Streeter listed five major passages (John's preaching, the temptation, the mustard seed, collusion with Satan, and commissioning the twelve) and eleven others where this Mark-Q overlap occurs. In all these passages put together there is a total of 50 verses in which Streeter finds verbatim agreement between Mark and Q. This causes two major difficulties:

(a) The source-question is therefore in fact simply pushed one stage further back: what is the literary relationship between Mark and Q? This widespread agreement must be explained; verbatim agreement in 50 verses must presuppose some literary connection. If Mark used Q for some passages, why did he not use Q more widely, especially to include some of those precious passages mentioned in c.1? Was only a partial edition of Q available to him? The number of unknown documents begins to proliferate, for example by different editions of Q. Alternatively, if the whole of Q was available to Mark, why did he omit so much?

(b) While it is accepted that on many occasions both Matthew and Luke show major inventiveness, editing their sources with imagination and steady theological purpose, on these occasions their inventiveness is assumed to have deserted them. For instance, in the case of the mustard seed, they have carefully stitched together the versions of Mark and Q simply for the sake of using both versions without any large theological advantage.

3. Recourse to other editions of Mark is a possible expedient to account for a number of agreements, both positive and negative, between Matthew and Luke against Mark. If both Matthew and Luke include a phrase absent from Mark (a positive minor agreement), it may be that they had an earlier text of Mark that included this phrase. There was therefore an earlier version of Mark (Proto-Mark) on which both Matthew and Mark drew.

Conversely, if Matthew and Luke both lack a phrase, it may be that the phrase was added to Mark after they used that gospel. Sanders (1969) offers a list of such suggested additions to Mark after it had been used by Matthew and Luke, e.g. 'and Andrew with James and John' in Mk 1:29; or 'carried by four of them' in Mk 2:3; or 'and there he prayed' in Mk 1:35, a phrase that would have fitted Luke's emphasis on prayer, but is lacking in Luke's parallel passage; or Mk 2:27. This 'Deutero-Mark' theory will explain many negative minor agreements (that is, where Matthew and Luke agree on omitting a Markan phrase), and the lack of phrases in Matthew or Luke that might be expected to appeal to the particular evangelist. The suggestion is that Mark is the first evangelist, but these phrases were simply not contained in the edition of Mark used by the later two. The difficulty about this theory is that many of the phrases are consistent with the style and methods widespread in and characteristic of the main part of the gospel. If they are consistent with the author's style, it seems unjustified to attribute them to a second editor. Deutero-Mark is, however, a possible way to evade some of the difficulties of the minor agreements.

The suggestion that a Matthean form (Proto-Matthew) existed before Mark is, however, attractive as a solution to some passages where Matthew seems more correct (or more faithful to the Jewish background) than Mark. For instance, in the pericope on plucking corn on the sabbath, Matthew's version makes far more sense than Mark's. In Mark's version (2:23) the disciples simply tear up the corn to make a path; this leads to a badly focused legal dispute. In Matthew's version (12:1) they pluck ears of corn to assuage their hunger as they pass through the field, in accordance with Deut 23:26; this gives rise to a good legal dispute about threshing on the sabbath. On the Proto-Mark theory Matthew would be drawing on an earlier version of Mark, which was later misunderstood and simplified by an author unfamiliar with niceties of Jewish law; finally Matthew would have simplified the legal issues and adopted some expressions from the final edition of Mark. The question is whether it is more economical to postulate this earlier version of the gospel, or to suppose that Matthew used Mark, but correctly spelt out and narrated the legal situation that alone makes sense of Mark's story. (However, Casey (1998) maintains that Mk 2:23-3:6 is itself the translation of a very ancient Aramaic document.)

Similarly, in the story of the empty tomb, the women's motive in Mt 28:1 (to pay a pious visit to the tomb) accords with Jewish custom, and with good sense, better than the motive in Mk 16:1 (to anoint an already decaying body, blocked off by a great stone). Has Matthew made better sense out of Mark's version, or has Mark misunderstood and simplified the story from an earlier version used by Matthew?

3. The Multiple-Level Hypothesis. This theory, put forward by M.-E. Boismard and other distinguished members of the French Biblical School in Jerusalem, goes a step (or several steps) beyond the theories of Proto-Mark and Deutero-Mark just outlined. It is little known beyond the French-speaking world, but is nevertheless important. The basis of the theory is that all the hypotheses hitherto put forward are too simplistic. There were several basic versions of the gospel material, which have interacted on one another at more than one stage of the development of the tradition to its final form. Traces of such development may also be garnered from divergent, non-standard quotations of the gospels in very early church fathers. These are often attributed to faulty citations by the fathers from memory, but in this theory it is suggested that they are genuine relics of earlier versions of the gospels.

Boismard (1972) holds that there are four documents at the basis of the tradition. One (A) is a Palestinian version, stemming from Judeo-Christian circles. The second (B) is a Hellenistic reinterpretation for use in the non-Jewish Christian circles. The third (C) is less well defined, an independent version, probably of Palestinian origin. Document A gave rise to an intermediate version of Matthew, into which fed also Q (possibly not a single document itself). This Intermediate-Matthew had no contact with B, C, or the Markan tradition. It was only subsequently that large sections of this tradition were replaced by sections drawn from an intermediate version of Mark, and further editorial changes were made by an editor whose style is in some ways remarkably similar to Luke. Such 'criss-crossing' is shown by the appearance in one gospel of expressions characteristic of another. It may well be attributed to the influence of each gospel on the others at a late stage of the tradition.

Boismard's method is to look for a pure and simple form of a story, eliminating the least illogicality or unevenness. He attributes any illogicality or development to a written source, until the characteristics of the final authors are reached. One example of this method may be seen in his treatment of the return of the apostles (Mk 6:30-4 and par.). Mt 14:13 has the same pattern as Mt 12:15 and 19:1-2, which shows that it stems originally from an earlier version of Matthew, and has received further Markan vocabulary at a later stage. According to one version (mostly vv. 32-3) Jesus goes away to a deserted place, where the local people recognize him and hurry to meet him; this comes from Document A. According to another version (mostly vv. 31-2) the crowd is already present and sees Jesus and the apostles depart in a boat; this version is from Document B. It is, of course, no longer possible to separate out the two versions completely now that they have been combined.

This particular case (which Boismard claims is a strong one for his schema) presents difficulties for the Two-Source Theory, since there are three positive minor agreements in two verses of Matthew and Luke against Mark: 'withdrew', 'the crowds followed him', and the mention of healing; Matthew and Luke also agree in three omissions against Mark. It does therefore seem likely that there is some direct relationship between Matthew and Luke. But there is no need at the documentary stage for the complications suggested by Boismard. Such a criss-crossing process may well have occurred at the stage of oral tradition. It fits better the more fluid consistency of a body of oral tradition, passing backwards and forwards between many witnesses.

4. Mark as the Single Source. This final theory is that of Goulder (1974; 1989), a revival and elaboration of a position put forward by Austin Farrer in 1955, 'On Dispensing with Q'. Goulder holds that Mark is the first gospel. Matthew's only written source was Mark, which he edited and developed through his own theological resources. The material in Matthew which is not drawn from Mark shows a consistency of method and approach that can only be the stamp of one mind. This approach extends to the material taken over from Mark, to the material shared with Luke, and to the material proper to Matthew alone. The elements said to be characteristic of Q (a concern for eschatology, the threat of judgement, the need to bring forth good fruit, the importance of the Christian community) are in fact characteristic of Matthew, and expressed in Matthean language, so that there is no need to postulate (let alone reconstruct) any such hypothetical source. Two reservations about the original statement of Goulder's theory have been repeatedly and strongly expressed: Matthew should not be tied to any theoretical arrangement of a lectionary, which is too nebulous. Nor should Matthew's process of elaborating Mark be termed 'midrash', for midrash can be done only on a sacred text, and Mark has not yet this status. Neither of these reservations affects the main thrust of the theory, though it would certainly strengthen it if it could be shown that Matthew was doing only what many other midrashists had done.

In order to show the uniformity of Matthew's style and theology Goulder 'finger-prints' Matthew not only by means of vocabulary, but principally by means of the consistent use of imagery and patterns of speech (e.g. pairs or double pairs of images, pairs of parables, consistent use of contrast in parables; such contrast is a feature of all Matthew's own story-parables, and is also introduced into parables taken over from Mark), see E.2.

The same finger-printing technique is applied to Luke. The new material in Luke is largely parables and other stories, and in these not only a characteristic vocabulary but also a characteristic method of storytelling can be charted (entries and exits, conversation, soliloquies of the chief character, varied, lively, and often disreputable personalities). Vocabulary, techniques of storytelling, and recognizable theological interests (concern for the poor and underprivileged, stress on the need for repentance) are discernible throughout, not only in passages proper to Luke but also in Luke's treatment of passages shared with Mark and Matthew. Once Q has been set aside, the way lies open to explain the many agreements between Matthew and Luke, which remain such a bugbear for the Two-Source Theory, by Luke's knowledge and use of Matthew.

Three major difficulties remain with this theory. The first is the different position of much of the teaching material in Luke from that of Matthew. The Sermon on the Mount becomes the Sermon on the Plain. Matthew's long, carefully structured discourses are cut up and cut down. Goulder explains this by Luke's theory that only a limited amount of teaching can be digested at one time; Luke therefore discards some material and redistributes other. Luke, in any case, shows no hesitation in relocating material (the rejection at Nazareth, the call of the disciples) if it suits his purpose. The second difficulty is that the theory attributes considerable freedom of inventiveness to both Matthew and Luke. This is particularly true in the parables, where both evangelists would have introduced whole stories which they did not receive from the Jesus-tradition. However, Goulder shows convincingly how Luke consistently builds his own stories out of existing hints. For example, Luke's parable of the prodigal son (Lk 15:11–32) is a characteristically Lukan version of Matthew's parable of the two sons (Mt 21:28–30). Luke's infancy stories could be his own retelling, according to his own theology, interests, and style, of minimal data derived from Matthew's. Similarly Luke's story of the ten lepers (Lk 17:11–19) could well be Luke's own remoulding, according to his own techniques and theology, of the healing of the leper in Mk 1:40–5. The third difficulty, somewhat intangible, is the doubt whether such a careful, modern, scissors-and-paste method of editing two previous texts may be postulated of an ancient author. This difficulty is, however, common to almost all explanations of the interrelationships of the gospels. It may be less extreme if the texts on which the later evangelists worked are regarded not as written documents but as texts held firmly and word for word in the memory, and thus allowing greater flexibility. However, proponents of the Two-Source Theory point out that the first two of these (the Baptist's preaching of repentance, and the testing in the desert) could scarcely occur anywhere else, leaving only the third case to be explained as a partial coincidence.

The attack on Goulder's theory has increased in intensity during the last decade. A particularly strong attack is mounted by Tuckett (1995: 31–45). Principally, Goulder's answer to Streeter's argument has been exploded. Streeter argued that it would be 'the order of a crank' if Luke meticulously followed Mark's order but changed the order of almost every pericope which he took from Matthew. Luke seems carefully to have scraped off every Matthean addition to Mark and then inserted many of them (but not all, e.g. Mt 12:5–7; 16:16–19; 27:19, 24, and why not?) elsewhere. Goulder's explanation of Luke's break-up of the long Matthean discourses—that Luke considered they provided too much richness to be digested at a single gulp—flies in the face of the long speeches in Luke 21, Acts 7 and elsewhere. Goodacre (1996) also casts doubt on Goulder's central vocabulary argument: are the 'Matthean' words which Luke is claimed to have adopted indeed specifically Matthean? In a number of cases it can be argued equally well that the borrowing is in the opposite direction.

D. John and the Synoptic Gospels. 1. The basic differences between John and the Synoptic Gospels have been outlined at the beginning of this article. The relationship between them continues, however, to be highly disputed, several different opinions being put forward. In 1974 Norman Perrin held that John must have known the Gospel of Mark directly. In Denaux (1992) René Kieffer held that John knew Mark or a source very similar to Mark, while Frans Neirynck argues for the direct textual dependence of Jn 5:1–18 on Mark. On the other hand in the same work Peter Borgen maintains that John is not using the actual text of the Synoptics, but rather an underlying oral tradition which they have in common; he compares John's use of the synoptic tradition in several passages to Paul's use in 1 Cor 11:23–34 of the tradition of the institution of the eucharist reflected also in Mk 14:22–5.

In detail the links between John and the synoptics are diverse.

(a) Some stories are closely similar in both John and the Synoptics, including verbal and structural similarities, though reworked to express the special theology of each author (e.g. the multiplication of loaves and the walking on the waters, see 1.1–3).

(b) In other cases Johannine miracle-stories are based on stories of the same type as the synoptic stories: controversial healings on the sabbath, Jn 5 and 9, a dead person, Lazarus, is raised to life, as Jairus' daughter or the son of the widow of Nain are in the Synoptics. It may be argued that in John the raising of Lazarus is so crucial to the decision to get rid of Jesus that, had it been known to the synoptic tradition, it could not have been omitted.

(c) There are sayings so close that they may simply be different translations of the same original (e.g. Jn 1:26–7; 2:19 compared to Mt 3:11 and Mk 14:58 respectively). In such cases the very form of the saying may be affected by the theology of the writer, and its positioning and use can certainly impart to it a different force.

(d) Some sayings in John appear in the form of stories in the Synoptics (e.g. Jn 12:27 and the prayer of Jesus in the Garden, see κ.5). The saying of Jn 3:3, 5, is very similar to Mt 18:3; it is the only mention of 'the kingdom' in John, and makes the same point as the Matthew-saying. In the passion narrative John has no scene corresponding to the decision of the Sanhedrin in Mark/Matthew to deliver Jesus to Pilate, but there may be traces of the same discussion and decision in the meeting of the chief priests and Pharisees related in Jn 11:47–53.

A special link between Luke and John is apparent. Luke and John share several omissions from the Mark–Matthew tradition (e.g. the mention of the Baptist baptizing Jesus). Some passages show a close relationship between Luke and John (the call of the disciples in Lk 5:1–11 and Jn 21, see ρ.5; the anointing in Lk 7:36–50). The link between John and Luke is clearest in the passion and resurrection narrative. Normally it is assumed that, if there is any direct dependence, it is John who is dependent on Luke. It has also, however, been argued by Lamar Cribbs (1971) that dependence goes in quite the opposite direction, and that Luke depends on John. There is a remarkable series of 20 passages where Luke departs from the Mark–Matthew tradition precisely to agree with John. It remains, however, most probable that John's link with Luke, as with Mark and Matthew, remains at the oral level (see J.1).

E. The Features of the Several Gospels Compared. In recent years scholars have devoted considerable attention to discerning the features proper to each evangelist, both in style and in theology. Such study cannot be divorced from the synoptic problem, that is, from the question of the order in which the gospels were written. Obviously features verbal, linguistic, and theological, present in both Matthew and Mark, will owe their origin to whichever of the two has been found to be the earlier, being borrowed thence by the later writer.

Word-lists have long been published, such as those of Hawkins (1909). His criterion for a word characteristic of Matthew and Luke is that the word occur at least four times in that gospel (three times in the case of Mark) and at least twice as often (in the case of Mark, more often) than in the other two Synoptic Gospels together. It has, however, been objected that mere frequency is no indication of origin, for a particular word found in a gospel may take another author's fancy, in which case the derivative author may use frequently a word originally derived from another evangelist, who uses the word only once or twice. Frequency of usage on its own is therefore no criterion of origin, particularly since Matthew and Luke are roughly twice as long as Mark. More progress may be made by means of particular usages of words, such as Mark's repeated transitional phrases, 'and immediately' and 'again'. It has proved possible to establish clusters of linguistic usage associated with such phrases by which Mark structures his stories. So, starting from Mark's highly characteristic and unusual use of 'again' to refer back to a previous incident, Peabody (1987) established that the same hand is responsible for the composition of the whole of Mk 1:16–4:1.

1. Mark. Narrative Style. A whole series of features in Mark may be connected to his distinctively oral style of storytelling.

On the grammatical level these include parataxis instead of syntaxis (a series of parallel short sentences, where a more literary writer might use subordinate clauses) and the frequent historical present (which often disappears in translation, and is often 'corrected' by Matthew and Luke). On a more stylistic level Markan duality has been thoroughly documented: Mark's thought often proceeds by two steps, the second frequently defining and focusing the first, 'That evening, at sundown' (1:32), 'in the morning, a great while before day' (1:35), 'the leprosy left him and he was made clean' (1:42). This duality shows also in the frequent double questions ('Do you not yet perceive or understand?', 8:17) and double commands ('Peace! Be still!', 4:39, or 'Take heed, beware!', 8:15). Another frequent oral technique is the afterthought explanation with 'for': 'for it was very large' (16:4), 'for they were afraid' (16:8). These are means by which the oral storyteller imparts his information gradually, at a pace at which it can be absorbed.

Two other oral techniques deserve mention, the frequent triple repetition to stress important points (the three great prophecies of the passion, Jesus' triple return to the sleeping disciples in Gethsemane, the triple accusation of Jesus before the high priest, Peter's triple denial, Pilate's triple appeal to the people in his attempt to set Jesus free), and Mark's knack of focusing his audience's attention on one object easily visualized: Jesus in the boat 'asleep on the cushion' (4:38) or John's 'head on a platter' (6:28). It is these techniques that make Mark such a superb and memorable storyteller.

Mark's Irony. Perhaps the most important feature of Mark's style of writing from the theological point of view is his consistent use of irony. His storytelling operates on two levels, so that events have for the informed reader a sense which the actors in the drama do not comprehend. From the beginning the reader knows the identity of Jesus (1:1); and the voice from heaven at the baptism, in Mark addressed to Jesus, not the onlookers, 1:11, while the actors in the story discover it only gradually. Ironically, it is the blind men at Bethsaida (8:25) and Jericho (10:47) who see clearly who Jesus is, while even in his confession at Caesarea Philippi Peter earns a rebuke for his lack of understanding (8:33). In the passion story this irony reaches a climax, as Jesus is repeatedly mocked for falsely claiming to be what he in fact is: a prophet (14:65) even while his prophecy of Peter's denial is being fulfilled, king (15:18), and saviour (15:31). Such irony serves both to drive home the lessons of the story and to bring readers to examine their own positions and commitment.

Education Levels. Despite, therefore, Mark's often inelegant and popular language, the artistry of composition and arrangement shown by his work is evidence of a considerable degree of education. In the first century primary education was widespread, and at this level, or at any rate before embarking on higher education in rhetoric, children were taught to expand, contract, reform, and refute passages handed to them. It can no longer be considered acceptable to categorize the earliest Christians as exclusively uneducated riff-raff of the slave classes. Luke (especially in Acts) is perhaps over-anxious to emphasize the respectable status of those who listened to and were attracted by Paul's message, but the evidence of Paul's letters shows that the community had considerable resources. They were able to travel, own slaves, eat meat, offer their houses for meetings, behave arrogantly and unfeelingly towards less wealthy members. Meeks (1983) opines that the most active and prominent members of Paul's circle were upwardly mobile. There is no reason to suppose that such a group would have selected a primitive ignoramus to write the gospel, or would have accepted it if one had done so.

The Failure of the Disciples. One of the most notable features of Mark's gospel is its criticism of the disciples. They initially respond with unhesitating obedience (1:16–20), and are congratulated as the grain giving a good yield (4:8) and for their first mission (6:30–1), but they continually fail to understand. They fail to rely on Jesus (4:38–40). They are sarcastic towards him (6:37). Time after time he rebukes their lack of understanding (7:18; 8:17; 8:29–33). In the first half of the gospel they are thrice rebuked on the lake for their lack of faith or understanding; in the second half of the gospel, at each of the three great prophecies of the passion they fail to understand that Jesus must suffer and that the disciple must share the lot of the Master. Finally when it comes to the passion they all desert Jesus. They have left all to follow Jesus; now the young man in the garden leaves all, even his makeshift clothing, to escape (14:52). Despite his earlier protestations of loyalty Peter thrice denies his Master, just as Jesus thrice stands up to his accusers. That these instances of failure are not mere historical reportage but bear Mark's emphasis is shown by the fact that they are all shot through with the colouring of his personal style such as dualism and triple repetition.

Various explanations have been offered for Mark's insistence on the disciples' failure. Weeden (1968) suggested that Mark was concerned to correct a group of Christians who saw Jesus only as a miracle-worker and undervalued the importance of his passion. Best (1986) saw a pedagogical element, Mark hinting how hard it was to assimilate the full message of Jesus. A feature of the gospel possibly related to, and contrasting with, the failure of the disciples is the success and praise of those who take the initiative in approaching Jesus: the Syro-Phoenician woman (7:25–30), the father of the epileptic boy (9:18), Bartimaeus (10:46–52), the woman at Bethany (14:9). Mark may be pointing the lesson that a first approach to Jesus is easy enough, but that enduring commitment brings its own difficulties. At any rate the gospel must be reacting to a testing situation of the persecution of Christians in which some (perhaps even some of the leaders of the community) have failed to understand that suffering for the sake of the gospel is an integral part of discipleship.

The Kingship of God. The focus of Jesus' proclamation of the Good News in Mark is, however, the kingdom, or rather kingship, of God. This is the object of his first proclamation, the conclusion of the Markan introduction (1:15). The proclamation is closely followed by Jesus' first miracle, the expulsion of an unclean spirit (1:21–8). As Jesus interprets his power over evil spirits as being a sign of the triumph of the kingdom of God over the kingdom of Satan (3:23–4) his miracles of healing may also be understood as a sign of the advent of God's kingship and rule, the triumph of God over evil, so long awaited in Judaism. From the first teaching of John the Baptist

(1:3) Mark has made clear that acceptance of this sovereignty of God will require a conversion and reorientation of life, though he is far less explicit than Matthew (e.g. the Sermon on the Mount) about the details of conduct required. There is a certain tension between two aspects, whether the kingship of God is already activated or is still to come. As Jesus' passion and resurrection approach, Mark gives a series of sayings that suggest that in some sense these events will bring the kingdom in power (9:1; 14:25, 62). At the same time the eschatological discourse leaves no doubt that all is not yet accomplished, and there is still to occur an overwhelming 'coming of the Son of Man in power' (13:26), preceded by a final great persecution of the disciples as they proclaim the Good News to all the nations (13:10).

The Person of Jesus. Reliance on the person of Jesus is the central condition for acceptance of God's sovereignty. The story Mark tells may be seen as an unveiling of the mystery of who Jesus is. The reader is told succinctly at the start that he is Messiah and Son of God (1:1). Through Markan irony (see above) the actors in the drama discover only painfully and slowly who Jesus is. But the believing reader, already enjoying knowledge of the resurrection, also shares in this discovery, learning as Mark's story unfolds what these titles mean. The reader benefits from the recognition of Jesus by the voice from heaven at the baptism (1:11) and the transfiguration (9:7) and by the unclean spirits as they are expelled (acknowledgements seemingly unnoticed by those present, 3:11; 5:7), but this knowledge is still denied to those who encounter Jesus. No human witness of Jesus reaches full acknowledgement of him as Son of God until the centurion at the cross. The quest pervades the gospel, as those who encounter Jesus attempt to puzzle out who he is (2:7; 4:41; 8:21, 29; 11:28; 14:61). It is made more laborious by Jesus' repeated order to 'tell no one about what they had seen until the Son of Man had risen from the dead' (9:9), the so-called 'messianic secret' (see Mk 1:32–4).

The dominant impression of Jesus is one of authority. When he calls the disciples they follow unhesitatingly (1:16–20). He teaches and heals with authority (1:22, 27). The wind and the sea obey him (4:41). Even his unexplained commands are obeyed without question (11:1–6; 14:13–16). Amazement and astonishment follow him everywhere (2:12; 5:20; 6:51; 7:37). A challenge to his authority is easily defeated (11:27–33), until 'no one dared question him any more' (12:34). He acts like the prophets of old (6:15; 8:28), even providing bread in the desert for his followers as Moses did (6:35–44; 8:1–9). He arrogates to himself powers that only God possesses, forgiving sin (2:1–12), claiming to be lord of the sabbath (2:28), rebuking the storm (4:39; cf. Ps 107:23–9), walking on the sea (6:48; cf. Job 9:8). The final blasphemy—again Markan irony—is when he proclaims that the high priest will see him "seated at the right hand of the Power" and "coming on the clouds of heaven" (14:62), a claim to share the very throne of God (see Donahue 1973). It is against this background that the titles given to Jesus, such as 'Son of Man' (see Mk 2:1–12) must be understood.

2. Matthew. Narrative Style. Mark and Matthew differ in two major respects. While Mark is concerned primarily to present a picture of the wonder of Jesus' personality Matthew concentrates on the teaching of Jesus. It has been calculated that Mark contains 240 verses of teaching, and Matthew 620. Invariably Matthew expands the Markan teaching, just as he contracts the miracle stories. The guidance for the Christian life provided by Matthew is certainly one of the reasons why his early became the most popular and widespread of the gospels. Another reason—and this is surely at the heart of Matthew's popularity—is the poetic, rhythmic, and linguistic skill shown in Matthew's teaching sections, making the teaching attractive to remember and to quote.

Matthew tends to think in simple contrasts, using contrasting images, rock and sand (7:24), broad and narrow road (7:14), sun and rain (5:45), as well as many other pairs of images, birds and lilies (6:26–9), speck and log (7:4), moth and rust (6:19–20), and sometimes pairs of pairs, grapes, thorns, figs, thistles (7:16), stone, bread, snake, fish (7:9–10). His parables similarly point contrasts. Goulder (1974: 54) describes all Matthew's thirteen long parables as 'black and white caricature contrasts'. All of them contrast personalities (normally stock contrasting personalities, devoid of human interest or subtlety, the two builders (7:24–7), the two sons (21:28–31), the two servants (18:23–35), the wise and foolish wedding-attendants (25:1–13), and are themselves often in pairs (the mustard-seed and the leaven, 13:31–3, the treasure and the pearl, 13:44–6, the watchful householder and the faithful servant, 24:43–7; the talents and the sheep and goats, 25:14–46).

Nor is it only the liveliness of the imagery that attracts. Matthew has also a balanced rhythm which is far more frequent in his sayings than in the other Synoptics; one of the most frequent forms is described by Goulder (1974: 71) as a 'four point antithesis which has a paradoxical element'. Of these Goulder counts forty-four in Matthew, e.g. 6:3; 7:16; 9:37; 10:16. Where they are shared by Mark and Luke the form given by Matthew is often sharper and more succinct (e.g. Mt 16:26 compared with both Mark's and Luke's versions, or Mt 10:26 with Mk 4:22, or Mt 20:16 with Lk 13:30). Two special types of these four-point sayings may be mentioned, one in which two of the four terms are the same ('You received without payment, give without payment, Mt 10:8, my itals.), and the other in which the four terms fall into pairs ('with the judgement you make you will be judged, and the measure you give will be the measure you get, Mt 7:2 (my itals.)—much more succinct—12 words only—in Matthew's Greek, and quite lost in Lk 6:37–8). If Mark was chosen to relate the Good News for his skill in storytelling, it could well be that Matthew was selected to write a gospel because of the memorably poetic quality of his oral version of the teaching of Jesus.

Matthew's Jewishness. The other feature that contrasts Matthew's style with that of Mark is its Jewishness, and more precisely its rabbinic quality. It is not simply that Matthew leaves Semitic words unexplained (e.g. rāqā in 5:22), or that he shows constant interest in Jewish matters, such as the three classic good works of Judaism (almsgiving, prayer, and fasting) or tithes, phylacteries, and the law. Nor yet that he several times demurs from Mark's cavalier treatment of legal observance (e.g. he omits Mk 7:19c, 'Thus he declared all foods clean') and in Mt 12:1–8 is careful to justify the disciples' plucking ears of grain on the sabbath with more argument than Mark, omitting the sweeping liberalism of Mk 2:27. More positively he frequently uses rabbinic methods of argument, a heading followed by examples (in rabbinic writing known as ab wētōlēdōt) in Mt 5:17 before the six great completions of the law in 5:21–48 and in 6:1 before the classic good works, the 'light and heavy' argument (Heb. qal wāhōmer, Lat. a minori ad majus) in 12:12, and kēlālōr 'summing up' in 7:12.

It is notable that of all NT writers Matthew's formulas to introduce scriptural quotations are closest to those used at Qumran (cf. Fitzmyer 1970–1). His use of Scripture, linked to the word rather than the meaning of texts, is similarly often characteristic of Jewish exegesis of the time (cf. Barthélemy 1963). This reaches its extreme when Jesus is represented as mounted on both the ass and the colt in Mt 21:7, in order to fulfil Zech 9:9 literally.

Most significant on this topic is Matthew's treatment of scribes. Mark shows little interest in the scribes, and has few good words to say for them. Matthew, on the other hand, is careful in his treatment of them, systematically removing them from passages where they could, in Mark's narrative, seem to have a part in the death of Jesus (passages corresponding to Mt 21:23; 26:3, 47; 27:1). On other occasions Matthew makes it clear that particular hostile scribes belong to the Pharisee party (7:28–9; 22:34–40) or he simply substitutes 'Pharisees' for 'scribes' (9:11; 12:24). More positively, scribes are joined to prophets and wise men as those who are to be sent out as messengers in 23:34—Luke, in his corresponding passage, joins them together as 'prophets and apostles'—so that with good reason the approving sketch of the 'scribe who has been trained for the kingdom of heaven' is seen as Matthew's own self-portrait (13:52). Some scholars conclude that Matthew was writing for a community of Christian Jews, possibly at Antioch (Meier 1982; Sim 1998).

Matthew's Christology. In accord with this Jewishness Matthew sees the message of Jesus as bringing the teaching of Judaism to completion. Thus on twelve occasions he shows Jesus acting 'in order to fulfil' the scripture (1:23; 2:6; 15, 18, 23; 4:15–16; 8:17; 12:18–21; 13:35; 21:5; 26:56; 27:9–10) as though with no other motive for action. He sees the miracles of Jesus as the fulfilment of Isa 61 (Mt 8:17; 11:5–6) and the resurrection of Jesus as the sign of Jonah (Mt 12:39; 16:4, whereas Mk 8:12 misses this significance, saying that no sign will be given). He sees Jesus as the new Moses, reflecting Moses' career in his infancy (this is the chief theme of Mt 2), in his lawgiving (Mt 5:1), and in his final charge on the mountain (Mt 28:16). Consequentially, the people of Jesus forms the new Israel, replacing the old. In Mt 16:18 'my church' (or more exactly 'my community/congregation') mirrors the people whom God called to himself in the desert, and they are the nation to which the kingdom will be given when it is taken away from the unresponsive tenants (22:43). The repeated promise of his presence among them (11:18; 18:20; 28:20) corresponds to the presence of God among the people of Israel.

Not unexpectedly, therefore, Matthew's Jesus is a more dignified and hieratic figure than Mark's, almost as though he were already the risen Christ. Many of the human touches of emotion found in Mark are missing in Matthew (e.g. Mk 1:43; 3:5). The thronging crowd scenes of the Markan miracles of healing give way to a solemn lone confrontation between the Healer and the beneficiary (cf. Mt 8:14–15 and 9:20–2 with their Markan equivalents). If Jesus worked no miracles at Nazareth because of their unbelief, it was not that he could not (Mk 6:5) but simply that he did not (Mt 13:58).

While in Mark the disciples consistently fail to understand Jesus and his message, in Matthew this is no longer possible (cf. Mk 6:52, 8:21 with Mt 14:33, 16:12). Whereas in Mark Jesus is commonly called ‘teacher’ by friend and foe alike, and ‘Lord’ only by sapient unclean spirits and the cured, in Matthew the disciples address him as ‘Lord’. Only outsiders call him ‘teacher’, and—Judas at the moment of betrayal (26:25, 49)—‘Rabbi’. This dignity of Jesus is naturally expressed by Matthew primarily in terms of the fulfilment of Judaism. He is greater than the temple, Jonah, or Solomon (12:6, 41, 42). He is the son of David (a title used by Mark only twice, by Matthew six more times, and the adoption of Jesus into the House of David is the principal theme of Mt 1). Above all, he is the new Moses, succeeding in the desert where Israel had fallen to the testing (Mt 4:1–11). As the new Israel he is also God’s son, frequently calling God ‘Father’. This unique relationship is mysteriously portrayed in the virginal conception and the comparison to God’s son in Egypt (2:15). It becomes the central assertion of Peter’s two confessions of faith, as the climax of the scene of the walking on the water (14:33) and of the confession of Caesarea Philippi (16:16). Finally it becomes the central object of the ironical mockery of Jesus on the cross (27:40, 43).

3. Luke. It is impossible to discuss the gospel of Luke in isolation from the Acts of the Apostles, with which it shares so many characteristics that few serious scholars have ever disputed the joint authorship of the two volumes. Luke stands out from the other evangelists by his degree of sophistication. This is apparent first of all in his style of writing, on the level both of linguistic and of narrative style. His vocabulary is far more elevated than that of the other evangelists; he uses many compound words, constructions, and grammatical forms (he is the only evangelist to use the optative mood) which are more at home in literary Hellenistic Greek than is the homely language of Matthew and Mark. Luke is familiar with the conventions of Greek historiography: just as in the Acts he uses speeches as a way of conveying editorial comment, so in the gospel he follows the Greek convention of using meals as occasions of teaching (7:36–50; 22:24–38). Two particular points which would have caught the attention of a more sophisticated audience deserve mention: first, both gospel and Acts open with a formal Hellenistic preface (each related to the other), which places the work in the literary category of scientific treatise or monograph (see Acts 1:1–4); it is intended to be a factual, well-ordered account. Secondly, many of the concepts involved would appeal to a Hellenistic audience, for example ‘salvation’, a term familiar to those acquainted with the ‘salvation’ offered by Hellenistic mystery-religions: Luke alone of the gospel-writers (apart from Jn 4:22, 42) uses the term or calls Jesus ‘Saviour’; correspondingly, the beneficiaries of Jesus’ miracles are described as ‘saved’ in a way that suggests that their cures bring more than merely physical salvation (8:36, 50; 17:19).

Luke’s narrative skill is particularly distinctive. His scenes are carefully crafted, often like dramatic scenes with ‘stage-directions’ of entrances and exits and liberal use of direct speech and dialogue, for example the little scenes of the infancy stories in Lk 1–2, or Martha and Mary (10:38–42), the ten lepers (17:11–19) or the journey to Emmaus (24:13–32). Luke’s skill in presenting theology by means of such dramatic scenes is thrown into relief by similar scenes in the Acts, for example the baptism of the Ethiopian (Acts 8:26–40) or Saul’s conversion (Acts 9:1–9). Luke’s characters are colourful and varied; contrast the warm family atmosphere and joy of Luke’s infancy stories with Matthew’s, in which no human being speaks to any other, or the three main characters of Luke’s parable of the prodigal son (15:11–32) with Matthew’s skeletal and wooden characters in the parable of the two sons (Mt 21:28–32). A special feature is Luke’s mixed characters, the blackguard Zacchaeus who makes good (19:1–10), the characters who do the right thing for the wrong reason (the friend at midnight, the crafty steward, the unjust judge).

Luke frequently uses patterns and parallels to convey his message. In the infancy stories the similarity and contrast between John the Baptist and Jesus, and between their parents, is carefully painted. The parallel between the gospel and the Acts shows the continuity between the ministry of Jesus and that of the Spirit (for example, the descent of the Spirit at Jesus’ baptism followed by his programmatic speech at Nazareth is paralleled in the Acts by the descent of the Spirit at Pentecost and Peter’s speech thereafter; the healings worked by the apostles in the power of the Spirit parallel those worked by Jesus himself). The four Beatitudes are balanced by four Woes (6:20–6). Luke is particularly enamoured of lists of four items (6:37–8; 14:12–13; 17:27). The infancy stories are bracketed by balancing scenes in Jerusalem (1:5–22; 2:41–50), and the Jerusalem ministry itself by prophecies about the fate of the city as Jesus reaches and leaves the city (19:41–4; 23:26–31).

The geographical framework, and especially Jerusalem, have marked significance for Luke. This is not unexpected, in view of the importance of journeying in the Acts, the whole of the second half of which is devoted to Paul’s missionary journeys. If the author was indeed a travelling-companion of Paul, journeying was a normal part of his way of life. Many of Luke’s greatest stories occur in the framework of a journey (the journey to Emmaus, the conversion of the Ethiopian and of Saul himself). A major section of the gospel consists of the journey to Jerusalem (9:51–19:27).

In the gospels it is chiefly from Luke that we can glimpse the importance of Jerusalem. At every level it held an important position in Jewish hearts. As the city of David it was the city of God’s promises. As the city of the temple it was the place of God’s presence, the centre of pilgrimage for all Jews. Even by the Gentile Pliny it was described as ‘by far the most distinguished city of the East’ because of Herod’s magnificent construction. For Luke it is the hinge-city of salvation. The gospel begins and ends there, the announcement to Zechariah being located in the temple itself, and the resurrection appearances being confined to Jerusalem and its surroundings. While in Mark and Matthew the prophetic action of Jesus in the temple is construed as a demonstration of the barrenness of Judaism, Luke removes the image of the barren fig-tree of Israel and makes the action a cleansing of the temple, so that Jesus continues to use it ‘daily’ (19:47; 21:37) as his pulpit for teaching. When the chief priests challenge his authority, it is not, as in Mark and Matthew his authority to signal the destruction of the temple, but his authority to use it for teaching (20:1–2). The affection of Jesus himself for the holy city is underlined by the repeated expression of his sadness at its failure to respond and to recognize ‘the way to peace’ (19:42); this marks the mid-point of his final journey up to Jerusalem (13:34–5), and brackets the Jerusalem ministry itself, culminating in the tragic prophetic pronouncement on the way to Calvary (23:28–32). In the Acts Jerusalem is first the birthplace of the church, the home of the ideal community of the followers of Jesus, where they live together in harmony, prayer, and community of goods, and undergo their first persecutions. Then it is the centre from which the message spreads to the ends of the earth (Acts 1:8), to which Paul returns regularly to ensure the unity of the church.

The fate of Israel is for Luke a related preoccupation. The atmosphere of OT piety which pervades the infancy stories, and the deliberate cultivation of biblical language in the style of narration there used, shows that Jesus is born into the bosom of Israel as the fulfilment of God’s promises to Israel, the fulfilment also of their longing for the promised deliverance (1:68–75; 2:25, 38). But Luke, like Paul in Rom 9–11, must also face the problem that Israel largely rejected its Messiah. Luke’s solution is strikingly different from Matthew’s. For all his Jewishness (see E.2), Matthew leaves no doubt that Israel’s rejection of Jesus brings on itself its own rejection. From the beginning there is a sharp contrast between the murderous rejection of Jesus by Herod the Jew and the reverence paid him by the Gentile magi. So to the parable of the wicked tenants Matthew deliberately adds, ‘the kingdom of God will be taken away from you and given to a people who will produce its fruit’ (Mt 21:43). In the parable of the wedding feast the guests originally invited refuse to come, with the result that their city is burnt (Mt 22:7—on the natural level a typical Matthean overreaction). Finally, at the trial before Pilate the people as a whole cry out, ‘Let his blood be on us and on our children’ (27:25). Does Matthew consider them as representatives of the people as a whole, or only of those who reject Jesus?

By contrast Luke insists that at least part of Israel accepted the promised Messiah. He makes a sharp distinction between the people and their leaders. The people are continually favourable to Jesus, and Luke carefully uses for them the word laos, as a technical, biblical term for the people of God (1:10; 3:15; 6:10; 23:27, etc.). At 7:9 where Matthew has ‘In no one in Israel have I found such faith’ Luke reads ‘Not even in Israel . . .’ (my italics), implying the presence of some response in faith among at least a part of Israel. In the final scenes the leaders are hostile to Jesus, stir up the people, and jeer at the crucified Messiah, while the people stand watching and return home beating their breasts, the first sign of turning to discipleship (23:35–48). The same pattern continues in the Acts, where the response of the people is enthusiastic (Acts 2:41, 47; 6:1, 7, etc.), while the authorities are again uniformly and bitterly hostile. Paul does indeed three times solemnly turn from the Jews to the Gentiles with a biblical gesture of rejection (in Asia, Acts 13:46–51; in Greece, 18:6; in Rome, 28:25–8), but in each case only after numbers of the Jews had been drawn to Christianity.

The prophet to Israel is, accordingly, one of the chief ways in which Luke represents Jesus. Like the biblical prophets, Jesus is ‘filled with the Spirit’, ‘led by the Spirit’ (4:1, 14, 18). Indeed, the scene at the Jordan is, in Luke’s case, better described as ‘the descent of the Spirit on the occasion of the baptism’ rather than ‘the baptism of Jesus’. From the beginning the biblical prophetic atmosphere is strong. Zechariah points out the child John as a prophet (1:79), but Jesus will be ‘a light for revelation to the Gentiles and for glory to your people Israel’ (2:32). Jesus already shows his prophetic qualities in dialogue with the teachers in the temple (2:47). In the crucial ‘Nazareth manifesto’ (one of Luke’s most carefully composed historico-theological scenes, see E.3) Jesus likens his mission to that of Elijah and Elisha (4:24–7); like a prophet, he is not accepted in his own country. After the raising of the widow’s son he is publicly hailed as a prophet (7:16). His death at Jerusalem is shown with increasing intensity to be the death of a prophet, firstly by the conversation at the beginning of the journey with the two great prophetic figures of the OT about his exodos at Jerusalem (9:31), secondly by the interpretation of the great journey as a journey of destiny to die as a prophet at Jerusalem (13:33), but most of all by the constant prophetic activity on that journey. On the road to Emmaus the disciples sum up Jesus’ activity as that of a prophet, and he himself acts as a prophet in interpreting the Scriptures. Finally the ascension shows the likeness of Jesus to the prophet Elijah, taken up to heaven in a fiery chariot (2 Kings 2:11).

That Jesus is more than a prophet is shown by Luke in many ways, particularly by his use of the title ‘Son of God’. In Mark this is already used significantly (see E.1, Person of Jesus); Luke enlarges this use, so that it is ‘moving beyond a functional understanding of Jesus’ sonship’ (J. B. Green 1995). The significance of the mysterious conception of the Son of the Most High through the Spirit of God without Mary having sexual intercourse (1:35) is confirmed by Jesus’ saying about really belonging in his Father’s house (2:49). The declaration of the voice at the baptism is given further prominence by the genealogy that follows immediately, linking Jesus ‘son, as it was thought, of Joseph’ directly to Adam ‘son of God’ (3:23, 38). The frequent expressions of intimacy between Jesus and his Father (10:21–2; 22:43) reach their climax in Jesus’ last words of trust on the cross (23:46). They are reinforced by Luke’s stress on Jesus’ constant practice of prayer (5:16), and his being found at prayer at all the decisive moments of his ministry (baptism, choice of the twelve, transfiguration, teaching of the Lord’s prayer, agony in the garden).

Furthermore, Luke’s use of the title kyrios of Jesus with the article (‘the Lord’) hints at a divine status for Jesus, for in contemporary documents the Hebrew and Aramaic equivalents are used of God. Mark uses this title of Jesus only in the vocative (except in the enigmatic Mk 11:3), in which usage it may mean no more than ‘Sir!’ The title is used overwhelmingly by Luke in narrative sections (e.g. 10:1; 11:39; 17:5), so that Fitzmyer (1979: 203), notes, ‘In using kyrios of both Yahweh and Jesus in his writings Luke continues the sense of the title already being used in the early Christian communities, which in some sense regarded Jesus as on a level with Yahweh.’ The same status is also hinted by such passages as 8:39, where the beneficiary of the miracle is told to ‘report all that God has done for you' and in fact 'proclaimed throughout the city all that Jesus had done for him'.

Luke has been described as 'the gospel of the underprivileged' from the emphasis that Luke places on Jesus' invitation to several neglected classes. Foremost among these are women. Luke alone mentions the women who accompany Jesus and minister to him (8:1–3). He habitually pairs women with men as recipients of salvation: Zechariah and Mary (1:11–38, and in their balancing songs of praise, 1:46–55, 68–79), Simeon and Anna (2:22–38), the widow of Zarephath and Naaman (4:26–7), the daughter of Jairus and the son of the widow (7:11–15 and 8:41–56, a double crossover of the sexes), a man searching for a lost sheep and a woman searching for a lost coin (15:4–10). In the same vein, by contrast to Mk 3:31–5, he represents Mary, the mother of Jesus, as the first of the disciples and as their model in her response to God's word (1:38, 46–55; 8:21; 11:27–8).

From the infancy narratives onwards it is clear that Jesus has come to bring comfort to the poor. In Mary's canticle God has 'filled the starving with good things' (1:53). In this Luke echoes the theme, so prominent in the post-exilic writings of Judaism, of God's blessing on the poor and unfortunate who put their trust in him. No house can be found for Jesus to be born in, and he is welcomed by hiring shepherds, themselves inspired by the joyful song of the angels. The text for Jesus' opening proclamation at Nazareth is 'he has anointed me to bring good news to the afflicted' (4:18, quoting Isa 61:1–2). In the Lukan Beatitudes the blessings are not (as in Matthew) on the 'poor in spirit' but on those who are actually 'poor now, hungry now, weeping now' (6:20–1); they concern a social rather than a religious class. This is complemented by Luke's frequent warnings about the dangers of wealth and possessions (the terrible parable of the rich fool, 12:16–21; the excuses of the invited guests, 14:18–19; the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, 16:19–31; Luke's severity towards the rich ruler, 18:18–30). This is all the more striking since Luke's own background and circumstances seem to be reasonably comfortable: his style and language are possibly the most sophisticated of all the NT writers; his images drawn from economics (banking, interest-rates, loans, the sums of money mentioned) bespeak a certain familiarity with finance; in his world the status given by special places at table is important (14:7–14); his anxiety to show that reputable and even high-class persons accepted Christianity, and his horror of shame and humiliation (16:3; 18:5), all suggest a background of middle-class values.

Luke shows Jesus' special care not only for the poor and for women, but also for other classes despised in Judaism, sinners and Gentiles. That Jesus came to call sinners was always at the heart of the gospel, but Luke places additional emphasis on this aspect. Story after story in Luke illustrates Jesus' welcome to sinners and the joy in heaven at repentance: the woman who was a sinner, the lost sheep, the lost coin, the prodigal son, Zacchaeus, the good thief. To be a sinner and to recognize one's state of sinfulness is almost a precondition of being called by Jesus (5:8; 15:2, contrast the spite of the dutiful elder son in 15:25–30 or the arrogance of the observant Pharisee in 18:9–14).

In the gospel of Mark Jesus has contact with Gentiles only in the person of the Syro-Phoenician whose daughter he heals. This contact is seen as exceptional, and the mission of Jesus is limited to his own countrymen. The future mission of the church to the Gentiles is hinted only by the recognition of Jesus as Son of God by the Gentile centurion at the foot of the cross. By contrast to Mark, Luke is concerned, even in the gospel, to show that the good news of Jesus extends also to those beyond Judaism. He is thus preparing for the mission to the world that will take place in his second volume, the Acts. Already Simeon proclaims the child as a 'light to the Gentiles'. In his opening proclamation at Nazareth Jesus announces that he will follow the example of the prophets Elijah and Elisha in bringing his message to those beyond the borders of Israel. This is fulfilled in the cure of the centurion's boy, during which the centurion's merits are warmly praised (7:11–10). Luke's special interest in the salvation of the Gentiles is shown by his rare allegorization of the parable of the great supper (14:16–24): after the messengers have brought in the crippled and beggars of the city (representing the outcasts of the Chosen People), they are sent out a second time into the highways and byways beyond the city, to gather in the Gentiles. A special interest is shown in the Samaritans, the neighbours of Judea to the north, and often especially hated and despised by the Jews. In the parable of the good Samaritan (10:29–37) and the cure of the ten lepers (17:11–19)—both arguably Lukan compositions—the Samaritans are presented mainly in an attractive light which contrasts favourably with Jews.

Running through the whole gospel as an undercurrent is teaching on discipleship. Luke presents Jesus as a model for his disciples. The early followers of Jesus in fact are shown in the Acts to be providing a mirror-image of his preaching, his miracles, his perseverance under persecution, and his witness unto death. Luke stresses the need for constant imitation of Christ. Disciples must take up their cross daily and follow him (9:23), just as Simon of Cyrene carries the cross behind Jesus (23:26). Jesus teaches his disciples to pray in imitation of his own prayer (11:1), and gives the whole scene of the agony in the garden as a lesson in prayer in time of temptation (22:40, 46). Beside the imitation of Jesus, the most striking factor in Luke's teaching on discipleship is that it involves a total reversal of current practice and values. This is in line with Luke's stress on the need for conversion at all levels (3:3, 8). The great journey to Jerusalem and the last supper are for Luke valuable occasions for teaching on discipleship, and it is this instruction that comes back again and again. Disciples must first of all recognize their sinfulness, and then leave not merely their possessions but everything (5:28; 14:33; 18:22). Luke's social world was built on a network of mutual relationships of patron and client, in which patron expected service from client and client protection from patron. In the community of Jesus' disciples there is to be no such quid pro quo. All are to give without hope of return (6:36–8; 12:33–4) and the great are to be servants of all (22:24–7). In this way Luke looks ahead to the life of the Christian community after the resurrection.

5. The Historicity of John. Despite the similarity of tradition behind the Fourth and the Synoptic Gospels, the pattern of John is very different from both a literary and a theological point of view. Gone are the days when it was scholarly orthodoxy to maintain that John was the least reliable of the gospels historically. From Dodd (1955–6) to Dunn (1983; 1991) it has become accepted that John contains sayings that are as primitive as or more primitive than their versions in the synoptic tradition. Similarly John often shows local knowledge superior to that of the Synoptics, especially in the Jerusalem and passion sequences (Siloam, Bethzatha, Kidron, Golgotha). In a number of incidents John seems to be building on parallel historical traditions. Especially in the account of the passion his alternatives to the agony in the garden (Jn 12:27–9) and the meeting of the Jewish authorities (11:47–53) are serious rivals.

The Composition of John. From a literary point of view the Synoptic Gospels are composed, as it has been classically described, like beads on a string, from short, independent episodes and sayings joined together by the several evangelists to form a pattern. The fourth gospel has fewer, longer incidents and far fewer isolated sayings. Both miracles and sayings tend to be prolonged into dialogues and often monologues which bring out the meaning of these signs. Thus the healing of the sick man at the Pool of Bethzatha develops first into a series of dialogues about the miracle and then into a monologue by Jesus on judgement (5:1–9, 10–18, 19–47 respectively).

John's Christology. With this is allied the greatest difference of all: in the Synoptic Gospels the subject of revelation is the kingship or reign of God, of which Jesus is the messenger. In John the primary object of revelation is Jesus himself and his glory, or rather the revelation of God's glory in him, climaxing in the hour of the exaltation and glorification of Jesus, the cross and resurrection. The crucifixion is no longer a shameful humiliation which has to be explained as the will of God expressed in Scripture; it is a royal progress which enables the divinity of Jesus to shine through, and leaves Jesus reigning from the cross until he himself triumphantly signifies that all is fulfilled.

Nevertheless, it is a secret Jesus who is being revealed, and the theme of seeking Jesus runs through the gospel from 1:38 'What do you seek?' to 20:15 'Whom do you seek?' One feature of this is the series of puzzled questions by which the dialogues are advanced (e.g. 3:4, 9; 4:9, 11, 29, 33; 6:9, 28, 42, 52, etc.). Another is the irony that runs through the gospel. This is principally in the mouth of the opponents of Jesus, who make exaggerated and self-important claims about their knowledge, just where they are most ignorant (4:12, 7, 27; 8:41, 47). Such irony becomes all-embracing in such incidents as the cure of the man born blind, when the Pharisees think they see but in fact are blind, and by their insistent refusal to accept the evidence gradually nudge the cured man towards full faith in Jesus; and the incident of the trial before Pilate, when in fact Jesus presides over the self-condemnation of those who think they are condemning him. But the disciples too can be ironical, often through bewilderment and overconfidence (1:46; 11:16; 16:29), as can Jesus himself, often with unanswered questions (3:10; 7:23, 28; 10:32). Double entendre is fundamental to all John's language. Just as Nicodemus quite legitimately misunderstands the Greek anōthen as 'again' when Jesus means 'from above' (3:3–7), so also the Son of Man 'lifted up' (3:14; 8:28; 12:32–4) means on one level 'lifted onto the cross' but on another level has a far more profound sense. At the same time it is a striking feature of John's language that he thinks in a series of contrasts—'John has dualism in his bones', writes Ashton (1991: 237)—expressed in the bipolarity of life and death, truth and falsehood, slavery and freedom, light and darkness, worldly and heavenly, openly and in secret, and other countless little contrasts.

John's portrait of Jesus can at last be described as 'incarnational', for this gospel both contains the two unambiguous assertions in the gospels of the divinity of Jesus, bracketing and so setting the tone for the whole gospel, 'the Word was God' (1:1) and 'My Lord and my God!' (20:28), and shows a Jesus subject to human exhaustion (4:6), loneliness (6:67), grief for a friend (11:35), and shrinking from death (12:27). What this means is shown principally in two ways. The first is more obviously dependent on Judaism. In the prologue the Word is shown to be the culmination and fulfilment of the tradition of a personified, life-giving Wisdom, who is both God at work in the world and yet not simply identical with God. The Word is also the culmination of the revelation of God, greater than that made to Moses (1:17), explicable only as the revelation of the awesome glory of God (Ex 33:17–23; Isa 6:1–5). This revelation takes place throughout the ministry of Jesus, but reaches its climax in the exaltation or glorification of the cross (8:28; 12:32–4; 13:32; 14:13).

The Johannine Jesus also takes over for himself the allusive divine title of Deutero-Isaiah, 'I am he'. This is used both absolutely and with a predicate. Used absolutely it is a self-identification, with scarcely veiled divine overtones. Thanks to the ambiguity of Johannine language it is impossible to exclude this awesome connotation when Jesus comes walking on the water (6:20), and it is certainly intended when the detachment, arriving to arrest Jesus, reacts to it by falling to the ground (18:5–8—the biblical reaction to the divine). It is so understood even more obviously by the Jews in 5:28, 58. Used as a predicate it attributes to Jesus awesome manifestations of the divine from within Judaism, which reach their full reality in him, 'I am the bread of life' (6:35), 'the light of the world' (8:12), 'the good shepherd' (10:11), 'resurrection and life' (11:25), 'the true vine' (15:1).

The second way in which the divine quality of Jesus is shown is by his relationship to the Father. The title 'Son of Man' is used frequently by Jesus in all the gospels, the simple title 'the Son', however, only on three occasions in the Synoptics but 20 times by the Johannine Jesus, denoting a close and simple relationship to the Father. There is an intimacy in this language that has no parallel elsewhere. The Son is sent by the Father—'the Father, the one who sent me' is a formula that occurs 21 times in John—and the relationship has been analysed in terms of the Jewish institution of the shālīḥ, an envoy sent out with the same powers as his principal to do the same work, to receive the same honour and to report back to the principal. Whereas the modern, Hellenized mind may define equality in the static terms of being, the Semitic mind, nowhere more clearly than Jn 5:19–30, defines the relationship in the dynamic terms of equality of action and authority, unity of purpose and of honour received. The central importance of this revelation of Jesus determines many other orientations of the gospel.

In John the ethical requirements of the Kingdom, so fully set out in the teaching sections of Matthew and Luke (the Sermon on the Mount and on the Plain, etc.), become simplified into the basic requirement of belief in Jesus 'that you may have life in his name' (12:44–50; 20:31). The only response demand is love (17:36), an echo of the love that is shared by the Father and the Son, reaches its climax on the cross, and is granted also by Jesus to his followers (13:1; 14:21–31; 17:23–4). The poor, so prominent especially in Luke, are barely mentioned. Indeed there is little of the Galilean peasant feel about this gospel: the action is more frequently in Jerusalem, and many of the people encountered (Nicodemus, the royal official at Capernaum) have a certain grandeur.

Eschatology. The perspective on the future is different. In the Synoptic Gospels there is a constant tension between the present and the future: the kingship of God is in some ways already a present reality, and yet it is still to be brought to reality in the future. There is a vivid expectation of the coming of the kingship in power when the Son of Man comes in his glory with the holy angels (Mk 9:1; 14:25, 62; Mt 24:30–1; 25:31). In John the concept of the kingship of God has virtually vanished—it is mentioned only Jn 3:3, 5—and has been replaced by that of 'eternal life' which is a present reality in Jesus (1:4; 6:35, 63; 11:25) already possessed by believers (5:24; 6:47; 10:28). Since the perspective of the gospel is already resurrectional, Jesus can say already 'the hour is coming and now is when true worshippers will worship the Father in spirit and in truth' (4:23), or 'when the dead will hear the voice of the Son of God' (5:25). This perspective of John has classically been designated 'realized eschatology'. This is not to say that all expectation of the future has vanished, for those who have done good will still 'come forth to the resurrection of life' (5:29). But the decisive moment has already come in the 'hour' of Jesus which reaches its climax in the death and resurrection of Jesus.

Judgement. As far as the individual is concerned one is reminded that throughout the gospel the decisive moment is that of encounter with Jesus. Judgement is not, as in the Synoptics, a 'day of the Lord' in the future, rather the coming of Jesus is a moment of krisis or judgement, and the whole gospel is in a sense a great judgement-scene. To 'judge' or 'condemn' (the same word in Gk.) occurs 4 times in Matthew, 5 times in Luke, 19 times in John. The Father has given all judgement to the Son (5:22) but it is not the Son who executes judgement; rather each individual exercises judgement by a personal reaction of faith or unbelief in Jesus (3:17–18). Thus the gospel represents a series of judgements: the disciples at Cana believe and see his glory; 'the Jews' refuse belief at the cleansing of the temple; Nicodemus shows goodwill but not yet belief, and so on until finally 'the Jews' tragically judge themselves before Pilate by rejecting God as king: 'we have no king but Caesar' (19:15)—if God is not king, then Judaism has no reason to exist. Forensic terminology is ubiquitous in the gospel: 'to bear witness' (once each in Matthew and Luke, 32 times in John), 'witness' (Mark thrice and Luke once, both at Jesus' trial, but 15 times in John). The witnesses to Jesus are the Baptist, Moses, his works, the crowds, the Paraclete, and above all his Father. Supporting these are terms like 'testimony', 'accuse', 'condemnation'.

John and Judaism. The side-lining of Judaism comes to expression in the way Jesus in his own person, one after another, supersedes the institutions of Judaism. Already at Cana Jesus provides the wine of the marriage-feast to replace the water of the law. Immediately afterwards his own body is seen to replace the temple (2:21). In 5:1–18 he takes possession of the sabbath, claiming that as God has the right to work on the sabbath, so has he. At the Feast of Tabernacles, Jesus claims to provide the living water which was such an important feature of the feast, symbolizing the blessings of the messianic age (7:37–9). In giving sight to the blind and claiming to be the light of the world (8:12, cf. 1:9; 3:19–21; 12:35, 36, 46) he again usurps the function of the law. Finally his death, at the time of the slaughter of the paschal lambs (19:24), replaces the pass-over sacrifice. But there is more to John's treatment of Judaism than this. Although at some levels of the gospel it can be acknowledged that 'salvation is from the Jews' (4:22, presumably in the sense of origin), on the whole the term is used to distinguish rites and festivals from the Christian way (2:6, 'the Jewish rites of purification'; 11:55, 'the Passover of the Jews'; 7:2, 'the Jewish festival of Booths'). More hostilely it designates those who will not accept Jesus and are responsible for his death, replacing in this respect not only the Pharisees and the authorities of the Synoptic Gospels, but also the crowds of Jerusalem. Significant of the evangelist's own attitude may be 9:18–23, where 'the Jews' is used as a term for those designated in what may have been an earlier version of the story as 'the Pharisees', and attempts have been made to show that 'the Jews' is used in this hostile sense only in one layer of the gospel (von Wahlde 1989). The fear of the blind man's parents that they will be 'put out of the synagogue' for confessing Jesus may well reflect the hostility between Judaism and Christianity towards the end of the century. In the farewell discourses (perhaps representing a different layer) the same opponents seem to be designated by 'the world' (which can elsewhere be used in a positive sense, 1:9; 3:16–19; 12:46), but their identity is made clear by the phrase 'their law' (15:25) and the similar threat to put you 'out of the synagogue', 16:2.

The Spirit in John. The centrality of Jesus is not compromised but rather enhanced by the importance of the Spirit. There is a sense throughout the gospel that the Spirit is necessary to complete the work of Jesus. The descent of the Spirit at the baptism will enable Jesus to baptize in the Spirit, which is represented to Nicodemus as the means to rebirth and life (3:5–8). The Samaritan woman is taught that worship in the Spirit is the sole true worship (4:23–4). In the bread of life discourse the Spirit is the means of life (6:13). But the Spirit will not be given until after Jesus has been glorified (7:39), and the sense that all these passages envisage the life of the future community is strengthened by the dual reference during Jesus' 'hour'. On the cross his final act is 'he bowed his head and handed over [my tr.] the Spirit' (19:30—is it to this that the climactic 'It is completed' refers?). The purpose of the first resurrectional appearance to the disciples is expressed as 'Receive the Holy Spirit' (20:22). The role and function of the Spirit are made clear principally in the five Paraclete or Counsellor sayings in the farewell discourses, when Jesus is laying out the future constitution of his community (14:15–17, 25–6; 15:16; 16:7–11, 13–15, see Jn 14:16–17). It is to continue and further the presence and work of Jesus after his departure.

Sections F–K give six trial pericopes in which the theological outlook of the different evangelists may be seen, and the arguments in favour of the different solutions to the synoptic problem assessed. Apart from section 1, different pericopes have been chosen than those discussed by Sanders and Davies (1989).

In these examples I frequently use my own translation, in order to reflect more exactly the detailed similarities and differences between the Greek texts of the several gospels.

F. 1. The Call of the First Disciples (Mt 4:18–22 || Mk 1:16–20 || Lk 5:1–11, cf. Jn 1:35–50)

Mt 4:18–22

¹⁸As he walked by the sea of Galilee, he saw two brothers, Simon, who is called Peter and Andrew his brother, casting a net into the sea, for they were fishermen. ¹⁹And he said to them, 'Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men.' ²⁰Immediately they left their nets and followed him. ²¹And going on from there he saw two other brothers, James son of Zebedee and John his brother, in the boat with Zebedee their father, mending their nets, and he called them. ²²But they immediately left the boat and their father and followed him.

Mk 1:16–20

¹⁶And passing along by the sea of Galilee, he saw Simon and Andrew the brother of Simon casting a net into the sea, for they were fishermen. ¹⁷And Jesus said to them, 'Follow me and I will make you become fishers of men.' ¹⁸And immediately they left their nets and followed him. ¹⁹As going on a little he saw James son of Zebedee and John his brother, who were in the boat mending their nets, ²⁰and immediately he called them, and they left their father Zebedee in the boat with the hired men and followed him.

Lk 5:1–11

¹Once while Jesus was standing beside the lake of Gennesaret, and the crowd was pressing in on him to hear the word of God, ²he saw two boats there at the shore of the lake; the fishermen had gone out of them and were washing their nets. ³He got into one of the boats, the one belonging to Simon, and asked him to put out a little way from the shore. Then he sat down and taught the crowds from the boat. ⁴When he had finished speaking, he said to Simon, 'Put out into the deep water and let down your nets for a catch.' ⁵Simon answered, 'Master, we have worked all night long but have caught nothing. Yet if you say so, I will let down the nets.' ⁶When they had done this, they caught so many fish that their nets were beginning to break. ⁷So they signalled to their partners in the other boat to come and help them. And they came and filled both boats, so that they began to sink. ⁸But when Simon Peter saw it, he fell down at Jesus' knees, saying, 'Go away from me, Lord, for I am a sinful man!' ⁹For he and all who were with him were amazed at the catch of fish that they had taken; ¹⁰and so also were James and John, sons of Zebedee, who were partners with Simon. Then Jesus said to Simon, 'Do not be afraid; from now on you will be catching people.' ¹¹When they had brought their boats to shore, they left everything and followed him.

According to three of the four gospels the first action of Jesus in his ministry is to gather a group of disciples, thus already forming his community. Through the number of the twelve corresponding to the twelve tribes of Israel, they will constitute his new Israel. The accounts of Mark and Matthew are closely related. Luke postpones the first call of disciples. He keeps it geographically similar, but integrates it into a tradition placed by Jn 21 after the resurrection. John himself attaches the call of the first disciples to the ministry of the Baptist, thus implying a location by the Jordan.

2. In Mark's account the stories of the call of the two pairs of disciples are closely similar to each other. The style of the whole incident is significantly Markan and shows that Mark's is the original account: the Markan phrase 'and immediately' occurs in vv. 18, 20; Mark's introductory 'and' + participle occurs in vv. 16, 18, 19, 20b; the duplication of 'Simon and Simon's brother' in v. 16 is typical of Mark's oral style.

By contrast to many biblical calls by the Lord, which begin with some such double vocative and answer as 'Abraham, Abraham!'—'Here I am!', the call of each pair is modelled on the call of Elisha by Elijah in 1 Kings 19:19–21:

1. The prophet sees the disciple, son of X.
2. The disciple was working at his trade.
3. The prophet calls him.
4. The disciple leaves his trade and family and follows.

The call of the second pair is perhaps marginally more closely modelled on Elisha's call. The second pair leave their father without hesitation, in deliberate contrast to Elisha, who asks permission to take leave of his father. On the other hand, the first pair's desertion of their nets, their means of livelihood, links to Elisha's destruction of his yoke and oxen. Each of these factors underlines the immediacy of their response to the uncompromising call. Even if some preparation for or explanation of the call occurred in fact, Mark deliberately omits any mention of it, and thereby lays more stress on the astounding authority of Jesus. Two other slight touches in the call of the second pair also relate to Elisha's call: 'and they in the boat' (v. 10) corresponds to 'and he with the twelfth' (1 Kings 19:19). The final 'followed behind him' also echoes 1 Kings 19:20. If the call of the second pair is the original narrative, the call of the first pair is inserted before it because it is fitting that Simon should be called first of all. It is also to the first pair that the function to 'fish for people' is given; they are not only disciples but also apostles.

3. Matthew follows Mark's account very closely, with only minor adjustments, mostly literary. Matthew is a careful teacher, even sometimes pedantic. He superfluously (perhaps fussily) inserts the mention that both pairs were two brothers. With similar meticulousness he tells us, before they leave him, that Zebedee was present, whereas in Mark their leaving Zebedee is the first indication of his presence on the scene. Matthew also adds two theological clarifications. First he explains that Simon 'is called Peter'. Consonantly with his concern for the community throughout his gospel, Matthew draws attention right from the start to the office which will be his (Mt 16:16–19). He frequently stresses Peter's prominence, especially by use of this title, though significantly he omits it when Peter fails his Master in Gethsemane (Mk 14:37)! Secondly Matthew mentions explicitly that the second pair leave the boat as well as their father, perhaps to suggest their total renunciation.

4. The Lukan narrative is basically quite different: it concerns primarily Simon Peter and his apostolate. It is perhaps for this reason that Luke transfers the call till later, when they have already witnessed some of Jesus' teaching and miracles. Simon's partners remain faceless until the last two verses, when their names are awkwardly tacked on with 'and so also were...'; it is really a bit late to tell us that the sons of Zebedee were his partners when we have already known about his partners for some time!

Some relationship of the story in Lk 5:1–11 to Jn 21 is undeniable, perhaps at the oral level: there is the night-long unsuccessful toil, the word of Jesus leading to the almost breaking net, and finally the authorization of Peter. It is difficult to be sure which was the original setting of the story. Simon's humble confession of his sinfulness fits Jn 21 better, after his triple denial at the time of the passion. Perhaps also the suggestions of the divine ('Lord', 'Do not be afraid') fit better a resurrection setting, though they do not demand it. Much the same reaction occurs when the disciples see Jesus walking on the water, see J.1. Two typical Lukan touches are the insistence that Peter must confess his sins before he is called to be a disciple (as Zacchaeus repents, and as is stressed in the mass conversions of Acts. Secondly, when they accept the call they leave 'everything', a total renunciation often stressed by Luke (14:33): Levi at his call leaves all (5:28), and the very rich young ruler is advised to sell everything he has (18:23).

5. John's account of the call of the first disciples is significantly different:

(a) Again there are two pairs of disciples, to the first pair of whom Simon Peter is attached. The identity of the first disciples is, however, different. The first pair consists of Andrew and an anonymous disciple, the second of Philip and Nathanael. There is no explicit sign of the sons of Zebedee, who feature in Mark's and Matthew's accounts.

(b) The location is different. For the first three disciples there is no suggestion of the Lake of Galilee, though Jn 1:44 does note that Philip, Andrew, and Simon were 'from Bethsaida' on the shore of the lake, and the call of Philip and Nathanael takes place after Jesus' decision to go to Galilee (Jn 1:43). The association of the first pair with the Baptist and his activity 'in Bethany across the Jordan' (Jn 1:18) suggests a fair distance from the Markan location at the north end of the lake. This suggests that the rapid succession of days ('the next day' in Jn 1:29, 35, 43) may be an artificial schema, uniting disparate material to form a first week of Jesus' ministry (see Jn 1:29–31).

(c) The theological emphasis is different. Instead of the magisterial call by Jesus the keynote of the first meeting is on the initiative of the disciples themselves in seeking and finding Jesus as teacher, Messiah, king of Israel, and Son of God. To this search Jesus responds by inviting the disciples to stay with him (1:38–9). On the second occasion the initiative lies with Philip, who leads Nathanael to Jesus.

(d) Simon is the third, not the first to become a disciple. However, his special position is indicated by Jesus' imposition of a name, Peter, described much later by Mt 16:16–18.

5. The most interesting feature of all is that the first two disciples are nudged towards Jesus by John the Baptist. Especially since the discovery of the Qumran literature it has been suggested that Jesus himself was originally a disciple of John, and this strengthens the link between them.

G. The Beatitudes (Mt 5:3–12; Lk 6:20–3, 24–6)

Mt 5:3–12

³ Blessed are the poor in spirit,
for theirs is the kingdom of heaven,

⁴ Blessed are those who mourn, for they will be comforted.

⁵ Blessed are the meek, for they will inherit the earth.

Lk 6:20–6

²⁰ Blessed are you who are poor, for yours is the kingdom of God.

⁶ Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they will be filled

⁷ Blessed are the merciful, for they will receive mercy.

⁸ Blessed are the pure in heart, for they will see God.

⁹ Blessed are the peacemakers, for they will be called children of God.

¹⁰ Blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake,
for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

¹¹ Blessed are you when people revile you and persecute you and utter all kinds of evil against you falsely on my account.

¹² Rejoice and be glad for your reward is great in heaven, for thus they persecuted the prophets before you.

²¹ Blessed are you who are hungry now, for you will be filled.

Blessed are you who weep now,
for you will laugh.

²² Blessed are you when people hate you, and when they exclude you, revile you and defame you on account of the son of man.

²³ Rejoice in that day and leap for joy, for surely your reward is great in heaven, for that is what their ancestors did to the prophets.

²⁴ But woe to you who are rich, for you have received your consolation.

²⁵ Woe to you who are full now, for you will be hungry.

Woe to you who are laughing now,
for you will mourn and weep.

²⁶ Woe to you when all speak well of you,
for that is what their ancestors did to the false prophets.

The form of a beatitude, announcement of a blessing on certain classes of people, is common in the Bible (see MT 5:3–12) and frequently occurs in such groups as the present collections. It is perhaps to be noted that collections of eight occur also in Sir 14:20–7 (with a ninth added as an explanation, just as the ninth in Mt 5:11 provides a transition to the rest of the Sermon on the Mount). In both Matthew and Luke there are clear eschatological overtones, dependent on Isa 61:1. This text is used elsewhere by both evangelists, especially in Mt 11:5–6; Lk 4:17–21; 7:22–3. The same eschatological fulfilment of Isa 61:1 featured prominently in the messianic expectation of the Qumran community, 11QMelch 16–18 and 4Q521.

The source of the beatitudes has been much debated. Matthew has eight as opposed to Luke's four beatitudes, but Luke has four 'woes' corresponding to his four beatitudes. It has become scholarly orthodoxy to hold that at least the material shared by the two evangelists is drawn from Q, though perhaps from slightly different versions of Q. For many this seems the most important test-case of all. In many of the cases the arguments are evenly balanced, so that it must be admitted that several explanations are possible, though one explanation may be much more appealing than another, and make better sense. If it is possible to show that Matthew's beatitudes form such a carefully composed and engineered whole that they cannot constitute an edition of any previous document, the existence of a Q for this pericope is not merely less likely, but is positively excluded.

If both Matthew and Luke are dependent on Q, Matthew has expanded the original four beatitudes and Luke has added the four 'woes'. In favour of this position it is obvious that Matthew is more interested in the spiritual dispositions demanded (Matthew has 'in spirit', 5:1) and brackets the whole with his characteristic 'kingdom of heaven' (vv. 3, 10), instead of the more commonly found expression 'kingdom of God' used by Luke. On the other hand the 'woes' show clear linguistic signs of Lukan editing in the repeated 'now' and other features which disappear in translation (oi anthrōpoi, kata ta auta), as well as the more obvious Lukan interest in the real poor and hungry, characteristic of his general concern for outcasts, and his repeated warnings of the dangers of wealth and comfort.

It has been suggested that a document underlies them both, to which Luke is the closer (Tuckett 1983). In order to exclude the possibility of Luke being dependent on Matthew, Tuckett considers two alternatives, either that Luke uses Matthew only or that he uses Matthew and another source (for the 'woes'). The parallelism between the woes and the beatitudes is so close that these woes could have had no independent existence, which excludes the latter alternative. The former alternative is excluded—according to Tuckett—by the Lukan use of the word 'laugh' (Lk 6:21, 25) which does not occur in Matthew's beatitudes and is not a Lukan word, so must be derived from another, non-Matthean source. To this Goulder replies by refusing to attribute to a source all words used only once by Luke. On the contrary, Luke has a large and inventive vocabulary, and in the section Lk 4:31–6:19 (where he is overwriting Mark) among the 606 non-Markan words, 13 are not used elsewhere by Luke. In any case 'laugh' is a reasonably common word, and is introduced by Luke as an exact contrast to 'weep', as in Eccl 3:4. That 'weep' in Lk 6:21 is a Lukan version of Matthew's 'mourn' is clear from the clumsiness with which Luke feels compelled to retain both words in v. 25. Thus Luke's version can, after all, be explained on the basis of Matthew's.

Matthew's beatitudes form a coherent whole which must have been composed at one draft in Greek (Puéch 1993). The question is whether this composition can be a Matthean elaboration of Q. The careful structure of the composition is unmistakable, the principal points being:

1. It is bracketed at beginning and end by the identical phrase 'for theirs is the kingdom of heaven'.
2. The word-count of the four pairs of beatitudes is symmetrical: 20-16-16-20. This must be deliberate, for it is achieved not without difficulty; for example the word-count must have dictated the inclusion of the definite article with 'righteousness' in v. 6, and its omission in the corresponding v. 10.
3. In the first four beatitudes those blessed all begin (in Greek) with the letter 'p'.
4. The blessings correspond symmetrically: 1 and 8 'for theirs is the kingdom of heaven'; 2 and 7 use the same Greek word klēthēsontai; 3 and 6 future active, 'will inherit', 'will see'; 4 and 5 future passive, 'will be filled', 'will be pitied'.

Such careful structure with exact word-count is characteristic of beatitude-collections, as is seen in the Hebrew collections of Sir 14:20-7 and 1QH 6.13-16 and 4Q525. Other features such as the eschatological overtones, the extra, final, transitional beatitude, biblical and Qumranic phrases such as 'poor in spirit' (cf. 1QH 6.14; 1QM 14.7; 4Q491.8-10) show that Matthew's composition fits exactly into a familiar pattern. It is difficult to accept that Matthew could have elaborated this complicated structure on the basis of any existing document that also served as a basis for Luke's beatitudes. It would also be a strange coincidence that both these writers should have independently chosen the beatitudes to head their great sermons. Luke's beatitudes and woes may therefore be explained as Luke's own edition of Matthew, rather than as similarly derived from Q. In outline the process would have been: if Luke is dependent on Matthew, it must be held that he cut the eight to four, a favourite number of his, omitting elements concerned with spiritual dispositions ('the meek') because he wished to concentrate on the aspect of discipleship and its demands, the Christian vocation to poverty and persecution. Luke elsewhere stresses that disciples must leave 'all', so that they are bound to be poor and destitute. Luke likes polar oppositions, so sharpened the reversal of situations to 'hungry' and 'filled', 'weeping' and 'laughing', in place of Matthew's 'hunger and thirst for justice' and his 'merciful' and 'receive mercy'.

The woes do show significant echoes of Matthew, despite being verbally unmistakably Lukan (plen = 'but', Lk 6.24, used by Matthew 5 times, Mark once, Luke 15 times, and Acts 14 times; 'woe to' with dative plural, none in Matthew or Mark, 5 times in Luke; 'rich', 3 times in Matthew, twice in Mark, 10 times in Luke; pleonastic 'all', as Lk 6:26, frequent in Luke). The form of a series of threatened woes could be taken from Mt 23. But whereas Matthew reserves the contrast with the beatitudes of the Sermon on the Mount until his final discourse, Luke makes the contrast more immediate. There are other traces of dependence of Luke on Matthew in the beatitudes. Lk 6:21 substitutes 'weep' for Matthew's 'mourn', but in the woes Lk 6:25 includes both verbs. Similarly in Lk 6:26 'speak well' corresponds to Mt 5:11 'speak evil' rather than to Lk 6:22 'revile'. Luke's formula in the second person plural (Matthew's eight beatitudes are in the third person) is less consonant with the background formula than Matthew's. It is, however, typical of Luke's immediacy of style (as Lk 6:2; 7:34 compared with their parallels).

In this instance, therefore, it is possible to argue either way, and the solution of the problem must be dependent on the overall solution of the synoptic problem.

H. 1. The Second Sign at Cana or Capernaum (Mt 8:5-13; Lk 7:1-10; Jn 4:46-53)

Mt 8:5-13

⁵When he entered Capernaum, a centurion came to him appealing to him ⁶and saying, 'Lord, my servant is lying at home paralyzed, in terrible distress.'

⁷And he said to him, 'I will come and cure him.'
the centurion answered, 'Lord, I am not worthy to have you come under my roof;

but only speak

Lk 7:1-10

¹After Jesus had finished all his sayings in the hearing of the people, he entered Capernaum. ²A centurion there had a slave whom he valued highly, and who was ill and close to death.

³When he heard about Jesus, he sent some Jewish elders to him, asking him to heal his slave. ⁴When they came to Jesus, they appealed to him earnestly, saying, 'He is worthy to have you do this for him, ⁵for he loves our people, and it is he who built our synagogue for us'

⁶And Jesus went with them, but when he was not far from the house, the centurion sent friends to say to him, 'Lord, I am not worthy to have you come under my roof; ⁷therefore I did not presume to come to you. But only speak

Jn 4:46-53

⁴⁶Then he came again to Cana in Galilee where he had changed the water into wine. Now there was a royal official whose son lay ill in Capernaum.

⁴⁷When he heard that Jesus had come from Judea to Galilee, he went and begged him to come down and heal his son, for he was on the point of death. ⁴⁸Then Jesus said to him, 'Unless you see signs and wonders you will not believe.' ⁴⁹The official said to him, 'Sir, come down before my little boy dies.' ⁵⁰Jesus said to him, 'Go, your son will live.' The man believed the word that Jesus spoke to him and started on his way.

the word, and my servant will be healed. ⁹For I also am a man under authority, with soldiers under me, and I say to one, "Go", and he goes, and to another, "Come", and he comes, and to my slave, "Do this", and the slave does it.' ¹⁰When Jesus heard him, he was amazed and said to those who followed him, 'Truly I tell you in no one in Israel have I found such faith.'

¹¹ I tell you, many will come from east and west and will eat with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, ¹² while the heirs of the kingdom will be thrown into the outer darkness, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'

¹³ And to the centurion Jesus said, 'Go, let it be done for you according to your faith.' And the servant was healed in that hour.

the word, and my servant will be healed. ⁸For I also am a man under authority, with soldiers under me; and I say to one, "Go", and he goes, and to another, "Come", and he comes, and to my slave, "Do this", and the slave does it.' ⁹When Jesus heard this, he was amazed at him, and turning to the crowd that followed him, 'I tell you not even in Israel have I found such faith.'

Lk 13:28–29 ²⁸ There will be weeping and gnashing of teeth when you see Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and all the prophets in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrown out. ²⁹ Then people will come from east and west, from north and south, and will eat in the kingdom of God.

¹⁰ When those who had been sent returned to the house, they found the slave in good health.

⁵¹ As he was going down, his slaves met him and told him that his child was alive. ⁵² So he asked them the hour when he began to recover, and they said to him, 'Yesterday at one in the afternoon the fever left him.' ⁵³ The father realized that this was the hour when Jesus had said to him, 'Your son will live.' So he himself believed, along with his whole household.

The relationship between the three accounts of the miraculous cure of the official's boy at Capernaum poses unusual problems. It is the only healing story shared by John and the Synoptic Gospels, and the only miracle story in the material normally assigned to Q (i.e. double tradition of Matthew and Luke without Mark). There are also unmistakable similarities with two other stories, one the story of the Syro-Phoenician woman's daughter (similarly healed at a distance) and the other a miracle-story about Rabbi Hanina ben Dosa.

2. First the link with the Markan tradition of the cure of the Syro-Phoenician's daughter (Mk 7:25–30 || Mt 15:22–8) should be outlined:

1. In each gospel this is the only miracle worked for a Gentile.
2. The parent comes to Jesus asking for the healing.
3. The dialogue between Jesus and the suppliant is reported.
4. The faith of the Gentile is contrasted with that of the Jews.
5. Jesus praises the parent's faith.
6. The cure is effected at a distance.

Such detailed similarity cannot be wholly coincidental. One explanation is that there was an outline story in the oral tradition which took on the two or three slightly different forms in the tradition expressed by Mark, Matthew/Luke, and John.

Hanina ben Dosa was a well-known rabbi in Palestine in the generation after Jesus. Of him several wonders are related, among them this story:

Once Rabban Gamliel's son fell ill. He sent two learned men to R. Hanina ben Dosa to beg God's mercy for him. R. Hanina saw them coming and went to an upstairs room and asked God's mercy for the boy. When he came down he said to them, 'Go! The fever has left him.' They asked him, 'Are you a prophet?' He replied, 'I am not a prophet or the son of a prophet. But this I have received from tradition: if my prayer of intercession flows unhesitatingly from my mouth, I know it will be answered; if not, I know it will be rejected.' They sat down and wrote and noted the exact moment at which he said this. When they got back to Rabban Gamliel he said to them, 'By the Temple Service, you are neither too early nor too late but this is what happened: in that moment the fever left him and he asked for water.'

This story teaches the lesson that R. Hanina, though not a prophet (despite the allusions to 1 Kings 17:19; Am 7:14), had the healing gift and intercessory power of a prophet. It shares with the gospel story the following elements:

1. Cure of a child at a distance.
2. Messengers sent by the father to ask for divine help.
3. Stress on simultaneity of the statement and the cure.

The story of R. Hanina also has the added wonder that he goes to pray without needing to be told. In the Jesus story his prophetic quality is not stressed—as it is stressed in Jesus' similar healing of the widow of Nain's son (Lk 7:16). Emphasis falls on the faith of the recipient rather than on the charisma of the miracle-worker.

3. In the Matthew–Luke story of the Capernaum cure there are significant differences between the two evangelists. Firstly, Matthew has assimilated the Capernaum story to that of the Syro-Phoenician, including in each three features which are not in the Markan version of the Syro-Phoenician cure:

1. The sick child's parent comes to Jesus, asking for the cure in direct speech, to which Jesus replies.
2. The longer speech by the suppliant, the full expression of faith that earns the cure, is therefore the suppliant's second statement.
3. Jesus' final statement to the suppliant, and the announcement of the cure, are almost identical in the two cases: 8:13: "Let it be done for you as your faith demands". And the servant was cured at that moment'; 15:28: "Let it be done for you as you desire." And her daughter was cured from that moment'.

On the whole Matthew shortens rather than lengthens Mark's miracle-stories. The purpose of each of these additions is to underline the faith of the suppliant and its reward. But Matthew's most significant addition to the centurion story is of 8:11–12, Jesus' saying that points the contrast between the faith of the Gentile and the disbelief of Israel; this is full of Matthean expressions and vocabulary. Such a contrast is stressed often by Matthew (the magi contrasting with Herod, 2:1–17; the vineyard taken from its custodians and given to others, 21:43; the guests at the marriage feast, 22:1–10).

4. The absence from Luke's version both of this couplet, and of all the Matthean assimilations of this story to the cure of the Canaanite girl, has frequently been used as an argument that Luke presents the more primitive version: he follows the order and content of Q, which has been changed by Matthew. But traces of Lukan editing are also clear. Most recently Franklin (1994: 283), says, 'It is hard to see how the creative hand of Luke could be denied at this point.' Luke likes to show that the history and miracles of the early church continue and mirror those of Jesus. So he assimilates this centurion to the centurion of Ac 10, who

1. is the first Gentile in the book to come to the faith;
2. sends messengers to Peter, as this centurion to Jesus;
3. is similarly praised by the messengers as helpful to the Jewish nation.

In order to prevent the centurion actually meeting Jesus (which would make the first embassy rather pointless) Luke is compelled awkwardly to put his speech of unworthiness (7:6–8), with all its circumstantial detail, into the mouths of the second set of envoys. The emphasis on his own unworthiness (in Luke it comes twice, by contrast to Matthew's once) compares to Simon Peter's protestations of sinfulness in Lk 5:8 and those of Zacchaeus in Lk 19:8. Luke always insists that at least some in Israel were converted (several groups are converted during the crucifixion, a large number at Pentecost, and some in each of the towns visited by Paul). So here Luke avoids the sharp contrast between Gentile and Jew seen in Matthew. If, as in the Goulder theory, Luke is dependent on Matthew, he alters Jesus' statement by the change of two letters, 'in no one in Israel have I found such great faith' (Mt 8:10) to 'not even in Israel have I found such great faith' (Lk 7:9). This leaves room in Israel for at least some faith. A softening of the polemic against Israel could also be the reason for omitting Mt's 8:11–12. When he does use this saying in Lk 12:28–9, he gives it in a less absolute version: others will indeed come from east and west, but at least 'the sons of the kingdom' will not be 'thrown out into exterior darkness', as in Matthew.

Especially a small verbal indication may show that Luke is dependent on Matthew rather than on any Q-version. This would solve the anomaly of a miracle-story in Q, the collection of Sayings of the Lord (if it existed), but would also show a significant dependence of Luke on Matthew. Luke uses a number of words that are favourites of his, but are not in Matthew's narrative. But significantly Luke starts and ends the story (7:2–3, 10) with a 'slave' of the centurion (adding with typical tenderness that this slave was valuable to him); the Greek word used by Matthew, 'boy', may, in Greek as in English, also mean a servant. But in 7:7 Luke once slips into the Greek word, 'boy', used by Matthew. This is described by Goulder as editor's 'fatigue', and taken as evidence that Luke was editing Matthew's story. The same phenomenon occurs in the words used for 'bed' in Lk 5:18–24 || Mt 9:2–7.

5. The story of the healing of the son of the royal official at Capernaum in Jn 4:46–54 is unusual in John, being the only healing-story which does not extend after the healing into a discussion or discourse of Jesus. It has obvious similarities to the synoptic stories just considered:

1. Capernaum enters into the story.
2. An official appeals to Jesus for the cure of his son, who is at the point of death (this is clear in Luke, less clear in Matthew; John is often closer to Luke than to the other Synoptics).
3. Jesus cures the child at a distance.
4. An intermediate group comes from the sickbed with a new message (another link to Luke rather than to Matthew).
5. The emphasis of the story is on the faith of the official.

There are also, of course, significant differences. As often, John's historical detail is persuasive: it is more likely that a royal official of Herod should be at Capernaum (which was a border town in Herod's territory, and not under direct Roman rule) than that a Roman centurion should be stationed there. Some of the differences are characteristic of John, and may well have been introduced by him for theological reasons:

1. The structure of the story is similar to that of the first miracle at Cana. These are the only two occasions on which Jesus at first demurs.
2. The reproach to faith that requires miracles (v. 48, as Jn 2:23–4; 20:29). In fact the two vv. 48–9 may well have been added to the original story. They can be cut out without spoiling the story, and only here is the victim called 'little boy'; elsewhere he is 'son'.
3. In Matthew and Luke the father's faith is praised before the cure. In John it comes at any rate to its full flowering only at the attestation of the cure 'at that hour' (4:58), as in the first sign at Cana the disciples find faith only when they see his glory at the end of the story (2:11).

There are comparatively few exact verbal similarities with the synoptic accounts, though some are notable (the healing occurs 'at that hour', Mt 8:13; Jn 4:53). But the similarity is more at the level of events and circumstances. The link between John and the two Synoptics may therefore be grounded on oral tradition rather than any written text.

I. The Controversy over Beelzebul (Mt 12:24–32; Mk 3:22–30; Lk 11:15–23 + 12:10)Mt 12:24–32

²⁴They said, 'It is only by Beelzebul, the ruler of demons, that this fellow casts out demons.' ²⁵He knew what they were thinking and said to them, 'Every kingdom divided against itself becomes a desert, and no city or house divided against itself will stand. ²⁶If Satan casts out Satan, he is divided against himself, how then will his kingdom stand?

²⁷If I cast out demons by Beelzebul, by whom do your own exorcists cast them out? Therefore they will be your judges. ²⁸But if it is by the Spirit of God that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come to you. ²⁹Or how can one enter a strong man's house and plunder his property without first tying up the strong man? Then indeed he may plunder his house.

³⁰Whoever is not with me is against me, and whoever does not gather with me scatters. ³¹Therefore I tell you, people will be forgiven every sin and blasphemy but blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven. ³²Whoever speaks a word against the Son of Man will be forgiven but whoever speaks against the holy Spirit will not be forgiven, either in this age or in the age to come.'

One of the most critical passages in the Synoptic Gospels is the Beelzebul controversy. The prominence in the gospel tradition of the accusation that Jesus casts out evil spirits by being in league with Beelzebul, the prince of evil spirits, suggests that it was one of the major ways of discounting Jesus' miracles used by his opponents. Moreover there are also parallels in John to the synoptic tradition, since there also Jesus is accused of having an evil spirit (Jn 7:20); on another occasion Jesus cites his power to work miracles in reply to such an accusation (Jn 10:20–1). The parallels are, however, sufficiently loose to be explained as dependent on oral rather than written tradition; the common point may be merely the memory that Jesus was accused of having an evil spirit. In John the accusation is made twice that Jesus 'has an evil spirit', and on the second occasion this is backed up with the question, 'Can an evil spirit open the eyes of the blind?' The circumstances of the accusation in the Synoptics and in John ²²And the scribes who came down from Jerusalem said, 'He has Beelzebul, and by the ruler of demons he casts out demons.' ²³And he called them to him and spoke to them in parables, 'How can Satan cast out Satan? ²⁴If a kingdom is divided against itself, that kingdom cannot stand. ²⁵And if a house is divided against itself, that house will not be able to stand. ²⁶And if Satan has risen up against himself and is divided, he cannot stand, but his end has come.

Mk 3:22–30

²⁷But no one can enter a strong man's house and plunder his property without first tying up the strong man. Then indeed he may plunder his house.

²⁸Truly I tell you, people will be forgiven their sins and whatever blasphemies they utter; ²⁹but whoever blasphemes against the holy Spirit can never have forgiveness, but is guilty of an eternal sin' — ³⁰for they said, 'He has an unclean spirit.'

Lk 11:15–23

¹⁵He casts out demons by Beelzebul, the ruler of demons.' . . .

¹⁷But he knew what they were thinking and said to them, 'Every kingdom divided against itself becomes a desert, and house falls on house.

¹⁸If Satan also is divided against himself, how will his kingdom stand?—for you say that I cast out demons by Beelzebul.

¹⁹Now if I cast out demons by Beelzebul, by whom do your own exorcists cast them out? Therefore they will be your judges. ²⁰But if it is by the finger of God that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come to you. ²¹When a strong man, fully armed, guards his castle, his property is in safe, ²²but when one stronger than he attacks him and overcomes him, he takes away his armour in which he trusted, and divides his plunder. ²³Whoever is not with me is against me, and whoever does not gather with me scatters.

¹² ¹⁰And everyone who speaks a word against the Son of Man will be forgiven, everyone who blasphemes against the holy Spirit will not be forgiven.'

are entirely different. In the Synoptics the starting-point of the discussion is expulsion of evil spirits; it is more specific than in John: 'They said that he has Beelzebul and casts out evil spirits through the leader of evil spirits.' It then leads on to a full-blown controversy.

The use of this particular tradition is different in each of the gospels. In Mark it is the centrepiece of a typically Markan 'sandwich', showing how Jesus was misunderstood by different groups of people. This then leads on to the recourse to parables in Mk 4. It is, then, part of Mark's demonstration of Jesus turning away from the crowds to instruct his special disciples, an important hinge in the structure of the first part of Mark's gospel. In Matthew the passage provides a commentary on the important quotation in Mt 12:18–21 of Isa 42:1–4, including, 'I shall place my Spirit upon him'; its message is, therefore, the contrast between the Spirit of Jesus and the spirit of Beelzebul. Not dissimilarly, in Luke the main part of the passage comes in the section on discipleship after the Lord's prayer and the promise (11:13) that the heavenly Father will give the Holy Spirit to those who ask him. It serves to contrast the spirit of the disciples with that of Jesus' opponents. Finally in John, the passages are part of the confrontation between Jesus and the temple authorities in Jerusalem, as part of the judgement theme that is so important in John.

From the point of view of the synoptic problem this passage has an importance all its own. Any solution to the problem must, of course, be shown to be valid for all the pericopes of the synoptic tradition. Nevertheless each theory has its special pericopes for which the proponents of the theory claim that their solution is obviously the best, while there are other pericopes where this solution is less obviously the best, and prima facie another solution would fit the facts equally well or perhaps even more easily. In the case of this pericope, however, it is claimed as primary evidence for their own theory by proponents of each of the principal solutions to the synoptic problem. The relationships between the synoptic passages have been claimed as evidence by proponents of the Griesbach theory, as evidence of Mark-Q overlap (in which Luke is closer than Matthew to Q) by proponents of the Two-Source theory, and by single-source theorists as evidence of editing of Mark by Matthew and Luke successively.

The basic relationship between the three synoptic texts is shown in Table 1.

One of the chief arguments of proponents of the Griesbach theory is the claim that Mark combines Matthew and Luke by zigzagging between them: when Mark departs from the order they share, Mark follows first one and then the other (see c.1). This is claimed to be exemplified here. So, it is dubiously claimed, Mk 3:22b agrees with the order of words in Luke against Matthew. Then Mk 3:25 agrees with Matthew (there is nothing corresponding in Luke). Mk 3:26 agrees with both. Still, after a gap, Mk 3:27–8 agrees with Matthew. Finally, Mk 3:29 corresponds to Lk 12:10b (the aorist of the verb blasphēmeō, eisto pneuma to agion). The zigzag is, however, in this case hard to sustain. In fact Mark shares overwhelmingly with Matthew, never in this passage with Luke, though there are occasional elements in the triple-tradition verses where Mark is closer to Luke than to Matthew. In Mk 3:22b the phrases are indeed in the Lukan order (Beelzebul first, not second as in Matthew), but the relationship between the verses is more easily explained as independent improvement by Matthew and Luke of Mark's clumsy double-phrase. In Mk 3:29 there are equally strong correspondences with Matthew. The argument is perhaps plausible, but by no means compelling.

On the Two-Source theory it is considered a passage of Mark-Q overlap. It is one of the five principal passages accepted as such by Streeter (along with the preaching of John the Baptist, the temptations, the mustard seed, and the commissioning of the disciples, see c.2). Matthew and Luke share 6½ verses absent from Mark, and in the triple-tradition verses there is persistent minor agreement between them against Mark. Some explanation must be given of these agreements, and if the Mark-Q overlap theory makes sense at all, it is a possible candidate as the explanation. Therefore a three-stage process is postulated: first comes Mark, then Q develops this tradition, then Matthew and Luke independently combine this Q tradition with their version of Mark.

In order to show, however, that at least in this case Mark-Q overlap is the most economical explanation it is necessary to show that Luke's version is the more primitive, and Mark has subsequently been edited by Matthew. So advocates of the Mark-Q overlap claim that Matthew has taken verses from various places in Q (the elements occur in three different sections of Luke) to make a skilfully unified composition, but that the elements of this composition are still visible in their original form in Luke. Advocates of this theory are posed the formidable task of showing that underlying Luke and/or Matthew is a unified theology or style that is distinct from that of the final authors, and can be considered characteristic of Q. So Kloppenborg (1987: 121–7) argues vigorously that Luke is the more primitive version, more coherent than Matthew's form. Luke's parable of the stronger man in 11:21–2 evokes warfare, which better fits the mention of 'kingdom' in the previous verses than does Matthew's household burglary. Matthew would then have adopted the earlier verses from Q, but reverted slavishly to Mark for the burglary. After the little Q-saying of Luke 11:23, Luke would have added another passage (originally separate in Q, and used by Matthew at 12:43–5) to stress that mere expulsion of the evil spirit is not enough without a further positive response to the kingdom. For Kloppenborg both Mark and Q versions have the same origin: 'the starting-point for this complex of Q-sayings is the traditional Beelzebul accusation and its refutation in Mark 3:20–6' (ibid. 127). But Q has enlarged the scene in two ways, first by attributing the accusation not (as does Mark) to the scribes from Jerusalem but to 'your sons' in general, and secondly by applying Jesus' threat not only (as Mark) to those who accuse Jesus of complicity with Beelzebul, but to all who oppose Jesus (Lk 11:23–6).

Opponents of the Mark-Q overlap must show that the Matthean passage is so typical of Matthew that there is no trace of any written source other than Mark. So Goulder (1974: 332) maintains that the changes are best explained as introduced first by Matthew. He points out that in Mt 12:25 the balance of two similarly shaped phrases is a typically elegant

TABLE 1. Relationship between synoptic texts

Mt 12:24b =	Mk 3:22b =	Lk 11:15	(complex relationship)
25a	24	17	(6 minor agreements Matthew/Luke against Mark)
25c	25	—
26	26	18	(6 minor agreements Matthew/Luke against Mark)
27	—	19	(1 minor disagreement Matthew/Luke)
28	—	20	(one important difference)
29	27	21–2	(Luke's wording very different)
30	—	23	(identical)
31	28	—	(several small differences)
32a	—	12:10a	(one characteristic difference Matthew/Luke)
32b	29	10b	(one minor agreement of Matthew/Luke against Mark)
—	30	—	(typical Markan dualism, not in Matthew/Luke)

Matthean improvement on Mark's rough phrase. Goulder then argues phrase by phrase that the expansions of Mark are so characteristic of Matthew that it would be a mistake to postulate any Q. Particularly the rhythm of vv. 31, 33, 35 is typical of Matthean formations, and such antitheses as 'gather/scatter', 'good/bad'. It is then necessary to argue that Luke can best be explained as derived from Matthew. To begin with, it is pointed out that Luke often breaks up longer Matthean sections, and that the method of so doing is in this case typical of Luke (see c.4).

On the other side it is argued that Luke, with his stress on the Spirit, would never have substituted 'finger of God' (Lk 11:20) for Matthew's 'Spirit of God' if he had been following Matthew. This is taken as an indication that 'finger of God' must have been the original form in Q (e.g. Stanton 1992a: 177 n.3); to which Goulder (1989: 504) replies that this allusion to Moses' miracles in Ex 8:15 is typical of Luke, and that 'Spirit' occurs only twice in Luke's accounts of Jesus' teaching.

In this particular case it is unlikely that either side will finally convince the other. The particular question must be judged in function of the more general question whether a Mark-Q overlap makes sense, and particularly whether this overlapping Q is so close to Mark that some literary dependence of Mark on Q would need to be postulated. This in turn would raise the question of why Mark omitted so much of Q.

J. 1. The Walking on the Water (Mt 14:22-33 || Mk 6:45-52 || Jn 6:16-21)

Mt 14:22-33

²²Immediately he made the disciples get into the boat and go on ahead to the other side while he dismissed the crowds. ²³And after he had dismissed the crowds, he went up the mountain by himself to pray. When evening came he was there alone, ²⁴but by this time the boat, strained by the waves, was far from the land, for the wind was against them. ²⁵And early in the morning he came to them walking on the lake.

²⁶But when the disciples saw him walking on the lake, they were terrified, saying it was a ghost, and they cried out in fear.

²⁷But immediately Jesus spoke to them and said, 'Take heart, it is I; do not be afraid.' ²⁸Peter answered him, 'Lord, if it is you, command me to come to you on the water.' ²⁹He said, 'Come.' So Peter got out of the boat, started walking on the water, and came toward Jesus. ³⁰But when he noticed the strong wind he became frightened and, beginning to sink, he cried out, 'Lord, save me!' ³¹Jesus immediately reached out his hand and caught him, saying to him, 'You of little faith, why did you doubt?' ³²When they got into the boat the wind ceased, and those in the boat worshipped him, saying, 'Truly you are the Son of God.'

Mk 6:45-52

⁴⁵Immediately he made his disciples get into the boat and go on ahead to the other side to Bethsaida while he dismissed the crowd. ⁴⁶After saying farewell to them he went up the mountain to pray. ⁴⁷When evening came, the boat was out on the lake, and he was alone on the land. ⁴⁸When he saw that they were straining at the oars, for the wind was against them. early in the morning he came to them walking on the lake. He intended to pass them by, ⁴⁹but when they saw him walking on the lake they thought it was a ghost and cried out. ⁵⁰For they all saw him and were terrified. But immediately he spoke to them and said to them, 'Take heart, it is I; do not be afraid.'

⁵¹Then he got into the boat with them and the wind ceased and they were utterly astounded, ⁵²for they did not understand about the loaves, but their hearts were hardened.

Jn 6:16-21

¹⁶When evening came, his disciples went down to the lake ¹⁷got into a boat, and started across the lake to Capernaum. It was now dark and Jesus had not yet come to them ¹⁸The lake became rough because a strong wind was blowing. ¹⁹When they had rowed about three or four miles, they saw Jesus walking on the lake and coming near the boat and they were terrified.

²⁰But he said to them, 'It is I; do not be afraid.'

²¹Then they wanted to take him into the boat with them, and immediately the boat reached the land towards which they were going.

The three evangelists who narrate this incident all use it to express their own theology. It is arguable that John's account is the closest to the oral tradition that lies behind them. Luke omits the story, perhaps because, along with other pericopes in the central section of Mark's gospel, he considers them unnecessary duplication. Before the content of the passage is discussed two preliminary problems must be aired.

The position of the incident is significant. It is rare that John and the Synoptics share any sequence of incidents, but in this case in both traditions the episode follows the miraculous feeding. In the case of John this is decidedly awkward, in that it splits the feeding (Jn 6:1-14) from the bread of life discourse (6:22-71); normally the related discourse in John follows immediately the miracle on which it comments. This suggests that the juxtaposition of the two incidents was considered significant in the previous oral tradition. This juxtaposition may have paschal overtones. Jn 6:4 mentions that the Passover was near, and in both the original Exodus incident and its liturgical commemoration the gift of manna and the crossing of the sea are associated. The OT typology is only slightly altered in the gospel accounts: the order of events is reversed, with the manna coming before the crossing, and Jesus does not cross the sea from one side to the other, but walks towards his distressed disciples in the middle of the sea.

The similarity between the accounts of John and Mark is notable especially in the order of the narration:

1. The disciples start off across the sea;
2. it is evening;
3. the disciples are in difficulty with the wind;
4. the distance covered (John) and time passed (Mark) is mentioned;
5. they see Jesus walking on the sea and are terrified;
6. Jesus says, 'It is I; do not be afraid';
7. they want to take him (John), actually take him (Mark), into the boat and all is well.

The exact verbal similarity is also striking, not all of it dictated by a scene of rowing on the sea. Matthew has an addition link with John in the description of the distance in stades (NRSV miles).

It has been commented that in John Jesus is walking epi the sea, which could be translated merely 'at' or 'beside' rather than 'on'. In this case there would not necessarily be any miracle involved, and the original lesson would be that without Jesus the disciples are helpless and distressed (John symbolizes their distress by 'it was now dark', 6:17, as in 8:12; 12:46, cf. 13:30). This would accord with their reaching land 'immediately', before they succeed in their intention of taking Jesus into the boat. But it would be difficult to account for the terror of the disciples, unless it is at the theophanic appearance of Jesus. The significance of Jesus walking on the sea comes from its scriptural echoes (see MT 14:23–36). In Israel the sea was always regarded as a frightening evil power, controlled and dominated only by the Lord (see also MK 6:45–62). Jesus' self-identification is made in the words egō eimi, which, at least for John, have the special significance of the divine name (see JN 6:16–21).

2. Despite sharing oral tradition and a number of similar words with John, Mark's narrative is unmistakably written by him. The style includes many of his typical features (see E.1): the characteristic 'immediately' (vv. 45, 50), the afterthought explanation with gar (vv. 48, 50, 52), double expressions (v. 45, 'to the other side, to Bethsaida'; v. 50, 'spoke to them and said'; 'take heart, do not be afraid'; v. 52 'they did not understand, their hearts were hardened'), and others invisible in translation. It is reasonable to assume that he himself composed the narrative from oral tradition. Boismard maintains that the narrative existed in different versions in Document A and Document B (see c.3) on the grounds that, if Jesus was alone on the shore 'when evening came' (from the supposed Document B), he could not be said to wait to come to them till 'early in the morning' (from the supposed Document A). John lacks the latter element, so used only Document B. In fact, however, John has traces of the disciples' prolonged wait in the form of the 3 or 4 miles' rowing.

With typical Markan irony (see E.1 and cf. Camery-Hoggatt 1992: 147) the climax of the story is the failure of the disciples to understand about the loaves. Mark many times stresses the incomprehension of the disciples. On this occasion, despite their utter astonishment, he links it to the miracle of the loaves, which included (6:37) one of the worst examples of their sarcasm to Jesus. Just as, in the second half of the gospel, they thrice fail to understand the formal prophecies of the passion, so in this first half their failure to understand is three times noted on the lake (also 5:41; 8:17–21).

3. Matthew makes some minor adjustments, though he does not file the story down as much as he does many of the healing miracles. He omits Mark's v. 48c, perhaps because it suggests the unworthy thought that Jesus intended to neglect his followers (who no doubt, as in the calming of the storm, see Mt 8:23–7, stand for the Christian community), and that he changed his mind. He omits also Mark's v. 50a because he dislikes such afterthought explanations. Matthew's most important change, however, is the introduction of Peter's walking on the water. Typically for Matthew, Peter starts well and then comes a cropper (as at Caesarea Philippi and at the trial-scene), but at least his enthusiastic leadership comes to view, and his trust in Jesus merits a controlled compliment from the Lord. As in Mark, the disciples may stand for the community who have difficulty in accepting the full message of Jesus, especially with its implications of persecution, perhaps in Matthew Peter stands for the community, enthusiastic but still too hesitant and repeatedly failing. But the disciples' final confession—so much at variance with Mark's conclusion—leaves little to be desired: it is already at least as full as that of the centurion at the foot of the cross in Mark. The repeated 'Lord' (vv. 28, 30) and 'worshipped him' are also hints of the reaction proper to the divine.

K. 1. Jesus' Prayer in the Garden (Mt 26:36–46 || Mk 14:32–42 || Lk 22:39–46)

Mt 26:36–46

³⁶Then Jesus went with them to a place called Gethsemane, and he said to his disciples, 'Sit here while I go over there and pray.'

³⁷He took with him Peter and the two sons of Zebedee, and began to be grieved and agitated. ³⁸Then he said to

Mk 14:32–42

³²They went to a place called Gethsemane, and he said to his disciples, 'Sit here while I go over there and pray.'

³³He took with him Peter and James and John, and began to be distressed and agitated. ³⁴And he said to

Lk 22:39–46

³⁹He came out and went, as was his custom, to the Mount of Olives; and the disciples followed him. ⁴⁰When he reached the place, he said to them, 'Pray that you may not come into the time of trial.'

them, 'I am deeply grieved, even to death; remain here and stay awake with me.' ³⁹ And going a little farther he threw himself on the ground and prayed

'My Father, if it is possible let this cup pass from me; yet not what I want but what you want.'

⁴⁰ Then he came to the disciples and found them sleeping and he said to Peter, 'So, could you not stay awake with me one hour?' ⁴¹ Stay awake and pray that you may not come into the time of trial; the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak.'

⁴² Again he went away for a second time and prayed, 'My Father, if this cannot pass unless I drink it, your will be done.'

⁴³ Again he came and found them sleeping, for their eyes were heavy.

⁴⁴ So leaving them again, he went and prayed for the third time, saying the same words. ⁴⁵ Then he came to the disciples and said to them, 'Are you still sleeping and taking your rest? See the hour is at hand, and the Son of Man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. ⁴⁶ Get up, let us be going. See, my betrayer is at hand.'

them, 'I am deeply grieved, even to death; remain here and keep awake.'

³⁵ And going a little farther he threw himself on the ground and prayed that, if possible the hour might pass from him. ³⁶ He said, 'Abba, Father, for you all things are possible; remove this cup from me; yet, not what I want, but what you want.'

³⁷ He came and found them sleeping; and he said to Peter, 'Simon, are you asleep? Could you not keep awake one hour?' ³⁸ Keep awake and pray that you may not come into the time of trial; the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak.' ³⁹ And again he went away and prayed, saying the same words.

⁴⁰ And once more he came and found them sleeping, for their eyes were very heavy; and they did not know what to say to him.

⁴¹ He came a third time and said to them, 'Are you still sleeping and taking your rest? Enough! The hour has come; the Son of Man is betrayed into the hands of sinners.' ⁴² Get up, let us be going. See, my betrayer is at hand.'

⁴¹ Then he withdrew from them about a stone's throw, knelt down, and prayed,

⁴² 'Father, if you are willing, remove this cup from me, yet not my will but yours be done.' [⁴³ Then an angel from heaven appeared to him and gave him strength. ⁴⁴ In his anguish he prayed more earnestly, and his sweat became like great drops of blood falling down on the ground.]

⁴⁵ When he got up from prayer he came to the disciples and found them sleeping because of grief, ⁴⁶ and he said to them, 'Why are you sleeping?

Get up and pray that you may not come into the time of trial.'

Jn 12:27-9

²⁷ 'Now my soul is troubled. And what should I say—'Father, save me from this hour'? No, it is for this reason that I have come to this hour. ²⁸ Father, glorify your name.' Then a voice came from heaven, 'I have glorified it, and I will glorify it again.' ²⁹ The crowd standing there heard it and said that it was thunder. Other said, 'An angel has spoken to him.'

Jn 18:11

Jesus said to Peter, 'Put your sword back into its sheath. Am I not to drink the cup that the Father has given me?'

2. The account of Jesus' prayer before his passion is a particularly rich example of how the several synoptic evangelists have adapted the tradition they received in order to express their own theology. There are also interesting links to the Fourth Gospel which most probably reflect an oral tradition about the prayer of Jesus at the pre-gospel stage. As a working hypothesis in the discussion of this pericope it will be assumed that Mark is the first of the Synoptic Gospels, used by both the other two.

A long series of scholars has suggested that Mark is here combining two accounts, e.g. one source is 14:32, 35, 40, 41, the other is 14:33-4, 36-8. More probable is the view that Mark is spinning out a minimum of material to convey his own message according to his own manner. It is shot through with elements of Mark's own style. As throughout the passion narrative, a principal motif is to make sense of the stunning events by showing that what happens fulfils the scripture. A little hint of this is the allusion to Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac in 'going a little further' (14:35, as Gen 22:5). But especially marked is the reminiscence in Jesus' words of the laments of the persecuted just man in the Psalms (Ps 41:6 in Mk 14:34, etc.). The accent is on two factors, the obedience of Jesus to his Father's will and—by contrast—the failure of the disciples. Thus, with typical Markan duplication, the prayer of Jesus is given first indirectly (v. 35), then directly (v. 36).

Probably for the prayer itself Mark is using or imitating already the formulae of early Christian prayer, with the Aramaic abba immediately followed by its Greek translation (ho patēr). This double formula of a particular Aramaic word, regarded almost as a talisman, occurs elsewhere in the NT (1 Cor 16:22; Rev 1:7). Jesus' consciousness that God was his Father was treasured by the early community; this usage, stemming from Jesus himself, was greatly extended, especially in John. However, the use of abba for God is not, as Jeremias (1978) contended, unique to Jesus, indicating the affectionate relationship of childhood; children called their father abi rather than abba, and abba does occur occasionally in Jewish prayers. As elsewhere, Mark emphasizes the intensity of Jesus' prayer by the triple repetition beloved of popular story telling (see E.1). But, as in Peter's triple denial, he has barely enough material to trick out the full triad: the prayer is given fully the first time; for the second time the prayer is merely 'the same word', and on the third occasion it is only the return of Jesus rather than his prayer that is mentioned.

Thus the chief emphasis is on the failure of the disciples to take their share in their Master's final trial. Throughout the gospel they have repeatedly failed to grasp the message of suffering; now they are thrice found asleep while their Master prays, and their definite desertion at the arrest will be confirmed by Peter's triple denial at the moment when Jesus thrice faces his accusers. The bitterness of this occasion is underlined by the special involvement of precisely those three disciples who had been favoured with special revelation at the transfiguration (the link is stressed: again in their abashed confusion: they 'knew not what to answer'). James and John had also stoutly protested that they could share Jesus' cup (Mk 10:39).

3. In Matthew's account, besides many little characteristic verbal changes of style, three changes of emphasis are visible. Firstly, Matthew tones down the lurid colours in which Mark paints Jesus' agony of mind: for Mark's word for Jesus' almost stunned distress, Matthew has the more seemly 'grieved'. Instead of Mark's uncontrollable 'falling [repeatedly, if the imperfect is taken seriously, as though Jesus were simply stumbling] to the ground', the biblical attitude of reverent prayer is indicated by 'fell face to the ground in prayer' (26:39, my tr.). This is in accord with Matthew's generally more dignified, and even hieratic, presentation of Jesus.

Secondly Matthew fills out the second prayer of Jesus. After the Jewish manner of respect for the Lord, both prayers are impersonal: 'let this cup pass from me', instead of Mark's direct request, 'remove this cup from me'. Matthew gives content to the prayer by using the Lord's prayer, which he has set down at the very centre of the Sermon on the Mount, 'Your will be done' (26:42; 6:10). It may be presumed that, since Jesus is the model for his disciples, he will pray the same phrases as he taught them to pray. The intimacy of both first and second prayers is stressed by the affectionate address, 'My Father' (26:39, 42); this perhaps indicates both similarity and distinction between Jesus and his disciples, who are instructed to pray with the plural 'Our Father' (6:9). At the same time, a certain hesitancy is shown—perhaps the hesitancy of respect—by the repeated 'if it is possible' (26:39), 'if it is not possible' (26:42), instead of Mark's confident 'for you all things are possible' (14:36). After this elaboration of the second prayer, Matthew can transfer to the third prayer Mark's minimal account of the second, 'saying the same words' (Mk 14:39; Mt 26:44).

Matthew's third concern is to underline the solidarity that should exist between Jesus and his disciples. As always he tones down their failure, here by omitting Mark's critical 'they did not know what to say to him' (Mk 14:40). He also takes the spotlight off Peter by removing Jesus' intimate and disappointed question to him, 'Simon, are you asleep?' (Mk 14:37), and by putting into the plural the criticism, 'could you not stay awake with me one hour?' (Mt 26:40). This now concerns not only Peter but all the disciples. Twice he adds 'with me' to 'stay awake' (26:38, 40); they should share in his passion, just as frequently in Matthew Jesus' community will benefit from his permanent presence (1:23; 18:20; 28:18–20) and will share in his ministry of forgiveness (9:8; 18:18).

4. Luke's version of the scene on the Mount of Olives (there is no mention of 'Gethsemane'; he often omits odd-sounding place-names, and has little interest in the topography of Jerusalem) is drastically shortened and unified. There is only one prayer and one return to the disciples. It is bracketed at beginning and end by the command, 'Pray that you may not come into temptation' (22:40, 46), exemplifying once more the Lukan theme of prayer, and more especially of the disciple praying after the model of the Master. In their persecutions and martyrdom, as in their working of miracles, the Acts of the Apostles will show the disciples mirroring exactly and continuing the life of Jesus into the era of the church. In the passion narrative too this carefully painted imitation comes to view in such details as Simon of Cyrene carrying the cross 'behind Jesus' (23:26). All stress has been taken off the failure of the disciples, both by eradication of the triple repetition and by a couple of subtle changes in 22:45: instead of 'sleeping' they are now (despite NRSV) 'lying down from grief', that is, their sympathy with Jesus is so intense that they could not stay on their feet. Nevertheless, when he firmly 'stands erect' after his prayer he comes to them and tells them too to join him in this posture (22:45, 46).

The most notable difference in Luke is the account of Jesus himself. Quite definitely, though not yet so emphatically as in John, Jesus is in control of his passion and death: he will be arrested only when he has exercised his healing ministry (22:51) and given the arresting party his consent, 'This is your hour' (22:53), and dies only when he has commended his spirit into his Father's hands (23:46). So now, Jesus does not collapse onto the ground, but 'knelt down', as Christians later do in prayer (Acts 7:60; 9:40; 20:36; 21:5). There is no sign of distress: his single prayer is calm and resigned, with the same resignation shown later by Christians (Acts 21:14). But there is nothing lacking to the intensity of his prayer.

The verses 22:43–4 are missing in some MSS, but are widely quoted in the second century. If they are considered part of Luke's gospel they contain two features, showing the preparation of Jesus for his passion. Both have analogies in the books of Maccabees to which the genre of Luke–Acts is so similar. First, Jesus is represented as an athlete about to enter a contest, with his adrenalin up, rather than terrified and horror-struck as in Mark. There is no question of sweating blood; it is merely that his sweat flowed like blood. This is the physical condition of those preparing for martyrdom in the books of Maccabees (2 Macc 3:16; 15:19; 4 Macc 6:6, 11). Secondly, an angel appears to show that Jesus' prayer is regarded, just as in Mk 1:13 at the earlier testing in the desert, and as two angels came to strengthen Eleazar at his martyrdom (4 Macc 6:18). After his prayer Jesus stands confidently upright, and comes to tell his followers to do the same in their prayer during temptation.

5. John has no equivalent scene of the prayer in the garden, but there are clear echoes of the same tradition. Similarly, he has no scene of the trial before the Sanhedrin (Mk 14:53–64), but an echo of this scene appears earlier in the Pharisees' decision to kill him in Jn 11:57. John portrays the passion of Jesus not as the moment of his humiliation but as the hour of his exaltation and glorification (see Jn 18:1–19:24). John's Jesus is nevertheless fully human, so that his soul is troubled by the approaching trial (12:27a). However, since it is the moment of his glorification and that of his Father (12:28), to which he has looked forward (2:4; 7:30; 8:20) and will look forward (13:1; 16:32), he thrusts aside the thought of praying to be delivered from it. The image of the cup of suffering seen in the synoptic accounts of the prayer in the garden is also present at his arrest in the garden (18:11). Here it is explicit that Jesus accepts the cup in an atmosphere of triumph, for it comes at the conclusion of the arrest scene. During this scene his divinity has shone through by his use of the mysterious divine 'I am he' (18:5, 6, 8) and the awestruck reaction of the arresting party in falling to the ground. He can be arrested only after he has given this consent. There are further echoes of the tradition in the Letter to the Hebrews, in the mention that 'Jesus offered up prayers and supplications, with loud cries and tears, to the one who was able to save him from death' (Heb 5:7). The echoes of the prayers of the persecuted just man in the psalms are evident here. As already in the wording of the prayer in Mark, Brown (1994: 229) suggests that this prayer 'came from an early Christian hymn of praise constructed of a mosaic of psalm-motifs'. Behind it would be the same tradition as that of the synoptic and Johannine prayer in the garden.

REFERENCES

- Ashton, J. (1991), Understanding the Fourth Gospel (Oxford: Clarendon).
- Barthélemy, D. (1963), Les Dévanciers d'Aquila (Leiden: Brill).
- Best, E. (1986), Disciples and Discipleship (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Boismard, M. (1972), Synopse des quatre Évangiles (Paris: Éditions du Cerf).
- Brown, Raymond (1994), The Death of the Messiah (London: Geoffrey Chapman).
- (1997), An Introduction to the New Testament (New York: Doubleday).
- Burridge, R. (1992), What are the Gospels? (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Camery-Hoggatt, J. (1992), Irony in Mark's Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Casey, C. (1998), Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Denaux, A. (1992) (ed.), John and the Synoptics (Leuven: Leuven University Press).
- Dodd, C. H. (1955–6), 'Some Johannine "Herrenworte" with Parallels in the Synoptic Gospels', NTS 2.
- Donahue, J. (1973), Are You the Christ? The Trial Narrative in the Gospel of Mark (Missoula: Scholars Press).
- Dunn, J. (1983), 'Let John be John', in P. Stuhlmacher (ed.), Das Evangelium und die Evangelien (Tübingen: Mohr).
- (1991), 'John and the Oral Gospel Tradition', in H. Wansbrough (ed.), Jesus and the Oral Gospel Tradition (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Fitzmyer, J. (1970–1) 'The Use of Explicit Old Testament Quotations in Qumran Literature and in the New Testament', NTS 7.
- (1979), The Gospel According to Luke (New York: Doubleday).
- Franklin, E. (1994), Luke, Interpreter of Paul, Critic of Matthew (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Goodacre, M. (1996), Goulder on the Gospels (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Goulder, M. (1974), Midrash and Lection in Matthew (London: SPCK).
- (1984), 'The Order of a Crank', in Tuckett (1984a).
- (1989), Luke—A New Paradigm (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Green, H. Benedict, (1984), 'The Credibility of Luke's Transformation of Matthew', in Tuckett (1984a).
- Green, Joel B. (1995), The Theology of the Gospel of Luke (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Hawkins, Sir J. (1909), Horae Synopticae (Oxford: Clarendon).
- Jeremias, J. (1978) The Prayers of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Kloppenborg, J. (1987), The Formation of Q (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Kloppenborg Verdin J. (2000), Excavating Q (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Koester, H. (1989), 'From Kerygma-Gospel to Written Gospel', NTS 35.
- Lamar Cribbs, F. (1971), 'St Luke and the Johannine Tradition', JBL 90.
- Meeks, W. (1983), The First Urban Christians (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Meier, J. (1982), 'Antioch', in R. Brown and J. Meier, Antioch and Rome (London: Chapman).
- Meier, J. P. (1994), A Marginal Jew, ii (New York: Doubleday).
- Neirynck, F. (1978), 'The Symbol Q' ETL 54: 119–25.
- (1979), 'Once More the Symbol Q', ETL 55: 382–3.
- (1988), Duality in Mark (Leuven: Leuven University Press).
- Peabody, D. (1987), Mark as Composer (Macon: Mercer University Press).
- Perrin, N. (1970–1), Expo Times, 82.
- Piper, R. A. (1995), The Gospel behind the Gospels, supplement to Novum Testamentum, vol. 75 (Leiden: Brill).
- Puéch, E. (1993), 'The Collection of Beatitudes in Hebrew and Greek (4Q525. 1–4 and Matt 5. 3–12)', in F. Manns and E. Alliata (eds.), Early Christianity in Context (Jerusalem: Franciscan Press), 353–68.
- Sanders, E. (1969), The Tendencies of the Synoptic Tradition (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press), 290–3.
- Sanders, E. and Davies, M. (1989), Studying the Synoptic Gospels (London: SCM).
- Sim, D. (1998), The Gospel of Matthew and Christian Judaism (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Stanton, G. (1992a), A Gospel for a New People (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- (1992b), Βίβλος, εὐαγγέλιον or βίος?, in F. van Segbroeck et al. (eds.), The Four Gospels (Leuven: Leuven University Press).
- Stuhlmacher, P. (1983), Das Evangelium und die Evangelien (Tübingen: Mohr).
- Tuckett, C. (1983), 'The Beatitudes: A Source-Critical Study, with a Reply by M. D. Goulder', NT 25.
- (1984a), 'Arguments from Order' in C. M. Tuckett, Synoptic Studies (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- (1984b), 'On the Relationship between Matthew and Luke', NTS 30.
- (1987), Reading the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- (1995), 'The Existence of Q' in R. A. Piper, The Gospel behind the Gospels, supplement to Novum Testamentum, 75 (Leiden: Brill), 19–48.
- von Wahlde, U. (1989), The Earliest Version of John's Gospel (Wilington, Del.: Glazier).
- Weeden, T. (1968), 'The Heresy that Necessitated Mark's Gospel', ZNW 59.

62. Acts

LOVEDAY ALEXANDER

INTRODUCTION

The book of Acts occupies a unique position in the NT, forming a bridge between the gospels and the epistles. It provides a narrative (the only one we have) of the steps by which the Christian message made the transition from the rural, Palestinian world of Jesus to the largely urban world of Paul and the later epistles, based in the Greek cities of the Roman empire. Whereas the gospels focus on Jesus, Acts focuses on people talking about Jesus, the apostles and others who spread his gospel across the Graeco-Roman world. While the Gospels are set almost exclusively in Galilee and Judea, Acts moves purposefully out from Jerusalem to the wider world of the empire, and its final scene is set in Rome. And while the gospels are located within the world of Palestinian Judaism, Acts moves out into the diaspora, where 'the Jews' are one vocal minority group among others seeking to maintain their identity within the multicultural civic communities of the empire.

A. Authorship. The book of Acts is anonymous: its opening verse (as was common in ancient literature) gives the name of its dedicatee, Theophilus, but not the name of the author. However, this dedication makes it easy to deduce that the author of Acts is the same as the author of Luke's gospel (cf. LK 1), and there is sufficient continuity of language, style, and theological interests to make this one of the few virtually unchallenged conclusions of NT scholarship. Since Luke and Acts together account for a quarter of the NT, this makes this anonymous author (whom we shall call 'Luke' for convenience) one of the most important in the NT canon. The other possible indicator of authorship within Acts is the so-called 'we-passages' (see LK 1; ACTS 15:36–18:28), which imply that the narrator was a companion of Paul on some of his voyages. Early church tradition identified him with the 'Luke, the beloved physician' of Col 4:14, a co-worker of Paul's (Philem 23) who was with Paul in prison, but this tradition has been questioned by scholars on the grounds that the author of Acts does not show the kind of knowledge we would expect of a close associate of Paul's (see LK 1 for a summary of the arguments). Since all the evidence on both sides lies within the book itself, it is difficult to resolve the question in advance of reading the text. I have tried to draw attention within the commentary to the passages which have a bearing on this question without prejudging the issue; but on balance I would agree with Fitzmyer and Barrett that it is difficult to find any alternative which makes more sense of all the data than the traditional ascription. See further Fitzmyer (1998: 49–51) and Barrett (1994–9: i. 30–48) (with full survey of all the ancient evidence); ii. pp. xlii–xlv.

B. Date. The question of date is no easier to resolve than the question of authorship, with which it is inextricably bound up. The book ends with Paul in prison in Rome, waiting for his appeal to Caesar to be heard: according to the book's internal chronology he was sent to Rome soon after the accession of Festus (25:1), who was procurator of Judea c.60–2 CE. Acts therefore cannot be earlier than c. 62; and the puzzling failure to narrate the outcome of Paul's trial has been taken as evidence that the book itself was written during the two-year period of imprisonment in Rome (28:30), before the persecution under Nero (64 CE) in which Paul traditionally lost his life. But this is again conjecture, and there are reasons for seeing the work as a more mature reflection on the significance of the Pauline mission, written after the apostle's death (which seems to be presupposed by the valedictory tone of 20:18–38, esp. 25). It must also come after the composition of the gospel, which is referred to in the opening verse (1:1), and therefore probably after the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE (LK 21:20). The gospel preface implies that Luke sees himself as a second-generation Christian, one who has 'followed' the tradition 'handed down by the original eyewitnesses' (LK 1:2). Thus a date in the 80s (1K D) would make sense, even if the author had earlier been a companion of Paul, and might help to account for some of the mistiness that seems to have grown up around the character and theology of Paul and the details of his travels (cf. Barrett 1994–9: ii. pp. xl–xli). Nevertheless, despite this mistiness in detail, Acts shows remarkable knowledge of the general conditions of life in the eastern Mediterranean at the time of Paul, and belongs unmistakably to the first century.

C. Audience. Despite the address to Theophilus in the opening sentence (1:1), Acts is not a letter or a speech addressing a single reader. The address is properly considered a dedication (not unlike the dedications of published books today), which allows the author to single out and honour one particular reader while implying a wider distribution. Such a dedicatee, within the conventions of ancient literature, would normally be a real person known to the author, a friend or patron, and often (but not necessarily) represents the same kind of reader as the implied readers of the text. If this is the case here, the readers, like Theophilus, will be people who have already had some instruction in the faith and need to be assured of its 'reliability' (LK 1:4). This seems to imply a both a predominantly Christian readership and one that will appreciate the neutral, academic tones of the preface. But it is also important to take account of the dramatic audiences Luke invokes within the text itself: see ACTS 1.

D. Acts and the Gospel Story. Ancient readers of Acts would recognize immediately from the first verse that this is the second volume of a multi-volume work, and a proper estimation of its narrative construction must take this into account. Acts assumes its readers have a basic knowledge of the characters and framework of the gospel story; it also contains a number of explicit summaries of the story of Jesus from the lips of the apostles who are now charged with passing on the tradition (LK 1:2) to a wider audience (cf. ACTS 2:14–36). There are significant differences between the two volumes, not only in subject-matter but in style, and these may reflect the different sources Luke had at his disposal. Luke's style in the gospel is very largely determined by his synoptic sources, and as a result, it is marginally closer in language to Matthew and Mark than it is to Acts. But there are also striking similarities between the two volumes. Acts shares with Luke's gospel a common interest in rooting the story in the Jewish Scriptures; extensive parallelism between the words and deeds of Jesus in the gospel and those of the apostles and Paul in Acts; an interest in female characters; and similar patterns of narrative construction, especially a tendency to group material topically rather than chronologically and a fondness for 'type-scenes' which encapsulate the whole character of a phase of mission in one dramatic and detailed scene (cf. Lk 8). There is also a tendency to hold over certain narrative details from the gospel to Acts which suggests that Luke already had Acts in view when he was writing the gospel (cf. esp. ACTS 28:23–31). In particular, major themes introduced in the narrative prologue to the gospel (Lk chs. 1–4) reappear in clearer definition in the narrative epilogue to Acts (Acts 27–8). For a reader who did not know the story in advance, it would not be possible to predict the ending of Acts from the beginning of the gospel. Readers who make it to the end of Acts, however, will be sent back to reread the beginning of the gospel with new eyes, and will have a new appreciation of the prophetic significance of the Nazareth episode (Lk 4:16–30) and of Simeon's 'light to the Gentiles' (cf. Lk 1, ACTS 28:23–31).

E. Genre. 1. The literary genre of Luke's gospel, like its language, is effectively determined by its subject-matter and sources: it is a 'gospel', modelled closely on Mark's (Lk 1). Acts is a very different proposition, and even though it forms a narrative continuation to the gospel, it is widely accepted that we may need to look further afield for literary models for Acts. Most scholars believe that the title (The Acts of the Apostles) which is first attested in the Anti-Marcionite Prologue in the second century is not original. It is a rather misleading description of the book's content given that there are no 'acts' recounted for many of the twelve Apostles and Paul (to whom well over half the book is dedicated) does not rank as an apostle in Luke's eyes. Of the three principal forms of prose narrative in the literature of the Graeco-Roman world (history, biography, novel), Acts is possibly unique in having been ascribed to all three (Powell 1991: 9). Further on the question of genre, cf. esp. Powell (ibid. ch. 1); Winter and Clarke (1993).

2. Greek History. Acts is commonly described as a history of the early church, and in a very broad sense that is what it is. But it is important to appreciate that Acts does not sit easily within the confines of the literary genre of 'history' as it was understood by Greek and Roman readers in the ancient world. In his formal prefaces and dedications, Luke echoes the language and conventions found in other secular prefaces of the time, prefaces to scientific or technical manuals or to academic treatises on ethnography or geography. Historians (who tend to avoid dedication) use this style sometimes in their more academic or antiquarian sections, but it is a far cry from the high-flown rhetoric that was expected of historical writers. Acts does not match the pretensions of contemporary historiography either in style or in subject-matter: history tended to concern itself with great men and public events, and was expected to express itself in language far removed from the everyday Greek of the streets. Within the broad realm of Greek historiography, Acts could perhaps most convincingly be classified as an antiquarian monograph dealing with institutional history; but this label does not seem to capture the real flavour of the book.

3. Biblical History. It is far easier and more convincing to range Acts alongside other Greek narratives from Jewish writers seeking to place events of their own day within the broader framework of biblical history. Luke has an extensive knowledge of the Greek Bible (that is the Gk. translations of the HB used by diaspora Jews, principally but not exclusively the Septuagint or LXX) and assumes considerable knowledge of these texts in his readers. Quotations from the Bible form an important subplot of Acts, in the series of speeches that cumulatively presents the major scriptural testimonies used in early Christian hermeneutic. Some of these testimonia seem to reflect a very archaic stage of Christian hermeneutic and may go back to an early Florilegium such as those found at Qumran, an anthology of key scriptural texts arranged to support the sect's hermeneutic (cf. Brooke 2000: i. 297–8; Steudel 2000: ii. 936–8). Luke also draws on the Greek Bible for a rich fund of allusion, narrative typology, vocabulary, and style, all of which give his story a strongly 'biblical' flavour (Fitzmyer 1998: 90–5; 1981: 107–27). It is not surprising, then, that Luke's work should resemble biblical historiography much more than Greek: this is evident especially in its biographical structure (concentration on a succession of single characters) and in its overtly theological framework (Greek historians typically distance themselves from religious interpretations of events).

4. Biography. Greek and Roman biography (an increasingly popular genre in the late 1st cent.) in many ways provides a better parallel to the scope and scale of Luke's work, especially the biography of philosophers: Luke's description of the gospel in Acts 1:1 would most readily suggest a philosophical biography to ancient readers. Philosophical biography is so far the most convincing genre that has been suggested for Luke's two-volume work, following the pattern found in Diogenes Laertius of the life of the founder of a philosophical movement plus shorter biographical notes on his followers. Extant examples of this genre seem to lack the religious intensity of Luke's work, but late first-century philosophical literature shows that there was a real interest in presenting the lives of philosophers as templates for living the philosophical life, especially the life (and even more the death) of the martyr-philosopher Socrates. A number of details in Acts would recall this paradigm for Greek-educated readers: cf. esp. ACTS 17:16–21; 21:1–16; 25:1–12.

5. Novel. The late first century also sees the growth in popularity of a less pretentious narrative genre, the Greek novel, and it has been suggested that Acts is a form of novel. Certainly many readers unaccustomed to biblical narrative might take the book as a novel, with its exotic settings, adventurous plot, framework of travel, and explicit religious ideology. Luke shows some inclination to novelistic narrative techniques in the elaboration of his more dramatic scenes (cf. e.g. ACTS 12:6–11), and the novel throws valuable light on Luke's narrative structure and textures. But there are also many differences, not least the lack of a love-interest, the lack of emotion (pathos), and the political realism of Luke's narrative: the heroes and heroines of the novels tend to move in a fantasy landscape which is only superficially parallel to Luke's pragmatic locations.

6. Apologetic. Acts has frequently been described as an apologetic work, presenting the 'speech for the defence' for Paul, or for the church, or for Christianity, before a hostile world. The wide variety of constructions that have been put on this reading demonstrates its weakness: it is not easy to press the wide-ranging narrative of Acts into the service of a single apologetic purpose. It would be more correct to say that Acts contains a high proportion of apologetic speeches (some explicitly so described, e.g. 26:2), and that these must be taken into account when assessing the book's overall purpose and audience. Acts often shows Paul defending himself before a Roman tribunal, and takes pains to show that Roman magistrates believed him to be innocent of any offence against Roman law (e.g. 18:15; 25:8; 26:31), and this has often been taken to be the book's underlying purpose. But it is also noticeable that many of the damaging charges brought against Paul are left unanswered (e.g. 16:20–1; 17:6–7), and that Paul rarely gets the chance to speak in his own defence in these scenes (cf. 18:14; 19:32). The dominant social location addressed by the apologetic speeches in Acts is the Jewish community, both in Jerusalem (chs. 2, 4, 5, 7, 22) and in the diaspora (chs. 13, 28). Even where Paul is speaking before a Roman tribunal, he is addressing a Jewish audience and Jewish charges (chs. 24, 26). Despite Luke's interest in the Gentile mission, it is the relationship of the Christian 'sect' (28:22) to its Jewish parent that dominates his presentation; and this must be taken into account when assessing his audience and purpose.

F. Text. The so-called Western Text of Acts, represented by a number of MSS of which the most famous is Codex Bezae (D), has substantially longer readings at certain points in the text, and the most significant of these are reproduced in the NRSV marginal readings (NRSV marg.). It has been argued that the longer text is original, but on the whole it is easier to explain the longer text as an expansion and clarification of a shorter original. See further Fitzmyer (1998: 66–79); Barrett (1994–9: i. 2–29).

G. Structure. Like much biblical narrative (including the gospels), Acts is an episodic narrative with minimal authorial comment and simplistic chronology. It is not easy to analyse in modern terms. Ancient narrators do not think in terms of chapters or sections but create a seamless flow; Luke often uses summaries to mark the transition from one scene to next, and interleaves characters and themes (e.g. the introduction of Saul at 7:58). But the alternation of 'summary' and 'scene' (typically a significant event followed by diverse reactions and interpretative speech) suggests that we may usefully analyse Acts, like many of the Greek novels, in dramatic terms, as a drama with four major acts, each with several scenes. But it must be stressed that this is a modern, not an ancient, division.

H. Outline.

Prelude (1:1–26)

Introduction; Ascension; Election of Matthias

Act I: The Church in Jerusalem (2:1–7:60)

Scene 1: The Day of Pentecost (2:1–47)

Scene 2: Healing at the Temple Gate (3:1–4:22)

Interlude: The Spirit-Filled Life (4:23–5:16)

Scene 3: Apostles on Trial (5:17–42)

Scene 4: The First Christian Martyr (6:1–7:60)

Act II: The Scattered Church: Samaria to Antioch (8:1–12:25)

Scene 1: Samaria and Gaza (8:1–40)

Scene 2: Damascus (9:1–31)

Scene 3: Caesarea (9:32–11:18)

Scene 4: Antioch and Jerusalem (11:19–12:25)

Act III: Paul the Missionary (13:1–21:16)

Scene 1: Paul's First Missionary Journey (13:1–14:28)

Scene 2: The Apostolic Council (15:1–35)

Scene 3: Paul's Second Missionary Journey (15:36–18:23)

Scene 4: Paul's Third Missionary Journey (18:24–21:16)

Act IV: Paul the Prisoner (21:17–28:31)

Scene 1: Paul on Trial: Jerusalem (21:17–23:30)

Scene 2: Paul on Trial: Caesarea (23:31–26:42)

Interlude: Storm and Shipwreck (27:1–28:10)

Scene 3: Paul in Rome (28:11–31)

COMMENTARY

Prelude (1:1–26)

Before the main action can begin, a narrative prelude smooths the transition from the first volume (1:1–5) by repeating the scene of the ascension in greater detail (1:6–11), and making up the numbers of the apostolic group (1:12–26).

(1:1) Authorial Introduction Luke begins his second volume with a conventional opening sentence in which he repeats the name of his addressee, Theophilus, and reminds his readers briefly of the contents of the first volume. Here the author slips out of the role of narrator and speaks in his own voice directly to the reader, as if to remind Theophilus (and all other readers) of the existence of the person who collected all the information behind the two books, the one who 'investigated everything carefully from the very first' and 'wrote it all up in an orderly fashion' (Lk 1:3) so as to reassure Theophilus of the reliability of the instruction he had received (Lk 1:4). This brief summary is a valuable indication of the way ancient readers would have seen the genre of Luke's first volume. The gospel was about 'all that Jesus did and taught': that is, it was a book focused on an individual (biography), and that individual was a teacher. Outside the world of the Bible, the most obvious niche to fit this kind of story into is philosophical biography, in which anecdotes of great teachers of the past were collected to provide images and examples for successive disciples to follow.

(1:2–5) The Story So Far The detached, academic tone of the preface does not last very long. Luke forgets to tell his readers what the second volume is going to contain. Instead, he takes us back to the closing scenes of the first volume, spinning rapidly back from the ascension to Jesus' final command (v. 2) to the forty-day period of resurrection appearances (v. 3). By the time we reach v. 5 (still within the opening sentence in the original), we have slipped a further notch into direct speech (the 'he said' of v. 4 is not in the Gk.), as if we were standing beside the apostles being addressed directly by Jesus himself. Jesus' words in this section recall the opening scenes of the gospel: the gift of the Spirit, which has marked out Jesus' special status during the period of his earthly ministry (Lk 3:16, 22) is about to be extended to his followers, and Luke's second volume is going to spell out what this promise means. This summary recapitulates the final scenes of the gospel (Lk 24), but with certain small differences. Earlier commentators have speculated that the differences might result from clumsy editing when Luke's work was split into two volumes: but each volume as we have it fits the standard length of a papyrus roll, and it is more likely that the bridge is original. Elsewhere, when he retells a story he has already told, Luke shows that he is not averse to varying the details of the story, perhaps because ancient educational practice placed high value on the ability to introduce variety into the retelling of well-known stories.

(1:6–12) Ascension The narrative of Acts proper begins with the apostles 'gathered together' (v. 6) to question Jesus for the last time. The question about the kingdom takes us back to the gospel (cf. Lk 4:43). Although Luke lacks the eschatological immediacy of Mark, the preaching of the kingdom remains an essential element of the gospel in Luke's two volumes. Jesus' answer redefines the future horizon: the eschatological future of apocalyptic expectation is not ruled out, but the apostles' attention is redirected to a closer and more immediate future. The imminent coming of the Spirit (v. 5) will mean their own empowerment for the task of acting as 'witnesses' to Jesus (v. 8). The primary semantic location for the activity of 'witnessing' is forensic, and indeed much of the action within Acts will take place (as Jesus had foretold, Lk 12:11–12) in a variety of trial situations. v. 8 can be read as a geographical programme for the whole book, with the first 7 chapters set in Jerusalem, 8–11 charting the spread of the gospel to the surrounding areas within Syria-Palestine ('Judea and Samaria'), and v. 13 onwards following Paul's mission ever further afield.

Luke alone of the evangelists closes the story of Jesus with a definite point of departure marking the end of the resurrection appearances. But the ascension is no afterthought: narrative clues to this denouement are laid as early as Lk 9:51, and the story is prefigured in the narrative of the transfiguration (Lk 9:28–36: parallels include the mountain, the cloud, and the two 'men'). Luke's description of the Mount of Olives as 'a sabbath day's journey from Jerusalem' (v. 12) highlights the scene of the ascension as a distinct location, the only narrative setting dignified as a 'mountain' in Acts. This is a story that moves not only outwards from Jerusalem but also downwards from the mountain. The story of Acts starts in a place where Jesus is visible, angels speak clearly, and the cloud between earth and heaven is momentarily thinned. From this point onwards, discerning and understanding God's purpose will become progressively harder.

(1:13–26) Election of Matthias There is one more task to be completed before the action proper begins. The disciples wait obediently in Jerusalem for the promised coming of the Spirit (for the 'upper room' cf. Lk 22:12). 'Devoted themselves . . . to prayer' (v. 14) suggests the virtue of dogged perseverance (cf. Rom 12:12; Col 4:2). 'With one accord' (v. 14) underlines the unity of the group, which here includes women and Jesus' mother and brothers, a surprising (cf. Lk 8:19–21) though unemphasized detail. Luke's list of the names of the apostles acts as a bridge with the first volume (cf. Lk 6:14–16). But it also highlights the fact that there is now a gap: Judas, the last in the list in Lk 6:16, is no longer one of the group. The story of Judas' treachery (which Luke assumes his readers will know) was described in Lk 22:3–6, 47–53, but Luke has not yet (unlike Matthew, who appears to know a different story: Mt 27:3–10) told his readers anything about the traitor's fate, and this episode gives him an excuse to do so. But the defection of Judas also creates a theological problem, not only because of the symbolic significance of the number 12 (Lk 22:30), but also because of the high value Luke places on the apostolic office. He has already stressed that the apostles were 'chosen' by Jesus and taught by him 'through the Holy Spirit' (v. 2). Judas' treachery shows that neither fact constitutes an automatic guarantee of fidelity. For Luke, acts of treachery against the Spirit (especially if there is a financial motive) are punished by God: cf. Acts 5:1–11.

Peter's call for a replacement for Judas, based (as so often in Acts) on an appeal to Scripture (v. 20), reinforces the identity of the group at this crisis point in its existence, and also constitutes a de facto recognition of his own authority in the group. In this interim period between the departure of Jesus and the arrival of the Spirit, the only resource is to ask God to indicate his 'choice' of a replacement (v. 24, cf. 1:2) by means of casting lots (v. 26), a means of ascertaining the divine purpose familiar both in the Graeco-Roman world and in the Bible.

Act One: The Church in Jerusalem (2:1–7:60)

Act I Scene 1: The Day of Pentecost (2:1–47)

As so often in Acts, the first big scene of the book is structured around a major theophanic event, the coming of the Spirit (vv. 1–4), followed by crowd reactions (vv. 5–13). Luke then gives us a theological interpretation of the event in Peter's speech (v. 14–36). But the speech is also an event in its own right which triggers its own reactions and results (vv. 37–42). This opening section closes with a transitional summary passage describing the growth of the church (vv. 43–7).

(2:1–4) The Coming of the Spirit Like the departure of Jesus, the coming of the Spirit for Luke is a definite event, located in a particular time and place and describable in empirical terms. The 'day of Pentecost' (v. 1) ties the story into a Jewish liturgical time-frame which began with the festival of Passover (Lk 22:1), and which in its turn was to determine the liturgical shape of the Christian year, limiting the passion and resurrection events to a period of fifty days (and incidentally explaining the continuing presence of large pilgrim crowds in the city: vv. 9–11). But Luke's solemn dating formula ('fulfilled': v. 1) suggests that he may also see a symbolic 'fit' between the outpouring of the Spirit and the festival which in first-century Judaism was a major celebration of the Sinai theophany and the giving of the Law to Israel. 'All together in one place' emphasizes the spiritual unity of the group whose constitution has been so carefully described in ch. 1.

The event itself is both an auditory (v. 2) and a visual experience (v. 3): as so often in biblical theophany, the stress is on comparison rather than direct description (cf. Ezek 1:13). Both wind and fire are associated with God's self-revelation in the HB: cf. Ex 19:16–19; 1 Kings 19:11–12; Isa 6:6. But the choice of these two images is particularly apt for the coming of the Spirit. 'Wind', both in Hebrew and in Greek, is closely associated with 'spirit'. The image of fire links with the Spirit's work of judgement (Lk 3:16–17). And the metaphor of 'tongues' (v. 3) links with the fact that the result of this manifestation of divine power is inspired speech (v. 4).

(2:5–13) Varied Reactions The essentially private experience in the 'house' immediately becomes public: a crowd gathers at the sound (v. 5) of a multiplicity of voices speaking in a cosmopolitan variety of languages. This first proclamation is not the result of a conscious mission plan, but a divinely inspired event which draws a curious audience. Luke heightens the dramatic effect of the Pentecost event by shifting his narrative perspective from the house to the streets outside: the crowd displays all the standard reactions to divine action (vv. 6, 7, 12). But while some hear only a confused babble of ecstatic (or drunken?) voices (v. 13), others hear 'each in their own dialect' a proclamation of God's 'great deeds' (v. 11). This is a miracle of hearing, a reversal of the confusion of tongues at the tower of Babel. Some have speculated that Luke has misunderstood the phenomenon of glossolalia; but among groups that practise speaking in tongues today, there are reports of intelligible speech which is heard as a real language unknown to the speaker.

The crowd itself is carefully characterized. The elaborate list of vv. 9–11 evokes the world-wide Jewish diaspora, nonchalantly straddling the borders of the Roman empire, and firmly centered on Jerusalem (Scott 1994: 561). Rome, on this mental map, is peripheral, the westernmost point imaginable in a sequence that looks to points east, north, south, and west before coming back to the centre. The list of exotic place-names is a foretaste of the geographical explosion that will come to dominate the narrative of Acts; but it is also a reminder that there are many potential journeys that will remain unnarrated, just as there are many more apostles and evangelists than those whose stories Luke will tell.

(2:14–36) Peter's Speech Peter acts as spokesman for the apostles (v. 14). As so often in Acts, Luke leaves it to his characters to provide the theological insights that explain the raw data of experience. This speech, the first major rhetorical composition of the book, is carefully signalled as a formal act of speaking (v. 14), with speakers and audience precisely defined. It introduces two key passages in the early Christian armoury of scriptural proof-texts: both show signs of intensive exegetical labour, and they may well have come down to Luke via an oral (or possibly even written) testimonia-tradition (cf. ACTS E. 2).

The first part of the speech (vv. 14–21) answers the question 'What does this mean?' (v. 12). The group cannot be drunk, Peter explains, because it is only breakfast-time (v. 15). On the contrary, this is something predicted in Scripture. The extended quotation from Joel 2:28–32 (LXX) clarifies a number of points about the apostolic proclamation. (1) The phenomenon of ecstatic speech is identified with the biblical gift of prophecy, and is the work of the same Spirit of God. (2) This is a phenomenon of 'the last days' (v. 17: Luke heightens the eschatological dimension of the original), but belongs to a stage before the final 'day of the Lord' (v. 20): for Luke, the coming of Jesus heralded the beginning of the end-time, but the final end is still to come (cf. Lk 21:9). (3) The promise is inclusive of age, gender, and social class (vv. 17–18); the Spirit is poured out on 'all flesh' (v. 17), and salvation is offered to 'whoever calls on the name of the Lord' (v. 21).

In v. 22 Peter turns to the implied underlying question, Who was Jesus? However dramatic the events surrounding the apostles, they cannot be understood without reference to Jesus. Peter's message here falls into a distinctive pattern analysed in Dodd's (1936) classic study of the apostolic preaching. This pattern is distinct from the Pauline gospel and may well have come to Luke via some form of primitive Christian tradition. The miracles performed by Jesus function as a form of divine attestation of his ministry, but this is a man through whom God was working in the midst of his people (v. 22). Responsibility for his death is threefold: the immediate agency ('lawless men'); the proximate motive force (the local audience which had witnessed Jesus' ministry, vv. 22–3); and behind both, the divine plan (v. 24). Once again, it is Scripture that provides the explanatory key to all this (vv. 25–8, citing Ps 16:8–11). The hope David entertained (v. 26), Peter says, proved false, if it was for himself: David died and his body was disposed of in the normal way (v. 29). Therefore the psalm must be interpreted as a prophetic oracle referring to the Messiah. Only after this scriptural testimony (which establishes the divine necessity of what happened to Jesus) does Peter introduce the personal witness of the apostles to the resurrection (v. 32).

The final section of the speech brings the focus back to the visible and audible events of Pentecost (v. 33): the gift of the Spirit is the direct result (and thus also the proof) of Jesus' exaltation to heaven. Luke shares a conviction (expressed in different ways in Jn 16:7 and in Eph 4:8–12) that the departure of Jesus was a precondition for the coming of the Spirit. Here the ascension is not described as a separate event, but is implicit in the resurrection, and this is the point at which Jesus achieves the title of 'Lord and Christ' (v. 36, cf. Rom 1:4). The Christological use of Ps 110 (v. 34) is widespread in early Christian hermeneutic, linked to the final phrase of Ps 16:11 by the reference to God's 'right hand' (Lindars 1961: 38–45).

(2:37–41) Reactions and Results The crowd reacts dramatically (v. 37): 'What shall we do?' Peter's prescription encapsulates the basic Christian message in four points: repentance, baptism, forgiveness, the gift of the Spirit (v. 38). Israel has to repent (5:31), but so too does the pagan world (17:30). The double package 'repentance and baptism' is associated with the forgiveness of sins (cf. Lk 3:3); but exactly how the association works is not clearly defined. Baptism is now 'in the name of Jesus Christ', and will be followed (or accompanied) by the gift of the Holy Spirit. This is the 'promise' that has dominated Peter's speech. It is not restricted to an apostolic élite: it is as universal as the need for repentance (v. 39). The final line of the Joel quotation (Joel 2:32), embellished and cross-referenced to Isa 57:19, highlights the universality of God's promise to the polyglot Jerusalem crowd. The final verse of the scene dramatically highlights the sermon's positive results (v. 41) and marks the first stage of the church's exponential growth from the small, inward-looking group described in ch. 1 to a significant movement making a world-wide impact (26:26).

(2:42–7) The Church Grows The first big scene of the drama concludes with a summary passage describing the ongoing life of the fledgling community. Luke does not on the whole show much interest in the regular, established patterns of church life, either in Jerusalem or in the Pauline mission: we are left to assume that the activities sketched here in outline continue to form the unstated backdrop to the more dramatic events highlighted in the narrative. Three new elements (teaching, fellowship, and the breaking of bread) have now been added to the prayer that forms the backbone of the group's regular activities (cf. 1:15). 'The breaking of bread' (vv. 42, 46) seems to be distinct from the mere taking of food (v. 46); it is virtually a technical term in the NT (outside Acts it is used only of the last supper and of Jesus' feeding miracles), and at the time Luke is writing can hardly mean anything other than the ritual meal already known to Paul (1 Cor 10:16; 11:24). 'The fellowship' is the only item on the list to be expanded: the group's unity finds practical expression in the common ownership of property (vv. 44–5). v. 47 sums up this first stage of the church's existence as an idyllic state in which the group is in harmony with its parent community ('the whole people': laos in Luke normally refers to the people of Israel) and with God: it is a paradise garden where praise and growth are both spontaneous.

Act I Scene 2: Healing at the Temple Gate (3:1–4:22)

The next major scene opens with the healing of a lame beggar at the temple gate (3:1–10). The miracle is given a theological interpretation through a lengthy speech by Peter (3:11–26), which in turn provokes its own reactions (4:1–4). But this time there is a new twist to the plot. Peter's action attracts the attention of the temple authorities, and the apostles are arrested and put on trial (4:5–12). This is the first of a series of trial scenes that will dominate Acts, bringing out the full forensic implications of the apostles' calling to act as Jesus' 'witnesses' (1:8), and expanding the circle of characters used by Luke to explore the theological implications of the unfolding narrative (4:13–22).

(3:1–10) A Lame Man Healed Luke has already told us that the apostolic band has the power to work miracles (2:43). Now he gives us a detailed account of one paradigmatic healing miracle, precisely timed and located, but with nothing about it at first sight to warn of the controversial situation it will provoke. Luke selects his actors from within a larger group: of all the apostles named in ch. 1, only Peter and John have scenes in their own right, and even John is very much a supporting character here (v. 4). Peter's lack of 'silver and gold' (v. 6: perhaps due to the community's policy on property, 2:44) highlights both the unexpected character of the miracle (the beggar is looking for money, not healing, v. 5) and the apostles' own dependence: only 'in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth' can healing take place. There is a deliberate patterning on gospel healing stories here (cf. Lk 5:23), and in both cases the play on words is almost certainly deliberate: Peter 'raised' (ēgeiren, v. 7) the beggar to a new way of life as well as to new mobility. The crowd reaction (v. 10) heightens the emotional impact of the miracle as well as its solid attestation: here is a whole crowd of witnesses to whom the lame beggar was well known (cf. 3:16; 4:22).

(3:11–26) 'No Other Name' Peter's second speech essentially answers the same two questions as his first: 'What does this mean?' (cf. 2:12) and 'What shall we do?' (cf. 2:37). This time the focus is on the origin of the power that has healed the lame beggar. The question was just as important for Greek readers as for Jewish: was it their own exceptional piety that had given the apostles this divine power (v. 12)? The answer is No: the healing, as the beggar had correctly surmised (vv. 9–10; 13), was the work of God; but God's agent (just as in 2:22) was Jesus, the one chosen by God but denied and destroyed by this very Jerusalem crowd. Peter's words here forge a damning chain of indictment against his audience. Jesus is described in v. 13 as God's 'servant' or 'child': the word is pais (boy), not huios (son), and probably echoes the prophetic 'Servant of God' in LXX Isa 52–3 (the word may reflect an early Christology; cf. also Acts 8:32–5). He is the 'holy and righteous one' (v. 14) and the 'author [or pioneer] of life' (v. 15, cf. Acts 5:31; Heb 2:10), the one whom God 'glorified' (v. 13; cf. Isa 52:13) and raised from the dead (v. 15). In each case the rhetorical effect is heightened by the contrast between Jesus' status in the eyes of God and his systematic dishonouring and rejection by the people ('whom you delivered up . . . you denied . . . you killed'). As for the apostles, their only claim to fame is to act as Jesus' witnesses (v. 15) and to exercise the faith in his name which brings about wholeness (v. 16).

There are, however, a number of mitigating factors. Both the crowd (whom Peter addresses as 'brothers') and their leaders acted 'in ignorance' (v. 17; cf. 13:27). Jesus' death was also part of the divine plan (v. 18): the suffering of the Messiah is something foretold by 'all the prophets'. This is an important theme for Luke, who has already had Jesus explain it to his disciples after the resurrection (Lk 24:26, 46), but he has not yet revealed precisely which prophetic texts can be interpreted in this way. The type of the 'prophet like Moses' in vv. 22–3 (based on Deut 18:19, linked with Lev 23:29) hints at a biblical typology that will allow Luke to find a scriptural prototype for the rejection of God's messenger (this theme is more fully developed in ch. 7). Here, however, the emphasis (v. 19) is on the appeal for repentance, seen as a precondition for 'times of refreshing' (v. 20) and the 'restoration of all things' (v. 21). These puzzling phrases are not easy to parallel elsewhere: they may be relics of a pre-Lukan eschatology, but both underline the fact that even for Luke the period of apostolic mission marks only a temporary postponement, not a replacement, of the final consummation. The speech closes on a positive note: what is on offer to the Jerusalem crowd is a fulfilment of their heritage, both as 'sons of the prophets' (v. 25, cf. 2:39) and as 'sons of the covenant' (v. 25). There is a Pauline ring about Peter's 'to you first' in verse 26 (cf. Rom 1:16): God's offer of blessing is universal, but it is being offered first to Israel.

(4:1–4) Conflicting Reactions The speech is dramatically interrupted by an intervention from authority. This is the first of many in Acts; here (since the healing took place in the temple precincts), it is appropriately the temple authorities who come to silence the apostles. The Sadducees were an aristocratic party linked closely with the priestly hierarchy. Luke ascribes to them an appropriate motive for the arrest (v. 2), since he has already identified the Sadducees as the party within Judaism who 'say that there is no resurrection' (Lk 20:27); Paul will later exploit this to good effect (Acts 23:6–9). This may explain why Luke picks out the resurrection (which has not been especially prominent) as the particularly offensive aspect of Peter's speech. The circumstantial detail that it was 'evening' (v. 3) ties the episode in with 3:1: we are still within the same dramatic scene. Meanwhile, behind the scenes, the church continues to grow (v. 4): many of 'the people' (v. 1) react positively to 'the word' (a favourite Lukan expression for the preaching of the gospel, cf. Lk 1:2), and the total number of believers now reaches 'about five thousand'.

(4:5–12) Arrest and Trial After a night in jail, the apostles are brought before a full session of the Sanhedrin (v. 15), the ruling council of Judea: the titles listed here enumerate all the groups from which the council was made up (cf. Lk 9:22; 20:1). Annas had been deposed as high priest in 15 CE, but continued to wield influence behind the scenes during the term of his son-in-law Caiaphas (18–36 CE: cf. Lk 3:2). The trial scenes so prominent in Acts highlight the forensic dimension of the apostolic call to bear witness (1:8, cf. Lk 21:13–15). In Luke's dramatic presentation it is not easy to distinguish forensic testimony from preaching: Peter's reply to the Council's question (v. 7) picks up more or less where his sermon left off. The key point (as in 3:16) concerns the origin of the power responsible for the healing miracle: by identifying this power with Jesus (v. 10) Peter once again faces the ruling authorities with the possibility that their treatment of Jesus was a terrible misjudgement. The point is rammed home with a new scriptural text (v. 11): the paradox of the rejected stone (Ps 118:22) was a favourite in early Christian reflection on the foreshadowing of Jesus in the Scriptures (Lk 20:17, cf. further 1 Pet 2:7; Lindars 1961: 169–74). Peter's final sentence goes further than anything he has yet said: Christ is the only means of salvation. The Greek word used of the beggar's healing is 'saved', a word used routinely of physical health and well-being (cf. Lk 8:48), and this allows Peter to answer the question in terms of the broader eschatological concept of 'salvation' already evoked in 2:40 and 2:21. Joel 2:32 promises 'salvation' from the tribulations of the last days to 'all who call on the name of the Lord', and this was almost certainly interpreted by the early Christians as a reference to the name of Christ.

(4:13–22) Deliberations of the Council Luke uses the privileged position of the narrator to give us an insight into the inner workings of the Sanhedrin. Readers do not need to know much about the politics of first-century Jerusalem to pick up the élitist perspective here (we do not need to assume that the apostles were totally illiterate, just that they had not attained the professional educational levels of the 'elders and scribes'). This élitist perspective is reinforced by the Council's 'us' and 'them' attitude to 'the people' (vv. 16, 17, 21)—an attitude which, Luke implies, is reciprocal (v. 21). 'Boldness' (parrhēsia v. 13) is not physical courage so much as 'frankness' or 'freedom of speech', a philosophical virtue particularly admired by the Greeks. The apostles' refusal to be silenced (v. 19) is a classic statement of philosophical parrhēsia. Finally, the Council's perspective is characterized by 'wonder' (v. 13): the supernatural is never very far away in this narrative, and Luke makes it clear that the fact of the beggar's healing (v. 14) is impossible to gainsay, even for hostile observers (v. 22). Thus the 'signs' given by God (v. 22; cf. 2:19) are in their own right an important part of the apostolic testimony (cf. 14:3).

Act I Interlude: The Spirit-Filled Life (4:23–5:16)

Most commentators are agreed that the story of Ananias and Sapphira (5:1–11) is in some way an isolated relic of tradition relating to a bygone phase of the Jerusalem church. Luke has bracketed this with two summary passages about the community of goods (4:32–7) and the progress of the church (5:12–16), and prefaces the whole section with a glimpse of the apostolic circle at prayer (4:23–31). The effect is of an interlude in the drama, underlining the power of the Spirit at work in the church, and the authority of the apostles, especially Peter.

(4:23–31) A Prophetic Prayer Like other biblical writers, Luke uses prayer to provide ongoing comment on the storyline. The authorities have just imposed a total ban on speaking or teaching in Jesus' name (4:18), and the new situation has to be reported and evaluated. Peter's 'you must judge' (4:19) is in a sense addressed to the reader as well as to the Sanhedrin: what is the correct Christian attitude in the face of such a prohibition, imposed by the legitimate civic authorities? The apostles themselves are in no doubt that the situation calls for the legitimate exercise of free speech in the face of a tyrannical abuse of authority (v. 29). Their prayer creates a theological framework for this stance, first by evoking the sovereignty of God (v. 24), as the ultimate authority that relativizes all human seats of power, and second by locating the present situation in Scripture. Ps 2 (quoted in vv. 25–6) exerted a powerful influence on the Christology of the early church: the word translated Messiah in v. 26 is christos, which makes it easy to read the psalm as a direct prophecy of those involved in the trial of Jesus (v. 27). The implication is that the hostility experienced by his followers simply makes them part of the same predetermined pattern (v. 28). Only Luke includes Herod in the passion narrative (Lk 22:6–12). The renewed visitation of the Spirit (almost a second Pentecost, v. 31) serves as a confirmation that the apostles' reading of the situation is the right one.

(4:32–7) The Common Life This summary is a slightly fuller repetition of 2:44–5. The added detail that the money raised from the sale of property was channelled through the apostles (v. 35) heightens the sense of centralized authority. There is no sense that Luke envisaged the Jerusalem community establishing a genuine coenobitic life (presumably any Jerusalem residents who joined the church continued to live in their own homes: cf. 2:46; 5:42). The emphasis is on the sale of disposable property by those who could afford it, in order to create a surplus for charitable distribution (v. 34, echoing Deut 15:4). This emphasis ties in with Luke's own interest in the proper use of surplus wealth (cf. Lk 6:20, 24), and it is conceivable that he has simply misunderstood an early tradition that may have reflected something more like the Essene lifestyle. (Sterling 2000). The mention of Barnabas (vv. 36–7) provides a positive example of this ideal use of wealth; it also (with typically Lukan economy) introduces a character, in good standing with the apostles, who will prove important at a later stage in the plot (cf. Acts 9:26–30).

(5:1–11) Ananias and Sapphira As it stands, this story does not quite fit the background information Luke has given us. v. 4 seems to conflict with 2:44 and 4:32 (unless ‘all’ is just Lucan hyperbole), and raises questions about the severity of the punishment: if the community of goods could be partial, and was purely voluntary, why is Ananias treated so harshly? The difficulties of understanding the story as it stands make it more rather than less likely that Luke has taken it over from tradition, and perhaps imperfectly understood it. The parallel with Qumran (Fitzmyer 1998: 318) makes it clear that it is the couple’s conspiracy to deceive, rather than the absolute monetary value of the sale, that constitutes the heart of their sin against koinōnia: the failure to share money is simply a symptom of a more serious failure to be ‘of one mind’ within the community (cf. Eph 4:25; Col 3:9). Lying to the community is ‘lying to God’ (v. 4) and ‘tempting the Holy Spirit’ (v. 9; cf. Phil 2:1–2 and 2 Cor 13:14 for a connection between the Spirit and koinōnia). In Luke’s narrative, the story also serves to highlight the authority of the church (ekklesia: v. 11 is Luke’s first use of this term) as the locus of God’s Spirit, and especially to underline the supernatural insight and authority of Peter, who sees through the deception (vv. 3–5, 8–9). It is another of the ‘signs’ God sends to confirm the church’s spiritual authority, and, like the healing miracles, induces ‘great fear’ (vv. 5, 11).

(5:12–16) Signs and Wonders The interlude concludes with a summary passage describing the ongoing healing ministry of the apostles. The note on ‘Solomon’s Portico’ (v. 12) is a realistic reflection of the group’s actual size: the only place such a large group could now be ‘all together’ is in a large public space. For the stoa of Solomon (the site of Peter’s impromptu sermon in 3:11), see Jos. J.W. 5:185; Jn 10:22. Luke stresses again the high reputation of the Christian group among ‘the people’ (v. 13). v. 15 implies that the bringing out of the sick for healing is a manifestation of ‘belief’, and there may be a contrast between this secret form of believing and the public commitment that would be implied by openly ‘joining’ the crowd in the portico (v. 13); the mention of ‘women’ (who might not join a public teaching session) may support this view. The scope and popularity of this healing ministry are described in terms that rival that of Jesus (cf. Lk 4:40–1, 6:18–19). The healing power emanating from Peter is so great that there is no need even to touch him (v. 15; cf. Lk 7:11–10; 8:43).

Act I Scene 3: Apostles on Trial (5:17–42)

At the end of the trial in ch. 4, the apostles are issued with a blanket prohibition on teaching in the name of Jesus. Their disdainful reply (4:19) leaves the reader in little doubt that the authorities will soon have cause to arrest them again: and so it proves. But this time things are stacked against the forces of officialdom. Arrest is followed immediately by miraculous release (5:17–26); official reprimand meets only defiance (5:27–32); and at least one respected member of the Council begins to doubt the wisdom of pursuing the case (5:33–40). The scene closes with a brief summary (5:41–2) describing the gospel’s triumphant progress.

(5:17–26) Arrest and Escape This time it is the whole apostolic group that finds itself in jail (v. 18). Like his contemporary Josephus, Luke is happy to use the Greek term hairesis

(sect, v. 17) to give a more nuanced description of the political groupings of first-century Palestine: the term is appropriately used elsewhere both of the Pharisees (15:5; 26:5) and of the Christians (24:5, 14; 28:22). ‘Jealousy’ (v. 17) may not be the best description of their motive, however: zēlos also means ‘zeal’, and in Acts may often be better seen in terms of a praiseworthy, if misguided, religious zeal (Paul uses it of himself in Gal 1:14, Phil 3:6, and cf. Rom 10:2). The conundrum posed by Peter in 4:19, if the reader still has any doubts, is dramatically resolved here as the apostles are miraculously released and instructed by no less than ‘an angel of the Lord’ to continue with their preaching mission in the temple (vv. 19–21). The miracle provides divine sanction for the apostles’ civil disobedience, and leaves the priestly authorities in an embarrassing and farcical position (recounted by Luke with a touch of dramatic irony, vv. 21–5). The apostles’ popularity with ‘the people’ is again a factor in their treatment by the ruling authorities (v. 26).

(5:27–32) The Trial This second trial is essentially a reprise of the first, with the difference that the charge now is direct disobedience of an explicit instruction (v. 28). Peter’s reply (v. 29) is equally unequivocal: like the philosopher Socrates or the prophet Daniel, the apostles take their orders from a higher authority, and cannot consider themselves bound by any human court. The charge that they intend ‘to bring this man’s blood on us’ should be read within the precise socio-political context that Luke has taken care to define: ‘us’ here means the ruling authorities, and stands in contrast to ‘the people’ who support the apostles. Peter’s speech summarizes the essential points made in the previous sermons: Jesus has been raised and exalted by God; his present position at God’s right hand is a precondition for the outpouring of gifts (vv. 31–2). A new element is the description of Jesus’ death as ‘hanging him on a tree’ (v. 30), using language derived from Deut 21:22–3 (cf. 10:39); the connection with crucifixion had already been made by exegetes at Qumran (Fitzmyer 1998: 337), and is also made by Paul (Gal 3:13). The primary result of Jesus’ exaltation is that the gift of ‘repentance and forgiveness of sins’ is now offered to Israel (v. 31).

(5:33–9) The Advice of Gamaliel Luke again adopts the privileged position of an omniscient narrator to report a private debate from within the ranks of the Sanhedrin (v. 34). Gamaliel’s intervention introduces an ironic commentary on the unfolding plot, posing a question that the reader will be able to answer (Luke makes sure of that) even if the council members cannot (vv. 38–9). In fact Gamaliel’s question will prove to be a key issue for the whole narrative: it is not only those outside the church who sometimes fail to recognize where God is at work. The role attributed to the historical figure of Gamaliel at this point in the narrative is not in itself implausible: this is Rabban Gamaliel the Elder, one of the great Pharisaic teachers of the first century, who flourished c.25–50 CE and is later said to have been the teacher of Paul (22:3). There is however a historical problem about the examples he cites. Theudas and Judas are both mentioned (in the same order) by Josephus at Ant. 20. 97–8, 102; but the mention of Judas is a flashback to the period of the first Roman census of Judea (cf. Lk 2:1–2). Theudas, on the other hand, is dated by Josephus to the procuratorship of Fadus (44–6 CE). This is well after the dramatic date of Luke's story, which must be before the death of Herod in 44 (Acts 12:20–3). Either Luke has made a mistake (possibly due to faulty memory of a source similar to that used by Josephus); or Josephus has; or there was another, earlier Theudas: all these options have been argued by commentators.

(5:40–2) Summary and Transition The Sanhedrin's decision to treat the apostles with caution does not prevent their being flogged (v. 40), a routine treatment in ancient courts used for eliciting the truth from witnesses as well as for punishment. The apostles' 'joy' (v. 41) establishes their credentials as martyrs: 'worthy to be dishonoured for the Name' is a highly paradoxical statement that expresses the Christian theology of martyrdom very well, and illustrates the importance attached to honour and shame in the first-century Mediterranean world. The section closes with an assurance that the apostles' parrhēsia is undaunted (v. 42): the gospel message is assiduously proclaimed, not only in the temple but 'from house to house'.

Act I Scene 4: The First Christian Martyr (6:1–7:60)

The Jerusalem section of Luke's narrative closes with an extended trial scene incorporating the longest speech in the book (7:2–53). This scene introduces a new character, Stephen, and his story is prefaced with a piece of church 'business' which provides the necessary background to his appointment (6:1–7) and to the controversy that brought him to trial (6:8–7:1).

(6:1–7) Appointment of the Seven Luke gives us a tantalizingly brief glimpse into the inner workings of the church, bracketed with two summary verses (5:42; 6:7). The terms 'Hellenists' and 'Hebrews' (v. 1) almost certainly refer to a language-based distinction between the two major groupings of converts in the Jerusalem church. The Hellenists are Jews whose major language is Greek (the international language of the eastern Mediterranean), and the Hebrews are Jews whose major language is Hebrew or Aramaic. The fact that all the seven have Greek names (v. 5), and that Stephen immediately gets into dispute with members of a group of diaspora synagogues (v. 9), suggests a diaspora connection, even though it is true that many Palestinian Jews also spoke Greek. The choice of candidates for this extension (or better, division) of the ministry is taken very seriously: the 'body of disciples' (v. 2) is treated like the assembly of a Greek city, who approve the apostles' proposal (v. 5) and 'choose' their representatives with care (v. 5 cf. 1:2, 24). The candidates are already marked out as 'full of the Spirit' (vv. 3, 5), but the transmission of authority from the apostles is very deliberately assured through prayer and the laying on of hands (v. 6).

(6:8–7:1) Stephen on Trial The atmosphere of controversy which has been building up since ch. 4 now enters a new phase. Stephen's opponents are not the temple hierarchy but members of diaspora communities settled in Jerusalem (6:9). The Latin title libertini ('Freedmen') indicates a group of Jews of Italian origin who were now settled in Jerusalem: the term is known from Latin sources, cf. e.g. Tacitus, Annals, 2:85. Although the synagogue is essentially a diaspora institution (worship in Jerusalem was focused on the temple), rabbinic sources refer to synagogues in the city, and the Theodotus inscription makes it reasonably certain that there was at least one Greek-speaking synagogue in Jerusalem in the first century (Fitzmyer 1998: 356–8; Riesner 1995: 179–210; text in Falk 1995: 281). The charges against Stephen echo those brought against Jesus in the gospels (for 'blasphemy', cf. Lk 22:71; and for threatening the temple, cf. Mk 14:56–8). The charge of subverting the law (v. 14) is new, and will reappear in the charges against Paul (cf. esp. 21:28). The law had a peculiar importance in the diaspora as a marker of identity: interestingly, Theodotus declares that his synagōgē or 'meeting-house' is set up 'for the reading of the Law and instruction in the commandments'.

(7:2–53) Stephen's Speech Stephen's speech seems on the surface to have little to do with the charges against him. Like most of the apologetic speeches in Acts, it is part of a larger polemical discourse, building on and developing the arguments already put forward in the sermons and trial speeches of the apostles. Nevertheless, this particular speech does have a distinctive ethos, which has led some commentators to suppose an underlying Hellenist or Antiochene source. In genre, the speech is quite different from the speeches of Peter. It falls into the category of 'rewritten Bible', a selective retelling of biblical history from a particular theological standpoint, of which we have several examples in intertestamental literature (cf. PBJL A5; A6); the form occurs already in the Bible itself, cf. e.g. Ps 105. Like other Jewish groups in the Second Temple period, the Christians used the biblical past to define their own identity.

(7:2–8) The Call of God Abraham is recognized throughout the NT as the spiritual ancestor of Jewish and Gentile believers alike. But the main actor in this national epic is God, who commands (v. 3), removes (v. 4), gives (vv. 5, 8), and promises (v. 5). Human achievement is defined in terms of being receptive to the vision of God (v. 2) and obedient to his word (vv. 4, 8). Like the author of Hebrews (11:8–10), Luke stresses Abraham's reliance on God's promise (v. 5) and highlights the experience of alienation rather than the inheritance of the land (v. 6). And by a careful selection of texts from Gen 15 and Ex 2–3 Luke subtly redefines the promise itself to focus on the creation of a worshipping community rather than on the acquisition of land (latreuein, 'worship' in v. 7 echoes Lk 1:74, and both pick up Ex 3:12, which refers to Sinai, not Canaan).

(7:9–16) Conflict in the Family Bypassing other episodes in the patriarchal narratives, Stephen moves on to the story of Joseph and Jacob's migration to Egypt, an episode that prepares the ground for the nation's exile in Egypt. This selection allows him to highlight the history of fraternal conflict within Israel, a conflict sparked by zēlos (which here does mean 'envy': v. 9, cf. Philo, De Josepho, 5). Joseph (like Daniel and Esther) was significant for diaspora Jews as a patriarch who, though forcibly separated from the land of promise, learns to live (and even flourish) in a pagan environment without compromising his faith: the key to Joseph's story is that even in Egypt, 'God was with him' (v. 9). For Christians, there is an additional typology: like Jesus, Joseph is rejected by his brothers, falls into 'afflictions', and is rescued by God (v. 10) in such a way that he in turn is able to save his people. For the number 75 (v. 14), cf. Gen 46:27, where LXX and some Qumran traditions read 75. v. 15 is a highly compressed form of the Genesis account of Jacob's visits to Egypt (Gen 45, 47, 49); and the burial place of Jacob (v. 16) is confused with that of Joseph (cf. Gen 23:16–20; 33:19; 50:13; Josh 24:32).

(7:17–22) The Birth of a Saviour Stephen now picks up the theme of promise (v. 17), identifying the key promise to Abraham (cf. Lk 1:73) as that of Gen 15:13–14, fulfilled in the Exodus (Ex 2:24; 3:12) rather than in the Conquest (which is of only passing interest to Stephen, cf. 7:45). The exposure of newborn infants (v. 22) was routine in the Gentile world—though in that context it would be more normal to expose the females and rear the males (cf. Philo, Vit. Mos. 1.10). It was at this precise moment of crisis and potential disaster that Moses was born (v. 20). 'Beautiful' (asteios) echoes LXX Ex 2:2, and is highlighted here by the addition of 'before God': cf. Philo's 'more than ordinary goodness'. The child is 'picked up' by Pharaoh's daughter (the technical term used for acknowledging a newborn child and agreeing to rear it). As in Philo, Moses' education in the palace is seen in terms of gaining (and excelling in) the best that the pagan world could offer (cf. Philo, Vit. Mos. 1.20–4).

(7:23–9) Moses Rejected Given this auspicious start in life, it is all the more ironic that Moses' first attempt to help his own people results in humiliation and rejection. Unlike the Exodus story (Ex 2:11–15), this retelling presupposes that Moses himself already understands that it is his destiny to act as God's agent of 'salvation' for his people (sōtēria, v. 25: NRSV, rescuing), and that the people themselves should have recognized the fact. Neither Philo nor Josephus makes this particular point out of this episode: Josephus ignores it, and Philo mentions it simply as a 'righteous act' on the part of Moses that incurs the wrath of the king and puts Moses' life in danger (Vit. Mos. 1.40–6). It is a peculiarly Christian typology, and one well adapted to the dramatic scenario of Stephen's speech, which understands Moses as the prototype of Jesus, sent by God as saviour of his people but rejected by those he came to save.

(7:30–8) Moses Selected Moses' rejection by his own people is placed in stark juxtaposition with his call by God. vv. 30–4 extract the key statements from the much longer narrative of Ex 3, 4. The assimilation of Horeb and Sinai (cf. v. 30 with Ex 3:1) was well established by Luke's day: the 'mountain of God' (Ex 3:1 was pre-eminently Sinai, and it is clearly Sinai to which Ex 3:12 refers. As with Abraham, this is a moment of angelic vision (v. 30) and divine voice (v. 31): Moses' contribution is limited to amazement (v. 31) and trembling (v. 33). Deliverance, too, is all God's work: 'I have seen ... I have heard ... I have come down to deliver ... I will send' (v. 34). But it is 'this Moses' (v. 35), the rejected one, who is chosen by God as the privileged recipient of the divine vision, and the one whom God sends as both 'ruler and deliverer'. The paradox recalls Peter's words at 2:13, 4:10, and it is underlined by the repeated houtos ('this one') in vv. 36–8. Like Peter (3:22), Stephen picks out Moses' prediction of the prophet (Deut 18:15 LXX) as a prediction of Christ (v. 37): the typology will be made more explicit in v. 52. And it was this same Moses who received the 'living oracles' of the law to pass on to the ekklesia ('congregation') of God's people ('to us', v. 38).

(7:39–43) Apostasy in the Wilderness At this point the syntactical focus shifts from Moses to 'our fathers', who become the subject of all the verbs in vv. 39–41. These are verbs of disobedience and apostasy: the message could not be clearer that Stephen's problem lies not with Moses or his teachings (6:11, 14) but with those who have consistently refused to obey them. The request for the golden calf (v. 40) is couched explicitly in terms that reflect the standard biblical denunciation of pagan idolatry (v. 41: Ps 97:7; Isa 48:5; Ps 135:15; Ps 115:4). Stephen uses an extensive quotation from Am 5:25–7 to reinforce his point: the rhetorical question of the opening is interpreted here as evidence that Israel's apostasy can be traced back to the wilderness period.

The passage from Amos is a notorious crux in the Hebrew, and Luke is drawing here on a long tradition of exegetical reflection. In v. 43 Luke follows LXX, which vocalizes the Hebrew sikkut (Am 5:26: the name of an Assyrian god) as sukkat (tabernacle, 'tent', NRSV), and 'king' (melech) as Moloch. The Hebrew 'Kaiwan your star-god' becomes 'the star of your god Raiphan': there are several MS variants for the last name, whose origin is obscure. Luke's only real change to the Amos text is to substitute 'Babylon' for the original 'Damascus', conflating Amos's vision of exile under the Assyrian empire with the later and more paradigmatic experience of exile in Babylon.

(7:44–53) Tabernacle and Temple It can hardly be a coincidence that Stephen moves directly from the 'tent of Moloch' to the 'tent of testimony', i.e. the tabernacle, though the logic of the transition is not entirely clear. Stephen's point seems to be that the wilderness tabernacle, which Moses made in obedience to the 'pattern' given by God (v. 44), was closer to God's will than King Solomon's temple, despite the fact that David had sought God's leave to build the temple (v. 46; cf. 2 Sam 7:1–16). It is of course Solomon himself who recognizes the futility of trying to build a house for God (v. 48; cf. 1 Kings 8:27): Stephen is exploiting an ambivalence about the temple that may be particularly felt in diaspora circles, but is already deeply rooted in the Hebrew Scriptures, as the following quotation from Isa 66:1–2 shows (vv. 9–50). 'Stiff-necked' (v. 51) takes us back to the wilderness generation: cf. Ex 33:3. The charge of 'resisting the Holy Spirit' that forms Stephen's peroration (v. 51) is also based on Scripture, cf. Isa 63:10: from here it is a logical step to the charge of persecuting the prophets who are inspired by the Spirit (v. 52; cf. Heb 11:32–8). This was a widespread tradition in early Judaism (cf. Fitzmyer 1998: 385), particularly highlighted by Luke (e.g. Lk 13:34); here it is linked implicitly with Moses' prophecy (v. 37), and explicitly with the chief role of the prophets for Christians, that of predicting the Messiah. Stephen's speech thus ends up with the same accusation as Peter's (v. 52); the long history of apostasy and rebellion is simply a way of identifying the scriptural patterns that underlie the crisis of rejection in the present generation.

(7:54–60) Stephen's Death Audience reactions to this speech are described in highly dramatic tones (v. 54), heightened even further by the description of Stephen's vision (vv. 55–6). Stephen's vision of the glory of God highlights his continuity with Abraham (7:2) and Moses (cf. Ex 33:18–23); but now the open heaven (v. 56) also contains the figure of Jesus himself. Jesus' position 'at the right hand of God' (v. 55) denotes the highest place of honour: the vision fully confirms Stephen's claim that the rejected saviour is in fact God's 'Righteous One'. Many different explanations of the fact that the Son of Man is 'standing' have been suggested (cf. Fitzmyer 1998: 392–3 and Johnson 1992: 139). Despite the differing circumstances, there are a number of literary parallels with Luke's description of the death of Jesus. Stephen commits his spirit to God and cries out 'in a loud voice' (vv. 59–60; cf. Lk 23:46). The prayer for forgiveness (v. 60) echoes in thought the prayer of Lk 23:34 (omitted in some MSS), though the wording is entirely different. The most dramatic difference is that when Stephen, the prototype for Christian martyrdom, dies 'calling on the name of the Lord' (v. 59), it is the exalted Jesus whom he expects to receive his spirit.

Act Two: The Scattered Church: Samaria to Antioch
(8:1–12:25)

Act II Scene 1: Samaria and Gaza (8:1–40)

Stephen's death is the trigger for a 'severe persecution' (8:1) which ushers in a new stage in the church's existence. From now on, the gospel is not confined to Jerusalem, but moves steadily outwards, carried by anonymous Christians (8:4). It will be increasingly hard for Luke to marshal the scattered pieces of information he has about the new foci of the church's life, and this central section reflects that difficulty: there is a less precise geographical structure here, and Luke seems to have few indications as to chronology. But this section forms a vital bridge between the stationary church of the Jerusalem narrative (chs. 1–7) and the evangelistic journeys of the Pauline mission (chs. 13–28). It also includes the two key moments of theophany around which the whole narrative spirals, Paul's conversion (ch. 9) and Peter's vision (chs. 10–11).

(8:1–4) The Church Scattered Geographically, the new stage is focused around two poles. The apostles stay on in Jerusalem (vv. 1, 14); and Jerusalem remains a narrative focus through to ch. 12. But the rest of the church is 'scattered throughout the countryside of Judea and Samaria' (v. 1). We are moving on to the middle stage of the apostolic commission in 1:8, but it is not just the apostles who do the preaching: unnamed disciples exploit their 'scattered' condition (v. 4) to spread the gospel. Interwoven with this story of expansion is the darker theme of persecution: Stephen is buried (v. 2), and Saul, slyly introduced as a bystander in 7:58, is painted in vivid and dramatic language as a zealous instigator of the persecution. How broad the persecution was (or how long it lasted) is not entirely clear. By 9:26 there is a group of 'disciples' back in Jerusalem alongside the apostles; it is possible that the community most affected was the one to which both Stephen and Saul belonged, the believers who belonged to synagogues of diaspora origin.

(8:5–13) Philip's Mission in Samaria Philip is not an apostle but one of the seven (6:5). We shall meet him again at 21:8, still characterized as 'the evangelist' but now settled in Caesarea with four daughters: the connection with a 'we-passage' suggests an obvious source from which Luke (directly or indirectly) could have obtained this story. 'Samaria' (v. 5) may be either the region (as in RSV) or the name of its capital city (as in NRSV), which was rebuilt under Herod the Great. Philip's preaching is presented as a highly successful piece of evangelism, accompanied by miraculous healings which impress the city's population (vv. 6, 8). It is only in v. 9 that Luke reveals that Philip has a competitor in Samaria: Simon was used to commanding the same focused attention from the Samaritans (vv. 9, 10). Simon's popular title (v. 10) may reflect local divine names. Justin Martyr (possibly drawing on local knowledge) identifies him as a Samaritan magician, later honoured in Rome as a god (Justin, 1 Apol. 26; 56; Dial. 20.6). Luke, however, labels his activity as 'magic' (vv. 9, 11), always a pejorative term in Acts: the magician's powers may be real, but they fade into insignificance beside the powers of the gospel. The preaching of the word brings about not just a nine days' wonder, but belief and baptism, i.e. intellectual conviction and entry into a new community. The fact that the magician himself is impressed by Philip (v. 13) simply serves to highlight the gospel's power: there is nothing in this verse to suggest that Simon's conversion was any less real than those of his auditors.

(8:14–25) The Coming of the Spirit: Samaria The enigmatic character of Simon Magus fascinated later Christians. Irenaeus identifies him as the founder of the 'Simonian' Gnostics (Adv. haer. 1.23). For Luke, however, the issue is not heresy but the illegitimate appropriation of divine power, and money (as so often) is a symptom of a deeper corruption. Simon's request implies that he thought he could enter into some kind of contractual arrangement with the apostles that would enable him to confer the Spirit at will (vv. 18–19). But the Spirit is God's gift (v. 20), and cannot be bought for cash. The sin of 'simony' (defined as 'the purchase and sale of spiritual things': ODCC s.v.) takes its name from this story.

The story also highlights two related issues of church order. (1) The role of the apostles. Luke's structuring of this episode implies a supervisory role for the Jerusalem church, concerned to keep an eye on new developments. The fact that Samaria has received God's word merits an apostolic visitation (v. 14). Luke is able to assure his readers that each significant new step in the expansion of the gospel has been tested and approved by the apostles. (2) Baptism and the Spirit. The sequence of events in this episode seems to imply (a) that baptism in the name of Jesus (v. 12) and the reception of the Spirit (v. 15) were two distinct events for the Samaritans and (b) that the latter could not happen without the laying on of hands by the apostles (v. 17). The passage has therefore been used in some churches to justify the practice of confirmation as a separate rite from baptism, and in others to argue that a distinct experience of the Spirit is necessary as a supplement to baptism. The problem with both these arguments is that although the sequence is clear in this passage, it is by no means universal, even in Acts (let alone in the rest of the NT): elsewhere the Spirit is bestowed before baptism (e.g. 10:44–8), or is not recorded at all (e.g. 8:38). Luke was not writing Acts as a manual of church discipline and is manifestly unconcerned to define the exact order in which the four elements involved in conversion occur (see above on 2:38).

The crucial point here in terms of plot is that the apostles' visit brings about a Samaritan Pentecost which demonstrates conclusively that this new step in the mission of the church has received the seal of the Spirit. The apostles, far from being against this development, are actively promoting it by conducting further evangelistic activity in Samaritan territory (v. 5).

(8:26–40) Philip and the Ethiopian Philip has another significant evangelistic task to perform before he disappears from the stage again. This episode shows Philip to be open and obedient to divine guidance. Luke shows little interest in ontological questions about spiritual phenomena: both angel (v. 26) and Spirit (vv. 29, 39) originate in God, and their effect on the observer is hard to distinguish (cf. 23:8–9). Luke's geography, however, is more exact than many commentators have given him credit for: Philip's route due south from Samaria intersects at Eleutheropolis with the Jerusalem–Gaza road (v. 26: epi means 'down to' or 'to meet'). Even the timing of this journey is miraculous: just at that moment (kai idou, lit. and behold, 27), Philip's path crosses the route of the Ethiopian pilgrim, heading west to strike the coast road towards Egypt.

What is the significance of this figure? Later tradition identified the eunuch as the first Gentile convert, and the founder of the Ethiopian church (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 2.1.13), but this does not seem quite to fit Luke's plot, with its elaborate build-up to the conversion of Cornelius in ch. 10. Luke lays more stress on the eunuch's links with Judaism: this is a man who has been to worship in the Jerusalem temple (v. 27) and is reading the prophet Isaiah (v. 28). Given the existence of a well-documented Jewish community at Elephantine (Aswan), Jewish influence south of Egypt is not implausible. Ancient readers would certainly imagine this character as an African: Ethiopia, in ancient geography, was the equivalent of Nubia, today's Sudan, rather than the modern Ethiopia. Readers who knew their Bibles might also pick up prophetic resonances, in which the Ethiopians (Heb. 'Cushites') figure among the most distant peoples from whom God will gather a remnant to worship in Jerusalem (e.g. Isa 11:11, Zeph 3:9–10).

The detail Luke lavishes on this story foregrounds the vital importance the early Christians attached to the correct interpretation of scripture (vv. 30–1): this was an integral part of the apostolic witness (Lk 24:44–9). The eunuch's question (v. 34) is still debated by OT scholars. As so often, a genuine difficulty within the Hebrew text provides a hook for Christological exegesis; but the real value of this passage for Christians lay in providing prophetic warrant for the ignominious death that Jesus had in fact suffered (Lindars 1961: 77–88). According to the Western text, Philip asks for and receives a declaration of faith before proceeding with the baptism, and the eunuch then receives the Spirit; Luke, as noted above, seems distressingly unconcerned to establish uniform practice in the apostolic period, and this reading looks like an attempt to iron out anomalies. The scene ends as abruptly as it began (v. 39): unlike the Cornelius episode, it is pure encounter, with no ongoing implications for the church. When the travellers reach the coast road, the Ethiopian turns south towards Gaza, while Philip (v. 40) turns north towards Azotus; as a character, he is now tidied away to Caesarea (to reappear briefly at 21:8), but his evangelistic activity en route provides some preparation for Peter's activities in the coastal areas in 9:32–43.

Act II Scene 2: Damascus (9:1–31)

The scene now shifts to back to Jerusalem. The apparently minor character of Saul (7:58; 8:1–3) undergoes a dramatic conversion from persecutor to preacher. This episode, retold twice in Acts (22:4–21; 26:9–18), is one of the most important episodes in the drama, both in its own right and because it introduces and legitimates the man who is to become the central character of the second half of Acts.

(9:1–9) On the Damascus Road The term 'conversion' is anachronistic and misleading if we think of it in terms of a change from one religion to another. Christianity was not at this stage a distinct religion in the modern sense but a sect within Second Temple Judaism, promoting one among a number of contested Jewish identities (Acts 24:14). It is a 'conversion' in the strict biblical sense, that is a complete change of direction; Luke's use of the term 'the Way' (v. 2; cf. v. 17, 'on the road [= way]') plays up this aspect of the story. Paul himself refers to his experience both as a prophetic call (Gal 1:15) and as an experience of the risen Christ (Gal 1:16; 1 Cor 15:8), and there is a strong element of both these in Luke's account (though Luke does not use the experience to justify giving Paul the rank of apostle).

The dramatic conversion of a persecutor or scoffer was a topos familiar both to Jewish and to Greek readers (cf. Dan 1–6; 2 Macc 3:13–40), and the vivid detail of Luke's story highlights the completeness of the reversal. Saul's threatening and purposeful journey (v. 1) comes to an abrupt halt (v. 3); the heavenly light deprives him of sight (v. 8); the heavenly voice leaves Saul's retinue speechless (v. 7); the instigator of punitive action has to be 'told what to do' (v. 6) and 'led by the hand' (v. 8). As in 2 Macc 3:28, it is a story of reversal which demonstrates clearly 'the sovereign power of God'. But what is particularly terrifying for Saul is that the voice that speaks from the midst of the theophanic light is the voice of 'Jesus, whom you are persecuting' (v. 5)—confirmation that Stephen's vision (7:56) was not total delusion.

(9:10–19a) Ananias's Vision Saul's story (like Cornelius': Barrett 1994–9: i. 453) is in fact the story of two visions, each confirming the other. We are told nothing of Ananias's past history, or of how he came to be a disciple (v. 10), but v. 13 implies that he was a Damascus resident. Ananias is given precise directions as to Saul's address (v. 11: the 'street called Straight' is still shown in the Old City of Damascus). Like many OT characters (e.g. Moses in Ex 3:11–4:17), Ananias does not hesitate to argue with 'the Lord'. The effect of his reluctance is to highlight the dramatic change between Saul's terrifying reputation and his present chastened state ('he is praying', v. 11). It also elicits a divine commission which highlights (in distinctly Pauline language) the contrast between Saul's sorry past and God's elective grace (v. 15: cf. 1 Cor 15:9–10; Rom 9:23). Saul's future career is prophetically outlined in vv. 15–16, which may be taken as a supplementary narrative plan to 1:8; precisely what this implies will be revealed as the narrative unfolds. Ananias's response, however reluctant, is generous (v. 17): laying-on of hands (here primarily for healing) is followed by baptism (v. 18). The gift of the Spirit (here at the hands of one who is not an apostle and has no known connection with Jerusalem) is implied (in intent, v. 17) but not stated—another instance of Luke's lack of concern for precise ritual patterns.

(9:19b–25) Saul in Damascus The dramatic effect of Saul's conversion is immediately apparent: in characteristic style, Luke records a reaction of universal amazement (v. 21). The relationship between Luke's narrative here and Paul's own account of his conversion in Gal 1 is contested. Paul does not mention anywhere that his call took place in Damascus, and does not mention an extended stay. According to Gal 1:17 he goes away immediately after his call to Arabia; but the fact that he then says 'I returned to Damascus' does seem to imply that the call took place there. The only other mention of Damascus in Paul's letters is at 2 Cor 11:32, where he describes being let down over the walls in a basket as an example of the humiliating position an apostle might find himself in. This must refer to the same episode (it could hardly have happened twice), but the details are different: in Paul's account, it is not 'the Jews' but the ethnarch (local commissioner) of Aretas who watches the gates to prevent his escape. Aretas was king of the Arabian kingdom of Nabatea, and since there are only a few years when he could have had any kind of judicial authority in Damascus, this dates the episode to 37–9 CE. Given Luke's general interest in local rulers (cf. Lk 3:1–2), it seems unlikely that he would have omitted this detail had he known 2 Corinthians; he must have had independent access to this piece of Pauline tradition, but has heard (or reconstructs) the details rather differently.

(9:26–30) Saul Returns to Jerusalem A more serious difficulty arises with Luke's account of Paul's return to Jerusalem. Compared with Paul's own account in Gal 1, Luke appears to imply a shorter interval before Paul's first Jerusalem visit (v. 19b), a longer stay in Jerusalem, and a meeting with more than one apostle (v. 27). Though Luke's chronology is notoriously vague, it is hard to reconcile the timing of these two accounts: Barrett's (1994–9: i. 462) conclusion is that 'Luke is correct in saying that Paul travelled from Damascus to Jerusalem, wrong in his dating of the event'. But in other respects the two accounts can be read as different perspectives on the same event: nothing in the Acts account suggests that Paul stayed a long time in Jerusalem, or had many meetings with the apostles, or (the point Paul himself is most keen to deny) that he had extensive instruction in the gospel from the Jerusalem church. Luke in fact highlights the suspicion with which the former persecutor was received by the Jerusalem church (vv. 26–7), and, like Paul, stresses the relative independence of Paul's gospel from apostolic control. So this short summary passage brings the narrative circle back to its point of departure in ch. 6: Saul, the zealous young man who approved of the killing of Stephen, comes back to Jerusalem to finish the argument with the Hellenists that Stephen had started, and arouses the same violent response. The 'brothers', it is implied, are in no way in control of this situation, but recognize its potential danger: Saul is packed off hurriedly to his home town of Tarsus (v. 30; cf. Gal 1:21), still unknown by sight to most members of the Judean churches (Gal 1:22).

9:31 Summary and Transition A final summary verse signals a return to the main narrative thread. Luke reminds us that much is happening of which his narrative only gives us tantalizing glimpses. He has shown us scattered groups of 'brothers' or 'disciples' (both men and women), and allowed us to see some of the individual encounters which they used, under the guidance of the Spirit, to spread their faith. But behind this diversity is a larger unity, something called 'the church' (in the singular) which is growing and 'being built up' throughout the region. Luke's focus on individuals has given us dramatic scenes of conversion and conflict, mostly in the cities: Jerusalem (chs. 1–7), Samaria (ch. 8), and Damascus (ch. 9), as well as one encounter on the desert road (ch. 8). What he does not describe, except in these brief summaries, is the steady consolidation that is going on behind the scenes and in the country regions: Samaria (cf. 8:25), Judea and Galilee, and (as we shall shortly be reminded), all along the coastal plain (cf. 8:40).

Act II Scene 3: Caesarea (9:32–11:18)

Saul, the future apostle to the Gentiles, has heard the call of God, but remains in the wings until Luke is ready to bring him back centre-stage. Before that happens, the mission to the Gentiles (only hinted at in 1:8 and 9:15) must be more fully prepared for through an extraordinary sequence of visions and encounters in Caesarea. Luke makes it quite clear that this crucial development in the history of the church comes about in response to God's initiative; and it is not Paul but Peter, the central figure of the apostolic team in Jerusalem, who is given the responsibility of grasping the vision (told three times over, like that of Paul) and passing it on to the church.

9:32–5 Peter and Aeneas The summary of v. 31 has swung the narrative back to the centre, and we now return to the Jerusalem church and to Peter as its chief figurehead. Going 'here and there among the believers' (v. 32) suggests one of the mechanisms by which the church was 'built up' (v. 31): it implies that Peter has some kind of pastoral oversight over the whole church ('all'), which by now includes believers in the towns of the coastal plain. How these communities may have been founded is suggested at 8:40: Lydda is the modern Lod, and Sharon is the region of Sarona, northwards along the coast towards Caesarea. These two brief miracle stories remind the reader of Peter's power as a healer. There are strong echoes here of the healing miracles of Jesus, though Luke is careful to stress that Peter heals in Jesus' name, not his own (v. 34). A characteristically Lukan 'all' (v. 35) underlines the evangelistic force of these miracles.

9:36–43 The Healing of Tabitha The fledgling community at the port of Joppa (Jaffa) comes across with a little more detail: it includes both men and women, and Luke uses the unusual term mathētria for a woman disciple (outside the church, women would not often be characterized as 'students'). Tabitha (Gk. 'Dorcas': both names mean 'gazelle') has developed a charitable ministry among the women of the town, especially (v. 39) the widows who, in a system with no social security, could find themselves in severe financial straits. Tabitha's clothing club is a prototype for the extensive practical aid programmes that grew up in the later churches. The 'upper room' (v. 39) and Peter's prayer (v. 40) recall healings of Elijah and Elisha at 1 Kings 17:17–24; 2 Kings 4:33 (cf. Lk 4:26, 27); but the closest parallels are with the gospel story of Jesus' healing of Jairus' daughter (Mk 5:22–4, 35–43 par.). It is intriguing that only Mark records the Aramaic form of Jesus' words to the child, talitha cum (Mk 5:41); this is so close to Peter's words here (though in the gospel story talitha is not a name) that it is tempting to think Luke has either held over this detail deliberately from the gospel to Acts, or has received a parallel healing tradition that transposes the miracle to Peter and to a non-Galilean location.

(10:1–8) Cornelius' Vision Like the conversion of Saul, this is really a story of two visionary experiences, each confirming the other. Luke leaves his main protagonist temporarily immobile (9:43) and takes the reader to Caesarea, 32 miles north up the coast. Here we are introduced to a man with the good Roman name of Cornelius, belonging to the non-commissioned officer class who were the backbone of the Roman army (10:1). The 'Italian Cohort' is known from inscriptional evidence to have been in Syria before 69, though we do not have precise details about its stationing. Cornelius is characterized as a pious man with a godfearing household (vv. 2, 7), and his piety is borne out by actions both charitable and religious (10:2). The term 'devout' (eusebēs) is one of a group of words Luke uses rather loosely, apparently to characterize Gentiles who were attracted to the religious practice of Judaism but shrank from the rigours of full conversion (generally called Godfearers to distinguish them from Gentile proselytes who had converted fully to Judaism). This may never have been a formal category, and its existence has been disputed in recent years; but the probability that some such group existed now seems to have been confirmed, at least for some diaspora cities, by the discovery of an inscription in Aphrodisias which includes a category of theosebeis among a list of charitable donors to a synagogue (Levinskaya 1996: 51–82; Barrett 1994–9: i. 500–1).

(10:9–16) Peter's Vision Cornelius' vision establishes not only his own piety but the much more important fact that God is taking the initiative in reaching out to the Gentiles. The interleaved timing, with the visitors moving purposefully on to meet a man who does not yet know of their existence (10:8–9) reinforces the point: everything about this sequence is miraculous, even Peter's noontime siesta with its combination of prayer and (albeit enforced) fasting (10:10). 'Trance' (ekstasis) is a strong word that strengthens the sense of an awe-inspiring revelation (cf. Mk 16:8; Lk 5:26; Lk 3:10; 22:17). The opening of heaven (10:11) is a standard feature of theophanic vision (cf. 7:55), but the rather bizarre details of Peter's vision are not: the container (skeuos) 'like a large sheet' sounds like a ship's sail, and fits the maritime setting of Peter's vision (cf. 10:5). The immediate focus of the vision, however, is on food. The list of 'four-footed creatures and reptiles and birds of the air' (v. 12) echoes the creation narrative of Gen 1, and is deliberately inclusive: the heavenly voice prohibits the classification of foods into 'clean' and 'unclean' that was fundamental to the Jewish food laws (cf. e.g. Lev 11:47). The use of koinos ('profane', v. 15, lit. common) as a gloss for 'unclean' is paralleled in the discussion of food laws in Mk 7:1–23 (par. Mt 15:1–20) and in Rom 14:14. Interestingly, however, the heavenly voice in Peter's vision does not make Paul's rather general philosophical point that 'nothing is unclean in itself' but assigns a more active role to God: the whole range of created food is clean not simply because God made it but because God has 'cleansed' it (v. 15).

10:17–23a Peter Summoned to Caesarea The significance of the vision is only unpacked slowly (though the reader, having had privileged access to Cornelius' vision, has clues that Peter does not). We are still with Peter up on the roof-top, puzzling over its meaning (10:17, 19), when Cornelius' emissaries knock at the door downstairs. It takes a further direct intervention from the Spirit (v. 19) to make Peter go down to meet them: Peter now shares the readers' knowledge that these visitors have been sent by God (v. 20), but their connection with the vision is not yet explicit. Peter is instructed to go with them mēden diakrinomenos (v. 20), an ambiguous verb whose double meaning is important for the story's development (Johnson 1992: 185): it can simply mean 'without hesitation' (so NRSV), but also carries the sense 'without making distinctions', 'without discrimination'. This sense is already implicit in Peter's action in inviting his guests in and making them welcome (v. 23). The messengers' description of Cornelius repeats (and therefore reinforces) much of what we as readers already know from the previous scene; the additional information that he is 'well spoken of by the whole Jewish nation' (cf. an earlier centurion in Lk 7:5) also underlines the fact that this is a Gentile.

10:23b–33 Peter Meets Cornelius It is hard to convey the extent to which Luke slows down the action in this scene, making explicit a series of apparently trivial actions of a kind normally left to the reader's imagination in biblical narrative. All of this, with the constant repetition of narrative detail, adds to the effect of drawing the reader into Peter's dilemma, to experience with him the gradual steps by which this new stage in God's plan is unfolded. The journey to Caesarea takes a full day (v. 24), and Peter takes with him some of the 'brothers' from Joppa (v. 23). All this time Peter has been associating with the Gentile soldier (v. 7) and the house-servants (probably also Gentile) sent by Cornelius: when he arrives, to find a houseful of the centurion's 'relatives and close friends' assembled in his honour (v. 24), the next decisive step is entering this Gentile household (v. 27). But Peter has already made the connection with the animal vision: the prohibition against calling anything 'common or unclean' is not about food but about people, not about what you eat but about who you associate with (v. 28). Cornelius' recapitulation of his own vision (vv. 30–3) heightens the solemnity of the scene: we find ourselves alongside the listeners, poised and expectant 'in the presence of God' to hear what God has commissioned Peter to say (v. 33).

(10:34–43) Peter Preaches to the Gentiles This is the last evangelistic speech Peter will make in Acts, and it is both parallel to and subtly different from those he has made in Jerusalem. Its burden is that God shows no 'partiality', no preferential treatment as between Jew and Gentile: acceptability before God is open to those 'in every nation' (v. 35) who fear him and perform righteous acts (cf. Rom 2:10–11, where the same word is used). Peter then moves into a recapitulation of the gospel message he has preached in Jerusalem, subtly adapted for this Caesarean setting. This is the fullest summary Luke gives of the gospel story in Acts. It brings out the characteristic shape of the story, starting in Galilee after John's baptism (v. 37), and stressing the charismatic power of Jesus' healing ministry: nowhere else does Luke make it so clear that he sees all healing as liberation from demonic power (v. 38). As in his Jerusalem speeches (cf. ACTS 2:14–36; 3:11–26), Peter now repeats the charge that Jesus was 'put to death' (v. 39), though without specifying who was responsible (for 'hanging on a tree' cf. ACTS 5:30); now that we have moved out of Jerusalem there is less emphasis on Jesus' death and more on his resurrection (vv. 40–1), including a reprise of the apostolic commission (v. 42). Peter (or Luke) is very interested in defining audiences here: God's message is sent first to Israel (v. 36), then to a smaller group of witnesses (v. 41), whose prime target is still 'the people' (v. 42, i.e. Israel). The message, however, is universal: judgement of 'the living and the dead' (v. 42: cf. 17:31) and forgiveness of sins for 'everyone who believes in him' (v. 43). The stage is set for an extension of the word of God to an audience which includes Gentiles (v. 33).

(10:44–8) The Coming of the Spirit: Caesarea It is at this precise point that the Holy Spirit intervenes. 'All who heard the word' (v. 44) are caught up in the same charismatic experience: the 'astounded' reaction of Peter's Jewish-Christian companions from Joppa highlights the fact that this includes 'even Gentiles' (v. 45). 'Speaking in tongues' (v. 46) has not been mentioned since the Pentecost experience of 2:4; Peter's question ('just as we have', v. 47) underlines the parallel, which is surely intentional. The act of baptizing Gentile believers (v. 48) follows as a logical consequence: the structure of Luke's narrative makes it quite clear that the initiative in this case is God's. The form of the question ('Can anyone withhold?', v. 47) recalls the Ethiopian's question about baptism in 8:37: within the narrative, this is a rhetorical question which expects the answer 'No', but the very existence of the question implies that some at least in Luke's audience might have preferred to answer 'Yes'.

(11:1–18) Ratification in Jerusalem There are indeed some who object to the reception of Gentiles into the church, identified in 11:2 as 'circumcised believers' in Jerusalem, who are making precisely the kind of 'discrimination' that Peter was warned against in 10:20 (cf. 11:12). The question is framed in terms of the traditional restrictions on table-fellowship between Jews and Gentiles to which Peter himself had referred in 10:28, and which we know from Paul (Gal 2:11–14) continued to be a bone of contention within the church (see below on ACTS 15:1–35 on the relation between Galatians and Acts on this issue). In Luke's narrative, it emphasizes the gap in understanding that has opened up between Peter and his fellow apostles: now he has to bring the rest of the Judean churches to accept the same radical break with tradition that he has made, and he can only do it by talking them through the same story, 'step by step' (kathexēs, 11:4). As with all Luke's recapitulations, there are minor variations between the various retellings: this allows Luke to reveal more of the real significance of what has happened each time the story is retold. Presenting this retelling in Peter's own words also allows Luke to reveal some of the character's own thought processes and to give a theological interpretation of the scene's key event. So Peter highlights the role of the Spirit, the importance of not 'making a distinction' (v. 12), and the parallel with Pentecost (v. 15). In Peter's own mind, the event triggered memories of Jesus' words (v. 16; cf. Acts 1:5), and to him the theological inference is clear (v. 17). Like Gamaliel (5:39), Peter warns that withholding baptism from the Gentiles would be tantamount to 'hindering God': this is one of Luke's major underlying themes, and his whole narrative is designed to offer convincing proof (as Peter's does here) that each step in the development of the church is initiated by God.

Act II Scene 4: Antioch and Jerusalem (11:19–12:25)

After the unified and tightly constructed episode of Cornelius' conversion we move to a rather more rambling section that combines summary accounts of the founding of the church in Antioch (11:19–26) and the sending of a famine relief mission to Jerusalem (11:27–30; 12:25) with traditional stories of martyrdom and imprisonment from the Jerusalem church (12:1–19) and the bizarre retributory death of Herod the persecutor (12:24).

(11:19–26) The Church in Antioch There is a very definite closure and change of scene at 11:19, as the narrative thread returns to 'those who were scattered' at 8:1, and follows them to Antioch, 300 miles to the north. Luke gives the impression that the persecution that followed Stephen's death was an explosive event, creating an unstoppable momentum: those caught up in it are still on the move, blissfully unaware of developments elsewhere, and 'speaking the word' as they travel (v. 19; cf. 8:4). Some of these anonymous Christians (Luke knows only that they came from Cyprus and Cyrene) take the momentous step of speaking the word to 'Greeks' as well as Jews in Antioch (v. 20). The MS reading hellēnistās (Hellenists, so NRSV) can hardly be right: the reading hellēnas (Greeks, as in NRSV marg.) is attested in P⁷⁴ and other early MSS and is to be preferred.

The foundation of the church in Antioch is a major development which indirectly confirms all that Luke has been highlighting in the Cornelius episode. The apostles' reaction to the news (v. 22) parallels that in 8:14, except that they send Barnabas (4:36) rather than travelling to Syria themselves. Barnabas acts both as a vital go-between linking Jerusalem with the satellite church in Antioch, and as the agent who brings Saul back onto the scene (vv. 25–6), to spend a year quietly engaged in 'teaching'. The passing note that the name 'Christian' was first applied to believers in Antioch (v. 26) is of marginal significance for the plot, but it illustrates Luke's antiquarian concern for detail and suggests that he does have some interest in avoiding anachronism. The implication is that the name is much more familiar in Luke's own time.

(11:27–30) Famine Relief Measures This notice raises a number of historical difficulties. (1) The best candidate for Luke's famine is the one dated by Josephus to 46–8 (Ant. 20.101); but Acts 12:20–3 appears to date the relief mission before the death of Herod Agrippa I, which is externally dated to 44 CE (cf. ACTS 12:20–4). It is possible that Luke simply did not know the exact order of these unconnected events, and has grouped them thus in his narrative for reasons of convenience rather than chronology (cf. his placing of the death of the Baptist, Lk 3:19–20). But it is also true (Barrett 1994–9: i. 563–64) that Luke narrates the return of the relief party after Herod's death (12:25). (2) The passage appears to conflict with Paul's own account of his relationship with Jerusalem. Paul himself claims to have visited Jerusalem only once before the critical encounter of Gal 2:1–10. If Gal 2:1–10 is identified with the Apostolic Council of Acts 15, and the first visit is equivalent to that of Acts 9 (as we have argued above: ACTS 9:26–30), then Luke has inserted an extra visit here, against the explicit asseverations of Gal 1:17–24. But there are other options: see further ACTS 15:1–35. (3) One of the enduring puzzles of Acts is why Luke never explicitly mentions the collection for the poor of Jerusalem on which Paul lavished so much attention in his later ministry (cf. e.g. Rom 15:25–8; 1 Cor 16:1–4; 2 Cor 8–9). Is this story a clumsy Lucan attempt to fabricate an earlier 'collection' in place of the real one? Or is it a relic of an earlier charitable collection to which Paul himself alludes briefly and puzzlingly in Gal 2:10?

(12:1–4) Herod Persecutes the Apostles The scene moves to Jerusalem, where the apostles are harassed by a fresh bout of persecution (12:1). This is not the Herod of the passion narrative (Lk 23:6–12; Acts 4:27) but Agrippa I, a grandson of Herod the Great, who gradually regained control of his grandfather's kingdom through the patronage of the Roman imperial family (only Acts identifies him by the family name Herod). Judea was added to his territory by Claudius after 41 CE, and he was engaged in a constant battle to retain favour with the Jewish population of the areas he controlled. Quite why he should have identified James as a threat to public order (v. 2) is unclear, and Luke seems to have little information on this martyrdom: it serves simply to establish Herod's character as a persecutor of the church, and to heighten the dramatic tension in the story of Peter's imprisonment. Peter's arrest, by contrast, is recounted with a wealth of dramatic detail. The note that it was Passover (v. 3) immediately suggests a parallel with the arrest of Jesus, as does the detail that Herod was intending to bring Peter 'out to the people' (v. 4)—though the parallel is more explicit in John's passion narrative than in Luke's. This narrative has two dramatic locations: while Peter is in prison 'the church' (v. 5) is engaged in 'fervent' prayer (cf. Lk 22:44, where the same word is used of Jesus' prayer in Gethsemane).

(12:6–11) Peter's Miraculous Escape This is one of the most sensational episodes in Acts. The timing is precise (v. 6); but despite his perilous (and doubtless uncomfortable) position, Peter is sleeping peacefully between his guards. The scene recalls 5:22–3, though the dramatic tension is heightened here: there Peter and John disappear from a locked prison cell, here Peter is spirited away despite being shackled to two soldiers (v. 6). The sudden appearance of the angel is reminiscent of the birth narrative (Lk 2:9): this direct intervention of heavenly personages is unusual in the narrative of Acts (though cf. 5:19–21), and contrasts strongly with the generally more realistic tone of the Paul narratives. Peter in fact (as we learn in v. 9) thinks that the almost comically precise instructions given by the angel are part of a dream: the reader knows better (vv. 7–8). The dramatic detail continues as the apostle leaves the sleeping guards and passes through the iron gate which opens 'of its own accord' (v. 10). The expression recalls a number of passages in ancient literature recording marvellous portents (e.g. Jos. J.W. 6.293, Tac. Hist. 5.13) or miraculous escapes (note esp. the escape of Moses reported by the hellenistic Jewish historian Artapanus: Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 9.27.23). Luke's technique here shows no signs of the cognitive distancing that Greek or Roman readers would expect of a historian's account of a miraculous event: the reporting is much closer to the style of biblical historiography, and is designed to stress the divine protection enjoyed by the Christian community.

12:12–17 Peter's Reception by the Church There is an element of comic bathos in this account of Peter's reception by the church: far from expecting their prayers to be answered, they are completely taken aback when he knocks at the door, and the maid Rhoda (a nice example of a Lucan minor character) is too flabbergasted even to open the door. Despite his supernatural escape, Peter is a very human figure here: prison doors may open up for him, but house doors remain obstinately closed. Peter's story comes to an abrupt end at this point (apart from 15:7–11). He stays only long enough to tell his story to the house-church (v. 17), and asks that it be passed on to 'James and the brothers'. Luke does not trouble to explain the name, but this James (as we will discover) is the brother of Jesus (cf. 1:14); he has not been mentioned by name before, but from now on he will act as spokesman for the Jerusalem church (15:13; 21:18; cf. Gal 1–2). Neither does Luke give us any information about Peter's subsequent destination. Later tradition places his death in Rome (cf. JN 21:8), but in Acts he simply fades out of the picture.

(12:18–23) Herod's Reaction and Death The scene shifts briefly back to the prison, where Peter's mysterious disappearance causes consternation among the soldiers (v. 18). Herod is depicted as a typical persecuting tyrant, venting his frustration on his subordinates. The judicial detail ('examined', v. 19) highlights the irony of the situation: neither the soldiers nor Herod share the readers' privileged knowledge of Peter's secret, and no amount of examination can possibly discover it. Herod's sensational death (vv. 20–3) was well-known, and a similar story appears in Jos. Ant. 19.343–50. But Luke's story is independent: both have Herod dying a horrible death as a punishment for being acclaimed as divine, but in Josephus' story it is the robe itself ('a garment woven in silver... illuminated by the touch of the first rays of the sun') that inspires the crowd's acclamation. Luke also provides a political setting (otherwise unconfirmed, though not implausible) which is absent in Josephus (v. 20). Both writers represent typically Jewish responses to ruler-cult, a phenomenon widespread in the Hellenistic world and enthusiastically adopted by the Roman imperial family. The offence in Agrippa's case was all the greater in that he was prepared to pose in Jerusalem as a pious Jew: the acceptance of divine honours was strictly for his Greek territories, but was grossly offensive to Jewish observers. The message of this particular tradition is clear: those who seek to resist the power of God manifest in the church will be punished (cf. 5:5, 10). 'Worms' (maggots infesting a gangrenous wound?) tend to figure among the gruesome deaths attributed to tyrants in contemporary literature. Josephus (Ant. 17.168–9) attributes a similar fate to Herod the Great.

(12:24–5) Summary and Transition The death of the persecutor is contrasted with the continuous growth and success of God's word (v. 24): any expansion attributed to the church (cf. 9:31) is, as Luke makes clear, entirely due to God. v. 25 acts as a narrative link after the digression on Herod's fate; the relief mission is successfully completed, and the narrative picks up what will from now on be its major characters before returning to Antioch. The text here is puzzling: it would be much easier to read 'from Jerusalem' (NRSV marg.), but this looks suspiciously like a very early correction to a text already felt to be difficult. If the more difficult reading 'to' is accepted, we would have to link it with 'mission' rather than with 'returned' and translate 'returned [i.e. to Antioch] having completed their service (diakonia) to Jerusalem'.

Act Three: Paul the Missionary (13:1–21:16)

Act III Scene 1: Paul's First Missionary Journey (13:1–14:28)

We are now entering the third phase of the geographical plan of 1:8, moving out from Jerusalem (chs. 1–7) and 'Judea and Samaria' (chs. 8–12) into uncharted waters. The impetus for expansion also changes. The first phase was the work of the apostles, and the second came about almost by accident as believers were 'scattered' after Stephen's death (8:4; 11:19); but this third phase begins with a deliberate and prayerful step undertaken by the church in Antioch. Thus a young church founded by refugees from persecution (11:20–6) now becomes an active missionary church in its own right.

(13:1–3) The Church in Antioch It is important for Luke to convey the impression that Paul's mission was not his own initiative, but was undertaken in obedience to a believing community which was itself acting under the guidance of the Holy Spirit (vv. 2, 4). The liturgical framework of prayer and fasting is carefully described, and forms an inclusio with the end of this first journey at 14:26. Apart from Barnabas and Saul (cf. 11:25–6), the members of this group (v. 1) are otherwise unknown. Lucius of Cyrene may be one of the founders of the Antioch church (11:20). Manaen (Gk. form of Menahem) is another of Luke's links with the Herodian household (cf. Lk 8:3). The laying-on of hands here (v. 3) is not an 'ordination' but a commissioning for a particular task, in which Barnabas and Saul will act as delegates of the Antioch church (cf. Num 27:18–23).

(13:4–5) The Journey Begins: Antioch to Paphos A new stylistic feature of these chapters is the way in which the journeying process itself is foregrounded by the use of redundant place-names (e.g. Seleucia, v. 1) and precise verbs for sea-travel (e.g. 'sailed', v. 1) in the narrative summaries that link one part of the scene to the next. Travel, increasingly as Luke's narrative progresses, becomes an event in its own right. Cyprus, the party's first destination, was not exactly new ground to the gospel (cf. 11:19), and it was Barnabas' home territory (4:36). What is new is that, unlike earlier believers who had come to Cyprus as refugees, Barnabas and Saul have a real sense of being on a mission ('sent out by the Holy Spirit', v. 4), and set out deliberately to visit the formal meeting-places of the Jewish communities they pass through (v. 5) to carry out the prophetic/apostolic task of proclaiming the word of God (v. 5; cf. 4:31; 6:2; 11:1). The additional note that the party now includes an 'assistant' in the shape of John Mark (v. 5) adds to the sense of a formal prophetic embassy.

(13:6–12) The Governor and the Guru In this dramatic scene, Saul/Paul demonstrates the awesome supernatural power wielded by the emissaries of the gospel: opposing spiritual forces are put to rout, and a proconsul is startled into faith. The scene parallels Peter's encounters with Simon Magus (8:14–24), and with Ananias and Sapphira (5:1–11), where the power of the Spirit (v. 9) is exercised in judgement. Luke uses the correct Greek title (anthupatos, proconsul) for the governor of a senatorial province (v. 7). A Roman inscription mentions a Sergius Paulus holding office in Rome under Claudius at about the right date to be Luke's proconsul; the family also seems to have a connection with Pisidia (Nobbs 1994: 89). Educated Romans had a particular interest in divination, and it was not uncommon for a wealthy senator such as Sergius Paulus to keep a soothsayer as part of his household.

For Luke, of course, it is obvious from his failure to recognize the truth of Paul's message (vv. 8) that Elymas is a 'false prophet': the term magus (v. 6, 8), is always defamatory in the narrative world of Acts (Acts 8:5–13). Many diaspora Jews had Greek or Latin names alongside their Hebrew names, and Paul's change of name (v. 9) is appropriate to the move into Gentile territory. His encounter with the proconsul's guru is sharp and violent: Paul refuses to tolerate spiritual opposition, and he denounces Elymas in strongly prophetic language (vv. 10–11). The result is graphically described (v. 11b) in words that echo Paul's own experience in 9:8–9: the parallel suggests that Elymas' temporary blindness may similarly lead to conversion. The story demonstrates the supernatural power of the gospel, encouraging the reader to share the proconsul's 'astonishment' and 'belief' (v. 12). But it also serves to distance the Christian message from one of its closest rivals in the market-place of ancient religions: and this is one of Luke's major concerns as a Christian teacher (cf. Acts 19:11–20).

(13:13–16) The Journey Continues: Paphos to Antioch The events in Cyprus serve as a prelude to the big set-piece scene of Paul's synagogue sermon in Antioch (13:16–41), itself the centrepiece of a longer travel-and-mission complex, moving out into new territory (13:13–14, 51; 14:6–7), then successively back retracing each stage of the outward journey (14:21, 24–6): no other missionary journey in Acts is so tightly constructed. Although Luke does not use the name here, all the sites visited by Paul on this journey fall within the boundaries of the Roman province of Galatia in the first century (Hansen 1994: 382): whether or not Luke's story of their foundation is accurate, therefore, it is reasonable to assume that these are the churches Paul addresses in the Epistle to the Galatians.

The party pauses long enough in Perga to drop off John Mark, who can presumably hope to pick up a ship travelling eastwards along the coast to take him back in the direction of Jerusalem (v. 13). The reason for his defection is not revealed: this subsidiary character has no real role in the narrative (except perhaps to explain the subsequent rift between Paul and Barnabas: 15:37–9). As in Cyprus, Paul begins his mission by heading for the synagogue (v. 14). Luke takes some trouble to set the scene for this first major speech to a diaspora audience: the note that it was the sabbath underlines the regularity of Paul's attendance as well as creating a time-frame for the whole episode (13:42, 44). Philo (Hypoth. 7.12–14; Spec. Leg. 2.62) confirms the regular sabbath-day reading of Scripture in first-century synagogues. There are many inscriptions referring to archisynagōgoi (officials, v. 15): these were wealthy local patrons (rather than rabbis) who took responsibility for the general maintenance of the synagogue and its services. (Cf. further Riesner 1995: 179–210; Meyers 1992: 251–63.)

(13:16–25) Paul's Synagogue Speech (1): The Testimony of the Past This long speech marks a new step in the progress of the gospel in that it is consciously addressed to a diaspora audience and addresses both ethnic Jews and 'others who fear God' (v. 16; cf. ACTS 10:1–8). Paul's potted resumé of Israel's history can be read as complementary to the one given by Stephen in 7:2–48. Both have the same goal: to show that the whole movement of biblical history points forward to and is consummated in the Christ-event. It is, of course, a highly selective history, beginning with the Exodus (v. 17) and the wilderness period (v. 18), moving on to the Conquest (v. 19) and the period of the Judges (v. 20), then to Saul (v. 21), and David (v. 22). The unusual attention given to King Saul (v. 21) may be a deliberately 'Pauline' touch (cf. Phil 3:5). Of all the speeches in Acts, this is the one that makes the most explicit use of Davidic messianism, picking up the divine election of the Davidic line (v. 22, an amalgam of 1 Sam 13:14 with Ps 89:20), and linking it directly with Jesus' Davidic descent (v. 23; cf. Rom 1:3). God is the main actor in Israel's history: almost all the verbs in these six verses describe God's actions ('chose', 'led', 'gave'). This is no heroic national saga but a narrative of election and grace. Paul's story lacks the aggressive critique of Stephen's, though there may be an implied criticism of the wilderness generation in v. 18 if we follow the reading 'put up with' (cf. Ps 95:8–11). Both variants occur in the Greek text of Deut 1:31. Luke assumes Paul's hearers will have heard of the mission of John the Baptist (vv. 24–5), which he places at the climax of Israel's history, the final tip of an arrow pointing in one clear direction (cf. Lk 16:16).

(13:26–31) Paul's Synagogue Speech (2): The Testimony of the Present The central section of the speech focuses on the Christ-event itself. It is introduced (v. 26) by a renewed address which stresses the inclusive nature of Paul's mission. But the focus is first of all on Jerusalem, scene of the fateful rejection of God's promised Messiah (v. 27). Luke never charges all Jews everywhere with complicity in the death of Jesus: here, as repeatedly in Peter's speeches, it is 'the residents of Jerusalem and their leaders' (cf. 2:14; 3:17) who share the moral responsibility for Jesus' death (though the Gentile Pilate was the judicial instrument of execution: v. 28; cf. 2:23). But there is a deeper level of predetermination in the whole tragic complex of events. The death of the Messiah was already predicted in Scripture (v. 27), so that the human actors in the drama simply 'carried out everything that was written of him' (v. 29): it was all part of God's plan (4:28; cf. 2:23). This is a classic case of tragic irony, and one that would be easily recognizable to readers of Greek tragedy. And it is the Jerusalem apostles whom Paul here singles out as the prime witnesses of the risen Christ to the people (v. 30): Luke's Paul never claims to be a witness to the resurrection in his own right (contrast 1 Cor 15:8).

(13:32–7) Paul's Synagogue Speech (3): The Testimony of Scripture Again the contrast with Jerusalem is foregrounded: they witness to the people (i.e. in Jerusalem) (v. 31), we bring the good news to you, here in Antioch (v. 32). And the good news is that the God of Israel's past is also the God of Israel's future (v. 33). The continuity between past and future is highlighted in the pattern of promise and fulfilment, as Paul traces the foreshadowings of the resurrection through a skein of scriptural testimonia. There is a considerable overlap here with the closing section of Peter's first Jerusalem speech (esp. 2:25–36), which likewise uses Scripture to reflect on the theological significance of the events just described. Here the text from Ps 16 which early Christians took literally as a prediction of Jesus' resurrection (vv. 35–7; cf. 2:27–32) is combined with two other testimonia. Ps 2:7 (v. 33) was a key verse in Christian Christological hermeneutic: patristic exegesis links it with the words of the heavenly voice at Jesus' baptism (cf. the Western text at Lk 3:22), but the 'today' envisioned here and in Heb 1:5, 5:5 is the day of the enthronement of the Davidic king, which for the early church was the moment of Christ's resurrection and exaltation (seen as a single event as in 2:32–3; cf. Rom 1:4). The third text used here is from Isa 55:3 (v. 34), which leads in via the catchword hosios (holy) to Ps 16 (v. 35): the underlying thought seems to be, as in 2:25–30, that God's everlasting covenant with David (Isa 55:3) entails that all the promises made to David must be fulfilled in the Messiah. (Further, Lindars 1961: 16; 139–44; 201.)

(13:38–41) Paul's Synagogue Speech (4): The Challenge of the Future The speech concludes with a solemn address to the audience. What was offered in Jerusalem is now being offered more widely: but the conditions are the same. The offer is 'forgiveness of sins' (v. 38; cf. 2:38); but Luke here gives it a characteristically Pauline twist (v. 39), the only distinctively Pauline element in the whole speech. Commentators have debated how close this summary really is to the theology of the Epistles (cf. Lk 1; IPCB): it seems best to regard it as a reasonably successful summary of the theology of justification by faith, written by someone for whom it does not hold the central position that it does for Paul. What are missing from Luke's summary are the distinctively Pauline reflections on the saving significance of the death of Christ. Underlying both, however, is the same core Christology, in which the person of Jesus is essential to salvation: 'by this Jesus' (lit. in him, v. 39). Either way, salvation is not simply a matter of 'having faith': it is mediated and received through the person of Christ. The diaspora community is being offered the same fulfilment of promise as the inhabitants of Jerusalem, a promise embodied in Jesus and the events of his death and resurrection. But it carries a health warning (v. 40): they now run the risk of making the same tragic mistake as their counterparts in Jerusalem, and thus unwittingly fulfilling the predictions of the prophets (v. 41).

(13:42–50) Divided Reactions Paul's speech leaves his audience with a stark choice, dramatized in the final verses of the chapter: 'believe' or join the 'scoffers' (v. 41). Initial reactions are uncommitted but favourable (v. 42); but by the next sabbath the mood has changed. 'The Jews' now suddenly become a character-group distinct from 'the crowds' (v. 45). This designation of 'the Jews' as a hostile group (cf. 9:23; 12:3) will become increasingly common in the Pauline section of Acts: here they 'speak against' the gospel message and so unwittingly fulfil Simeon's prediction of Lk 2:34. This negative reaction carries its own punishment: those who reject the message have passed judgement on themselves (v. 46). But it is only after this rejection, Luke implies, that Paul feels justified in pursuing the mission to which God has called him and 'turning to the Gentiles' (v. 46): and note that even here Paul does not say he will stop preaching to Jews (cf. 14:1). The words cited from Isa 49:6 (v. 47) form a hermeneutical key to the second part of Acts: Luke interweaves the related themes of 'light to the Gentiles' and 'salvation to the ends of the earth' throughout this section (both themes are anticipated in Lk 2:30–2; see further ACTS 28:23–31). A pattern is now being established: success with Gentile residents of the city and its surrounding country region (v. 49) only intensifies the opposition of 'the Jews' (v. 50), who use their influence with the city élite to get the missionaries expelled. The close of the episode recalls the gospel advice to itinerant preachers (v. 51; cf. esp. Mt 10:14).

(14:1–7) Preaching in Iconium and Lystra This is a summary passage rather than a 'journey' section: Luke shows consistently less interest in land journeys than in sea travel. Paul's party now turns east and follows the Roman road (the Via Sebaste) linking the Roman colonies of Antioch, Iconium (modern Konya, 150 km. SE) and Lystra (30 km. SW; Hansen 1994: 384–5). Despite the fact that there are many converts both Jewish and Gentile (v. 1), this is not really a church foundation-narrative: Luke's report concentrates more on the pattern of preaching and rejection that he sees repeated at Iconium (v. 1). Here the opposition is classified as 'unbelieving Jews', or better (given the aorist tense) 'Jews who had decided against belief': it is the message itself that provokes these violent and divided reactions, just as Simeon had foreseen (Lk 2:34), and the same diversity of reactions characterizes the Gentile population of the city (v. 4). The missionaries' response to persecution, like that of the Jerusalem apostles (e.g. 4:13, 29, 31) is the proper prophetic stance of 'bold' and persistent speech, accompanied by miraculous healings (v. 3). This and the following are the only sections of Acts (vv. 4, 14) where Paul and Barnabas are given the title 'apostles': Luke normally restricts the title to the twelve, but here is most probably using it in its root sense of 'delegates' (i.e. of the Antioch church).

(14:8–18) Miracle at Lystra There is a new feature in this scene: we are now deep in pagan territory, among crowds whose native tongue is not Greek but Lycaonian (v. 11). Inscriptions confirm the survival of this pre-Greek language in this period, as well as the joint worship of Zeus and Hermes in the region (Bruce 1990: 321–2). Luke seems faintly amused at the crowd's superstitious reaction to the miraculous healing, with its ambivalent reading of the relationship between Paul and Barnabas (v. 12): Zeus, as chief of the gods, was the more important figure). But Paul quickly realizes that it is no joke when the priest of Zeus-before-the-Gates prepares to offer sacrifice to the apostles (v. 13). The emergency occasions Paul's first attempt in Acts to explain the gospel in totally pagan terms. Paul's sermon here is totally consistent with the orthodox Jewish critique of pagan religion, which stresses (against a broadly animistic religious culture) the distance separating God from the created order (v. 15). The pagan gods are 'worthless' (i.e. they are 'idols'), and the good news is an invitation to 'turn' away from idols to the living God (cf. 1 Thess 1:9). The providential care God bestows on all the world's inhabitants acts as a silent witness to his beneficence, but pagans who fail to recognize the source of creation's bounty are not so much sinful as misguided (v. 16).

(14:19–23) Return and Consolidation The narrative returns abruptly to summary mode and picks up the theme of persecution, depicted as a concerted plot against Paul by 'the Jews' of Antioch and Iconium (v. 19; cf. 2 Cor 11:25, which uses the same verb). Luke's account may have an exemplary function in depicting Paul's remarkable courage as well as the fraternal solidarity of the disciples (v. 20). Derbe lay 100 km. to the SE of Lystra, cf. Hansen 1994: 385: it was a considerable journey for someone in Paul's condition, and the motive for the visit is unclear, but it must not be forgotten that all this time Paul is moving closer to his own home province of Cilicia, and he may have had some prior knowledge of this mountainous region. On the return journey, the focus is on the consolidation of the newly planted churches. Strengthening the soul and encouraging believers to remain in the faith (v. 22) are major functions of the Pauline letters, and Luke (who never mentions the letters) here gives us a glimpse of Paul performing this function in person: cf. esp. 1 Thess 2:14–16; 3:2–4. The description of Paul's ministerial arrangements for these churches (v. 23) is tantalizingly brief. 'Elders' do not appear as church officials in the Pauline letters before the Pastorals (Titus 1:5; 1 Tim 5:17, 19); it is possible that Luke has anachronistically transferred this term from his own time to the Pauline foundations, while correctly retaining in direct speech Paul's own term episkopoi (20:28; cf. Phil 1:1).

(14:24–8) The Journey Home: Return to Antioch The whole episode is brought to a closure with a journey section (vv. 24–5) tracing the regions traversed on the way home; Attalia is mentioned as the natural port of embarkation for the coastal voyage to Seleucia. The church which had sent out its delegates in obedience to the Spirit receives a formal report on the work completed (v. 26). Just as the impetus for the journey came from God, so did the grace by which it was accomplished (v. 27): particularly significant in the report is the opening of a 'door of faith' for the Gentiles (Paul uses this metaphor in a more general sense at 2 Cor 2:12). But it is precisely this piece of divine opportunism that creates the next problem to be solved within the church (ch. 15).

Act III Scene 2: The Apostolic Council (15:1–35)

The hectic journeying of this third act of Luke's narrative is interrupted at this point by the more static scene of the Apostolic Council in Jerusalem. This is no irrelevant interlude: the growth of the Antioch church, and the mission Paul has completed on its behalf, have raised a fundamental question of principle which must be resolved before the mission can proceed. Can Gentiles be allowed to join the church direct (as it were) from the pagan world, or can they come in, like the Godfearers and proselytes, only via a prior attachment to the synagogue? The admission of Gentiles in fact raises in an acute form the question of identity that is one of the underlying themes of Acts. All the first Christians (like Jesus himself) were Jews: following Jesus, for them, meant finding in him the culmination and true fulfilment of their ancestral religion. But if this was so, then new entrants from outside Judaism should logically be expected to follow the normal procedures for incoming proselytes, which included circumcision (15:1, 5). That is the point at issue in this formalized debate, which Luke has arranged as a pair to the earlier debate after Peter's visit to Cornelius (11:1–18).

The circumcision controversy was the occasion for Paul's most impassioned letter, the Epistle to the Galatians, and sparked off much of his most profound theological reflection on the relationship of law and grace in the Christian life. It is natural, therefore, to read the Acts account with one eye on Paul: but our first priority must be to understand Luke's story in its own terms. What is not clear is whether Acts 15 parallels Paul's visit to Jerusalem in Gal 2:1–10, or whether this 'private' visit is the one mentioned in Acts 11:30, in which case the full Council would fall after Galatians was written. This would explain why Paul does not mention the Council or the decree. On problems of Pauline chronology see further IPCE; Alexander (1993a); Jewett (1979); Lüdemann (1984); Witherington (1998: 77–97).

(15:1–5) Controversy in Antioch The Jerusalem Council is framed by opening and closing scenes in Antioch, an indication of how the narrator's perspective has shifted since the early chapters of the book. Antioch is now 'home ground', and events in Jerusalem are much more cloudy. We have no background information on the identity of the 'certain individuals' (v. 1) or of the 'elders' (vv. 2, 4) because we have not been following developments in Jerusalem since Peter's departure in 12:17. The narrator shares the point of view of the Antioch church that the 'conversion' of the Gentiles is a matter for rejoicing (v. 3). When the Antioch delegation reaches Jerusalem (v. 5) it becomes clear that there are differing viewpoints within the Jerusalem church, and that this particular controversy stems from a group of Christians with Pharisaic roots: but that is not itself a negative description in the narrative world of Acts (cf. 26:5).

(15:6–12) The Council (1): The Testimony of Peter Luke stresses the formal nature of this deliberation (v. 6): the formal opening address (vv. 7, 13: 'Men, brothers', NRSV marg.) would remind a Greek-educated reader of the speeches of classical rhetoric. Peter's intervention is crucial in the debate; it presents the reader with a brief but telling reminder of the narrative argument set out in chs. 10–11. It is an indication of its importance for Luke that we have now heard this story three times, once from the narrator (10:44–8) and twice from Peter (cf. 11:15–17). As in ch. 11, Peter stresses that the whole Cornelius episode stemmed from the sovereign choice of God (v. 7), and that the clinching testimony is the visible activity of the Holy Spirit (v. 8), which demonstrated that God makes 'no distinction' between Gentile and Jewish believers (v. 9). Peter's role in the decision to accept Gentiles on equal terms is more positive than we would expect from Paul, who sees Peter's vacillation at Antioch as a betrayal of the whole principle (Gal 2:11–12). Both Paul and Luke are writing with their own particular purposes in view here: part of Luke's agenda is to strengthen the Pauline argument by giving it the support of the most prominent of the Jerusalem apostles (while part of Paul's agenda is to stress his independence of Jerusalem). Thus Luke's Peter here voices some of the most strongly 'Pauline' arguments in Acts: that the coming of the Spirit is evidence that God has cleansed the hearts of the Gentiles 'by faith' (v. 9; cf. Gal 3:2–5 and contrast 10:44–8), that circumcision means subjecting the disciples to the 'yoke' of the whole law (v. 10, cf. Gal 2:14; 5:1–3), and that Jews and Gentiles are saved on an equal footing through grace (v. 11; cf. Gal 2:15–21).

(15:13–21) The Council (2): The Decision of James The emergence of James as effective leader of the Jerusalem church is surprising (though it is hinted at in 12:17), but indicates further how little inclination (or information) Luke has for a concerted 'history of the church'. His speech affirms the validity of the narrative arguments of Peter, which was based on the charismatic events associated with the mission itself (v. 14), and adds a scriptural argument (vv. 15–18), thus providing a hermeneutical framework for interpreting these same events. James' quotation of Am 9:11–12 reflects the Greek rather than the Hebrew, though it is not identical with the LXX. Although there are many textual and exegetical problems relating to the details of this decree, it is clear that James comes to the formal decision (v. 19) that Gentile converts should observe the same restrictions as had been placed since biblical times on 'aliens' wishing to live among God's people (v. 20; cf. Lev 17–18; Fitzmyer 1998: 557). There is a puzzling lack of 'fit' between James' conclusion (and the decree that follows) and the introduction to the debate: the implication is that circumcision is not required of Gentile converts, but it is not stated in so many words. The observation cuts both ways: if this was a verbatim report of an actual debate, we might expect it to be more coherent (though it would of course be considerably abbreviated); but the discrepancies are equally hard to explain if Luke is making the whole thing up.

(15:22–9) The Council (3): The Apostolic Decree The formal setting is highlighted by Luke's language here: cf. esp. the archaic impersonal use of edoxē + dative ('decided', vv. 22, 25, 28), which follows classical syntax (familiar from the formal decrees of Greek cities) against normal NT usage (cf. Lk 1:3, another formal passage). The letter is addressed only to the Gentile believers of Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia (v. 23), not to the whole church or even (surprisingly) to Paul's new foundations in Galatia. The wording implies an increasingly centralized authority in Jerusalem (v. 24), with a hierarchical council which regards its decisions as divinely sanctioned (v. 28). In this slightly amended form (v. 29), the list of prohibitions is even more clearly designed to facilitate table-fellowship between Jewish and Gentile believers, the issue that sparks off the 'Antioch incident' in Gal 2:11–12; if Luke's account is accurate, it is very hard to locate this incident after the decree, but it could make sense as the kind of incident to which the decree was a reply. But we are still left with the problem of Paul's failure ever to mention the decree in any other letter.

(15:30–5) Return to Antioch The episode closes with a triumphant return to Antioch. Paul and Barnabas are now accompanied by the Jerusalem delegates Judas and Silas (v. 22), who prove to be congenial companions (v. 32) and, like Barnabas (who was himself originally sent down from Jerusalem to keep an eye on what was happening in Antioch, 11:22–4) provide encouragement and strengthening (cf. 14:22).

Act III Scene 3: Paul's Second Missionary Journey (15:36–18:23)

The next five chapters of the narrative are devoted to a vivid descriptive portrait of Paul in the context of his missionary activities—the evangelist, the controversialist, the prisoner, the pastor, but above all the indefatigable traveller, covering an amazing amount of territory around the coasts of the eastern Mediterranean. The journeys are conventionally classified as two ‘missionary voyages’, and I have followed this division (see Map 11) for convenience. But in fact the pattern is not as simple as that: none of these journeys has the clear outward-and-return structure of the first, and although Paul makes periodic trips back to base, these do not have the clear symbolic function of his first return to Antioch.

There are three bodies of literature that may help us to understand this section better. (1) Paul's own letters give us a comparative body of data and may provide some confirmation for the Acts narrative. Taking these letters seriously as primary evidence gives us a sequence Philippi–Thessalonica–Athens–Corinth, which fits the basic configuration of this second journey in Acts (cf. Alexander 1993a), though it does not give us much in the way of internal chronology. We do not know whether Luke had access to Paul's letters, but most scholars think he did not. (2) Ancient itineraries: the final chapters of Acts contain a puzzling phenomenon known as the ‘we-sections’, where the narrator suddenly and without explanation slips into the first person and out again (16:10–16; 20:5–21:18; 27:1–28:16). They also contain a remarkable amount of redundant travel information (stopping-places, ports of embarkation, etc.), especially relating to sea travel, and it has been suggested that the simplest explanation for both is that Luke himself was with Paul on some of these journeys, or alternatively that he had access to a travel log or itinerary written by one of the party. There is some contemporary evidence that such logs existed (though by their nature they would be ephemeral): there are tattered remains of one such (dating from the fourth century CE) among the Rylands papyri (P.Ryl. 616–51), and it seems to show both the we-formulation and the lists of stopping-places that might form the basis of a narrative. (3) Ancient travel-writing: travel-writing was a popular genre in the ancient world, ranging from detailed geographical description to pure fantasy. Some scholars have observed that in such descriptions the use of redundant place-names and the use of the first person may serve a literary function, and therefore conclude that these features of Acts are not necessarily indications of eyewitness testimony. See further Rapske 1994: 1–47; Scott 1994: 483–544; Porter 1994: 545–74.

(15:36–41) Paul and Barnabas Part Company Paul's second journey begins after an unspecified interval (v. 36) and without the formal commissioning ceremony of the first. Its initial motive is simply to follow up the previous mission and revisit the converts made on that occasion (v. 36). But the partnership with Barnabas comes to an end at this point (vv. 37–9): he is not mentioned again in Acts, though Paul assumes he is known to the Corinthians (1 Cor 9:6). The link with Jerusalem is maintained, however, in the person of Silas, who has apparently returned from Jerusalem (unless we accept the Western text of 15:34: NRSV marg.) in time to be selected as Paul's new travelling companion (v. 40). Like Barnabas and Paul, Silas is a ‘prophet’, that is, he is anointed by the Holy Spirit (15:32). This must be the same as the Silvanus with whom Paul evangelized Macedonia and Achaia (1 Thess 1:1; 2 Cor 1:19); Luke uses a Greek form of the Aramaic name, Paul a more Latinized form. This time (perhaps because he is not travelling with the Cypriot Barnabas) Paul heads up through the Taurus mountains via his home territory of Cilicia (v. 41), which means following the mountainous route up into southern Turkey through the Cilician Gates.

(16:1–5) Timothy Joins the Group Timothy became one of Paul's most trusted co-workers (Rom 16:21), and must have been well known in Pauline circles; he is mentioned in letters to the churches in Rome and Corinth, and cited as co-author of the letters to Philippi, Thessalonica, Philemon, and Colossae. The story of Timothy's circumcision (v. 3) seems at odds with Paul's statement about Titus in Gal 2:3 and with Paul's own attitude to circumcision in that epistle. But Luke seems to assume that Timothy (unlike Titus) was ethnically Jewish (16:1), in which case this is not about the circumcision of a Gentile believer but about Paul's desire to keep open his channels of communication with the Jewish community, here and elsewhere (cf. 1 Cor 9:20). The Apostolic Decree (Luke uses the plural dogmata, appropriate for a formal decision by a civic assembly) is mentioned for the last time at this point (16:4): clearly Luke sees it as relevant to the churches in this area, even though it did not address them directly (15:23).

(16:6–10) Journey: Phrygia to Troas This short journey section summarizes a huge swathe of travelling, which takes Paul out of his previous mission fields and right across to the north-west corner of Asia Minor. For the ‘region of Phrygia and Galatia’ (v. 6) see now Mitchell (1992: 871): this is most naturally understood as the area between Iconium and Antioch, which was ethnically Phrygian but divided between the Roman provinces of Galatia and Asia. The Roman roads north of Pisidian Antioch are later than Paul's day, but there are ancient trade routes across this area, and one of them, branching off not far north of Antioch, led westwards down the Lycus valley towards Ephesus. Having been ‘forbidden by the Holy Spirit’ (v. 6) to extend his mission in this direction, or to turn west at the next crossroads for Smyrna, Paul had no choice but to follow the road north towards the Black Sea coast. Somewhere along the road (Luke knows only rather vaguely that it is ‘opposite Mysia’) there was a further choice: north to Bithynia and Pontus, or west to Troas? Again, the guidance of the Spirit (v. 7: ‘the Spirit of Jesus’ is clearly interchangeable with the commoner ‘Holy Spirit’) determines their route: westwards, down towards the coast. But where was the mission to take place? There is no record of any preaching along this part of the journey: Paul seems to be waiting for guidance, and in the port city of Troas it comes in the shape of a dream which Paul interprets as a revelatory oracle: a call for help from Macedonia.

(16:12–15) Journey: Troas to Philippi The we-narrator, who joins the party at this point (v. 10) immediately displays his passion for the details of travel, especially by sea: cf. the interest in ports of call (Samothrace, Neapolis) and in the jargon of seafaring ('set sail', 'took a straight course', v. 11). From Neapolis the party travelled along the Via Egnatia, the Roman road linking the northern Aegean to the Adriatic ports (Gill 1994: 409): Philippi, Amphipolis, Apollonia, and Thessalonica (17:1) were all on this road. Philippi, as a Roman colony (originally settled by army veterans, partly to pacify a hostile area), operated as a kind of mini-Rome, whose citizenship, magistrates, and laws were Roman. But it was not 'the first city of Macedonia' (as v. 12 appears to say); most commentators now read 'a leading city' (as NRSV) or emend to 'a city of the first district' (as NRSV marg.), which it was. Luke's term proseuchē (v. 13, 'place of prayer'), though used elsewhere of a synagogue, may indicate a less formal meeting-place here, perhaps because the Jewish community at Philippi was not large enough to have a purpose-built community edifice. First-century evidence suggests that Jewish communities liked to meet close to running water: cf. Jos. Ant. 14:258. Lydia's independent status as a trader (v. 14) and householder (v. 15) is not uncommon for women in the ancient world, especially among the travelling merchants and artisans who formed a major component of the population of most Greek cities: such women not infrequently take on the role of patron and benefactor to Jewish and other immigrant communities.

(16:16–24) Exorcism and Imprisonment Paul's stay in Philippi takes a dramatic turn from a chance encounter with a fortune-teller. Luke describes this slave-girl as having a 'python spirit' (v. 16, 'spirit of divination'), that is as having the ability to deliver oracular pronouncements in the manner of the shamanistic prophetesses of the Delphic oracle. This was a well-known phenomenon in the ancient Mediterranean world, and its potential for commercial exploitation is nicely satirized by Lucian (e.g. Peregrinus; Alexander the False Prophet). Luke, unlike Lucian, sees this as a genuine spiritual force which intuitively recognizes Paul's own supernatural power (v. 17): as in the gospels, such pronouncements, though expressing spiritual truth, emanate from evil spirits which can be exorcized (v. 18; cf. Lk 4:34–5). At one level, therefore, this is a story that demonstrates Paul's spiritual power (while stressing that it is strictly subordinate to that of Christ, v. 18). The episode descends to civic melodrama, however, when the slave's owners (whose motives Luke characterizes as purely commercial) take Paul and Silas to court. Luke uses the standard Greek term stratēgoi (v. 20) for the local magistrates (their Latin title would have been praetores), who are correctly shown as meeting in the city's agora (market-place, Lat. forum, v. 19). The charge (vv. 20–1) is interesting: though the practice of Judaism was not in itself illegal in the empire, Roman sources show a deep-rooted prejudice against the adoption of foreign religious customs by Roman citizens, and this periodically expressed itself in official enactments (cf. Acts 18:1–11). The magistrates, tacitly accepting the support of the crowd (v. 22) impose a standard Roman punishment (v. 22, 'beaten with rods', i.e. beaten with the fusces carried by the lictores: cf. 2 Cor 11:25).

(16:15–34) The Saving of the Jailer Luke shares with the Greek novelists a taste for dramatic scenes of imprisonment and escape (cf. 12:6–17), and this scene allows him to depict another aspect of Paul's spiritual power as something that allows him to triumph over adversity. Like the philosopher Socrates, he sings hymns in prison (Epict. Diss. 2.6.26–7); like the prophet Daniel, he is rescued by divine intervention from a punishment that he has incurred simply by being faithful to his God (cf. Dan 3, 6). Paul's status as a true philosopher is further enhanced by his treatment of the jailer: by honourably staying put when the earthquake would have allowed him to escape (and by implication keeping the other prisoners in place), Paul prevents the jailer from a shame-induced suicide (v. 28). The result is a reversal of roles: disregarding his original orders (v. 23), the jailer now treats his prisoners with honour (v. 30), washes their wounds (v. 33) and supplicates them for salvation (v. 30). Thus Paul is able to use the shameful experience of prison to further his mission (v. 32), even in the middle of the night (vv. 25, 33). The jailer in his turn becomes a paradigmatic convert, hearing the word and responding in faith 'with his entire household' (stressed three times, vv. 32, 33, 34), baptized, sharing table-fellowship, and 'rejoicing' (vv. 33, 34).

(16:35–40) The Shaming of the Magistrates The real losers in this drama are the colony's magistrates. The 'police' (rhabdouchoi, lictores, v. 35) come to tell the jailer to release his troublesome visitors; but Paul has another trick up his sleeve. Only now does he choose to reveal his true civic status: as Roman citizens, he and his companion should not have been publicly humiliated, and they are certainly not going to let the authorities get away with this crude mistreatment (v. 37). The revelation terrifies the magistrates. Roman citizens had a right to higher standards of legal treatment than other inhabitants of the empire: in the previous century, the senator Verres had been prosecuted in Rome for a series of crimes against provincials which included the mistreatment of Roman citizens (Cicero, Against Verres, 2.5.169–70). Whether Paul was actually a Roman citizen is a matter of some dispute: he never mentions the fact in his letters, and it has been thought to be incompatible with his upbringing as an observant Jew (Phil 3:5–6). But it is an important feature of the plot of Acts (Acts 22:22–9; 25:11–12), and here serves to complete the role-reversal in the story with the complete discomfiture of the magistrates, who have to come to 'apologize' to Paul (better 'implore'; parekalesan, v. 39) and beg him to leave. The episode (which has its humorous side) shows Paul coming out with honour from a situation where he seemed to be humiliated, and demonstrates above all that faithfulness and boldness in preaching God's word will be vindicated; but it hardly leaves the impression that Paul is a model Roman citizen.

(17:1–9) Thessalonica The first-person narrative has disappeared at some point in the Philippi story, and the next few episodes see Paul continuing his travels with Silas and Timothy. Thessalonica (Salonica), a couple of stages down the Via Egnatia, sees a repeat of the pattern set at Pisidian Antioch. Thessalonica has a well-established Jewish community with a synagogue (v. 1), where Paul spends three successive sabbaths arguing for his own messianic interpretation of Scripture (v. 2). As in Antioch, there is initial success among synagogue members and even more among Gentile adherents (v. 4), but this leads to an outbreak of 'jealousy' (or possibly 'fundamentalist zeal': zēlōsantes, v. 5) on the part of 'the Jews', who enlist the help of the city mob to launch an attack on Paul and Silas. The civic authorities here are called 'politarchs' (v. 6), a title which is attested in inscriptional evidence for Thessalonica (Horsley 1994: 419–31). Who Jason is, and how Paul comes to be staying at his house (vv. 5–7), are not explained. Once again, a disturbing charge is laid against the missionaries, bringing out the latent political radicalism of the Christian mission (vv. 6–7): it is easy to read Paul's proclamation of the Kingdom (cf. 28:31) as inherently incompatible with the personal oaths of loyalty to the emperor demanded of all inhabitants of the empire (Barrett 1994–9: ii. 815–16). And once again, Paul is given no chance to rebut the charge: the overall impression left by this episode is that trouble does indeed follow the mission wherever it goes.

17:10–15 Beroea A similar pattern is repeated at Beroea, some 80 km down the road. The dependency of the Pauline mission on the networks of the Jewish diaspora is clearly visible in this section: arriving in an unfamiliar city, Paul heads straight for the synagogue and encourages the community to a flurry of exegetical study. The Jews of Beroea are presented as a paradigm of positive response: belief is the result (v. 12), but this is built on a foundation of careful and open-minded examination (anakrinontes, v. 11) of the scriptural testimony to Christ. This community is described as 'nobler' than the Jews of Thessalonica (eugenesteroi, v. 11: NRSV 'more receptive'), an implicitly élitist value-word which clearly reveals how Luke wants his readers to respond: note again that it is 'women of high standing and men' who believe (v. 12), while it is 'the crowds', i.e. the urban proletariat, who are stirred up to protest by the negatively portrayed Jews of Thessalonica (v. 13). The unnecessary detail provided about the complex movements of Paul and his associates (vv. 14–15) sounds as if it is based on inside knowledge of the Pauline retinue.

(17:16–21) Waiting in Athens That Paul visited Athens shortly after founding the church in Thessalonica, and that he spent some time waiting there (v. 16), is confirmed by 1 Thess 3:1–6, which must have been written not long after the visit. Whether the speech described here actually happened is another question: many commentators believe Luke has simply seized the opportunity of Paul's visit to the heartland of Hellenic culture to create a type-scene, portraying his hero as a philosopher in the best Greek traditions, taking on the philosophers at their own game and preaching the gospel in Greek terms. Although Luke characterizes the philosophical scene in terms of the most popular philosophies of his own day (v. 18), the whole dramatic setting is redolent of the Athens of the classical period, the golden days of philosophy, when Socrates walked the streets of Athens and engaged in philosophical dialogue (dialegeto, 'argued', v. 17) in the agora with everyone he met. Significantly, here in Athens the charge brought against Paul has a distinctly Socratic flavour: in this setting, and for readers educated in the popular traditions of the Greek philosophical schools, 'foreign divinities' (xenōn daimoniōn, v. 18) can hardly fail to evoke the charge brought against Socrates of preaching 'new divinities' (kainā daimonia: cf. Xen. Mem. 1.1.1–4: this is the only place in the NT where daimonia has the neutral Greek sense 'divine beings' rather than the normal NT sense of 'evil spirits'). The Areopagus was the chief administrative body in the city in Paul's day (Gill 1994: 447), but to Luke's Greek readers it is pre-eminently the place where philosophers are tried, just as for his Jewish readers Jerusalem is the place where prophets are put to death (Lk 13:33–4). See further Alexander 1993b: 57–63.

(17:22–34) Paul's Areopagus Speech This speech allows Luke to present a more complete and studied version of Paul's preaching to Gentiles than the emergency sermon of 14:15–17. The points of focus are very close to Paul's own summary of his message at 1 Thess 1:9–10: a repudiation of idolatry in favour of the 'living and true God' (v. 29) and an eschatological expectation of the risen Christ's return from heaven (v. 31). In preparation for this day of judgement, all humanity has to repent (v. 30). Apart from the reference to Christ, Luke's Paul here stands well within the traditions of diaspora Judaism, which believed that the pagan world was guilty of the sin of idolatry, that is, of failure to recognize that the living creator God behind the created universe (vv. 24–8) cannot possibly be worshipped in human temples (v. 24) or through human-made religious images (v. 29). Like other diaspora Jewish apologists, Paul seeks to exploit points of common interest with his audience. Athens was famous for its profusion of religious images: to Paul's Jewish eyes, this is nothing better than a collection of 'idols' (v. 16), but the fact that the Athenians liked to include altar-dedications to 'unknown gods' creates a bridgehead for the preaching of the one 'unknown God' behind the universe (v. 23). Greek philosophers had already popularized a kind of philosophical monotheism among more sophisticated pagan thinkers (this was one reason why Judaism attracted their respect), and Paul is able to use a line from the Stoic poet Aratus (v. 28; Aratus, Phaenomena, 5) to reinforce his point: the same line had already been quoted by the Jewish apologist Aristobulus (Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 13.12.6). The similarities and differences between this speech and Paul's own survey of pagan religion in Rom 1–3 have occasioned much scholarly debate: what is missing, again, is the specific preaching of Christ crucified (cf. 1 Cor 1:18–25), and Rom 1:32 seems to leave no room for the 'ignorance' of Acts 17:30; but both approaches are clear that the coming of Christ signals a universal human need for repentance.

(18:1–11) Corinth Corinth was the administrative centre of the Roman province of Achaëa and was to become an important centre for the Pauline mission. Aquila and Priscilla (v. 2) are to become important associates of Paul's, well known to the Corinthian church (1 Cor 16:19; cf. Rom 16:3–4); here Luke records their first meeting at the time of the founding of the church in Corinth. The implication is that they had already become Christians, presumably in Rome. According to the imperial biographer Suetonius (Life of Claudius, 25), the reason for Claudius' expulsion of the Jews from Rome was that the Jews were 'constantly causing disturbances at the instigation of Chrestus'; there may well be a confusion with Christus, which would sound the same in first-century Greek. A later chronicler dates the event to Claudius' ninth year, i.e. 49 CE. Paul's tentmaking (v. 3) is mentioned here for the first time; Paul himself asserts his determination to support his mission by manual work, especially in Corinth (1 Cor 4:12; 9:6; 1 Thess 2:9), but never says what the work was. Paul's own attitude to the 'hardship' involved in this work suggests that he regarded it as a demeaning occupation; but Luke does not make this an issue.

For Silas and Timothy (v. 5), cf. 1 Thess 3:1, 6; Luke may have simplified the story. Paul's mission in Corinth follows the now familiar sequence (vv. 4–5). His disputations in the synagogue come to an abrupt end as opposition builds up (v. 6), and Paul makes a symbolic gesture of repudiation (cf. 13:51). Paul's 'innocence' here (v. 6) is prophetic: he has discharged his responsibility to the Jewish community, and now turns to the Gentiles with a clear conscience (cf. Ezek 33:1–9). The house of Titius Justus (v. 7) is used as a meeting-place and becomes the base for the meetings of the nascent Christian community. This is undoubtedly how many of the Pauline churches originated, as breakaway groups which began holding separate meetings alongside the synagogue: other households soon joined them (v. 8; cf. 1 Cor 11:14; and see ACTS 13:15 on 'official of the synagogue').

(18:12–17) Gallio After a period of quiet church growth, opposition flares up again and Paul is brought before the proconsul Gallio. Since proconsuls were in office only for one year, this name provides another chronological indicator in Luke's narrative, in fact one of the key dates for NT chronology. An inscription surviving in Delphi in which Claudius refers to Gallio as his friend and proconsul (full text in Fitzmyer 1998: 621) places Gallio in Achaëa during the first part of 52 CE; he seems to have left his province early because of illness, so Paul's appearance before him must fall between the spring and early autumn of the year 52. The charge is that the form of religious practice advocated by Paul is 'contrary to the law' (v. 13); once again, Paul gets no chance to defend himself, but Gallio makes the significant judgement that the only law at issue is Jewish law: there is no question of 'crime or serious villainy' (v. 14), i.e. nothing that contravenes the Roman law of the colony. From the Roman perspective, in other words, disputes between synagogue members and church members are still intramural disputes between rival factions (or 'sects', cf. 24:14) within the Jewish community. This is almost certainly a correct perception for the period Luke is describing; Suetonius' account of Claudius' expulsion of the Jews (ACTS 18:2) shows that a Roman writer could still make the same assumption in the second century. Gallio's studied indifference (v. 17) is not a particularly good advertisement for Roman justice, but it does make the point dramatically that the dispute over the messianist interpretation of the Jewish Scriptures was not something with which the Roman authorities needed to be concerned.

(18:18–23) Return to Base Attempts to establish a precise internal chronology for the Pauline mission are continually baffled by Luke's vagueness on matters of time. It is probable (though not certain) that the Gallio incident took place at the end of the eighteen months (v. 11), but we still do not know how much longer Paul stayed in Corinth after 52 (v. 18). The impression Luke gives is that he himself has only sporadic pieces of precise information here. At some point, however, after a long and successful mission in Corinth, Paul decides to return to Syria. Cenchreae (v. 18) was the port of Corinth on the eastern side of the Isthmus; Paul mentions a church there, of which Phoebe was deacon and patron (Rom 16:1–2). The point of the vow (presumably a Nazirite vow, cf. 21:23–4) is unclear, but it may show Paul's continuing fidelity to Jewish modes of piety. He takes Priscilla and Aquila with him as far as Ephesus (v. 19; cf. 1 Cor 16:9) and seizes the opportunity for a tentative foray into the synagogue there, apparently testing the waters for a future visit: the earlier sense that the Spirit had forbidden mission in Asia (16:6) appears to be still in his mind (v. 20). Luke seems to have no inside information on Paul's motivation for this visit. He clearly wants to touch base with the home church in Syrian Antioch (v. 22), but appears to have paid a brief visit to Jerusalem as well: the Greek has simply 'he went up', but this is a reasonable construction given that he then goes 'down' (normal idiom for a journey away from Jerusalem) to Antioch. A brief note (v. 23) shows Paul going back to the churches founded on the 'first missionary journey' for a third pastoral visit, and marks the start of the second phase of his most extended period of missionary activity.

Act III Scene 4: Paul's Third Missionary Journey (18:24–21:16)

Paul's return to Antioch at 18:22 provides a convenient marker to divide the 'second' from the 'third' missionary journeys, though there is little to suggest more than the briefest of visits before he is off on the road again (18:23). Much of this section is spent on consolidation of the churches already planted; this must in fact have been the period when Paul was writing many of the letters (e.g. the Corinthian correspondence) which show him deeply engaged in dealing with the pastoral problems that were arising in the churches he had founded (cf. 2 Cor 11:28). Acts shows us little of all this, preferring to focus on the evangelistic work which we glimpse in the background of the epistles (e.g. 2 Cor 2:12). Luke does give us a vignette of Paul the pastor, however, in the farewell speech to the Ephesian elders (20:18–35). This section also charts Paul's growing awareness of his final destination, as the narrative moves inexorably towards its climax in Jerusalem, and points beyond that to Rome.

(18:24–8) Interlude: Apollos in Corinth Luke's almost exclusive focus on Paul inevitably gives an oversimplified picture of a church whose expansion is becoming ever more complex. Here a rare interlude gives us a glimpse of an independent missionary at work within the Pauline sphere. As an Alexandrian Jew, Apollos was a member of one of the largest Jewish communities in the ancient world, with a complex and well-established tradition of philosophical hermeneutics of which Philo is the best-known proponent: cf. 1 Cor 1:12; 3:4–9; 4:6; 16:12, where it is clear that Apollos (perhaps because he displays some of the 'wisdom' that Paul lacks) has gained a following within the Corinthian church. The instruction (katechēsis) Apollos has received (v. 25) is sufficiently Christian to be called 'the way of the Lord', but it stops short at the 'baptism of John' (ACTS 19:3). Priscilla and Aquila (who presumably heard Apollos in the synagogue) provide whatever further instruction is needed; but Luke does not state how the 'accuracy' of Apollos' teaching needed to be supplemented, and there is no suggestion that Apollos' baptism was inadequate. An already well-developed network of interchurch communications (v. 27) facilitates Apollos' visit to Corinth. There Apollos' rhetorical gifts are well used in public debate with the synagogue (v. 28).

(19:1–7) The Disciples of John The focus shifts back to Paul, the solitary charismatic leader and apologist, who is making his way back to Ephesus via the 'interior regions' (v. 1), i.e. presumably down from the Galatian uplands via the Lycus valley. Somewhere (in Ephesus?) he finds a mysterious group of 'disciples' (v. 1) who have not heard of the Holy Spirit and know only of John's baptism (vv. 2–3). The episode gives Paul a parallel scene to Peter's Samaritan Pentecost (8:15–17): like Peter, he lays hands on the disciples and they receive the Holy Spirit (v. 6). The two passages give us the same sequence of events in Christian initiation: baptism 'in the name of the Lord Jesus' (v. 5; cf. 8:16), then laying-on of hands followed by the reception of the Holy Spirit (v. 6; cf. 8:17). What is different here is the starting-point: the baptism of John the Baptist, the forerunner who points the way to Christ (cf. 13:24–5) can hardly be disowned by Christians, but it is not sufficient on its own: as a 'baptism of repentance' (v. 4), it was, like John himself, purely preparatory to Christian baptism (cf. 2:33, 38). This gives Luke a coherent theology, but it leaves us with a puzzle: why was Apollos not compelled to be baptized? Does Luke intend us to understand that he was already 'burning with the Spirit' (18:25, NRSV 'with burning enthusiasm')? Luke's interest in orthopraxy is strictly limited; his agenda here may partly be to incorporate disparate Ephesus traditions into the overarching portrait of Paul which is his main focus.

(19:8–10) Paul Preaches in Ephesus A compressed summary passage (completely ignoring any previous Christian activity in Ephesus) now shows Paul repeating in the province of Asia the patterns of preaching and apologetic which have characterized his mission across Galatia, Macedonia, and Achaia. He joins the synagogue (v. 8) in order to campaign publicly for the messianist interpretation of the Scriptures in which he believes: this is a campaign of dialectical argument and persuasion (v. 8) which lasts for three months and wins some success. But he fails to carry the whole community with him, and as opposition grows he decides to move out, taking with him the 'disciples' (v. 9, i.e. those who have accepted his teachings) to set up a rival school of scriptural interpretation in a nearby lecture-hall: the Western text (D) adds the circumstantial detail of his regular teaching hours (NRSV marg.). From this base the whole of Asia is evangelized (v. 10): this is typical Lucan hyperbole, but it fits Paul's own highly stylized and province-based view of his mission (Rom 15:19). Note again that the highly public 'leaving' of the synagogue (v. 9) does not mean the cessation of preaching to Jewish individuals ('both Jews and Greeks', v. 10).

(19:11–20) Magic and Miracle The summary of the Ephesus mission is enlivened by two dramatic scenes that display other key attributes of Luke's portrait of Paul. Here he is characterized as a miracle-worker of such 'extraordinary' charismatic power (v. 11) that it can be transmitted via skin-contact with inanimate objects (v. 12, cf. 5:15; Lk 8:44). Unusually in Luke's narrative, God is the subject of the first sentence here (v. 11): it is important for Luke to underline that Paul's spiritual power does not come from himself but is a direct divine endorsement of his mission. The point is made in dramatic form with the episode of the sons of Scaeva (v. 14), itinerant Jewish exorcists who try (as Simon Magus had done with Peter in 8:19) to annex this charismatic power for themselves (v. 13). This episode has a particular appositeness in Ephesus, which was associated with certain magical formulae (the Ephesia Grammata or 'Ephesian Letters') which had the power to ward off evil spirits (Trebilco 1994: 314–15). Luke makes the point clearly that Christian miracle is totally distinct from this widespread syncretistic activity: real evil spirits (and Luke believes that they exist) respond not to names, however exalted, but to the power of God working through his legitimate representatives (v. 15). Despite the humour, there is a serious point being made here, integral to early Christian propaganda: as everywhere in Acts, it is the name of the Lord Jesus, not of any missionary or apostle, that is 'glorified' (v. 17). The scene may also have an exemplary function for Christian readers: magical practice is not an option for Christian believers (vv. 18–19).

(19:21–2) Paul's Travel Plans This phase of Paul's mission is drawing to a close, and Luke now begins to interleave into his narrative hints of his final destination. The plan to revisit the churches in Macedonia and Achaia (Philippi, Beroea, Thessalonica, Corinth) reverberates through the pages of Paul's letters to the Corinthians, which were probably written about this time: cf. 1 Cor 16:5–8; 2 Cor 1:16. The voyage was always intended to culminate with a visit to Jerusalem, and by the time Paul writes Romans (from Corinth) we know that he was planning to go on from Jerusalem to Rome (Rom 15:22–5). It is noticeable that Luke here, like Paul but unlike his own normal practice, uses province names rather than city names to describe Paul's destinations. Erastus (v. 22) may be the same as the Corinthian Christian of Rom 16:23. But why did Luke never mention the collection for the poor of Jerusalem on which Paul lavished so much time and attention at this stage in his ministry (Rom 15:25–8; 2 Cor 8–9), and which was the chief motive for his visit to Jerusalem (1 Cor 16:1–4)? Lucan hindsight may be at least part of the answer: Paul's visit to Jerusalem turned out disastrously different from his expectations, and his prophetic sense that he 'must' see Rome (v. 21; Luke's 'must' [dei] normally conceals a reference to the divine will) is fulfilled in ways that Paul clearly did not envisage when he wrote the Epistle to the Romans.

(19:23–41) Demetrius the Silversmith Before the journey begins, however, a final detailed and dramatic scene makes a fitting closure to Paul's active missionary period. It is, like so many others in Acts, a scene of civic disturbance (tarachos, v. 23) which almost brings the city to the dangerous state of stasis (rioting, v. 40), a state which above all others civic authority desired to avoid. The disturbance (naturally) was not Paul's fault: this time the culprits are a guild of silverworkers who feel that their livelihood is threatened by the success of Paul's mission (vv. 24–7). For the monetary motive, cf. 16:19; but on this occasion Paul has incurred the wrath of a powerful guild who are able to draw on a combination of civic pride and religious devotion to one of the most powerful cults in the ancient world (Trebilco 1994: 316–38). The silversmiths' guild of Ephesus is known from inscriptions; several ancient texts speak of the powerful position of such trade associations and their potential for civic disturbance (ibid. 338–42).

Luke's vivid picture of the unruly mob rushing into the theatre (v. 29) can be paralleled in both factual and fictional accounts of civic life in this period. The theatre (which has been excavated) was built in the third century BCE and enlarged under the emperors; it seated about 20,000, and was the natural site both for regular assemblies (v. 24) and for informal meetings (ibid. 348–50). Paul's own part in this episode is small, but Luke makes it clear that his personal courage is not in doubt (v. 30). The Asiarchs (v. 31: NRSV 'officials of the province of Asia') are members of the city's social élite, prominent in public events and benefaction: their existence at this period was long thought to be an anachronism, but is now confirmed by extensive epigraphic evidence. The identity of Alexander (v. 33) is unclear, but his intervention serves to underline the racist undertones of the riot (v. 34). The 'town clerk' (v. 35) is probably the grammateus tou dêmou, a title well attested by contemporary inscriptions as a leader and spokesperson for the assembly. The claim that the cult statue 'fell from heaven' (v. 35) appears elsewhere in the ancient world (often of meteorites), but is not otherwise attested for Ephesus. The charge of temple robbing (hierosulia) and/or blasphemy against the pagan gods (v. 37) was one that Jewish writers in the diaspora were sedulous to avoid (cf. e.g. Jos. Ant. 4.207; Ag. Ap. 2.237; Philo, Spec. Leg. 1.53); it is one to which Paul's denunciation of idolatry leaves him open (v. 26; cf. 17:29), and Luke takes this opportunity to rebut it. The town clerk's reference to proconsuls (v. 38; generic plural: there was only one at a time) lends powerful support to his appeal for calm (v. 40): Greek cities in the Roman empire were left in relative autonomy to run their own internal affairs, but the one crime that could be guaranteed to incur imperial displeasure was civic disorder.

(20:1–6) Journey: Ephesus to Troas via Macedonia The planned journey (19:21) now gets under way. The point at which Paul is about to leave Corinth for Jerusalem by sea (v. 3) may be the point at which Romans 15:25 was written. The change of plan coincides with a change of pace: the list of associates (v. 4) suddenly gives this journey a ceremonial flavour, and with the reappearance of the we-narrator (vv. 5–6) we are counting by days rather than months. From this point on, the narrative of Paul's penultimate voyage slows down as travel once again becomes an event to be savoured. Paul's companions come from almost all the areas covered by the mission so far. For Sopater cf. (probably) Rom 16:21; for Tychicus Col 4:7; Eph 6:21; 2 Tim 4:12; Titus 3:12. Aristarchus and Gaius have been mentioned in passing in 19:29 (though the names are not uncommon, and the Gaius of Rom 16:23 is almost certainly a Corinthian); cf. also Col 4:10. Since the we-narrator was last heard of in Philippi (16:17), it is a natural inference that he was left behind there and is picked up again here after Paul has spent the Passover season in Philippi (v. 6).

(20:7–12) Troas There is a constant feeling in this section that the narrator knows more than he troubles to reveal. Clearly there is a church in Troas, though its founding (probably because it was independent of Paul) has not been recorded: cf. 2 Cor 2:12–13, which also implies that there were believers in Troas. The meeting 'to break bread' on the first day of the week (v. 7) implies some kind of liturgical gathering; cf. Acts 2:42. Since for most Christians Sunday was a working day, early practice was to meet on Saturday night or early on Sunday morning (cf. Pliny, Ep. 10.96.7). It is simplest to read this as an evening gathering, after work for some (perhaps including Eutychus: his name was a common slave name), which begins with an extended teaching session from Paul (v. 7), includes the 'breaking of bread' and a communal meal (v. 11), and finishes at dawn. The detail of the lamps (which created smoke and fumes) provides some explanation for Eutychus' sleep (v. 8); the fact that this was a third-storey room suggests a working-class insula or apartment block rather than the atrium of a villa or town house. Paul's prompt action to save the boy recalls the miracles of Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings 17:21–2; 2 Kings 4:34–5); the description of the boy as 'dead' (nekros, v. 9) implies that Luke intends us to see this as a real miracle, not just a lucky escape (v. 10).

(20:13–17) Journey: Troas to Miletus One of the most striking differences between the geographical perspectives of Paul and Luke is the latter's passionate interest in sea travel contrasted with Paul's almost complete lack of nautical vocabulary. This very detailed journey section illustrates the point well. It adds almost nothing to the plot and could have been summarized in a dozen words: but the profusion of technical sailing terms ('set sail', 'take on board') and redundant place-names adds a vivid touch of colour to the narrative, which becomes a virtual travelogue of the eastern Aegean. Maybe Paul actively preferred land travel (v. 13)? The decision to 'sail past Ephesus' (v. 16) does not imply that Paul had any control over the destination of the ship on which he had taken passage, but that he had decided not to break his journey there (Ephesus still had a port in Roman times). The reason Luke gives is pressure of time (v. 16); this would make all the more sense if the main motive for Paul's journey was to accompany the collection to Jerusalem (Rom 15:25; Rom 15:31 already betrays some anxiety on Paul's part about the reception of this gift). As in v. 6, the we-narrator reckons time in terms of Jewish festivals. At Miletus, however, there is time enough (perhaps while waiting for a ship to cover the next section of the voyage) to send for the 'elders' of the church at Ephesus (v. 17; cf. Acts 14:19–23).

(20:18–38) Paul's Speech to the Ephesian Elders This is the only direct speech in Acts in which Paul addresses Christian believers, and thus the only speech which strictly parallels the epistles. It has a strongly valedictory flavour, best matched in the prison letters (whether authentic or pseudonymous: cf. esp. Phil 3; 2 Tim 3–4). There are, however, already anticipations of this mood in Rom 15, and some parallels with the autobiographical sections of 2 Cor 10–12.

(1) The opening section of the speech (vv. 18–27) consists of a review of Paul's mission: although ostensibly concerned only with Asia (v. 18), it may stand as a paradigmatic review of the whole mission, just as 13:17–41 stands as a summary of Paul's whole message to the Jewish diaspora and 17:22–34 of his message to the Greeks. The mood is sombre, with a very Pauline stress on trials and tears (v. 19) rather than on the victories over opposing spiritual forces that Luke has highlighted: for 'humility' (tapeinophrosunē) cf. Phil 2:3, and for the general sentiment 1 Cor 4:10–13; 2 Cor 4:7–12; 11:23–9. The only positive achievement Paul highlights is the completeness of his proclamation of the gospel (vv. 20–1, 27); Rom 15:17–19 makes a similar claim, though Paul there boasts only of preaching to Gentiles. This completeness absolves Paul of his prophetic responsibility (expressed in the very Lucan language of v. 26: cf. 18:6). And the reason he needs to make this claim now is that his 'course' is almost finished (v. 24; cf. 13:25; 2 Tim 4:7; Phil 3:12–14 uses a similar metaphor but with different words). Paul expresses here a strong prophetic sense that his life is drawing to a close (vv. 22–5): it is hard to read v. 25 as anything other than a prediction of his own death, written at a time when Luke and his readers knew precisely what fate awaited Paul in Jerusalem and Rome.

(2) The second part of the speech (vv. 28–35) consists of paranaesis, practical advice to the church in a manner familiar from the epistles, especially the later, 'catholic' epistles. The shepherding metaphor of vv. 28–9 strongly recalls 1 Peter 5:2–3, though episkopoi (overseers) is Pauline (cf. Phil 1:1) and may reflect the fluid terminology of Paul's day better than Luke's term 'elders' (v. 17). The repeated counsel to 'watch' (vv. 28, 31) is a constant feature of early Christian paranaesis from Paul onwards (cf. 1 Thess 5:6; 1 Cor 16:13), but the warning against the inroads of false teachers (vv. 29–30) is more characteristic of the later epistles (cf. e.g. 1 Tim 1:3–11; Titus 2:1). The address closes with a commendation to the grace of God (v. 32) and a final hortatory example (vv. 33–5): Paul's own practice of working with his hands is put forward as an incitement to charitable giving and mutual support within the community. The final words cite an otherwise unknown saying of Jesus that may have been passed down in the oral tradition: it fits well with Luke's general interest in encouraging wealthier Christians to support the poor.

(3) The framework of the speech (vv. 36–8) reinforces the sense of impending tragedy that marks this final journey to Jerusalem. Emotions, so much a feature of the Greek novel, are surprisingly rare in Acts, but here we have a vividly drawn scene that reveals an unexpected facet of Luke's hero, his ability to inspire and share affection.

(21:1–16) Journey: Miletus to Jerusalem The we-narrator resumes the tale, giving it his customary wealth of detail: the itemized stages of the voyage, and the redundant detail of ships and cargoes, give the narration both a pragmatic realism and an indefinable sense of pathos. The group of disciples in Tyre (v. 3) is otherwise unknown; their prophetic warning (v. 4) and solemn farewell (v. 6) exemplify and reinforce the tone of Paul's address (cf. 20:23). Ptolemais (v. 7) provides another group of believers offering hospitality and support. By the time the party reach Caesarea (v. 8) they are re-entering more familiar territory: Philip the evangelist was last seen heading in the direction of Caesarea at 8:40. His prophetic daughters (v. 9) do not actually utter any warnings to Paul, but their presence adds to the authority of the group of local people (v. 12) who warn Paul against proceeding to Jerusalem. Most prominent among these is Agabus, an itinerant charismatic from Jerusalem who acts out a classic piece of prophetic symbolism (v. 11) as a warning to Paul; he must be the same as the one mentioned in 11:28, though Luke makes no cross-reference. The scene climaxes with a joint appeal from the local Christians and Paul's travelling companions (v. 12); Paul is moved but unshakable in his resolve to persist with his journey whatever the cost (v. 13). There is a distinctly Socratic flavour about this scene, heightened by the presence of the women and by the we-narration that echoes that of Plato's Phaedo, 117D–E. Paul is being presented as a martyr, exhibiting a properly philosophical courage like that of Socrates in the face of death: his friends, like those of Socrates, can only acquiesce in the divine will (v. 14; cf. Socrates' last words: 'If so it is pleasing to God, so let it be': Epict. Diss. 1.29.18–19).

Act Four: Paul the Prisoner (21:17–28:31)

Act IV Scene 1: Paul on Trial: Jerusalem (21:17–23:22)

The final quarter of Acts is devoted to a Pauline trial narrative, a structural parallel to the passion narrative of Jesus which closes the gospel. Paul the travelling missionary becomes—as the narrative has predicted—Paul the prisoner, the 'chained' Paul of the prison epistles. Luke exploits the dramatic possibilities of the situation to the full, unleashing a flood of direct speech which builds up to a vivid presentation of the case against Paul and of his own answer to it. The first scene is set in Jerusalem: Paul unintentionally sparks a riot in the temple (21:27–36), is rescued by a Roman tribune (21:37–40), and attempts to present his case to the crowd (22:1–21), then to the Sanhedrin (23:1–10). But the gradual unpacking of Paul's Roman status (22:22–30) signals a move to the next stage of the drama, where Paul is taken to Caesarea for his own protection (23:11–22).

(21:17–26) Arrival: Paul Meets James The visit begins innocuously enough, with a warm welcome from the 'brothers' (v. 17) and a more formal debriefing with the leaders of the Jerusalem church (v. 18). Paul's detailed report on the success of his Gentile mission (v. 19) is greeted with enthusiasm; Luke makes it clear that since the decisions of the Apostolic Council (see Acts 15:22–9), James and the Jerusalem leadership have no problem with the admission of Gentiles to the church (v. 25). But there is a threatening shadow from another quarter: the growing number of Jewish believers are troubled, not about what Paul tells the Gentiles, but about what he tells the Jews. Rumours are spreading that Paul's gospel involves inciting Jewish believers to abandon 'Moses' (i.e. the Jewish law), especially the ongoing practice of circumcision and the distinctive Jewish 'customs' that define Jewish identity in the diaspora (v. 21). This is what concerns those who are 'zealous for the law' (v. 20; cf. Acts 5:17), and it is not a problem about the past (are Jewish Christians saved by the law?) but about the future (should Jewish Christians go on keeping the law?): as so often, it is in the rituals surrounding the birth of children that crucial questions of identity crystallize. James suggests that Paul should demonstrate publicly that he himself remains an observant Jew by sponsoring and joining four men who are going through the procedures of a nazirite vow (vv. 23–4), and he agrees to do this (v. 26; cf. 18:18). The same issue arises here as over the circumcision of Timothy (see ACTS 16:1–5): is this action unthinkable for the Paul of the epistles (as some have suggested) or does it fall under the rubric of being ‘all things to all people’ (1 Cor 9:22)?

(21:27–36) Paul in the Temple James’s fateful advice unwittingly precipitates the crisis he is trying to avoid. Paul’s visibility in the temple over the seven days of his purification period (v. 27) brings him to the attention of some ‘Jews from Asia’, presumably like himself visiting the city for the festival of Pentecost: these may be members of the community in Ephesus with whom Paul had been disputing over a two-year period before his final journey (19:8–10). They perceive Paul’s gospel as a direct attack on the Jewish people, the law, and the temple, a general charge which the following chapters will do their best to answer; but they also add the more specific charge (guaranteed to cause maximum disturbance among the volatile crowds at a festival season) that Paul has brought an uncircumcised Gentile into the holy place (v. 28). This was a serious charge which would have incurred the death penalty: Jewish religious law was in this respect backed up by all the weight of Roman authority. Inscriptions surviving from the temple precinct (cf. Fitzmyer 1998: 698; cited Barrett 1994–9: ii. 1020) show that visitors to the temple were clearly warned at the barrier separating the Court of the Gentiles from the inner courts that any non-Jew entering the enclosure did so at his own risk. Paul would have known this perfectly well, and Luke makes it clear that he had not in fact broken this regulation (v. 29). But the misapprehension is enough to arouse ‘the whole city’ (v. 30), and temple security lock the inner courts against Paul, a symbolic irony that would not have been lost on Luke’s readers: time and again, in Luke’s presentation, it is not Paul himself but his Jewish audiences who close the doors against him. But the riot continues in the larger Court of the Gentiles, and Paul is in real danger of being lynched (vv. 31–2, 35–6). He is rescued in the nick of time by the commander of the Roman garrison stationed in the Antonia fortress, which overlooked the temple and was designed precisely to quell religious riots such as this (cf. Jos. J.W. 5. 243–5). Luke’s vivid use of detail adds to the dramatic realism of the scene.

(21:37–40) Paul and the Tribune This scene effectively dramatizes the tussle over identity that overshadows the final scenes of Paul’s career. Paul has been shut out (literally, v. 30) from the religious centre of his own people and is now in the hands of Roman authority. As readers, we know that Paul can in fact lay claim to a status that opens doors in the Roman world (16:37); but the tribune does not know that, and his instinct is to treat Paul as a native troublemaker on a level with other oriental insurrectionists (v. 38). Josephus tells of an Egyptian prophet who led a revolutionary crowd to assemble outside Jerusalem and wait for the city to fall (Jos. J.W. 2. 261–3; Ant. 20.169–72). He dates this incident to the procuratorship of Felix (which is the time of Paul’s visit), so the tribune’s allusion could be to the same figure. But Paul effectively undercuts the assumption by addressing the tribune in educated Greek (v. 37): with all the insulted pride of Greek citizenship at being taken for an Egyptian, he claims to be ‘a citizen of no mean city’ (v. 39: RSV brings out the understated elegance of the Greek phrase; cf. Eur. Ion, 8). Whether Paul, as the son of an observant Jewish family (Phil 3:5), could actually have held full Tarsian citizenship is disputed; but Luke uses both polis and politēs in a variety of non-technical senses (e.g. Lk 1:26; 19:14), and Paul may well have regarded himself as a politēs of the Jewish community of Tarsus in this wider sense (Légasse 1995: 366–8). For the tribune, used to the complexities of civic status in the eastern empire, Paul’s use of Greek is sufficient for the moment to establish common ground. When Paul turns to address the crowd again, however, it is his Jewishness that comes to the fore: ‘in the Hebrew language’ (v. 40) almost certainly means Aramaic, the spoken language of Palestine (Fitzmyer 1998: 701).

(22:1–21) Paul’s Temple Speech This is the first in a series of apologetic speeches (‘defence’, 22:1; Gk. apologia) made by Paul in this final section. Language and address are designed to stress the speaker’s commonality with his audience (vv. 1–2), and his opening words emphasize that he, like them, is a ‘zealot for God’ (v. 3) with a strict seminary education rooted in Jerusalem (which was presumably where he learnt to speak Aramaic). Both statements are consistent with Paul’s own claims about his education in Gal 1:13–14; some scholars have argued that ‘this city’ refers to Tarsus, but this seems to make less sense of Paul’s argument here. As in Gal 1:13 and Phil 3:6, the touchstone of Paul’s ‘zeal’ is his persecution of the church (v. 4). The high priest at the time of Paul’s arrest (v. 5) was not the same as the one in office at the time of his visit to Damascus, but there may have been some continuity in the membership of the Sanhedrin.

Paul’s retelling of his own conversion story overlaps with Luke’s version of the story in ch. 9. The very fact that the story is repeated in such detail is an indication of its importance for Luke; but there are also intriguing differences that shed an interesting light on Luke’s practice as a narrator. Clearly he sees no difficulty in the fact that the retold story is slightly different each time. Variation in detail was a stylistic virtue in the ancient rhetorical schools; and, as with Peter’s retellings of the Cornelius episodes, each retelling brings to the fore a further aspect of the event’s inner theological significance. Here Paul gives us a little more background detail about Ananias (v. 12), relevant to his claim to be working within a framework of observant Judaism. Ananias’ message to Paul (v. 14) also stresses continuity with Judaism: the one who sent Ananias was ‘the God of our ancestors’, and Jesus is described as ‘the Righteous One’ (cf. 3:13–14; Jer 23:5–6; 33:15). The significance of baptism (to which Luke has earlier alluded briefly without explanation) is here made explicit (v. 16): it is to do with cleansing from sin, and calling on the name of Christ. Paul now adds an episode of which Luke’s earlier narrative (9:26–30) has told us nothing. A visionary experience of Christ (significantly located in the temple, v. 17) warns Paul of his danger in Jerusalem (v. 18) and gives him a direct commission to go ‘far away to the Gentiles’ (v. 21). This is more explicit (and closer to Gal 1:16) than 9:15–16, where Ananias is told only that Saul has been chosen to bring the name of Christ 'before Gentiles and kings and the people of Israel' (a promise that seems in context to have more to do with martyrdom than with preaching).

(22:22–9) Paul the Roman The mention of Gentiles proves too much for Paul's audience, who resume their riotous behaviour at this point (vv. 22–3). The tribune decides to remove Paul to the barracks for further interrogation: the examination of witnesses by torture (v. 24) was routine practice in both Greek and Roman judicial systems. Leaving it to the last possible moment, Paul decides that it is time to reveal a little more of his status (v. 25), and produces consternation and dismay among the soldiers and minor officials into whose hands he has fallen (vv. 26–9). See ACTS 16:35–40 for the relative protection offered by the status of Roman citizen. The question of Paul's citizenship is hotly disputed (see Légasse 1995: 368–72). Paul's claim to be free-born (v. 28) means that his status goes back at least to his father's generation, possibly earlier, to the period of the civil wars, when Roman generals granted citizenship to a number of individuals and associations in the Greek East who had supported their cause. The contrast with the tribune (whose name we discover in 23:26 to be Claudius Lysias) may be a sly dig at the growing laxity of citizenship grants, which were widely reported to be freely available for money in the time of Claudius (Dio Cassius, 60. 17.5–6). But the essential point is that Luke's whole plot falls apart at this point without Paul's Roman citizenship, which is the motive force to get him to Rome; it is hard to imagine that Luke's readers, even as late as the 80s or 90s, would not have been familiar with the broad outlines of the story. Luke is quite happy, as we have seen, to present an account of historical events that is fictionalized in detail (e.g. in the attribution of direct speech), or to create 'type' scenes to represent what he considers to be the essential historical truth of a complex situation, but it is not plausible to suppose that the whole episode of Paul's appeal to Caesar is free invention: and the appeal is only possible if Paul had citizen status.

(22:30–23:10) Paul before the Sanhedrin The only way the tribune could 'order' the Sanhedrin to meet (22:30) was in an advisory capacity, in order to help him determine whether or not Paul had a case to answer in Jewish law. The high priest Ananias (23: 2; cf. 24:1) is Ananias son of Nebedaeus, appointed by Herod of Chalcis in 47 CE, and replaced in 59 (Jos. Ant. 20.103, 131, 179, 205). Paul's exchange with him is difficult to explain, however, even within the terms of Luke's own interests: Barrett (1994–9: ii. 1062) says of this passage, 'There is historical material behind this paragraph, but it is deep and remote.' Luke's account of the hearing does not follow exact judicial procedures, but it does convey some of the atmosphere of corruption and factionalism that pervades Josephus' account of the procuratorship of Felix. Paul is able to exploit this factionalism to his own advantage (vv. 6–8), and Luke highlights a positive response to Paul from at least some within the Pharisaic party. The point at issue (at least the only one that interests Luke) is the same as the question that exercised Gamaliel in 5:39: has Paul received a genuine divine revelation (v. 9)? The fact that some Pharisees are prepared to give him the benefit of the doubt is worth recording, but the net result of the hearing for the tribune is simply deeper confusion: clearly Paul is safer for the moment in Roman custody (v. 10).

(23:11–22) Plots and Counterplots Paul receives private reassurance at this point that the confusing things that are happening to him are part of God's plan (v. 11)—perhaps the first inkling that his 'witness' in Rome will not be as missionary but as prisoner. Meanwhile, 'the Jews' (by which Luke means those who are opposed to Paul) decide to get rid of Paul by assassination if judicial means will not avail (vv. 12–15). The wealth of dialogue and circumstantial detail with which this story is told is reminiscent of the Greek novels, but the ambush is not in itself implausible, and the hitherto unsuspected presence of Paul's nephew (v. 16) provides a possible source for Luke's privileged information about the conspirators. The net result is that Paul gets a high-quality escort to Caesarea (vv. 23–4), and the next stage of his gradual transfer into the Roman sphere of authority takes place with dramatic (and secret) efficiency.

(23:23–30) Paul Sent to Caesarea The numbers of Paul's military escort (vv. 23–4) seem excessive and may be exaggerated (though cf. Jos. Ant. 20.160–6, 185–8; J.W. 2.253–65 on the general disorder and danger on the roads at this period). Manuscripts disagree on some of the details (perhaps through a desire to improve on the purely secular detail of Luke's story), and the word translated 'spearmen' is a rare word whose meaning is unclear (which suggests that there may be good tradition behind this: it would not have been difficult for Luke to write more clearly if he were composing freely). 'Felix the governor' (v. 24) is named for the first time here. He was a freedman, brother to the imperial secretary Pallas (Jos. J.W. 2.247, Ant. 20.137), and was appointed by Claudius to the procuratorship of Judea c.52; he was widely regarded as cruel and corrupt (cf. Tac. Hist. 5.9), and was indicted by the Jews of Caesarea after his retirement from office (Jos. Ant. 20.182). Despite his unpopularity, he remained in post until c.60, when he was replaced by Festus (Jos. J.W. 2.271; Ant. 182). Luke's note that Claudius Lysias 'wrote a letter to this effect' (v. 25) is revealing: there must have been a letter, and Luke knows roughly what it would have said, but he makes no claim to be reproducing a genuine document verbatim. The tribune tells the story in a way more flattering to himself (v. 27), but otherwise repeats for the governor's benefit what we already know.

Act IV Scene 2: Paul on Trial: Caesarea (23:31–26:32)

The second phase of Paul's trial begins with his transfer to Caesarea. A formal hearing before Felix, with speeches for the prosecution and the defence (24:1–27) ends inconclusively, and Felix decides to defer his decision and keep Paul in custody. Matters comes to a head when Festus arrives in the province and the proceedings are reopened (25:1–12). Sensing that Festus favours sending him back for trial in Jerusalem, Paul is compelled to appeal to Caesar; the remainder of the scene is little more than a coda, with Paul displayed as a curiosity before Festus' guests, but this final hearing allows Paul to make one of his longest and most impassioned speeches before an influential patron of diaspora Judaism.

(23:31–24:9) The Speech for the Prosecution Caesarea is about 110 km. from Jerusalem by road, and Antipatris (23:31) is about half-way, at the point where the hill-country road intersects with the road running north from Lydda along the coastal plain. Paul is kept in Herod's praetorium (23:35), and some scholars have suggested that the Epistle to the Philippians could have been written from there (cf. Phil 1:13), in place of the traditional origin in Rome. The delegation from the Sanhedrin acts promptly (24:1), this time bringing a professional rhetor (NRSV 'attorney') to make a formal rhetorical presentation on their behalf; this is a subtle reaction to the change of venue for the hearing, which is now much more in the Roman sphere than the Jewish. Rhetorical presentation of a case by trained orators was very important in both Greek and Roman legal proceedings. Tertullus' speech, though short, displays many of the formulations known from contemporary speeches (Winter 1993: 315–22). The opening exordium (vv. 2–4) uses a range of honorific titles and compliments similar to those of papyrus petitions found in Egypt, stressing the characteristics of the governor that make him competent to try the case ('your foresight', 'your customary graciousness') and his success at maintenance of the peace (plausibly read as an allusion to Felix's recent putting down of the insurrection led by the Egyptian: see ACTS 21:37–40). The narratio or 'statement of the case' (vv. 5–6) is abbreviated but recognizable. The charge of being an 'agitator' (v. 5: lit. causing civic discord, staseis) is calculated to impress any Roman governor, especially one presiding over a province rapidly degenerating into stasis (Josephus' word for the state of civil war which ushered in the Jewish Revolt). Similar accusations were laid against Alexandrian Jews in 41 CE in a letter of Claudius that accuses them of 'stirring up a common plague throughout the world' (Barrett 1994–9: ii. 1097). The more precise charge of profaning the temple (v. 6) was, as we have seen, a serious breach of a Jewish religious law which the Romans were pledged to uphold. On 'sect' (v. 5) see below on ACTS 24:14; the name 'Nazoreans' (NRSV marg.) occurs several times in Luke–Acts and is probably best treated as a variant for Nazarēnos (Fitzmyer 1998: 254).

24:10–21 The Speech for the Defence Paul, like Tertullus, uses the popular 'many'-formula in his opening words ('many years'), though, as compliments go, this is factual rather than fulsome. His most serious self-defence (apologia, v. 10) focuses on events in Jerusalem: in the short time he has been in the city, Paul has not been involved in disputes or riots in synagogue or temple (v. 12). The fact that he has done precisely this across the diaspora is irrelevant, because it is outside the jurisdiction of the Sanhedrin: and as Luke has demonstrated, Roman governors outside Judea have shown no inclination to follow up complaints against Paul from local Jewish communities (cf. ACTS 18:12–17). Only in Judea, where Jewish law has the status of a local civic code upheld by Roman authority, is Paul in any danger: and there, as Luke takes pains to show, no offence against the law can be proved against him (v. 13). 'Twelve days' (v. 11) is puzzling, since Luke's account seems to imply a longer period, but he may be simply adding the seven days of the vow (21:27) to the five in Caesarea (24:1); Luke certainly seems to imply that the whole period of Paul's imprisonment and trial in Jerusalem, like that of Jesus, was hurried and compressed. The speech quickly moves from self-defence against the immediate charges to a more general affirmation of Paul's whole ideology (cf. Phil 1:7, which shows the same slide). 'The Way' which Paul follows is in fact presented in Acts as a 'sect' of Judaism, that is as a legitimate interpretation of the ancestral traditions (v. 14), and one that has significant continuity with the beliefs of the other 'sect' to which Paul (and many of his accusers) belong, the Pharisees (cf. 23:6; 26:5)—especially the belief in resurrection (vv. 15, 21). In this context, finally, Luke's Paul does appear to mention the collection for the poor of Jerusalem (v. 17: and cf. Rom. 15:25–7 for Paul's own liturgical angle on this).

(24:22–7) Felix Defers Judgement Prosecution and defence have made their presentations, but Felix refuses to be drawn into making a judgement, initially on the pretext of waiting for the tribune's report (v. 22); but no more is heard of this. The narrative pace begins to slow down: 'some days later' (v. 24) is one of the vaguer Lukan time-indicators. Paul now settles into the pattern that will control his life through the rest of the book. He is in custody (v. 23), but has a degree of 'liberty'; like all ancient prisoners, he is reliant on his 'friends' (lit. his own) for the daily necessities of food and clothing (cf. Jos. Ant. 18.203–4 on the conditions of Agrippa's imprisonment in Rome). Like all ancient prisoners, too, he is now totally dependent on the whim of the governor for the pursual of his case. Each time Paul is summoned by the governor (vv. 24, 26), he must have hoped that things were moving forward; but Felix has no interest in bringing the case to a speedy conclusion (v. 27). Luke's rather cynical evaluation of Felix's motives (v. 26) is matched by the general estimate of Felix found in Tacitus and Josephus (ACTS 23:23–35); Josephus records a similar complaint later of Albinus (Jos. Ant. 20.215). On the one visit that is recorded in more detail (vv. 24–5), Paul comes across as a model philosopher, trying in vain to influence a corrupt governor for good. Felix's adulterous relationship with Drusilla is known from Jos. Ant. 20.141–3. According to custom, Paul might have hoped to be released at the end of Felix's term of office (v. 27), but Felix deliberately leaves the case for his successor.

(25:1–12) Paul Appeals to Caesar Josephus confirms that Felix's successor in the province of Judea was Porcius Festus (Jos. J. W. 2.271; Ant. 20.182–8), and that his arrival was heralded by a flurry of official activity. Festus himself seems to have been keen to clean up the ongoing brigandage problem left by his predecessor; he may also have been eager to avoid the kind of action brought against his predecessor by the Jewish community in Caesarea, who took the opportunity to send a delegation to Rome to complain about Felix's 'misdeeds against the Jews' (Jos. Ant. 20.182). In this atmosphere, keeping on the right side of the Jewish authorities (vv. 2, 9) was obviously in the new governor's interests, but it was equally important to act with all propriety in relation to Rome: Festus' decision to play safe with the case of the troublesome Roman citizen Paul by referring the case to Rome makes a lot of sense. The sense that Paul is here under the protection of the Roman imperial authorities is very strong in this section: it was in fact one of the major roles of the emperor in this period to act as a final court of appeal for provincials who felt they were not getting justice from local magistrates. Only here, in all his defence speeches (apologia, v. 8) does Paul explicitly say that he has not committed any crime against the emperor: the main thrust of his defence is that no offence against Jewish law can be proved against him. Transferring the case to Jerusalem, as Festus threatens (v. 9), was in effect extraditing a Roman citizen for trial on a capital charge under a different legislative authority; if both parties agreed (v. 9), this was perfectly in order. But Paul rejects the offer, and (just to make sure) appeals over the procurator's head to the higher court of the emperor, as Roman citizens were entitled to do (v. 10). Legally, Paul was perfectly within his rights; interestingly, however, Luke seems to feel he needs to protect his hero against the more philosophical imputation that he is making this appeal because he is afraid to face death (v. 11). This may be another Socratic touch: the ideal Cynic, according to Epictetus (Diss. 3.22.55–6), will not appeal to any Caesar or proconsul in order to escape a flogging.

(25:13–27) Agrippa and Bernice The stage is now effectively set for Paul's last journey to Rome: Paul has appealed to Caesar, and Festus has agreed to transfer his case to Rome (v. 12). But Luke takes the time, before he goes, to give Paul another long set-piece speech, one of the longest in the book, and his final and most impassioned apologia. In a sense this is the speech we would expect Paul to make in Rome, before the final tribunal that tries his case; but Luke is either unwilling or unable to show us any trial scene in Rome, or even to tell us what is the denouement of the trial (see ACTS 28:23–31). Instead, Paul has one last chance to make a statement of his case (in effect, a defence of his whole career), not before Festus (who has already heard all he needs to know, and who in any case has relinquished his jurisdiction to a higher court) but before the Jewish king Agrippa II and his sister Bernice (v. 13). In itself Agrippa's visit to Festus, and Festus's decision to let Paul speak before him, is perfectly plausible: Festus may well have felt that the king's expertise would be useful to him in drafting his report on the case (v. 27). Agrippa II (son of the 'Herod' of ch. 12, Agrippa I) was now consolidating his holdings in the region (Jos. J.W. 2.247, 252) and becoming a significant power-broker, both with Rome and with the Jewish community worldwide; Josephus (ibid. 2.245, cf. also Ant. 20.135) shows him acting as spokesperson for a Jewish delegation in Rome a few years earlier, and later has him visit Alexandria to congratulate Tiberius Julius Alexander on his accession to the prefecture of Egypt (Jos. J.W. 2.309), much as Luke has him do here for Festus (Alexander was a previous procurator of Judea and Bernice's brother-in-law). Bernice was the sister of Agrippa (and also of Drusilla, Felix's wife); she was at this stage widowed and living at her brother's court in an ambiguous relationship (Jos. Ant. 20.145). She took an active part in Jewish affairs and is shown by Josephus alongside Agrippa in his final, disastrous attempt to hold back the forces of revolt in Jerusalem in 66 (Jos. J.W. 2.344). The scene, then, as Luke describes it, is historically realistic; but by choosing to give it the full dramatic treatment, Luke has turned it into a characteristic type-scene, parallel to the Nazareth pericope in Lk 4:16–30, which allows him to sum up both the Roman failure to find a case against Paul (25:14–27) and Paul's own self-defence (26:1–29). It also allows him to demonstrate the fulfilment of the prophecy that Paul would have to testify 'before kings' (9:15).

(26:1–11) Paul's Speech (1): My Former Life Like the speech before Felix, Paul's speech can be analysed according to the canons of contemporary rhetoric (Winter 1993: 327–31). It begins with a standard captatio benevolentiae, congratulating his auditor on his expert ability to judge the case (vv. 2–3). He then moves into a reprise of his own life-story, explaining at greater length than we have yet seen his former life in Judaism (cf. Gal 1:13–14). No mention of Tarsus here (that was to impress a Roman tribune); the whole emphasis is on Jerusalem, and in particular on Paul's Pharisaic piety (vv. 4–5; cf. 23:6, Phil 3:5–6) and his persecution of the Christians (vv. 9–11; cf. Gal 1:13; Phil 3:6; 1 Cor 15:9). Since Luke is not imparting any new information here, we need to ask what is the rhetorical function of this lengthy section, not only within the dramatic setting in the narrative but also on the reader. It is striking how much of the rhetoric here is devoted to demonstrating Paul's fidelity to the Jewish religion (vv. 6–8): far from being a mere ruse to split the audience (as it was in 23:6), the hope of the resurrection is integral to Paul's belief-system, as it is, he argues, to the ancestral beliefs of his audience.

(26:12–23) Paul's Speech (2): The Heavenly Vision Luke has already twice told us the story of Paul's conversion, once as narrator (9:1–18) and once in Paul's own words (22:6–16): as with Peter's vision, functional redundancy is an indicator of rhetorical importance. Here again there are slight variations in the telling: Luke does not think it important to repeat every detail of the story in exactly the same way (but as in the gospels, the keywords of the pericope tend to be the most stable in repetition: compare vv. 14–15 with 9:4–5; 22:7–8). The addition of 'in the Hebrew language' (v. 14) shows that Luke has not forgotten (even if his readers have) that this is an address to a Greek-speaking audience, whereas the previous speech in which the same events are recounted was in 'Hebrew' (or Aramaic; see ACTS 21:40). Does Luke feel it necessary to apologize, in this Greek context, for the barbarous name 'Saul', which he gives in its Semitized form? If so, it is all the stranger that the heavenly voice is expanded here to include a proverbial saying ('It hurts you to kick against the goads') which is not found in 9:4 or 22:7, and which is best paralleled in Greek literature (cf. esp. Eur. Bacch. 794–5). Paul's divine commission, which in earlier accounts had come via Ananias (9:15–16) or in a trance (22:17–21) is here compressed into his initial revelation (vv. 16–18). These verses contain the strongest and clearest statement in Acts of Paul's own understanding of his commission to bring the gospel to the Gentiles: cf. Gal 1:15–16. 'To serve and testify' (v. 16: hupēreten kai martura) recalls Luke's description of the ultimate sources of the apostolic tradition he reports (Lk 1:2). The mission is described (v. 18) in prophetic terms strongly reminiscent of Isa 42:6–7; 49:6 (already quoted at 13:47) and anticipating the close of the book (see ACTS 28:23–31). The controlling image is visual rather than verbal (cf. 'proclaim light', v. 23): Paul's calling is to 'testify' (v. 22), but the primal experience to which he is testifying is conceived not as word but as vision (v. 16), and it is a 'heavenly vision' which, as in the days of the patriarchs (7:2, 30) ultimately compels obedience (v. 19).

(26:24–32) Paul's Speech (3): Challenge to Agrippa The speech closes with a lively piece of dialogue which adds a touch of comic irony to the scene. The contrast between 'madness' (v. 24) and 'sober truth' (v. 25) is a philosophical one, designed to point up the contrast between the calm rationality of Luke's hero and the bluff incomprehension of the magistrate set to hear his case. In a sense, however, it is also a challenge to the reader of the type set by Gamaliel's conundrum at 5:38–9; and Luke points this up by turning the end of Paul's speech into a direct challenge to Agrippa, vv. 26–9). Any reader who shares Agrippa's knowledge (i.e. any reader who knows and believes the Jewish Scriptures) must be persuaded: and the end of the speech makes it clear that the real object of Paul's persuasive rhetoric is not exoneration but conversion: 'all who are listening' to Paul (v. 29) are invited to 'become a Christian' (v. 28). Given Agrippa's role in assisting Jewish delegations to present their case in Rome (ACTS 25:13–27), Paul's attempt to enlist the king to his cause may not have seemed unreasonable (Josephus is still trying to do the same 40 years later: Jos. Vita, 362–6). Within the secondary world of the narrative, however, Paul's appeal simply has the effect of reinforcing his innocence: both Festus and Agrippa are convinced that he has committed no crime (vv. 31–2).

Act IV Interlude: Storm and Shipwreck

The narrative now enters its final phase, a kind of dramatic postlude after the rhetorical climax of the speech before Agrippa. Paul has appealed to the power of Rome, and that power now envelops him ('transferred', lit. handed over, 27:1). The temple doors have been shut (21:30); the final appeal to Jerusalem has failed, and Paul is now effectively shut out from the city in which he was reared (26:4). The prophecy that he will bear witness in Rome (23:11) will be fulfilled, but very differently from the way Paul himself may have envisaged his visit to the centre of the empire (20:21). The final scene of the book will be set in Rome: but first, the transition is accomplished by a meticulously described sea-voyage which succeeds in gratifying the sensationalist tastes of the readers of ancient novels while retaining an obstinately pragmatic realism.

(27:1–12) Along the Coasts of Asia Minor The we-narrator reappears at this point (v. 1). Paul has at least two companions from among the party who accompanied him from Macedonia, including Aristarchus (v. 2) and the unnamed narrator. The centurion Julius (v. 1) is otherwise unknown, but inscriptions attest to the presence of an 'Augustan cohort' of auxiliaries in Syria during most of the first century. Paul is not important enough to warrant military transport, however; like most travellers, Julius and his small party of prisoners are expected to find what ships they can that are going in the right direction. For this first section of the voyage, the we-narrator shows his customary appetite for nautical detail; he notes the irrelevant point that the first ship Julius picked for the coastal voyage came originally from Adramyttium (up the Aegean coast towards the Troas, v. 2), and that the second came from Alexandria (v. 6). This was almost certainly one of the huge grain ships (cf. v. 38) that plied across the Mediterranean to Rome, supplying the city with grain from its 'bread-basket' in Egypt. Ancient ships did not cross the open sea any more than they had to: navigational instruments were primitive, and most mariners preferred to keep within sight of the coastal landmarks that were described in the periploi or seafarers' guides. Luke's painstaking account of the first stages of the voyage seems to highlight the difficulty Paul experiences in setting out in this new, westerly direction: the winds are against them (vv. 4, 7), they make slow progress (v. 7), each stage is accomplished 'with difficulty' (vv. 7, 8). As a result, by the time they reach Crete, the sailing season is almost over (v. 9; note again the we-narrator's penchant for dating by the Jewish liturgical calendar). There was no obvious reason why the ship's master should heed the advice of a Jewish prisoner who had (presumably) little seafaring experience (vv. 10–11); Paul's words are prophetic, though whether from common sense or from supernatural insight, Luke does not say.

(27:13–26) Storm Winds off Crete Paul's landing at Fair Havens, on the southern coast of Crete (v. 8), is still pointed out to visitors; the small bays on this rocky coast would not be suitable for a large ship to shelter from winter storms, so the decision to make for a better harbour was apparently reasonable (v. 12). But the manoeuvre has been left too late, and the ship is caught by a violent offshore wind (lit. a typhoon wind, v. 14): its name, Euraquilo (NRSV 'north-easter', v. 14) appears on a Roman wind-rose found in N. Africa. Roman ships, having a single large sail, were very difficult to turn into the wind (v. 15); the danger of being driven on to the sandbanks of the Syrtis, off the coast of Africa (v. 17) was very real. This passage abounds with nautical technicalities which have been found to make sense in terms of ancient navigation; though highly dramatic, the account is realistic and contains no supernatural elements. The only miraculous aspect of the story, so far as it goes, is Paul's self-possession and courage (vv. 21–6). This narrative (unlike some of the more sensational shipwreck accounts from ancient literature) contains no record of divine intervention, simply a dream recounted by the hero, who believes (and persuades his fellow-passengers to believe) that it is a promise of survival (v. 23). For readers who know their Bibles, this is a kind of reversal of the Jonah story: Jonah's disobedience to God brought his ship into danger (Jon 1:12), whereas Paul's obedience will ensure safety for his (v. 24).

(27:27–38) Up and Down in Adria The 'sea of Adria' is not the modern Adriatic but the open sea between Crete, Sicily, Italy, and N. Africa: the novelists call it the Ionian Sea. Josephus speaks of being shipwrecked in the same area with a ship's company of 600 (Jos. Vita, 15). The pattern of soundings (v. 28) and landmarks (vv. 39, 41) fits the traditional identification of Paul's landfall as St Paul's Bay on the island of Malta, though others have been suggested. Anchoring by the stern (v. 29) is feasible for ancient ships, and makes sense in the circumstances. Paul's authority is growing all the time; the centurion is by now much more inclined to listen to Paul than to the sailors (vv. 30–1). And his final intervention is directed at the 'salvation' of the whole ship's company: at one level, the advice to take some sustenance (v. 33 'without food', Gk. asitai, can mean 'without appetite') is a piece of practical advice aimed at helping them all to survive having to swim to shore (v. 34), but the Greek word sōtēria (salvation) also allows the story to be read at a symbolic level. This must be also the key to Paul's action in breaking bread and 'giving thanks' (v. 35); this is not a Christian eucharist in any formal sense, but the language elsewhere in Acts always has these connotations, and it is hard to believe they are completely absent here.

(27:39–44) All Safe to Land Improved visibility in the morning suggests to the experienced sailors the risky strategy of casting off the anchors (clearly they believe the ship is past saving) and running the ship ashore (vv. 39–40). Some unexpected underwater barrier prevents this (v. 41); the ship starts to break up some way out from the beach. 'Ran the ship aground' (v. 41) is the most literary phrase in the whole account: Luke here uses the Homeric and classical Greek word naus (ship), while elsewhere he has used the more pragmatic and colloquial ploion (boat) and skapos (dinghy); the verb used here (epokellō) is also Homeric. Since Homer was the staple text for Greek primary education, it is likely that any writer educated to Luke's level (whether Greek or Jewish) would know enough of Homer's characteristic diction to fall into it naturally on occasions where the subject-matter seemed to call for it, as here: storm and shipwreck are frequent events in Homer's Odyssey. But the phrase, even if it is used unconsciously, illustrates the extent to which Luke's hero is now moving out of the biblical world and invading the seas of classical mythology. Paul's thoroughly realistic voyage is also an epic journey into the unknown, across stormy seas which, for Greek and Jewish readers alike, always had some of the symbolism of chaotic forces beyond human control; the same psalm which speaks of God as 'the hope of all the ends of the earth' sees a symbolic equivalence between the 'roaring of the seas' and the 'tumult of the peoples' (Ps 65:5–7). In this sense Luke's relieved conclusion (v. 44) is both a simple statement of fact and a subdued paean of victory.

(28:1–10) Miracle on Malta The westernmost point of Paul's epic voyage, appropriately enough, has a desert island feel to it: the 'natives' (v. 2) are barbaroi in Greek, the standard term for non-Greek speakers (though readers of the Greek novels would be more inclined to look for them in the east than in the west). The native language on Malta was in fact Punic, as the island had been colonized from Carthage. Like the Lycaonians of 14:11, they are portrayed as kindly but superstitious folk, taking Paul's imperviousness to snakebite as an indication of divine status (v. 6). But in fact the Greek novels show that the islanders' attitude to shipwreck survivors was as common among sophisticated Greek readers as among 'barbarians'. In Chariton's Callirhoe (a novel which is roughly contemporary with Acts), Theron the pirate, saved from shipwreck, claims to be especially favoured by the gods; when his crimes become apparent, the narrator points up the moral that Theron was actually saved because of his impiety, so as to suffer just punishment (Callirhoe, 3.4.9–10).

Despite appearances, Malta is not an uninhabited island: the castaways are soon taken in by a local landowner with the Roman name of Publius (v. 7); this is a common Roman praenomen, and gives us little indication of his family. His title ('leading man', lit. first man) is attested from inscriptions as a Maltese title. Paul performs a miraculous healing on Publius's sick father (v. 8: reminiscent of Jesus' healing of Peter's mother-in-law); as in the gospels, other islanders start to come for healing (v. 9), proof, if any were needed, that the God whom Paul serves (27:23) is still with him. Far from demeaning Paul, the whole shipwreck incident has served to load him with honour (v. 10).

Act IV Scene 3: Paul in Rome (28:11–31)

After the drama of the shipwreck, there is almost an air of anticlimax about the book's final scene, which is both sombre and open-ended. Paul reaches Rome, which is where he has been headed (one way or another) ever since 20:21. But we never find out what happened when his case was heard before the emperor, or even if it was ever heard. The final verses of the book give us an ambivalent portrait of Paul the prisoner, preaching the kingdom to all comers (vv. 30–1), but never free of the custodial presence of Roman authority (v. 16). The bulk of the final scene is taken up with a debate with the Jewish community in Rome (vv. 17–28); only after failing to win acceptance for his message there does Paul finally turn 'to the Gentiles' (v. 28).

(28:11–16) Journey: Malta to Rome A final detailed journey section brings Paul's party to Rome with the we-narrator's customary attention to the ceremonies of voyaging. Malta was not as far from the sea-lanes that tied together Mediterranean civilization as it had seemed; the party have no trouble picking up a passage for their onward journey on an Alexandrian ship wintering on the island (v. 11). There is a touch of irony about the note on the ship's figurehead: the 'Twin Brothers' (i.e. Castor and Pollux, the Gemini or Dioscouri) were favourites with sailors and, according to Lucian, play a starring role in every good shipwreck tale (Lucian, On Salaried Posts, 1–2). Here their role is purely decorative: Paul does not need the help of pagan deities to get him through the storm. The ship calls in to ports along the east coast of Sicily and the 'toe' of Italy (vv. 12–13), both ancient Greek foundations which feature prominently in the plots of ancient novels and comic plays; but for the final stages of the journey, the atmosphere is wholly Roman. Luke prefers the Latin name Puteoli to the Greek Dicaearchia (cf. Jos. Vita, 16); the Forum of Appius and the Three Taverns are staging-posts along the Appian Way a few miles out from Rome. There is an odd feeling of homecoming about this last stage: far from being the 'ends of the earth' (1:8), Rome is a place where there are already 'brothers' (NRSV 'believers', v. 15) who come out to give Paul a ceremonial escort along the Appian Way. There is something slightly shocking about the reminder (v. 16) that after all, Paul is still a prisoner, with his liberty of action strictly curtailed.

(28:17–22) Paul's Reception in Rome The final scene of Acts shows us not Paul the pioneer missionary, preaching to the pagans of Rome as he had to the philosophers of Athens (ch. 17), but—as so often in Acts—Paul the faithful Jew, pleading with the leaders of the Jewish community in Rome to give his gospel a fair hearing. And, significantly, a fair hearing is what he gets: this scene is markedly more irenic than those in Jerusalem, and shows no sign of the animosity that Paul has been arousing in Asia Minor (21:27–8). Paul himself stresses his common interest with the leaders of the community ('Brothers', v. 17), and hastens to reassure them that his appeal to Caesar does not imply any disloyalty to 'my nation' (v. 19)—a suspicion that would naturally arise in a Rome which was accustomed to receiving rival delegations from the home country seeking justice or redress at the emperor's hands. Getting the local community on his side before word arrived from Jerusalem (v. 21) could make a lot of sense for Paul's case; but it also implies (as we saw in Pisidian Antioch) that neither Luke nor Paul sees 'the Jews' as a monolithic social or religious system: hostility in one part of the system does not by any means automatically imply that there will be hostility in others. In fact the Roman Jews have a remarkably open-minded attitude to Paul and his message (v. 22): it is a 'sect' which is 'spoken against' (v. 21, cf. Lk 2:34), but they want to make up their own minds about it (v. 22). Paul's stance is the same as it has been all through his trial: the 'hope of Israel' recalls his words to Agrippa (26:6–8), but also takes the reader much further back to the opening chapters of the gospel and the faithful old people in the temple 'waiting for the consolation of Israel' (Lk 2:25–38).

(28:23–31) Paul's Last Words Paul has one day to win over the local community. Luke does not tell us what he said, but we can legitimately infer that it was a repetition of the argument that the whole of Acts has been setting out in dramatic form (v. 23). The result is not wholly negative (some are 'convinced', v. 24), but it is inconclusive: the final state of the community is described as 'disharmony' (v. 25, 'disagreed': Gk. asymphōnoi). Paul's strategy all through Acts seems to have been to win over entire communities for his messianist interpretation of the Jewish Scriptures, and it is this strategy—not the offer of salvation to individual Jews—that finally seems to have run out of steam. Luke has saved up for this point in his narrative (vv. 26–7) the sombre prophecy from Isa 6:9–10 that informed much early Christian reflection on the Jewish rejection of Jesus (Lindars 1961: 159–67); compare Luke's citation in the parable of the sower (Lk 8:10) with Mk 4:12; Mt 13:14–15. It is a verse addressed by a prophet to his own people, and it records, not the threat of divine judgement, but the tragic failure of 'this people' to take advantage of the proffered 'salvation' (v. 28: the word picks up earlier allusions to Isaiah's wider vision (Acts 26:12–23) as well as taking the reader back to Simeon's prophecy in Lk 2:30). It is probably fair to regard this as the real conclusion to Acts; the final two verses form a brief coda, recording Paul's continued witness to 'all who came' (by implication Jews as well as Gentiles, v. 30) over a two-year period: hardly triumphalist, but quietly confident that the proclamation of the gospel will go on into an uncertain future 'with all boldness and without hindrance' (v. 31).

REFERENCES

- Alexander, L. (1993a), 'Chronology of Paul', in G. F. Hawthorne, R. P. Martin, D. G. Reid (eds.), The Dictionary of Paul and his Letters (Illinois: Inter-Varsity Press), 115–23.
- (1993b), 'Acts and Ancient Intellectual Biography', in Winter and Clarke (1993), 31–63.
- Barrett, C. K. (1994–9), The International Critical Commentary: Acts (2 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Bauckham, R. (1995) (ed.), The Book of Acts in its First-Century Setting, iv. Palestinian Setting (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Brooke, G. J. (2000), 'Florilegium', in Schiffman and VanderKam (2000), i. 297–8.
- Bruce, F. F. (1990), The Acts of the Apostles: the Greek Text with Introduction and Commentary, 3rd edn. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Dodd, C. H. (1936), The Apostolic Preaching and its Development (London: Hodder & Stoughton).
- Falk, D. (1995), 'Jewish Prayer Literature and the Jerusalem Church in Acts', in Bauckham (1995), 267–301.
- Fitzmyer, J. A. (1981), The Gospel According to Luke I–IX, (AB New York: Doubleday, 1981).
- (1998), The Acts of the Apostles, (AB New York: Doubleday).
- Gill, D. (1994), 'Achaia', in Gill and Gempf (1994), 433–53.
- Gill, D., and Gempf, C. (1994) (eds.), The Book of Acts in its First-Century Setting, ii. Graeco-Roman Setting (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Hansen, G. W. (1994), 'Galatia', in Gill and Gempf (1994), 377–95.
- Horsley, G. H. R. (1994), 'The Politarchs', in Gill and Gempf (1994), 419–31.
- Jewett, R. (1979), Dating Paul's Life (London: SCM).
- Johnson, L. T. (1992), The Acts of the Apostles, Sacra Pagina, 5 (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press).
- Légasse, S. (1995), 'Paul's Pre-Christian Career According to Acts', in Bauckham (1995), 365–90.
- Levinskaya, I. (1996), 'God-fearers: Epigraphic Evidence', in I. Levinskaya (ed.), The Book of Acts in its First Century Setting, v. Diaspora Setting, (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Lindars, B. (1961), New Testament Apologetic (London: SCM).
- Lüdemann, G. (1984), Paul, Apostle to the Gentiles: Studies in Chronology (London: SCM).
- Meyers, H. (1992), 'Synagogue', ABD vi. 251–63.
- Mitchell, S. (1992), 'Galatia', ABD ii. 871.
- Notbs, A. (1994), 'Cyprus', in Gill and Gempf (1994), 279–89.
- Porter, S. E. (1994), 'The "We" Passages', in Gill and Gempf (1994), 545–74.
- Powell, M. A. (1991), What Are They Saying About Acts? (New York: Paulist).
- Rapske, B. (1994), 'Acts, Travel and Shipwreck', in Gill and Gempf (1994), 1–47.
- Riesner, R. (1995), 'Synagogues in Jerusalem' in Bauckham (1995), 179–210.
- Schiffman, L. H., and VanderKam, J. C. (2000) (eds.), The Encyclopedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls (2 vols., New York: Oxford University Press).
- Scott, J. M. (1994), 'Luke's Geographical Horizon', in Gill and Gempf (1994), 483–544.
- Steudel, A. (2000), 'Testimonia', in Schiffman and VanderKam (2000), 936–8.
- Sterling, G. in Schiffman and VanderKam (2000), i. 5–7.
- Trebilco, P. (1994), 'Asia', in Gill and Gempf (1994), 316–38.
- Winter, B. (1993), 'Official Proceedings and Forensic Speeches in Acts 24–26', in Winter and Clarke (1993), 315–22.
- Winter, B. W., and Clarke, A. D. (1993) (eds.), The Book of Acts in its First-Century Setting, i. Ancient Literary Setting (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Witherington III, B. (1998), The Acts of the Apostles: A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).

63. Introduction to the Pauline Corpus

TERENCE L. DONALDSON

A. Overview. 1. No less than thirteen of the twenty-seven writings of the New Testament are letters attributed to the Apostle Paul. They constitute fully one-quarter of the New Testament's bulk; if one adds to this the portion of the Acts of the Apostles where Paul is the main character, Paul's proportion of the New Testament climbs to almost a third. The proportion devoted to the life and ministry of Jesus (i.e. the four gospels) is higher, but not by much.

2. The significance of Paul's literary legacy, of course, is not simply a matter of its quantity. His letters (at least those that can be attributed to him with some certainty) represent the earliest extant writings of the Christian movement. Further, they are real letters, written to actual congregations whose life circumstances are reflected, albeit with some ambiguity, in the texts themselves. In addition, they are at times highly personal letters, at least in the sense that the desires, emotions, thinking processes, and very personality of their author are vividly portrayed. Moreover, their author was no marginal figure. While his place within the early Christian movement needs to be determined with care, it is clear on any reading of Christian origins that, by virtue of the groundbreaking nature of his missionary activity among the Gentiles and the intellectual vitality that he brought to bear on the defence and nurture of his young congregations, Paul was a major player in the first, formative generation of the movement. In sum, then, Paul's letters represent a window into nascent Christianity of inestimable value.

3. The significance of the Pauline corpus is not restricted to its value as source material for the reconstruction of Christian origins, however. The letters not only play a passive role, providing a window into the circumstances lying behind them; they have also been agents in their own right, affecting the lives of their readers—both the original readers and those who subsequently read, as it were, over their shoulders—and thereby helping to shape the history of Christianity and of Western culture as a whole. The Epistle to the Romans, for instance, has had a striking chain of influence—from the unknown early readers who, for whatever reason, preserved the letter in the first place; to Augustine's conversion, precipitated by the random reading in a moment of crisis of a particularly pertinent passage (13:13–14); to Martin Luther's rediscovery of Augustine and his own experience of spiritual release while wrestling with the phrase, 'the just shall live by faith' (1:17) as he prepared lectures on the epistle; to John Wesley's experience of a heart 'strangely warmed' while listening to a reading of the Preface to Luther's commentary; to Karl Barth and his own commentary on the epistle, which represented a dramatic break with the sunny liberalism in which he had been nurtured and a rediscovery and reworking of Reformation themes. This chain of influence, of course, represents a particular strand of Christianity, one in which Paul has been especially revered. But Paul's influence has by no means been limited to the Reformed segment of Christendom. Hymnody, homilies, iconography and other forms of aesthetic representation, across the Christian spectrum and down through the centuries; the nineteenth-century missionary movement; the 'introspective conscience of the west' (Stendahl 1976: 78–96); popular idiom ('all things to all people'; 'thorn in the flesh'; 'charisma'); contemporary Jewish–Christian dialogue; social-scientific models of conversion—the influence of Paul has been pervasive and far-reaching.

4. For these reasons and more, Paul's letters are significant and deserve the careful attention not only of Christian readers but also of all who aspire to an informed perspective on the Western cultural inheritance. But the very things that make for Paul's significance also bring with them various problems that feed into and affect the experience of reading him.

5. For one thing, the sheer bulk of Pauline material in the NT can easily lead readers to overestimate his place and significance in early Christianity. Evidence even from his own letters indicates that Paul was somewhat of a maverick, operating for the most part outside the main circle of earliest Christianity and relating only awkwardly to its original leaders. He may well have represented the wave of the future: since the middle of the second century those characteristic elements that it took all his formidable resources to establish and defend—full and equal membership for Gentile believers, no obligation to adhere to the law of Moses, and so on—have simply been taken for granted as basic elements of the Christian faith. But the very success of Gentile Christianity can serve to obscure the degree to which Paul's mission represented radical innovation in his own day, and this in turn can result in misperceptions of the nature of his thought and rhetoric.

6. In addition, and partly for this reason, Paul has not always fared well at the hands of his interpreters—admirers and champions included. To cite one particular example, the Reformation reading of Paul, in which the theme of justification by faith is identified as the heart of his gospel and the interpretative centre of his thought, is increasingly being seen as a misreading; to approach Paul with the assumption that his concerns and contentions were analogous to those of a Luther or a Calvin is to look at him through a distorting lens that skews some aspects of his theological discourse and leaves others in obscurity. Further, the interpretation of a normative text in a religious culture inevitably has social effects. Thus Paul's name has come to be associated with developments in Western society that many have found undesirable: for example, the treatment of Jews and Judaism as a people rejected by God; the institution of slavery in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries; the colonialization of Africa and the Far East, to which the activity of Christian missionaries was a contributing factor; patriarchal structures and the exclusion of women from full participation in church and society; intolerant attitudes towards those of homosexual orientation.

Also, Paul has sometimes been blamed for constructing a complex religion centred on sin, guilt, and death, far removed from the life-affirming message of Jesus (cf. Muggeridge and Vidler 1972: 11–16).

7. The very factors making for Paul's significance, then, also serve to condition our perception of his writings, interposing between the modern reader and the letters themselves a set of lenses and filters that shape the reading process. These interposed optical paraphernalia should not be seen simply as an obstruction; the history of the effects of Paul's letters in the centuries between their time of writing and our own day is an important part of the overall significance of the letters themselves. Still, the first step in coming to terms with the letters is to try to bridge the intervening distance and to read the letters directly and on their own terms; put differently, to bracket out the particularities of our own contemporary perspectives and attempt to read the letters as they would have been understood by their original intended readers.

8. This is a laudable goal, towards which a formidable array of Pauline scholars have bent their collective energies over the past two centuries of historical-critical investigation. But here we encounter a second set of problems, arising from the letters themselves: as the author of 2 Peter observed long ago, many aspects of Paul's letters are 'difficult to understand' (2 Pet 3:16). In part, the difficulties are due to the fact that we are dealing with letters per se; in part, they derive from the particular way in which Paul writes letters. But in each case, the nature of these writings means that in order to understand them we need to go beyond them, to interpret them in the framework of at least three hypothetical scholarly reconstructions.

9. First, there are the individual contexts presupposed by the letters themselves. As Roetzel (1998) has reminded us, Paul's letters are 'conversations in context'; more to the point, in reading these letters we are hearing only one side of the conversation, with no clear indication of the context. As in any conversation, the epistolary author as conversation partner can simply take for granted a whole set of details crucial to the meaning of the letter but so well known to the intended readers that they require no explicit mention. Who, to take one simple example, was the 'famous brother' (2 Cor 8:17) who accompanied Titus in the delivery of 2 Corinthians 8 and so could remain unnamed in the letter? Or with what strand of early Christianity can we identify those who were 'unsettling' the Galatians (Gal 5:12), and what were their motives? Later readers like ourselves, who are not privy to the whole conversation and its context, are forced to draw out from whatever slender clues the text affords a sense of these contextual taken-for-granted, as an essential first step in the determination of meaning.

10. Such reconstruction of provenance and life setting forms part of the interpretative task for any individual letter from antiquity (and—mutatis mutandis—for any ancient text at all). But in the case of Paul we are dealing not simply with one individual letter, but with a whole series of letters that evidently had an integral role to play in an extended missionary agenda. A proper understanding of any one of them, then, will depend to a certain extent on a second scholarly reconstruction, namely, the larger sequential framework of Paul's own life and activity within which the individual letter finds its place. Here the reconstructive task is both aided and complicated by the existence of the Acts of the Apostles, with its connected narrative of Paul's missionary activity. Aided, in that Acts deliberately sets out to provide us with the kind of sequential account that is glimpsed only occasionally, and with difficulty, in the letters. Complicated, in that the Acts account, partly because of the author's own purposes and partly because of the limitations within which the author did his work, is not infrequently at variance with the picture emerging from the letters themselves. Perhaps this is the place to mention the additional fact that several of the letters bearing Paul's name also bear characteristics that make it difficult to understand them as written by Paul himself. In at least some of these cases it is best to understand them as the product of a Pauline school carrying on his legacy into a subsequent generation. Further, a tradition going back as far as the second century sees the epistle to the Hebrews as written by Paul as well. While there is no scholarly justification for the attribution, the reference to 'our brother Timothy' in Heb 13:23 serves to situate this epistle somewhere in the larger Pauline circle. In any case, the reconstruction of the nature, modus operandi, sequence, chronology, and aftermath of Paul's missionary enterprise is another requisite element of the interpretative task.

11. Thirdly, there is an inherently theological dimension to the rhetoric of these letters. To be sure, the letters are not to be read as if they were theological treatises; a recognition of the essentially occasional and situational nature of the letters was a decisive step forward in Pauline scholarship. Nevertheless, while the letters must be seen as responses to particular circumstances in the life of Paul and his communities, it is also evident that to deal with these various contingent situations Paul engaged in a style of theological argumentation that drew on already-existing vocabulary, structures, and patterns of thought. As Dunn (1998: 15) has observed with reference to the search for the theology of Paul, 'the letters themselves indicate the need to go behind the letters themselves'. Again, however, the interpreter is faced with a difficult task. Partly because of the sheer fecundity of Paul's agile mind, and partly because the letters use and allude to his 'theology' without ever laying it out in any systematic way, it has been notoriously difficult to discern the central element or essential structure of his theological thought.

12. A proper understanding of Paul's letters, then, necessarily involves us in substantial projects of contextual reconstruction. In turn, these projects depend for their success on a larger engineering project, that of bridging the social and cultural gap between the modern reader and the first-century Graeco-Roman world. To a modern reader, for example, Paul's language of 'bewitchment' in Gal 3:1 may seem quaintly metaphorical. But in a culture where the power of the evil eye was widely feared, the text would have had quite a different impact (Elliott 1990). Likewise, ancient and modern readers would bring distinctly different cultural assumptions to a reading of 2 Cor 8–9, in which Paul is encouraging the Corinthian Christians to contribute to his collection for the Jerusalem church. In contrast to modern readers in the Western world, who tend to see charitable giving as a universal obligation, Paul's Corinthian converts would have understood benefaction to be the domain of the wealthy, who themselves would assume the role of benefactor less out of a sense of moral obligation than in expectation of public honour. What we think we know is often a greater barrier to understanding than what we do not know, and this is as true of the cultural assumptions we bring to a reading of the NT as of any other area of life.

13. The foregoing is not meant to discourage the casual or novice reader from reading Paul, as if one has to acquire a massive body of background and contextual knowledge before being able to approach the letters themselves. The process is spiral: initial familiarization with the text raises questions of interpretation and meaning that can be answered only on the basis of further information about the text's original context; increasing awareness of contextual background precipitates further questions that can be answered only on the basis of a more careful and critical reading of the text; and so on. Further, the process is ongoing and open-ended. It is not as if the range of questions diminishes as knowledge increases. As will become apparent not only in this introductory essay but also in the commentaries on the individual letters to follow, there is a great deal of disagreement and debate among Pauline scholars at almost every point. One enters this interpretative spiral, then, not so much to arrive at a definitive interpretation as to become a participant in an ongoing process of discussion, debate, and new insight.

14. The process may be ongoing, but it is not without its key moments and fresh phases. Indeed, this is a particularly exciting time to be engaged in the discussion of Paul and his letters. The final quarter of the twentieth century saw some significant developments: richer descriptions of Paul's cultural environment, both Jewish and Graeco-Roman; fundamental shifts in the way his thought is perceived and put together, especially with reference to his Jewish upbringing and 'conversion'; fruitful application of methods and insights drawn from the social sciences; increased appreciation of the rhetorical and epistolary conventions at work in the letters; and so on.

The purpose of this introductory essay is to lead readers into the interpretative spiral described above and to convey some sense of the current state of the discussion. To do this, the material will be organized as follows.

B. The Sources. 1. Our two main sources of biographical information concerning Paul are the Acts of the Apostles and the letters themselves. There are some additional snippets in later Christian writings—e.g., a stylized descriptive portrait in Acts of Paul 3.1; accounts of his martyrdom under Nero (1 Clem. 5.5–7; 6.1; Eusebius Hist. Eccl. 2.25). But even if we were to exploit them to the full (e.g. Riesner 1998), we would simply be adding minor embellishments to a portrait based primarily on our two main sources.

At first glance these two sources seem to complement each other neatly. Acts provides us with biographical information on Paul's life and ministry, and the circumstances in which the individual churches were founded; the letters provide us with direct information on his thought and his interaction with churches after he had moved on to new fields of mission. We might seem to be in the happy position of being able to combine two complementary sources to construct a full picture.

2. As has already been observed, however, the use of Acts as a source for Paul is not without problems. For one thing, despite the impression given by the author of Acts (let us for convenience call him Luke) that he is providing us with a full and continuous account of Paul's itinerary, Paul himself makes reference to details—for example, trips (the hasty and painful visit to Corinth in 2 Cor 2:1) and various incidents of hardship (2 Cor 11:23–7, especially the references to shipwrecks, synagogue discipline, and imprisonments)—about which Luke seems unable to tell us anything.

Further, at points where the two accounts do overlap, they are sometimes strikingly at odds. The parade example of this is the narration of Paul's first post-conversion visit to Jerusalem in Gal 1:18–24 and Acts 9:26–30. In Acts, it is a high-profile visit. Although the disciples were 'all afraid of him', after Barnabas had convinced 'the apostles' of the reality of his new-found faith, Paul 'went in and out among them in Jerusalem, speaking boldly in the name of the Lord', at least until opposition from the (non-Christian) Hellenists increased to the point that the 'brothers' felt it necessary to escort him to safety in Caesarea. In Galatians, by contrast, the visit is a much less public affair. Paul's purpose in going up to Jerusalem was 'to visit Cephas', which he did for fifteen days, not seeing 'any other apostle except James the Lord's brother'. Even after his departure, he was 'still unknown by sight to the churches of Judea that are in Christ', who simply had oral reports that their former persecutor was now 'proclaiming the faith he once tried to destroy'.

Even when one gives full weight to the diverging purposes of Luke (who wants to emphasize harmony in the early church and the smooth progression of the faith outwards from Jerusalem) and Paul (who wants to downplay his contacts with Jerusalem and to defend his independence as an apostle), the differences between the two accounts are substantial. Acts and the letters are not to be treated simply as equal and complementary sources. Paul's own testimony needs to be given primacy. The letters represent our primary source for his life and thought.

3. Nevertheless, Acts is not simply to be dismissed; Luke clearly has independent access to information about Paul's career. He displays no awareness of Paul as a letter-writer, which means that Acts cannot be seen merely as an embellished narrative presentation of details gleaned from the letters. Further, there are frequent points of contact, in details of itinerary, between Acts and the letters (see the list in Brown 1997: 424). Even the accounts in Gal 1 and Acts 9, as discussed above, despite their differences in detail and emphasis, contain a similar sequence: conversion near Damascus (Gal 1:15–17; Acts 9:1–19); subsequent trip to Jerusalem (Gal 1:18; Acts 9:26); time spent in Cilicia/Tarsus (Gal 1:21; Acts 9:30) and Syria/Antioch (Gal 1:21; Acts 11:25–6). Moving out from Galatians but still within the same sequence of events, the account of Paul's flight from Damascus in Acts 9:23–5 has its first-person counterpart in 2 Cor 11:32–3. Similar observations could be made about Paul's progression down the Greek peninsula (1 Thess 2–3; cf. Acts 16–18) or his final trip to Jerusalem with the collection money (1 Cor 16:1–4; 2 Cor 7–9; Rom 15:25–9; cf. Acts 19:21–21:19). Thus while Acts and the letters are not simply to be interlaced, critical and cautious use can be made of the Acts account to supplement the information on Paul's life and activity contained in the letters.

C. Paul's 'Conversion'. 1. Any biographical accounting of Paul needs to begin with what in popular parlance is called his 'conversion'. The appropriateness of the term is debated, and will be discussed a little later. Without foreclosing on the debate, we will refer to the event as Paul's Damascus transformation or Damascus experience. This experience—which Paul understands as an encounter with the risen Christ—is not only foundational for everything that follows, it is the perspective from which our sources present what they do about anything that precedes. Luke does not seem to tire of the story; after providing a full narrative in Acts 9, he repeats it (with some interesting variations in detail) on no less than two other occasions (22:3–21; 26:2–18). Modern readers might wish that he had used this space instead to fill in some of the gaps in his narrative—the activity of Peter, for example, or the origins of the church in Rome. Paul is somewhat more reticent, speaking of it on three occasions (Gal 1:15–16; 1 Cor 9:1; 1 Cor 15:8–10; perhaps also 2 Cor 4:6), but always in the context of some other issue. Still, the consequences of the experience—the conviction that God had raised Jesus, making him Christ and Lord; the conviction that God had commissioned Paul, making him apostle to the Gentiles—are everywhere present, as assumption or as theme.

2. To reconstruct Paul's biography, then, it is necessary to begin with his Damascus experience. To reconstruct it accurately, however, it is necessary to understand the nature of the experience. It was an event that divided Paul's life into a 'before'—'my earlier life in Judaism' (Gal 1:13)—and an 'after'—'an apostle' (Gal 1:1) 'entrusted with the gospel for the uncircumcised' (Gal 2:7); a proper understanding of Paul depends on how we correlate these three biographical points. More specifically, the characteristic features of Paul's apostolic self-understanding stand in such patent contrast to the typical 'life in Judaism' that one cannot really understand the later Paul without understanding how the transformation worked itself out. How was it that a self-proclaimed 'zealot for the traditions of [his] ancestors' (Gal 1:14) was transformed into a zealous advocate of a mission to Gentiles, offering them a righteous status before God not by adherence to the Torah but by faith in Christ?

3. It was mentioned above that there have been some significant shifts in Pauline scholarship in recent years; one such has to do with the understanding of Paul's Damascus transformation. Older scholarship tended to understand this transformation as involving a perception on Paul's part of some fundamental deficiency in Judaism and his consequent abandonment of Judaism for a different religion that was able to offer what Judaism lacked. In this family of interpretations the appropriateness of the term 'conversion' is assumed. There are several branches of the family. One, stemming from the Reformation, emphasizes Paul's polemical contrast between justification by works and justification by faith. It is assumed that this works/faith contrast represented Paul's fundamental critique of Judaism; he understood Judaism to be a legalistic religion, one in which a person's status with God was something earned through meritorious Torah observance (works) rather than something offered freely by God in divine grace, to be received in humble faith. The essence of Paul's conversion is understood, in this reading of it, to consist in the recognition that Judaism was a works-religion that did not work, and the correlative discovery that Christianity offered freely, on the basis of faith, the righteous status that Torah-religion was not able to provide. Sometimes such a recognition of the futility of Judaism is understood to be the essence of the Damascus experience itself; in encountering the risen Jesus Paul saw Judaism for the inferior and inadequate religion that it was. Often, however, the recognition is shifted further back, Paul's problem with Judaism seen as something emerging during his upbringing. It is argued, usually with appeal to Rom 7, that Paul's experience of Judaism was one of frustration and despair. He had tried hard to gain God's approval by keeping the law in a zealous fashion, but found that no matter how hard he tried he always fell short. In this reading, his conversion is seen as fundamentally the discovery that Christ provided the solution to an existential problem that he had already experienced in his Jewish upbringing.

4. This is not the only way in which Paul's Damascus transformation is perceived as essentially an abandonment of Judaism. Another interpretation takes its point of departure not from Paul's faith/works contrast but from his universal gospel. How is Paul's interest in Gentiles to be accounted for? The answer, it is suggested, is that Paul came to abandon a frame of reference in which the distinction between Jew and Gentile is central, for one in which that distinction is abolished, one in which 'there is no longer Jew or Greek' (Gal 3:28). Again, such an exchange of one type of religion (this time a particularistic one) for another (a universalistic one) is sometimes seen as the essence of the Damascus experience itself. Just as often, however, it is rooted in the idea that already in his upbringing Paul had experienced frustration with Jewish particularism and, in some interpretations, had struggled, valiantly but vainly, to suppress an attraction to the wider Hellenistic world.

5. Such interpretations, in which Paul's Damascus experience is seen as essentially an abandonment of a Jewish context for something different, have had a long and successful history, at least in part because they seem to provide a coherent explanation of central elements in Paul's post-Damascus frame of reference—especially his role as apostle to the Gentiles, and the gospel he preached to Gentiles, offering them a righteous status before God without demanding adherence to the Torah. But more recent study of Paul has tended to demonstrate that such coherence is purchased at a high price, specifically, an unacceptable level of incoherence with respect to the first of the three biographical points—Paul's earlier life in Judaism.

By the early part of the twentieth century Jewish scholars (e.g. C. Montefiore, S. Schechter, and later H.-J. Schoeps), along with Christians sympathetic to Judaism (e.g. G. F. Moore, J. Parkes), had already pointed out that Judaism was not the legalistic religion of meritorious achievement that it had often been made out to be. Jewish religion, they objected, started not with the Torah but with the covenant, a relationship between God and Israel established entirely on the basis of divine grace. The Torah was given as a means not of earning a relationship with God, but rather of responding in gratitude to God and of maintaining the relationship already established by God's gracious election of Israel. Further, Jewish religion did not require flawless performance of the law, as Paul's argument in Romans and Galatians seems to assume. The law itself recognized the inevitability of sin, making provision, in the sacrificial system, for repentance, atonement, and forgiveness—an aspect of Torah-religion that Paul studiously avoids in the pertinent passages. This more accurate depiction of Judaism has been most convincingly developed and demonstrated by E. P. Sanders (see Sanders 1977), who terms it a religion of 'covenantal nomism' rather than of legalism. Prior to Sanders's work, however, the conclusion often drawn from this argument about the true nature of Judaism has been that if the traditional reading of Paul is accurate, then Paul must have seriously misunderstood Judaism. If Paul really perceived Judaism as a religion of meritorious achievement requiring perfect performance, then his critique of Judaism is badly off-target from the outset.

6. One way of explaining this supposed misunderstanding of Judaism is to lay it at the door of Paul's diaspora upbringing; if Paul had been raised in Judea, closer to the source, he would have experienced a truer form of the faith and thus would have depicted it more accurately (Schoeps 1961: 173). But this leads to a second way in which the traditional interpretations of Paul fail to integrate what we know about his earlier life in Judaism. Not only is it recognized that no sharp distinction can be drawn between Hellenistic and Palestinian Judaism, the idea that Paul fundamentally misunderstood Judaism does not square well with his own comments about his earlier life. For one thing, he locates himself within a traditional, covenant-centred form of the faith. He is a Hebrew of the Hebrews (Phil 3:5; cf. 2 Cor 11:22); a zealot for the traditions of his ancestors (Gal 1:14); a Pharisee, a group for which we have only Palestinian evidence (Phil 3:5; see Hengel and Schwemer 1997: 36). Further, whenever he looks back on this period of his life, he does so with a great deal of pride and satisfaction (Gal 1:13–14; Phil 3:4b–6; 2 Cor 11:22). Phil 3:6 is particularly instructive; as one of the grounds for which he might have confidence in the flesh, he points to the fact that 'as to righteousness under the law, [he was] blameless'. The statement resonates with the pride of accomplishment (blameless!) rather than despair over the impossibility of the law's demands. With the recognition that the 'I' of Romans 7 is not autobiographical (Kümmel 1929), the way has been cleared to ask whether instead of Paul misunderstanding Judaism, Paul's interpreters have misunderstood him.

7. This question has been posed most forcefully by E. P. Sanders in his epoch-making book, Paul and Palestinian Judaism (1977). In the book Sanders demonstrates convincingly that Paul can be much better understood if we assume (1) that in his upbringing he had experienced Judaism as a religion of covenantal nomism, but that (2) in his Damascus experience he had come to believe that God had provided Christ as a means of salvation for all on equal terms, and that (3) since entrance into the community of salvation was through Christ, Torah-observance could not be imposed as a condition of membership. Anticipating some discussion to follow, we need to observe that Sanders leaves a number of loose ends and logical disjunctions; in particular: why 'for all'? Why 'on equal terms'? Why are Christ and Torah mutually exclusive? But for present purposes, the significant point of Sanders's work is that it opens up the possibility of seeing Paul's Damascus experience as primarily the acceptance of a new set of convictions about Jesus rather than the abandonment of an old set of convictions about Judaism. The way is open to see Paul not as a frustrated Jew, nor as one who fundamentally misunderstood the religion of his ancestors and contemporaries, but as a covenantal nomist who had an experience convincing him that the God of Israel had raised Jesus from death.

8. What emerges, then, is an understanding of Paul's Damascus experience in which it is seen not as the solution to an already-perceived problem with Judaism, nor as the abandonment of one religion (Judaism) for another (Christianity). Instead, the outcome of the experience was in the first instance a new estimation of the person and significance of Jesus in the purposes of the God of Israel. This led to an unprecedented reconfiguration of the constituent elements of Judaism, for reasons that we will explore in a moment. But reconfiguration is quite a different thing from abandonment.

For this reason, 'conversion' has been seen as perhaps not the best term to use to describe Paul's experience. Both in popular parlance and in much social-scientific study, 'conversion' implies a transformation that is more radical, more discontinuous with the convert's past, and more driven by psychological imbalance, than was the case with Paul. At the same time, to describe the experience as a 'call', as Stendahl does (Stendahl 1976: 7–23), is not a fully satisfactory alternative either, even when one gives full value to Paul's use of prophetic call language in Gal 1:15 (cf. Isa 49:1; Jer 1:5). This term fails to do justice to the fact that Paul's experience represented a much more decisive shift, a more sharply demarcated before and after (cf. Phil 3:4–11), than was ever the case with an Isaiah or a Jeremiah. While Paul continued to worship and serve the same God, his framework of service shifted decisively from one organizing centre (Torah) to another (Christ). What term to use, then, for this decisive shift? One alternative is to return to 'conversion', redefining it so that both continuity and discontinuity are preserved (Segal 1990). Such an approach can claim support from more recent social-scientific studies (e.g. Rambo 1993), which recognize a much broader range of conversion types. Perhaps the safer approach, however, is to choose less loaded terms, such as transformation or reconfiguration.

9. But why was the reconfiguration so sharply polarized? Why were the two organizing centres—Torah and Christ—set over against each other in such an antithetical way? Or to pose the question with respect to the comparative biographies of Paul and James, who both became leaders in the church as the result of an experience understood to be an encounter with the risen Christ (for James, see 1 Cor 15:7): why did the experience lead in Paul's case to a Christ–Torah antithesis while in the case of James of Jerusalem, who seemed to be able to combine Christ-faith and Torah-religion in a much more harmonious way, it led rather to a Christ–Torah synthesis?

10. In contrast to Paul's conversion per se, the answer to this question does seem to lie in his pre-Damascus experience. Even prior to his own experience of Christ, Paul had already come to some conclusions about the incompatibility of Christ-faith and Torah-religion. What is important here is not simply that Paul persecuted the church, but that he understood it as an expression of zeal (Phil 3:6; cf. Gal 1:14). In the context of Torah-piety, zeal implies more than simply fervour. At least since the time of the Maccabees, zeal and zealotry referred to the willingness to use force to defend Torah-religion from some perceived threat (e.g. 1 Macc 2:24, 26, 27, 50; Jub. 30:18; Jdt 9:2–4; see Donaldson 1997: 285–6; Dunn 1998: 350–2). If Paul's persecution of the church was an act of zeal, then he must, even at this early stage, have seen Christ-religion and Torah-religion as mutually exclusive. Further, since even after his Damascus experience this incompatibility between Christ and Torah seems to have remained (even if transformed), the conflict between the two must have been of such a nature that it could not be resolved simply by changing his estimation of Jesus. The Christ–Torah antithesis must have been perceived as a more fundamental incompatibility.

11. What, then, was the nature of this incompatibility? Several possibilities have been explored in scholarly discussion (Donaldson 1997: 169–72). Some suggest that the idea of a suffering and dying Messiah was in itself an affront to Jewish expectation and thus incompatible with Torah-religion. Others focus on the specific means of Jesus' death—crucifixion—noting that the Torah itself sees as cursed 'anyone hung on a tree' (Deut 21:22–3), a text that by the first century was being interpreted with respect to crucifixion (4QpNah 1.7–8; 11QTemple 64.12; cf. Gal 3:13). Still others suggest that Paul's estimation of the Torah had been deeply affected by the fact that it was precisely his zeal for the law that had led him to persecute Christ's church. But none of these suggestions seem to produce a tension between Christ and Torah so intractable that a well-motivated Jewish believer could not have found a way to resolve it.

12. My suggestion moves in a different direction, and builds on two more fundamental aspects of Jewish and Jewish-Christian belief: (1) the relationship between Torah and Messiah in Jewish expectation; and (2) the unprecedented 'already/not yet' shape of early Christian belief. In Jewish patterns of thought (at least those that included the concept of a Messiah), the respective functions of Torah and Messiah were neatly differentiated by the distinction between this age and the age to come. In this age, the Torah functioned as a badge of membership or a boundary marker for the covenant people of God. To live a life of loyalty to the Torah was a mark of membership in the covenant community; to be a member in good standing was to be righteous; it was the community of the righteous as demarcated by the Torah in this age that could expect to be vindicated by God in the age to come, when the Messiah appeared. There was thus no confusion of roles: the Torah served to determine the identity of the people whom the Messiah would come to deliver; put differently, the Messiah did not function as a boundary marker or badge of membership.

13. But the Christian message—that God had revealed the identity of the coming Messiah by raising Jesus from death—had the effect of blurring this neat distinction. The Christ who would come to redeem the righteous in the age to come had already appeared before this age was at an end.

How, then, was the community of the righteous to be determined in the period between the resurrection and the end? Was it defined by adherence to Torah or to Christ? Would the community redeemed by Christ at the eschaton be one demarcated by Torah-observance or by Christ-adherence? The unprecedented two-stage appearance of the Messiah in Christian belief had the effect of putting Christ and Torah in tension with each other, as rival boundary markers for the people of God. The overlapping of the ages in Christian proclamation brought Christ and Torah into conflict.

14. My suggestion is that because of his perspective as an outsider, the pre-Christian Paul perceived this rivalry and conflict much more clearly than those inside. He was a faithful observer of the Torah, 'as to righteousness under the law, blameless' (Phil 3:6). But the Christian message as he heard it implied that this was not enough; to truly belong to the community of the righteous, he had to believe in Christ. He also observed that the church was prepared to admit as full members many who, 'as to righteousness under the law', were far from 'blameless'. Torah observance, it appeared, was also unnecessary. Undergirding his persecution of the church, then, was a fundamental perception that—whether the early Christians recognized it fully or not—the Christ they preached represented a categorical rival to the Torah in its community-defining role. Since this rivalry was rooted not simply in Paul's lack of belief in Christ but in the nature of the Christian message itself, it did not disappear with his new belief in Christ. The Christ–Torah antithesis remained, even though his perception of its implications shifted dramatically.

15. One final element of Paul's Damascus experience requires mention here, though we can deal with it only briefly. In the discussion carried out above concerning Paul's description of his experience as a 'call', we did not pay much attention to the focus of the call—to proclaim [God's Son] among the Gentiles' (Gal 1:16). At least in retrospect, then, Paul sees his role as 'apostle to the Gentiles' (Rom 11:13) as the direct outcome and inner meaning of his Damascus experience. But how are we to understand his all-embracing concern for the salvation of the Gentiles?

This question, too, has been altered by the interpretative shift described above. In older patterns of interpretation, Paul's interest in the Gentiles has been understood as entailing, or as the result of, an abandonment of Judaism. In his conversion experience, it was argued, Paul left behind a world where the distinction between Jew and Gentile was fundamental, and entered a wider world where there was no differentiation. The ways in which this line of interpretation were worked out varied with the ways in which the process of abandonment was reconstructed (see above, and also Donaldson 1997: 18–27). But the heart of the matter in each case was that Paul's 'universalism' (i.e. his concern for Gentile salvation) was tied up with a rejection of Jewish particularism.

16. More recent study, however, has brought to the fore two things that suggest a different explanation. The first has to do with Paul himself, the second with Jewish attitudes towards Gentile salvation. First, it is clear that 'Jew' and 'Gentile' continue to be important categories for Paul. While he insists that there is no distinction with respect to sin ('all, both Jews and Greeks, are under . . . sin', Rom 3:9) or salvation ('for there is no distinction between Jew and Greek', Rom 10:12), this does not mean that Jewishness has lost all theological significance for Paul. Indeed, by describing himself as apostle to the Gentiles, he indicates that he continues to inhabit a world where the distinction between Jew and Gentile is operative. Paul sees himself as a Jew (Rom 11:1), commissioned by the God of Israel to bring a message of salvation, not to an undifferentiated mass of generic humanity, but to Gentiles, that part of humanity that exists in distinction from Israel. Further, the ultimate goal of this mission is the final salvation of 'all Israel' (Rom 11:26). What is needed, then, is a much more Israel-centred understanding of Paul's interest in the Gentiles.

17. This brings us to the second point. While Jewish self-understanding is undeniably particularistic (the one God of all has chosen Israel from among the nations for a special covenanted relationship), Judaism also had its own forms of universalism. That is, by Paul's day Judaism had developed ways of finding a place for Gentiles within God's saving purposes for the world, ways that offered Gentiles a share in salvation without denying the special nature of Israel's own covenant relationship. One of these patterns of universalism, of course, was proselytism; the community of Israel was willing to accept as full members of the family of Abraham those Gentiles who embraced the Torah and its way of life (e.g. Jdt 14:10; Tacitus, Hist. 5.5.2). Another pattern, based on a quite different perception of things, was prepared to see the possibility of Gentiles being accounted righteous and having a share in the age to come as Gentiles, without having to accept those aspects of the Torah that differentiated Gentiles from Jews (e.g. Jos. Ant. 20.34–48; t. Sanh. 13.2). A third looked to the future, and expected that as one of the consequences of Israel's end-time redemption, many Gentiles would finally acknowledge the God of Israel and thus be granted a share in the blessings of the age to come (e.g. Isa 2:2–4; Tob 14:5–7).

18. This is not the place to survey the pertinent Jewish material in any detail. Nor is it possible here to explore Paul's conceptions concerning the Gentiles and their place 'in Christ' against this background (on both points see Donaldson 1997). For present purposes it is sufficient to say that Paul's Gentile mission is best understood as a Christ-centred reinterpretation of one of these Israel-centred patterns of universalism. That is, Paul's concern for the Gentiles had its origin in attitudes already present in Judaism, even though with his Damascus experience they came to be oriented around a different centre. His call 'to proclaim [God's Son] among the Gentiles' results not from a rejection of Jewish particularism but from a reinterpretation, from his standpoint 'in Christ', of some aspect of Jewish universalism.

Later on in this introductory essay we will return to the matter of Paul's thought and its characteristic themes and structure. For the present, however, we need to discuss the temporal and geographical framework of his life.

D. Paul's Formative Years. 1. 'My earlier life in Judaism' (Gal 1:13): Paul does not tell us a great deal about his Jewish upbringing and pre-Christian activities. This is not due to reticence; when it serves his purposes, he can parade his credentials and accomplishments with great flourish (esp. Gal 1:13–15; 1 Cor 15:9; Phil 3:4–6; 2 Cor 11:22; Rom 11:1). But his purposes are never purely biographical; what he tells us and how is determined by the rhetorical needs of the moment. In addition to the explicit information he does convey in passing, of course, the letters also contain a wealth of implicit evidence—familiarity with the Mediterranean world, facility in Greek, knowledge of the Septuagint and of Jewish interpretative tradition, and so on.

Still, the information conveyed to us by Paul himself is much less specific than that contained in the Acts account, where it appears both in the narration of his persecuting activity (7:58–8:3; 9:1–3) and in the speeches of self-defence made after his final arrest (22:1–5, 19–20; 23:6; 26:4–12). But while its secondary status needs to be remembered, the information in Acts, with only two or three exceptions, is both consistent with Paul's own statements and not so patently in keeping with Luke's special purposes as to come under suspicion.

2. According to Luke, Paul was a diaspora Jew—specifically, a native of Tarsus, the prosperous chief city of the region of Cilicia (21:39; 22:3). The letters certainly confirm the general identification; even without Acts, Paul's facility in Greek and the ease with which he navigated the Hellenistic world identify him as a diaspora Jew. With respect to the more specific reference to Tarsus, the only evidence in the letters with a bearing on the matter is Paul's statement that after his first visit to Jerusalem he 'went into the regions of Syria and Cilicia' (Gal 1:21). Syria is understandable; someone who had spent time in Damascus (Gal 1:17) could readily gravitate to Antioch, an important centre of the Jewish diaspora. But Cilicia is less to be expected, unless, as Luke indicates, Paul had a special personal affinity for the area. This detail in Galatians, then, lends a definite plausibility to Luke's identification of Tarsus as Paul's home city.

Luke goes further, however, to identify Paul as a citizen both of Tarsus (21:39) and of Rome (16:37–9; 22:25–9; 23:27), the latter by birth. This is not outside the realm of possibility. Jews certainly could be Roman citizens without compromising their traditional observances (e.g. Jos. Ant. 14.228–37). Tarsus itself was lavishly rewarded for services rendered, both by Mark Antony after the death of Cassius and Brutus (Appian, Historia, 5.1.7), and by Octavian after the battle of Actium (Dio Chrysostom, Orations, 34.8). One could readily imagine circumstances in which even a Jewish family would have been able to share in this largesse. At the same time, however, full weight needs to be given to two additional items of information. First, Paul himself nowhere alludes to Roman citizenship, despite his readiness to boast about other items on his curriculum vitae when it served his purposes. Second, Paul's Roman citizenship could be seen as too neatly consistent with one of Luke's major themes—namely, that Roman officials repeatedly took the Christians' side, or at least demonstrated that they considered the movement to be no real threat to the order of the empire. But on the other hand, the sole premiss of Paul's final trip to Rome, as it is narrated in Acts, is his Roman citizenship, with the concomitant right of appeal to the imperial tribunal (Acts 25:10–12, 21; 26:32). Unless we are prepared to dismiss this whole account, despite the verisimilitude of its first-person narration (27:1–28:16), we need to give at least some credence to Luke's statements about Paul's citizenship.

3. As we have already observed, however, Paul's own self-description places more emphasis on his Jewish identity and credentials. To put this information into its proper perspective, we need to keep in mind the extent and significance of the Jewish diaspora. By the beginning of the first century, as was observed by the geographer and historian Strabo, 'this people [i.e. of Judea] has already made its way into every city, and it is not easy to find any place in the habitable world which has not received this nation and in which it has not made its power felt' (quoted by Jos. Ant. 14.114–18). Of interest in this statement is not only the geographical spread of Jewish communities (also Jos. J. W. 2.399; Ag. Ap. 2.38–9; Philo, Flacc. 7.45; Acts 2:5–11), but also what this translation calls their 'power', rendering a Greek verb that usually has the sense 'to gain the mastery of, to prevail over'. The word is not to be taken literally, as if Jews had become dominant in any of the cities where they had taken up residence. But it does describe the fact that in city after city Jews had been able to create and maintain Torah-centred islands in the midst of the larger Hellenistic sea. And perhaps this image distorts things somewhat, in that Jewish communities were by no means sealed off from the life and culture of the cities that sustained them. The example of Sardis, where the Jewish community was able to acquire space for their synagogue in the central civic edifice that also housed the bath and gymnasium, is perhaps a little late (3rd cent. CE) to be directly relevant. But any difference between this example and the circumstances of diaspora Jews in the first century in Sardis or elsewhere is one of degree, not of kind. Diaspora realities can also be seen reflected in the long list, compiled by Josephus, of decrees issued by Julius Caesar and his successors which defined and protected the rights of the Jewish communities in various cities of Asia and elsewhere (Jos. Ant. 14.186–264). While not as much is known of the Jewish community in Tarsus as in some other cities, a Jewish presence in the first century is nevertheless 'well attested' (Murphy-O'Connor 1996: 33).

4. Paul's biographical statements, then, brief and tangential though they may be, come more vividly to life when placed in the context of this vibrant diaspora reality. It was in one of these Greek-speaking Jewish communities, integrated into the life of the larger city but without wholesale assimilation, that he was born (perhaps in the first decade of the century) and nurtured in the ancestral faith. There were inevitably different degrees of Hellenization within the diaspora, but Paul locates his origins at the more rigorously observant end of the spectrum. While most (male) Jews could presumably describe themselves, as Paul does in Phil 3:5, as 'circumcised on the eighth day', and 'a member of the people of Israel', not all would be able to name their tribe (Benjamin), or—since the term probably indicates facility in Hebrew or Aramaic—to categorize themselves as 'a Hebrew born of Hebrews' (cf. 2 Cor 11:22).

The next item in the Philippian catalogue—'as to the law, a Pharisee' (Phil 3:5)—is a little harder to envisage in a diaspora setting, however. While Jews everywhere were identified by their adherence to the law, the only evidence we have for Pharisees as a specific group stems from Judea. Here the information from Acts is relevant, for Luke identifies Jerusalem as the place of Paul's education. Speaking to the Jerusalem crowd after his arrest, Paul is depicted as saying: 'I am a Jew, born in Tarsus in Cilicia, but brought up in this city at the feet of Gamaliel, educated strictly according to our ancestral law' (Acts 22:3). This reading of the verse takes the latter two participial clauses (brought up, educated) as referring to the same process—study under Gamaliel. It is possible, however, to read the verse as referring to two stages—primary nurture (brought up in this city) and secondary training (educated strictly at the feet of Gamaliel according to our ancestral law). This latter reading, which suggests that Paul moved to Jerusalem as a child, is probably more consistent with the comment in Acts 23:6 that he was also the 'son of Pharisees'.

5. But is it consistent with Paul's own statements about Jerusalem? There is a significant body of scholarship that rejects wholesale Luke's identification of Jerusalem as the locale for both Paul's education and his persecuting activity (e.g. Knox 1950: 34–6; Haenchen 1971: 297, 625). This rejection is based partly on a consideration of Luke's purposes: it is in keeping with his interpretative programme (cf. Acts 1:8) to have the apostle responsible for taking the gospel 'to the ends of the earth' to be linked closely with Jerusalem. But further, it is based more fundamentally on Paul's own statement that even after his conversion and first visit to Jerusalem, he 'was still unknown by sight to the churches of Judea' (Gal 1:22). Surely, it is argued, the Jerusalem church would have known its chief persecutor.

6. In the context of Galatians, however, Paul is talking about his contacts with Jerusalem as a Christian: apart from Cephas and James, he declares, the church in Jerusalem and Judea had not seen the transformed Paul with their own eyes. With respect to the possibility of a period of residence in Jerusalem, then, Paul's statement that he was a Pharisee weighs in more heavily than does his comment about the churches in Judea (Murphy-O'Connor 1996: 52–4). This does not mean, however, that Luke's depiction is to be accepted in toto. Surely if Paul had had any meaningful association with Gamaliel it would have been included in one of his catalogues of Jewish credentials. The claim to be a 'son of Pharisees' probably belongs to a similar category.

7. In all probability, then, Paul journeyed to Jerusalem as a young man, where he joined the Pharisees, pursuing his 'zeal for the traditions of his ancestors', and 'advancing in Judaism beyond many of [his] people of the same age' (Gal 1:14). Probably we are to see him as attached to one of the Hellenistic synagogues in Jerusalem, perhaps even the 'Synagogue of the Freedmen' (Hengel 1991: 69), which included in its membership expatriates of Cilicia (Acts 6:9). It is also possible that during this period he took a special interest in Gentile proselytes. In Gal 5:11 he refers to a time when he 'was preaching circumcision'. In the context of Galatians, this statement means more than simply that he himself was once a Torah-observer; it means that he once was engaged in encouraging Gentiles to be circumcised and thus to become full adherents of Torah-religion (cf. Gal 5:3). When was this? It is unlikely that there was a period after his Damascus experience where he preached a kind of Judaizing gospel to Gentiles. The statement more likely refers to his pre-Damascus period, where we might envisage him as playing the same sort of role with Gentile synagogue-adherents as Eleazar did with King Izates of Adiabene (Jos. Ant. 20.43–5), namely, insisting that only by becoming full proselytes would they be pleasing to God.

8. It is also during this period that Paul's zeal 'for the traditions of [his] ancestors' (Gal 1:14) took particular expression in his persecution of the nascent Christian movement (Gal 1:14, 23; Phil 3:6; 1 Cor 15:9). As has been noted already, there is no need to set Gal 1:22 over against the Acts account, and to restrict Paul's persecuting activity to an area outside Judea (Damascus). We can accept the Acts account at least to this point, that it was in Jerusalem that Paul took offence at the activity of the early Christians, particularly the Greek-speaking 'Hellenists' (Acts 6) who formulated their message in a manner that was much more critical of the temple and much less acquiescent to the Jewish religious establishment (cf. Acts 7) than the 'Hebrews'. Perceiving the activity of the Hellenistic Jewish Christians as a threat to the well-being of the Torah-centred way of life, and also at a deeper level perceiving their basic message as setting Christ over against the Torah, he engaged in 'zealous' repression of the movement. When this resulted in the flight of Christians from Jerusalem to other Jewish centres, Paul became involved in attempts to repress the activity of the new movement in Damascus. That is, we can accept the basic itinerary of Acts 8 and 9, though some of the details (the ferocity of Saul's own activity, imprisonment rather than simple disciplinary action, official letters from the high priest) may well be the result of Lukan exaggeration.

9. 'When God was pleased to reveal his Son to (in) me' (Gal 1:15–16): Somewhere near Damascus (cf. 'returned', Gal 1:17), Paul had an experience that led to a radical reassessment of the person of Jesus and a thoroughgoing reconfiguration of his foundational convictions. In the history of interpretation, various attempts have been made to account for this experience without remainder by appealing to psychological preconditioning or even physiological manifestations (e.g. an epileptic seizure). But to reduce the range of possible explanations in this way is to fail to recognize the reality of religious experience, on the phenomenological level at the very least. Religious phenomena certainly have their psychological and physiological dimensions, but it is unfair to religious communities in general to reduce religious experience to non-religious categories.

Paul, of course, understood this experience as an encounter with the risen Christ (Gal 1:15–16; 1 Cor 9:1; 15:8–9) and, moreover, as belonging to the same set of experiences as had brought the movement into being in the first place (1 Cor 15:5–8). But the reality of a religious experience is one thing, the interpretation placed on it by the subject quite another. Any attempt to assess the reality lying behind the statement, 'Christ appeared to me', belongs in a book whose purposes are quite different from those of a commentary such as this.

10. To understand Paul and his letters, however, it is necessary to recognize that he saw no gap or caesura between the experience and the interpretation. For him the subjective experience ('God... was pleased to reveal his Son in me', Gal 1:15–16, my lit. tr.) and the objective reality ('[Christ] appeared... to me', 1 Cor 15:8) were a seamless unity.

Further, to understand Paul it is necessary to recognize two things that flowed from this experience. One was a reconfiguration of his basic, world-ordering convictions. Paul had already come to some conclusions about how the message of a crucified and risen Messiah related to the basic convictions of covenantal nomism. His previous perceptions of Christ 'according to the flesh' (2 Cor 5:16) produced the conviction that Christ and Torah were mutually exclusive; they were rival ways of marking the community of the righteous. Consequently his new conviction—that God had raised Jesus and that the claims made about him in Christian preaching were thus grounded in God's action—was not a simple, self-contained conviction; rather, it set in motion a thoroughgoing process of convictional restructuring. Not that his new convictions were simply the inversion of the old. He continued to believe in the God of Israel, in Israel's election, even in the divine origin of the Torah. But these native convictions were redrawn around a new centre, the foundational conviction that the crucified Jesus had been raised by God.

11. The second thing that flowed from Paul's Damascus experience was that it was also and at the same time a call to be an apostle. Despite the chronological gap between the first experiences recounted in 1 Cor 15:5–7 and Paul's own—a gap alluded to in v. 8 ('last of all, as to someone untimely born') but ultimately dismissed as inconsequential—Paul claims that it constituted him an apostle on an equal basis with the others (vv. 10–11; cf. Gal 1:1). One can readily imagine how this claim would have sounded to those 'who were already apostles before [him]' (Gal 1:17) and their Jerusalem followers, especially when this johnny-come-lately began to insist on a law-free mission to Gentiles with Paul himself as its divinely commissioned apostle. An uneasy relationship with the Jerusalem church marked Paul's ministry from the outset.

12. 'So that I might proclaim him among the Gentiles' (Gal 1:16): Looking back, Paul locates the origin of his Gentile mission in the Damascus experience itself. Some interpreters have argued that this is just a matter of retrospect, Paul here collapsing a process that might have taken years, into the event that set the process in motion in the first place (e.g. Watson 1986: 28–38). But not only is there no evidence for such an intervening phase of any length, Paul's statements relating to his activity in Arabia suggest that from the very beginning he saw himself as commissioned to carry the gospel to Gentiles. Paul's sojourn in Arabia (Gal 1:17) is sometimes seen as a period of quiet reflection, where he contemplated the significance of his experience and worked out its theological implications. No doubt there was a period of time in which such reflection took place; certainly his new theological framework did not emerge instantaneously. But Paul's time in Arabia seems to have attracted the unfavourable attention of King Aretas himself (2 Cor 11:32). One does not usually arouse the ire of a ruling monarch by engaging in solitary theological reflection. Paul's Arabian experience suggests that he attempted to carry out an apostolic ministry among non-Jews at a very early date. If there was a period of reflection, we should think in terms of weeks, not years.

13. From a first-century Judean perspective, Arabia was the kingdom of the Nabataeans, with its capital in Petra (Jos. J.W. 1.125: 'the capital of the Arabian kingdom, called Petra').

This means that Paul's sojourn in Arabia in Gal 1:17 needs to be co-ordinated with the account of his escape from the agents of King Aretas in Damascus (2 Cor 11:30–3). The reference here is to Aretas IV, king of the Nabataeans from about 9 BCE to 39 CE. Murphy-O'Connor (1996: 5–7) argues that Damascus came under Nabataean control in 37 CE, which would then have been when Paul's departure from Damascus took place, though certainty is not possible (cf. Riesner 1998: 84–9). Presumably Paul had created enough of a disturbance through his evangelizing activity in Arabia that he had to return to Damascus (Gal 1:17), which in turn became too hot for him to remain once Aretas had gained control of the city. This evidence suggests, then, that Paul's statement in Gal 1:16 should be taken at its temporal face value: right from the beginning, he felt himself called as an apostle with a special commission for the Gentiles.

14. 'Up to Jerusalem . . . into the regions of Syria and Cilicia . . . Antioch' (Gal 1:18, 21; 2:11): Of the other events in the period between his Damascus experience and the start of the missionary activity reflected in the letters, Paul tells us very little. 'After three years' he journeyed to Jerusalem, with the specific intention of 'getting to know' Cephas/Peter, or of 'making his acquaintance' (Gal 1:18; on this sense of the verb histanai, see Jos. J. W. 6.81). Paul's larger purpose in Galatians 1 and 2 is to minimize his contacts with 'those who were already apostles before [him]' (Gal 1:17), in order to establish the point that he 'did not receive [his gospel] from a human source, nor was [he] taught it, but [he] received it through a revelation of Jesus Christ' (Gal 1:12). While this statement underlines the centrality of the Damascus experience for Paul's new commitment to Christ and the gospel, it should not be interpreted as implying that his early Christian experience was isolated and individual and that other Christians played no part in his formation. Presumably he did not baptize himself (Rom 6:3). Likewise, he was able to count on friends—Christians, in all probability—to help him over the city wall in Damascus (note the passive in 2 Cor 11:33: 'I was let down'). Even before his first visit to Jerusalem, then, he had been incorporated into a Christian community as a new convert, with all the socialization that would have entailed. Further, he describes such central Christian elements as the facts of the gospel itself (1 Cor 15:1–7) and the narrative of the last supper (1 Cor 11:23) as material that he had 'received' and then 'handed on', using the accepted, formal vocabulary for the transmission of tradition. It is probably not without significance that the two proper names mentioned in the summary of the gospel in 1 Cor 15:3–7 (Cephas, James) are precisely the two people that he met on his first Jerusalem visit (Gal 1:18–19). As C. H. Dodd is famously reported to have said, surely in two weeks Paul and Peter found more to talk about than simply the weather.

15. Of Paul's time in 'the regions of Syria and Cilicia' (Gal 1:21), very little can be said, unless we disregard the order in which these two geographical regions are listed and understand 'Syria' to refer to the kind of scenario recounted in Acts 11:25–6, where Paul was engaged as Barnabas's junior partner in a ministry of teaching and church leadership in Antioch. Be that as it may, other statements of Paul confirm the general picture arising from the Acts account: he was resident for a time in Antioch (both Cephas and James's delegation 'came' to Antioch, while Paul and Barnabas were already there; Gal 2:11–12); and he was associated with Barnabas in the earlier part of his known ministry but probably not later (the only evidence for direct association appears in Gal 2:1, 9, 13; cf. 1 Cor 9:6). Paul's arrival in Antioch brings his formative period to an end and sets the stage for the more public ministry narrated in Acts and reflected in his letters.

E. The Chronology and Sequence of Paul's Mission. 1. Any full chronological reconstruction of Paul's active ministry requires the co-ordination of three interdependent lines of investigation: (1) discerning the relative chronology of the different geographical stages of his mission; (2) identifying some fixed dates as anchor points for an absolute chronology; and (3) placing the letters at their appropriate points within this chronological framework. This is not the place, of course, to attempt any such reconstruction. Even if it were possible to do so in a reasonably concise way, it would be inappropriate here; the authors of each of the sections to follow must be allowed the freedom to interpret their assigned segment of the Pauline corpus within their own reconstruction of Paul's career. What is required at this point is a more general introduction to the problems inhering in the evidence, the points at which crucial decisions need to be made, and the resultant range of reconstructions.

2. As might well be expected, the role of Acts is once again a key factor in the discussion. In both Acts and the letters Paul's mission activity is punctuated by visits to Jerusalem, and the main reconstructions of Pauline chronology are differentiated by their approach to these visits. Acts recounts no less than five such visits:

Visit 1:	Post-conversion visit (9:26–30)
Intervening activity:	Time spent in Tarsus and Antioch (9:30; 11:25–6)
Visit 2:	Famine relief visit (11:27–9; 12:25)
Intervening activity:	Mission activity in Cyprus and southern Asia Minor (13:1–14:28)
Visit 3:	Jerusalem Council visit (15:1–30)
Intervening activity:	Mission activity in Macedonia and Achaia (16:1–18:17)
Visit 4:	Unspecified visit (18:18–23)
Intervening activity:	Mission activity in Ephesus and Asia (18:24–19:41)
Visit 5:	Collection visit (20:1–21:26)
Subsequent events:	Arrest, hearings, journey to Rome (21:27–28:31)

Two preliminary observations should be made about the final two visits. First, while Luke presents the fourth visit as a matter of some urgency to Paul (cf. 18:20–1), he provides no information at all about either the reason for the journey or its outcome. Second, while Luke is aware of the fact that the fifth visit was for the purpose of delivering collection money to Jerusalem (24:17), this aspect of the final journey is very much played down in Acts in comparison to the letters.

3. In the letters themselves, by contrast, there is evidence of only three visits:

- Visit A. Post-conversion visit (Gal 1:18)
- Visit B. Jerusalem consultation (Gal 2:1–10)

Visit C. Collection visit (1 Cor 16:1–4; Rom 15:25; cf. 2 Cor 8–9).

Several preliminary observations should be made about this list as well. To start with, the first two visits are presented in conjunction with some additional chronological information: the first visit occurred three years after Paul's Damascus experience (Gal 1:18), and the second visit took place 'after fourteen years' (Gal 2:1)—though whether the fourteen-year period begins with the first visit or with the Damascus experience is not specified in the text and is a matter of some scholarly dispute. Further, since Paul's purpose in this section of Galatians is to make the point that his contacts with Jerusalem were minimal, the context requires that the list is complete. That is, the cogency of his argument would have been in jeopardy if he had failed to mention a visit; thus prior to the writing of Galatians, Paul had made two, and only two, visits to Jerusalem. Finally, the third visit, to deliver the 'collection for the saints' (1 Cor 16:1), appears only in prospect; in all the references it is still a journey that lies in the future.

Of these two sets of visits, the first and the last in each case obviously correspond with each other, despite differences in detail. It is more difficult, however, to make sense of what comes in between. There are evident similarities between the meetings recounted in Acts 15 and Gal 2:1–10: the same participants (Paul, Barnabas, Peter, James), dealing with the same issue (circumcision of Gentile converts), coming to the same general decision (legitimacy of the Gentile mission). The majority of interpreters take these two passages as variant accounts of the same event (i.e. B = 3), and develop a chronological framework on the basis of this and other evident points of contact between Acts and the letters (with varying estimations of the reliability of information found only in Acts).

4. In addition to this majority position, however, there are two other minority approaches to Paul's chronological framework that need to be mentioned. One of them originated with the work of William Ramsay (1907), who was particularly concerned to demonstrate the historical reliability of Acts. The majority viewpoint described above tends towards the conclusion that Luke was mistaken in recounting an intervening visit between the post-conversion visit and that of the Jerusalem Council (i.e. the famine relief visit), since Paul's argument in Galatians leaves no room for it. In the position developed by Ramsay and followed by a number of others (e.g. Bruce 1977), it is argued instead that the consultation described in Gal 2:1–10 took place during the famine relief visit (i.e. B = 2). They argue that the private nature of this consultation (Gal 2:2) is more in keeping with Acts 11 than with Acts 15, and that Paul's statement of his eagerness to remember the poor (Gal 2:10) can readily be correlated with the famine relief project. Essential to this approach are two assumptions about the letter to the Galatians: first, that Galatians was written prior to the Jerusalem Council of Acts 15—perhaps the same delegation from Jerusalem that was creating dissension in Antioch (Acts 15:1) was pressuring the Galatian churches as well; and second, that the 'churches of Galatia' were those founded by Paul and Barnabas in Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Derbe, and Lystra during the so-called first missionary journey

(Acts 13 and 14), cities that were located in the southern part of the Roman province of Galatia (though the region of the ethnic Galatians lay further to the north). While this approach is often dismissed as special pleading in defence of Acts, there is a case that could be made on the basis of Galatians itself, which contains details that might suggest an early date for the letter (e.g. the prominence of Barnabas and absence of Timothy; the absence of any explicit mention of the collection project or injunctions to contribute; the restriction of his whereabouts between the first two visits to the regions of Syria and Cilicia).

5. The other minority viewpoint, pioneered by John Knox (1950), attempts to build a chronology almost entirely on the basis of information in the letters. In addition to the Jerusalem visits, there are three chronological sequences appearing explicitly in the letters: (1) from Damascus to the confrontation with Peter (Gal); (2) missionary activity in the Greek peninsula (1 Thess); (3) travels in connection with the collection (1 Cor, 2 Cor, Rom). Knox, followed by a number of others (e.g. Hurd 1965; Lüdemann 1984), have argued that according to Paul's own statements there could not have been any more than three visits to Jerusalem. The key to this reconstruction is the injunction in Gal 2:10 that Paul 'remember the poor', which is understood to mark the inception of the collection project. That is, at the Jerusalem Council, in return for the recognition of his Gentile mission, Paul undertook a project to raise money from his Gentile churches as a sign of good faith towards the Jerusalem church. Since this was the project that occupied much of his time during the final, Ephesus-based phase of his known missionary activity, the founding of churches in Galatia, Macedonia, and Achaia must have happened prior to the Jerusalem Council; that is, this missionary activity is located in the fourteen-year period mentioned in Gal 2:1. This reconstruction has the effect (though not the intent) of placing the Jerusalem Council at a point in the sequence corresponding to the unspecified visit of Acts 18:18–23.

6. To this point, the discussion has had to do with relative chronology. In order to develop an absolute chronology, it is necessary to determine some fixed dates. Paul himself is not all that helpful in this regard. The reference to King Aretas in 2 Cor 11:32 is the only instance where he names an otherwise identifiable secular figure. Still, one reference is better than none. As observed above, Murphy-O'Connor (1996: 5–7) has argued that Paul's departure from Damascus can be dated to about 37 CE; while this may represent more precision than the evidence allows, at least one can say that the event had to have taken place before Aretas's death in 39 or 40 (Riesner 1998: 84–9). The other possible anchor-point is provided by the reference to Paul's appearance before Gallio, the proconsul of Achaia (Acts 18:12). In 1905 an inscription was discovered at Delphi containing the text of a letter from Claudius to the city, which also referred to Gallio as proconsul. Since the term of office for a proconsular governor of a province was normally one year, commencing on the first of July, it is possible to fix Paul's appearance before Gallio to some time in the latter part of 51 CE (Murphy-O'Connor 1996: 15–22; Riesner 202–11). This, of course, assumes that Luke's report is reliable; advocates of a letters-based chronology place Paul's time in Corinth much earlier, and thus are required to dismiss the Acts account entirely.

7. To illustrate how the different approaches to Paul's chronology work out in practice, it will be useful to compare three chronologies—that of Murphy-O'Connor (1996), representing an approach that makes significant, albeit critical, use of Acts; Bruce's framework based primarily on Acts (Bruce 1977); and Lüdemann's letters-based chronology (1984). Note the significant variations in the events lying in between the post-conversion visit and the Jerusalem Council.

Murphy-O'Connor:

Conversion	33
Post-conversion visit	37
Syria and Cilicia	37–?
Cyprus, S. Asia Minor	?–45
Antioch	45–6
Galatia, Macedonia, Corinth	46–51
Jerusalem Conference	51
Antioch	51–2
Ephesus and environs	52–6
Collection visit	56
Arrival in Rome	62

Bruce:

Conversion	33
Post-conversion visit	35
Syria and Cilicia	35–46
Famine relief visit	46
Cyprus, 'Galatia'	47–8
Jerusalem Council	49
Macedonia, Achaia	49–52
Unspecified visit	52
Ephesus and environs	52–7
Collection visit	57
Arrival in Rome	60

Lüdemann

Conversion	33
Post-conversion visit	36
Syria and Cilicia
S. Asia Minor
Macedonia (Galatia?)
Arrival in Corinth	41
Jerusalem Council	50
Ephesus and environs	51–3
Collection visit	55

(Lüdemann also offers an alternative set of dates, not reproduced here, based on a date for the crucifixion of 27 CE rather than 30).

8. The final aspect of any chronological reconstruction is the placement of the letters within the larger chronological framework. Again we can leave these discussions for the commentaries on the individual letters that follow. Here only brief comments are necessary. There is little uncertainty about the relative position of 1 Thessalonians, the two Corinthian epistles, and Romans; in each case internal evidence provides reasonably clear indications of relative date (though the issue of the Corinthian correspondence is complicated by the probability that at least 2 Corinthians is a composite document). If 2 Thessalonians is authentic, then it is probably to be dated shortly after 1 Thessalonians, though some interpreters argue for an inverted sequence. Most commentators place Galatians prior to Romans and in the same general time-frame as the Corinthian correspondence, though as has already been observed there is a minority view that holds it to be the earliest of the letters. As for the 'prison epistles'—Philippians, Philemon, and Colossians (if authentic)—while traditionally they have been seen as written during Paul's Roman imprisonment, there is a growing body of opinion that would place some or all of them earlier, perhaps in an Ephesian imprisonment between 1 and 2 Corinthians (see 2 Cor 1:8; note the reference to many imprisonments in 2 Cor 11:23).

F. Paul's Apostolic Modus Operandi. 1. The number of churches addressed or referred to in the letters suggests that Paul was strikingly successful in gaining converts and founding new congregations. The letters provide us with very little direct information, however, on how he went about the process. Once again, the lack might seem to be supplied by the Acts account. Here Paul's activity in founding new churches tends to follow a recognizable pattern. He begins in the synagogue, where he takes advantage of opportunities to proclaim the gospel in a public forum (e.g. Acts 13:5, 14; 14:1; 16:13; 17:1–2, 10; 18:4). The preaching meets with a mixed response—a positive reception by some of the Jews and many of the Gentile proselytes and 'God-fearers' (13:43; 14:1; 17:4), but a hostile response by the larger proportion of the Jewish community (13:45; 14:2; 17:5–9, 13; 18:6). This opposition leads Paul to withdraw from the synagogue with his small group of converts, who become the nucleus of a separate community with a growing number of Gentile members (13:46–9; 14:3–4; 18:6–11), and an appointed body of leaders ('elders', 14:23; 20:17). Eventually local opposition or other considerations force Paul to depart and to move to a different city, where the process is invariably repeated.

2. Again, however, the Acts material should be used with caution; for when Paul describes his mission field, Jewish synagogues are nowhere in sight. While preaching to Jews is not categorically eliminated (1 Cor 9:20), Paul invariably characterizes his apostolic mission as directed towards Gentiles (1 Thess 2:16; Gal 2:2; Rom 1:5; 11:13; 15:16; Col 1:24–9); indeed, this was precisely the division of labour agreed to with Peter (Gal 2:7–9). Likewise, when he addresses his readers, he refers to them as Gentiles (1 Cor 12:2). In neither case is there any hint of a mixed group of Jews and Gentiles. Further, when he describes his Thessalonian converts as people who had 'turned to God from idols, to serve a living and true God' (1 Thess 1:9), he does not seem to leave room for the possibility that adherence to the synagogue had been for any of them a half-way house on the path from idolatry to their new faith, in contrast to Acts 17:4.

3. Still, the differences between Paul and Acts should not be exaggerated. For one thing, if some of his converts indeed had first been 'God-fearers' and synagogue adherents, Paul would have had his own reasons to play down this fact, not wanting his mission to be seen as dependent in any way on the synagogue; he is, after all, not a disinterested observer of his own mission. Further, the ease with which he can quote and allude to Scripture in his letters suggests a real familiarity with Jewish Scripture and tradition on the part of his Gentile readers, a fact not inconsistent with the idea that some of them had had a prior association with the synagogue. In addition, Paul's statement in 1 Cor 9:20 that 'to the Jews I became as a Jew, in order to win Jews', indicates that he did not consider Jews to be out of bounds for him. Indeed, given the evidence for Jewish communities in most of the cities where he worked, it would be difficult to imagine that he could have carried on a mission that did not impinge on the synagogue community in some way.

4. Nevertheless, Paul's letters represent our primary source, and we should not allow the more fully developed but nevertheless schematized picture in Acts to control or overshadow the information emerging from the letters themselves. Further, the task of setting the information from both Acts and the letters into a richer description of Paul's mission has been aided of late by more sociologically informed studies—both those that draw on models of how new religions grow and develop (on the Christian mission generally, see Stark 1996) and those that attempt detailed descriptions of Paul's social context (e.g. Meeks 1983). One emphasis arising from both types of study is the importance of various social networks in the spread of a new religious movement. While the role of public preaching and teaching should not be eliminated entirely, more emphasis should be placed on family networks (e.g. 1 Cor 7:13–16), on the extended household with its various networks of slaves, freedmen, tenants, clients, and so on (e.g. 1 Cor 1:16), and on the networks involved in the carrying out of a trade (Hock 1980). Indeed, the frequency of references to house-churches (1 Cor 16:19; Rom 16:3–5, 23; Philem 1; Col 4:15) suggests that households provided the primary social context in which Paul's churches were embedded (though other models such as voluntary associations may have helped shape the new communities as well; see Ascough 1997).

5. It is not easy to discern the shape of Paul's original preaching. The basic elements are clear enough; the summary in 1 Cor 15:3–8, with its focus on Christ's death and resurrection as a saving event, is reflected in other references sprinkled through the letters (e.g. 1 Cor 2:1–5; 1 Thess 1:9–10). But it is more difficult to discern how these basic elements were fleshed out. To take one sharply debated issue, how much biographical information about Jesus' life and teaching was included (Dunn 1998: 183–206)? Or, how central was Israel to Paul's preaching? Did he, for example, lead his converts to believe that they were full members of Abraham's family (Gal 3:29) or that they had been grafted into Israel's stock (Rom 11:17–24), or did these Israel-centred themes emerge only later and in response to external influences (see Donaldson 1994)?

6. In any case, after his initial preaching Paul spent a period of time consolidating his evangelistic gains and establishing a self-sufficient community. Most of his letters contain passing references back to this initial period of community-formation (e.g. 1 Cor 11:4–16; 2:1–5; 2 Cor 1:19; 12:12–13; Gal 4:13–15; Phil 4:9; 1 Thess 2:9–12; 2 Thess 3:7–10). During this period he did not request or accept financial support from the congregation, preferring to support himself through his own work (1 Cor 9:3–18; 1 Thess 2:9; 2 Thess 3:7–10) and contributions from already-founded congregations (2 Cor 11:7–11; Phil 4:15–16). With the exception of Phil 1:1, there seems to be little evidence of the kind of appointed 'elders' referred to in Acts (e.g. Acts 14:23). Indeed, a striking feature of the letters is that in dealing with local conflicts Paul does not bring local office-holders into the picture, either to instruct them or to encourage his readers to submit to them. He tended to operate more on the basis of a charismatic, gift-based leadership (Rom 12:4–7; 1 Cor 12:1–31; cf. Eph 4:11–16), though one should not underestimate the de facto leadership role played by the head of the household in which the church met.

7. After leaving the congregation and moving on to another city, Paul continued to feel 'daily pressure because of [his] anxiety for all the churches' (2 Cor 11:28). His anxiety took the positive form of an ongoing pastoral responsibility, exercised not only through his own follow-up visits (Phil 1:27; 2:24; 1 Cor 4:18–21), but also by means of appointed emissaries—for example, Timothy (1 Cor 4:16; 16:10–11; Phil 2:19–23) and Titus (2 Cor 7:6–16; 8:16–24)—and by means of the letters themselves. Through these agencies Paul extended his apostolic activity and authority; both emissaries (1 Cor 4:17) and letters (Gal 4:20) functioned as proxies—and sometimes as precursors—for his own apostolic presence (Funk 1967).

8. Paul founded self-sustaining congregations and then moved on. But where, and why? How did he decide which city he would move to next? More specifically, did Paul operate from some sense of a geographical plan or strategy? A number of pieces of evidence seem to suggest that he did. (1) Not only did he concentrate on cities, but the cities he chose to work in tended to be prominent ones, provincial capitals and the like. (2) He seems to have thought of these cities in terms of the provinces in which they were found, preferring to refer to his churches with provincial rather than city names; e.g. Achaia and Macedonia (Rom 15:26; 2 Cor 8:1; 9:2), Asia (Rom 16:5), Illyricum (Rom 15:19), Spain (Rom 15:24), and (probably) Galatia (Gal 1:2). (3) For years, he says, he had a desire to proclaim the gospel in Rome (Rom 1:10–13; 15:23), which he then wanted to use as a staging-post for a journey to Spain (Rom 15:24, 28). (4) The agreement between Peter and Paul recounted in Gal 2:9—'that we should go to the Gentiles and they to the circumcised'—is at least open to a territorial (rather than solely ethnic) interpretation. (5) The geographical context in 2 Cor 10:12–18 suggests a territorial element in Paul's statement that 'we... will keep within the field that God has assigned to us' (v. 13). (6) Paul's statement in Rom 15:19, 24, to the effect that he is now free to travel to Rome because he has 'fully proclaimed the gospel of Christ' 'from Jerusalem and as far around as Illyricum', seems to suggest not only a notion of territoriality but also of a specific evangelizing agenda within that territory. Since there was still plenty of scope for preaching, not only in untouched cities but even in the cities where churches had been planted, his statement that his work was finished in this area must suggest that he was operating according to some more specific strategy than simply preaching to as many Gentiles as he could wherever he might find them. (7) Finally, the statement that the conversion of the 'full number of the Gentiles' would be the thing to trigger the coming of the End and the salvation of 'all Israel' (Rom 11:25–6), sets the whole mission within an eschatological framework: when the gospel was 'fully preached', not simply from Jerusalem to Illyricum but from Jerusalem to X (X being wherever he considered the end of the territory to be), then the parousia would take place.

9. While these pieces of evidence seem to add up to a geographical strategy of some kind, it is not any easy matter to discern what it might have been. The popular notion that Paul engaged in 'missionary journeys', with Jerusalem as his point of departure and return, owes more to Luke than to Paul—and actually owes more to the modern missionary movement than to Luke: as Townsend (1985) has observed, it was not until the onset of the missionary movement in the eighteenth century that anyone thought to describe Paul's apostolic activity in terms of 'three missionary journeys'. Another notion influenced by more modern Christian missionary strategy—namely, that Paul intended each of his churches to be centres of evangelism for the whole province of which it was a part (e.g. Dunn 1988: ii. 86g)—founders on the fact that Paul nowhere urges his congregations to carry out the task of evangelism; strangely, his letters contain no injunctions to evangelize at all. Somehow he seems to consider his churches as representative of the provinces in which they are located, so that once a church was founded within a province, he could say that the gospel had been 'fully preached' in that province.

10. But how did he determine which provinces in which to work? Knox has suggested that the word kuklō in Rom 15:19 ('from Jerusalem and kuklō as far as Illyricum') should be translated 'in a circular manner', arguing on this basis that Paul's plan was to work his way through a string of provinces circling the Mediterranean and ending up in Egypt (Knox 1964). Others have attempted to find a geographical template in Israel's Scriptures—either the sequence of nations listed in Isa 66:18–21 (Riesner 1998: 245–53) or the various 'tables of the nations' in Gen 10 and elsewhere (Scott 1995). Each proposal has its difficulties, however, not the least of which is the fact that there were many provinces between Jerusalem and Rome or Spain which Paul did not seem compelled to visit. The statement that he chose to work only where Christ had not 'already been named' (Rom 15:20) might suggest that he avoided other provinces because they had already been evangelized. But this would hardly have been true of Thrace, Moesia, or Gaul, to name only a few of the provinces in which he did no work. Moreover, Rom 15:20 cannot be pressed too hard, in that Paul was quite prepared to preach the gospel in Rome (Rom 1:13) and to consider it as part of his apostolic turf (Rom 1:5–6; 15:14–16) even though a church already existed there.

Perhaps the most that can be said is that Spain, considered by the ancients to be the 'end of the earth', represented for Paul the goal of his ever westerly-pressing mission. In this connection, it is worth noting that Paul seems to have conceived of his apostolic task in the light of the Servant passages of Isaiah (see the citations or allusions in Gal 1:15; 2 Cor 6:2; Rom 15:21) and that the Servant's task was to bring God's salvation 'to the end of the earth' (Isa 49:6; see further Donaldson forthcoming).

In all probability, however, Paul never made it to the 'end of the earth'. He journeyed to Rome not in apostolic freedom but as a prisoner. While it is possible that his Roman hearing resulted in release (Murphy-O'Connor 1996: 359–63), it is more likely that it resulted, eventually, in his execution.

G. The Letters. 1. Paul wrote neither theological treatises nor narratives but letters, and a proper understanding of his literary legacy requires that we take seriously its epistolary character. To do this, we must look not only at the letters themselves, but also at the letter-writing conventions that were present in the Graeco-Roman world. Fortunately, we are the beneficiaries of a century of careful comparative study, with the result that the shape and texture of Paul's letters are being brought ever more clearly into focus.

2. It is customary in discussions of the literary features of Paul's letters to begin with Adolf Deissmann and his work on the papyri that were coming to light in the latter part of the nineteenth century (Deissmann 1910). And with good reason. Deissmann was the first to realize the significance of these papyri for the study of Paul's letters, and his own observations have continued to shape the discussion. In contrast to the more literary epistles that had been preserved in the classical corpus, which were generally written for a wider reading public and with a view to preservation (e.g. those of Cicero or Seneca), the letters contained among the papyri findings were truly occasional writings. That is, they were addressed to the immediate situation that had prompted their writing, and they tended to be artless, spontaneous, and personal. On the basis of such a distinction between literary 'epistles' ('products of literary art') and real 'letters' ('documents of life'; ibid. 218), Deissmann argued that Paul's writings should be classed among the latter. That is, they are occasional writings, written 'not for the public and posterity, but for the persons to whom they are addressed' (ibid. 225), written not as the careful formulations of a systematic theologian but out of the pressing urgency of a pastoral situation.

3. As a first approximation, Deissmann's analysis is valid and perceptive, highlighting as it does the immediacy and situation-driven character of the letters. Even the Epistle to the Romans, containing the most sustained and systematic argumentation in the corpus and traditionally understood as a 'compendium of Christian Doctrine' (Melancthon), should be understood instead as written out of specific circumstances (Paul's planned trip to Rome) and shaped in accordance with specific purposes (to win the acceptance of the Roman Christians by addressing their concerns about his Gentile mission). But Deissmann's categories are too crudely drawn and need to be significantly revised. For one thing, Paul's letters are not simply personal and private; he writes to whole congregations, even in such a 'personal' letter as Philemon (Philem 2), and addresses his readers from a self-conscious position of authority. Nor are they as brief, rough, and artless as many of the papyri letters on which Deissmann based his categories; while they may not display evidence of formal rhetorical training, they are nevertheless well-structured and carefully composed. In addition, further study of letters in antiquity has revealed a wide variety of different types of letter (Stowers 1986), from letters of rebuke (cf. Galatians) to letters of mediation (cf. Philemon), as well as a wider range of relationships between sender and recipient. With respect to the latter point, Aune has suggested a similarity between Paul's letters and 'official letters' sent from government officials to those under their authority (Aune 1987: 164–5).

4. Still, private letters provide the basic form on which all letters in Graeco-Roman antiquity were based, and a comparison between Paul and the epistolary papyri is very illuminating. Paul's letters are composed according to the conventional pattern of the day, although he adapted it in ways that made his letters particularly effective means of extending and reinforcing his apostolic activity.

Letters typically began with a prescript, consisting of the name of the sender, the name of the recipient, and a salutation. To use one of Deissmann's (1910: 167–72) examples, a second-century letter from a young Egyptian just arrived in Italy after having enlisted in the army begins this way: 'Apion to Epimachus his father and lord, many greetings.' The word 'greetings' (chairein) is a customary form of salutation in Hellenistic letters, though Jewish letters sometimes replace it with 'peace' (šālôm, eirēnē). Paul's letters follow the same format (A to B, greetings), but with several characteristic adaptations, some of them more or less the same from letter to letter, others particularly tailored to the needs of the situation. First, he usually adds a term descriptive of his own role and status, most frequently 'apostle' but also 'servant' or 'prisoner', completed in each case by 'of Christ Jesus'. Then he often names a co-sender (Romans being the only exception among the certainly authentic epistles), even though the letter itself is usually couched in the first person singular (e.g. Philemon). Then, where it suits his purposes, he will considerably expand either the sender or the recipient portion of the prescript. In Romans and Galatians, for example, where his own status as an apostle is in need of defence, he uses this portion of the letter to make an aggressive (Galatians) or subtle and extended (Romans; 6 verses) declaration of his apostolic status and authority. In 1 Corinthians, it is the recipients who are described more fully (1:2). Here the emphasis on their status as saints and on their membership in a wider community of Christians is an appropriate opening note to a letter addressed to a community marked by decidedly unsaintly behaviour (e.g. 5:1) and smug self-sufficiency (4:8; cf. 11:16). Finally, Paul ends the prescript with a salutation distinctively his own ('Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ'; minor variations in Colossians and 1 Thessalonians), yet adapted from current patterns. 'Grace' (charis), while part of Paul's characteristic Christian vocabulary, is close enough to chairein to be heard as an edifying wordplay; 'peace' is typical of Jewish letter-writing patterns.

5. The prescript in Graeco-Roman letters was frequently followed by a section in which the writer expressed wishes for the good health of the recipient, often couched in the form of a prayer, and/or offered thanksgiving to the gods for some benefit received. To illustrate, the letter cited above continues: 'First of all, I pray that you are in good health, and that you continue to prosper and fare well, with my sister and her daughter and my brother. I give thanks to the Lord Serapis that when I was in danger in the sea he saved me immediately.' Again this has its counterpart in Paul, though where in conventional letters it tended to be formulaic and perfunctory, in Paul each prayer/thanksgiving section is freshly composed for each letter, complimentary to the readers, and tailored in evident ways to the concerns of the letter. In 1 Corinthians, to take a particularly striking example, Paul gives thanks for characteristics in his readers that he will later scold them for not displaying: their richness (cf. 4:8) in speech (cf. ch. 14), in knowledge (cf. ch. 8), and in spiritual gifts (cf. chs. 12, 14). In Philemon, before pressing his request that Philemon receive Onesimus back with love (v. 16) and so refresh Paul's heart (v. 20), he gives thanks for Philemon's demonstrated 'love for all the saints' (v. 5) and for the way in which 'the hearts of the saints have been refreshed' already through Philemon. In less capable hands, this section would have been crudely manipulative. In Paul's more subtle and even elegant phrasing, however, this section functions as a kind of overture, introducing the themes to follow and predisposing the recipients to a receptive reading of the letter as a whole. The one exception is Galatians, where Paul moves straight from the prescript (concluded, unusually, with a doxology) to an expression of astonishment at the culpable folly of the readers. Here the prayer/thanksgiving section is omitted for effect, or one could even argue that it has been replaced with a curse section (Gal 1:6–9).

6. At this point in both Graeco-Roman letters and in Paul we move into the body of the letter, where the sender sets out to accomplish the purpose for which the letter was being written. Here, the sheer variety of purposes and forms means that it is not as easy to identify epistolary patterns at work in letter bodies as a whole. Still, comparative work has by no means been fruitless (White 1972). For one thing, many of the formulae by which Paul introduces his subject-matter or takes up new themes are frequently found elsewhere: e.g. 'I am astonished that'; 'I want you to know that'; 'I beseech/appeal to you'; 'I rejoice that'; 'I am confident that'—all are frequent in Paul and richly documented in Graeco-Roman sources (Aune 1987: 188; Longenecker 1990: pp. cv–cviii). As observed already, letter bodies can be further categorized according to the particular function intended for the letter (Stowers 1986). Also, as will be picked up in more detail below, considerable new light has been shed on the letters, particularly on the letter bodies, by analysing them in terms of the conventions of ancient rhetoric. Finally, it is possible in at least some of the letters to identify a section of parenesis at the end of the body proper (Rom 12:1–15:13; Gal 5:1–6:10; 1 Thess 4:1–5:22), i.e., a combination of instruction and encouragement, no doubt related to the particular circumstances prompting the letter, but in ways that are not always readily discerned.

7. Letter closings display less of a fixed form and have not been nearly as well studied, at least until recently (Weima 1994). Instead of essential elements, there appear to have been a number of conventions from which letter writers could make a selection according to preference or need: 'a farewell wish, a health wish, secondary greetings, an autograph, an illiteracy formula [i.e. indicating that the note had of necessity been written by a secretary], the date, and a postscript' (ibid. 55). Again Paul's usage both reflects current conventions and displays a Christian adaptation of them. His letters contain the following closing elements (ibid. 77–155): (1) a peace benediction, often a variation on the form 'may the God of peace be with you' (e.g. Rom 15:33; 2 Cor 13:11; Phil 4:9); (2) a final exhortation (e.g. 1 Cor 16:13–16; Phil 4:8–9); (3) greetings (first-, second-, and third-person), together with an injunction to 'greet one another with a holy kiss' (Rom 16:16; also 1 Cor 16:20; 2 Cor 13:12, 1 Thess 5:26); (4) an autograph (explicit in 1 Cor 16:21; Gal 6:11; 2 Thess 3:17; Philem 19; Col 4:18); (5) a grace benediction, in the form 'the grace of the Lord Jesus be with you'. The one fixed element, found in all the letters, is the closing grace benediction, which taken in combination with the prescript means that each letter is framed with the wish for grace. In addition, each closing contains a selection of the other elements, with a tendency towards the order in which they were listed above.

8. In more recent years, epistolary analysis has been supplemented—or even rivalled—by a second type of analysis to which the letters have been subjected, that of rhetorical criticism. The pejorative overtones associated with the term 'rhetoric' in popular parlance (e.g. mere or empty rhetoric) is a measure of how far this once highly prized declamatory skill has fallen in esteem. In antiquity, however, rhetoric was one of the two possible capstones of an education (philosophy being the other) and the basic prerequisite for a public career. Shorn of its negative connotations, 'rhetoric' simply denotes the 'art of persuasion', and more recent study has recovered a sense of its place in antiquity and its potential for New Testament interpretation (Kennedy 1984).

9. Rhetorical criticism looks at argument in the NT from several angles (see Mack 1990), each of which can be fruitfully applied to the body of Paul's letters. One has to do with classification of argument types. Ancient rhetoricians divided argument into three categories—judicial (rendering verdicts on past actions), deliberative (making decisions about future courses of action), and epideictic (bestowing praise or blame)—and these have been brought to bear on Paul's letters. A second approach has to do with the classification of different elements within an argument. Aristotle distinguished between ethos (the establishment of the speaker's relationship with the audience and the basis of the speaker's authority), logos (the substance, structure and arrangement of the argument itself), and pathos (the ways in which the emotions of the audience are elicited and engaged in the service of the argument). These three categories can readily be applied to each of Paul's letters, with immediate and fruitful results. A third aspect of rhetorical criticism is concerned with the logos itself, especially with structures of ancient rhetoric as prescribed in the handbooks of Quintilian and others. In his work on Galatians, for example, Betz (1979) attempts to demonstrate that the argument in this epistle unfolds according to the prescribed sequence of the exordium (introductory section), the narratio (recitation of the facts of the case), the propositio (thesis to be demonstrated), the probatio (specific arguments or proofs), and the concluding exhortatio.

10. Occasionally one gets the sense in reading rhetorical criticism that text is being eclipsed by pattern; that is, that the text is being squeezed to fit a prescribed rhetorical pattern, or at least that demonstrating the pattern has taken precedence over revealing the text. Further, it is doubtful that Paul himself would have been exposed in an explicit way to the type of rhetorical training prescribed by the handbooks. Still, since rhetoric itself permeated the cultural air he breathed, he would have been deeply affected by rhetorical patterns and conventions at least in a secondary way. Moreover, any approach that encourages readers to attend carefully to the actual functioning of a text as it works its persuasive power on a reader is to be warmly welcomed.

11. Any discussion of the actual functioning of the individual letters themselves or of the ends to which their particular persuasive powers are turned is best left to the individual commentaries to follow. More generally, however, one can say that what Paul intends to accomplish by means of his letters is what he himself would do if he were there. As he says towards the end of his troubled correspondence with the Corinthians: 'So I write these things while I am away from you, so that when I come, I may not have to be severe in using the authority that the Lord has given me for building up and not for tearing down' (2 Cor 13:10). Or a little earlier in the same letter: 'Let such people understand that what we say by letter when absent, we do when present' (2 Cor 10:11). Further, the promise (threat?) of a visit in many of the letters (1 Cor 4:18–21; 16:5–9; 2 Cor 9:4; 13:1, 10; Phil 2:24; Philem 22) serves to reinforce the connection between action by letter and action in person (Funk 1967).

12. Of course the Corinthians themselves felt that, at least as far as the exercise of forceful discipline was concerned, Paul's letters were more effective than his presence! 'His letters are weighty and strong, but his bodily presence is weak and his speech contemptible' (2 Cor 10:10). But discipline was only one arrow in his epistolary quiver. What Paul was attempting to do in his letters—to continue the archery metaphor by borrowing a phrase from Beker (1980)—was to direct a 'word on target' to the situation of his readers, to bring the 'coherent core' of his gospel to bear on the 'contingent circumstances' to which the letter was addressed. Paul's ultimate aim, in person or by letter, was to create and maintain for his converts a new world in which they might live and find meaning, a world grounded on the death and resurrection of Christ and the victory over the forces of evil and death that these had signalled.

13. This brings us close to the matter of Paul's 'theology', to which we will turn our attention in a moment. But first, two final items concerning the letters themselves. One of these has to do with two other agents with roles to play in the process of communication carried out by a letter. As was customary in a culture where the means of letter production were not readily available to all, Paul made use of a secretary to do the actual pen and papyrus work. This is implied by the autograph section in many of the letter closings, where Paul himself takes up the pen 'to write this greeting with [his] own hand' (1 Cor 16:21). It is stated explicitly in Rom 16:22 where, in the midst of a series of third-party greetings, the secretary breaks into the conversation to add his own word of greeting: 'I Tertius, the writer of this letter, greet you in the Lord.'

What was the role of the secretary in the production of Paul's letters? There is a range of possibilities, from simply producing a good copy from Paul's corrected first draft to actually composing the substance of the letter under Paul's general direction. The oral quality that comes through at many points, however, especially where sentences are broken off or new thoughts begun before old ones are fully completed (e.g. Rom 5:12; 8:3) or where verbs of speaking are used with respect to what is being said in the letter (Rom 11:13; 2 Cor 12:19), seems to suggest that Paul dictated his letters. This is also confirmed by a general evenness in style among the certainly authentic letters.

14. Perhaps more important for the process of communication was the role played by another agent—the person delivering the letter. In an era where there was organized postal service only for Roman imperial business, individual arrangements had to be made for the delivery of letters, preferably by someone known to the sender. Presumably the ‘tearful letter’ referred to in 2 Corinthians (2:3–4, 9; 7:8, 12) had the positive effect that it did (7:6–16) at least in part because Titus (who probably delivered the letter) had been present to interpret it, to ensure that it was being heard correctly, to mollify any who were upset by it, and perhaps even to negotiate a more positive response than if Paul had delivered his message in person. The role of the letter carrier also comes up in Col 4:7–9 where Paul (if Colossians is directly from Paul) commends Tychicus, again the probable letter carrier, who ‘will tell you all the news about me’. Later readers, who have to piece together information about Paul’s ‘news’ like a detective in a P. D. James novel, might wish that Paul had not left so much to the letter carrier, but had put more of the actual detail of his life and circumstances into the letters.

15. The reference in the previous paragraph to the disputed authenticity of Colossians brings us to the final item to be touched on in this section. Fully six of the thirteen letters that bear Paul’s name display characteristics that have led many scholars to conclude that some or all of the six were not written directly by Paul. While the details need to be left for the individual commentaries to follow, the characteristics are a combination of elements: differences in vocabulary and style, differences in theological outlook, reflections of contextual circumstances that probably emerged only later, and so on. These characteristics are not uniformly present in the six letters: 2 Thessalonians, Colossians, and Ephesians are much more Pauline in their vocabulary, style, and theology than are the Pastorals (1 and 2 Timothy, Titus). There are also variations within these two groups. Ephesians, with its long sentences and its piling up of synonyms and genitive constructions (e.g. ‘the working of the power of his strength’, 1:19), sounds less Pauline than does Colossians or 2 Thessalonians. With respect to the Pastorals, some of the features that set these writings apart from the rest of the Pauline corpus (the concern for church order; the stiff and formal tone out of keeping with letters ostensibly written to close associates) are absent from 2 Timothy.

16. In each case scholars have entertained a range of possibilities. Some have defended authenticity by appealing to special circumstances that might account for the observed deviations from the norm. Others have pointed to the way in which Paul included others within his sphere of apostolic authority—those mentioned as co-senders of letters, for example—in order to argue that Paul may have given a secretary or co-worker greater latitude in the actual composition of the letters in question. Still others—the majority in the case of Ephesians and the Pastoral epistles—believe that letters were written by former associates or later admirers of Paul some time after his death, written to bring the voice and authority of Paul to bear on pressing circumstances in the real author’s own day.

17. Readers who encounter this discussion for the first time often interpret the latter suggestion as implying deliberate deception on the part of the real author. But even in our own day we are familiar with situations where it is considered quite appropriate for texts that have been written by one person to be attributed to another—political speeches, for example, or ‘as told to’ autobiographies, or unfinished manuscripts published posthumously after being edited and completed by a colleague or admirer of the deceased. Furthermore, the ancients tended to have different attitudes towards authorship than are standard in our own culture, with its notions of copyright and intellectual property. Take, for example, this statement by the late second-century Christian writer Tertullian: [The Gospel] which was published by Mark may be maintained to be Peter’s, whose interpreter Mark was, just as the narrative of Luke is generally ascribed to Paul. For it is allowable that that which disciples publish should be regarded as their master’s work’ (Adv. Marc. 6.5). Certainly cases of deception were known in antiquity, no less than in our own day. But there is a much broader range of options to be put into play in the discussion.

One of the factors in the discussion of authenticity, however, and one of the keys to Paul’s enduring significance, is the presence in the certainly authentic letters of a distinctive set of theological themes and structures. To this we will now turn our attention.

H. The Thought within and beneath the Letters. 1. One cannot read through Paul’s letters without being struck by the dazzling array of images, metaphors, terms, concepts, and typologies that he uses to describe the human situation and the work of Christ and its consequences. A classroom of even beginner-level students can quickly fill up a whole blackboard. In an order as random as a classroom brainstorming session: justification; sin; redemption; judgement; flesh; Spirit; spirit; body; law; works of the law; faith; grace; boasting; Christ; Lord; the first/last Adam; Son of God; sons of God; sons of Abraham; righteousness; reconciliation; adoption; freedom; slavery; expiation; sanctification; enemy; wrath; love; for us; for our sins; blood; gospel; preaching; body of Christ; in Christ; putting on Christ; in the Spirit; crucified with Christ; dying with Christ; rising with Christ; walking; called; being one; bought and sold; first fruits; wisdom; glory; living sacrifice; faith, hope, and love; triumph; dying to the law; dying to sin; principalities and powers; elemental spirits; condemnation; fellowship—not to mention ‘things that are not to be told, that no mortal is permitted to repeat’ (2 Cor 12:4).

2. The list is a testimony to the vigour and vitality of Paul’s mind. His was an active intellect, throwing off metaphors and ideas as a grindstone throws off sparks. Yet the very kaleidoscopic dazzle of his language makes it difficult to read him well, especially since his statements on some topics (the law, in particular) seem to be in considerable tension with each other. Is there a discernible pattern or an underlying structure that will help us make coherent sense of this welter of theological language? What, in other words, is the basic shape of Paul’s theology?

3. The task is by no means easy. The puzzlement expressed by the author of 2 Peter, noted at the outset of this essay (2 Pet 3:16), is echoed by modern readers as well. In Franz Overbeck’s delightfully paradoxical way of putting it: ‘No one has ever understood Paul, except Marcion; and even he misunderstood him.’ Or, in more expanded form: ‘[Paul’s] greatness is shown in the very fact that he has found no congenial interpreter and probably never will. From Marcion to Karl Barth, from Augustine to Luther, Schweitzer or Bultmann, he has ever been misunderstood or partially understood, one aspect of his work being thrown into relief while others have been misunderstood and neglected' (Schoeps 1961: 13).

4. Some have decided that the very attempt to find a coherent pattern of thought in Paul is misdirected, either because Paul's significance is to be found instead in his spirituality or his exercise of pastoral care, or because his thinking contains an irreducible element of incoherence. Among those who think that the quest for coherence is worth pursuing, there have been several different ways of formulating the problem, or several different places in which the interpretative key has been sought. Some have looked to Paul's 'background', hoping to find in Paul's Jewish formation or Hellenistic environment (or a combination of the two) the grid-points around which his theological discourse can be plotted and patterned. Others have looked to his conversion (as has already been observed), hoping to find a biographical and experiential paradigm that might have generated—and thus might make sense of—his later argumentation. Still others have attempted to select from the larger set of terms and metaphors a primary image or a central theme around which the remainder can be arranged. 'Justification by faith not works' is probably the best-known example of such an attempt. These approaches have been supplemented from time to time by various developmental schemes, which try to discern a substantial progression of Paul's theology as he matured.

5. Perhaps the most promising approach, however, is one that sees Paul's 'theology' as a cumulative activity taking place between two other levels of cognition and perception. The foundational level, located in structures beneath the surface of the text, consists of Paul's set of basic convictions, things that he took to be axiomatic or self-evident. Some of these were native convictions, stemming from his primary formation in Judaism; others were secondary and reconstitutive, stemming from his Damascus experience. We have already discussed the way in which Paul's 'conversion' experience can be seen as a redrawing of his primary Jewish convictions around the new belief that God had raised Jesus from death and thus made him Saviour and Christ.

By contrast, the uppermost level, encountered at the rhetorical surface of the letters, is much more contingent, in that it is related to the specific situations that prompted Paul's epistolary response. This level is not to be simply identified with either the actual circumstances themselves or Paul's actual response, though both are involved. Rather, it is to be located in Paul's perception of the situation, as he views it through the lens of his basic gospel convictions.

6. What is commonly thought of as Paul's theology, then, can be seen as lying in between these two levels and produced by the dynamic interaction between them. New and unforeseen circumstances in his churches force Paul to develop the implications of his core convictions in order to be able to address them. Questions raised by opponents or sceptical hearers of his message raise to the surface tensions inherent in his new set of convictions, tensions that he needs to resolve if his message is to be heard. Especially prominent in this regard are those tensions arising from his new belief that Christ, not Torah, is the true badge of membership in the family of Abraham. Paul's theology, then, is that developing body of thought that exists in between conviction and circumstance, driven in different ways by both and by the dynamic interaction between them.

7. This is obviously not the place to try to develop any full-scale description of this developing body of thought. The most recent (and highly successful) attempt to do this (Dunn 1998) ran to some 800 pages! But for present purposes, in addition to this suggestion of a multilevel approach to Paul's theology, it will be helpful to make a few further comments about the shift that is currently underway with respect to a central aspect of his thought, namely, the nature of the human plight and of the solution provided by God in Christ. An older pattern, shaped in large measure by the controversies of the Reformation era (though constructed from elements in existence ever since the church had become a distinctly Gentile institution), has been increasingly displaced by a new pattern owing much to a new appreciation of the Jewish context in which Paul carried out his apostolic mission. Of course, to reduce the complex field of Pauline interpretation to two 'patterns' is a considerable oversimplification; reality is much more complex than that. Still, it is often helpful to paint with broad strokes before working on the fine details, so there is value in a simplified sketch. In any case, both patterns deal with the central themes of sin and salvation, but in strikingly different ways.

8. The older approach assumes that for Paul the fundamental problem posed by sin was essentially that it left human beings guilty before a righteous God. God demands righteousness first and foremost, but humans are universally sinful and thus under divine condemnation. Christ's role, then, is conceived primarily as a way of removing this guilty verdict. His death makes it possible for God, though righteous, to forgive sin, and for humans, though sinful, to be considered righteous. In this 'objective' view of the atonement (the process by which Christ overcomes the problem posed by sin and effects a reconciliation between God and humankind), the problem posed by human sin is located ultimately with God; even though God might be willing to forgive, the standards of divine righteousness make this impossible. There are various ways in which this 'impossibility' has been understood. The most common, however, is that God's righteousness required that sin be punished. In his death—so runs this 'penal substitutionary' view of the atonement—Christ functioned as a substitute, experiencing death as the punishment for sin, even though he was not guilty of sin. With the penalty paid, God is then free to overlook sin, 'imputing' Christ's righteous status to those who believe.

9. If guilt and its consequence—condemnation—constitute the nub of the human plight, then the heart of salvation for Paul is to be found in its opposite, justification. Christ's fundamental accomplishment in this older view, then, was seen as opening up the possibility of justification, a new status attributed to the believer on the basis of faith. What gave Paul's doctrine of justification by faith its particular spin in the traditional line of interpretation was the way it was defined in contrast to 'works'. Faith and works were taken to be fundamental categories for Paul, representing two mutually exclusive personal stances or attitudes vis-à-vis God. 'Works' is understood as an attitude of self-confidence based on meritorious achievement, where one attempts to earn acceptance and standing before God on the basis of moral and religious accomplishment. While such standing might be theoretically possible, the pervasiveness of sin, it is argued, made it impossible in reality. Thus Paul's language of justification by faith is interpreted within the framework of two mutually exclusive religious frameworks—one operating on the basis of divine grace humbly accepted, the other on the basis of human achievement boastfully put forward.

In this reading of Paul, Judaism comes into the picture essentially as an example of a works religion—the one with which Paul was most familiar, but nevertheless just a particular example of a more general human tendency. Paul's interest in the Gentiles is taken for granted, in that it is assumed that he begins with a generically human problem—how can a sinful human being find acceptance before a righteous God?

10. In this way of construing Paul's thought, it can readily be seen how the distance between Luther and Paul has been collapsed, so that Paul's problem and solution are understood to replicate those of Luther himself. We have already seen one difficulty with this reading of Paul—the fact that its legalistic interpretation of Judaism represents a fundamental misunderstanding of how the law functioned with respect to the covenant. But there are other difficulties as well. One has to do with sin. It is hard to imagine how someone who read in his Scriptures that God was 'merciful and gracious, slow to anger and abounding in steadfast love' (Ps 103:8) could have believed that human guilt for sin was a fundamental obstacle to divine forgiveness. Another has to do with justification by faith. While juridical language (justification, etc.) looms large in Galatians and Romans, when one looks at the letters as a whole one is struck by the limited role it plays. Outside Galatians and Romans (and Phil 3) Paul never uses this doctrine as a fundamental first principle to be brought to bear on problems, in Corinth, say, or Thessalonica. Moreover, he quite happily issues all sorts of commands and injunctions to his congregations concerning 'works' they are to perform, without feeling any apparent compunction to warn them of the dangers of legalism. In fact, the only 'works' that Paul gets upset about are those that would turn Gentiles into Jews—circumcision, food laws, sabbath observance, and other Torah regulations. Since Romans and Galatians are written precisely for the purpose of defending the equal status of Gentile believers as Gentiles, against those who would in effect have them become Jews, it can be argued that instead of being his central theme, justification by faith is a particular line of argument developed for this purpose.

11. These observations could be developed at much greater length. But for present purposes this will suffice as an introduction to an alternative way of construing Paul's central story of plight and salvation, again sketched out in broad strokes. Rom 8:1–4 provides us with a convenient set of paints and brushes:

There is therefore now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus. For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has set you free from the law of sin and of death. For God has done what the law, weakened by the flesh, could not do: by sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and to deal with sin, he condemned sin in the flesh, so that the just requirement of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not according to the flesh but according to the Spirit.

At this point in Romans, Paul is bringing the argument of chs. 1–8 to a conclusion. He returns to the theme of justification: there is no condemnation—that is, there is justification—for those in Christ Jesus. Why? Not because Christ has endured a penalty that had to be meted out, but because Christ has performed an act of liberation: he has liberated you from the law of sin and death. For Paul, sin is conceived not simply as culpable wrongdoing, but more fundamentally as a power, a kind of force-field that 'has come into the world through one man' (Rom 5:12), bringing death in its train and holding the whole of humankind under its sway. Those in its power commit sins and incur guilt, of course, but precisely because of the power of sin already at work in them: 'If I do what I do not want, it is no longer I that do it but sin that dwells within me' (Rom 7:20). The problem posed by sin, then, is only secondarily one of guilt; more fundamentally, the problem is bondage. What is needed is not forgiveness per se; until the power of sin is nullified, forgiveness does not get at the root of the problem. What is needed, rather, is liberation.

12. Christ's accomplishment, then, is to be seen more fundamentally in terms of a confrontation with sin, breaking its power and opening up a new sphere in which life can be lived. What Christ has done in the flesh is to 'condemn sin' (v. 3). In context, this must mean more than simply to declare sin to be deserving of condemnation; the law was very good at doing this (ch. 7), but what Christ has done is something that the law 'could not do' (v. 3). Christ, for Paul, has not only pronounced the verdict but also carried out the sentence; he has won a victory over sin and emptied it of its power—at least for those who are 'in Christ' (v. 1) and who 'walk according to the Spirit' (v. 4).

13. While Christ's death makes possible a new objective status (of which justification is one metaphor), this is not the heart of salvation for Paul. Instead, salvation has to do with the real subjective experience of being liberated from sin's power and transferred to a sphere in which a different power is at work, the power of the Spirit. Those who are empowered by the Spirit—who 'walk according to the Spirit' (v. 4)—are thereby 'of Christ' (Rom 8:9) or 'in Christ' (v. 1) or have Christ in them (Rom 8:10). This language is part of a larger complex in Paul in which the Christian experience is described in participatory terms—i.e. as an experience of sharing with Christ in the process of dying to this age, an age in which sin and death are the regnant powers, and rising to the life of the age to come, where sin and death are finally defeated (Rom 6:1–11). While the process will not be complete until the End, believers even now experience the Spirit as a kind of first fruits (Rom 8:23) of the full harvest to come. Just as those under the power of sin were bound to transgress the law (Rom 7:14–20), so those who 'walk according to the Spirit' are enabled to 'fulfil' 'the just requirement of the law' (v. 4).

In contrast to the juridical language of justification by faith, this language of participation in Christ permeates the letters, functioning as the touchstone for ethics (e.g. Rom 6:1–11; Gal 5:16–26) and the fundamental first principle for dealing with community problems (e.g. 1 Cor 6:15–20; 10:14–22). If we begin here, we will be able to make much better sense of Paul than if we take justification by faith as the centre and starting-point. Faith is still fundamental, though what it does in the first instance is to open the door for the believer's incorporation into Christ.

14. In this portrayal of Paul's thought, Judaism comes into the picture not as an example of the wrong kind of religion: rather, in Paul's reinterpretation of Torah-religion, Israel becomes the place where the nature of the human plight was clarified and the decisive act of God's solution was carried out. Israel's role, as Paul understands it, was to be a kind of representative sample of the whole of humankind, in both plight and salvation. Within Israel, the Torah functioned to define and reveal sin (Rom 5:20; 7:7, 13), so that it could be clearly seen that all were under its power and subject to death; within Israel, Christ appeared to confront and defeat sin, so that all could be liberated from its power and share in the glory of the age to come. As a representative (Rom 11:1–6) of this representative sample, Paul felt himself called to announce this liberation to the nations out of which Israel had been called in the first place.

This is far from being even a sketch of Paul's theology; a rough outline of one section of a sketch would be more accurate. Still, if the letters cannot be understood without some sense of the convictional and theological levels operating beneath the surface, this sketch of a sketch might provide the reader with a bit of a glimpse of what might be going on beneath the surface and giving shape to what appears above.

I. The Collection and Enduring Significance of the Letters. 1. It was observed above that we have been able to arrive at a better understanding of Paul's letters by comparing them with ordinary letters of his own day, noting not only the similarities but also the differences. In addition to the differences already discussed, there is one further difference between Philemon, say, and Apion's letter to his father Epimachus (discussed above) that deserves reflection. The issue is that of preservation. That we are able to read the papyri letters at all is purely due to happenstances of survival and discovery—the favourable Egyptian climate and the chancy circumstances of archaeological investigation. Paul's letters, by contrast, have been deliberately preserved by generations of reading communities that have continued to find them meaningful and have each taken great care to preserve them and hand them on to the next. Consequently the 'meaning' of these texts cannot be restricted to the limited confines of the original reading event. These texts have had a significant afterlife, continuing to speak in fresh ways to new situations, and this afterlife has added its own successive layers of meaning that hover like an aura around the texts as we read them today.

2. The actual process by which Paul's letters were collected in the first place can be only dimly discerned (Gamble 1975; 1985). That they have survived at all seems to indicate that they were preserved by their original recipients; the only other option—that Paul and his associates preserved a 'master file' of letters—is ruled out both by the absence of some letters (e.g. the one mentioned in 1 Cor 5:9) and by evidence that suggests the gradual emergence of a standard collection rather than the existence of a fixed corpus of letters from the outset (Gamble 1975). The reference in 2 Pet 3:16, along with the writings of Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp, indicate that by the late first and early second centuries most of Paul's letters were known and were being cited as authoritative texts, though there is no indication of the shape or extent of the collection. The first extant list of Pauline writings is that of the 'heretic' Marcion in the mid-second century, a list containing all but the Pastorals. The Pastorals are included, however, in lists drawn up later in the century by Irenaeus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria. These three authors also contributed significantly to the concept of a Christian canon of scripture, consisting of a set of 'apostolic' writings existing alongside the Scriptures originating with Israel; the terms 'Old' and 'New Testament' (the Latin equivalent of 'covenant') were contributed by the Latin writer Tertullian. By the end of the second century, then, the thirteen letters contained in our New Testament had been collected into a single Pauline corpus that formed part of a larger (though still somewhat fluid) collection of authoritative Christian Scripture.

3. This process of canonization represents a dramatic shift in the context within which these letters were read. At the outset, neither Paul nor his intended readers saw the letters as 'Scripture', even though Paul wrote both out of the conviction that God had 'spoken' in a new way in Christ (revelation being one component in the concept of 'Scripture'), and with a sense of divinely granted authority (a second component). No doubt these were factors in the initial preservation of the letters. But what happened next? In the absence of any hard data between the 50s and the 90s of the first century, there is room for a variety of possibilities. Some argue for a Pauline school—associates and later followers of Paul, who made collections of the letters in order to study the thought of the master, producing new letters to synthesize his thought (e.g. Ephesians) or to bring his voice to bear on new situations (the Pastorals). Others suggest that it was the publication of the Acts of the Apostles that produced a renewed interest in Paul and led churches to dig the letters out of the archives and copy them for circulation. Edgar Goodspeed and his followers (e.g. Knox 1959) link this with the imaginative idea that the one primarily responsible for the collection was none other than Onesimus, the slave for whose benefit the letter to Philemon was written. This theory rests on two (not completely implausible) suppositions: that the Onesimus of Philemon is the same person referred to by Ignatius (c.110CE) as bishop of Ephesus; and that the inclusion of the short, semi-personal letter to Philemon in the Pauline corpus requires some explanation. It is more probable, however, that the process of collection was both a more continuous and a more haphazard affair, with different collections emerging in different local settings through the latter part of the first century.

4. In any case, the basic fact is clear that the letters survived not because the early church was interested in preserving an archival record of its origins, but because those who first read the letters over the shoulders, as it were, of the original recipients felt that the letters transcended their original settings and had continuing meaning for readers and situations beyond the original context. While our understanding of the letters has been richly enhanced by careful scholarly reconstruction of their original contexts, it should not therefore be supposed (though a perusal of much scholarly literature suggests that it often has been supposed) that the question of the meaning of these texts is exhausted when a full recovery of this 'original meaning' is attained. At least three additional layers or dimensions of meaning need to be recognized.

5. The first is the canonical context. While the letters were first written as individual items of communication—part of an ongoing dialogue between Paul and the community in question, to be sure, but to be read independently of any other letter from Paul—they have been preserved in a canonical collection of which they are an integral part (Childs 1984). At least in the context of the church, then, one cannot read Galatians, say, with its polemical and extreme language about (some aspects of) Torah-centred religion, without reference to the more tempered and generous language of Romans. Likewise, the negative view of marriage in 1 Cor 7 has to be read alongside the more positive depiction in Eph 5; even if Ephesians is not by Paul himself, these texts have been preserved for us by a tradition that makes no distinction whatsoever between Pauline and Deutero-Pauline or post-Pauline literature.

6. To say this, of course, is to say nothing about how one goes about resolving tensions among the members of the collection; there are no rules to say that Romans trumps Galatians or that Eph 5 is to be preferred over 1 Cor 7 (or vice versa in either case). Tension and interpretative difficulty come with the canonical territory, even more so when the rest of the canon is brought into play (as indeed it should be). Of course, we can read the letters in isolation from each other if we choose to do so. But they have been preserved only as part of a collection where they are presented to us as 'the epistles of Saint Paul'. This process of canonization, then, is not simply the ecclesiastical equivalent of the dry sands of Egypt—a historical happenstance that has effected the preservation of these letters but that is extrinsic to their meaning. Intrinsic to the process of preservation is the development of a framework of meaning within which the letters have been handed on to subsequent generations.

7. This leads to a second 'value-added' stage in the process. Subsequent generations have not simply handed on the texts in their canonical framework of meaning. Each generation of Christian readers has engaged in the process of scriptural interpretation—of reading these letters within this framework in order both to enter more deeply into the text and to bring it to bear on the situations and circumstances of their own day. Scriptural interpretation is of necessity a collaborative and corporate exercise, but one that is impoverished when the voices of previous generations of interpreters are left out of the discussion. Recently there has been a revival of interest in the history of interpretation, evidenced for example by the series Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture (Inter Varsity Press) and Pilgrim Classic Commentaries (Pilgrim Press), and this is helping to bring these voices back to the interpretative table.

8. But this is not the only way in which the transmission of Paul's letters through the years has generated levels of meaning that accompany them into the present. The Bible has existed not simply as an interpretative object; it has been a kind of subject or agent as well, impacting—indeed, shaping in fundamental ways—the culture in which it has been transmitted to us. One cannot come to a full understanding of Paul's letters without recognizing the social and cultural effects they have had. This type of study is still in its infancy (see Bockmuehl 1995), but examples spring readily to mind. We have already observed at the outset of this essay the role played by the Epistle to the Romans in the conversions of Augustine, Martin Luther, and John Wesley. These conversions are significant not only for their own sake, but also for their far-reaching social and historical consequences—Augustine and the 'introspective conscience of the West' (Stendahl 1976), Luther and the Reformation, Wesley and the evangelical revivals in Great Britain and the New World. It would take whole volumes of books to trace the historical consequences of Paul and his letters in these events alone.

9. To take another, quite different, example: during archaeological excavation of the city of Caesarea Maritima, a mosaic floor was discovered in a building dating from the Byzantine period (6th cent. CE) that originally served some public and bureaucratic function. The mosaic contained the text of Rom 13:3: 'Do you wish to have no reason to fear the authority? Then do what is good, and you will receive its approval.' Here, probably not for the first time and certainly not the last, statements from Paul's letter to the church in Rome were used by ruling powers to encourage submission to the state. The role of this text in eliciting and reinforcing the church's acquiescence to the policies of the Nazi regime in Germany is a more extreme example of the same power of texts to shape social realities, for good or ill. The fact that the text was being misinterpreted in the process—what he said to the Roman Christians notwithstanding, Paul was quite prepared to engage in activity that the state considered disruptive enough to justify his arrest and imprisonment (2 Cor 11:23)—in no way diminishes the point.

10. The point could be elaborated at great length, and there is much interesting work waiting to be done on the epistles of Paul as factors in social history. But the most important thing to be said about the letters as subjects, as agents accomplishing effects, is that the potential for their functioning in this way is present every time they are read anew. In any fresh encounter with these texts they bring to the event the evocative power of their rhetorical voice, along with the reverberating echoes of the processes of meaning-production that have preserved them and brought them to us. We bring to the event our own personal subjectivities, along with whatever we have come to know about the texts themselves, the circumstances lying behind them, the structures of thought and conviction lying beneath them, and the history of preservation, interpretation, and effective agency opening up in front of them. What comes out of the encounter, happily, has often been unpredictable and full of rich surprise. Paul would call it grace.

REFERENCES

- Ascough, R. S. (1997). What Are They Saying About the Formation of Pauline Churches? (New York: Paulist).
- Aune, D. E. (1987). The New Testament in its Literary Environment (Philadelphia: Westminster).
- Beker, C. (1980). Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Betz, H. D. (1979). Galatians: A Commentary on Paul's Letter to the Churches in Galatia, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).

- Bockmuehl, M. (1995), 'A Commentator's Approach to the "Effective History" of Philippians', JSNT 60: 57–88.
- Brown, R. E. (1997), An Introduction to the New Testament (New York: Doubleday).
- Bruce, F. F. (1977), Paul: Apostle of the Heart Set Free (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Childs, B. S. (1984), The New Testament as Canon: An Introduction (London: SCM).
- Deissmann, A. (1910), Light from the Ancient East: The New Testament Illustrated by Recently Discovered Texts of the Graeco-Roman World (London: Hodder & Stoughton).
- Donaldson, T. L. (1994), "'The Gospel that I Proclaim among the Gentiles' (Gal 2:2): Universalistic or Israel-Centred?', in L. Ann Jervis and Peter Richardson (eds.), Gospel in Paul: Studies on Corinthians, Galatians and Romans for Richard N. Longenecker, JSNTSup 108 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press), 166–93.
- (1997), Paul and the Gentiles: Remapping the Apostle's Convictional World (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- (forthcoming), "'The field God has assigned": Geography and Mission in Paul', in Leif Vaage (ed.), Religious Rivalries and the Struggle for Success in the Early Roman Empire, Studies in Christianity and Judaism (Waterloo, Ont.: Wilfrid Laurier University Press).
- Dunn, J. D. G. (1988), Romans, WBC (2 vols: Waco, Tex.: Word).
- (1998), The Theology of Paul the Apostle (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Elliott, J. H. (1990), 'Paul, Galatians and the Evil Eye', CurTM 17: 262–73.
- Funk, R. W. (1967), 'The Apostolic Parousia: Form and Significance', in W. R. Farmer, C. F. D. Moule, and R. R. Niebuhr (eds.), Christian History and Interpretation: Studies Presented to John Knox (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press), 249–68.
- Gamble, H. (1975), 'The Redaction of the Pauline Letters and the Formation of the Pauline Corpus', JBL 94: 403–18.
- (1985), The New Testament Canon: Its Making and Meaning (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Haenchen, E. (1971), The Acts of the Apostles: A Commentary (Philadelphia: Westminster).
- Hengel, M. (1991), The Pre-Christian Paul (London: SCM).
- Hengel, M., and Schwemer, A. M. (1997), Paul between Damascus and Antioch: The Unknown Years (Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox).
- Hock, R., F. (1980), The Social Context of Paul's Ministry: Tentmaking and Apostleship (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Hurd, J. C. (1965), The Origin of 1 Corinthians (New York: Seabury).
- Kennedy, G. A. (1984), New Testament Interpretation through Rhetorical Criticism (Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press).
- Knox, J. (1950), Chapters in a Life of Paul (New York/Nashville: Abingdon-Cokesbury).
- (1959), Philemon among the Letters of Paul (Nashville, Tenn.: Abingdon).
- (1964), 'Romans 15:14–33 and Paul's Conception of His Apostolic Mission', JBL 83: 1–11.
- Kümmel, W. G. (1929), Römer 7 und die Bekehrung des Paulus (Leipzig: Hinrichs).
- Longenecker, R. N. (1990), Galatians, WBC (Waco, Tex.: Word).
- Lüdemann, G. (1984), Paul Apostle to the Gentiles: Studies in Chronology (London: SCM).
- Mack, B. L. (1990), Rhetoric and the New Testament (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Meeks, W. A. (1983), The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Muggeridge, M., and Vidler, A. (1972), Paul: Envoy Extraordinary (London: Collins).
- Murphy-O'Connor, J. (1996), Paul: A Critical Life (Oxford: Clarendon).
- Rambo, L. R. (1993), Understanding Religious Conversion (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Ramsay, W. M. (1907), St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 9th edn. (London: Hodder & Stoughton).
- Riesner, R. (1998), Paul's Early Period: Chronology, Mission, Strategy, Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Roetzel, C. J. (1998), The Letters of Paul: Conversations in Context, 4th edn. (Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox).
- Sanders, E. P. (1977), Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Schoeps, H.-J. (1961), Paul: The Theology of the Apostle in the Light of Jewish Religious History (Philadelphia: Westminster).
- Scott, J. M. (1995), Paul and the Nations, WUNT 84 (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck]).
- Segal, A. F. (1990), Paul the Convert: The Apostolate and Apostasy of Saul the Pharisee (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Stark, R. (1996), The Rise of Christianity: A Sociologist Reconsiders History (Princeton: Princeton University Press).
- Stendahl, K. (1976), Paul among Jews and Gentiles, and other Essays (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Stowers, S. K. (1986), Letter Writing in Greco-Roman Antiquity (Philadelphia: Westminster).
- Townsend, J. T. (1985), 'Missionary Journeys in Acts and European Missionary Societies', Society of Biblical Literature Seminar Papers, 433–7.
- Watson, F. (1986), Paul, Judaism and the Gentiles, SNTSMS 56 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Weima, J. A. D. (1994), Neglected Endings: The Significance of the Pauline Letter Closings, JSNTSup 101 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- White, J. L. (1972), The Form and Function of the Body of the Greek Letter (Missoula, Mont.: SBL).

64. Romans

CRAIG C. HILL

INTRODUCTION

A. Significance. Romans is one of the eminent texts of Western history. From Augustine to Luther, from Wesley to Barth, Christian thinkers of every era have been shaped profoundly by this, the longest Pauline epistle. Romans is commonly regarded as Paul's supreme work, the consummate expression of his mature theology. Among Protestants in particular, no book has been more highly esteemed or carefully scrutinized. Above all, Romans influenced the Reformation vision of true religion as the reception of God's grace through faith.

In equal and opposite reaction, however, Romans has unwittingly encouraged generations of readers from Marcion onwards to regard Judaism as the exemplarily false religion, a creed of merit and system of works unworthy of devotion or even of toleration. The first of these conclusions lies at the heart of Protestant–Catholic debate, the second at the centre of Jewish–Christian controversy. Not surprisingly, Roman Catholics have long questioned Protestant readings of Romans (paralleling in some ways the canonical protest of Jas

2:14–26), as Jews have long challenged the epistle's characterization of their theology. Only recently, as a consequence of post-Vatican II ecumenicity and post-Holocaust interreligious awareness, have the earlier interpretative models begun to break apart. The willingness of major scholars to cross traditional boundaries and weigh old criticisms with new seriousness is undoubtedly the most important development in modern Pauline studies. Thus, now as in the past, Romans is at the forefront of Christian theological reflection and self-understanding.

B. Provenance. 1. The Pauline authorship of Romans is not in doubt. Indeed, one might say that Romans is the 'most Pauline' epistle, since it most influences scholarly construals of Paul and most frequently is referenced in arguments about the (in)authenticity of the Deutero-Pauline letters. Also, compared to other Pauline epistles (notably Philippians and 2 Corinthians), few doubts arise concerning the literary integrity of Romans. The unity of the letter is seriously questioned only at ch. 16, which some regard as the remnant of a separate Pauline letter, appended to Romans' original conclusion in 15:33. The evidence for this view is not compelling, as is noted in the commentary on ch. 16.

2. Romans was probably composed in Corinth during Paul's final visit. Gaius, 'whose hospitality I and the whole church here enjoy' (16:23, NIV), is presumably the same figure mentioned in 1 Cor 1:14. In 15:23–33, Paul anticipates an imminent journey to Jerusalem, an itinerary that corresponds broadly to Acts 20:1–21:17. Thus, widespread consensus exists for dating Romans in the mid-50s CE, making it one of Paul's final letters (at least subsequent to his Thessalonian, Galatian, and Corinthian correspondence).

3. The letter is written 'to all God's beloved in Rome' (1:7). The city of Rome was the seat of government of the Roman republic (25th cent.–31 BCE) and empire until 330 CE, when Constantine moved the capital to Constantinople. During the second and first centuries BCE, Rome gradually came to dominate the countries of the Mediterranean basin, including Judea, which was conquered in 63 BCE by the Roman general Pompey. The city of Rome was vast, home to approximately 1 million persons. Augustus and subsequent emperors erected monumental public works, including amphitheatres, squares, temples, forums, and libraries. Although the wealthy inhabited comfortable villas, the great majority of people were poor and lived in large tenement houses, some as tall as six storeys (HBC 882). The Jewish community of Rome was substantial; it is estimated that between 20,000 and 50,000 Jews lived in the city by the beginning of the first century CE (ABD 1048). How or when Christianity came to Rome is unknown. By mid-century, when Paul wrote Romans, the church already enjoyed a substantial reputation (1:8). A dispute within the Jewish community over Christian claims appears to stand behind the Emperor Claudius's expulsion of the Jews from Rome in 49 CE (see Acts 18:2). According to Suetonius (Claudius, 25.4), 'the Jews constantly made disturbances at the instigation of Chrestus', probably a mistaken form of the word Christus (Christ). Local Christians were sufficient in number and reputation in 64 CE that Nero could scapegoat them for the fire of Rome. Nero fastened the guilt and afflicted the most exquisite tortures on a class hated for their abominations, called Christians by the populace' (Tacitus, Annals, 15.44.2).

C. Literary Genre. Formally, Romans is identical to most other Pauline letters, including a salutation (identifying sender and recipients), a thanksgiving (clarifying the relationship between writer and reader and previewing the contents of the letter), a body (offering the substance of Paul's communication), and a farewell (including a final blessing and, if ch. 16 is genuine, personal greetings). In numerous other ways, however, Romans is different—as one might expect, knowing that it is the only Pauline letter written to a church neither founded by the apostle or his assistants, nor visited by him (note e.g. the lengthy self-descriptions in 1:1–6 and 15:16–21, and the deferential language of 1:11–13 and 15:22–4). The hallmark of Paul's other letters is their contingency; characteristically, they deal with specific issues that arose within a particular Pauline church (e.g. 1 Cor 1:11: 'For it has been reported to me by Chloe's people that there are quarrels among you'; 1 Cor 7:1: 'Now concerning the matters about which you wrote...'). Reading these letters is not unlike overhearing one side of a conversation. Clearly, this analogy does not apply to Romans, which is more declamation than dialogue. The letter does not address in any obvious way the Roman church's own problems. It is a single, extended theological argument, not a seriatim discussion of pastoral concerns. It thus is a letter more in form than in function. For this reason, Romans is categorized as, for example, an 'epistle' (as distinct, according to Deissmann (1927: 220), from a non-literary 'letter'), a 'Greek letter-essay' (Stirewalt 1977), an 'essay-letter' (Fitzmyer 1993), or an 'ambassadorial letter' (Jewett, cited by Fitzmyer 1993: 68–9). All such labels make the point that Romans was commissioned to a somewhat different service than the other Pauline letters. To what service, exactly, is one of the perennial issues of Pauline scholarship.

D. Purpose. 1. Paul offers few clues as to his purpose in writing to the church at Rome. He states in 1:10–11 that he prays for the Roman Christians and longs to see them, 'that I may share with you some spiritual gift to strengthen you—or rather so that we may be mutually encouraged by each other's faith...[and] that I may reap some harvest among you as I have among the rest of the Gentiles.' In 15:15, he states that 'on some points I have written to you rather boldly by way of reminder, because of the grace given me by God to be a minister of Christ Jesus to the Gentiles in the priestly service of the gospel of God, so that the offering of the Gentiles may be acceptable, sanctified by the Holy Spirit.' In 15:23–9, Paul informs his readers of his travel plans: he soon will deliver the collection to 'the saints at Jerusalem' and then visit Rome on his way to Spain, where he will engage in further missionary work (v. 20). He hopes not only to see the Roman Christians but also 'to be sent on by you, once I have enjoyed your company for a little while' (v. 24). Similarly, in vv. 28–9, Paul states that 'I know that when I come to you, I will come in the fullness of the blessing of Christ.' In 15:30–1, Paul urges his readers to pray for the success of his impending trip to Jerusalem, 'so that by God's will I may come to you with joy and be refreshed in your company.' Taken together, these statements probably indicate that Paul hoped to win the support of the Roman church for his missionary venture in Spain, and that as 'minister to the Gentiles' (Gal 2:7), he assumed a measure of pastoral responsibility for the Gentile Christians in what was, after all, the greatest city of the known world. The letter thus would have both strategic and didactic functions, to introduce and recommend Paul, and to teach and exhort his readers in the Christian faith, as Paul understood it.

2. Could not Paul have met these objectives in fewer than the 7,000 words of Romans? Was there some larger task, demanding a more extensive response? The traditional explanation is to regard Romans as Paul's theological 'last will and testament', a summary of his theology composed near the end of his career. But Paul expected both an ongoing apostolic occupation and an approaching eschatological consummation (13:11–12). Moreover, Romans is not a good compendium of Pauline teaching; much that is contained in Paul's other letters is absent. Why did Paul write at such length about these particular issues, most notably, the law and Judaism? Scholars have looked both to Paul's own circumstances and to the circumstances of the Roman church for answers.

3.1. What do we know about Paul's situation that might be relevant to the composition of Romans? Surely the most important datum is the recent, bitter controversy at Galatia; the letter to the Galatians includes most of the primary topics and much of the key language of Romans. Many scholars date Philippians even closer to Romans (55 CE, according to Jewett 1979). Phil 3 (probably a warning based on Paul's Galatian experience; see Hill 1992: 155–8) is reminiscent of both Galatians and Romans ('flesh . . . circumcision . . . zeal . . . righteousness under the Law', etc.). Thus the theology of Romans does not appear ex nihilo. Paul had ample cause to weigh these matters and to regard them as both important and urgent.

3.2. A second key factor is Paul's awareness of the relative failure of the church's 'Jewish mission' (Gal 2:7–8). Paul speaks of his 'sorrow and unceasing anguish' for his 'kindred according to the flesh' (9:2). It is clear that Jewish unbelief is a theological and not just a personal problem for Paul. God acted in Christ to fulfil divine promises to Israel, but the concrete result is a Gentile church. Can God be righteous, faithful to God's own nature and commitments, and not save Israel? (Indeed, God's righteousness is the unifying theme of the entire letter. See ROM 1:16–17.) In the face of his impending trip to Jerusalem, the problem must have appeared acute. Has God failed? And is not Paul, who calls Gentiles 'children of Abraham' (4:16) and who says that 'Christ is the end of the law' (10:4), the enemy of Israel? Is Paul's a righteous gospel? Hays (1989: 35) has noted with insight that Romans is 'an intertextual conversation between Paul and the voice of Scripture' in which the apostle 'labors to win the blessing of Moses and the prophets'. Gentile biblical scholarship has tended to de-Judaize Paul, thereby trivializing these struggles and rendering the central place of Rom 9–11 (on the fate of Israel) nonsensical.

3.3. A number of scholars have argued that it is Paul's impending trip to Jerusalem that most influenced his writing of Romans (e.g. Manson 1948, Jervell 1971). It is evident from 15:30–2 that Paul himself anticipated trouble in Jerusalem. Accordingly, Romans is often seen as a rehearsal of the arguments that Paul would make on his own behalf in Jerusalem. The shape of this theory varies from scholar to scholar, depending mostly upon prior conclusions about the relationship between Paul and other Jewish Christians. Does 15:31 indicate that Paul would have to defend himself to the church as well as to the Jewish authorities of Jerusalem? If so, on what issues? F. C. Baur (1873–5: i. 109–51) asserted a century and a half ago that the leaders of the Jerusalem church (notably, Peter and James) actively opposed Paul for admitting uncircumcised Gentiles into the church. It is the heirs of Baur today who make the most of Paul's conflict with the Jerusalem church. By their reading, Paul's defence in Romans of the equality of Jew and Gentile is aimed squarely at the Jerusalem Christians. This presents a heroic, classically Protestant portrait of Paul as the lone champion of Christian freedom. Despite its popularity, this hypothesis is not corroborated by the New Testament. The only substantial evidence strongly supports the contrary view, that the Jerusalem church accepted Gentiles qua Gentiles as Christian believers (e.g. Gal. 2:1–10; Acts 15; see Hill 1992: 103–92). This does not mean that there was no disagreement between Paul and other Jewish-Christian leaders. Paul sanctioned disobedience by Jews of certain Jewish (particularly food) laws (see 1 Cor 9:20–1), an attitude that did not endear him to many in Israel, Christian or otherwise. It is instructive that it was over food laws that Paul confronted Peter at Antioch (Gal 2:11–14); it was not the circumcising of Gentiles that precipitated the crisis but the observing of dietary laws that, in Paul's mind, recreated the distinction between Jews and Gentiles. Likewise, it is the issue of law observance on the part of Jewish Christians that is mentioned in association with Paul's final visit to Jerusalem in Acts (21:21, 28). Also, one should bear in mind that Paul was bidding for the practical support of the Roman church. Interjecting a dispute with the mother church (whose authority Paul himself acknowledged; e.g. Gal 2:2) hardly seems politic. Moreover, any such self-defence is subtle to the point of invisibility (cf., by contrast, the defence of 2 Cor 11–13 or the record of his public confrontation in Gal 2:11–14). Therefore, while Paul's impending Jerusalem visit may have been a factor in his composition of Romans (as in ROM D.3.1), it is highly doubtful that Romans originated as an apologia directed at the Jerusalem church.

4. The other approach is to look to the circumstances of the letter's recipients for explanations. How much Paul knew about the situation in Rome is the subject of considerable debate. His most likely source of information was Priscilla and Aquila, who, according to Acts 18:2, came to Corinth from Rome as a consequence of Claudius' expulsion of the Jews (49 CE). They are mentioned by Paul himself in 1 Cor 16:19 and (if authentic) Rom 16:3. Also mentioned in ch. 16 are several other Roman Christians. Still, it is not obvious how Paul's acquaintance with such persons might have shaped this letter. Paul made a considerable effort to introduce himself and his gospel to the Roman church, a clear signal that he regarded his audience as strangers. Many scholars attempt to link the epistle's contents to a Roman context by suggesting that the Jewish believers who returned to Rome following Claudius' death were not accorded due respect by their Gentile co-religionists, who even went so far as to deny positions of authority to returning Jewish leaders (Marxsen 1968: 95–104; Beker 1980: 69–74). Hearing of the Gentile Christians' conduct, Paul composed this letter, at least in part as an attempt to unify the Roman church. Passages such as 11:17–21 ('do not vaunt yourselves over the branches [the Jews'] were written to teach the Gentile believers proper humility. (In tension with this purpose is the tendency of these same scholars to equate the 'weak' of ch. 14 with returning Jewish believers who continued to observe food laws: see Dunn 1988: ii. 798; cf. the counter-argument in Nanos 1996: 85–165.) This reconstruction, while not impossible, is open to question at every point (see e.g. the strong challenge of Stowers 1994). The most that can be said with certainty is that Paul wanted to demonstrate that the Gentile church had not supplanted Israel, and therefore that Gentiles had no reason to boast in their present status (11:17–36). The argument could have been formulated in response to a Jewish–Gentile conflict in the Roman church, but such a conflict is not required to explain it. Perhaps Gentile Christians in the capital city faced special temptations to triumphalism, but that tendency could hardly have been unique, as subsequent history thoroughly demonstrates.

5. Knowing the context of a statement is of first importance in determining its meaning; unfortunately, such contextual data are substantially lacking with respect to Romans. Consequently, the inherently conjectural nature of one's interpretation should be acknowledged. Sufficient evidence exists to allow for the formation of fairly detailed hypotheses; sufficient gaps in that evidence ensure that even careful hypotheses will be substantially speculative. To a large degree, we do not know why this epistle was written, and any interpretation based upon the presumption of such knowledge will be inherently circular. Because the commentary below assumes no single 'reason for Romans', it will not attempt to advance one interpretation against all others. Instead, it will seek to delineate the plausible range of interpretation. This is an admittedly confined ambition, but one that corresponds to the real limitations within which any interpreter of Romans labours.

E. Issues of Interpretation. 1. A generation ago, one might have asserted that the exegesis of Romans was complete in its essentials, pointing to the common interpretative tradition that extended from Augustine to Bultmann and Barth. Whatever consensus might have existed prior to 1977 was fractured by the publication that year of E. P. Sanders's Paul and Palestinian Judaism (see Räisänen 1983: 1–15; Dunn 1988: i. pp. lxiii–lxxii). Sanders offered a critique of Pauline scholarship based on two methodological assumptions: (1) a religion ought to be understood in its own terms through an analysis of its own primary sources; and (2) an author's argumentation must not be unnaturally synthesized by later expositors; contradictory statements and approaches, where they occur, should be allowed to remain (Sanders 1977: 12). Application of the first assumption leads one to question any construal of Judaism based on the often polemical references to it in Christian writings, including the NT. The popular picture of first-century Judaism as a religion of sterile legalism, supercilious piety, and haughty self-righteousness is not supported by Jewish documents. When allowed to speak for themselves, first-century Jews are not heard advocating a religion of merit, the photo-negative of a uniquely Christian notion of salvation by grace. Functionally, Judaism and Christianity are quite similar: one 'gets in' by means of God's gracious calling; one then is obligated (not least by gratitude) to obey the will of God, however defined. Obviously, regarding Judaism in this way necessitates a rethinking of Paul. For example, earlier interpreters could assume that Paul had formulated his ideas about the law in response to the legalism of normative Judaism. One school saw Paul's response as a correction of Jewish abuses; the law, no longer 'misused', was still valid (Cranfield 1979: 862). Others believed that Paul rejected out of hand any notion of the law's validity since he recognized that the law itself was a primary source of human alienation (Bultmann 1952–5: i. 247). Unfortunately, both approaches account for Paul's position by making reference to a Judaism that never existed. A popular counter-proposal suggests that Paul's target was not works righteousness at all but 'Jewish national [self]-righteousness' (e.g. Dunn 1988: i. pp. lxxi–lxxii, 42–3, etc.). This move appears to vindicate Paul—he is still right about what is wrong about Judaism—but it misses the point of Sanders's critique. In effect, it substitutes a new bad Judaism for the old, now discredited bad Judaism of traditional interpretation. But the problem is not in our (previously) faulty identification of Judaism's deficiency (whose depiction in Paul varies and so is infinitely interpretable); the problem is in Paul's either/or reasoning that requires that Judaism be nullified for Christ to be necessitated (see ROM 6.6). Were the disorder Jewish pride, the remedy would be Jewish humility. But for Paul the only adequate curative is Christian faith, which means that the only actual complaint is Jewish unbelief, however variously it may be explained or characterized from the Christian side (see ROM 2).

2. It is at this point that the second methodological principle, that of taking apparently contradictory material at face value, has been fruitfully applied. What does it mean if Paul's arguments about the law do not entirely cohere? Among other things, it may indicate that Paul did not think his way to Christian faith, that his conclusions about the law are not the result of his own pre-Christian wrestling with its supposed inadequacies. As Sanders (1977: 442–7) put it, Paul 'reasoned backwards'. He did not move from consideration of the law to Christian faith; instead, having come to faith in Christ, Paul attempted to understand as a Jewish Christian the Judaism in which he had been raised. Thus Paul never was entirely able to repudiate the law. It was, after all, God's law and as such must serve a divine, albeit negative, purpose. Two fundamental convictions, that God is the God of Israel and that God provides salvation only in Christ, were thus held together in uneasy tension, and most of what is commonly considered under the rubric 'Paul and the Law' can be understood as part of an ongoing attempt to effect a reconciliation between the two.

3. If Judaism was not the false religion of works righteousness, if the law did not function within Judaism as a means to salvation, what are we to make of Paul's argument? It may be claimed that Paul has set up Judaism as a straw man, the foil to all that is deemed good and true in Christianity. It seems more reasonable, however, to think that Paul is describing something quite real: not Judaism as non-Christian Jews knew it but Judaism as it would be experienced by Paul's Gentile-Christian converts. Within Judaism, one was not circumcised to earn membership in the people of God. Instead, circumcision marked a son of Israel's participation in God's gracious, pre-existing covenant. The situation is wholly different, however, if the subject is an adult Gentile Christian. If he accepted circumcision under compulsion, he would, by implication, be saying that his faith in Christ is insufficient to save, an inadequate basis for participation in God's covenant. For him circumcision would therefore become a work, and Judaism a religion of works righteousness. (The same dilemma occurs when an adult Christian joins a denomination that does not recognize his or her baptism. For that person, baptism becomes an entry requirement, an indispensable 'work', however it may be construed theologically by existing church members.) Paul's argument, including his tendency to oppose the law and Christian faith as antithetical religious systems, makes a good deal more sense when viewed in this way. This does require, however, that we no longer regard Paul as an objective, disinterested observer of Judaism.

4. Other distinctive aspects of Paul's thought bear significantly on our understanding of Romans. The first concerns Pauline eschatology. In general, Paul has a decidedly future or 'not yet' orientation, reminiscent of the Gospel of Mark. In the undisputed Pauline epistles, salvation is always a future category; the paradigm of present Christian life is the cross, not the resurrection (e.g. 1 Cor 1:18; 2:2; Rom 6:5; 8:18). Present experience of the Spirit is a foretaste or seal (2 Cor 1:22) of what is to come (1 Cor 13:8–12). There is one very important exception, however, one issue in relation to which Paul consistently invokes a realized eschatology: the Gentiles. For Paul, the prophetic expectation that Gentiles would be incorporated into Israel in the last days is already being fulfilled, not least in his own ministry. (Note, for example, how Paul's description in Rom 15:25–6—see also the quotations in vv. 9–12—draws on Isa 66:18–22.) In Rom 11:25–7 Paul explains this 'mystery': present Jewish unbelief has effected a reversal of the eschatological timetable; contrary to expectation, it is the Gentiles who will enter first, after which God will act to save 'all Israel'. Much of what is peculiar to Pauline theology is derived from this perspective: admission of Gentiles is not foreshadow; it is substance. That puts Pauline theology on a fundamentally different footing from that of other Jewish-Christian leaders, and it explains how both Paul and the 'pillar apostles' (James, Cephas, and John: Gal 2:9) could have agreed to the practice of Gentile admission while utterly disagreeing as to its consequences. If there is now one people in Christ, without distinction between Jew and Gentile (Gal 3:28), then the church exists in a radically new age, from which one can radically critique what went before—especially the law, whose very stipulations drew the boundaries between Jew and Gentile. (An inevitable consequence of a realized eschatology is an increased sense of theological distance between insiders and outsiders, especially between Christians and (non-Christian) Jews; note the many pejorative references to 'the Jews' and 'the world' in Johannine literature.) The categories of Paul's thought that are derivative of the 'Gentile issue' share in the same logic, e.g. Paul's idealized Christian anthropology, according to which believers are essentially different from other people: they 'walk in the Spirit' and so fulfil the 'just requirements of the law' (Rom 8:4). It is always worth asking what reality Paul presupposes within a given argument. When a question relates in some way to Gentile admission, Paul's thinking shifts towards realized eschatological categories, a fact that explains many of the ambiguities within Pauline theology and the tensions between Pauline theory and practice.

5. It is important to note that Paul worked with the concepts available to him. Chief among these is the idea that the law is a single entity, given by God. This presents Paul with an insuperable difficulty. He knows by God's acceptance of Gentiles (demonstrated by gifts of the Spirit; Gal 3:2–5) that obedience to laws that distinguish Jews from Gentiles (namely circumcision, food laws, sabbath and other 'days') is no longer required. However, the law being a unity, it is necessary to challenge it in toto. In theory, this is no problem, because Christians possess the Spirit and have no need for a 'written code' (2:27). In practice, what Paul expects of his converts is a fairly typical Jewish morality, which he can assume for himself but which comes less naturally to his Gentile associates. Consequently, Paul is put in the awkward position of legislating rules of behaviour ad hoc, since he no longer has the law to draw upon for authorization. Therefore, he is forced, in effect, to reinstitute Jewish laws with Christian warrants (e.g. see Rom 1:20; 1 Cor 6:15–17; and 10:20–1). Thus it is erroneous to suppose that Paul created a law-free religion. Christianity, like Judaism, has always had norms (again, mostly Jewish); for that reason, Christians, as much as Jews, can be guilty of reducing religion to rule-keeping. In short, it is quite possible that the argument of Romans would have looked very different had Paul been able to divide the law explicitly into categories (clarifying what is rejected and what is retained), as Christians ever since the second century (e.g. Epistle of Barnabas) have attempted to do. Certainly, subsequent Christian ambivalence—even animosity—towards the Hebrew Bible would have been lessened had Paul taken such a course.

6. Finally, it is vital to understand that Paul consistently organized the relationship between Judaism and Christianity in such a way that non-Christian Judaism must be negated. Gal 2:21 reveals a great deal about the working of Paul's mind: 'I do not nullify the grace of God; for if justification comes through the law, then Christ died for nothing.' In other words, it is a zero-sum game. If God intended to save through Christ, it must have been necessary; therefore, one could not be saved apart from Christ, that is to say, through the regular practice of Jewish religion. The either/or structure of Paul's argument explains an otherwise astonishing fact: were Romans our only source, we might well conclude that Jewish theology knew nothing of mercy, grace, love, forgiveness, or atonement. As the logic stands, these necessarily become Christian categories (as do 'grace and truth' in Jn 1:17). It is interesting to note that Paul cited God's acceptance of Abraham on the basis of faith in both Gal 3 and Rom 4 and then passed in silence over virtually all subsequent Jewish history (the mention of David in Rom 4:6 being a rare exception). Needless to say, the existence of any pre- or non-Christian Judaism in which one might find right relationship with God creates a severe problem for Paul. On the one hand, he wants to argue that God saves only in Christ and that Judaism, apart from Christ, is a way of 'sin' and 'death' (Rom 7:9–11); on the other hand, Paul feels compelled to cite precedents in Judaism for God's saving modus operandi. The question is, can one have it both ways? Paul might have argued on the basis of essential continuity: the God of the Jews, always a God of salvation, has worked this saving purpose ultimately in Christ (an argument somewhat similar to that of Hebrews). Instead, Paul's argument traces the line of essential discontinuity, which is precisely what Marcion and other despisers of Judaism have found congenial in his thinking. One must ask if it is possible to affirm what Paul affirms (the religion of grace) without necessarily denying what Paul implicitly denies (that Judaism itself is such a religion).

COMMENTARY

Salutation (1:1–17)

Although the basic shape of the salutation is the same in all Paul's letters (an indication of the sender(s) and recipient(s) followed by a short blessing), the form is flexible and was adapted by Paul to each letter's purpose. For example, Paul wrote Galatians in part as a defence of his divinely sanctioned apostolic authority; thus he identifies himself as 'an apostle neither by human commission nor from human authorities' (Gal 1:1). The salutation in Romans is distinguished by its lengthy description of 'the gospel of God' for which Paul was set apart (vv. 2–6). Such details establish Paul's credentials and identify common ground with his audience.

As in Phil 1:1, Paul refers to himself as a 'slave' or 'servant' (doulos) of Jesus Christ (a designation paralleled, for example, in Jas 1:1, 2 Pet 1:1, Jude 1). It was customary for Jews to regard themselves or their leaders as 'servants of God' (Ps 19:11; 27:9; Neh 1:6; 2 Kings 18:12; Isa 20:3; Jer 7:25; Deut 32:36; etc.), and Israel itself is frequently identified as God's servant (Jer 46:27; Ezek 28:25; Isa 44:1, 45:4; etc.) (Dunn 1988: i. 7). The Christological appropriation of OT language about God is a consistent and revealing feature of the NT writings (e.g. cf. Phil 2:10–11; Isa 45:23). Also noteworthy is Paul's tendency to balance a statement about Christ with a statement about God. He wished the Romans 'grace . . . and peace from [both] God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ' (v. 7); likewise, Paul mentioned that he was 'set apart for the gospel of God . . . [which is] concerning his Son' (vv. 1, 3) and offered thanks to 'God through Jesus Christ for all of you' (v. 8; cf. Rom 8:9; 'Spirit of God . . . Spirit of Christ').

The mention of prophets, scriptures, and David (vv. 2–3) sounds a deliberate note of continuity with Israel's past. The connection between Paul's contemporary proclamation to Gentiles and God's ancient promises to Israel is of central importance in Romans (see esp. chs. 9–11). (On the plural 'scriptures', see Hays 1989: 34).

Many scholars think that the core of vv. 3–4 came from pre-Pauline Christian tradition, possibly in the form of an early Christological formulation (Byrne 1996: 43; Dodd 1932: 4–5). A pair of descriptions of the Son are set in parallel, distinguished by the contrasting Pauline terms 'flesh' and 'spirit':

who was descended from David according to the flesh and was declared to be Son of God with power according to the spirit of holiness by resurrection from the dead

Jesus' human or earthly ('according to the flesh') status as a descendant of David (see 2 Sam 7:11–16; Davidic lineage is a staple of messianic texts: Isa 11; Jer 23:5–6; Ezek 34:23–4; etc.) is mentioned only here in Paul's writings but figures prominently elsewhere in the NT (e.g. Mt 1:1; 9:27; Mk 11:10; 12:35; Lk 1:27, 32; 2:4; 2 Tim 2:8; Rev 3:7; 5:5). Also lacking support elsewhere in Paul is the early Christian idea that Jesus was appointed or designated (horisthentos; see TDNTv. 450–1) Son of God at the resurrection (v. 4; cf. Acts 2:36; 5:30–1; 13:33). 'With power' (whether traditional or Pauline) probably modifies the title 'Son of God' and not the verb 'declared' (Fitzmyer 1993: 235; Cranfield 1979: 62; contra NIV 'declared with power'), emphasizing Jesus' exalted status. ('According to the spirit of holiness' is a Semitism; cf. Ps 51:11.) It also might indicate that, at least for Paul, the resurrection enhanced an already existing sonship (Dunn 1988: i. 14). In citing Jesus' twofold pedigree, in flesh and in spirit, Paul makes the claim that Jesus is the anticipated Jewish Messiah—and more (as in Mk 1:1). It is Paul's expectation that these common (and apparently longstanding) Christian affirmations will be shared by his readers.

The phrase 'obedience of faith' (also mentioned in 16:26) is ambiguous. It may refer either to faith that is an expression of obedience or to obedience that is an expression of faith. Possibly, Paul intended both meanings. Clearly it is the bringing of persons to faith in Christ that is the primary goal of the Pauline mission. It is no coincidence that Paul can refer synonymously to the Jews' unbelief in 11:20 and to their disobedience in 11:31 (Cranfield 1979: 66). Elsewhere in Romans, however, Paul uses 'obedience' in the more conventional sense (5:19; 6:16; 15:18; 16:19). An interesting parallel occurs in 2 Cor 9:13, where Paul says that the Corinthians' generosity is an expression of their 'obedience to the confession of the Gospel of Christ'. The fact that Paul includes in this mission the Roman Christians themselves (v. 6) indicates at the very least that he is talking about more than the evangelization of Gentiles.

'Grace to you and peace' is the typical Pauline greeting (1 Cor 1:3; 2 Cor 1:2; Gal 1:3; etc.); it is also used in 1 and 2 Pet 1:2 and Rev 1:4). It elegantly combines the Christian word 'grace', charis (replacing the similar Greek greeting chairein; cf. Acts 15:23; 23:26; Jas 1:1), and the Jewish greeting 'peace' (šālôm). It thus incorporates both Gentile and Semitic as well as Christian and Jewish elements.

Thanksgiving (1:8–17)

The thanksgiving is used here, as in Paul's other letters, to express goodwill towards his audience and to remind them of (or, in the case of Romans, to establish) the terms of their association, matters that fall broadly under the heading of 'relationship maintenance'. The thanksgiving also serves to introduce the reader to key ideas and terminology, deliberately signalling the letter's overarching themes (see e.g. 1 Cor 1:4–9; Phil 1:3–11; 1 Thess 1:2–3:13; Philem 4–7). It is to the thanksgiving that one should look first for an indication of Paul's own sense of purpose in writing. (The exception is Galatians, which—not surprisingly, given its polemical edge—contains no thanksgiving.)

(1:8–15) Relationship Maintenance Strictly speaking, Paul is establishing, not maintaining, his relationship with the Roman Christians; nevertheless, he stresses that his interest in and concern for them are not new. He has long known of and prayed for the church at Rome and has been encouraged by reports of its faithfulness. Paul indicates his hope that he 'might at last succeed in coming' to Rome (v. 10). In v. 13 he states that 'I have often intended to come to you (but thus far have been prevented)'. Paul's journey to Rome is not an afterthought; his readers should not feel slighted. The reason for the delay is spelled out in 15:22–4: Paul's missionary activity in Asia and Greece (that is, amongst 'the rest of the Gentiles', v. 13) had only recently been completed. Rome, the natural destination of the 'apostle to the Gentiles' (Gal 2:7), is now fully in view.

The language of 1:1–15 is highly diplomatic. Paul balances assertions of his apostolic authority with statements concerning his regard for and reciprocity with the Roman Christians. Paul is not the founder of Roman Christianity and so cannot assume charge over it. It is worth noting, however, that even in Paul's own churches he had no real power. Paul could exercise authority only in so far as he could persuade his audience of his right to do so (the rhetoric of Galatians and 2 Corinthians providing the best examples; see Holmberg 1978: 193–204).

v. 14, instead of dividing humanity into 'Jew and Gentile' (or 'Jew and Greek', v. 16), on this one occasion Paul uses the standard Hellenistic categories 'Greeks and barbarians' (TDNT i. 546–53), which by this time had come to refer to 'all races and classes within the Gentile world' (Dunn 1988: i. 33). It is not clear whether 'wise and foolish' directly parallels 'Greeks and barbarians' (cf. the opposing conclusions of Cranfield 1979: 83; Fitzmyer 1993: 251). In either case, the point is made that the gospel transcends such distinctions. Paul is a 'debtor' (i.e. 'one under obligation'), presumably by his calling, to proclaim the gospel to all Gentiles, including, of course, the Romans themselves. It is less likely that Paul also meant to express his personal indebtedness to individual Gentiles (Morris 1988: 63). A further point is that even the most cultured among the Gentiles is in need of the gospel and (in the light of v. 16, immediately following) that the gospel is in no way threatened by human wisdom. (The contrast between earthly wisdom and divine power (v. 16) is especially prominent in 1 Corinthians, e.g. 1:18–19; 2:4–5.)

(1:16–17) Theme Paul advances now to a statement of his theme: God saves all (both Jew and Greek) in the same way (by faith) by the same means (the gospel), thus demonstrating God's righteousness (God's fairness and fidelity). As this statement indicates, 'righteousness' denotes something more than 'justice' (see Stuhlmacher 1994: 29–32). Dunn (1988: i. 41) terms it 'covenant faithfulness' and traces the idea to the Psalms (e.g. 31:1; 51:14; 98:2) and Deutero-Isaiah (e.g. 45:8, 21; 46:13; 62:1–2) (cf. Hays, below). In Rom 3:21–6, Paul returns to the idea that 'the righteousness of God [now] has been disclosed' (v. 21). How? Not by condemning sinners, as justice demands, but by justifying them, as God's character requires. In view particularly is God's covenant obligation to Israel (see 11:27, 29: 'And this is my covenant with them, when I take away their sins ... for the gifts and the calling of God are irrevocable'). The question of God's faithfulness (one might even say 'God's consistency') is at stake. God has worked salvation in Christ 'first' for the Jews (v. 16); nevertheless, many Jews have not believed. Does the fact of an increasingly Gentile church demonstrate either that God's plan has been thwarted or that God's people have been rejected? For Paul, neither conclusion is possible. Instead, he sets out to demonstrate that the righteousness of God is evident precisely in God's acceptance of Gentiles (chs. 1–8), and that the inclusion of Gentiles does not invalidate God's election of Israel (chs. 9–11).

The question, 'Has God abandoned Israel?', is long familiar to Judaism. At root, it is the question of theodicy, in this case, of the evident gap between God's promises and Israel's reality, felt most acutely in time of national defeat and occupation. Richard Hays (1989: 34–83) has demonstrated powerfully that Paul used as source for his reflections in Romans the prophets and lament psalms that dealt with God's apparent abandonment of Israel. It is striking that these materials are laden with references both to God's righteousness and to God's universal salvation (e.g. Ps 97:3 (LXX); Isa 51:4–5; 52:10). It should therefore come as no surprise that Paul initiates the argument of Romans with a quotation from Hab 2:4, which not only supplies key terminology for the letter (ROM 1:17) but does so in the context of a hard-won prophetic affirmation of God's paradoxical faithfulness.

The link to the remaining, paraenetic section of Romans (chs. 12–15) has been obscured by the Protestant inclination to consider justification in exclusively juridical terms. The notion that Christians are different from others primarily in their legal standing before God owes much to a traditional (Augustinian/Lutheran) (mis)reading of Rom 7–8. The Pauline meaning of 'justification' is much broader and evidences a quite different eschatological orientation (see ROM 8). The word dikaion ('to justify'; first used in 2:13 and then repeatedly throughout chs. 2–10) means literally 'to righteous'; it comes from the same root as dikaionunē, 'righteousness.' It means both 'to treat as righteous' and 'to make righteous' (Käsemann 1980: 25). In other words, God both forgives sin and converts sinners in 'righteousing' the unrighteous. The relational character of righteousness (e.g. seen as God's faithfulness to Israel, above) covers both being established and being equipped as a fit partner in right relationship (e.g. in 8:2–4). The same point is made by calling the gospel 'the power of God for salvation'. Thus, the entirety of Romans may be seen to be centred, in three parts, on the theme of God's righteousness:

Chs. 1–8	God's righteousness evident in the treatment of Jew and Gentile
Chs. 9–11	God's righteousness evident in the treatment of Israel
Chs. 12–15	God's righteousness evident in the lives of believers.

It is not required that one probe Paul's psyche to explain the statement in v. 16 that he is 'not ashamed' of the gospel. These words echo 'the very same prophecies and lament psalms from which Paul's righteousness terminology is also drawn' (Hays 1989: 38), e.g. Ps 24:2; 43:10 (LXX); Isa 28:16 (quoted in Rom 9:33); and, of particular note, 50:7–8: 'I know that I shall not be put to shame; he who vindicates me is near' (also recalled in 8:31–9).

v. 17, 'through faith for faith' (ek pisteōs eis pistin) is a difficult phrase to interpret. Most often, it is taken to refer to the exclusiveness of the requirement of faith (sola fide); hence the NIV's 'faith from first to last'. Because pistis can also mean 'faithfulness' (as in 3:3, its next occurrence beyond this section), it is possible that Paul had in mind God's pistis (faithfulness) which engenders, is manifest in, or is recognized by (eis, unto) human pistis (faith) (cf. Barth 1933: 41; Edwards 1992: 42–3). In support of this reading, one should note that the repetition of a word to play on its double meaning is a popular convention and that ek (from) used with the verb 'reveal' is most readily 'understood as denoting the source of the revelation' (Dunn 1988: i. 44). An even more important consideration is the content of the revelation: God's righteousness. Given the full sense of the term 'righteousness' (above), it is reasonable to imagine Paul saying that God's righteousness is revealed in (God's) faithfulness to (human) faith. 'The one who is righteous will live by faith' is a quotation from Hab 2:4. Here Paul made use of one of only two verses in the HB that link 'faith' and 'righteousness'. (The other is Gen 15:6, another of Paul's crucial proof texts; see 4:3; Gal 3:6.) Although many commentators support the NRSV's rendering, in which ek pisteōs ('by faith') modifies the verb 'live' (Murray 1979: 33; Fitzmyer 1993: 265), an equally strong argument can be made for the translation, 'The one who is righteous by faith will live' (see e.g. Käsemann 1980: 32; Sanders 1977: 484; Cranfield 1979: 101–2). ('Live' here, in contrast to Habakkuk, would refer to resurrection life.) After all, Paul speaks in Phil 3:6 of a contrasting 'righteousness under (en) the law.' Similarly, it is possible that pistis here, as in the previous verse (and the LXX of Hab 2:4, 'my faithfulness'), refers to (God's) faithfulness. Again, the double meaning may be deliberate.

God's Righteousness Evident in the Treatment of Jew and Gentile (1:18–8:39)

Surprisingly, Christ is mentioned only once (2:16, on the future judgement) in 1:18–3:20. Indeed, almost nothing is distinctly Christian in the remainder of the first and the whole of the second chapter of Romans. The background to these materials is Hellenistic Judaism; unquestionably, Paul's description of the human condition in vv. 18–32 borrows heavily from popular Hellenistic-Jewish descriptions of Gentiles. (The highest concentration of parallels occurs in the Wisdom of Solomon, almost certainly known to Paul.) Like Paul, Jewish apologists characteristically attacked Gentile idolatry and sexual misconduct. ('For the idea of making idols was the beginning of fornication', Wis 14:12; cf. vv. 22–7.) Some also claim that behind ch. 2 lies an otherwise unknown Hellenistic synagogue sermon (see below). It is reasonable to suppose that Paul used stock materials to construct a foundation upon which the more distinctive elements of his argument would be built. This strategy is reminiscent of his citation of the Christological formulae in 1:3–4, which served to establish common ground with his readers.

Beginning in 3:21–6, Paul returns to an explicitly Christian vantage point. Interestingly, the same paragraph reintroduces the theme of righteousness (vv. 21, 22, 25, and 26; like 'Christ', 'righteousness' is mentioned only once in passing (3:5) in the previous chapter and a half). God's righteousness has been disclosed 'through faith in Jesus Christ for all who believe' (v. 22). The work of Christ is characterized as 'a sacrifice of atonement by his blood' that brings 'redemption' to those who believe (vv. 24–5). But why is such a disclosure, such an atonement, such a redemption necessary? If Christ is the solution, what precisely is the problem? Clearly, it is the job of 1:18–3:20 to inform us. Specifically, this section functions to justify Paul's own summary in 3:22b–23: 'For there is no distinction, since all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God.'

1:18–32 All are without Excuse The structure of the argument in 1:18–3:20 is not obvious. Commonly, 1:18–32 is read as an indictment of Gentile wickedness and 2:1–3:20 as the extension of that indictment to the Jews (Fitzmyer 1992: 269–71). Paul's approach is probably more subtle. In a sense, 1:18–32 sets a trap for the imaginary Jewish interlocutor introduced in 2:2. The description of human wickedness seems to be aimed exclusively at Gentiles; it appears to assume the typical contrast between Jewish probity and Gentile depravity. Nevertheless, nowhere does Paul indicate that he is describing only Gentiles; indeed, the Jewish/Gentile distinction is not made explicit until 2:9. Moreover, elements of vv. 18–31 hark back to the darker moments and practices of Israel's past. It is especially likely that the worship of the golden calf (and perhaps the Israelites' subsequent revelry) of Ex 32 is in view. In Acts 7:41, Stephen referred to that incident and concluded, 'God... handed them over to worship the host of heaven'. Paradidōmi ('handed over') is the same verb used by Paul in vv. 24, 26, and 28 in reference to God's judgement. (The idea might go back to the OT passage quoted in the subsequent verses of Acts 7 (42–3), Am 5:25–7, which criticizes Jewish idolatry in the wilderness and speaks of God 'deporting/sending away' (metoikizō) the Jews to Damascus.) Also, Paul borrows language from Ps 106:20 and Jer 2:11, both of which deal with Israelite idolatry. Pious readers might accept God's judgement on conduct such as Paul describes, not realizing that they themselves stand under the same condemnation. Ch. 2 is written to make this point explicit.

v. 18, 'For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against... those who... suppress the truth'. For Paul, the problem is not that God is unknowable; the problem is that humanity does not want to know God (cf. Wis 13:1–9). Accordingly, the idol worshipper does not seek to do the will of God; he seeks a god to do his will. Creature dethrones creator, and cosmic order is turned upside down (v. 24). 'Threetimes (vv. 23, 25, 26) human beings are said to have "exchanged" or "substituted" one reality for another' (HBC 1136). God's response in each case is to 'give up' or 'hand over' humanity to its own desires (vv. 24, 26, 28). For Paul, sin carries within itself its own punishment (Achtmeier 1985: 40), and the sinner's most terrible judgement is to be left alone. vv. 26–31, while it is true that Paul saw the reversal of the created order manifest in homosexual relations, it is notable that his list also included such transgressions as covetousness, envy, boastfulness, and gossip. It would be difficult not to locate oneself somewhere in this catalogue—which, of course, is just the point. The knowledge of God that humanity suppresses is a moral knowledge. They 'know God's decree, that those who practise such things deserve to die', and still they disobey and even applaud the disobedience of others (v. 27). Humanity is utterly 'without excuse' (v. 20), especially the excuse of ignorance.

Of course, Paul's fictive conversation partner (see below) would not plead ignorance. But does a Jew's knowledge of God put him or her in a superior position? Can knowledge of God's law deliver from God's judgement? It is to such questions that Paul's description of the human condition in vv. 18–32 has been leading.

(2:1–3:20) The Impartiality of God Scholars since Bultmann have made much of the similarities between Paul's rhetoric in Romans and the diatribe, a form of argumentation in which a Cynic or Stoic philosopher taught students by 'debating' an imaginary opponent (Bultmann 1910; Stowers, 1981). Although some scholars question whether or to what extent the diatribe was an established rhetorical form, there can be no doubt that diatribe style is present in Romans (Fitzmyer 1993: 91). At numerous points beginning in ch. 2 (also 3:1–9; 3:27–4:25; 9:19–21; 10:14–21; 11:17–24; 14:4–12), Paul addresses and even responds to the objections of an interlocutor (most often with an impassioned 'By no means!' (mē genoito); 3:4, 6, 31; 6:2, 15; 7:7, 13; 9:14; 11:1, 11). The effect is to pull the reader into the 'conversation' on Paul's side. Rhetorically, the diatribe confers argumentative dynamism without ceding authorial control. It remains in the rhetor's power to choose what questions to ask and what answers to accept.

Because Paul's dialogue partner of 2:1–16 is not identified explicitly, some commentators have isolated this section from 2:17–3:20, in which Paul plainly addresses a Jewish interlocutor (Barrett 1957: 43; Morris 1988: 107; Ziesler 1989: 80–1). It is more likely that the whole of 2:1–3:20 speaks to perceived Jewish attitudes and that any ambiguity as to the object of 2:1–16 is expressly eliminated by the direct address of v. 17. Stuhlmacher (1994: 39) made the intriguing suggestion that Paul delayed identifying the interlocutor for dramatic effect; 2:17 thus functions like Nathan's statement to David in 2 Sam 12:7: 'You are the man!' (In fact, Ps 51, understood to be David's penitential prayer, is quoted in Rom 3:4.)

The juxtaposition in vv. 28–9 of the mere outward and the true inward practice of Judaism is preceded in passages such as Deut 10:16, 30:6, and Jer 4:4, 9:26, which use the 'circumcision of the heart' metaphor to describe those whose inner commitments are consistent with their (outwardly obvious in the case of males) status as God's covenant people. The truly surprising employment of Scripture comes in v. 24, which uses Isa 52:2 to argue that Israel itself is so disobedient as to be the cause of Gentile blasphemy. This is 'a stunning misreading of the text' (Hays 1989: 45). In fact, Isa 52 celebrates Israel's rescue from the injustices of the nations. (Israel has been 'oppressed without cause'; 'my people are taken away without cause', Isa 52:4, 5.)

Numerous other difficulties are associated with the interpretation of Rom 2, some of which bear significantly upon one's understanding and evaluation of the entire letter. The first, most glaring problem is the repeated assertion that one is justified (v. 13) or receives eternal life (v. 7) on the basis of one's deeds. (The notion that God equitably judges people according to their works is common in the HB; however, such passages do not have in view the issue of eternal destiny. In v. 5, Paul specifically quotes the LXX of Ps 61 (62):13 and Prov. 24:12.) This idea appears flatly to contradict Paul's numerous other statements that one cannot be saved by one's works (e.g. 3:20; 4:2; 9:32; 11:6). One way out of the dilemma is to say that Paul wrote only of a theoretical justification; in fact, he realized that no one actually measures up to the proposed standard. Others reason that when speaking of those who 'do good' (etc.), Paul 'is implicitly referring to Christians' (Fitzmyer 1993: 297). The first proposal seems heavy-handed; in effect, it trades coherence for consistency. The second notion, that the chapter approves only Christian good works, is certainly possible, although it does little to commend Paul as a fair-minded observer of human behaviour. Alternatively, Hays (1989: 42) has suggested that Rom 2 be read in the larger context of Ps 61 (quoted in v. 5), which 'renders an account of God fully consonant with Paul's emphasis on God's kindness and forbearance'. An entirely different approach is advocated by E. P. Sanders (1983: 123), who thinks that Paul made use of a source or sources ('homiletical material from Diaspora Judaism') that contributed the desired argument for God's impartiality (and Jewish sinfulness) but included elements strikingly at odds with Pauline theology (ibid. 123–35). In general, Rom 2 reads well as a sermon preached to Jews to encourage a higher standard of Jewish conduct. (Indeed, change 'Jew' to 'Christian' and 'circumcision' to 'baptism', and the text reads like a sermon exhorting church members to live up to their calling; cf. Mt 7:21–3.) It is noteworthy that Rom 2 deals with matters known to be at issue within first-century Judaism, such as the question of 'righteous Gentiles' and the nature of true obedience (ibid. 134).

A second problem concerns the description of Jewish sinfulness in Rom 2. In 3:9, Paul states that 'we have already charged that all, both Jews and Greeks, are under the power of sin'. Paul concludes that since Jews share the same plight as Gentiles, they require the same solution, namely, Christ (3:21–6). How does Paul make his case? Given the longstanding tendency of interpreters to read Paul as if he were an existentialist—that is, one concerned with internal states and interior conflicts (see Stendahl 1963)—the actual argument of Rom 2 is surprising. Paul does not say that while most Jews most of the time meet the external demands of the law (cf. Paul's larger claim for himself in Phil 3:6), they nevertheless continue to sin inwardly, for example, by being proud of their obedience. Such a critique would not be entirely new; something like it existed in the Jesus traditions (e.g. Mt 5:21–4, 27–30; 6:1–5; 23:25–8; Lk 11:37–44). That argument would put Jews and Gentiles on equal footing without necessitating that all Jews (or even hypothetical, representative Jews) be shown to be as badly behaved as Gentiles, which seems to be the point of 2:21–4. The lack of a clear conception or language of interiority is consistently problematic for Paul. Even Rom 7, which is usually read in this way, speaks of sin as an external power that causes one to do or not do what is right (7:15). Surely, the Jews of Paul's day were not characteristically thieves, adulterers, and temple robbers.

A third difficulty is that the obvious solution to the problems posed in 2:1–29 is that Jews simply become better Jews. If Jews commit sinful acts, repentance and atonement are available to them within Judaism. Damnation is neither the sole nor the expected alternative to perfect obedience. In this context it is worth noting that when all is said and done, Paul's one substantial and consistent accusation is that the Jews have rejected their Christ. What confuses are the numerous ways such rejection can be characterized (as disobedience, unbelief, works righteousness, etc.) and the numerous deficiencies to which it can be attributed (hardheartedness, pride, self-assertion, etc.). Apart from faith in Christ, no amount of Jewish obedience, faith, or humility is going to satisfy. However it is described, this by definition is a problem that cannot have a (non-Christian) Jewish solution.

The ground shifts in 3:9, where Paul states that 'both Jews and Greeks are under the power of sin'. This statement removes the possibility that, unaided by God, either Gentile or Jew could be righteous (contra 2:7, 13, etc., but consistent with 7:7–24). A compilation of OT proof-texts in 3:10–18 then describes humanity's utter depravity (Eccl 7:20; Ps 5:10; 10:7; 14:1–3/53:2–4; 36:2; 140:4; Isa 59:7–8/Prov 1:16). Thus the problem is not so much that humans sin as that humans are incapable of not sinning. Christ is necessary for Jew as well as Gentile because only he can break sin's power. This claim demonstrates how Paul's thinking could at times steer him in the direction of a realized eschatology (see ROM E. 4); Christians are now 'in the Spirit' and please God while others remain 'in the flesh' and cannot please God (8:3–8). This approach equalizes Jew and Gentile and so makes Christ necessary. One might object that this line of reasoning succeeds only by overstating the differences between believers and unbelievers, in particular, between Christians and Jews. Is it really the case, either in outward behaviour or inward disposition, that Christians as a group sin less than Jews? Are the rules of the church experienced so differently from the laws of the synagogue? Certainly, it would have been possible to argue for the necessity of Christ without negating Judaism as an instrument (or at least a prior instrument) of God's grace. Despite the demurral of 3:1–2, Paul's point is that with respect to the actual state of their relationship to God, Jews enjoy no advantage over Gentiles. One must ask, 'What then was the point of Judaism?' That question, in one form or another, is the central concern of the next several chapters.

(3:21–31) The Revelation of God's Righteousness vv. 21–6 are the capstone of Paul's introductory argument; Stuhlmacher (1994: 57) refers to the paragraph as 'the heart of the letter to the Romans'. Here Paul revisits the grand theme introduced in the Thanksgiving: the righteousness of God. The divine character—faithful, gracious, forgiving, and merciful—has been disclosed in Christ, specifically in Christ's death, a sacrifice for sin 'effective through faith'. Altogether apart from human initiative, God has done what God always intended to do ('attested by the law and the prophets') and so is proved righteous. It is instructive that Ps 143, quoted (v. 2, significantly emended) in Paul's statement of judgement in Rom 3:20, maintains that one is preserved by God's righteousness (Ps 143:1, 11–12), the very subject of vv. 21–6 (see Hays 1989: 51–2). Paul is deeply conscious of the interplay of God's condemning justice and God's justifying righteousness, already evident in Scripture.

That the death of Jesus decisively altered the human situation (described in 1:18–3:20) is assumed but not explained. Almost certainly, the language Paul used concerning Christ's atonement was common to first-century Christianity and required little elucidation. (See 1 Cor 15:3, where the statement that 'Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures' is included in the tradition that Paul himself received.) v. 25, 'expiation' (hilastērion: 'sacrifice of atonement', NRSV) probably has in view the Jewish sacrificial system. In the LXX, the same word is used to refer to the 'mercy seat', the top of the ark of the covenant, on which the blood of the sin offering was sprinkled annually on the Day of Atonement. It might (also) have as background the notion of the efficacious sacrifice of martyrs, as one finds in 4 Macc 17:22. 'Redemption' (apolutrōsis) originally connoted 'freedom by ransom'. In the NT, the word is used to emphasize a change in one's position that is effected entirely at God's initiative and expense. It does not require a literal 'payment' by God (e.g. to the devil), as sometimes featured in later soteriological speculation (EDNT 138–40).

v. 24, which states that believers are 'justified by his [God's] grace as a gift', captures a great deal of Pauline theology in a few words. Quintessentially for Paul, justification is gift, not reward (see 4:1–4; 5:15–17). It originates in God's mind, is motivated by God's character, and is 'purchased' by God's work in Christ. It is neither human invention nor human achievement; hence, it is gracious, unmerited. Obviously, it occasions no opportunity for human boasting (v. 27; see 2:17, 23; 4:2; cf. the 'positive boasting' in 5:2–3, 11; 15:17); one may as well boast of being born as boast of being justified. (Not surprisingly, boasting is a prominent Pauline theme, especially in 1 and 2 Corinthians, e.g. 1 Cor 1:29–31; 3:21; 4:7; 5:6; 2 Cor 11:12, 16–18, 30; 12:1, 5–6; cf. the favourable boasting in 1 Cor 9:15–16; 15:31; 2 Cor 11:12; 5:12; 7:4, 14; 8:24; 9:2–3; 10:8, 13, 15–17; 11:10; 12:30.) v. 25, the statement that God, in 'divine forbearance', 'passed over the sins previously committed' raises many questions. What does it mean to 'pass over' sin (from pareisis; lit. the 'passing by' = 'letting go unpunished'; see BAGD 626), and whose sins specifically have been passed over? Did God simply not judge former sins, or was their judgement postponed, perhaps until the cross? What evaluation of Judaism and of its sacrificial system lies behind this verse? Commentators have ventured answers to these and related questions, but no one account of the passage has proved persuasive. It is clear at least that Paul regarded the death of Christ as the one final and essential sacrifice, the basis for all human salvation. Paul does not provide us with enough information to judge how, to what extent, and on what basis he considered such salvation to have been operative in the past.

v. 26, it is essential to note that the faith of which Paul speaks in vv. 27–31 (and in Romans generally) is specifically 'faith in Christ' (see also 4:23–4). Although Paul may contrast works with faith and unbelief with faith, the unspoken and yet insistent polarity is between Jewish faith in God apart from belief in Christ and Christian (whether Jewish or Gentile) faith in God including belief in Christ. In other words, it is one's response to Jesus that ultimately is at issue, however the argument may be framed. Paul believed that God was in Christ and that to believe in God now means perforce to believe in Christ; the two 'faiths' are inseparable. Accordingly, it is only Christian faith that is legitimated as faith. (One can observe the same dynamic clearly at work in Johannine literature, e.g. in Jn 5:23 and 1 Jn 5:10–12.) Logically, this move eliminates the problem of present Jewish (but non-Christian) belief in God; it is not actual (one might say 'sufficient') faith. Thus Paul can speak of faith in God as if it were a uniquely Christian attribute. At the same time, this approach introduces a problem: what to do with pre-Christian Jewish faith

(that is, unless one claims that those such as Abraham and David, both commended in Romans, already believed in Christ). The press of this difficulty may well account for Paul's statement in v. 25 (above) concerning God's former dispensation of forgiveness.

In v. 27 Paul contrasts a law 'of works' with a 'law of faith'. The shift in the use of nomos (law) is curious and has led many to translate the word in this instance as 'principle' (i.e. the principle of faith by which boasting is excluded). Barrett (1957: 83) has argued convincingly that, for Paul, nomos occasionally 'means something like "religious system", often ... but not always, the religious system of Judaism'. Such an interpretation makes sense both here and at numerous other points in Romans. v. 31, Paul asks, 'Do we then overthrow the law by this faith?' As a Jew himself, Paul cannot answer, 'Yes'. The law is still God's law. There must be some sense in which Paul's teachings (which, let us not forget, abrogate certain specific commandments; e.g. Rom 14:14) actually 'uphold the law', perhaps the law rightly understood or the law in its deeper purpose. We do not have to wait long to discover something of what the apostle had in mind.

(4:1–25) The Example of Abraham Paul has just stated that he upholds the law (3:31) and that the righteousness of God, which he proclaims, is attested in 'the law and the prophets' (3:21). It is time to make good on these claims. Religious arguments, like legal arguments, often begin with an appeal to precedent. In most democracies, a lawyer can do no better than to appeal to the nation's constitution (and, thereby, to its founders). Constitutional interpretation is both the most basic and the most consequential matter of law. Generations of case law can be overturned by a single ruling of unconstitutionality. Paul makes his first and strongest argument by appealing to the founding figure of Judaism, Abraham. What goes for Abraham, he can assume, goes for all. God's covenant with Abraham is the core of the Jewish 'constitution', subsequent 'amendments' notwithstanding. Summoning Abraham to his defence is both an inspired and (in the light of the controversy in Galatia, which seemed to revolve around the interpretation of the Abraham story, especially the commandment of circumcision in Gen 17:10; see Gal 3) probably necessary strategy. The appeal to Abraham has the added benefit of preempting an opponent's appeal to Moses (see Gal 3:17). 'The promise ... did not come to Abraham or his descendants through the law' (4:13). According to one possible interpretation, Paul (see Rom 10:5) effectively rules 'unconstitutional' Moses' later understanding of the relationship between the law and eternal life (e.g. that 'the person who does these things will live by them', Lev 18:5, my emphasis).

The basic argument of Rom 4 is comparatively simple and direct. According to Gen 15:6, Abraham 'believed the Lord; and the Lord reckoned it to him as righteousness'. (What Abraham actually believed—namely, God's promise that he would have offspring—is not in view nor, naturally, is a consideration of what 'reckoning righteousness' might have meant in its original context.) Abraham was not, of himself, righteous; instead, because of his faith, he was treated (elogisthē: 'was credited'; a 'bookkeeping term figuratively applied to human conduct' as in Ps 106:31; 1 Macc 2:52; and Philom 18; Fitzmyer 1993: 373) as though he were righteous. His standing before God was a gift, not an attainment (see Rom 3:24). This occurred prior to the giving of the law, prior even to the requirement of circumcision. This first instance of human righteousness thus becomes the paradigm for all subsequent instances. It is very likely that Paul wrote Rom 4 with a view to popular Jewish treatments of the Abraham story that focused on the patriarch's obedient example, which in some cases even argued for his attainment of merit (e.g. 4 Ezra 9:7; 13:23). A similar reading is present in Jas 2:18–26, which may have been formulated to counter (possibly second-generation) abuses of Pauline theology. The two sides actually make different, not opposite, points. Essentially, Paul uses the Abraham story to answer the question, How does one get 'in' (e.g. right relationship with God)? Much more characteristically, the story is used in James to exhort believers (those already 'in') to behave in a certain way, in this case to demonstrate their faith by their actions. It is entirely possible to laud Abraham's good behaviour (e.g. in obeying God's command to leave his home, Gen 12:1) without implying that Abraham was thereby sinless or perfectly righteous, which issue was not under consideration. In fact, many contemporary Jews could have accepted Paul's basic point: like Abraham, one enters into covenant with God at God's initiative and by means of God's grace. The doctrine of justification by faith is not without Jewish antecedents; the real controversy concerns, not the necessity of faith, but the content or object of faith.

The fact that Abraham had not yet been circumcised (that comes two chapters later, in Gen 17) allows Paul to claim that Abraham is exemplar to and ancestor of all faithful persons, both Jews and Gentiles (3:9–12). As proof-text, Paul cites Gen 17:5 ('I have made you the father of many nations', vv. 17–18). Gentile Christians were for Paul (and probably for most other Jewish Christians) 'children of Abraham'. It is not difficult to imagine how such claims might have rankled with non-Christian Jews, how they could have been seen to threaten the integrity, ultimately even the existence, of Israel. It is likely that such claims underlie many of the instances of persecution recorded in the NT (see Gal 5:11 and 6:12).

v. 15, the sentiment 'the law brings wrath; but where there is no law, neither is there violation' is echoed in 5:13: 'sin was indeed in the world before the law, but sin is not reckoned when there is no law' (cf. the 'passing over' of sins prior to Christ in 3:25). It also anticipates the argument of 7:7–24 ('if it had not been for the law, I would not have known sin, v. 7). Presumably, the point is that 'law makes sin into transgression' (Byrne 1996: 158). Under the law, one not only sins, one sins with explicit knowledge that one is sinning. Paul makes no attempt to co-ordinate these statements with the earlier argument that Gentiles are fairly judged by God, having 'what the law requires written on their hearts' (2:15).

vv. 19–21, the quality of Abraham's faith is vividly described. Abraham believed God against all opposing considerations and contrary appearances. The final reality was God's fidelity: God would do what God had promised. The character of faith as trust is nowhere more clearly depicted in Paul's writings. vv. 23–4, the content of justifying faith is spelled out more fully: belief in God who 'raised Jesus our Lord from the dead, who was handed over (paredothē) to death for our trespasses and was raised for our justification'. This description of Jesus sounds formulaic and therefore traditional; ultimately, it is dependent upon Isa 52:13–53:12 (LXX), which tells of the Suffering Servant, on whom ‘the LORD laid (paredōken) our sins’ (53:6), who ‘bore (paredothē) their sin’ (53:12), who will ‘justify many’ (v. 11) (see Cranfield 1979: 251–2).

(5:1–11) God’s Reconciling Love as the Foundation for Legitimate Boasting Two verbs dominate this section: ‘boast’ and ‘reconcile’. We were told in 4:2 that Abraham had no ground for boasting before God. Similarly, 3:27 made the point that boasting is excluded (see also 2:17, 23). In Rom 5, however, boasting is neither groundless nor excluded: Paul boasts ‘in the hope of sharing the glory of God’ (v. 2), in ‘sufferings’ (v. 3), and ‘in God’ (v. 11). The difference, of course, is that here Paul is not, as in 2 Cor 10:13–15, ‘boasting beyond limits’, claiming as his own achievement something achieved by others. It is perfectly proper to boast in what God has done, rather than in what one has done for God (see ROM 3:24). And what God has done in Christ, according to Rom 5:1–11, is to reconcile (katallassein) humanity with God. ‘Reconciliation’ is return from alienation, the restoration of relationship. Its use here puts the divine–human rift in deeply personal (as opposed to exclusively forensic) terms, an estrangement that yields only to the prevailing power of God’s love (v. 8). The state of reconciliation is described in v. 1 as ‘peace with God’. Because reconciliation is achieved from God’s side and offered when most undeserved (v. 8), the believer possesses security in the hope of eternal life (vv. 2, 5) and confidence in the midst of earthly trials (vv. 3–4). Reconciliation is something about which to boast.

The claim to ‘boast in . . . sufferings’ (v. 3) is distinctly ironic and distinctively Pauline. For Paul, the paradigm of Christian existence, of Christian reality, is the cross (see ROM 8:4). One’s faithfulness to the crucified messiah is measured, not in gifts of power or wisdom, but in degrees of sacrifice and suffering (1 Cor 4:8–13; 2 Cor. 6:3–10; 11:21–12:21). Against the pretensions of the so-called ‘super-apostles’ at Corinth, Paul wrote, ‘If I must boast, I will boast of the things that show my weakness’ (2 Cor 11:30). Putting the cross at the centre of his thinking (the gospel is characterized as ‘the word of the cross’ in 1 Cor 1:18), set Paul outside normal religious expectation, including the expectations of many of his converts. To Paul, religion was not a means by which to manipulate heavenly powers to earthly ends. God’s locus in this world is disclosed in the cross, which is foolishness and weakness in human eyes (1 Cor 1:17–19). Therefore, Paul can boast in his sufferings, in the very absence of earthly rescue, in the knowledge that he travels in the footsteps of the crucified messiah, and that he will arrive someday at the place of Christ’s resurrection (where ‘hope does not disappoint’, v. 5). It is consistent with this perspective that reconciliation is a present reality (v. 10: ‘we were reconciled’ to God, aorist tense), but salvation itself remains a future hope (vv. 9–10, ‘we will be saved’). (The two are related by means of an a minori ad maius argument: if God has reconciled, how much more will God save.)

In their unreconciled state, humans are described as ‘weak’, ‘ungodly’, ‘sinners’, and ‘enemies’ of God (vv. 6, 8, 10), a portrayal that recalls the description in 1:18–32. That Paul would, by implication, refer to himself and to all other Jews as ungodly and enemies of God is astounding. A less pointed description, however, might undermine his argument concerning the absolute necessity of the atonement. It is because reconciliation with God is so entirely necessary and yet so utterly unattainable from the human side that it is so highly prized.

(5:12–21) Adam and Christ Paul found a prototype for the doctrine of justification by faith in the story of Abraham (ch. 4). He then characterized the justification won by Christ’s death as reconciliation with God (5:1–11). But how can Christ’s work, however meritorious in itself, save others? Can the actions of one individual affect the standing of all other persons? Yes, indeed, if that individual happens to be the archetype for subsequent humanity. In vv. 12–21, Paul turns to Adam as precedent (that is, by way of counterexample) for the universality of Christ’s atonement. If all of humanity shared in Adam’s disobedience, how much more (note, again, the a minori ad maius structure) may all humanity share in the obedience of Jesus, the very Son of God (v. 19; see also 1 Cor 15:45–9).

Paul argues on the basis of Gen 3 only that ‘sin came into the world through one man’. (There were of course two human players in the Garden drama. Eve has gone missing.) He does not propound a theory (‘original sin’) concerning the conveyance of sin, biological or otherwise, from one generation to the next. The proof of the ubiquity of sin is the universality of its consequence: death (v. 12; Gen 3:3). The resurrection of Christ thus overturns death introduced by Adam: ‘For since death came through a human being, the resurrection of the dead has also come through a human being; for as all die in Adam, so all will be made alive in Christ’ (1 Cor 15:21–2). The proper order of creation, lost in the Fall, is thus in the process of being restored (8:18–25). This two-part story is complicated by the mention of the law in vv. 13–14 and 20. Sin existed prior to the giving of the law, but it was not like Adam’s transgression, that is, disobedience of an explicit commandment. The law given through Moses served to increase culpability; humans again could transgress as Adam had transgressed (vv. 13–14; see 4:15). (One might note that, among other things, Paul’s argument ‘passes over the so-called Noachic legislation (Gen 9:4–6)’; Fitzmyer 1993: 418.) And, whereas Adam had to obey only one commandment, those living under the law have six hundred and thirteen times the opportunity for transgression: ‘law came in, with the result that the trespass multiplied’ (v. 20). In the light of 7:5–12, a minority of commentators have interpreted v. 20 to mean that the law was given for the express purpose (hina) of increasing (and not merely increasing the guilt of) sin (Murray 1979: 208). This would involve God in the deliberate promotion of sin which is, needless to say, a problematic assertion (cf. the relationship between the law and sin in 7:11–12).

Moses is a not accidental omission on Paul’s short-list of human archetypes. By situating the law where he does (v. 20, it ‘slipped in’—pareisēlthen—between Adam and Christ; see Gal 3:17), Paul indicates that Moses was not the answer to Adam. The law did not provide a way out of the human dilemma; quite to the contrary, it made an already bad situation worse. Whether or not it increased the incidence of sin (a debatable point, both exegetically and practically), it heightened sin’s sinfulness by exposing the deliberateness of human disobedience. The law could not give (eternal) life; it was participant in and not victor over Adam's 'dominion of death' (vv. 20–1). In the face of this stark portrayal, one could object that the law did function for many as a positive corrective and guide. A larger problem is that belief in eternal life post-dates Torah. If one enquires, like the 'rich young ruler', 'What must I do to inherit eternal life?' (Lk 10:25), one asks a question that the law is unequipped to answer. (Note that Jesus' own answer concerned doing, not merely believing, certain things.) A typical Jewish approach would be to assume that those remaining in covenant with God will inherit eternal life. Paul's answer really is no different, but the obligatory covenant is (i.e. the new covenant of 1 Cor 11:25; 2 Cor 3:6, 14, etc.).

(6:1–23) Dead to Sin and Alive to God Paul has just introduced the notion that there are two dominions, one of death, whose head is Adam, and one of life, whose head is Christ (5:21). The obvious conclusion is that believers now dwell with Christ in the dominion of life. But this cannot be the whole truth: believers sometimes disobey, and all believers die. In what sense and to what extent Christ's dominion is a present reality is the underlying issue in Rom 6. Paul's argument is organized around two questions: 'Should we continue in sin in order that grace may abound?' (v. 1), and 'Should we sin because we are not under law but under grace?' (v. 15). Paul's response is by now anticipated: 'By no means!' (mē genoito; see ROM 2:1–3:20). The first question is answered ontologically: 'How can we who died to sin go on living in it?' (v. 2). The believer has already died and 'walks in newness of life'. How? By identification with the death of Jesus in baptism (vv. 3–4). It is important to note that this identification is substantial, not moralistic; one actually participates with Jesus in his death: 'We know that our old self was crucified with him so that the body of sin might be destroyed, and we might no longer be enslaved to sin' (v. 6). Believers are a 'new creation' (2 Cor 5:17), a new kind of person who has the power not to sin (vv. 12–14, 18, etc.). (How this portrayal meshes with the description of the 'wretched self' in 7:14–25 is a major problem; see ROM 7:14–25.)

Of all NT writings, Paul's letters most pointedly exhibit the eschatological tension between the 'already' and the 'not yet'. The obvious counterpart to 'we have been buried' with Christ 'in his death' (v. 4), would be 'and we have been raised with Christ in his resurrection'. This may be the viewpoint of Ephesians (e.g. 2:1–6), but it is not the perspective of Romans. Although the situation of the believer has changed considerably, it has not changed entirely. With respect to the individual Christian, all references to resurrection and eternal life are future tense (vv. 5, 8). Believers 'walk in newness of life' (v. 4) and are 'alive to God' (v. 11); nevertheless, their experience of the 'dominion of life' is proleptic, not fully realized. Although they have 'died to sin' (v. 2), they may yet submit themselves 'to sin as its instruments' (v. 13), may once again come under the dominion of sin (v. 12). The tension between the two realities remains unresolved: humans by nature sin; believers by (their new) nature do not sin (cf. 1 Jn 1:7–2:1 with 3:6, 8–9; 5:18). Believers are human, but believers also represent a new (or 'renewed') type of humanity. One could lower the tension by diminishing the status of believers (that is, by moving towards a more exclusively future eschatology); however, such a change would thoroughly undermine Pauline theology. Paul sets the law and Christ as opposite means: what the law could not do, Christ has done (8:3). But if believers (Christians) are not substantially different from those 'under the law' (non-Christian Jews), then (by Paul's reasoning) Christ has failed. Why frame the argument in this way? Because of Paul's one overriding concern: the present equality of Jew and Gentile (see ROM 3:29–30).

Paul's second question also concerns the relationship between believers and sin. To paraphrase v. 15, Why not sin if sin is not judged? Are those set free from sin thereby free to sin? Paul answers that such 'freedom' is illusory. People are not transferred from slavery to sin into neutral, non-allied autonomy. Instead, they pass from one allegiance, one 'slavery' (to speak 'in human terms', v. 19), to another. Believers are slaves 'of obedience' (v. 16), 'slaves of righteousness' (vv. 18–19), 'enslaved to God' (v. 22). There can be no 'freedom' to sin, since sin itself is slavery. 'Grace and sin are to one another as "either" is to "or"' (Barth 1933: 217).

Paul stated earlier that death came through Adam's sin (5:12). vv. 20–3 make clear that all sinners earn death as their fitting 'wages' (opsōnion, v. 23). The language used to describe sin ('things of which you are now ashamed', v. 21) is reminiscent of the description of human wickedness in 1:18–32 ('shameless acts', 1:27). The alternative is holiness ('sanctification', NRSV) that leads to eternal life (v. 22). Something 'holy' is pure, consisting of only one thing (e.g. 'pure gold'). That believers are to be holy (or sanctified), to be one thing, is the point of the entire chapter.

(7:1–25) The Law and Sin A connection between law and sin was posited in 3:20, 4:15, 5:13, and 5:20. This is one of the most surprising and controversial claims encountered in Paul's letter, and it demands elaboration. The discussion in ch. 6, especially the concluding section on slavery and freedom, provides an opportunity for the reintroduction of the subject of the law and sin. The previous paragraphs considered reasons why believers should not sin. In vv. 1–6, Paul offers another: the believer has died not only to sin (6:3) but also to the law (vv. 1–4), which is itself a cause of sin (vv. 5–12). (On the question, 'Of what law does Paul speak?', see Fitzmyer 1993: 455.)

The marriage metaphor Paul employs is somewhat forced. The statement that 'the law is binding on a person only during a person's lifetime' (v. 1) aligns with the conclusion 'you [therefore] have died to the law through the body of Christ' (v. 4). But the one who dies in vv. 2–3 is the husband, not the wife (the believer). Is the law the husband who dies, the 'law' that governs the wife's relationship to the husband, or both? Despite the confusion, the point of vv. 2–3 appears straightforward: one who simply disregards the law (e.g. a married person who has an affair) may be judged a sinner ('an adulterer', v. 3), but one who is no longer subject to the law (a widow[er]) may not be judged by the law (may not be called an adulterer when remarrying). Someone reading 'you have died to the law... so that you may belong to another' might well ask, 'Who was the first partner—the law?' On one level, Dunn (1988: 369) is correct to say that the question is 'over-fussy'. The analogy makes a basic point and should not be pushed beyond it. On another level, however, the question is quite valid and reveals much about Paul's view of Judaism. Whose were those who lived under the law? Although the language is covenantal (i.e. concerning marriage), the prior covenant partner is not God. It is as though the Sinai covenant was made with the law itself.

The mention of bearing fruit in v. 4 fills out the idea in ch. 6 that believers have become 'instruments of righteousness' (v. 13), experiencing 'sanctification' to God (v. 22). God's will is not only the absence of evil but also the presence of good. Although some commentators have argued that 'bearing fruit for God' means 'begetting spiritual children', it is more likely that Paul is referring to the generation of good character and/or works (cf. Gal 5:22; Cranfield 1979: 336–7). Correspondingly, Paul refers to 'fruit for death' as the product of 'sinful passions' 'at work in our members' (v. 5).

v. 5, two new and very important ideas are introduced. The first concerns life 'in the flesh'. Up until now, 'flesh' (sarx) has been used to refer to physicality: Jesus was descended from David 'according to the flesh' (1:3); Abraham is 'our ancestor according to the flesh' (4:1; Paul returns to this usage in 9:3, 5). Now the term takes on board a decidedly pejorative nuance. (Paul's use of sarx is the subject of numerous scholarly studies; summaries may be found in TDNT vii. 98–151; Spicq 1994: 3:231–41; EDNT 3:230–3.) Being 'in the flesh' means being in the (ordinary if not 'natural') state of human alienation from God. The one in the flesh here is roughly equivalent to the 'the old self' of 6:6. While 'fleshliness' does include carnality (i.e. improper sensuality), its meaning is broader. 'Flesh' symbolizes 'the weakness and appetites of "the mortal body"' that were the causes of sin (Dunn 1988: 370; cf. 'sinful passions' here). The juxtaposition of flesh and Spirit (v. 6) does not evidence a true matter/spirit dualism, nor does it demonstrate that Paul was an ascetic (see Käsemann 1980: 188–9). With respect to the last point, one might note that while Paul himself was unmarried, he did not prohibit marriage, and at one point he even commanded married believers to continue sexual relations (1 Cor 7:3–5). Nevertheless, it would be fair to say that physicality was, if not denigrated, then at least held in some suspicion by Paul (cf. Rom 8:10). He might have allowed for Christian marriage, but 1 Cor 7:7–9, 28 is hardly a ringing endorsement. The second idea to be introduced in v. 5 is the notion that the law causes (not only exposes or increases the culpability of) sin (see Rom 5:13–14). The contention that dormant passions are 'aroused by the law' anticipates (one might say, necessitates) the discussion in 7:7–20. Much the same idea has appeared before, in 1 Cor 15:56: 'The sting of death is sin, and the power of sin is the law.' Law is the parental command not to raid the biscuit tin, an injunction that draws attention to and makes all the more desirable the very thing it prohibits. As the saying goes, stolen fruit is sweetest. Nevertheless, one might dispute whether law and sin are always thus related. Does prohibition inevitably increase desire, and does 'sinful passion' require a commandment to be stirred up? Moreover, are the commands that Paul so often includes in his letters (as in Rom 12–14) somehow excluded from this dynamic?

v. 6, the contrast between 'the old written code' and 'the new life of the Spirit' seems to be dependent particularly upon the prophecy of the future covenant in Jer 31:31–4. In contrast to the Sinai covenant ('which they broke', v. 32), in the new order the law will not be taught but rather will be written 'on the hearts' of God's people (v. 33). Paul calls the law, literally, an 'old/aged letter' (palaiotēti grammatos), a title conveying (in line with the treatment of the old covenant in Jer 31) both decrepitude and externality. But that's not all: the metaphor of slavery is picked up from the previous chapter and applied, not to sin, but to the law itself (see Gal 4:22–31). vv. 4–6 ratchet up by several notches Paul's already negative treatment of the law. The law is no longer just an inadequate solution to the problem of sin; the law itself is the problem. Has not Paul come to the point of equating the law, God's law, with sin? He answers, 'By no means!' (v. 7). It is not really the law's fault; sin is to blame. (That sin could be a responsible 'party' evidences a decided shift in terminology.)

The argument of v. 7 is familiar: the law makes known, discloses, sin as sin (4:15; 5:13, 20). The selection of the tenth commandment (against coveting, see 13:9) is intriguing since it is one of the few OT commandments to prohibit an attitude. It is here that Paul comes closest to locating sin in one's internal states (e.g. one sins by obeying the law for the wrong reasons or by being proud of one's obedience)—an attitude that generations of commentators have attributed to him. It may be that Paul's intuition drew him in this direction, but that he lacked the conceptual tools that would have allowed him to construct such an argument. Such speculation should be tempered by the fact that the idea, if present, is dropped in the next verse: sin now is an external power that acts on the individual. The 'wretched self' of vv. 14–25 is faulted for wrongful (in)action, not for wrongful thinking or feeling: 'I can will what is right, but I cannot do it... the evil I do not want is what I do' (vv. 18–19). A more likely explanation is that Paul quoted the coveting prohibition because he had in mind the temptation in the Garden (Gen 3:5–6; see the discussion of Adam below): "'For God knows that when you eat of it your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God, knowing good and evil.'" So when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was a delight to the eyes, and that the tree was to be desired to make one wise, she took of its fruit and ate.' In Rom 6, sin was objectified as a power to which one could yield (v. 13) and be enslaved by (v. 16). The anthropomorphizing of sin is extended in 7:8–23. Twice sin is said to have 'seized an opportunity in the commandment' (vv. 8, 11). The ultimate expression comes in v. 17: 'It is no longer I that do it, but sin that dwells within me' (repeated in v. 20). It is as though sin were a demonic being that overpowers and possesses humans. The effect is to exonerate the law: it is not the law itself that provokes transgression, it is sin's fault. Sin wrests control of the law and uses it as an instrument of death. The 'I' (as in 'it is no longer I that do it'), being 'in the flesh', is helpless before such an onslaught. In 7:14–8:8, it is this weakness (and not the law, which is 'holy, just, and good') that is the problem. The solution? Believers are empowered to fulfil 'the just requirement of the law' as they walk 'not according to the flesh but according to the Spirit' (8:4; recall again Jer 31).

Regarding Paul's treatment of the law in Romans, Sanders comments (1983: 76) insightfully that there is 'an organic development with a momentum towards more and more negative statements until there is a recoil in Romans 7, a recoil which produces other problems'. Among the difficulties: 'The law could no longer be said to produce sin or to multiply transgression as part of God's overall plan [the typical view in both Romans and Galatians], since the realm of sin is now considered entirely outside that plan' (ibid. 73). Moreover, God is now credited with having provided a means for attaining life (v. 10; see 10:5) that was incapable of succeeding. In other words, if the law was given to produce transgression, the law is linked to sin (against which Paul 'recoils' in v. 7); however, if the law was given by God to produce eternal life, it was doomed to failure by human weakness (or sin's power). But how could God's plan fail?

There are good reasons for thinking that Paul himself is not the implied subject, the 'I', in 7:7–26. (Compare the universalized 'I' in e.g. 1 Cor 13). Paul never lived 'apart from the law', 'the commandment' did not 'come' in his lifetime (v. 9), nor was he 'killed' by sin (v. 11). Moreover (and of considerable importance for the interpretation of Paul), vv. 14–25 describe a self-perception nearly the antithesis of Paul's own as evidenced in his letters (see ROM 2; Stendahl 1963; Sanders 1983: 76–81). The statement of Acts 23:1, 'up to this day I have lived my life with a clear conscience before God', is echoed in passages such as 2 Cor 1:12 and 4:2. The man who wrote, 'as to righteousness under the law, [I was] blameless' (Phil 3:6) and 'I am not aware of anything against myself' (1 Cor 4:4) did not suffer from existential angst. The assignment for Rom 7 must have been something other than autobiography.

The one character who qualifies on all counts to be the speaker in 7:7–26 is Adam (see Stuhlmacher 1994: 106–7), the archetypal human in whom all others sinned (5:12–21). Speaking as Adam, Paul can return to the initiation of 'law', the giving of 'the commandment' (v. 9) in the Garden: 'You shall not eat of the fruit of the tree ... or you shall die' (Gen 3:3). Writes Paul, 'The very commandment that promised life proved death to me' (v. 10). Instead of saving them from death, the prohibition was used to lure them to death. The identification with Adam also explains the radical anthropomorphizing of sin in this same section: sin is like the serpent that 'deceived' Adam and Eve (v. 11; Gen 3:1, 4), enticing them to covet the forbidden fruit. (They ate, desiring to be 'as God', Gen 3:5. Note the description of Eve's response in Gen 3:6.)

vv. 14–24, if Paul is speaking in the place of unregenerate humanity, especially from the perspective of Adam, it follows that these verses do not describe the situation of believers. This is not the way the passage is read by many scholars (e.g. Schlatter 1995: 160; Barrett 1957: 151–3), but it is the only interpretation that suits the chapter's larger context (cf. Dunn's (1988: 387–99) attempt to resolve the conflict in terms of eschatological tension). The status of the individual in Rom 5:12–7:6 is either/or: either dead to sin or enslaved to sin, either in the dominion of life or in the dominion of death. The same situation prevails in Rom 8: either one is in the Spirit or one is in the flesh (v. 9). The Christian anthropology of Romans is not an essay in grey. The fault of the law in Rom 7 is that it is powerless (as 8:8: 'those in the flesh cannot please God'); it makes no sense in the context of this argument that Paul would describe believers in terms of the problem and not in terms of the solution. If 7:14–24 is a description of believers, then what is 8:1–17? There is indeed a future 'edge' to Paul's eschatological perspective, but it is located elsewhere: the expectation of 8:10–11 and 18–39 has nothing to do with freedom from sin (already available to believers); Paul awaits freedom from sin's corporeal and cosmic effects.

v. 25, the final sentence ('So then ...') makes the best claim to be a description of believers since it comes after Paul's Christian thanksgiving (v. 24). Some have argued that the verse is simply out of order or that it was originally a marginal gloss. 'For it is scarcely conceivable that, after giving thanks to God for deliverance, Paul should describe himself as being in exactly the same position as before' (Dodd 1932: 114–15). It is striking that the individual is characterized as being a 'slave' to the law and to ('the law of') sin, both 'pre-Christian' categories in Rom 5–6. Moffatt paraphrases the verse: 'Thus, left to myself, I serve ...', which may capture Paul's meaning. At very least, one's assessment of v. 25 must take account of 8:1–7. The person in ch. 7 is 'with [the] flesh' 'a slave to the law of sin', but the believer in ch. 8 is 'not in the flesh' (v. 9) and is 'set free from the law of sin' (v. 2)! Therefore, it is possible in v. 25 that Paul describes a state to which believers may revert; it is clear that it is not the state in which he expects believers to remain.

(8:1–17) The Law of the Spirit Having described the dominion of death from which the law offers no rescue, Paul turns his attention to the alternative existence previewed in 7:6, 'the new life of the Spirit' experienced by those 'discharged from the law'. The description in 8:1–17 is rich and densely packed, containing numerous themes that figure prominently in other Pauline texts. Freed from the law, one lives beyond the reach of law's penalty: condemnation (v. 1, as in 7:3). A new system or principle, 'the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus' (in contrast to the old system, 'the law of sin and of death'), now governs the believer's existence. 'Life' has a double meaning that corresponds to the two ends of the eschatological spectrum: it is a new quality of existence already enjoyed (v. 10), and it is future, eternal existence with God (vv. 11, 13). The Spirit effectuates both forms of life: in the present, the Spirit dwells in believers (v. 9) and empowers them to fulfil 'the just requirement of the law' (v. 4) and to 'put to death the deeds of the body' (v. 14); the Spirit leads believers (v. 14), witnesses to them that they are God's children (v. 16), and 'intercedes' for them 'with sighs too deep for words' (v. 26). In the future, God will raise believers to eternal life through the same Spirit (v. 11). More than anything else, it is the Spirit that marks the dawning of the new age (the 'dominion' of grace; 5:21). According to Acts (10:44–11:18), the presence of spiritual gifts amongst Gentile Christians was the decisive consideration in their admission to the church. It is instructive that Paul's first argument against the Galatian Judaizers concerns the presence of such charismata amongst the Galatian converts prior to any law observance (Gal 3:1–5). (Note that Paul refers synonymously to 'the Spirit of God' and 'the Spirit of Christ' in v. 9. See ROM 1:1 above.)

v. 3, the idea of Christ's atonement, already present in 3:24–5 and 5:6–9, is reintroduced. God 'dealt with sin', something that law, allied to weak human 'flesh' (i.e. the powerless human will, as in 7:14–25), was incapable of doing. In the death of Jesus, God 'condemned sin in the flesh', that is, the condemnation of v. 1 was executed on Jesus, the only human (one 'in ... flesh') who was undeserving of such judgement. (He was 'in the likeness of sinful flesh', that is, he was human without sinning. Cf. 2 Cor 5:21: 'For our sake he made him to be sin who knew no sin, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God.' See also Phil 2:5–11.) As before, Paul is more interested in celebrating the atonement than in explaining its mechanics.

The difference between the two types of existence is explained from the human side as a difference of fundamental disposition or direction (vv. 5–11). One who lives 'according to the flesh' (vv. 5, 12; returning to the meaning of 7:14) has a mind set 'on the things of the flesh' (vv. 5–6). What constitutes 'the things of the flesh' is not specified, but it must mean something more than 'earthly concerns', such as the provision of food and clothing (cf. 'the deeds of the body' in v. 13). Such a mindset is 'hostile to God'; it does not—it cannot—'submit to God's law' or 'please God' (vv. 7–8). (As in v. 4, Paul assumes that believers are the only ones who 'do' the law.) The best explication of the phrase is found in Rom 1:18–32, which vividly describes human nature at war with God. The essential sin is idolatry, the devotion to something as god that is not God. Again, there is no middle ground, no accommodation, no compromise. Believers are on one side of the line and unbelievers the other.

By the logic of Paul's argument, believers should now have the power to do what the 'wretched self' of Rom 7 could not, namely, obey the law. Nevertheless, the 'just requirement of the law' (equivalent to 'the law of God' in v. 7) that they fulfil cannot be precisely equivalent to Torah since it does not include such 'optional extras' as circumcision (1 Cor 7:19). The use of the singular (to dikaiōma) 'brings out the fact that the law's requirements are essentially a unity' (Cranfield 1979: 384). For Paul, the will of God is present in but not circumscribed by Torah. The commonplace distinction between 'the spirit' and 'the letter' of the law is not far from what Paul had in mind (Rom 7:6).

v. 15, the mention of slavery recalls the discussion in 6:16–23 but also, more fully, Gal 4:1–9 and, especially with its connection to parentage, 21–31. 'Abba' (in Aramaic, an affectionate word for father) is associated with the prayer of Jesus (Mk 14:36); its presence in the Pauline epistles (here and Gal 4:6) is noteworthy. vv. 15–16 were key to Wesley's doctrine of 'Christian assurance', the idea that believers need not doubt their standing with God, being inwardly assured by the Spirit of their adoption (see also 9:1). Paul is careful to show that adoption does not imply an 'also-ran' or second-class birth-right; on the contrary, believers are fully 'heirs of God' and even 'joint heirs with Christ' (v. 17; cf. v. 29); that is, by identifying with Christ, they participate fully in the benefits won by Christ. Paul does not mean to imply that believers are equal in every way to Christ.

v. 17, the section concludes quite unexpectedly: [we are] 'heirs . . . if . . . we suffer'. This sudden shift to minor key signals the presence of the antagonist, death. Although sin has been overcome, its ravages, its legacy remain. ('The present time'—ho nun kairos, v. 18—is the label Paul gives to this 'time between the times'.) The comments made in connection with 5:3 ('we . . . boast in our sufferings'), apply here: for Paul, the shape of Christian life was cruciform ('we suffer with him'; see also Rom 8:4). True spirituality is dangerous and costly (1 Thess 3:4). Paul's difficult experiences with the church at Corinth (where he now writes) may well have prompted the inclusion of this amendment (cf. 1 Cor 4:8–13). 'Glory' and its cognates are used 180 times in the NT (cf. 1:23; 2:7, 10; 3:7, 23; 4:20; 5:2; 6:4; 8:18, 21; 9:4, 23; 11:36; 15:6–9; 16:27; see TDNT ii. 247–54; EDNT 1:344–9). The linkage between suffering and glory is typically Jewish (Stuhlmacher 1994: 132) and is made in a number of other NT writings (e.g. Lk 24:26; Eph 3:13; Heb 2:9–10; 1 Pet 1:11; 4:13; 5:1, 10).

(8:18–39) The Creation's Eager Longing To the woman . . . [God] said, | 'I will greatly increase your pangs in childbearing; | in pain you shall bring forth children | . . . ' And to the man . . . [God] said, | ' . . . cursed is the ground because of you; | in toil you shall eat of it all the days of your life; | thorns and thistles it shall bring forth for you; | and you shall eat the plants of the field. | By the sweat of your face you shall eat bread | . . . you are dust, and to dust you shall return.'

According to Gen 3:14–19, nature itself was corrupted by human sin and suffers sin's mournful consequences (see 4 Ezra 7:10–14). The 'peaceable kingdom' of Eden is no more.

The poetry and power of 8:18–39 betoken the magnitude of Paul's discovery: no less than Paradise returned. God in Christ is not saving individuals only; God is at the task of saving creation, of swallowing up Adam's entire loss in Christ's complete victory. What is the source of Paul's confidence? Christ's resurrection (of which Paul himself is a witness; Gal 1:16; 1 Cor 15:8), which is no less than the end of history placarded in the midst of history (1 Cor 15:20–6). The Garden curse, death, has been broken and remains only to be shattered.

As already noted, the reader comes upon the idea of suffering abruptly in v. 17, like fine print at the end of a contract. He or she may be left second-guessing: Is this 'inheritance' worth its price? Paul is quick to put matters into perspective: seen aright, present suffering is disproportionate to future glory. To know things as they are one must recognize the scope of the drama in which one participates and the scale of the denouement for which one hopes. Present suffering is not merely local; it is cosmic. Future glory is not merely personal; it is universal. All history turns on the events of recent years, all creation awaits their completion, and Paul and his readers are at the epicentre of both. In one sense, the weight of the entire cosmos is on their shoulders; in another, the entire cosmos cheers them on. Thus Rom 8:18–39 provides both explanation and incentive. One may better accept suffering if one knows its origin and anticipates its cessation. All the more, one may accept (even 'boast of', 5:3) suffering that advances some great cause. Rhetorically, 8:18–39 is not unlike the stirring speech delivered by (Shakespeare's) King Henry V to encourage his outnumbered troops to face the French at Agincourt ('We few, we happy few, we band of brothers', Henry V, iv. iii).

Paul says that creation (the natural world) is 'groaning in labour pains', an image that evokes both the curse (in God's words to Eve) and the promise of its reversal (new life). v. 23 captures the resultant eschatological tension: 'we . . . who have the first fruits of the Spirit [the Spirit's many benefits, mentioned above], groan inwardly'. Believers are now children of God (v. 14), possessing 'a spirit of adoption' (v. 15), yet they must 'wait for adoption, the redemption of . . . [their] bodies' (v. 23). It is interesting that v. 24 contains the only past tense form of the verb 'to save' (esōthēmen) in any of the undisputed Pauline epistles: literally, 'we were saved in hope.' Hope requires both object and absence. vv. 18–25 testify to a profound hope fuelled by the certainty and desirability of its object and the profundity of its absence.

v. 20, the identity of 'the one who subjected' the creation to futility is the topic of intense debate. The likely candidate is again Adam, the consequences of whose sin surely underlie the reflections of the entire paragraph. But did Adam subject the creation to futility 'in hope'? A variety of attempts have been made to get to grips with this odd phrase. For example, Cranfield (1979: 414) wrote that 'The creation was not subjected to frustration without any hope... Paul possibly had in mind the promise in Gen 3.15 that the woman's seed would bruise the serpent's head (cf. Rom 16.20)'. An alternative solution is to regard the entire phrase 'for the creation... who subjected it' as a parenthesis, and attach the final two words of v. 20, 'in hope', to the next phrase, as does NRSV (the original Greek text did not contain punctuation; where phrases or even sentences begin and end is by no means certain). Thus, v. 21 may complete the thought of v. 19: 'For the creation waits... in hope that [or because] the creation itself will be set free...'

It is possible that the phenomenon described in vv. 26–7 is the gift of tongues, which Paul describes in 1 Cor 14.15 as 'praying with the spirit'. The statement that 'God... knows what is the mind of the Spirit' could refer to the fact that tongues were unintelligible to the human speaker. (According to 1 Cor 14.3, the one speaking in tongues 'utters mysteries with his [her] spirit'.) It is also possible that 'unutterable groanings' (stenagmois alalētois, v. 26) refers, literally, to inarticulate moans. This interpretation takes into account the fact that vv. 26–7 assume universal applicability, whereas, by Paul's own account, all did not speak in tongues (1 Cor 12.4–11). On the other hand, it should be said that the second reading has more difficulty explaining the repeated assertion that the Spirit 'intercedes' on behalf of the saints. An unrelated issue concerns the degree of separation between God and Spirit in Paul's description (e.g. 'God knows what is the mind of the Spirit'; see Dunn 1988: 479–80).

v. 28 does not promise that only good things will happen to 'those who love God'. In the larger context of vv. 18–39, and the immediate context of vv. 29–30, the sentence probably means that the woes that characterize the present age, and the suffering of persecution in particular, cannot thwart God, who uses even these to accomplish the divine purpose.

Paradoxically, Paul assumes both that God predestined humans to a certain fate and that humans are responsible for that fate. Rom 9.14–26 shows that he knows the obvious objection—how can humans be held responsible for God's actions?—and that he does not possess a rational answer. Instead, he responds, 'Who are you, a human being, to argue with God?' (9.20). Here as elsewhere in the NT, predestination is not mentioned abstractly; it usually functions either as assurance (as in Rom 8) or as theodicy (as in Rom 9; really another form of assurance). The essential point is that, despite all appearances to the contrary (the 'all things' of v. 28), God has everything under control.

As was mentioned in connection with Rom 1.16, 'justification' in Romans combines two ideas: that God credits to believers the status of righteousness and that God empowers believers to live righteously. Both meanings may be present in

v. 29: it is God's purpose that believers 'be conformed to the image of his Son'. Certainly, this means sharing in future glory, being one 'within a large family' (cf. 1 Cor 15.20). 'Image' (eikōn), echoing the creation account of Gen 1 (v. 26), invites an additional and fuller interpretation, that believers already share the character of Christ.

The entirety of Rom 1–8 reaches its climax in vv. 31–9. Paul's speech is fittingly dramatic, harking back again (Rom 1.16) to Isa 50.7–8 (LXX; trans. Hays 1989: 59–60): 'I know that I shall by no means be put to shame, | Because the One who justified me draws near. | Who enters into judgment with me? | Let him confront me. | Indeed, who enters into judgment with me? | Let him draw near to me. | Behold, the Lord helps me. | Who will do me harm?' By way of encouragement to his readers, Paul wrote earlier of the disproportion between present tribulation and future glory (vv. 18–25). To the same end, he now writes of the disproportion between earthly appearance and spiritual reality. For believers, the one true indicator of their position is the love of God demonstrated in the cross of Christ. (v. 32 is especially poignant because it borrows language from the story of the binding of Isaac in Gen 22: 'you have not withheld your son, your only son' (v. 12); Cranfield 1979: 436. In Rom 8.32, God makes the sacrifice that even Abraham was 'spared'; note the verbal echoes of Gen 22.12 in Rom 8.32.) With this datum, the 'everything else' of v. 32 is assured. No condemnation is more persuasive than Christ's intercession, no deprivation, no sovereignty, no distance a greater reality. 'In all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us.' It is a glorious vision.

God's Righteousness Evident in the Treatment of Israel (9.1–11.36)

(9.1–5) Paul's Lament over Israel In first eight chapters of Romans the Protestant Reformers found the answer to their urgent question, 'How shall we be saved?' Ironically, their close identification with Paul worked both to popularize and to obscure Paul's distinctive theological contribution. In assuming common cause with Paul, they tended to project onto Paul their own struggles with disconsolate conscience and disapproving Catholicism. So Romans came to be viewed as a kind of personal salvation manual, a road-map for guilty, lost souls in search of a forgiving, gracious God. One consequence was the orphaning of the remainder of the epistle, especially chs. 9–11, whose interest in the fate of Israel was scarcely an ongoing or pivotal Christian concern. Recent biblical scholarship has been more successful at placing Rom 9–11 where it properly belongs, at the centre (or, rhetorically, at the climax) of Paul's argument. The concern of Romans is not so much to explain justification by faith in Christ as to explain how such a soteriological system upholds God's righteousness, especially God's righteousness towards non-Christian Israel. Thus, deprived of chs. 9–11, Romans would be gravely deficient; indeed, without reading to the section's surprising conclusion in 11.25–36, one might wonder truly if unbelieving Israel's present status does not expose 'unrighteousness on God's part' (9.14).

Moving from 8.39 to 9.1 is like walking off a precipice; having scaled the resplendent heights of ch. 8, one drops by a single step to the shadowy depths of ch. 9. 'I have great sorrow and unceasing anguish in my heart' (v. 2). Why sorrow if nothing is able 'to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord' (8:39)? Because it appears that Israel is not among the 'us', that Israel is alienated from God's love. This is an intolerable conclusion against which Paul mobilizes two basic arguments. First, he contends that now as in the past, only a portion of Israel has been elect or faithful; therefore, one ought not to regard the present case as being exceptional either from the side of God or of Israel. It is evident that this answer was not fully persuasive even to Paul. The word of God might not entirely have 'failed' (v. 6), but Jewish Christianity remained a disconcertingly small success. Paul's second answer locates the solution outside present history (and therefore beyond the thwarted historical means of the Church's Jewish mission): at the return of Christ, 'all Israel', even 'disobedient' Israel, will be saved (11:25–36). In this belief, Paul finds a solution to the problem of God's apparent unrighteousness: God, being God, must save Israel.

Paul's remarks in vv. 1–5 appear to reflect Ex 32:30–4, Moses' offer to be 'blotted out of the book' for the sake of the Israelites, who had 'sinned a great sin' in constructing the golden calf at Sinai. (The Sinai incident also might be in view in Paul's description of human idolatry and rebellion in Rom 1:18–32). Not long before, in 2 Cor 3:4–11, Paul explicitly contrasted (his) Christian ministry with that of Moses at Sinai. This same historical referent might have encouraged Paul to begin speaking of the 'Israelites' (v. 4 and more generally in these three chapters) instead of the 'Jews'. 'Israel' and 'Israelite' are in any case the terms better suited to his argument; they allow Paul to treat past and present Judaism as a whole, they signal continuity with previous 'covenant communities', and they provide the common conceptual thread that runs through a series of arguments concerning the identity of God's true people.

In 3:1, Paul asked, 'Then what advantage has the Jew? Or what is the value of circumcision?' His answer, 'Much in every way,' was ambiguous. The only specific instantiation was Israel's entrustment with 'the oracles of God' (3:2). In vv. 4–5, Paul returns to the question, this time offering a significantly longer list of privileges, the ultimate of which is to provide (by earthly descent, 'according to the flesh') the world with its Messiah. The most unexpected item in the list is 'adoption', which in just the previous chapter had a distinctly—and uniquely—Christian nuance (8:15, 23; cf. Gal 4:5). Presumably, Paul now refers to something different, most likely to God's 'adoption' of Israel in the Exodus (as in Ex 4:22; Hos 11:1). It is interesting to note how such points of continuity both strengthen and weaken Paul's argument. On the one hand, God's work of universal adoption in Christ may be seen to be consistent with (and therefore made credible by) God's previous action in adopting Israel; on the other hand, to the extent that Israel already is adopted, it ought not to require readoption. For this reason, when Paul defends the necessity of Christ, as logically he is forced to do, his argument must lean heavily to the side of discontinuity. Jews cannot have any actual advantage with respect to salvation if Jews and Gentiles are both equally in need of Christ.

The enumeration of divine blessings leads Paul into doxology: 'God, who is over all, is blessed forever. Amen' (v. 5). The original Greek text did not include punctuation, which makes it possible to translate the phrase appositionally, i.e. as an explanatory remark concerning Christ (e.g. the NRSV's '... the Messiah, who is over all, God blessed forever'). Despite Paul's generally high Christology (Rom 1:1–5), it is very unlikely that he would have referred to Christ as 'God over all'. Some commentators note by way of contrast 1 Cor 15:24–8, in which Paul states that Christ himself 'will also be subjected to the one who put all things in subjection under him, so that God may be all in all' (my emphasis; Dunn 1988: 535–6).

(9:6–29) God's Consistency Evident in the Election of True Israel Once again, the issue of God's righteousness is front and centre. 'It is not as though the word of God had failed' (v. 6). The 'word of God' refers broadly to God's promises to Abraham and through him to his descendants (see 4:13–25). Why might one argue that this 'word' had failed? Because comparatively few who now recognize and experience its fulfilment in Christ are Abraham's offspring. The Jews, who ought to be first and foremost, appear to be last and least (cf. 11:6). Has God's plan for Israel been thwarted? It cannot be so. Paul argues that the divine promises to Abraham were fulfilled by the election of only a portion of Abraham's natural descendants. God chose Isaac over Ishmael, Abraham's first-born. One might object that of the two sons only Isaac had the right of succession, being the sole child of Sarah, Abraham's wife. Such a protest is impossible, however, in the case of Abraham's grandson Jacob, whose elder brother was his twin (see Gen 25:19–34). The word of God was not frustrated by the 'failure' of Ishmael and Esau to obtain their natural birthright. It was through the second born, the true 'children of promise', Isaac and Jacob, that God's plan was fulfilled. The reference in vv. 27–9 to the remnant of Israel (Isa 10:22–3) makes much the same point (see 11:1–5): God's choice of a part of Israel is wellprecedented; so among contemporary Jews it is the Christian believers who are the elect descendants of Abraham. It is important to recognize that Paul does not maintain this position unvaryingly; in 11:25–32, he will argue for the salvation of unbelieving Israel based upon its continued election. ('For the gifts and calling of God are irrevocable', 11:29.)

Paul is not making the point that physical descent from Abraham in itself is insufficient to save. For Paul, lineage is simply irrelevant to salvation. Rom 9 harks back to the argument of Rom 4, where Paul stated that Abraham's true descendants are not the 'adherents of the law' but those who 'share in the faith of Abraham' (4:14–16). The contrast between 'children of the flesh' and 'children of the promise' in v. 8 sets up an analogous human-way v God's-way dichotomy. The major difference is that Paul's argument in vv. 6–13 only indirectly concerns Gentiles. (In v. 24, he will again include Gentiles explicitly as part of God's people, although he does not employ the idea of 'promise', as he did in Rom 4.) The issue is whether 'fleshly' Israel in toto is the Israel for and in whom God must be shown to have acted faithfully. For Paul, at least in the context of this argument, it is not.

v. 13, the severe statement 'I have loved Jacob, but I have hated Esau' (Mal 1:2–3; see HBC 1155, on the original, probably less extreme, sense of this verse) pointedly raises the question of God's justice (vv. 14–29). Paul's first answer (citing Ex 33:19) is that it is no injustice to be merciful, to treat some people better than they deserve. The issue is not God's just or unjust response to human goodness (v. 16); election is a gracious gift, not an achievable reward. Even the hardening of Pharaoh's heart (vv. 17–18) was done to advance the cause of God's salvation (Ex 9:16). Of course, things might look different from the perspective of Pharaoh or Ishmael or Esau. Granted that election is undeserved, why elect some and not others? The problem is intensified by positing a 'reverse election' in which God hardens the hearts of the wicked. How can God find fault for what God has caused (vv. 18–19)? This is a problem with a very long history in Judaism. The belief in the omnipotence of the one true God may lead to (or, inversely, may be guided by) the conviction that God exerts control over all human circumstances. Thus the Exodus narrative states repeatedly both that Pharaoh hardened his own heart (Ex 8:14, 32; 9:34; etc.) and that God hardened Pharaoh's heart (4:21; 7:3; 9:12; etc.). The same perspective is evidenced in passages such as Deut 2:30, Josh 11:20, 1 Sam 6:6, and—most poignantly in reference to Israel itself—Isa 63:17: 'Why, O LORD, do you make us stray from your ways and harden our heart, so that we do not fear you?'

God's omnipotence is affirmed by means of the potter metaphor (Isa 29:16; 45:9–13; Jer 18:6; Wis 15:7). The potter has sovereign right over the clay, not the reverse. It is significant that Paul links this idea to a statement about God's unexpected patience towards the wicked (vv. 22–3; see Wis 11:21–12:22). If God is both just and powerful (as powerful as a potter over a lump of clay), why do the wicked exist, much less flourish? The assertion of God's omnipotence underlies all theodicy; if God controls human action, then human evil itself must originate in God. Negating this conclusion requires a limiting of God's omnipotence (often imagined as a divine self-limitation: here, for example, judgement is forestalled temporarily by God's patience; see also 2:4; Neh 9:30; 1 Pet 3:17; and 2 Pet 3:9, 15). The problem is as old as the book of Job and remains as intractable. Paul's answer is reminiscent of that of Job's latter chapters: 'Who indeed are you, a human being, to argue with God?' Logically, this is no answer at all; instead, it is a roundabout affirmation that God can be trusted. This faithful God indeed has done what was promised, calling a people out from among Gentiles (vv. 25–6) and Jews (vv. 27–9) alike. In sum, if much of 'natural' Israel is not included in true Israel, it cannot mean that God has failed. Then whose fault is it?

(9:30–10:21) Israel's Failure Explained In a sense, 9:6–29 explained Jewish unbelief 'from above', that is, from the perspective of God's purpose and election. What follows is an explanation 'from below', an account of Israel's response and hence responsibility. Several of Paul's statements in this section are difficult to untangle, but the essential point seems clear enough: Gentiles happened effortlessly upon righteousness by believing the proclamation concerning Christ. Jews, who had worked diligently to be righteous, have rejected faith in Christ, the only thing able to make them truly righteous. For this error they have no excuse.

The meaning of 'righteousness' is fundamental to this passage and has been the subject of intense debate (see Ziesler 1989: 251–2). In large part, the problem arises because Paul uses the term in a distinctly new, Christian sense, even in reference to Judaism. Writes Sanders (1977: 544), Righteousness in Judaism is a term which implies the maintenance of status among the group of the elect; in Paul it is a transfer term. . . . Thus when Paul says that one cannot be made righteous by works of law, he means that one cannot, by works of law, 'transfer to the body of the saved.' When Judaism said that one is righteous who obeys the law, the meaning is that one thereby stays in the covenant.

Within Judaism, one did not obey the law in the hope of transferring from one people (unrighteous, unsaved) to another (righteous, saved). Paul's faith/law antithesis presupposes that Jews were trying (and failing) by means of the law to attain a status ('righteous' = being 'saved') that could be conferred only by faith in Christ. Thus the juxtaposition of law and Christ as rival means of salvation is problematic; normally, the two serve different functions in different systems. From the side of Judaism, it is an apples-and-oranges comparison; however, from Paul's side, with the controversy at Galatia fresh in mind, the opposition between faith in Christ and works of the law was as straightforward as the distinction between chalk and cheese (see ROM E.3). One should note how readily and frequently a difference in theological nuance or emphasis is transformed polemically into an antithesis. A modern example is the contention on the part of some conservative Christians that unlike other churchgoers, they do not practise 'religion' but rather experience a 'relationship' with God. Outsiders might regard the religion/relationship antithesis as quite odd: even the most experientially oriented Christianity is still a religion; certainly others (including other Christians) affirm relationship with God. For insiders, however, the dichotomy helps to account for the existence of (so-called) Christians who reject the group's distinctive claims. Such persons can be dismissed as 'unbelievers' who strive misguidedly through 'religion' to know God. Similarly, Jews who for varying reasons reject Christian claims can be depicted as formalistic law-keepers without faith. In either case, what is offered is an insider's account of the rejection of those outsiders who ought to know better.

Paul's first explanation of Israel's fault, in vv. 31–2, is notoriously ambiguous. One might have expected Paul to say that 'Israel had pursued but did not achieve righteousness' (Cranfield 1979: 507). Instead, Paul wrote that Israel 'pursued a law of righteousness' but 'did not arrive at' (or 'attain') 'law'. The meaning of 'law', 'righteousness', 'law of righteousness', and 'attain law' in v. 31 have been debated extensively with no resulting consensus. It is not even clear whether it was the 'pursuit' of law itself or the inability to 'attain' ('catch up with', Fitzmyer 1993: 577) law that Paul faults. If the former, Paul might be saying that Israel's pursuit of 'legal righteousness' could not lead them to the law's true goal (as possibly in 10:4). If the latter, Paul might mean that Israel attempted but failed to live righteously according to the precepts of the law. In either case, succeeding verses make clear that the actual fault of the Jews is their unbelief in Christ, whom they insensibly overlooked (10:2–3), over whom they have stumbled (9:32–3, a combination of Isa 8:14 and 28:16; the same idea is repeated in 11:9–12; 1 Cor 1:23; and 1 Pet 2:6–8). As a result, they are characterized as being unsaved (10:1), 'disobedient and contrary' (10:21), 'broken off', 'cut off', 'fallen' (11:19, 22), and 'hardened' (11:7, 25). Their only hope is to 'submit to God's righteousness' (10:3), which means specifically to believe in (10:4, 9, 11; 11:20, 23), call upon (10:13), and confess (10:9–10) Christ.

Phil 3:2–9 is a close parallel to Rom 10:1–4 and helps to clarify Paul's distinction between the Jews' 'own righteousness' and the righteousness imparted by God through Christ. In Phil 3:6, Paul says that 'as to righteousness under the law', he was 'blameless', a statement in tension with the interpretation of 9:31 that suggests that the Jews erred by failing to attain just such a status. In Phil 3, 'one's own' righteousness 'under the law' is rejected not because of its unattainability but because of its inferiority. Rom 10:1–4 may be much closer to this sentiment than is Rom 1–7. While it is not stated whether persons may succeed at 'establishing their own' righteousness, it is clear that their attempt to do so misses the point. Another, superior kind of righteousness exists, in the face of which the lesser righteousness is only a distraction. Put differently, the problem is this: Judaism is experienced as a complete, self-contained religious system that does not appear to require faith in Christ. One can be a superlative ('zealous', Phil 3:6; Gal 1:14; Rom 10:2) Jew—the pre-Christian Paul is Paul's own pre-eminent example—and still be on the wrong side of the line. Essential for Paul is the belief that Judaism without Christ is unfinished, that the law itself points to Christ as its ultimate goal and fulfilment (v. 4, telos, probably in the sense both of intention and termination; Barrett 1957: 197). Paul's characterization of Judaism's incompleteness varies; Paul's conviction of its incompleteness does not.

Considerable debate has arisen over the relationship between the key vv. 5 and 6, focusing on the force of de ('but') at the beginning of the second sentence. If de signals a strong contrast (again, between two forms of righteousness), then Paul is stating quite boldly that Moses was wrong to assert that one could 'live' (in Paul's usage, the word probably refers to resurrection life; see Rom 1:17) by doing the law. In favour of this interpretation one may cite Gal 3:12, which quotes Lev 18:5 to similar effect: Moses' words prove that 'the law does not rest on faith' but on 'works'. One way of diminishing the contrast between the two verses is to take the reference to 'live' in v. 5 in its original sense, referring not to eternal life but rather to 'life sustained by God... in accordance with the... law' (Dunn 1988: 612). But Rom 7:10 speaks of the commandment 'that promised' but could not deliver 'life'; there (as possibly in 10:5–6) it is not a question of two kinds of life but of two means, one failed and the other successful, of attaining the one true, eternal life. Other interpreters find continuity, not contrast, in Paul's statements. For example, Hays (1989: 75–7) has argued that vv. 6–13 explain v. 5 by indicating what 'things' one must do in obedience to the law to find eternal life: namely, confessing, believing, and calling upon Christ. This view may be supported by the fact that Paul's second quotation, which helps to establish the principle that 'righteousness comes from faith', is also from 'Moses' (Deut 30:12–14, followed by citations of Isa 28:16 and Joel 2:32). It is instructive that those who do and those who do not see a contrast between vv. 5 and 6 link Paul's argument to v. 4

(Christ as telos) in essentially opposite ways: the former emphasizes Christ as the law's termination, the latter Christ as the law's goal.

Paul's first two elaborations on Deut 30:12–14 ('that is, to bring Christ down', 'that is, to bring Christ up from the dead', 10:6–7) provide 'a scriptural exclusion of any contemplation of the kind of human effort the rival mode of righteousness would involve' (Byrne 1996: 318). One need not, indeed cannot, do what God has done in Christ. The common obligation of Jews and Greeks is only to 'believe', 'confess', and 'call on the name of the Lord'.

10:14–17, Paul returns to the matter of Israel's fault. Can it be that Israel's unbelief is occasioned by simple ignorance? Do they fail to call on Christ because they have not heard 'the word of Christ' (vv. 17–18)? The 'good news' (Isa 52:7) has been delivered to them, but the report has not been received (also preceded in Isaiah: the nearby 53:2). Paul concludes his argument by offering scriptural warrant for the situation described in 9:30–1. Gentiles 'who are not a nation', 'who did not seek' God, have found God (Deut 32:21; Isa 65:1). By contrast, Israel is a 'disobedient and contrary people' to whom God's hands have been extended in vain (Isa 65:2). Thus, Paul would lay Israel's fault, its unbelief in Christ, at Israel's own feet.

(11:1–36) God's Plan for Israel Once again, Paul advances his argument with a rhetorical question concerning God's faithfulness and constancy. 'Has God rejected his people?' vv. 1–10 reiterate the answers provided in ch. 9. That only a remnant of physical Israel is true Israel is preceded in Jewish history, in this case, in the example of Elijah and the seven thousand (1 Kings 19). God has not spurned this Israel, that is, the portion of Israel 'whom he foreknew' (v. 2) and elected (v. 7). Again, Paul speaks of God graciously choosing some and of God hardening others (vv. 5–7; see 9:6–18), which Paul again defends by means of scriptural citation (vv. 8–10; Deut 29:4; Isa 29:10; Ps 69:22–3; see 9:17, 25–9; cf. the similar use of Isa 6:9–11 in both the synoptic tradition, e.g. Mk 4:12, and John, e.g. Jn 12:40).

v. 11, the shift in Paul's argument here is immensely important. Imagine that chs. 9–11 had ended at 11:10: 'let their eyes be darkened so that they cannot see, and keep their backs forever bent'. In that case, Paul might with good reason be regarded as a thoroughgoing Christian supersessionist. 'Israel failed to obtain what it was seeking' (v. 7), and so Israel has been set aside in favour of the church. The fact that Paul has been read this way for centuries amply demonstrates that Rom 11:11–36 has not been given its due weight as the conclusion and climax, not only of Rom 9–11, but of the argument begun in 11:16–17 concerning the righteousness of God. Paul asks, 'Have they stumbled so as to fall?' For the first time, the possibility is raised of a future change in Israel's status. Their present 'stumbling' is not to be interpreted as a permanent 'fall'. As much as Paul wanted to justify the present reality (e.g. through talk of an elect remnant), he could not accept that reality as permanently justifiable. Here at last Paul offers a strong answer to the persistent question concerning God's faithfulness towards Israel.

In conventional Jewish eschatological expectation, Israel would first be restored, and then into that redeemed Israel would stream believing Gentiles (e.g. Isa 2:1-4; 42:1-9; 49:55:4-5; 60:1-7; 66:18-23). Paul reveals this 'mystery' (v. 25): Jewish obduracy has led to a reversal of the eschatological timetable. Now is the period of Gentile inclusion: 'through their stumbling salvation has come to the Gentiles' (v. 11); 'their stumbling means riches for the world' (v. 12); 'their rejection is the reconciliation of the world' (v. 15); 'you (Gentiles) were once disobedient to God but have now received mercy because of their [the Jews'] disobedience' (v. 30, my emphasis). Precisely what Paul believed happened (or could have happened in its place) is not clear. He might have imagined that Christ would have returned already had the mission to Israel succeeded. It is worth noting that the same train of thought is evident in Acts: the Jews are given a chance to repent with the promise of Christ's return (e.g. 3:17-21); increasingly, they reject the apostles' message, resulting ultimately in the martyrdom of Stephen (ch. 7), a direct consequence of which is the spread of Christianity to the Gentiles (11:19-26). This same pattern—Jewish rejection leading to Gentile opportunity—occurs repeatedly in the accounts of Paul's missionary activity in Acts (e.g. 13:13-52; 18:1-8; 28:17-28).

v. 25, the period of Gentile evangelization is impermanent: 'a hardening has come upon part of Israel, until the full number of the Gentiles has come in'. After the mission to the Gentiles is complete, God will act to bring faith to Israel and to complete the eschatological drama: 'So all Israel will be saved; as it is written, "The Deliverer will come from Zion, he will banish ungodliness from Jacob"; "and this will be my covenant with them when I take away their sins"' (vv. 26-7, quoting Isa 59:20-1; 27:9). 'What will their acceptance be but life from the dead!' (v. 15). Interestingly, the author of Luke-Acts also maintains the expectation of a Jewish restoration following the Gentile mission (e.g. Acts 1:6-7; cf. the periodization of history in Lk 21:24: 'Jerusalem will be trampled on by the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled,' my emphasis). Unfortunately, NT scholarship often has overlooked the presence of these ideas in Romans as well as in Luke-Acts.

So, when all is said and done, God's election of 'all Israel' stands (cf. 'full inclusion' in v. 12), and God's righteousness is vindicated (vv. 29-32). No details are offered concerning the constitution of 'all Israel'. (All Jews at all times? All Jews present at Christ's return? Cf. Sanday and Headlam (1980: 335): "'Israel as a whole, Israel as a nation," and not... necessarily including every individual Israelite.') At very least, it is clear that this group includes many if not all who are now, from Paul's perspective, 'disobedient' (vv. 30-1) 'ungodly' (v. 26, a stunning characterization), and even 'enemies of God' (v. 28). Unlike Gal 6:16, there is no possibility here that Paul is referring to the church as ('spiritual') Israel. Ch. 11 contains two hints as to the means of Israel's eventual salvation. In vv. 11 and 14 Paul returns to a point made by his earlier quotation of Deut 32:21 (10:19): Israel will become jealous of the Gentile believers and repent. Perhaps this is sufficient means to win some to faith in Christ (11:13-14)—but 'all Israel'? That will be accomplished by God directly (v. 23), apparently in anticipation or consequence of Christ's return (v. 26; note the eschatologically oriented vv. 12 and 15). More than that Paul does not say.

vv. 17-24, Paul's understanding of the relationship between Gentile believers and Israel is explicated by means of the olive tree metaphor. The Gentiles have no true root in themselves; they are wild branches grafted into an already existing, carefully cultivated olive tree. True, they now occupy the place of natural olive branches (Jews) pruned because of their fruitlessness (their unbelief), but they have no cause to be proud. The present situation is temporary: natural branches will be grafted back in, and some wild branches may yet be 'broken off'.

It should be said that the 'mystery' revealed in 11:11-32 does not follow logically from 11-11:10. Stopping at 11:10, one would conclude that only a small remnant of Israel is or ever will be saved. The church's mission to the Jews failed, and that is that. But present appearances belie ultimate realities (cf. 8:31-9). The resolution to Paul's 'sorrow and unceasing anguish' (9:2) is found at length in his trust in the eschatological triumph of God's righteousness. The issue finally is decided, not by reason, but by faith.

Fittingly, Paul's disclosure of the divine plan leads him to doxology (vv. 33-6), an expression of awe at the greatness of God who uses even 'disobedience' to produce 'mercy' (vv. 30-1). Of course, it is not God's inscrutability or power alone that compels Paul's adoration; above all, it is God's righteousness that is proved in God's 'ways' and 'judgments'. In coming to understand God's mysterious plan for Israel, Paul has looked behind the veil and glimpsed 'riches', 'wisdom', and 'knowledge' beyond human calculation. Paul's 'hymn of adoration' (Dunn 1988: 697) crowns chs. 9-11 in much the way that 8:31-9 concluded chs. 1-8. Both passages affirm with rhetorical beauty and force the apostle's trust in God's trustworthiness. Disputation at an end, Paul points to God's future, believes in God's triumph, and worships.

The Righteousness of God Evident in the Lives of Believers (12:1-15:13)

(12:1-2) Introduction: The Renewal of Your Minds

At 12:1, Romans turns from the conceptual and argumentative to the practical and didactic. This is a shift towards more typical Pauline content; anyone familiar with Paul's Corinthian, Philippian, or Thessalonian correspondence should feel at home in the ethical exhortations of chs. 12-15. Of course, Paul here writes to a church that he neither founded nor visited, a fact evidenced by the fairly general nature of his paraenesis (see ROM c, on the lack of contingency in Romans).

Paul has laboured to defend God's righteousness, in part through attributing to believers a righteousness unrealized by the now antiquated means of law obedience. But it is one thing to speak loftily of fulfilling 'the just requirement of the law' by 'walking according to the Spirit' (8:2-4); it is quite another to mark out the steps for such a journey. What does this new righteousness look like in everyday practice? Paul provides an illustrative, not exhaustive, answer in these few chapters.

God's extraordinary mercy was described in 11:30-2. What then is the fitting ('logical', logikos) human response ('service' or 'worship', latreia, 12:1)? It is to present oneself wholly to God, from whom and through whom and in whom are all things (11:36). Offering 'your bodies a living sacrifice' con-notes giving oneself continuously and entirely. Any lesser response misprizes the greatness of God's own offering.

The eschatological context of Pauline ethics is immediately evident. v. 2 begins, literally, 'Do not be conformed to this age.' Paul vividly characterized the old order in Rom 1:18–32; humans had 'became futile in their thinking, and their senseless minds were darkened' (1:21). The new, eschatological righteousness overmasters humanity's ancient, fallen nature: believers experience a 'renewal of... [their] minds, so that... [they] may discern what is the will of God—what is good and acceptable and perfect' (12:2b). For Paul, it is no less than a return, a 'conforming' to the original order, the re-creation of human minds not 'subjected to futility' (8:20; cf. 'new creation' in Gal 6:15; 2 Cor 5:17). Paul does not expect his readers to obtain such an exalted capability on their own. Rather, he believes that as possessors of the Spirit, they are already equipped to live lives 'holy and acceptable to God' (12:1; see 8:1–17). Paul asks only that they be what they truly are: righteous.

(12:3–21) Exhortations for the Christian Community It is obvious that the recent Galatian controversy influenced Paul's discussion of the law in Rom 1–8. Less noticed is the impact of Paul's difficulties with the church at Corinth upon Rom 12–15. Note that Paul's first exhortation is to humility and Christian unity—not surprising, as he writes from Corinth, the native habitat of spiritual pride and factional division (see 1 Cor 1–4). It is a sermon well rehearsed: vv. 3–8 are closely paralleled by 1 Cor 12:12–28. A major difference is the list of gifts in vv. 6–8, which is more mundane than that found in 1 Cor 12:28. (Rom 12 includes gifts of exhortation, generosity, and compassion but not deeds of power, healings, and tongues. In Romans the gifts are not linked specifically to the activity of the Spirit, and the corporation of Christians is not referred to as 'the body of Christ.') Paul again counters disunity by challenging individual status seeking, but, outside of Corinth, he does not locate the problem specifically in the flaunting of spiritual gifts.

The listing of maxims, as in vv. 9–21, is characteristic of ancient paraenesis and is a feature commonly found near the conclusion of Paul's letters (e.g. 1 Thess 5:12–22; Phil 4:4–9). Probably Paul draws from no one source but rather from the broad stream of Christian ethical teaching, incorporating elements of the Jesus tradition, Jewish wisdom literature, and Graeco-Roman philosophy (Byrne 1996: 375). A unifying element is supplied by v. 9a: 'love is genuine' (anupokritos; lit. unhypocritical). (Contrary to NRSV, there is no imperative verb.) The discussion of the body of Christ in 1 Cor 12 was also followed (in the justly celebrated ch. 13) by an appeal to agapē, love. It is love alone that curbs self-assertion and so makes unity possible (Phil 2:2; 1 Pet 3:8). Accordingly, the whole of vv. 9b–13 is sometimes read as a description of 'unhypocritical love in action' (Achteimer 1985: 198). Perhaps this is too tidy a summarization of Paul's wide-ranging admonitions; nevertheless, it is certain that Paul regarded love as the pre-eminent and finally only necessary command, a point he makes explicitly in 13:8–10 (and in continuity with passages such as Mk 12:28–34; Mt 5:43–8; 19:19; Jn 13:34–5; 15:12–17; Jas 2:8; 1 Jn 3:11, 23; 4:21; and 2 Jn 5).

(13:1–7) Christians and Civil Authority Paul commended his readers to 'live in harmony' and to 'live peaceably with all'; immediately after, he adjured them not to seek revenge (12:16, 18–19). A discussion of civil authority follows naturally if not necessarily from these remarks. It may be that Paul's comments reflect concern over behaviour that had contributed to the expulsion of the Jews (including Christian Jews; see Acts 18:2) from Rome only a few years before (see Rom 8:3).

Does Christian conversion, the submission to God's rule, release one from civil authority? It is reasonable to suppose that one who lives in a new age is free of the old age. But one cannot live only in the new aeon; on earth the ages overlap. God's dominion is not entirely realized; believers' hearts are not wholly submitted (hence Paul's admonishment in 12:2). One might regard government as an expedient necessitated by human sin; even so, it is apparent that Christians do not yet live so distant from the Fall as to make obsolete government's corrective function. And predating the fallen, evil order is the original, beneficent order of creation (see Rom 1:18–20). Is government a temporarily sanctioned accommodation or an eternally mandated institution? Like Jesus in Mk 12:17, Paul does not deal explicitly with these questions; nevertheless, his words invalidate some answers, such as regarding government as human invention or satanic usurpation.

Few if any passages in the Pauline corpus have been more subject to abuse than vv. 1–7. Paul does not indicate that one is required to obey public officials under all circumstances, nor does he say that every exercise of civil authority is sanctioned by God. No particular government is authorized; no universal autarchy is legitimated. Instead, Paul reiterates the common Jewish view that human governance operates under God's superintendency (Jn 19:11; Dan 2:21; Prov 8:15–16; Isa 45:1–3; Wis 6:3), that it is part of the divine order and so is meant for human good (1 Pet 2:13–14; Ep. Arist. 291–2). Paul's view of order and desire for order is also paralleled in 1 Corinthians. Paul responded to the chaos of Corinthian worship by arguing that 'God is a God not of disorder but of peace' (14:33) and so commended his followers to do 'all things' 'decently and in order' (14:40). Here Paul advises a new group of readers to find peace by submitting to proper order (cf. 1 Cor 16:16). It is striking that Paul treated with such optimism the very Roman authority by which he himself was eventually martyred. The presentation in Rom 13 has often been contrasted with that of Rev 13, in which Rome is portrayed as a diabolical beast whose 'authority' is exercised in making 'war on the saints' (v. 7). Rom 13 and Rev 13 are not quite opposites; Paul is not attempting to account for the reality depicted in Revelation. Nevertheless, the near demonization of the state in Revelation may be a healthy canonical counterbalance to its near idealization in Romans. But both Paul and the author of Revelation share common ground in asserting God's final authority over human affairs, humanity's ultimate allegiance to God, and God's eventual victory over every opposing 'ruler, authority, and power' (1 Cor 15:24–5). Rom 13:1–7 is not easy to live with, but neither would the opposing alternative be.

(13:8–10) 'Love is the Fulfilling of the Law' In Rom 12:9, Paul offered a theme for the ethical instruction to follow: 'love is genuine.' He neatly closes this paraenetic section by returning to the subject of love. The segue in vv. 7–8 is artful: 'Pay to all what is due (opheilas)...Owe (opheilete) no one anything, except to love'. In other words, while civic obligations can and should be fulfilled, the obligation to love can never be fully discharged. The primacy of the love commandment is a NT commonplace and almost certainly goes back to Jesus himself (see ROM 12:9a). In Mk 12:28–34 and parallels, Jesus cites a twofold commandment, love of God (Deut 6:4–5) and love of neighbour (Lev 19:18). Paul refers only to the latter. Perhaps he did not know the double formula, or perhaps his immediate concern led him to quote only the Leviticus passage. (The four commandments listed are all from the ‘second table’ of the Decalogue, which deals with social relationships; Deut 5:17–18.) To be children of God is pre-eminently to have the character of God, and the pre-eminent attribute of God’s character is love (Mt 5:43–8). Such love issues from the giver irrespective of the recipient’s merit: ‘God proves his love for us in that while we still were sinners Christ died for us’ (5:8). So no fault in the neighbour and no sufficiency in the self excuses one from love. And if one shares the character of God, then indeed God’s law is fulfilled.

(13:11–14) The Eschatological Context Paul completes a second inclusio by returning to the eschatological theme introduced in 12:2 (‘Do not be conformed to this age...’). The present is characterized as a time between the times, expressed eloquently in the metaphor of night turning to day. Now is still a time of darkness, but the believer knows it to be the darkness preceding the dawn. Recognizing that ‘the night is far gone’ (v. 12), one rouses oneself, lays aside the secret, shameful ‘works of darkness’ (detailed in v. 13), dresses in ‘the armour of light’ (v. 12, i.e. by behaving righteously), and stands ready before the approaching day.

In 12:2, Paul asked his readers to act as those already inhabiting a new age, to live up to their high spiritual standing in Christ. The argument is reminiscent of 6:1–5: Christians are in a fundamentally new position, already having died to sin. So, ‘How can we who died to sin go on living in it?’ (6:2). In vv. 11–14 we find much the same idea. One who lives ‘as in the day’ makes ‘no provision for the flesh’, gives no quarter to the ‘works of darkness’ (v. 12). To be holy is to be unmixed, entirely sanctified to God (12:1). The temptation is to view the eschatological ethic partly as a future demand, to split the difference between old and new orders, to contrive a half-in, half-out moral standard. For Paul, such unholiness is neither permissible nor sensible.

The phrase ‘put on the Lord Jesus Christ’ (v. 14) appears to have originated in Christian baptismal liturgy. Compare Gal 3:27: ‘As many of you as were baptized into Christ have clothed yourselves with Christ.’ ‘Taking off’ (or ‘laying aside’, v. 12) and ‘putting on’ is the nomenclature of repentance, intrinsic to baptism (cf. the idea of the ‘wedding garment’ in Mt 22:11–14). To say that one ‘puts on Christ’ adds to repentance the concepts of spiritual identification and empowerment (cf. Gal 2:19–20). In 6:3–4 Paul wrote that ‘all of us who have been baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death... we have been buried with him by baptism into death, so that, just as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, so we too might walk in newness of life’. In baptism, one participates in the death and, proleptically, in the resurrection of Christ. The believer puts on the clothing, not merely of a new self, but of Christ’s own righteousness, power, and victory. This high ‘Christian anthropology’ is in keeping with Paul’s thought elsewhere in Romans (ROM E.2; ROM 8, etc.).

(14:1–15:13) ‘Pursue What Makes for Peace and for Mutual Edification’ Paul began this section of Romans with an exhortation to Christian unity (12:3–8), modelled on his recent Corinthian correspondence. By way of conclusion, he returns to the same idea and source. Controversy had arisen at Corinth over the practice by some of eating meat that had been sacrificed to idols (1 Cor 8:1–13; 10:12–33). In theory, Paul was on their side: ‘We are no worse off if we do not eat, and no better off if we do’ (8:8). But theory is not principle, privileges are not rights, and ‘knowledge’ (8:1) is not wisdom. The prerogative of the ‘strong’ (15:1) does not outweigh the church’s need for unity and the individual’s need for integrity. Simply put, it is wrong to encourage another to violate conscience. ‘Therefore, if food is a cause of their falling, I will never eat meat, so that I may not cause one of them to fall’ (8:13). The scope and application of Paul’s ‘community ethic’ are nowhere more clearly articulated than in 1 Cor 8 and Rom 14.

As we have seen (e.g. in 12:4–7), Paul generalizes the argument of 1 Corinthians when adapting it to Romans. The identity of ‘the weak’ is no longer clear; Paul does not mention food sacrificed to idols, nor do his statements about eating meat and drinking wine (v. 21) refer self-evidently to Jewish practice (although the mention of ‘one day... better than another’ in v. 5 probably has in view the Jewish sabbath). Rather than respond to any one practice, Paul formulates a rule of conduct that may be applied in a variety of circumstances (which, by way of example, include controversies surrounding eating, drinking, and sabbath observance). One is to live before God with faith (14:5–9, 22–3) and before others with consideration (14:1–5, 13–21). Do not look to the example of those who offend; do not be an example to those who would be offended.

Paul’s ethical thinking inhabits the ground between individualism and communitarianism. It is somewhat individualistic: each person stands or falls before God alone (14:4); each must be ‘fully convinced’ in his or her ‘own mind’ (v. 5); each is accountable to the dictates of his or her ‘own conviction’ (v. 22). But the community has moral priority. Recognition of individual differences is meant to foster unity (as in the body metaphor); ironically, it is those who demand absolute conformity that ‘pass judgement’ (v. 4) and so create division. The individual is constrained both by God’s judgement (vv. 7–12) and by the needs of others (vv. 13–23). One ought to please God (v. 18) and one’s neighbour (15:1–2), not oneself. This is not self-annihilation; this is mutuality, the dance of reciprocating love.

The tolerant attitude evidenced in this passage belies the oft-popular image of Paul as narrow-minded traditionalist. (14:14, ‘nothing is unclean in itself’, attests to the radical inclination of Paul’s thought.) v. 4, ‘Who are you to pass judgement on servants of another?’ is reminiscent of that most-cited biblical quotation, Mt 7:1, ‘Judge not, lest you be judged.’ As a matter of perspective, one should bear in mind that neither Paul nor Jesus taught that one ought simply to ‘behave and let behave’. The sphere of activity within which Paul allowed disagreement was significant but still restricted in size. Essentially, it consisted of matters regarded by Paul as morally indifferent (14:1: 'opinions', see 1 Cor 9). 'The kingdom of God is not food and drink' (14:17), but it is 'walking in love' (14:15). Then as now, conflict arose because of discrepant calculations of moral gravity. Inevitably, it is easier for the 'strong' (the less observant) to be tolerant of the 'weak' (the more observant) than the reverse. At what point does moral allowance turn the corner to moral abdication? Were Jewish Christians intolerant who continued to require sabbath observance (which is, after all, the fourth commandment of the Decalogue; see Mt 24:20)? In the first as in the twenty-first century, tolerance is in the eye of the beholder.

In 15:1, Paul explicitly identified himself with 'the strong' ('in faith', 14:1), a designation that he assumes rhetorically for most if not all of his audience. (What reader would want to identify with the community of the weak-but-tolerated?) The NRSV translation, 'We who are strong ought to put up with the failings of the weak,' is unfortunate. Literally, the strong are instructed to 'carry', 'support', or (by extension) 'tolerate' (bastazō) 'the weaknesses' (asthenēmata) of the weak'. To judge the actions of the weak as 'failings' is to commit the very error described by Paul in ch. 14.

Paul caps his exhortation to unity and mutual concern by referring to the example of Christ, 'who did not please himself' (15:3). 'Welcome' (or 'accept', 'receive', proslambanomai) 'one another... just as Christ has welcomed you' (15:7). The passage is similar to Phil 2:1–11, where Paul charges his readers:

Be of the same mind, having the same love, being in full accord and of one mind. Do nothing from selfish ambition or conceit, but in humility regard others as better than yourselves. Let each of you look not to your own interests, but to the interests of others. Let the same mind be in you that was in Christ Jesus... (vv. 2–5)

What follows is the well-known 'Christ hymn', a poetic description of Jesus' self-abnegation and subsequent exaltation. Rom 15:3 is somewhat different: Paul refers only obliquely to Christ's passion, quoting the lament of the righteous sufferer in Ps 69:9, 'The insults of those who insult you [God] have fallen on me.' (Psalm 69 was widely cited in early Christianity; Cranfield (1979: 733n. 1) lists 18 other NT 'quotations and echoes'.) Christ's identification with God (15:3) and with humanity (15:8) cost him honour and status, the same currency that Paul would require his readers to expend for one another (12:3–5).

Rom 15:7–13 completes the discussion of Christian life begun in 12:1. More importantly, it brings to a close the larger argument begun in 1:16. 'Christ has become a servant in order that he might confirm the promises given to the patriarchs' (v. 8) thus proving God righteous. Christ came both for Jews (v. 8) and for Gentiles (vv. 9–12), a reiteration of Paul's 'thesis statement' in 1:16–17. As he has done repeatedly before, Paul cites scriptural evidence validating the inclusion of Gentiles in the people of God (Ps 18:49; Deut 32:43 (LXX); Ps 117:1; Isa 11:10 (LXX)). In conclusion, Paul again shifts from argumentative to sacral address (cf. Rom 8:31–9; 11:33–6), now, appropriately, in the form of a benediction. The phrases 'God of hope' and 'abound in hope' evoke the eschatological expectation that grounds the believer's everyday experience. In 14:17, Paul wrote that 'the kingdom of God is not food and drink but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit'. So Paul concludes by wishing his readers nothing less than God's dominion, both now and future.

Conclusion (15:14–16:27)

(15:14–33) The Apostle's Plans Paul began the epistle by introducing himself and his apostolic credentials to the Roman Christians and by explaining his intention to visit them in the near future (1:1–15). His language was highly diplomatic; he praised the Romans for their faith and offered that he himself would be benefited spiritually by them. v. 14 picks up where 1:15 left off. The audience again is lauded: 'you yourselves are full of goodness, filled with all knowledge'. The apostle again is politic: he acknowledges that the recipients themselves are 'able to instruct one another'. Yes, Paul has written rather boldly, but only by way of reminder (v. 15). Besides, his boldness is commensurate with his authority in Christ, carefully detailed in vv. 16–21.

Several aspects of Paul's self-description merit attention. The use of sacerdotal imagery to describe his ministry ('priestly service... the offering of the Gentiles') is telling. Paul's language appears to echo Isa 66:18–23, a prophetic description of the eschatological incorporation of Gentiles into Israel (see also Isa 2:1–4; 42:1–9; 49; 55:4–5; 60:1–7). The 'offering of the Gentiles' (v. 16), an idea borrowed from Isa 66:20, probably consists of the Gentiles themselves (in the person of the church leaders who would accompany Paul to Jerusalem; see Barrett 1957: 275) as well as the money gathered from their congregations (vv. 25–8; Gal 2:10; 1 Cor 16:1–4; 2 Cor 8, 9). Possibly Paul entertained the idea that the impending trip to Jerusalem might prove to be the 'pilgrimage of the nations' to 'the mountain of the Lord' (Isa 2:3; as in Isa 66) that would precipitate the coming of 'the Deliverer' to Zion (11:26 = Isa 59:20–1). This hope might account for the statement in v. 19 that Paul had 'fully proclaimed' the gospel from Jerusalem to Illyricum. The conversion of a representative group from the nations (equivalent to 'the full number of the Gentiles' in 11:25) might signal the fulfilment of Isaiah's prophecy and precipitate Christ's return (note 16:20). An obvious objection is that Paul planned to go on from Jerusalem to Rome and then to Spain (v. 28). Still, hoping for the eschaton and planning for its delay are not mutually exclusive activities. As a Christian missionary, Paul had done both for years.

The legitimacy of Paul's apostolic authority was disputed at Corinth as well as Galatia, and faint aftershocks of those controversies can be felt in vv. 17–19. As a Christian leader, Paul had a number of liabilities: for example, he had not known nor was he commissioned by the historical Jesus; he had persecuted the church; his physical appearance was 'weak', and he was comparatively 'unskilled in speaking' (2 Cor 10:10; 11:6). Paul acknowledged other leading apostles but claimed to have 'outworked them all' (1 Cor 15:10). He pointed repeatedly to his ceaseless labours and continual suffering for the sake of the gospel as primary validation for his ministry. He articulated this claim in passages that are among the most dramatic and powerful in all of his letters (e.g. 1 Cor 4:8–13; 2 Cor 6:3–10; 11:21–12:21). Here in Rom 15, he emphasized not only the extent but also the success of his evangelistic effort. By such a measure, his ministry may be peerless.

Paul's statement of purpose in vv. 20–9 serves a variety of functions. First, it explains why it has taken him so long to come to Rome. Paul's job is the founding of pioneer churches (v. 20); his assignment had been the field from Jerusalem to Illyricum (v. 19). Having now completed that task (v. 23), he is prepared to advance to Spain. Second, it details the reason for Paul's trip to Rome and makes clear that his stay there will not be permanent. (In other words, he is not coming to 'take over' the Roman church.) Third, it lets the Romans know both that he expects to be welcomed (vv. 24, 29) and that he hopes to be supported by them in his mission to Spain (v. 24).

Paul asks for prayer 'that I may be rescued from the unbelievers in Judea'. It is a poignant request; according to Acts 21:27–36, Paul was arrested soon after his arrival in Jerusalem. The additional intercession, that 'my ministry to Jerusalem may be acceptable to the saints', has been seen by some as an indication that the Jerusalem church opposed the Gentile mission and so would reject the collection. Cranfield's (1979: 778) judgement is on target: '[It would] be more likely to recognize in these words evidence of Paul's spiritual and human sensitivity and freedom from self-centred complacency than to draw from them any confident conclusions about the tensions between the Jerusalem church and Paul.' (See also Fitzmyer 1993: 726.) Contrary to the assertions of the Tübingen School, it is extremely improbable that the leaders of the Jerusalem church opposed the inclusion of uncircumcised Gentiles (see ROM D.3.3, above; cf. Gal 2:1–10; Acts 15:1–29). However, it is entirely likely that they took issue with Paul's conclusion that Jews no longer need obey certain parts of the law. (It is instructive that the charge raised in connection with Paul's arrival in Jerusalem concerned Jewish—not Gentile—law observance, Acts 21:21). For most Jewish Christians (e.g. the author of the Gospel of Matthew), the key issue apparently was not the Judaizing of Gentiles but the Gentilizing of Jews. It also is worth noting that Phil 4:18 uses similar priestly language in reference to the 'acceptability' of a monetary offering, but no interpreter suggests that the status of the Philippians' gift was ever in question. (See Hill 1992: 175–8, for further discussion of the interpretation of Rom 15:31.)

(16:1–27) Personal Greetings and Final Remarks Was ch. 16 part of Paul's original letter to Rome? The question arises in part because of discrepancies in the textual tradition. One early manuscript (P⁴⁶, c.200) appears originally to have omitted 16:1–23. Other versions contain ch. 16 but locate the letter's benediction (16:25–7) at the end of ch. 14. Nevertheless, the manuscript evidence for the literary integrity of Rom 1–16 is quite strong (e.g. Sinaiticus, Vaticanus, Codex Ephraemi, etc.). According to Origen, Marcion disseminated a version of Romans that ended at ch. 14. The likeliest account is that the missing passages were gradually reattached to truncated copies of Romans, the benediction being added first at the end of ch. 14 (see Stuhlmacher's valuable discussion, 1994: 244–6).

The authenticity of ch. 16 also has been questioned because of the extensive greetings (twenty-six people in all) in vv. 3–15. Could Paul have known so many Roman Christians? Some scholars have suggested that all or part of ch. 16 was a separate letter, possibly written to commend Phoebe to the church at Ephesus. It is an intriguing but unconvincing suggestion.

Rom 16 by itself hardly constitutes an independent letter; moreover, we are scarcely in a position to judge whom Paul could not have known. Clearly, it would have been to his advantage to identify as many Roman confederates as possible. (Note that he first greets Prisca and Aquila, who left Rome under Claudius' edict and who may have returned following its suspension; Acts 18:2–3.) Finally, one may cite again the compelling textual evidence for the originality of ch. 16.

Rom 16 differs from other Pauline epistolary conclusions primarily in the length of its greetings (vv. 3–16) and its blessing (vv. 23–7; see below). Each of its elements is common to other Pauline closings:

Personal recommendation (vv. 1–2) 1 Cor 16:10–11, 15–18;
1 Thess 5:12–13 (cf. Phil 4:2–3); Philem 17
Personal greetings (vv. 3–16) Philem 23–4
Final admonition (vv. 17–20a) 1 Cor 16:13–14; 2 Cor 13:11–12;
Gal 6:12–17; Phil 4:4–9; 1 Thess 5:14–22
Grace (v. 20b (=24)) 1 Cor 16:23; 2 Cor 13:13; Gal 6:18; Phil
4:23; 1 Thess 5:28; Philem 25
Greetings from companions (vv. 21–3) 1 Cor 16:19–20; Phil
4:21–2
Identification of writer/amanuensis (v. 22) 1 Cor 16:21; Gal
6:11
Blessing (vv. 25–7) 2 Cor 13:11b; Gal 6:16; Phil 4:19–20; 1 Thess 5:23–4.

The frequent mention of women in vv. 1–15 is impressive. Writes Beverly Gaventa (in Newson and Ringe 1992: 320) 'Nothing in Paul's comments justifies the conclusion that these women worked in ways that differed either in kind or in quality from the ways in which men worked.' Phoebe, probably the bearer of the letter, is referred to as a deacon (not 'deaconess', as in the RSV and MLB) and patron of the church. Nine other women are included in vv. 3–15, several of whom are commended for their ministry. Of particular interest is Junia (v. 7), who together with Andronicus (probably her husband) is said to be 'prominent among the apostles'. Almost certainly, the phrasing identifies both as apostles. For that reason, many translators assumed that lounian must be a contracted form of the masculine Junianus. In effect, they masculinized the name Junia, rendering it 'Junias' (e.g. RSV, NIV, NJB, NEB). But the pairing of names (as with Prisca and Aquila in v. 3) usually indicates a husband and wife; moreover, no corroborating example has been found for the supposed masculine form, while the feminine usage is very well attested (see the fine overview of the question in Dunn 1988: 894–5). In short, 'Junias' is a scandalous mistranslation.

Paul's letters often include final words of admonition (see table above). The exhortation in vv. 17–20 recalls the teaching in 12–15:13 concerning Christian unity, whose background was the recent controversy at Corinth (and secondarily at Galatia). The description of those who serve 'their own appetites' and deceive others by 'flattery' is reminiscent of Paul's account of fallen humanity in 1:18–32. On behalf of his readers, Paul assumes the best but cautions against the worst.

The stately prescript that began Romans (1:1–7) is echoed in the formal benediction in vv. 25–7. Paul again refers to his ministry of the 'gospel' (v. 25=1:1), mentions the testimony of the prophetic writings (v. 26=1:2), and speaks of winning the Gentiles 'obedience of faith' (v. 26=1:5). As he did in 11:36,

Paul concludes with doxology, glorifying God in whose mysterious plan and by whose eternal command the Gentiles have been brought into the communion of faith. It is a majestic crown to an extraordinary letter.

REFERENCES

- Achtmeier, P. J. (1985) (ed.), Harper's Bible Dictionary (San Francisco: Harper).
- Barrett, C. K. (1957), A Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, BNTC (London: A. & C. Black).
- Barth, K. (1933), The Epistle to the Romans, trans. E. C. Hoskyns (London: Oxford University Press).
- Baur, F. C. (1873–5), Paul, The Apostle of Jesus Christ, trans. A. P. (vol. i), and A. Menzies (vol. ii) (2 vols.; London: Williams & Norgate).
- Beker, C. (1980), Paul the Apostle (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Bultmann, R. (1910), Der Stil der paulinischen Predigt und die kynisch-stoische Diatribe, FRLANT 13 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht).
- (1952–5) Theology of the New Testament, trans. K. Grobel (2 vols.; London: SCM).
- Byrne, B. (1996), Romans, SP 6 (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press).
- Cranfield, C. E. B. (1979), Romans, ICC (2 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Deissmann, A. (1927), Light from the Ancient East, 2nd edn. (London: Hodder & Stoughton).
- Dodd, C. H. (1932), The Epistle to the Romans, MNTC (London: Hodder & Stoughton).
- Donfried, K. P. (1991) (ed.), The Romans Debate, rev. edn. (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson).
- Dunn, J. D. G. (1988), Romans, i. chs. 1–8; ii. chs. 9–16, WBC 38A–B (Dallas: Word).
- Edwards, J. R. (1992), Romans, NIBC (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson).
- Fitzmyer, J. A. (1993), Romans, AB 33 (New York: Doubleday).
- Hays, R. B. (1989), Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Hill, C. C. (1992), Hellenists and Hebrews (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Holmberg, B. (1978), Paul and Power: The Structure of Authority in the Primitive Church as Reflected in the Pauline Epistles (Lund: Studentlitteratur AB).
- Jervell, J. (1971), 'The Letter to Jerusalem', ST 25. ET, Donfried (1991: 61–74).
- Jewett, R. (1979), A Chronology of Paul's Life (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- (1982), 'Romans as an Ambassadorial Letter', Interpretation, 36: 5–20.
- Käsemann, E. (1980), Commentary on Romans, trans. and ed. Geoffrey W. Bromiley (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Manson, T. W. (1948), 'St Paul's Letter to the Romans—and Others', BJRL 21: 224–40. Repr. in Donfried (1991: 1–16).
- Marxsen, W. (1968), Introduction to the New Testament (Oxford: Blackwell).
- Morris, L. (1988), The Epistle to the Romans (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Murray, J. (1979), The Epistle to the Romans, NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Nanos, M. D. (1996), The Mystery of Romans: The Jewish Context of Paul's Letter (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Newson, C. A., and Ringe, S. H. (1992) (eds.), The Women's Bible Commentary (London: SPCK).
- Räsänen, H. (1983), Paul and the Law (Tübingen: Mohr).
- Sanday, W., and Headlam, A. C. (1980), A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, 5th edn., ICC (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Sanders, E. P. (1977), Paul and Palestinian Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- (1983), Paul, the Law, and the Jewish People (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Schlatter, A. (1995), Romans: The Righteousness of God, trans. S. Schatzmann (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson).
- Spicq, C. (1994), Theological Lexicon of the New Testament, trans. and ed. J. D. Ernest (3 vols.; Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson).
- Stendahl, K. (1963), 'The Apostle Paul and the Introspective Conscience of the West', HTR 56: 199–215.
- Stirewalt, L. M. Jr. (1977), 'The Form and Function of the Greek Letter-Essay', in Donfried (1991).
- Stowers, S. K. (1981), The Diatribe and Paul's Letter to the Romans, SBLDS 57 (Chico, Calif.: Scholars Press).
- (1994), A Rereading of Romans (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Stuhlmacher, P. (1994), Paul's Letter to the Romans: A Commentary, trans. S. J. Hafemann (Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox).
- Wedderburn, A. J. M. (1988), The Reasons for Romans, SNTW (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Ziesler, J. (1989), Paul's Letter to the Romans, Trinity Press International New Testament Commentaries (London: SCM).

65. I Corinthians

JOHN BARCLAY

INTRODUCTION

A. Authorship. The letter claims to be written by Paul and Sosthenes (1:1) and there is no reason to doubt this ascription. As in other cases of supposedly joint authorship (e.g. 2 Cor 1:1), Paul probably took the sole responsibility (16:21). Clement accepted the letter as Paul's at the end of the first century CE (1 Clem 47) and all modern scholars concur, with doubts surrounding only certain sections (see on 11:2–16 and 14:34–5).

B. Integrity. Our earliest papyri preserve the letter whole (e.g. P46, from c.200 CE), but a number of scholars have argued that it is in fact a compound of several letters. Thus it has been suggested that 1 Cor 1–4 is a self-contained letter, closing in 4:14–21 with the typical close-of-letter formulae (see de Boer 1994). It is strange that the named party divisions which Paul repeatedly criticizes in chs. 1–4 are never mentioned in chs. 5–16. It is possible that the Corinthians' letter to Paul (7:1) and disturbing news about their behaviour (5:1) arrived after the initial drafting of chs. 1–4 but before they were sent to Corinth. However, the opening thanksgiving section (1:4–9) seems to anticipate themes which surface in later chapters (e.g. spiritual gifts in 1:7 and chs. 12–14), and the theme of unity (1:10) pervades the whole letter (see Mitchell 1992). Inconsistencies have been found within later chapters, for instance between an apparently softer stance on sacrificial food in 8:1–13 and 10:22–11:1, and a harder line in 10:1–22. Complex theories have been propounded of two, four, or more original letters which have been stitched together into our 1 Corinthians (see details in ABD i. 1142–3). Such hypotheses are plausible in the case of 2 Corinthians, but Paul's varying rhetorical purposes can probably explain all the inconsistencies in this letter. Thus we may take 1 Corinthians as a single and unified whole.

C. Date. The letter is written from Ephesus in the spring (before Pentecost, 16:8–9). If we accept the chronology of Acts (see below), Paul founded the church in Corinth in 50–1 CE (Acts 18:1–7) and was in Ephesus two or three years later (Acts 19:1–10); thus the date of composition of this letter is some time in the period 52–5 CE.

D. Paul's Previous Dealings with the Corinthian Church. 1. It was of immense importance to Paul that he was the founder of the church in Corinth, the one who laid their foundation, however many supplementary builders they may have had (3:10). As his 'work in the Lord', the existence of the Corinthian church is, for Paul, proof enough of his apostleship (9: 1–2), even if it is clear from chs. 1–4 and 9 that not all the Corinthians are willing to recognize his status or authority. Paul recalls bringing the gospel to Corinth at a time which was fraught with 'weakness, fear and trembling' (2:1–3). Some of the details which we may piece together from 1 Corinthians accord well with the narrative of this founding visit in Acts 18:1–17, for instance the conversion of Crispus (1 Cor 1:14; Acts 18:8), the contact with Prisca and Aquila (1 Cor 16:19; Acts 18:2–3) and his labour in Corinth with his own hands (1 Cor 4:12; Acts 18:3). Paul's own comments do not allow us to date this founding visit, but Acts connects it (at its close, after 18 months) with a trial before the proconsul of Achaia, Gallio. By good fortune, an inscription enables us to date Gallio's period of office to 50–1 CE, thus giving helpfully precise parameters to the date of Paul's time in the city. Acts also mentions, as a prelude to Paul's visit, Claudius' expulsion of Jews from Rome (Acts 18:2). Conflicting evidence in our sources leads some scholars to think that that expulsion took place in 41 CE, and it has been proposed that Acts 18 actually combines the accounts of two separate visits by Paul to Corinth, one in 41 and one in 50/51 CE (see Lüdemann 1984: 157–77). However, Jews were probably not expelled from Rome until 49 CE (see Barclay 1996: 303–6), and there is thus no reason to doubt the integrity of the account in Acts 18 or the dating of Paul's initial visit to 50/51 CE.

2. Corinth was a cosmopolitan city, refounded as a Roman colony in 46 BCE, a seaport exposed to multiple influences from East and West (see ABD i. 1134–9 s. v. Corinth). According to Acts, Paul spent longer here than in most cities (at least 18 months, Acts 18:11, 18), a fact at least partly explained by the comparative lack of opposition he encountered in the city. The birth of the church also seems to have been unusually peaceful: Paul nowhere indicates any experience of harassment (see Barclay 1992). Paul established a core of believers, both Jews and Gentiles (1 Cor 1:22–4; 7:18), who were baptized in the name of Christ (1:13), received the Spirit (12:13) and started to meet for meals and worship in homes (11:17–34; Rom 16:23). Paul bequeathed to them a variety of credal traditions and practical instructions (15:3–5; 11:2, 23) but two factors combined to lessen his influence on the church once he had left the city. First, some of his own or subsequent converts were people of education and high social standing (see E.1) who developed independent views about the meaning of the Christian message (e.g. in relation to the resurrection of the body and sexual behaviour) and whose integration in Corinthian society made them reluctant to accept Paul's more sectarian social practices (e.g. in relation to sacrificial food). Secondly, situated at an international crossroads, the church in Corinth was visited by a variety of Christian leaders, some of whom won converts of their own and assisted the church to develop in ways of which Paul disapproved (e.g. Apollos and, probably, Peter/Cephas, 1:12; 9:4–5).

3. The first signs of conflict between Paul and the Corinthian church are preserved in Paul's reference to their reception of an earlier letter he had sent (5:9–11). This letter is now lost, but it seems to have urged a moral discipline on the church which was not well received. Perhaps in response to that letter, the Corinthians wrote a letter referred to in 7:1. It is possible to suggest some of the topics on which the Corinthians wrote to Paul: many may be introduced by the formula 'now concerning', which occurs not only in 7:1, but also in 7:25 (on the topic of virgins), 8:1 (on food offered to idols), 12:1 (on spiritual gifts), 16:1 (on the collection), and 16:12 (on Apollos). Moreover, with the aid of a little imagination, we may even reconstruct what the Corinthians thought about some of the issues Paul addresses: in some cases Paul seems to cite back at them their own formulae, such as 'all things are lawful for me' (6:12; 10:23), 'it is well for a man not to touch a woman' (7:1), and 'all of us possess knowledge' (8:1). (For a full reconstruction of this interchange see Hurd 1965; for an imaginative exercise see Frör 1995.) 1 Corinthians thus represents part of a dialogue between Paul and the Corinthians, a dialogue which, as 2 Corinthians indicates, caused considerable pain to both parties for years to come.

4. As well as the Corinthian letter, Paul has received oral reports about affairs in the church, for instance from Chloe's people (1:11) and from Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus who may have brought the letter from Corinth (16:17–18). Some of the oral reports have caused Paul great concern (1:11–13; 5:1). Now, in response to both written and oral information, Paul writes our 1 Corinthians hoping that it, and Timothy's visit (4:17), will induce the necessary changes in the church before he has to correct them in person (4:21). It is clear from 2 Corinthians that that hope was not fulfilled.

E. The Corinthian Church. 1. Recent scholarship has highlighted the importance of the social divisions in the church in Corinth and has posited the disproportionate influence of a small élite group within the church, whose attitude to their social inferiors and whose class-determined interpretations of the Christian faith underlie many of the issues addressed in this letter (see esp. Theissen 1982; Chow 1992; Clarke 1993; Martin 1995; more generally on Pauline Christians, Meeks 1983; see, however, the strong arguments to the contrary by Meggitt 1998). Paul's statement about the generally lowly make-up of the church in 1:26–8 none the less indicates that there were some members of education, power, or noble birth, and some named individuals seem to belong to such an upper stratum. For instance, Gaius (1:14) must be a man of some wealth to be able to house the whole church (Rom 16:23, written from Corinth); some think the church may have grown to fifty or more members. If Crispus and Sosthenes were rulers of the synagogue, as Acts 18 indicates, they must have been from wealthy families (the title normally designates financial patronage). Moreover, the Erastus who sends greetings from Corinth in Rom 16:23 is there listed as 'city treasurer'. The title might designate a lowly office, but it is extremely rare for Paul to mention the occupations of Christians and he would probably do so only if they were of social importance. It is tantalizing that an inscription from Corinth from around the middle of the first century CE mentions one Erastus (a very rare name in Corinth) as paying for a piece of pavement after his appointment as aedile. It is possible that this is the same Erastus as the one mentioned by Paul, at a subsequent and more exalted rung up the social ladder (aediles were among the highest civic leaders in Corinth; Theissen 1982: 75–83).

2. Thus the church in Corinth covered a broad social spectrum, with a few highly placed individuals who probably played a major role in shaping the life of the church and its relations with wider Corinthian society. The divisions at the Corinthian Lord's Supper (11:17–34) indicate the problems inherent in staging communal meals across such a spectrum, and the 'knowledgeable' who cared little for the scruples of their 'weaker brothers' in relation to sacrificial food (1 Cor 8–10) may have been those of higher status whose contacts with their social equals would have been greatly disrupted by taking a scrupulous stance on this matter. Other topics raised in this letter may also be related to wealth and status. The Corinthian Christians who took each other to court (6:1–8) might have been wealthy (court cases were often expensive) and were perhaps engaged in a power-struggle within the church. Speaking in tongues (1 Cor 12–14) was possibly an elitist activity (Martin 1991) and the whole spirituality of the Corinthian church probably reflects the confidence of those who accommodated their faith to their social aspirations (4:6–13). The party groupings mentioned in 1:12 may represent splits among the social élite who competed for patronage in the church. It is harder to discern how such social divisions related to the ethnic mix of the church (Jews and Gentiles) or to different opinions about sexual activity (contrast the ascetic Corinthian statement in 7:1 with the apparently libertine one in 6:12).

3. The leaders of the church in Corinth seem to have prided themselves on their status as 'spiritual people' (3:1–3; 14:37). That involved a particular eagerness for spiritual gifts (12:1; 14:12), but also a high evaluation of 'wisdom' and 'knowledge' (2:6; 8:1–3) which included the appreciation of mysteries (2:6–16; 13:1–2) and the conviction that others' so-called 'gods' are really shadows ('idols', 8:4–6). Their 'spiritual' status also encouraged a sense of 'authority'—particularly the permission to eat whatever they wished and to use their bodies however they liked (6:12; 10:23). Such an emphasis on spiritual knowledge seems to have reinforced and even extended the common Greek disparagement of the body as a paltry piece of material; as a result, there are partial parallels with the later phenomenon of Christian 'Gnosticism', though not to the extent some have claimed (e.g. Schmithals 1971). In any case, some Corinthian believers appear to have balked at Paul's notion of a resurrected body (15:12, 35–57) and others understood their new possession by the Spirit to require complete sexual abstinence (7:1, 25–39). Paul finds the claims being made by the Corinthians absurdly inflated, tantamount to claiming exemption from all the inevitable weaknesses and imperfections of the present (4:8–13; 13:8–13). It is not clear whether the Corinthians thought themselves already 'resurrected' in some final sense, or whether that is merely Paul's caricature of their position (4:8; cf. 1 Tim 2:18; Thiselton 1977–8). Paul attempts throughout the letter to puncture their pride and to redirect their sense of honour towards mutual service in the community.

F. Outline.

Prescript (1:1–3)

Thanksgiving (1:4–9)

Appeal for Unity and for Re-evaluation of Paul's Ministry (1:10–4:21)

The Absurdity of Party Groups (1:10–17)

The Message of the Cross, its Recipients and Proper Medium (1:18–2:5)

True Wisdom for Spiritual, not Bickering, Christians (2:6–3:4)

Models of Leadership in the Church (3:5–4:5)

Paul's Apostolic Style and Authority (4:6–21)

Sexual and Related Issues (5:1–7:40)

Expulsion of an Immoral Member of the Church (5:1–13)

The Absurdity of Using Corinthian Courts (6:1–11)

Immorality and the Significance of the Body (6:12–20)

Celibacy and Marriage (7:1–40)

Sacrificial Food and the Dangers of Idolatry (8:1–11:1)

Debate with the 'Knowledgeable' concerning their 'Right' to Eat (8:1–13)

Paul's Example in Renouncing the 'Right' to Financial Support (9:1–23)

The Dangers of Complacency in relation to Idolatry (9:24–10:22)

Practical Guidelines on Eating and Avoiding Offence (10:23–11:1)

Issues Relating to Communal Meetings (11:2–14:40)

Praying and Prophesying with Proper Head-Covering (11:2–16)

Humiliation of Church Members at the Lord's Supper (11:17–34)

The Distribution of Spiritual Gifts in the Body of Christ (12:1–31)

The Superior and Critical Demands of Love (13:1–13)

The Superiority of Prophecy over Tongues (14:1–40)

The Resurrection of Christ and the Resurrection Body (15:1–58)

Letter Closing, with Travel Plans, Final Instructions, and Greetings (16:1–24)

COMMENTARY

Prescript (1:1–3)

This follows the form typical in the Pauline letters; sender, addressees, and greeting (cf. Gal 1:1–3). Paul mentions his apostolic calling since some in Corinth doubted this (9:1–2) and associates with himself Sosthenes, perhaps the synagogue leader mentioned in Acts 18:17, who must have been converted after the events narrated there. In referring to the church in Corinth Paul emphasizes their purity ('sanctified', 'saints', v. 2), a theme which he will later employ to reinforce the boundaries between the community and outsiders and to outlaw behaviour which soils the church (e.g. 5:6–8; 6:9–11).

He also pointedly associates them with all other Christians elsewhere (v. 3). He will not allow the Corinthian Christians to exalt themselves over others (4:7), to neglect their needs (16:1–4), or to develop idiosyncratic patterns of church life (4:17; 11:16).

Thanksgiving (1:4–9)

Paul's letters generally begin with a thanksgiving, which places the life of the church in the context of God's activity and compliments the believers on their progress thus far. Despite the problems which this church poses, Paul appears genuinely grateful for its lively success, so long as it is attributed to 'the grace of God' (v. 4) by which they have been 'enriched' (v. 5). Later he will criticize the Corinthians for boasting in their spiritual virtuosity as if they had made themselves rich (vv. 7–8). Their God-given riches include every form of 'speech' and 'knowledge' (v. 5)—topics which will recur at several points in the letter (notably 11:18–3:5; 8:1–13; 13:1–2; 14:1–40), where Paul's appreciation is tempered with caution about the uses of such gifts in the community. In v. 6—which is probably best translated 'just as the testimony to Christ was confirmed among you'—Paul points forward to his discussion of the terms in which he first testified to Christ in Corinth (11:18–2:5), reminding his socially comfortable converts that all they have is based on the subversive message of Christ crucified. Their speech and knowledge are part of their enjoyment of every 'spiritual gift' (charisma, v. 7), a theme which comes to full (though again critical) expression in chs. 12–14. Notable at the end of this section are references to the future: for all their present abundance, the Corinthians still await 'the revealing of our Lord Jesus Christ' (v. 7) and the judgement which will take place on 'the day of our Lord Jesus Christ' (v. 8). Throughout this letter Paul will point forward to that future, to forestall premature judgements of his own or anyone else's ministry (v. 5), to warn against complacency in the race still unfinished (9:24–7; 10:12), and to moderate the exaggerated claims that were being made for knowledge and other spiritual gifts (13:8–13). Their only ground for confidence can be the faithfulness of God (v. 9; cf. 10:13), who has called them to participate in Christ (cf. 1:30–1). It is only by continuing in that 'fellowship' with Christ that they can face the end with confidence (cf. 16:22–4).

Appeal for Unity and for Re-evaluation of Paul's Ministry (1:10–4:21)

(1:10–17) The Absurdity of Party Groups v. 10 encapsulates the core of Paul's appeal which covers not only chs. 1–4, but also many other parts of the letter which appeal for mutual care within the church (e.g. 6:1–8; 8:1–3; 12:12–26). The 'divisions' spoken of here do not seem to prevent the church gathering together (Rom 16:23), but they damage its life, preventing its maturation (3:1–4) and negating its calling to love (13:1–13). Paul is responding in the first instance to oral reports from 'Chloe's people' (v. 11), probably the slaves of one of the members of the church. The quarrels they report concern the forming of party-groups in which members of the Corinthian church line up, in quasi-political fashion, behind Paul, Apollos, Cephas, or (apparently) Christ (v. 12). The last grouping receives no further mention in 1 Corinthians, except in Paul's insistence that all belong to Christ (3:22). Perhaps the statement here represents a claim by some Corinthians to a more direct allegiance to Christ. Apollos is repeatedly named in the following chapters, and his followers may have been converted through him, since we know he was in Corinth after Paul (3:6; Acts 18:24–19:1). It has often been suggested that Paul's critical words about eloquence in 1:18–2:5 may be directed against admiration of Apollos' rhetorical prowess (according to Acts 18:24 he was 'an eloquent man'). Therein may lie some truth, though Paul is careful never to criticize Apollos directly in this letter and says he has encouraged him to return to Corinth (16:12).

The Cephas party remains a matter of controversy. Had Cephas (Peter) visited Corinth, like Paul and Apollos, and thus played some role in shaping the Corinthian church? Some think that 9:5 suggests as much, others that Cephas' reputation was high enough for him to have attracted a following in Corinth without a personal presence (cf. 15:5 and Barrett 1982: 28–39). Either way, it is difficult to know what the Cephas party stood for. An old scholarly tradition (arising in the 19th cent. in the Tübingen school and revived by Goulder 1991) takes the Peter party to represent a conservative form of Jewish Christianity, which took the Jewish law as its continuing standard. However, evidence for this standpoint in Corinth is hard to find and the character and influence of the Cephas party remain an enigma. What is revealing, however, is that those who say they belong to Paul are only one segment of the Corinthian congregation. Without wanting to foster a Paul party in Corinth, Paul clearly needs to re-establish his authority over the whole church. 1 Cor 1–4 is thus characterized by a delicate balance between Paul's self-effacement, as he points to Christ and the cross, and his self-promotion as the 'father' of the Corinthian church and the model of Christian discipleship (cf. Dahl 1967).

Paul's first move is to ridicule the creation of such groups. Since the whole church belongs to Christ and constitutes his body (12:12–27) any such party splits threaten to dismember Christ (v. 13). Tactfully using the Paul party as his prime target, Paul insists that he is neither the origin of their salvation nor the one to whom they belong. Reference in v. 13 to baptism 'in [lit. into] the name of Paul' indicates that baptism was usually performed in Pauline churches 'into the name of Christ' (cf. 12:12–13; Gal 3:27). It appears that the person of the baptizer is being given special significance in Corinth and Paul thus deliberately plays down his role in this regard: he can think of very few whom he has baptized (vv. 14–16; on Crispus and Gaius see 1 Cor 1:14). The sudden remembering of Stephanas' household (v. 16) underlines the insignificance of Paul's role in this matter; the initial lapse of memory might be genuine, but it also serves an obvious rhetorical role. Stephanas seems to have played some leadership role in the Corinthian church (see 1 Cor 16:15–18). Paul insists that his commission was to 'proclaim the gospel', not to baptize (v. 17). This does not mean he considered baptism insignificant: he assumes that all believers have been baptized (1 Cor 6:11; 12:13) and elsewhere spells out its theological significance (Rom 6:1–11). But he had a different and specialized role: to preach the gospel of Christ crucified. By immediately disowning an interest in 'eloquent wisdom' (v. 17) he prepares the way for the next section of the letter.

(1:18–2:5) The Message of the Cross, its Recipients and Proper Medium At first glance, this section might appear a digression from the topic of party divisions, a subject which does not recur till 3:4. But the conjunction of the themes of wisdom and party boasts in 3:18–23 indicates that the two are closely related. It is possible that wisdom (and specifically eloquence) was one of the bases on which Corinthian Christians were lining up behind different leaders (see above, on Apollos). But, more generally, Paul discerns in the claim of allegiance to vaunted leaders a fundamental misapprehension of the gospel, whose value-system is wholly opposed to the values of power and wisdom which the Corinthian competitiveness exhibits. Thus, typically, Paul attacks the disease which has brought about the worrying symptoms, and forces the Corinthians to recognize the counter-cultural impact of the gospel of Christ crucified, in its message (1:18–25), its chosen recipients (1:26–31), and its proper medium (2:1–5).

The message of the cross is portrayed as an uncompromising indictment of human values of wisdom and power, since it reverses their standards and undermines their pretensions. In 1:18 Paul introduces the twin antitheses of wisdom/foolishness and power/weakness, which undergird this whole section, and he embraces the apparent absurdity of his message of Christ crucified—absurd, however, only to those ‘who are perishing’. The division of humanity into two groups—‘those perishing’ and ‘those being saved’ (he never says believers have been saved)—is similar to the dualistic spirit of apocalyptic literature, as also are the pejorative nuances in phrases like ‘this age’ (1:20) and ‘the world’ (1:21). For Paul, the turning-point of the ages is precisely in the death (and resurrection) of Christ (cf. 15:20–8). The cross of Christ marks the final indictment of vaunted human ‘wisdom’, the fulfilment of the prediction of Isa 29:14, cited in 1:19. With rhetorical questions, Paul calls for those reputed to be wise (‘scribes’ are those so reputed in the Jewish world) and declares that God has not just bypassed ‘the wisdom of the world’ but utterly subverted it (1:20). The failure of humankind to know God according to its own system of wisdom triggers a divine plan springing from a deeper ‘wisdom of God’ (1:21; cf. Rom 1:18–23). In Jewish fashion, Paul divides humankind into two: Jews and Greeks/Gentiles (the two latter are synonymous in 1:22–4, but the term ‘Greek’ is particularly well suited for association with wisdom). The distinction between their desires (Jews want ‘signs’—that is, demonstrations of divine power—and Greeks want ‘wisdom’) is rhetorically over-schematized, since Jews were also interested in wisdom (e.g. the Jewish wisdom material) and Greeks were also interested in supernatural power (e.g. in healing). But it enables Paul to present the message of Christ crucified as the inverse of all human values. It is ‘a stumbling-block’ to Jews (cf. Gal 5:11; 6:12–14), particularly because of the scriptural association between ‘hanging on a tree’ and being accursed by God (Deut 21:22–3, cited in Gal 3:13); it is ‘foolishness’ to Gentiles, since this Roman punishment was universally feared as a hideously cruel and shameful death (the shame of prolonged, helpless, and public death being as devastating as its pain). But to those who are ‘called’ this ultimate symbol of weakness and absurdity represents, paradoxically, the precise locale where God displays his power and wisdom (1:24–5).

This negation of the human value-system is matched by God’s call of believers (1:26–31). The social make-up of the Corinthian church proves Paul’s point since few Corinthian Christians could claim status by education (‘wise’), political influence (‘powerful’), or ancestry (‘of noble birth’, 1:26). Although this observation plays a rhetorical function here, it must also be broadly true (for a social profile of the church, see 1 COR E.1–2). For Paul, the predominantly low-status composition of the church is no accident: it indicates precisely God’s choice which aggressively ‘shames’ the wise and powerful in the world. To create a rhetorical tricolon, Paul adds to his earlier twin motifs of wisdom and power a third category, the low (lit. ignoble) and despised (1:28) who shame those ‘of noble birth’ (1:26). He then expands this category to its fullest possible generalization: God chose the things that are not, to bring to nothing the things that are (1:28). The phrase ‘the nobodies’ depicts then, as now, those of no social significance, but it also evokes notions of God’s creative role in bringing creation out of nothing (cf. Rom 4:17; Gal 6:15; 2 Cor 5:17). And if salvation is entirely the creation of God, no human being can claim credit or rest confidence in any human attributes of status or significance (1:29). Theologically this line of thought is parallel to Paul’s assault on Jewish boasting in Rom 2–4, but here it is widened to embrace the whole human race. It is precisely the Corinthians’ boasting and concomitant arrogance which Paul opposes throughout this letter (cf. 4:18; 5:2; 8:1; 13:4), and it is here exposed in its absurdity. All that salvation means in Christ (the list of abstract nouns in 1:30 sums up its meaning by reference to the core metaphors in Pauline theology) is possible only from God (so runs the Greek behind ‘he is the source of your life’, 1:30). And here Paul can rightly claim to be in continuity with the prophetic warning against self-confidence, citing (1:31) Jer 9:24, whose context warns against glorying in wisdom, power, and wealth.

Finally, Paul addresses the question of the medium by which this message is conveyed (2:1–5) recalling the terms in which he first communicated the gospel. Here he pointedly eschews rhetorical ability, despite the fact that this passage, 1:18–2:5, is one of the most rhetorically effective in the New Testament! In the Graeco-Roman world ‘wisdom’ was closely associated with rhetorical skill (‘lofty’ or ‘plausible’ words, 2:1, 4), which was a central element in ‘secondary’ education and was highly prized by a public which enjoyed listening to finely crafted speeches in the courtroom, assembly, or theatre (see Litfin 1994). Paul claims that his message was so completely focused on Christ crucified (2:2) that any decorative oratory would have been utterly inconsistent. His own weakness as messenger (2:3) matched the ‘weakness’ of the message, so that its powerful effect in evoking faith might be identified unmistakably as the power of the Spirit of God, not any human achievement (2:4–5). Paul here anticipates his later self-depiction as a figure of weakness and humiliation (4:9–13), characteristics which match the message of the cross (cf. 2 Cor 4:7–15; 11:21–12:10). Though they admired his letters (2 Cor 10:10), the élite Corinthian Christians clearly despised Paul’s speaking abilities (2 Cor 11:6); but Paul regards his ‘disability’ here as precisely making visible the only ‘ability’ that counts, the power of God.

(2:6–3:4) True Wisdom for Spiritual, not Bickering, Christians At first sight 2:6–16 seems to shift into a different gear. After denigrating wisdom in 1:18–2:5, Paul suddenly claims to impart wisdom, and in doing so changes from the first person singular (I) to the first person plural (we)—a change then reversed in 3:1ff. What is more, the claim to privilege the ‘mature’ (2:6; the Greek could be translated ‘perfect’) looks out of step with the notion that the cross subverts human hierarchies (1:26–9), while several terms in this section of the letter are unusual or even unique in Pauline literature (e.g. ‘the depths of God’, 2:10, and the contrast between the ‘spiritual’ and the ‘unspiritual’, 2:13–15; cf. 15:44–6 and Pearson 1973). Is Paul claiming access to a higher wisdom than the folly of Christ crucified? Does this passage reveal an esoteric or mystical side to Pauline theology not witnessed elsewhere?

The best explanation is that Paul is not outlining a new or more esoteric form of wisdom, but spelling out the implications of his gospel in terms that partially reflect the vocabulary and concepts of the leaders of the church in Corinth, but also in such a way that he can spring a rhetorical trap on his dialogue partners in 3:1–5. Although we cannot be fully confident in this matter, it is very likely that Paul picks up and reuses elements of the theological vocabulary of the Corinthian élite in this passage, for instance, their claim to be recipients of the revelation of the Spirit, to be ‘spiritual’ and not just in possession of ordinary, natural life (the ‘unspiritual’ of v. 14), to speak in Spirit-inspired terms to one another (2:13), and to be above critical scrutiny in such matters (2:15). Paul’s skill in this passage is to accept and rework this pattern of vocabulary and then to turn it against the Corinthian élite in 3:1–5 when he argues that their behaviour in fact disqualifies their claim to be ‘spiritual’!

Paul first refers to a ‘wisdom’ communicated among the ‘mature’, which is hidden and decreed from eternity ‘for our glory’ (2:6–7). That may seem to confirm the élitist claims of the leaders of the Corinthian church who act as though they were already rich and filled (4:8). But Paul makes clear that he understands such concepts in an apocalyptic framework in which God’s wisdom is precisely opposite to the wisdom claimed by ‘the world’, especially that espoused by the élite (‘the rulers of this age’); similarly, the ‘glory’ to which we are destined is not a present but a future possession (2:9). It has often been thought that ‘the rulers of this age’ referred to in 2:6 and 2:8 are the supernatural forces of evil which Paul elsewhere calls ‘powers’ and ‘authorities’ (e.g. 1 Cor 15:24; Rom 8:38; cf. Col 2:15). But the precise term he uses here (archontes) is more naturally taken to refer to (human) ‘political authorities’ (cf. Rom 13:3) and their responsibility for the crucifixion (2:8) strongly suggests that Paul is thinking primarily of earthly political powers. The notion that these powers are ‘doomed to perish’ matches the thought of 1:28 (where the same Gk. verb is used): those considered ‘something’ are shamed through the cross, while the ‘nothings’ in this world are destined for ‘glory/honour’ (2:7). The shamed Crucified One turns out to be—by the same paradox as 1:25—the ‘Lord of glory’ (2:8).

The ‘glory’ which is destined for believers (2:7) is defined in 2:9 as indescribably beyond human imagination by means of a pastiche of scriptural phrases, drawn principally from Isa 64:4 and 65:17. The point here, developed in 2:10–16, is that the Spirit gives access to a realm of knowledge, and a language in which to communicate it, quite beyond normal human knowledge and communication. This is not to suggest that the gospel is inherently irrational, but that its content and what it reveals about God’s paradoxical purposes go well beyond the frame of reference in which human language operates. As suggested above, some of the vocabulary here might reflect the terms in which the ‘spiritual’ people in Corinth distinguished themselves from those who had merely normal human abilities, the psychikoi (those with merely natural human life, psychē) translated in 2:14 as ‘unspiritual’. However, by using the ‘we’ form throughout (e.g. ‘we have received... the Spirit that is from God’, 2:12), Paul suggests that these special attributes are applicable to all believers. Those who ‘love God’ (2:9; cf. 8:3) are gifted with ‘the gifts of God’s Spirit’ (2:14; cf. 12:1–11), which, like the cross, appear foolish by worldly standards (2:14). The Spirit therefore enables an understanding much deeper than mere human knowledge (2:15). Indeed, Paul can even claim in 2:16 that the rhetorical question of Isa 40:13 (originally phrased to expect the answer ‘no one’) can be used to describe a position filled by believers, who really have ‘the mind of the Lord’ (here taken to refer to Christ). Such bold claims indicate that Paul regards Christian faith as opening a dimension of understanding far more profound than anything offered by non-believing perspectives; this is of a piece with his assertion that the cosmos, and time, and life, and death ‘belong to’ believers, inasmuch as they belong to Christ (3:21–3).

But Paul’s dialogue with the élite in Corinth cannot rest here. He now springs on them a rhetorical trap which denies to them the very spiritual superiority he had described in such glowing terms in 2:6–16. If what he has just described is the condition of the ‘spiritual’, let the Corinthians know that Paul could not initially impart such spiritual knowledge to them since they were merely ‘people of the flesh, infants in Christ’ (3:1). They cannot here be described as ‘unspiritual’ (2:14), since they had, as believers, received the Spirit (12:12–13); yet at the start of their Christian lives they were hardly spiritual in the terms they now claim, only ‘of the flesh’—that is, ensnared in merely human patterns of thought and behaviour (cf. the flesh–Spirit antithesis in Gal 5 and Rom 8). At that stage, they could only take milk and were not ready to be weaned (3:2). But now comes Paul’s really devastating blow: ‘even now you are still not ready, for you are still of the flesh’ (3:2–3, emphasis added). In other words, all that Paul has been saying about ‘the spiritual’ and their understanding of the mysteries of God cannot really be applied to the Corinthians: he has built up the mystique of this category only to deny that the Corinthians can fit it! This is the first of many attempts in this letter to puncture the pride of the Corinthian Christians, but there is no more devastating. The basis of Paul’s claim that they are still of the flesh is where the trap really bites: the jealousy and quarrelling evidenced in their claims of belonging to rival leaders (3:3–4) reveal precisely how immature they are! The party-groupings which set up rival claims to status in wisdom or in the excellence of the chosen leader indicate not how mature but how immature the Corinthian church is: their bids for superiority show just how inferior they are, operating on the level of mere squabbling humans rather than as gifted and inspired people of the Spirit. Thus it appears that the party claims ('I belong to Paul' etc.) which seemed to disappear from sight after 1:18 were actually in the background all along. For Paul they represent a mindset determined by the values of 'this age' which have been fundamentally subverted by the message of the cross (1:18–2:5) and superseded by the new depths of understanding afforded by the Spirit (2:6–16).

(3:5–4:5) Models of Leadership in the Church Now that he has returned to the topic of party groups in the Corinthian church (3:4), Paul constructs another line of argument against such factionalism, this time focused on leadership and its evaluation. To align oneself with one or another leader is, for Paul, to commit three cardinal errors: (1) to place leaders on a pedestal, where they do not belong; (2) to play them off inappropriately against one another; and (3) to reward them with human praise rather than leaving to God the assessment of their work. These three themes are the principal elements in the discussion of leadership in 3:5–4:5, which Paul develops by using metaphors drawn from agriculture (3:5–9), building (3:9–17), and household slavery (4:1–5). 3:18–23 forms an interlude which links this section back to 1:18–31 and points to the folly of the boasting which takes place in leadership competitions.

The agricultural metaphors in 3:5–9 emphasize the subordinate nature of Christian leadership as a task fulfilled only at the bidding of the Lord (3:5, 8) and in utter dependence on God's creative activity (3:6–7, 9). Paul and Apollos are no more than servants through whom (not in whom) the Corinthians believed (3:5). Paul, as founder of the church (a role he recalls frequently in this letter, cf. 3:10; 4:15; 9:2), may be said to have been its planter; Apollos' subsequent activity was to water the plants (3:6). But neither role is of any value without the gift of growth to the plants, a gift which only God can bestow (3:6–7). The Corinthians belong to the church by God's calling (1:2, 26–7), and it is God alone who is 'the source of your life in Christ Jesus' (1:30): thus it is absurd to use slogans which suggest that their leaders were themselves the creators, rather than simply the instruments, of the church's life. Moreover, the two tasks of planting and watering cannot be played off against one another: the two workers 'have a common purpose' (2:8; lit. 'are one'), so it is senseless to claim to belong to one and not to the other. They are 'working together' in an agricultural project planned and owned by God (3:9). And they will receive their reward not through human adulation but by God's assessment of their labour (3:8).

The end of 3:9 switches the metaphor to that of building, an image which governs the discussion of leadership in 3:10–15 and is then extended with reference to the temple (3:16–17). Paul the planter in 3:6 is now Paul the master builder, who laid the foundation of the church in Corinth (3:10). In this case reference is made not to Apollos, but to 'someone else' who is building on that foundation. Since within this metaphor God is less clearly the means of growth, the spotlight falls on human beings with responsibility for building, with a none-too-veiled threat that they may be performing their task badly (3:10, 12–13). The aggressive tone in Paul's voice has led many commentators to suspect that he is attacking some specific individual(s) in the church (e.g. Barrett 1971: 87–8). Moreover, it is tempting to take 3:11 as a rebuke of those who claim to belong to Cephas, on the basis of the famous rock prediction:

'You are Peter and on this rock I will build my church' (Mt 16:18). It is just possible that Paul is here attacking Peter and his influence in Corinth, though elsewhere in the letter he speaks of Peter in unpolemical terms (9:5; 15:5) and we do not know if the rock saying, which is found only in Matthew, was known in Corinth at this date. Paul is concerned at the direction of the current leadership of the church, and reveals those anxieties by warning of the consequences of building with worthless materials (3:12–15). Again the test of value comes not from present human assessment but from God's definitive judgement which will operate on 'the Day'. Building on traditional images of 'the Day of the Lord' as a fiery event (e.g. Mal 3:2–3; 4:1; cf. 2 Thess 1:7–8), Paul suggests that all worthless building materials will be consumed and the builder rewarded or punished ('suffer loss', 3:15) on the basis of what survives. The context suggests that he is referring specifically to those with leadership responsibilities, rather than to each individual believer. His basis for confidence that the builder will survive, even if his work is destroyed, is that God's grace has a secure grasp of those in Christ (cf. 5:5; 11:32). However, that does not negate the possibility that believers may somehow prize themselves away from Christ by continual and deliberate disloyalty (cf. 9:27; 10:6–12).

Indeed the seriousness of the building work being undertaken in Corinth is underlined in the extension of the metaphor to the church as a temple (3:16–17). Elsewhere, each Christian's body is described as a temple of the Holy Spirit (6:19), but here (as in 2 Cor 6:16) the church as a collective is so described. This is a striking transfer of terminology and allegiance from the Jerusalem temple, which was still standing at this time and was the object of reverence by Jews both in Palestine and in the Diaspora. Paul's Gentile converts were never instructed to pay any attention, or contribute any taxes, to that building; nor, of course, did they construct any 'temples' of their own. They were encouraged, rather, to think of themselves as a temple, the locus of God's holy presence. Thus, to inflict damage on a church community is to touch God's precious sanctuary, inviting his immediate judgement (3:17). Builders in Corinth should beware that they really build and do not destroy (cf. 8:10–11).

3:18–23 briefly interrupts the sequence of metaphors to underline once more the counter-cultural character of Christian commitment (3:18–19 echoes themes from 1:18–31). Expanding quotes from Job 5:12 and Ps 94:11, Paul emphasizes again God's opposition to the worldly standards of evaluation which undergird the Corinthians' rivalry as they boast in competing leaders (3:19–21). In fact, their slogans suggest a fundamental misapprehension of themselves and of the relationship between church and leader. Instead of saying 'I belong to Paul' (or whomever), they should recognize rather that Paul (or Apollos or Cephas) 'belong to' them (3:21–2). Although God's servants may play important roles in founding and encouraging the church, their purpose is not to win admirers or adherents but to serve the church to which they belong. By placing leaders on a pedestal the Corinthian church actually demeans itself: the leaders are there for the sake of the church, not the other way around. And Paul can expand this principle rhetorically with the claim that the world, life, death, and time are at the service of the church, because this community is not some mere club or social gathering but the centre of God's plan for the world and history (3:22; cf. 6:2–3 and the expansion of this theme in Colossians and Ephesians). At least, the church has that role inasmuch as (and only inasmuch as) it belongs to Christ (that is the one slogan from 1:12 which Paul does not here reverse); and Christ himself belongs to God (cf. 11:3; 15:28). As the token of the new creation in the midst of 'this age', the church has a significance far greater than the leaders God uses to serve it. But its significance lies only in the fact that it belongs and bears witness to Christ, the agent of God's re-creative power in the universe.

The third metaphor of leadership is that of household slaves, specifically stewards (4:1–5). Again it is implied that such figures should not be the objects of praise (they are only agents of Christ, or of 'the mysteries of God'); but the emphasis here falls on the assessment of their work. Stewards are held accountable as to their trustworthiness (4:2), but by their masters, not by those they encounter in the course of their work (cf. Rom 14:4). At this point, Paul becomes directly personal, applying the metaphor specifically to himself as one who might come under the Corinthians' scrutiny (4:3) but who prefers to leave the judgement to his master (4:4; 'the Lord', kyrios, means also 'the master' of a slave). Here then emerges, what we might have suspected all along, that the party divisions in Corinth represent a critical evaluation of Paul's apostleship, inasmuch as some claim to belong to others and not to Paul (1:12). As in 9:3, Paul hints at a body of opposition to his authority, but he attempts to defuse it by insisting that it is inappropriate for the Corinthians to judge his behaviour, and premature as well: when the Lord comes (and not before), he will give full and final judgement (4:4–5). What will count then is commendation from God (4:5), not the measure of praise (or criticism) leaders currently receive from members of the church.

(4:6–21) Paul's Apostolic Style and Authority The personal turn taken in Paul's final leadership metaphor (4:1–5) indicates the progression of the argument towards self-defence. It now becomes clear that Paul is under attack in Corinth, unfavourably compared with other leaders and criticized specifically for the poor figure he cuts and for his long absence from the scene. Paul's response requires him to confront and ridicule Corinthian pride (vv. 6–8), to describe, by contrast, his own highly vulnerable ministry (vv. 9–13), and finally to assert his fatherly authority in Corinth and announce his forthcoming visit (vv. 14–21).

Paul's first target is the inflated sense of importance in the Corinthian church, which he regards as the cause of their party rivalries: they are puffed up in comparing one leader with another, congratulating themselves on their chosen objects of allegiance (v. 6). Looking back on 3:5–4:5, Paul says he has 'applied all this to Apollos and myself for your benefit' (v. 6). The Greek here is slightly obscure and might mean simply that he has put his discussion in the form of analogies (relating to Apollos and himself) rather than using literal speech, or that he has changed the analogies from one metaphor to another (gardener, builder, steward) to make his points as clear as possible. Another possible nuance is that he has disguised his meaning, making explicit reference to Apollos and himself, but really referring to other people

(e.g. Cephas?). But it is unnecessary to attribute to Paul some subtle encoding of his message. He is simply drawing attention to his use of metaphor to indicate that he has set out these various leadership models in order to undercut the rivalries which afflict the Corinthian church. It is very hard to discern the source or meaning of the saying Paul cites in this context, 'Nothing beyond what is written' (v. 6; some suspect that the text is corrupt at this point). This looks like a slogan, but whose is it, and does it refer to Scripture or to something else that was 'written' (see Hooker 1963; Fee 1987: 166–9)? Few scholars claim to understand the allusion, which one imagines made more sense to the Corinthians than it does to us.

Paul regards Corinthian pride as manifest in a sense of special achievement and perfection. Their giftedness, which he recognized in 1:4–7, led to a sense of distinction, which easily obliterated gratitude for gifts received (v. 7). They have been enriched (by God, 1:5), but imagine themselves simply rich (v. 8); their notions of fullness and royal authority might be related to the Stoic notion of the self-sufficiency of the perfectly wise man. The sarcasm of v. 8 is an attempt to puncture that pride, and the following verses deflate it by depicting the life of the apostles (supposedly the models of the church) as the very opposite of the honour and victory which the Corinthians expect for themselves. Like those under a sentence of death, who are brought on at the end of a public spectacle to entertain the masses by their gruesome deaths, the apostles are a despicable sight, watched only to be ridiculed (v. 9). Their reputations match the folly, powerlessness, and shame of the cross (v. 10 echoes the themes of 1:18–25), and vv. 11–13 spell this out in practical terms, with some intriguing echoes of the ethos of the gospels (e.g. Mk 6:7–12; Lk 6:24–31). Included in this list of demeaning conditions of life is the fact that Paul works with his own hands (v. 12). That suggests that he is combating an ethos fostered by the social élite (who alone looked down on manual labour); in deliberate and perhaps exaggerated contrast, Paul presents himself as the scum of the earth (v. 13; cf. 1:28–9).

The polemical purpose of this self-portrait is evident when Paul declares his aim to be to 'admonish' his 'children' (v. 14); he denies that he wants to shame them (cf. however 6:5), but that cannot be ruled out as a proper result. It now becomes clear that Paul's role as founder of the church is crucial to his present bid to correct them. However many teachers and leaders may have operated in Corinth, they can have no status higher than 'guardian' (lit. childminder—the slave employed by parents to guard the safety of their children), whereas Paul is unique as their 'father' (v. 15). Paul wants to claim this role even in relation to those who were converted through other evangelists (e.g. after his departure from Corinth) and he uses it, as fathers often did in the ancient world, to require that his 'children' imitate his pattern of life and thought (v. 16). He is dispatching Timothy (perhaps with this letter) to reinforce his point, but also now promises to come in person (vv. 17–21). It appears that his long absence from Corinth has been criticized, or at least exploited, by those who think Paul's opinion about their affairs is insignificant (v. 18). With a final rhetorical flourish (still utilized by parents!) Paul offers them a choice: it is up to them whether he comes with gentleness or punishment (v. 21). This threat proved to be a fatal mistake, since Paul, when he finally did visit Corinth, found himself facing stiffer opposition than he had anticipated, and his stay proved extremely painful (2 Cor 2:1–2). The assertion of authority was to backfire in outright repudiation of Paul and still harsher criticisms of his ministry: in 2 Corinthians we can watch him trying to patch up a now deeply uneasy relationship.

Sexual and Related Issues (5:1–7:40)

(5:1–13) Expulsion of an Immoral Member of the Church The abruptness with which this chapter begins has led some to wonder whether it starts a new letter or is occasioned by some fresh news. But there are good reasons why Paul should have delayed treating such matters until now. The first four chapters of the letter, which undercut the Corinthians' pride and reassert Paul's authority, form the necessary platform for Paul to launch his specific assaults on behaviour in the Corinthian church. None of what follows in chs. 5–16 would cut any ice in Corinth unless the members of the church were prepared to reconsider their canons of 'wisdom' and to listen to their 'father' in Christ.

The oral information to which Paul responds here was apparently rather more damning than what the Corinthians had divulged in their letter (7:1). Paul is shocked that they have tolerated a form of sexual liaison which he considers scandalous even among 'pagans', whom he takes to have minimal moral standards (cf. 1 Thess 4:5). The 'immorality' (porneia) concerns a prolonged relationship between a man and his father's wife, probably his stepmother and probably after the death of his father. We cannot say more about the figures involved (Clarke 1993 suggests that the man may have had financial interests in such a relationship, e.g. to secure his inheritance), except that Paul's chastisement of the man alone suggests that the woman was not a Christian (cf. vv. 12–13). Sexual relations between a man and his stepmother were generally considered incestuous, both in Judaism (e.g. Lev 18:8) and in the Graeco-Roman world (Ap. Met. 10.2–12), and it is therefore surprising that this Corinthian believer had got away with such behaviour thus far. It is possible that he was too important socially to be subject to criticism, and that he justified his behaviour specifically on the basis of the Christian ethos of liberty. The latter may be hinted at by Paul's expostulation: 'And you are arrogant!' (v. 2). That arrogance may exist despite such sexual activity, but it might also flourish because of the claim to freedom from taboos which Christian faith was understood to entail: in 6:12 (and 10:23) Paul will cite a Corinthian slogan which suggests a conscious embracing of liberty, even in sexual conduct (6:13). For the rest of this chapter Paul simply assumes that this behaviour is wrong; its perpetrator must therefore, he insists, be expelled. Later, however, in 6:12–20, he gives some reasons why he thinks a Christian must be responsible in the use of his/her body.

In vv. 2–5 Paul portrays an act of expulsion (excommunication) which may owe something to synagogue practices known to him. He imagines the church gathering like a court, to pronounce judgement 'with the power of our Lord Jesus'. Such is his own strength of feeling, and his lack of confidence in the moral values of the Corinthian Christians, that he imagines himself present 'in spirit' and declares already what verdict the church court will reach: they are to 'hand this man over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh' (v. 5). Handing over to Satan (cf. 1 Tim 1:20) probably means expulsion, on the understanding that the world outside the church is in the grip of Satan ('the god of this world', 2 Cor 4:4), but it is unclear whether 'the destruction of the flesh' implies physical harm (cf. 2 Cor 12:7), even death (cf. 1 Cor 11:30), or, more benignly, the suppression of the man's fleshly nature, that is, his propensity to sin (cf. 3:3; Gal 5:19–21). In any case, Paul regards the final result of this action as in some way salvific: 'his spirit' (the Greek lacks 'his' and might conceivably mean 'the spirit of the church') will be saved in the final judgement. The connection between destruction of the 'flesh' and salvation of the 'spirit' is obscure, and depends on the meaning of each term. Does physical suffering chasten, or death make atonement for sin, or moral correction purify the individual's spirit (see Fee 1987: 208–13)? 1 Cor 11:32 might suggest some chastening process.

vv. 6–8 highlight the danger of the Corinthians' nonchalant attitude in this matter, drawing on purity metaphors associated with Passover. v. 6 contains a proverb (cf. Gal 5:9 and Mt 13:33) concerning the disproportionate influence of a tiny substance—in this case, clearly, the single individual in the corporate body of the church. But yeast leads Paul to think of Passover, and the need before Passover to clear out all traces of the substance (Ex 12:15). The church is to become unleavened (that is, without sin) because it is, in principle, a new, unleavened substance (v. 7); Paul often calls on his converts to become in practice what they already are. They are a part of the Passover feast founded on the sacrifice of Christ, the lamb (an unparalleled use of such imagery in Paul). Then, in v. 8, the church shifts within the metaphor from the unleavened dough to partakers of the festival: the Corinthians' church life may be considered a permanent Passover meal, which must be kept free from the impurities of 'malice and evil' such as the sexual sin presently tolerated in their midst.

Thus the final paragraph of this chapter (vv. 9–13) underlines the need for the church to condemn and expel the bad influence presently festering in its midst. In v. 9 Paul refers to his earlier letter as already issuing instruction to dissociate with the 'immoral'—an instruction which seems to have been objected to in Corinth as implying complete social withdrawal, but which Paul here insists meant only separation from immoral members of the church. He now makes clear that he does not require a sectarian retreat ('going out of the world', v. 10), although later chapters will indicate that he is unhappy with the degree of social integration which the Corinthian Christians enjoy (6:1; 10:14–22). He has no principled objection to social intercourse with unbelievers, even if they be immoral or 'idolatrous': the danger lies in association with those who have been accepted into the church as 'brothers' or 'sisters'. Paul assumes that the Corinthians will know for sure who are 'insiders' and 'outsiders' (5:12–13), probably on the basis of whether or not they have received baptism (6:9–11; 12:12–13). He regards it as far more dangerous to associate with immoral insiders than immoral outsiders, presumably because the example of the insider will be more influential on the rest of the congregation. Perhaps the Corinthians did not understand themselves to be committed to a common lifestyle or to be bound as tightly to each other as Paul here assumes.

They may have thought of 'religion' as quite separate from 'ethics' and their relationships with social equals more important than their fellowship with other believers. Paul's instruction here requires that they regard moral behaviour with the utmost seriousness and that they understand themselves as a community whose intensity of involvement with one another renders them vulnerable to internal corruption (v. 13 cites from a parallel theme in Deut 17; see Rosner 1994). The harsh measures advocated ('not even to eat with such a one', v. 11) would debar the offender from the communal Lord's Supper, which, like meals generally in antiquity, was an important token of association.

(6:1–11) The Absurdity of Using Corinthian Courts The theme of judging insiders rather than outsiders (5:12–13) leads Paul into a short digression. He will return to the topic of sexual morality at the end of ch. 6, but for now uses this opportunity to register his disapproval of Corinthian Christians who are settling their disputes with one another in the civil courts of Corinth. We do not know how many such cases there had been (perhaps only one), or precisely what they concerned, though the reference to 'defrauding' in v. 7 suggests financial disputes, which indeed were the most common cause of litigation in the Graeco-Roman world. Paul is affronted that the Corinthian Christians seem incapable of resolving their internal disputes without resorting to the judgement of 'unbelievers'. His objection lies not so much in his fear lest the community wash its dirty linen in public (he shows no concern here that it will be discredited), but in the absurdity of asking for judgement from people far less capable than believers. Those who sit in the Corinthian courts are described as 'the unrighteous' (v. 1) and 'unbelievers' (v. 6), and Paul's objection to resorting to their judgement is not simply that they are liable to be corrupt (though, arguably, justice was a rare commodity; see Winter 1991) but that they represent 'the world' (v. 2), the realm of unbelief which is by definition inferior in understanding and integrity to the circle of 'the saints'. Here the apocalyptic dualism between 'church' and 'world' which underlay Paul's whole discourse in chs. 1–4 has its social application in his insistence that the Corinthian Christians are in a wholly different category to outsiders (cf. esp. 2:6–8). The influence of this world-view is further evident in Paul's appeal to the apocalyptic notion that God's elect are destined to judge (or rule) the world in the end-time (v. 2; cf. Dan 7:22; 1 Enoch 1:9; Rev 2:26–7). As in 3:21–3, Paul cleverly portrays the Corinthian Christians as underestimating their own importance. If they remembered their destiny in judging the world, even angels, they would not consider themselves incompetent to judge the trivial matters which they now ask others to decide (vv. 2–4). In reality, the Christian parties to these disputes probably failed to see the church as a juridical entity and looked to Corinthian judges to provide publicly recognized verdicts which would restore their social honour. In Paul's view, such outside authorities 'have no standing in the church' (v. 4; lit. are despised by the church, contrast Rom 13:1–7). As a withering rebuke, he asks whether there is really no one in this community which so values wisdom who is wise enough to deal with this matter (v. 5)! The language here is reminiscent of Deut 1:16 (Moses' creation of courts in Israel), and the whole passage may reflect the operation of internal courts in some Diaspora Jewish communities.

In vv. 7–8 Paul steps onto a higher moral plane and asks how these lawsuits have arisen in the first place: to have them is already to lose them ('a defeat for you', v. 7). He hints at an ethic of non-retaliation reminiscent of the Sermon on the Mount, without invalidating the lesser solution of internal adjudication. It is best to accept injustice, and permissible to seek its rectification through an internal court, but it is inappropriate to ask 'the unrighteous' to judge such matters and utterly scandalous that Christians are themselves responsible for injustice in the first place—even against their fellow Christians (v. 8).

vv. 9–11 follow straight on: the wrongdoing which has given rise to the litigation threatens to place those responsible in the category of 'the wrongdoers' who will be excluded from the kingdom of God (v. 9). The theme of the kingdom of God features very rarely in Paul's theology, and is chiefly found in association with traditional formulae, as here where it is linked to a list of excluded persons (vv. 9–10; cf. Gal 5:19–21). The list here expands that offered in 5:10 and its opening with sexual sins and idolatry is parallel to Jews' denunciations of the sins they considered typical of the Gentile world (cf. Rom 1:18–31). The two terms translated (NRSV) as 'male prostitutes' and 'sodomites' (v. 9) have been the subject of some debate. The first (lit. soft people) could refer to 'womanizers' (i.e. those involved in heterosexual profligacy) but could also mean the passive partner in male homosexual acts; the second is a rare term (lit. sleeper with males) which probably designates the penetrating partner in male-with-male sex. Paul, like other Jews, considered either role in homosexual acts disgraceful (cf. Rom 1:26–7). The list also includes two terms for financial fraudulence ('thieves', 'robbers'), perhaps reflecting the character of the disputes just discussed. Such behaviour, Paul insists, cannot now characterize their Christian lives (v. 11). They have been washed, sanctified, and justified—a transformation whose description here probably alludes to the event of baptism. At that point they came under the authority of a new master ('in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ', cf. 1:13–15) and received a new identity 'in the Spirit of our God' (cf. 12:13).

(6:12–20) Immorality and the Significance of the Body The Corinthians would have agreed with Paul that their receipt of the Spirit gave them a new identity as 'spiritual people' (cf. 2:6–16). But Paul thinks that they have failed to grasp the implications of that change of identity, in particular the limits it sets on the use of their bodies. In v. 12 he twice cites a formula, 'all things are lawful for me' (cf. 10:23), which appears to be current in the Corinthian church and suggests a confident appropriation of Paul's gospel of 'freedom'. Paul does not reject it out of hand, but cautions lest its individualist emphasis ('all things are lawful for me') prove detrimental to the church as a whole: not all things are beneficial (i.e. to others). That insistence on considering the good of others will be the cornerstone of his argument concerning food in chs. 8–10 and spiritual gifts in chs. 12–14. Here Paul is also aware of how freedom can become a new slavery ('I will not be dominated by anything'); he has a lively sense of the power of sin (cf. Rom 6; Gal 5:13–24).

But Paul is most anxious lest this sense of freedom create a carelessness regarding bodily behaviour. The first part of 6:13 might again be a citation from the Corinthian church: “food is meant for the stomach and the stomach for food”, and God will destroy both one and the other”. The reference to food anticipates the discussion of chs. 8–10, where Paul challenges the ‘knowledgeable’ who consider themselves immune to corruption by such a paltry phenomenon as food. In Paul’s eyes this betrays a dangerously dualistic notion of the human person as possessing a spirit/soul in principle separable from the body. He fears that this might lead (or had already led) to the justification of sexual freedom on the basis that the satisfaction of sexual appetites was as insignificant as the assuaging of hunger. Thus he insists that ‘the body is not for porneia but for the Lord and the Lord for the body’ (v.13). Porneia was used in the Jewish tradition to refer to any sexual activity judged immoral (NRSV translates here ‘fornication’). Paul will later talk about a sex with a prostitute (porne, v. 15), but porneia could refer to anything he considered illicit (it is used also in 5:1 and 7:2). ‘The body’ (sōma) must here include the material/physical expression of our selves. In ch. 15 Paul will draw a distinction between the ‘natural body’ which cannot inherit the kingdom of God and the ‘spiritual body’ which will be the form of resurrection life (15:42–50). That complication, in the existence of two kinds of body, perhaps explains why Paul says here (v. 14) that God who raised the Lord will raise us up (not ‘will raise our bodies up’, as the line of argument might otherwise suggest).

None the less, Paul cannot concede that our present ‘natural bodies’ are irrelevant to Christian commitment. On the contrary, they are ‘members’—literally, limbs—of Christ (v. 15), so that the way we handle them inevitably draws Christ into our activities. Paul exploits this notion as far as possible by a novel application of Gen 2:24 (‘the two shall become one flesh’) to all sexual unions, not just marriage. The physical joining in sex with a prostitute actually links Christ’s body with that of a representative of sin—a union which Paul finds utterly scandalous. Hence the conclusion: ‘Flee immorality’ (v. 18; NRSV ‘Shun fornication!’). It is not altogether clear why this sin is here taken to be uniquely ‘against the body itself’, but Paul may be hinting at the way in which sexual activity affects (and therefore potentially corrupts) the whole person at the deepest point of our identity. Two final arguments underline the significance of the body for a believer. First, the body is indwelt by the Spirit of God, and thus has the sanctity of a temple (v. 19); and one does not treat a temple in a cavalier fashion (cf. 3:17). Secondly, believers come under an ownership: like slaves bought at a market (v. 20), they are answerable in totality to a master, and that includes their bodies (slaves were sometimes known simply as ‘bodies’; cf. Rev 18:13).

(7:1–40) Celibacy and Marriage Paul now mentions the letter he has received from the Corinthians (v. 1), which may set the agenda for most of the rest of this letter. It is often supposed that the Corinthians meekly asked Paul’s opinion on these matters, but the signs of tension in his relationship with them suggest that their approach might not have been so deferential. The subject-matter for this chapter is their statement (NRSV rightly uses inverted commas), ‘It is well for a man not to touch a woman’ (7:1). ‘Touch’ is a euphemism for sexual relations, and the statement seems to represent a principled rejection of all sexual activity. The position of those who held this view in Corinth may be deduced as: (1) Those who are single should avoid marriage (see 7:1, 8–9); (2) Those who are married should refrain from sex with their partners (see 7:3–6); (3) Those who are married should seek divorce (see 7:10–11), especially if they are married to an unbeliever (see 7:12–16); (4) Those who are engaged should not proceed to marriage (see 7:36–8). We cannot be sure why some Corinthians took this apparently ascetic stance. Early Christianity spawned many kinds of asceticism (Brown 1988), but here there may have been some denigration of the body arising from the exuberance of experience in the Spirit, combined with the assumption (widespread in antiquity) that prophecy and other activities involving special receptivity to God required withdrawal from the ‘pollution’ of sex. If some of the Corinthians were particularly ‘eager for spiritual gifts’ (14:12), ‘anxious about the affairs of the Lord, that they may be holy in body and spirit’ (v. 34), they may have regarded it as necessary to avoid sexual activity and advantageous to withdraw from, or to refuse to enter, marriage.

Paul begins his response to the Corinthians by dealing with the first three points in the summary above (vv. 1–16). He then draws back to illustrate his principle that believers should remain in the condition in which they were called, with reference to circumcision and slavery (vv. 17–24). When broaching the question of ‘virgins’ (unmarried persons eligible for marriage), he first expounds the advantages of detachment (vv. 25–31) and single-mindedness (vv. 32–5), before discussing the position of such virgins, together with the case of the eligible widow (vv. 36–40). Throughout he insists that marriage is not sin, and sex within marriage wholly appropriate (even necessary), but always with an unmistakable coolness. He consistently maintains that it is better, if possible, to be unmarried, provided that this does not (1) involve initiating a divorce, an action forbidden by the Lord (v. 10), or (2) subject the believer to irresistible passions, leading to sex outside marriage (vv. 2, 9). The lack of enthusiasm for marriage in its own right, for the procreation of children, or for the establishment of a Christian family (contrast Eph 5:21–6:4) is notable.

Paul starts by citing the Corinthian statement that ‘it is well for a man not to touch a woman’, but he cannot accept it fully, at least not within marriage. v. 2 could refer to men and women in general and their acquisition of marriage partners: ‘each man should have his own wife’ etc. (NRSV). But, in view of the following verses, it is perhaps more likely that it refers to married men and women who should ‘have’ (in the sense of ‘have sexual relations with’) their partners: thus, ‘each husband should have sex with his own wife’ etc. (Fee 1987: 277–80). The reason for Paul’s advice is his concern with immoralities, perhaps with specific ‘cases of immorality’ (NRSV) in mind, such as those alluded to in chs. 5 and 6. Lurking throughout this chapter is Paul’s fear of the power of sexual desire, which, if not fulfilled (or neutralized) within marriage, is likely to lead to sin. vv. 3–4 indicate the obligations and privileges of both marriage partners in sexual matters, with a degree of reciprocity highly unusual in antiquity; indeed almost every point in the chapter is discussed from both male and female angles. Nowhere is this more radical in effect than in the second half of v. 4. The first half, detailing the husband's authority over his wife's body, is a standard assumption in antiquity (and all other patriarchal societies). But the second, by putting the matter the other way around, undercuts assumptions of male privilege at their most sensitive point: the male body and its use in sex. Neither party is here allowed to make unilateral decisions: any period of sexual abstinence must be by agreement and of limited duration, lest the sexual urge (Satan's tempting) prove too strong (v. 5). Such a period of abstinence may enable a Christian couple to devote themselves to prayer, a notion with some parallels in Judaism (e.g. T. Naph. 8:8).

At v. 6 is the first of many indications in this chapter that Paul is careful not to establish rules or speak more confidently than is his right (cf. vv. 25, 40). The 'this' which he here concedes may be marriage, but more probably refers to temporary abstinence from sex within marriage. Then v. 7 means: I would like everyone to be sexually continent like myself, but recognize that some have this gift and can remain unmarried, while others do not, needing to marry and to fulfil the sexual obligations of that state. The 'gift from God' (charisma) represents the ability to remain celibate without succumbing to sexual desire.

vv. 8–9 turn directly to the unmarried and widowed. Paul himself is unmarried, perhaps because his conversion disrupted his life-plans so severely. The unmarried state is his preference for all (for reasons he will detail in vv. 25–35), but he is worried again by the power of sexual passion (likened here to a fire), which some need to tame, or quench, within marriage.

What about those who are already married and are tempted to escape from marriage? Here Paul for once gives a command (cf. v. 6), though not on his own authority but on that of the Lord (v. 10). This is one of those very few places (9:14 is another) where Paul refers explicitly to the teaching of Jesus. He here cites a saying also attested (with some variations) in the Synoptics, in which Jesus declared divorce to be illegitimate (Mk 10:2–11; Mt 19:3–9; Lk 16:18). In the case of a wife he imagines a second-best option whereby she separates/divorces (vv. 13–15 suggest that these may be synonyms for Paul) but does not marry again (v. 11). Some think that his special concentration on the woman might reflect a specific case, or growing tendency, in Corinth (Wire 1990). The acceptance of this second best ('if she does separate...') shows that Paul does not regard the teaching of Jesus as legislation; it sets some parameters, but allows for differences of situation. He will later acknowledge that a Christian may have to accept divorce at the hands of a non-Christian partner (v. 15), taking Jesus' principle to rule out only the initiation of divorce proceedings.

vv. 12–16 deal with the case of Christians already married to unbelievers. Paul does not recommend entering into such a partnership (7:39; cf. 2 Cor 6:14–16), but seems to envisage here the conversion of one partner in a marriage, a situation which could be fraught with difficulty if the Christian spouse disdained household idolatry (cf. 1 Pet 3:1–6). Such verses make clear that it was not always whole households which converted (cf. 1:16). In this case, Paul has no direct teaching from Jesus (v. 12), but adapts what he knows to fit the social necessities. He recommends staying in the marriage if at all possible and seems to be responding to fears that the believer is somehow defiled by this intimate contact with the 'unholy'. If the marriage is to be maintained, and if holiness or defilement are in some sense contagious, logic propels Paul to insist that the unbelieving spouse is actually made 'holy' through the believer, just as are the children of even one Christian parent (v. 14). This description of persons as being 'holy' or 'sanctified' is normally used by Paul only in relation to believers in Christ (e.g. 1:2; 6:11); it is strange to find it used here of unbelievers, whose future salvation is uncertain (v. 16). Children are mentioned here for the only time in the chapter and only as a supporting argument, and it is unclear what, if anything, is implied by their designation as 'holy' (v. 14). The verse has been used with equal force in arguments both for and against infant baptism, about which Paul never speaks explicitly. v. 15 recognizes that the non-Christian partner may not wish to continue a marriage with a spouse whose recent conversion creates tension in the marriage, and in this case Paul recommends allowing divorce for the sake of peace. Nothing here rules out remarriage, though the possibility is not mentioned. v. 16 could be translated in either an optimistic or a pessimistic sense. Optimistically ('who knows, you might save your spouse'), it undergirds the main thrust of the paragraph, urging a Christian to remain in a mixed marriage (so NRSV; REB; cf. 1 Pet 3:1–2). Translated in a pessimistic sense ('how do you know whether you will ever save your spouse?'), it discourages hopes of benefit from remaining in such a marriage and thus supports the concession of v. 15 that one may withdraw from a hopeless situation (so RSV; NIV). The former is slightly more likely.

The question of change of status leads Paul to formulate a general principle (v. 17): that you should lead whatever life is apportioned by the Lord, which is taken to be that state in which you were called. 'Called' is one of Paul's common terms for conversion, and he seems to be talking here of the state in which one becomes a Christian, not a vocation to which one is summoned (NRSV rightly translates at vv. 20, 24, but not at v. 17). Such a policy of 'stay as you are' is indeed his general advice in this chapter (if married, don't divorce; if single, remain so), with some exceptions allowed. It is now illustrated with regard to ethnic identity and social status (cf. the three categories in Gal 3:28). Circumcision, the sign of male Jewish identity, should not be reversed (as could be done by surgery or by stretching and pinning what remains of the foreskin); similarly the foreskin should not be removed for the sake of adopting Jewish identity. Here Paul summarizes the theme of his letter to the Galatians, insisting on the relativization of such cultural markers. Accordingly v. 19 echoes statements in Galatians (5:6; 6:15), though with a different and extremely puzzling conclusion. 'Keeping the commandments of God' in any normal Jewish sense would include the practice of circumcision; Paul has somehow redefined the notion to filter out certain commands which he considers unnecessary in a multi-ethnic church (cf. 9:19–21).

The second illustration concerns social identity, as slave or free person (vv. 21–4). Here the same 'stay as you are' principle is applied as a general rule, with legal status similarly relativized. Christian slaves can consider themselves 'freed persons belonging to the Lord' (freed persons usually had continuing obligations to their former owners), while Christians who are free are really 'slaves of Christ' (vv. 22–3). This compensatory redescription of reality renders social location irrelevant to Christian obligation (and perhaps even inverts the assumed hierarchy of slave and free, see Martin 1990: 63–8), enabling Paul to tell those in slavery not to mind about it (v. 21). However, the second half of v. 21 contains an ambiguity which has been the focus of some debate. The Greek could be taken to urge accepting slavery, even if there is an opportunity of gaining freedom (so NRSV). However, it could equally, and perhaps better, be taken in an opposite sense, providing a partial exception to the general rule of the paragraph: 'but if you can gain your freedom, be sure to use that opportunity' (so RSV). In most cases, as Bartsch (1973) pointed out, slaves would have no choice in this matter: if an owner wished to free a slave, it would happen whether the slave wished it or not. Since the chapter does contain other exceptions to the rule of 'stay as you are', and since v. 23 suggests that Paul considered freedom a better condition than slavery, the second, more positive, reading is to be preferred. None the less, the main thrust of the paragraph illustrates the rule of status-retention, which v. 24 reiterates.

In v. 25 Paul turns to the specific case of 'virgins', that is, those not yet married. Girls were typically married off by their parents at or very soon after puberty to men who were usually several years older. Marriage and the subsequent raising of children was taken to be a civic duty (to ensure future generations), but some radical philosophers (Cynics) took it to be a distraction from their philosophical calling. In what follows, Paul will mix some such Cynic motifs with his own apocalyptic reasoning about the end of the world (see Deming 1995). In the first instance (vv. 25–31) he applies the principle of 'stay as you are' on the grounds of the 'impending crisis' (v. 26). What he has in mind is made clearer in v. 29 ('the appointed time has grown short') and v. 31 ('the present form of this world is passing away'). Paul is convinced that he lives in the last generation (cf. 1 Thess 4:15 and 1 Cor 15:52). He thus harbours the apocalyptic belief that all present social structures will be dissolved, and also that the time preceding the 'end' will be characterized by acute distress ('the impending crisis'). Under such circumstances it is clear that marriage is of little value and the raising of future generations an irrelevance. Paul cannot advocate being rid of marriage relationships already entered, since he has the Lord's word forbidding divorce (v. 10). But neither can he recommend marriage for those as yet unmarried: it would not be morally wrong (vv. 28–9) but it would only make one more vulnerable to the distress of social breakdown. In fact, even for those who are married, Paul advocates an 'eschatological detachment': let them live 'as though they had no wives', like all dealings with the world must be conducted on the basis of 'as if not' (vv. 29–31). This sentiment is paralleled in Jewish apocalyptic documents (e.g. 2 Esd 16:40 ff.). It is not entirely clear what it would mean for married men to live 'as though they had no wives' (vv. 2–5 suggest it cannot mean a withdrawal from sex), but in some general sense marriage is relativized here as an institution hardly worth investing in.

The second reason for Paul's coolness regarding marriage is spelt out in vv. 32–5. Paul wishes his converts to be 'free from anxieties', or more precisely, free from competing anxieties. Like the Cynics, Paul is impressed by the amount of attention to the marriage partner required by marriage (again he oddly fails to mention children), regarding these as 'the affairs of the world' which constitute a distraction from 'the affairs of the Lord'. For him, marriage and family life are not part of a believer's service to the Lord but a competing interest which prevents 'unhindered devotion to the Lord' (v. 35; cf. v. 34: 'his interests are divided'). The specific reference to the woman's concern 'to be holy in body and spirit' (v. 34) may allude to the concerns of particular Corinthian women, who operated as prophets (11:2–16). Once again, Paul is cautious not to side too strongly with those who forbid marriage (v. 35), but it is clear that he considers 'good order' and 'devotion to the Lord' better served by singleness. It is possible that he considers himself in this respect a better 'worker' than other apostles who were accompanied by their wives (9:3–6; 15:10).

The next paragraph (vv. 36–8) returns to the practical matter of virgins, first signalled in v. 25. Unfortunately, the paragraph could be read in a number of different ways (see Fee 1987: 349–55). Some interpret it as concerning a young girl's father, who is responsible for marrying off his daughter: the verb used for 'he who marries his virgin' (v. 38) normally means 'he who marries her off', i.e. arranges her marriage. Then the Greek could be taken to refer to a father anxious about his treatment of his daughter, if she is getting over-age (the Greek translated in NRSV 'if his passions are strong' could be taken in this quite different sense; a girl might be considered 'overripe' in her early twenties!); then it is no sin for him to allow and arrange her marriage. The more usual interpretation of the text (adopted by the NRSV and by most commentators) takes it to speak of an unmarried man and his desire to marry, or his control over this desire. Oddly, in either case, the girl's wishes in this matter are entirely ignored. Whether Paul envisages some sort of permanent 'engagement' is unclear. As throughout the chapter, Paul allows marriage ('it is no sin') but considers it a second-best option (v. 38).

That principle is finally applied to the case of a widow (vv. 39–40; many girls were widowed quite young). By the rule of 'no divorce' (v. 10) a woman can consider remarriage only on the death of her husband (cf. Rom 7:1–4); then she may remarry 'in the Lord' (the choice cannot have been great in a small congregation). But Paul's preference for singleness is again evident (v. 40). His final sentence sums up his surprising hesitancy on this matter, unless there is irony in his claim that he too (as much as the 'spiritual people' in Corinth) has access to the wisdom of the Spirit (cf. 2:14–16).

Sacrificial Food and the Dangers of Idolatry (8:1–11:1)

8:1 opens a new section of the letter, on 'food sacrificed to idols', perhaps another issue raised in the Corinthian letter. At first sight, the content of ch. 9 appears out of place in this section. However, as we shall see, it actually fits perfectly as an illustration of what Paul requires of the 'people of knowledge': that they renounce their 'rights' for the sake of others. It has often been noted that Paul's softer tone on the consumption of sacrificial food in 8:1–13 and 10:23–11:1 appears inconsistent with his hard-line attitude to idolatry in 10:1–22; some have even suspected the combination of two or more letters at this point. There is indeed a certain dialectic in Paul's position regarding such food, which might mask inconsistency: he himself calls attention to this dialectic in 10:19–20. But the distinctions he draws between the different contexts in which sacrificial food is eaten, and the different intents such eating represents, make it possible for him to give such a nuanced response. Moreover, it is quite like Paul to advance an argument by a range of different strategies which may not cohere perfectly with one another (cf. his response to ‘speaking in tongues’ in chs. 12–14).

The issue of ‘sacrificial food’ arises from the fact that food consumption was frequently associated with the deities, whether by prayer, libation, or sacrifice, and that the slaughter of animals often took place in the context of temple worship. Jews, who were notoriously averse to ‘alien’ religious practices, abstained from food and wine which had become tainted by association with gods other than their own. The early Christian movement was generally Jewish in ethos, but in many places attracted a majority of Gentile members in churches which were prepared to abandon some distinctive Jewish practices (such as circumcision and Sabbath observance). It was thus possible for uncertainty to arise as to the proper Christian stance towards Greek and Roman deities (which Jews called ‘idols’), or at least towards the meals, festivals, club-dinners, and parties which were generally accompanied by some sort of religious activity. Many kinds of food might be considered to be affected: portions could be offered on an altar in domestic or public settings, or liquids poured out as a libation (see Willis 1985; P.D. Gooch 1993). Paul seems to be particularly concerned here with meat (8:13). Wealthy individuals or clubs often brought animals for slaughter at a temple, one portion being reserved for the deity (i.e. the priests), with the rest consumed in an ordinary meal either on the site (many temples had dining rooms) or in a private setting. Even meat sold in the meat market might have been offered to a deity, so a believer anxious to avoid any contact with idolatry might balk at the purchase of meat there and at the fare provided in taverns or in an unbeliever’s house. On the other hand, dinner invitations, club meetings, family celebrations, and civic festivals were such an important part of social life that some Christians might be reluctant to adopt a rigorous stance on this issue; that would certainly affect the lives and prospects of such socially significant believers as Gaius and Erastus (see E.1).

Many ambiguities surrounded the issue of sacrificial food. Was all the meat idolatrous or only those portions specifically reserved for the deity? Was one tainted by association with idolaters at occasions when they committed idolatry, or not? What, in any case, constituted ‘idolatry’ and how were the images to be regarded? In Graeco-Roman culture, general reverence for the images of the deities included a range of attitudes to their relation to reality: some considered the gods to be present within the images, others that they merely represented some divine attribute. In these chapters Paul is in dialogue with a group within the Corinthian church who considered themselves knowledgeable in such matters (‘we all possess knowledge’, 8:1). It appears that these are an educated élite: in a spirit of confident monotheism they take idols to represent nothing at all (8:4), and reason that participation in idolatrous meals, even in idolatrous worship, was a meaningless and harmless activity. This stance was probably bolstered by social convenience, but Paul takes it seriously as a theological position which was not entirely incorrect but which could have dangerous effects both on themselves and on other, ‘weaker’, Christians.

(8:1–13) Debate with the ‘Knowledgeable’ concerning their ‘Right’ to Eat As in ch. 7, Paul starts by citing a phrase used in the Corinthian letter: ‘all of us possess knowledge’ (8:1). He will shortly deny this claim, since he is aware of vulnerable Christians in Corinth unable to take this knowing stance towards ‘idols’ (v. 7). But his first reaction is against the spirit of the assertion. Although he recognizes knowledge as a gift of the Spirit (1:5; 12:8), he senses here the dangers of pride and self-interest, which subordinate care for others to the acquisition and display of one’s own knowledge. Thus, once again, he warns against becoming ‘puffed up’ (cf. 4:6 and the same verb, translated as ‘to be arrogant’, in 4:19, 5:2, and 13:4) and sets the priority on the constructive capability of love (v. 2; cf. chs. 12–14). In the very claim to knowledge Paul fears the corrupting power of arrogance which needs to be humbled by recognizing the inadequacy of our present ‘knowledge’ and the far greater value of being ‘known by’ God (vv. 2–3; cf. 13:8–13).

On the basis of this caution Paul addresses the knowledge in question (vv. 4–6). Again he quotes Corinthian statements that ‘no idol in the world really exists’ (or, ‘the idol-image represents nothing in the world’) and that ‘there is no God but one’ (v. 4). Paul can readily agree with the second statement, a cardinal tenet of Judaism. The first contains some ambiguity (see the alternative translations just offered) and it is possible that Paul and the Corinthians understood it in different senses. Paul could accept that the image is insignificant, but, as the next verse and 10:19–20 make clear, he does not doubt the reality of the spiritual beings which were the object of worship in Graeco-Roman religion. If the Corinthian élite think there are no such beings (and thus participate in pagan worship as a harmless inanity), Paul will have to reprimand them severely (10:1–22). Even here he insists on the exclusivity of Christian commitment (vv. 5–6). Whatever deities others might worship—and Paul insists that they are only ‘so-called gods’ (cf. Gal 4:8)—‘yet for us there is one God... and one Lord ...’ The confessional and formulaic character of v. 6 suggests the presence here of a credal statement in which we see Christology coming to birth. The Jewish Shema (‘Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord’, Deut 6:4) is here split apart into a statement about God, the creator of the world and goal of salvation, and a matching statement about the Lord, now taken to mean Jesus Christ, the medium of creation and redemption. The two are clearly distinguished (cf. 3:23; 11:3; 15:27–8) but the way in which Paul reads them both out of the Jewish declaration of monotheism is suggestive of the ways in which Christian theology will struggle to define Christ’s exalted status without falling into ditheism (see further Hurtado 1988 and Dunn 1991).

Before proceeding further on this theological tack, Paul reminds the élite that they are not as representative of the church as they think (v. 7) and that they have responsibilities to fellow believers which override their ‘right’ to eat whatever food they wish. Paul knows that, after a lifetime of worship of ‘so-called gods’, converts are apt to be uneasy about contact with religious practices which they consider themselves to have renounced; if they were to eat such food again, their vulnerable self-image as Christians (their 'conscience') would be 'defiled' (v. 7). In itself, food is not of decisive significance in our relationship to God (v. 8, possibly, but not certainly, another Corinthian statement). Therefore, Paul insists, nothing fundamental is lost by declining to eat certain foods; he deliberately overlooks the social loss which might result from scrupulosity regarding 'idolatrous food'. Since the 'knowledgeable' people have no grounds for insisting on such eating, Paul is entitled to warn them lest their 'liberty' (v. 9, or 'right'; the noun echoes the slogan of 6:12) cause disaster for more vulnerable Christians. The 'stumbling-block' referred to here (cf. Rom 14) signals much more than 'offence' or 'shock': it suggests causing others to fall catastrophically, resulting in their 'destruction' (v. 11). The danger Paul has in mind is that 'the weak' (those whose self-image as Christians is vulnerable) will be encouraged, or pressurized, by the example of 'the knowledgeable' to eat food which they know, or suspect, has been sacrificed to idols. While such eating may not cause the knowledgeable to falter in their Christian commitment (since they regard the idol as a 'nothing'), it could disastrously compromise the commitment of weaker Christians, who might now view themselves as having reversed their decision to renounce idolatry. Paul imagines this happening if the knowledgeable are seen 'eating in the temple of an idol' (v. 10). Later (10:14–22) he will advance other reasons for caution about such behaviour, but here he maintains his focus on the effect which this display of superior knowledge could have on the weak: in their uncertainty of self-image as Christians, they may be 'encouraged' (Paul says 'built up', with conscious irony) to follow suit, with disastrous consequences. Damage against believers for whom Christ died diminishes his work and thus constitutes sin against Christ (vv. 11–12). Rather than looking down on the weak with the disdain typical of elite classes in Graeco-Roman society, the people of knowledge are here required to take them with full seriousness, as fellow Christians (cf. 11:17–22; 12:14–26): love is more important than knowledge (vv. 1–3). Thus, to use himself as an example, Paul renounces his right to eat meat, in case it causes the collapse of another's faith-commitment (v. 13).

(9:1–23) Paul's Example in Renouncing the 'Right' to Financial Support Ch. 9 appears to veer off in a different direction from the topic of food offered to idols. Here we have Paul's impassioned plea to be regarded as an apostle in Corinth (vv. 1–2), a long series of arguments concerning his right to receive support (vv. 3–14), and then his declaration that his boast lies precisely in making no use of this right (vv. 15–18) and in offering himself, although free, as a slave of all (vv. 19–23). All this is not, however, as irrelevant as it might seem. Paul finished ch. 8 by offering himself as an example of willingness to renounce his right to eat meat, if that was necessary for the sake of others. That leads him to present himself as an example on a wider plane of this principle of renunciation of rights. He has the right as an apostle to be given his material upkeep, but for the sake of the gospel he has renounced this: although 'free' and entitled to exercise certain rights, he has chosen to make himself a slave (v. 19). But this illustration is not unproblematic, because it is precisely his refusal to accept financial support from the Corinthians which has led some to doubt whether he is an apostle at all. It is because he knows that his status is questioned by some in Corinth that Paul chooses to use this controversial matter as his illustration: thereby he can defend himself, reassert his apostleship, and present himself as the Corinthians' model (cf. 11:1) all at the same time. This means that it is some time before Paul returns explicitly to the subject of sacrificial food, but such apparent digressions which actually advance the argument at a deeper level are typical of Paul's rhetoric (cf. ch. 13 between chs. 12 and 14).

'Freedom' may have been the watchword of the 'people of knowledge' in Corinth: it sums up their assertion of rights and that 'all things are lawful' (6:12; 8:9; 10:23). Hence Paul declares that he, too, is 'free'—in particular, endowed with the 'rights' of an apostle. His claim to apostleship was heavily contested in his generation, since he had not been a disciple of Jesus, had persecuted the church, and was often at odds with the 'mother church' in Jerusalem. Paul here rehearses the grounds for his claim: that he saw (and was commissioned by) the risen Christ (cf. 15:3–11) and that he has successfully founded churches (vv. 1–2). He hopes that the Corinthians will recognize at least this second claim, but has to counter immediately a prejudice against his apostleship which has taken root precisely in Corinth.

While staying in Corinth, Paul had apparently supported himself entirely by his own labour (according to Acts 18:3, as a leather worker), and even when the church he founded had offered him financial support he had refused to take it (cf. 2 Cor 11:7–11). It is not entirely clear why this became a matter of principle for him in Corinth; elsewhere he acknowledges receiving support from Macedonian churches (2 Cor 11:9; Phil 4:10–20). Perhaps he feared lest wealthy Christians in Corinth might wish to use their financial patronage to influence his preaching or control his movements. In any case, the fact that he did not accept support from Corinth turned out to be a bone of contention. Other 'apostles', whom the Corinthians knew about or met, received support, probably appealing to the words of Jesus and the example of travelling missionaries in Judea and Galilee (see Theissen 1982: 27–67). To forgo this right might thus appear to place Paul at a lower level than 'real' apostles, and for Paul to support himself by manual labour was to demean himself in the eyes of wealthier Christians (cf. 4:12).

Thus Paul confronts directly those who 'examine' him (v. 3; the same verb is used in 2:15 and 4:3). He declares his entitlement to the same forms of material support as other apostles (vv. 4–6), making special mention of 'the brothers of the Lord' (e.g. James, 15:7), and Cephas, the hero of the Cephas group, 1:12). He then strings together an impressive collection of arguments for this entitlement (vv. 7–14). He appeals first to human parallels (soldiers, vineyard workers, and shepherds), where workers expect some return for their labour (v. 7). He then turns to the Scriptures for the same principle, offering an allegorical reading of Moses' law about the threshing ox (vv. 8–11; see Deut 25:4). It is not often that Paul appeals directly to 'the law of Moses' for moral guidance (his letters to the Galatians and Romans show what an ambiguous entity 'the law' has become for him). Nor does he usually employ allegory in his interpretation of the Scriptures (Gal 4:21–31 is the only other example), although it was a technique long-established among Hellenized Jews. In his concern to find a moral lesson in the law, Paul insists that Moses really speaks only about human welfare, not about oxen. Allegorists such as the Jewish philosopher Philo sometimes took both literal and allegorical meanings as valid, but sometimes, like here, considered only the allegorical worthy of God. Paul applies this verse to his situation by a double transference: in talking of oxen, God is talking about human ploughers and reapers (v.10); and this principle can be applied to those who sow spiritually, and may expect to reap in exchange (v. 11). Paul can also appeal to the benefits enjoyed by priests in a temple (v. 13) and, finally, to the direct instruction of the Lord (v. 14; cf. Mt 10:10; Lk 10:7–8; 1 Tim 5:18). It is intriguing that this should be mentioned last, and without any special emphasis or priority over the previous arguments. That may be related to the fact that Paul cites this command only to declare that it does not apply to him!

Before finishing this chain of argumentation, Paul had anticipated his conclusion (v. 12): he has the rights to which he appeals but has opted not to make use of them, if to do so would place an obstacle in the way of the gospel. Now it becomes clear how this whole discussion relates to Paul's instruction to 'the people of knowledge' in ch. 8. In 8:9 he had warned them that their 'right' (NRSV: 'liberty') could be a stumbling-block to the weak and should be waived if it proved to be so. Here he presents himself as a model of such voluntary renunciation of rights, for the sake of the gospel. In his case, too, Paul has the 'weak' especially in mind (v. 22 highlights his accommodation to the weak, not the strong). By refusing to accept support, Paul ensures that he is not a burden on those with little to spare: he works with his hands and thereby identifies with those who are socially and economically weak, even at the risk of offending the wealthier converts who would like Paul to accept their patronage and quit his embarrassing mode of work (Martin 1990: 117–35).

vv. 15–18 explain further this renunciation of rights and its importance for Paul. Preaching the gospel 'free of charge' was an important and distinctive feature of Paul's ministry: indeed, the sentence structure breaks down in v. 15 to reveal how emotionally significant is this 'ground for boasting'. He now plays with the theme of employment and 'pay' (the Gk. word misthos means both 'pay' and 'reward'). The fact that he preaches the gospel is not for Paul a matter of choice, but of necessity (v. 16; cf. Gal 1:15–16). If it were a matter of choice, he would be a free agent, and like any other free man would expect pay ('reward') for work completed. But he is not a free agent, he is 'entrusted with a commission', that is, working for Christ as his slave-steward (v. 17; the same metaphor as in 4:1–2). Slaves do not get pay ('reward') just for doing what their owners tell them to do. Paul's 'reward' (pay) is to do what he has been instructed to do under very special conditions: to make the gospel 'free of charge'. Ironically, then, his spiritual pay is to receive no financial pay for the fulfilment of his task (v. 18).

This might look like a form of self-interest, to get some reward out of what he does, if Paul did not go on to explain his motivation in vv. 19–23. His goal is not self-gratification but the interests of the gospel, and in particular the desire to 'win' converts. Like a demagogue who enslaves himself to the populace to campaign for their rights, Paul has deliberately renounced rights and demeaned himself to advance the cause of the gospel (v. 19). His self-sacrifice is first illustrated by the chief characteristic of his mission, his cross-cultural adaptability (vv. 20–1). Among Jews he could live like a Jew: that is, among the law-observant he observes the law, although not considering himself utterly bound to it (v. 20). The purpose is to win Jews for the gospel; for, although his call was 'to the Gentiles' (Rom 1:5), Paul still associated with Jews, as his synagogue visits testify (2 Cor 11:24). Similarly, for Gentiles 'outside the law' Paul lived in a Gentile fashion, although in truth not lawless before God, but under full obligation to Christ (v. 21, 'under Christ's law'; no code of teaching is here envisaged). Again the purpose is to win Gentiles, the task in which Paul was so successful, though at the cost of his reputation among most fellow Jews, who took his adaptability to be merely opportunism (Gal 1:10). This loss of clear-cut cultural identity is paralleled by his loss of honour in 'becoming weak' (v. 22), identifying with those who possessed less knowledge and less social significance than the élite leaders of the Corinthian church. Paul is prepared to give up cultural and social rights for the sake of the gospel, and hints that only by so doing will he share its blessings (v. 23). Thus he is entitled to challenge the 'people of knowledge' in Corinth as to their willingness to do the same. If they are not willing, he suggests, they may forfeit its blessings and lose out on the salvation which they take for granted. Such is the turn his argument now takes in 9:24–10:22.

(9:24–10:22) The Dangers of Complacency in relation to Idolatry While 9:24–7 still takes the form of discourse about himself, Paul now begins to turn his own example into challenge to his Corinthian audience. He uses images from the games which would be particularly vivid in their imagination, since Corinth hosted the biennial Isthmian games, drawing participants from all over the Graeco-Roman world. Entering the race is not the same as winning it: the Corinthians still have to make sure they 'run' successfully (9:24). Sporting heroes were extremely famous in antiquity and it was well-known that they underwent very rigorous training in order to win a garland. That was a motif often used in popular philosophy to indicate the seriousness of a moral lifestyle, and Paul employs it here to urge self-discipline for the sake of a far more valuable prize, salvation (9:25). Practice, discipline, and self-control were all essential for an athlete's success, whether the sport was running or boxing (9:26). Without them, a promising career would easily be spoiled, and Paul takes seriously the possibility that he himself might be 'disqualified' by God, excluded from salvation (or at least from its 'reward', cf. 3:14–15) even after having brought others into it (9:27).

The note of warning to the Corinthians is becoming louder, but before turning the spotlight directly back on to them Paul invokes a cautionary tale from the Scriptures (10:1–13). He finds no difficulty in using scriptural narratives to illustrate God's dealings with the church, since he regards the Israelites in the desert as 'our ancestors' (10:1) even though the church he is writing to is mostly Gentile (see further Hays 1989). Paul recounts the story of Israel's disobedience in the wilderness because it illustrates precisely what he wants to warn the Corinthians about: that even those chosen by God can go badly astray; and if they do, whatever their privileges, they are liable to destruction. The fact that the story concerns idolatry and sexual immorality makes it immediately relevant to a church which worries Paul on both these scores.

Paul detects among the Corinthian Christians a sense of privileged security in which they consider themselves immune to danger. Perhaps it is on this basis that the people of knowledge have the confidence to attend idolatrous events, reckoning that nothing can harm their status as spiritual people. They may have taken particular pride in their baptism as ensuring salvation and in the Lord's Supper as replenishing their spiritual resources. Both would therefore constitute rites which, like some Graeco-Roman mysteries, confirmed their superior status and sealed their immortality. It is probably for this reason that Paul describes the Israelites' experience in terms which match Christian rites. As they went under the cloud and through the (Red) Sea, the Israelites were 'baptized into Moses' (10:2), just as Christians were baptized into Christ (1 Cor 12:12–13; Gal 3:27); similarly, as they ate the manna and drank from the rock in the desert, they partook of 'spiritual' food and drink like that enjoyed in the Lord's Supper (10:3–4). Indeed, Paul even claims that the Israelites drew nourishment, in a sense, from Christ himself, who is identified with the rock from which the water issued (10:4). He here draws on Jewish exegesis which reflected on the fact that the Pentateuchal narratives place this rock in different locations: had it therefore 'followed' the Israelites through the desert? In some quarters this rock had also been allegorized as 'Wisdom', from which the righteous drew spiritual nourishment, and Paul may be drawing on an early Christian identification between Christ and Wisdom (cf. 1:30 and 8:6). None the less—and this is the point of the illustration—despite having access to all the same privileges as the Corinthian Christians (baptism, 'spiritual' food and drink, and even Christ himself), the Israelites were not immune from God's punishment when they went astray: in fact, most of them were destroyed (10:5).

In 10:6 and 10:11 Paul explains the principle by which he interprets the Israelites' story: these events are an example, and were written down as a warning, indicating the dangers for God's people if they entertain evil desires. Indeed, 10:11 suggests that they were written specifically for 'us', that is, the Christians who live in the final generation, the climactic junction of time Paul calls 'the ends of the ages' (cf. 7:29–31; cf. Rom 15:4). 10:7–8 runs through a list of Israel's errors, perhaps a stock résumé of the wilderness sins: idolatry, in the worship of the golden calf (10:7, citing Ex 32:6); 'sexual immorality' (porneia, see 1 Cor 5:1), in forging illicit marriages with Midianite women (10:8, alluding to Num 25, where, however, the casualty figure is 24,000); putting Christ to the test (10:9, alluding to Num 21; some texts read 'the Lord', which is how the scriptural narrative puts it, but generally Paul takes 'the Lord' in the Scriptures to refer to Christ); and finally, complaining, in grumbling about God's purposes or Moses' leadership (probably alluding to Num 14 or Num 16, with the notion of the 'destroyer' transferred from Ex 12:23). In each case, the outcome is the same: the 'destruction' of the sinners. If such stories are of immediate relevance to the Corinthians as 10:11 suggests, then the warning is clear: they are in as much danger as the Israelites in the desert. Paul turns directly against the confidence of the Corinthian leaders with the warning of 10:12. No situation is uniquely difficult or inescapable, and they cannot claim to be helpless or faultless if they sin: God will enable them to endure temptation (cf. 1:8–9) and will always provide an escape route (10:13). The question is whether the Corinthians will be willing to take it and the social inconvenience it may cause.

The notion of 'escape' leads into Paul's direct instruction: 'flee from the worship of idols' (10:14). Of the wilderness sins recounted in 10:7–8, it is idolatry which is Paul's most immediate concern. He has still to confront the people of knowledge concerning their easy dismissal of the significance of 'idols' (8:4), since he fears (or knows) that this attitude will justify their convenient participation in acts of worship to idols. Addressing them, with slight condescension, as 'sensible people' (they boast of their 'knowledge', 8:1), he urges them to consider what sorts of 'partnerships' (or 'sharing', Gk. koinōnia) they are undertaking. At the Lord's Supper, the cup (known as 'the cup of blessing' because of the prayer, blessing God, which is spoken over it) is a 'partnership' in the blood of Christ. Similarly, the bread which is broken is a 'partnership' in the body of Christ (10:16). It is difficult to determine what sort of 'sacramental theology' undergirds these statements. Is the 'partnership' merely represented by the cup and bread, or actually effected by it? And what is the relationship between the cup and blood, and between the bread and body (cf. 11:24–5)? But what is clear, and what Paul is concerned to stress, is that participation in this meal signals a bond between the participant and Christ, a bond which must be exclusive of all others (10:21–2; cf. the parallel argumentation in 6:15–17).

The reference to the 'bread' and the 'body' leads Paul into a brief aside concerning the 'one body' of the church (10:17, anticipating 11:17–34 and 12:12–31), a motif which should encourage the people of knowledge to take more care of their fellow 'limbs' who have weaker consciences (cf. 10:23–4). But the main point of the paragraph is pursued again in 10:18 with reference to Jewish sacrificial practice, where partaking in sacrificial victims joins an individual to the worship offered at the altar. Paul considers that the same applies to worship and sacrifice in Graeco-Roman religion. 10:19 makes clear that he has not revoked the convictions he set out in ch. 8: it is not that the food is significant in itself (thus the act of eating is not so much the problem), nor that the 'idol' (i.e. the image) is itself of importance (its presence or proximity at a meal is not problematic); rather, in the act of sacrifice, Gentiles devote themselves to 'demons' and thus create a 'partnership' with beings which are wholly out of bounds for a believer. Paul here uses the word daimonion, which refers in normal Greek to a supernatural being of lesser significance and more ambiguous virtue than a full god, but one not necessarily evil; in time, however, Jewish and Christian usage was literally to 'demonize' all such beings. The point here is that such a partnership is incompatible with belonging to Christ, on the Jewish principle that God is jealous of all rivals (10:22, echoing Deut 32:21). The people of knowledge may be strong compared with the weak in conscience, but they are not 'stronger than' God (10:22), that is, strong enough to withstand the sort of judgement which the wilderness stories have threatened.

Paul thus issues a ban on actions which constitute personal involvement in idolatry (worship of idols). The following paragraph (10:23–11:1) will show greater latitude regarding situations where there is no personal participation in idolatry. The hard line he takes here may appear to go further than the argument he employed in 8:4–13, where his concern was the effect of eating sacrificial food on others, rather than its threat to one's own partnership with Christ; but the difference is one of focus rather than substance. In practice, it may have been difficult to define, or to anticipate, where a believer was implicated in acts of idolatry, for instance, when attendance at a meal in a temple or in the presence of an idol might involve the banqueters in sacrifice or other acts of worship. Perhaps Paul underestimated the complexity of such situations, but it is clear at least that he cannot tolerate the forging of a link to alien entities, which, though they may not be gods, are none the less potent rivals to Christ (cf. 15:24–8).

(10:23–11:1) Practical Guidelines on Eating and Avoiding Offence The ban on participation in 'idolatry' has not yet resolved all the practical issues, since there are places and occasions where sacrificial food may be on offer without involving the believer in idolatry. In such matters, again the crucial issue is the effect of one's actions on other people, particularly other believers: we have returned full circle to the concerns of ch. 8, since Paul still maintains that love is a more valuable criterion than knowledge (8:1–3). Thus, while citing again in 10:23 the Corinthian principle of freedom (cf. 6:12), Paul insists on modifying it with reference to what 'builds up', that is, what is beneficial to others (cf. 8:1). The tendencies of the élite are to protect their own interests in such matters, advancing their social position by minimum abstentions from sacrificial food; but Paul calls them to seek, first of all, the advantage of others (10:24). In the case of food sold in the meat market (which might or might not have passed through a temple in the process of slaughter), Paul encourages complete freedom: ignorance as to the history of the food means that no one's conscience (identity as a Christian) is affected by eating this food. Most Jews were more anxious about avoiding food possibly tainted by idolatry, but Paul overrules this scruple since eating such food from a market risks no personal participation in idolatry, and since the food itself is a part of God's good creation (10:25–6, boldly citing Ps 24:1 in support). In the case of a meal at an unbeliever's house, ignorance is again encouraged for the same reasons (10:27), but here complications may arise from the involvement of other people in the meal. Paul is concerned for the 'conscience' of someone else who declares the food to have been involved in sacrifice (10:28). Because the phrase, 'This has been offered in sacrifice', does not use the Jewish/Christian term 'idolatrous', many interpreters take this informant to be a non-believer (either fellow-guest or host; e.g. Fee 1987: 483–5). But it is hard to see why Paul would be concerned with an unbeliever's conscience in this matter, and it is better to see here the same weak Christians as were in view in ch. 8 (Barrett 1971: 239–40). For their sake, i.e. lest they be pressurized into compromising their faith, knowledgeable Christians should refrain from such food (10:28–29a). But otherwise the basic principle remains: so long as one can give thanks with integrity, that is, eat the food as part of a relationship with God (uncompromised by partnership with demons), one should do so freely, even if others are critical (10:29b–30).

On this reading of the argument, 10:28–9a forms a digression, citing an exceptional case when liberty is to be constrained, while 10:29b–30 gives the general rule. If this is right, Paul agrees with the knowledgeable about their freedom to a large degree, but checks them at the point where their freedom causes real damage to others (cf. Rom 14:1–15:6). The last few verses of this discussion (10:31–11:1) sum up its principles. Eating and drinking are to be done 'to the glory of God', without compromise of that glory by idolatry. At the same time, no stumbling-block (the Greek echoes 8:9 and is much stronger than NRSV 'offence') is to be placed in the path of Jews or Greeks or the church (10:32). The goal should be not one's own advantage, but that of others, that they be saved and maintained in salvation (10:33, i.e. not 'destroyed' by selfish use of 'knowledge'; cf. 8:11). And, finally, Paul reminds them of the example he has described in ch. 9, not ultimately because of his own importance (he does not want a 'Paul party') but because he believes he thereby imitates Christ (11:1; cf. Rom 15:1–3).

Issues Relating to Communal Meetings (11:2–14:40)

Paul now turns to a number of topics which relate to the conduct of worship and communal meetings in the Corinthian church. The bulk of this new section concerns the exercise of spiritual gifts (chs. 12–14), but that is prefaced with discussion of two topics also related to worship, head-covering of women in prayer and prophecy (11:2–16) and the Lord's Supper (11:17–34). Paul's initial word of commendation (11:2) is probably meant to preface the whole section, since the Lord's Supper and the gifts of the Spirit were part of his legacy to the church. But on many issues, in fact, he has more criticism to offer than praise (cf. 11:22).

(11:2–16) Praying and Prophesying with Proper Head-Covering This passage, with its hierarchical ordering of male and female, has had a fateful influence through the centuries and has not enhanced Paul's reputation. It is full of awkward argumentation, so awkward that a few scholars even consider it a later addition to the letter by another hand. The issue concerns men and women who pray and prophesy in the church (vv. 4–5). Paul takes it for granted that both genders will participate in such important acts of church leadership (on prophecy, see ch. 14); how this tallies with the apparent ban on women's speech in church in 14:33–6 is not clear (see 1 COR 14:33–6). Most commentators rightly take the topic to be the covering of the head (Theissen 1987: 158–75), while a few scholars construe the Greek differently to refer to tying up (or letting loose) of hair (Murphy-O'Connor 1980). Men and women wore the same sort of outer garment (Gk. himation), which could be drawn forward from behind the neck to cover the crown of the head, or even further forward over the face as well. In normal circumstances men did not draw the himation forward, although Romans did in offering sacrifice at an altar. The typical customs for women are more difficult to discern, and probably varied over time and in different cultural contexts within the Graeco-Roman world (on Corinth see Thompson 1988). However, a variety of evidence suggests that, in public and in the presence of men other than family members, married women frequently covered their heads and even their faces, as a sign of modesty and as a protective barrier in the force-field of lustful stares. Young unmarried girls did not usually cover or veil themselves, but for a mature/married woman (girls were normally married at puberty) to be seen uncovered might suggest that she was somewhat 'forward', thus bringing shame both on herself and on her husband. Thus head-covering functioned both to differentiate women from men and to subordinate them.

This passage suggests that there are some women in the Corinthian church who are leading worship in prayer and prophecy with their heads uncovered. We can only speculate about the reasons for this behaviour. It is possible that the causes were quite mundane, for instance, that they felt the house-church a sufficiently 'private' context not to require head-covering, or that the ecstasy of Spirit-inspiration caused head-coverings to slip. It is normally suggested, however, that there stands some theological principle behind their activity, for instance some appeal to the baptismal formula that 'there is neither male nor female' (Gal 3:28) in order to justify the abolition of gender distinctions. It is also possible that the practice was particularly sponsored by those 'virgins' Paul addresses in ch. 7, who as unmarried women may have wished to demonstrate their special relationship to God (7:34) by renouncing a common token of relatedness to a husband (see later, Tertullian, On the Veiling of Virgins). Whatever the cause, the practice brings to the surface deep anxieties in Paul concerning gender distinction, and he employs a battery of arguments from theology, Scripture, custom, and 'reason' to reimpose what he insists is the universal Christian custom (v. 16).

His first move is to set up a hierarchy of 'heads', involving God, Christ, man, and woman (v. 3). 'Head' (Gk. kephalē) probably indicates 'authority'; some have taken it to mean 'source', but in either case the chain suggests subordination (on Christ's subordination to God, cf. 3:23 and 15:28). The use of 'head' language enables Paul to draw on both literal and metaphorical senses; the male with covered head disgraces his head (physical head and/or Christ), the female with uncovered head disgraces hers (physical and/or man, vv. 4–5). The cultural assumptions concerning 'shame' in this matter are clear in the parallels Paul draws with a woman whose hair is cut short or shaven (vv. 5–6): in both cases she was considered demeaned as a woman (cf. v. 15) and her femininity denied. Paul is concerned throughout this passage that genders should not be confused or rendered ambiguous.

v. 7 suggests a natural distinction between man (as image and glory/reflection of God) and woman (as glory/reflection of man). This represents a tendentious reading of Gen 1:26–7 (where male and female are created 'in the image of God'). The logic of the verse is obscure, but perhaps suggests that in worship of God the man's head should not be covered (since it brings glory to God), while the woman's should (since it brings glory to man). vv. 8–9 draw from Genesis 2 (Eve's creation from and for Adam) in order to reinforce the hierarchy suggested by the opening chain (v. 3). Thus a woman is required to have, literally, 'authority on her head' (v. 10). This must refer to the head-covering, but it is unclear whether it is a symbol of her authority to pray and prophesy (Hooker 1964), or of her submission to male authority. The reference to the angels in this verse is puzzling. Some take these as the angels who protect the orders of creation and are present at Corinthian worship to ensure order (there are some parallels to this notion at Qumran). Others regard them in a more sinister light as the successors to the 'sons of God' (Gen 6:1–4) who are liable to lust after unveiled women (Gen 6 was much discussed in Jewish apocalyptic circles, cf. 1 Enoch 14–16). In vv. 11–12 Paul moves to moderate some of what he has asserted by pointing to the interdependence (not equality) of women and men in the cycle of life, but 'in the Lord' suggests some specifically Christian reality. Finally, he appeals to reason (vv. 13–16). The Corinthians should know what is 'proper' in the matter of hair and head-covering. The appeal to 'nature' in v. 14 with reference to the degradation of long hair shows how disastrously Paul has confused 'nature' and 'custom', a confusion which has led him to support cultural norms with arguments from 'creation'. He may realize that his arguments are not likely to persuade and thus resorts finally to an abrupt dismissal of 'contentiousness', refusing to allow further discussion on this matter (v. 16).

(11:17–34) Humiliation of Church Members at the Lord's Supper Paul now turns to a topic on which reports have suggested a fundamental dysfunction in the church in relation to a rite, the Lord's Supper, which should constitute the core of church life and enact the proclamation of the gospel. The seriousness with which he takes this issue is indicated by his claim that their present form of gathering is positively harmful (v. 17), by his suggestion that the behaviour of some might mark them out as false Christians (v. 19; cf. 9:27), and by his warning that their mishandling of the Supper could lead—in fact already had led—to illness and death as divine judgement (vv. 27–32). The divisions that he hears about (v. 18) appear to be primarily social, between the elite members of the church and lower-class Christians. The 'Lord's Supper' (v. 20) was a full meal, incorporating the sharing of bread and wine but not restricted to those foodstuffs. Paul is scandalized that what was meant to be a common meal has become a display of disunity in the church. It appears that wealthier members have been bringing their own supplies for the meal, starting the meal before all had arrived and keeping their own food largely, if not entirely, for themselves, so that they consume more (and perhaps better quality) food than poorer members (vv. 20–2). It was common at dinner-parties in the Graeco-Roman world for the host to give more and better food to his more distinguished guests, and perhaps Gaius, the host to the whole church (Rom 16:23), has simply followed cultural habits unthinkingly (Theissen 1982: 145–74). Thus Paul once again has to remind the wealthier members of the church of their responsibilities to their fellow Christians of lower status: by humiliating them in this fashion they are showing contempt for the church of God (v. 22; cf. 3:16–17 and 8:12).

To correct such abuse Paul first reminds them of the tradition he passed to them (v. 23–6). These verses are actually our first witness to the form and understanding of the Lord's Supper in the early church, being earlier than the gospel accounts (Mk 14:22–4; Mt 26:26–8; Lk 22:17–20). This is the only incident in the life of Jesus that Paul ever recounts (apart from his crucifixion) and it seems to have become fixed relatively early as the founding narrative for an important Christian rite. We cannot tell precisely how Paul understood the identification between 'the bread' and 'the body' (v. 24) or between 'the cup' (note, not 'the wine') and 'the blood' (v. 25), though the reference to the new covenant and the notion of 'remembrance' seem to place greater emphasis on the relationship forged between the participant and the Lord than on the essence of the elements themselves. v. 26 seems to be Paul's own interpretation of the significance of the meal: through it the participants 'proclaim the Lord's death'. In the light of 1:18–2:5 it is not surprising that he finds the élitism and self-centredness of the higher-status Christians in Corinth constituting a denial of the message of Christ crucified.

Returning to the Corinthians' conduct, Paul warns them against eating and drinking 'in an unworthy manner' (v. 27). The context suggests that such carelessness about partaking in bread and wine includes the scandalous behaviour of those who humiliate other Christians at the Supper (vv. 20–2). Hence, the call to 'examine yourselves' (v. 28) must signal primarily a scrutiny of one's behaviour towards others in the church, not a general moral scrutiny of one's 'worthiness' to partake in a sacred meal. Eating and drinking requires 'discerning the body' (v. 29), discerning that the bread 'is' the body of Christ, but also that the church constitutes the body of Christ as it partakes of this 'one bread' (10:17; cf. 12:12–27). To defile the Supper is to show contempt for the church, and thus to invite the sort of judgement which God metes out to those who damage his temple (v. 29; 3:16–17). Such 'unworthy' eating makes one accountable for the body and blood of Christ (v. 27), in the sense that, rather than benefiting from the death of Christ, one is actually placed among his enemies and murderers (like 'the rulers of this age', 2:6–8). That would be to invite God's judgement (v. 29). Paul reckons some have already experienced this in illness and death (v. 30; cf. 5:5), though it is better to be judged in this way as a discipline than to be condemned utterly, like 'the world' (cf. 1:18; 3:15). The final instructions (vv. 33–4) show that the humiliation of the poorer members is still his chief concern: the 'brothers and sisters' should wait for one another and not indulge in grossly unequal feasts. The advice to satisfy hunger 'at home' (v. 34) might constitute a step towards separating the meal from the ritual sharing of bread and wine.

(12:1–31) The Distribution of Spiritual Gifts in the Body of Christ At v. 1 Paul turns directly to the issue of 'spiritual gifts' (the Greek could also mean 'spiritual people'). As ch. 14 will show, he is particularly concerned with their exercise in worship (a topic already touched on in 11:2–16). That chapter also indicates that the heart of the issue is the use of 'tongues', a gift of humanly incomprehensible speech which some Corinthian Christians apparently rate far higher than does Paul. The highly charged enthusiasm of the Corinthian church has led to an energetic use of the gifts of the Spirit (cf. 1:7) and a sense of fullness which Paul considers dangerously close to self-satisfaction (4:8). Here he is concerned lest the variety of gifts lead to disunity within the church, and create a hierarchy in which certain 'gifted' Christians despise others. The gift of tongues may be specially conducive to this sense of superiority, since it represents a dramatic and complete 'possession' by the Spirit of God, the gifted individual being considered to speak 'mysteries' (14:2) in 'the tongues of angels' (13:1). There is some evidence to suggest that such esoteric speech might be cultivated particularly by higher-status individuals, so that this gift might reinforce the status differentials which we have found to be operative in other issues addressed by Paul (Martin 1991).

Paul's first warning is against naïvety (vv. 1–3). Not every form of 'possession' is God-inspired: the Corinthians should not assume that the more dramatic the 'ecstasy', the better the gift. In their religious past they experienced 'ecstasy' (v. 2; NRSV 'enticed' would be better translated 'moved'), but that was erroneous, inducing only worship of speechless 'idols'. The gift has to be tested by its result (v. 3): clearly the Spirit of God cannot inspire someone to say 'Jesus be cursed', while the basic Christian confession 'Jesus is Lord' is attributable only to the Spirit (cf. Rom 10:9; Phil 2:11). The point may seem obvious, but 'inspiration' was (and is) a problematic claim and needed to be tested by its effects (cf. 14:29; 1 Thess 5:19–21).

But there is another and larger point to be made: that no one gift should be regarded as of unique importance or played off against others (vv. 4–11). In a formulation which points towards later trinitarian doctrine, Paul insists that the varieties of gifts and services can be traced to the same Spirit/Lord/God (vv. 4–6). v. 11 will re-emphasize this point, while suggesting that the Spirit distributes gifts to every believer ('to each one individually') and according to the Spirit's choice, not his/her own (but cf. 12:31; 14:1). Thus none can boast of having a gift, which is precisely a gift (charisma means 'gift of grace'), not a possession or an achievement (cf. 4:7). Moreover, the gifts are given not for individual satisfaction or pride, but 'for the common good' (v. 7). Thus Paul again signals the criterion of 'benefit to others' which he has appealed to throughout (6:12; 8:1–3; 10:23–4, etc.) and which will form the theme of ch. 13 as the basis for ch. 14.

To illustrate the 'varieties of gifts', Paul gives a representative list in vv. 8–10. Parallel lists in v. 28 and in Rom 12:6–8 (cf. Eph 4:11) suggest that this is not meant to be an exhaustive inventory, but a display of the diversity which the Corinthians will recognize as operative among themselves. Some appear to overlap (e.g. utterance of wisdom and utterance of knowledge) or to be closely linked to others ('faith' in this context means the special exercise of faith required for the 'working of miracles', vv. 9–10; cf. 13:2). It is no accident that the gifts of tongues and their interpretation are placed at the bottom of the list (as also in v. 28). While not wishing to endorse explicitly a gift-hierarchy, Paul does want to demote tongues from the exalted position it holds in the estimation of some Corinthian Christians.

In v. 12 Paul introduces the metaphor of the body, which will dominate the rest of this chapter. The statement in v. 27 that 'you are the body of Christ' does not mean that the church constitutes, in some literal sense, the presence of Christ in the world; rather, the church is (like) a body which belongs to Christ, identified with the risen Christ ('so it is with Christ', v. 12) but not identical to him. The body was commonly used in antiquity as a metaphor for human society (or for the whole cosmos), as a variegated organism whose diverse parts are interdependent. It was an image that could easily be exploited by élite classes to justify inequality, on the basis that it was necessary for inferior groups to play their part for the good of all (the Roman historian Livy uses it in this way). One of the striking aspects of Paul's use of the metaphor is that, in his hands, it not only justifies diversity in the church, but also works specifically against hierarchical notions of honour and differential importance.

The combination of diversity and unity—many limbs in one body—is the first point to be established (vv. 12–20). Baptismal formulae in v. 13 remind the Corinthians of their cultural and social diversity but also of their common access to the Spirit (cf. Gal 3:28, whose ‘male and female’ pairing is conspicuously absent here). vv. 14–19 illustrate the fact that a body, properly understood, must be a differentiated organism: it cannot all be of one part. Paul notably presents this fact from the point of view of a member which feels itself excluded because it is not something else (vv. 15–16). He thus identifies with the position of members of the church who are being made to feel inferior or marginalized, and insists on their rightful place within the body.

In vv. 21–6 Paul then develops this perspective by confronting the superior attitudes of the ‘stronger’ or more prominent Corinthian Christians. No member can dismiss others as dispensable (v. 21) because those which are apparently ‘weaker’ or less ‘honourable’ are in fact of crucial significance and accorded very great ‘respect’ by the rest of the body. He is thinking no doubt of the attitude we adopt to the vulnerable organs of the body and the genitalia, but his point is clearly meant to apply to the less ‘honourable’ members of the Corinthian church. We have noted at many points how the ‘weaker’ members in the church are being treated with less than full respect by higher-status Corinthian Christians (1:26–8; 8:1–13; 11:20–2). Paul here uses the body metaphor to overturn such attitudes, pointing out that the less ‘respectable’ are in fact accorded great respect, and that God has so designed this (vv. 22–4). This attribution of greater honour to the ‘lesser’ individual is based on the same principle as Paul had found in the message of the cross (1:18–25), where human values of power and wisdom are overturned. As in that passage, Paul finds here the solution to those pride-induced ‘dissensions’ which are springing up in the Corinthian church (v. 25; the same word is translated ‘divisions’ in 1:10). The mutuality of care for one another’s interests which Paul had taught in chs. 8–10 (10:24, 32) is here illustrated by the concern of all the body’s parts for the health and welfare of the rest (vv. 25–6).

The chapter is completed by making explicit the relevance of the metaphor to the Christians in Corinth (v. 27) and by another list of ‘gifts’ or ‘appointments’ (v. 28). Here some value distinctions are introduced (‘first apostles’ etc.) since Paul does regard some gifts as more conducive to the welfare of the body than others (as ch. 14 will illustrate); again tongues is last in the list! The point about necessary diversity in the body is finally driven home with a series of rhetorical questions (vv. 29–30) designed to undercut the notion that any one gift should be possessed by all, or that anyone is deficient in not possessing it. There is a sense in which some gifts are ‘greater’ (v. 31), but that is only because they facilitate the supreme virtue which Paul will now describe.

(13:1–13) The Superior and Critical Demands of Love This chapter has sometimes been considered a self-contained ‘love-hymn’, pre-prepared by Paul, whose present positioning creates a somewhat disappointing descent to the practicalities of ch. 14. But in fact this prioritizing of love fits its present literary context and the precise needs of the Corinthian church exceptionally well, and in its sharp criticism of the values current among the Corinthians it is hardly an anodyne ‘ode to love’. It is written in prose, not verse, but it clearly has poetic qualities both in the level of language and in its structural shaping. It falls naturally into three sections (vv. 1–3, 4–7, 8–13): the first and third match one another in their comparative evaluations of love, while the central section consists of thirteen simple verbs, arranged in order positive–negative–positive.

The first section (vv. 1–3) is made up of three conditional clauses, each complemented by a devastating statement of worthlessness. The first imagines the possession of all the possible gifts of speech which were so highly prized in Corinth, ‘tongues of angels’ perhaps describing the imagined content of ‘speaking in tongues’. Without love, which can make such communication purposeful and beneficial to others, all such gifts, although genuinely gifts of the Spirit, are mere noise (‘noisy gong’ refers to the bronze products for which Corinth was famous). Similarly the powers of prophecy, knowledge, and faith (cf. 12:8–10; Mk 11:20–4) are valueless without love (v. 2). In fact, most challenging of all, even apparent acts of charity and self-sacrifice gain nothing at all, unless they are motivated and controlled by love (v. 3). A tiny textual variant could alter the sense in v. 3 from delivering the body ‘that I may boast’ to delivering it ‘to be burned’. Commentators are evenly divided on the best reading here. It was perhaps unnecessary still to criticize boasting (cf. 4:7), so the reading ‘to be burned’ (e.g. in martyrdom) may be preferred. Even martyrdom is valueless unless it is founded on love.

The central stanza (vv. 4–7) provides a pen-portrait of ‘love’ (agapē), a term not coined in early Christianity but given special prominence and reshaped to express its peculiar ethos of self-sacrifice. The paragraph is made up of simple verbs or short clauses which define the quality of love, mostly by the attitudes it eschews. Two positive verbs open the list, which then contrasts love with a catalogue of spiritual failures in the Corinthian church: love is not envious (cf. 3:3), it is not boastful or arrogant (cf. 4:6, 18–19; 5:2; 8:1, etc.), it does not insist on its own way (cf. 10:24), nor rejoice in wrongdoing (cf. 5:1–2). The final four positive verbs (v. 7) expand the field of love’s operation as widely as possible. Their link between love, faith, endurance, and hope matches the conglomerate of Christian virtues which Paul elsewhere uses to sum up the essence of Christian commitment (cf. v. 13; 1 Thess 1:3).

In the final paragraph (vv. 8–13) Paul returns to demonstrate the supreme value of love, now stressing not so much its indispensability (vv. 1–3) as its eternal worth. Paul is ever conscious of the provisional character of Christian existence before the parousia (cf. 15:19), and he cannot share the Corinthian sense of fullness (4:8). For him, the only characteristic of the present which is final and complete is love: ‘love never ends’ (v. 8). All other Christian qualities, even genuine gifts of the Spirit, are provisional and imperfect. The Corinthians value prophecy, tongues, and knowledge (cf. chs. 8–10 and 14), but all these, Paul insists, are only temporary phenomena (v. 8). For now, knowledge (and prophecy) are inescapably partial (v. 9), not only in the sense that they are incomplete

(we know only some things) but also because they are imperfect (even what we 'know', we only partly comprehend; see P. W. Gooch 1987: 142–61). Like a child whose knowledge not only grows but also matures, so our present state of knowledge will appear 'childish' from the perspective of the final revelation (v. 11). Or, to use a different image, our present perception is inevitably indirect and distorted—in a mirror and 'dim'—while in the future we will see direct and clear, as clearly as we are already seen and known by God (v. 12; cf. 8:3). The abiding qualities, which already have a firm purchase on eternal truths, are faith, hope, and love (not the Corinthians' vaunted 'knowledge'). But the greatest of these, as the reflection of God's own character, is love (v. 13; cf. Rom 5:8).

(14:1–40) The Superiority of Prophecy over Tongues As the first phrase makes clear, ch. 14 draws its inspiration from the preceding eulogy of love, which is not a digression from the topic of spiritual gifts but an exposition of the virtue which enables the church to evaluate and prioritize those gifts. As concerns various forms of speech, love sets the priority as that which 'builds up' the church (v. 12; cf. 8:1). 'Building up' constitutes one of the two guiding principles of Paul's instructions concerning worship, the other being that which is 'decent' and 'orderly' (vv. 33, 40). The first part of this chapter is made up of four overlapping arguments for the superiority of prophecy over tongues (vv. 1–25). 'Prophecy' is never defined, but seems to constitute speech which instructs, encourages, consoles, or challenges its hearers (vv. 3, 24–5, 31). 'Tongues' are not foreign languages intelligible to native speakers (as are portrayed in Acts 2), but speech which is humanly unintelligible, being addressed primarily to God (v. 2). The phenomenon of such 'ecstatic speech' is quite widely attested in a variety of religions, though in antiquity it may have been specially prized by the social élite.

The first argument for the greater value of prophecy is that it strengthens the whole church, whereas tongues benefit only the individual gifted with them (vv. 1–5). Once again, Paul places a premium on what benefits the whole community (cf. 10:23–4), even if it be a less spectacular or mysterious gift than tongues. Their 'mysteries in the Spirit' (v. 2) are not understood even by fellow 'spiritual people', unless someone exercises the gift of interpretation (v. 5). Paul's wish that all speak in tongues or prophecy (v. 5) must be hypothetical (in the light of 12:29–30), but he simultaneously insists that what the Corinthians value most highly is actually of inferior value. Prophecy may be transitory and imperfect (13:8–10), but at least for the present it can be well used in the service of love.

The second argument develops the first by contrasting the unintelligibility of tongues—and therefore its worthlessness for others—with the intelligibility of prophecy (vv. 6–13). Again, the question is what benefit the speech has for others (v. 6). Tongues are as indistinct and incomprehensible as a musical instrument whose notes signify nothing to the hearer (vv. 7–8) or as a foreign language whose meaning we cannot grasp (v. 11). Paul recognizes and affirms the Corinthian 'zeal' for spiritual gifts (v. 12); nothing in this passage discourages the use of gifts as such. He simply wants the most useful (upbuilding) gifts to be regarded as of higher value, a recognition which will force the Corinthians to view themselves as a community, not as a collection of gifted individuals. Paul is careful not to go so far as to ban the use of tongues, but he requires that their users should expect them to be turned into something beneficial through interpretation (v. 13).

The third argument (vv. 14–19) provides a different rationale for the superiority of prophecy: it involves both spirit and mind, whereas the gift of tongues engages only the spirit. Paul is probably speaking here of 'spirit' in the sense of human spirit, though it is closely linked with, and inspired by, the Spirit of God. We might expect this contrast to imply a higher evaluation of rationality, the engagement of the mind being exalted over 'irrational' speech. But it would be hard to argue that the human mind was a higher faculty than the Spirit-inspired spirit, and Paul's cherishing of the 'mind' turns out to be not on account of its rationality so much as its intelligibility to others, the goal being once again the 'upbuilding' or instruction of the hearers (vv. 17–19). This point is made by reference to prayer, singing, and the offering of thanksgiving to God, as the discussion broadens to cover wider aspects of worship (cf. v. 6). Thus Paul forces the Corinthians to consider what is appropriate 'in church', as opposed to in private. In a communal setting, intelligible words count for everything (v. 19). Again, Paul does not discredit tongues absolutely (he claims to be even more gifted than the Corinthians, 14:18!), but requires them to reconsider their appropriateness with a view to others' needs. He is challenging the same unconcern for others which had manifested itself at the Lord's Supper (11:20–2).

The final argument (vv. 20–5) is prefaced by a stinging rebuke of the Corinthians, who seem to have prided themselves on their maturity (v. 20, whose last phrase reads literally, 'in your minds be mature'; cf. 2:6–3:4). Paul turns to the only passage in 'the law' (here meaning the Scriptures as a whole) which might be relevant to the subject of 'tongues', a warning in Isa 28:11–12 about God speaking to his disobedient people through foreigners. At first sight, the lesson Paul draws from this passage in v. 22 (tongues are a sign for unbelievers, prophecy for believers) seems to be the reverse of his illustration in vv. 23–5, where he imagines the negative effects of tongues on 'outsiders' or 'unbelievers' (the two terms are probably synonyms) and the positive effects of prophecy. The clue probably lies back in the quotation itself, which Paul has slightly modified (adding 'even then') to suggest that the 'tongues' actually bring about, or confirm, unbelief. Thus the 'sign for' phrases in v. 22 should probably be taken to mean that tongues serve to strengthen unbelief, while prophecy serves to strengthen, or bring about, belief. Thus outsiders viewing the whole church speaking in tongues will not be attracted to the faith, but simply conclude that it is a form of madness (v. 23); while if they encounter prophecy in the church, they will be led to faith by a conviction of sin, a revealing of heart-secrets, and a recognition of God's presence in the church (vv. 24–5). This is a rare depiction of what Paul imagines to be the ingredients of 'conversion', indicating the importance for him of sin and judgement (cf. 4:4–5) and of the powerful presence of God (cf. Gal 3:2–5). His own experience in his call/conversion may also be reflected here in some measure.

The discussion can now broaden out to take in wider aspects of worship (vv. 26–40). This is the most complete image we get of earliest Christian worship, though we cannot tell whether Paul's prescription matches reality in the Corinthian church, or in any other. Paul certainly imagines the participation of any member of the community (there are no designated 'ministerial' roles), bringing whatever gifts they have, provided, once again, that they contribute to the task of 'building up' (v. 26). The 'lesson' here (v. 26) means teaching, not a reading from Scripture, an activity which is strikingly absent from this list of worship activities. The theme of the chapter makes the spotlight fall particularly on tongues and prophecy. The former are not banned, but restricted in number and admissible only if interpreted. The latter also is not to become a virtuoso performance: a number of prophets should be allowed to speak, their speech weighed as to its validity (cf. 2:15; 12:3), and room made for new speakers, whose prophecy is sparked by a further 'revelation' (vv. 29–31). Paul is striving to control the exuberance of the worship meetings, but also to prevent their domination by any one figure or clique: each member of the body has its part to play and none is entitled to dismiss the contribution of others as inconvenient or unnecessary (cf. 12:14–26).

The next paragraph (14:33b–36) has been the subject of intense debate. It seems to place a total ban on women's speech in church, which is strangely inconsistent with Paul's permission in 11:2–16 that (veiled) women could pray and prophesy. Also the argument depends on a vague and uncharacteristic appeal to 'the law' (v. 34) and appears to assume that all the women will have husbands to ask 'at home' (v. 35), despite Paul's acceptance that the single and celibate option is prudent for both women and men (ch. 7). Such facts prompt one of two conclusions. Either Paul is truly inconsistent here, reacting against a threat of 'unruly' women by forbidding their verbal participation, despite what he had earlier allowed. Or this passage is an interpolation into the letter by a later editor, one who took the opportunity of the surrounding context to introduce the restrictive ethos of the Pastoral letters (e.g. 1 Tim 2:8–15, part of a letter generally regarded as written by a later Paulinist, not by Paul himself). This latter option is favoured by many commentators, and it is given slight textual support by the fact that some manuscripts place vv. 34–5 at the end of the chapter, rather than in their present location; that might indicate that they were once a marginal gloss which was inserted by scribes at varying points into the original text (see Fee 1987: 699–708). There have been numerous speculations about a particular local problem in Corinth (e.g. women who rudely interrupted prophecy, or questioned their husbands in 'weighing' their prophecies, see Jervis 1995) which might or might not explain this outburst if it is genuinely from Paul. But as it stands the passage seems to presuppose that women in all Paul's churches were wholly silent, which hardly fits what we know of women leaders in Pauline congregations (e.g. Rom 16:1–2, 3–5; 7; Phil 4:2).

Paul closes the discussion with a strong assertion of his authority (derived from the Lord) and a refusal to countenance contrary opinions even from prophets or so-called 'spiritual' people (vv. 37–8). The strength of his tone suggests that the whole chapter is directed against a dominant individual or group whose use of gifts is stifling the life of the congregation. The final verses (39–40) summarize the priorities set by the chapter and highlight the need for order; disorder is easily exploited by the strong.

The Resurrection of Christ and the Resurrection Body (15:1–58)

This chapter stands somewhat alone in the flow of topics in the letter and it may appear odd that the heavy emphasis on the cross as the heart of the gospel in chs. 1–2 should be diluted by the equal insistence here on the centrality of the resurrection (2:2 is somewhat contradicted by 15:3–5). Yet the discussion of the body in 6:12–20 gave an indication that Paul considered the Corinthians' understanding of resurrection to lie at the root of other problems in their church (see esp. 6:12–14). It is difficult to be sure how the Corinthians did understand resurrection. Were they uninterested in a future resurrection because they considered themselves already 'raised' (cf. 4:8; 1 Tim 2:18)? Or did they disbelieve any future life after death? In fact, the main focus of the chapter (at least from v. 35 onwards) is the notion of a resurrection body, and it is most likely that the Corinthians believed in the existence of some post-mortem state, but one free from the restrictions of the body. Their belief in some form of afterlife seems implied by their practice of vicarious baptism for the dead (v. 29), but it was common in Hellenized circles (both Greek and Jewish) to consider the body an encumbrance which the soul will gladly shed after death. For Paul, their doubt about the sense or value of a 'resurrection body' suggests that they are beginning to question an essential element of their faith, the resurrection of Christ; it also indicates a lack of trust in God's creative power to bring life out of death in whatever form he chooses. Thus he insists on the apocalyptic notion of a final battle against the powers of death (vv. 20–8) and defends the idea of a resurrection body, though dispelling crude notions of physical identity between the present and the future body (vv. 35–57).

Paul begins by pointedly reminding them of the terms on which they entered the faith—terms which they must continue to accept if they are to remain secure (vv. 1–2). The important point is that these terms included belief in the resurrection of Jesus, and it is this topic which Paul emphasizes in citing a foundational credal statement (vv. 3–7). This creed is introduced in v. 3 in technical terms signifying the transmission of tradition, one which Paul must have inherited (in Antioch?) before he founded the church in Corinth (50–1 CE). It thus constitutes the earliest known Christian creed. Its structure is clear: two main 'that' clauses concerning, respectively, the death and the resurrection of Christ, each backed by reference to the Scriptures, and two supplementary 'that' clauses about the burial (reinforcing the death) and the appearances (supporting the resurrection). It is not clear precisely what scriptures are alluded to in this formula nor is it obvious where the original creed ceased: some think it ran no further than v. 5, others as far as v. 7.

This creed constitutes our earliest literary evidence to belief in the resurrection of Christ, and it is often remarked that it makes no mention of the empty tomb or of the women who witnessed the scene (and the risen Christ) according to the stories in the gospels. That silence has suggested to some the late emergence of the story of the empty tomb (first attested in Mk 16, in the late 60s CE), though others consider the silence merely accidental. In any case, it is striking that Paul supports the notion of the resurrection of Jesus purely on the grounds of the resurrection appearances. Those appearances he lists are not all easily correlated with the gospel stories, which also differ among themselves, though the appearance to Cephas may correspond to Lk 24:34, and the appearance to 'the twelve' with stories in Lk 24 and Jn 20.

One reason for Paul's concentration on these appearances is that he can add his own testimony at the end of the list (v. 8). He took his commissioning to his apostleship to be the final resurrection appearance, although Luke placed it in a quite different category in the narrative of the book of Acts. This claim to a vision of Christ was crucial to Paul's self-belief as an apostle (cf. 9:1), and it leads him into a brief digression about his apostleship (vv. 9–10), which reveals much about his sense of inferiority (as a former persecutor), his radical appreciation of grace, and his hope of outdoing other apostles (cf. 9:3–18). Returning to the topic (v. 11), he insists that the same resurrection-centred message was taught by all the apostles and was the basis of the Corinthians' faith.

The next paragraph (vv. 12–19) unearths the reason for Paul's concern that the Corinthians 'hold firm' to the message he delivered: he thinks they are beginning to waver in their faith in the resurrection of Jesus since some say 'there is no resurrection of the dead' (v. 12). As noted above, the Corinthians' doubts probably concerned the notion of a bodily resurrection, as indeed the phrase 'the resurrection of the dead' (which could be taken literally as 'the raising of corpses') might suggest a crude notion of physical reconstitution after death. Paul himself does not envisage resurrection in such crude terms, but his first reaction is to insist that to doubt the notion of a resurrection of the dead is to doubt the resurrection of Christ, which was a cardinal tenet of their creed. He now runs through a logical argument twice (vv. 13–15 and 16–19) with slight variations in emphasis. First: if there is no resurrection, then Christ has not been raised, then our preaching of that fact was worthless and so is your faith, which is based on that fact (vv. 13–14); indeed, the apostles are then vulnerable to the charge of lying about God, for claiming he raised Christ from the dead (v. 15). Secondly: if the dead are not raised, then Christ has not been raised, then your faith is futile and 'you are still in your sins' (vv. 16–17)—that is, you cannot depend on the other part of the creed, that 'Christ died for our sins' (v. 3). That means all grounds of hope are destroyed. As far as Paul is concerned, the future hope is such a necessary counterweight to the difficulties of the 'present evil age' (Gal 1:4) that, if it were proved to be groundless, Christians would turn out to be especially pitiable. The Corinthians may not have denied all future hope, but Paul insists on depicting the whole of the slippery slope which he thinks they have started to descend.

Corinthian doubts have challenged a basic element in Paul's theology and he now demonstrates the pivotal significance of the resurrection of Jesus within the scheme of salvation (vv. 20–8). This scheme is founded on an apocalyptic notion of the age of death being succeeded and overcome by an age of life, the latter being ushered in by a cosmic act of resurrection (de Boer 1988). For Paul, the resurrection of Christ constitutes the 'first fruits' of that cosmic act (vv. 20, 23), the beginning of the harvest which heralds the proximity of the rest. Pairing Christ with Adam (cf. Rom 5:12–20), Paul finds in Christ the start of a new humanity, in which the failures of the present (encapsulated in death) are replaced by the possibilities of the future (resurrection and life). The key text in vv. 27–8 is Ps 8:6, which concerns the intended dignity of humankind: that role is now fulfilled in the 'final Adam' (cf. v. 45) and made possible through him for all (v. 22). That 'all' could be taken to mean 'the whole of humanity', thus implying a kind of universalism (cf. Rom 5:18; 11:32), though the subsequent reference to 'those who belong to Christ' (v. 23) and the earlier dismissals of non-believers (e.g. 1:18; 6:9–10) suggest that Paul did not carry through its universalistic potential. The cosmic transformation thus takes place in successive phases: first, the resurrection of Christ, then, at his coming, those who belong to him; 'then' (meaning probably, 'at that same moment', though some see here a further phase), it will be 'the end' when God's kingdom is complete and all the enemies of his rule are defeated. In this apocalyptic scenario the risen Christ plays a crucial role: it is through his present reign that God's enemies are being defeated (v. 25), as God puts them in subjection to him (vv. 27–8). Even so, Paul insists that Christ is ultimately subordinate to God, who is not himself, of course, subject to Christ (v. 27) but is the one to whom Christ is subject in 'handing over the kingdom' (v. 24; cf. 3:23; Rom 11:36).

The next section of the chapter (vv. 29–34) contains miscellaneous arguments which indicate the significance of belief in life beyond death. The reference to baptism 'on behalf of the dead' (v. 29) has been the subject of multiple interpretations (some of which construe the Greek quite differently). It probably refers to a rite in which a few Corinthian believers underwent a vicarious baptism in the place of those (believers?) who had died either unbaptized or 'improperly' baptized. 1:12–17 suggests that some Corinthians regarded baptism by certain figures as of great significance, and they may have wished to make up for a 'lack' in the case of those who were baptized by different leaders or in a different way. Paul does not condemn such a practice, and he is willing to use it to show that the Corinthians themselves entertain hopes for an existence beyond death.

Turning to himself, he indicates how his own life is founded on the same principle of hope (vv. 30–2). It is only because his investments lie beyond his present physical existence that he is prepared to take such risks with his life—exposed daily to the threat of death. Indeed, he has recently undergone some specially dangerous experience in Ephesus (v. 32); here 'fighting with wild beasts' must be a metaphor, or he would not have lived to tell the tale, but it is not clear what sort of crisis it refers to. The Corinthians need to be warned and shamed (vv. 32–4; cf. 4:14; 6:5). If they lose their faith in the resurrection of the dead, they have lapsed into mere hedonism (v. 32, citing Isa 22:13) and will end up corrupting their morals (v. 33, citing a popular proverb originating with the poet Menander). The final comment, that some have 'no knowledge of God' (v. 34) is particularly biting considering the Corinthians' boast of 'knowledge' (8:1, 4).

In v. 35 Paul reaches what is probably the heart of his dispute with the Corinthians: the means and meaning of a resurrection body. On this topic he attempts to preserve a fine and difficult balance. He insists on keeping the term 'body'

(Gk. sōma) in describing the future state, but also stresses the discontinuity between the present and the future body, leaving somewhat ambiguous the relation between the two. The first stage of his argument (vv. 36–41) is the insistence that there are many types of ‘body’, each with variant degrees of ‘glory’: in talking about the resurrection of the dead our minds should not be restricted by what we presently experience as ‘body’ with its rather limited glory. The analogy of the seed (vv. 36–8) illustrates the possibility of very different ‘bodies’ either side of death, and the insistence that ‘God gives the seed a body as he has chosen’ (v. 38) places the emphasis on God’s re-creative power. The Corinthians’ doubts indicate that they have placed their confidence in the continuation of their ‘spiritual’ selves beyond death, rather than in God, whose future act of resurrection will demonstrate his sole power over the forces of sin and death (cf. 1:30–1). The analogy also indicates the variety of different ‘bodies’ resulting from seeds, which is further illustrated by reference to the varieties of ‘flesh’ and the difference between ‘heavenly’ and ‘earthly’ bodies (vv. 39–41). In antiquity the stars and planets were generally considered to be living matter with a constitution much more glorious and ethereal than that of earthbound creatures. Paul is thus suggesting that a resurrection body could be a body of a much higher order than our present physical condition, though the point hardly works for us who know that the stars are not a different order of creation, but as physical, material, and destructible as ourselves.

vv. 42–50 apply the illustrations to the topic in hand. What is ‘sown’ (in death) is one kind of body—perishable, inglorious, and weak—but what is raised can be a body of a wholly different kind. One is a ‘physical body’: the Greek psychikon sōma means a body animated by a soul (psychē), which is here taken to be mortal and temporary. The other is a ‘spiritual body’: the Greek pneumatikon sōma indicates a body inhabited by spirit (pneuma), here perhaps the Spirit of God. Paul thus wishes to preserve the term ‘body’ but only when it is shorn of its connotations of physicality and mortality. The impersonal statements, ‘it is sown a physical body, it is raised a spiritual body’, leave unclear whether the physical body is itself reused in the resurrection or whether the self gains a new body quite distinct from the old. This ambiguity matches Paul’s silence as to what happened to the body of Jesus and whether his tomb was empty. At least v. 50 makes clear that the present physical body (‘flesh and blood’) is quite unfit for ‘the kingdom of God’, though whether entry into that kingdom involves the transformation of the present body or the granting of an essentially new body is left undefined in this chapter and is not consistently dealt with elsewhere (cf. Rom 8:11; Phil 3:21; 2 Cor 5:1–11). vv. 45–9 develop the contrast between the psychikon sōma and the pneumatikon sōma by reference to their two prototypes: Adam, the first man, made from the dust, who became a living (but mortal) psychē (Gen 2:7) and Christ, the final Adam, whose origin is heaven, and who is a life-giving (and immortal) pneuma. Our present bodies are as perishable as Adam’s (‘we bear the image of the man of dust’), but the future resurrection body will bear the image of Christ (v. 49).

Thus the chapter finishes with a triumphant declaration of the hope on which the whole Christian faith depends, a ‘mystery’ which makes sense of the present in the light of the future (vv. 51–8; cf. 2:9–10). Although not all will die first (‘sleep’), it is certainly the case that all will be changed, that is, our perishable selves will become imperishable and fit for the ‘kingdom of God’ (v. 50). Using traditional apocalyptic imagery, Paul imagines this great change taking place ‘at the last trumpet’ (v. 52; cf. 1 Thess 4:16; Rev 8:6). Since he supposes here that he and his generation will be alive at this end-point in history (cf. 7:29–31; 1 Thess 4:15, 17), he distinguishes between ‘the dead’ who will be raised in the new imperishable state and ‘we’ who will be changed from a mortal life to a new immortal state (vv. 52–4). At that moment the final enemy, death, will be destroyed (cf. v. 26), and Paul celebrates with two Scripture citations, one (v. 54) from Isa 25:8, a passage full of eschatological promises, the other (v. 55) from Hos 13:14, a passage which he wilfully reads against its grain: the prophet invited death to wield its sting, but Paul employs his words to taunt death with its ultimate powerlessness. Death’s sting is already at work in the power of sin, a power derived from the law (v. 56; the themes are elaborated in Rom 6–7); but we are granted victory over both by God (cf. Rom 8:37–9). That means for now persistence in faith and action, since ‘the work of the Lord’ is of ultimate and lasting significance (v. 58), like love, which is its chief characteristic (13:13; 16:14).

Letter Closing, with Travel Plans, Final Instructions, and Greetings (16:1–24)

This final chapter covers a range of topics which bear on Paul’s relationship to the church in Corinth, issues which either had already become problematic or would soon become so. The ‘collection for the saints’ (vv. 1–4) is the collection Paul had agreed to gather for the church in Jerusalem (Gal 2:10). His problem was in persuading his churches to support this project, since his intentions for this money were open to question and the necessity of the collection was not obvious to all. Paul here suggests a mechanism for regular storing of money on ‘the first day of the week’, that is, Sunday; nothing is implied here about worship on Sundays. He is trying to avoid a sudden and potentially embarrassing demand for money when he arrives in Corinth. He also suggests that the Corinthians participate in its delivery, to offset suspicions about its destination. It is clear from 2 Cor 8 and 9 that this advice went unheeded and the Corinthians proved extremely unwilling to contribute to the collection (cf. 2 Cor 12:14–18). However, Rom 15:25–7 suggests that Paul was eventually successful, if the reference to Achaia there includes the church at Corinth (the capital of the province).

Paul’s description of his travel plans (vv. 5–9) seems designed to explain why he is unable to visit Corinth immediately: he is detained in Ephesus for the sake of the gospel and wants to wait till he can pay more than a fleeting visit to Corinth. 4:18–19 indicated that Paul was criticized for his absence from Corinth, but the promises he now makes proved to be fateful. He subsequently decided to visit them on his way both to and from Macedonia, and then had such a painful time in Corinth that he did not come back (2 Cor 11:15–2:2). As 2 Corinthians shows, this constant shifting of plans exposed Paul to acute criticism from certain figures in the church, and undermined the church’s confidence in his word.

Meanwhile, Paul is sending Timothy as his delegate (vv. 10–11). It is unclear why that visit, promised in 4:17, is now somewhat indefinite, but the note of fear concerning his reception in Corinth is revealing: if Paul's assistant is likely to be 'despised' in Corinth, Paul's own standing cannot be very secure. As for Apollos (v. 12), we can only speculate why Paul wanted him in Corinth (where he was the figurehead of a 'rival' party, 1:12) and why he was unwilling to go (v. 12). As in 3:5–9, Paul seems anxious to show that he and Apollos are not at odds nor wishing to undermine each other's work.

The general instructions of vv. 13–14 (cf. 15:58 and ch. 13) lead into a specific recommendation of the household of Stephanas (vv. 15–18). Their 'service of the saints' (v. 15) probably consisted of financial support of the church in Corinth. Given what we have glimpsed of leadership contests in the church, this strong recommendation constitutes Paul's bid to ensure that leadership remains in (or reverts to) this household: their presence with Paul at the time of writing has given him the opportunity to hear about the situation in Corinth and to mould the thinking of people who he hopes will influence the rest of the church. We cannot tell what relationship Fortunatus and Achaicus had to Stephanas; they perhaps belonged to his 'household', as slaves, freedmen, or free dependants.

The final greetings (vv. 19–24) are distinguished by special reference to Aquila and Prisca, the couple who had hosted Paul in Corinth at the foundation of the church (Acts 18:2–3). The 'holy kiss' (v. 20) may have been a common sign of recognition among Christian believers (cf. 1 Thess 5:26) and is here contrasted with a curse on any who 'has no love for the Lord' (v. 22). This is perhaps a formulaic phrase defining Christian identity (cf. 12:3), while the last words of v. 22 are a Greek transliteration of an Aramaic acclamation ('Marana tha') which must derive from early Jewish Christianity. Paul's own handwriting (v. 21; cf. Gal 6:11) gives a personal tone to the close of the letter, which has been calculated throughout to restore the allegiance of the Corinthians to himself, though not for his own sake, only in order to ensure their continuance 'in Christ Jesus' (v. 24; cf. 1:9).

REFERENCES

- Barclay, J. M. G. (1992), 'Thessalonica and Corinth: Social Contrasts in Pauline Christianity', JSTNT 47: 49–74.
- (1996), Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora from Alexander to Trajan (323 BCE–117 CE) (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Barrett, C. K. (1971), A Commentary on the First Epistle to the Corinthians, 2nd edn. (London: A. & C. Black).
- (1982), Essays on Paul (London: SPCK).
- Bartchy, S. S. (1973), MALION CHRESAI: First-Century Slavery and 1 Corinthians 7.21 (Missoula: Scholars Press).
- Brown, P. (1988), The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity (London: Faber & Faber).
- Chow, J. K. (1992), Patronage and Power: A Study of Social Networks in Corinth (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Clarke, A. D. (1993), Secular and Christian Leadership in Corinth: A Socio-Historical and Exegetical Study of 1 Corinthians 1–6 (Leiden: Brill).
- Dahl, N. A. (1967), 'Paul and the Church at Corinth according to 1 Corinthians 1–4', in W. R. Farmer et al. (eds.), Christian History and Interpretation: Studies Presented to John Knox (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press), 313–35.
- de Boer, M. C. (1988), The Defeat of Death: Apocalyptic Eschatology in 1 Corinthians 15 and Romans 5 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- (1994), 'The Composition of 1 Corinthians', NTS 40: 229–45.
- Deming, W. (1995), Paul on Marriage and Celibacy: The Hellenistic Background of 1 Corinthians 7 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Dunn, J. D. G. (1991), The Partings of the Ways between Christianity and Judaism (London: SCM).
- Fee, G. D. (1987), The First Epistle to the Corinthians, New International Commentary on the New Testament, (Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans).
- Frör, H. (1995), You Wretched Corinthians! (London: SCM).
- Gooch, P. D. (1993), Dangerous Food: 1 Corinthians 8–10 in Its Context (Waterloo, Ont.: Wilfrid Laurier University Press).
- Gooch, P. W. (1987), Partial Knowledge: Philosophical Studies in Paul (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press).
- Goulder, M. D. (1991), 'SOPHIA in 1 Corinthians', NTS 37: 516–34.
- Hays, R. B. (1989), Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Hooker, M. D. (1963) "'Beyond the things which are written": An Examination of 1 Cor. iv. 6', NTS 10: 127–32, repr. in From Adam to Christ: Essays on Paul, (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press), 106–12.
- (1964), 'Authority on her Head: An Examination of 1 Cor. 11.10', NTS 10: 410–16, repr. in From Adam to Christ: Essays on Paul (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press), 113–20.
- Hurd, J. C. (1965), The Origin of 1 Corinthians (London: SPCK).
- Hurtado, L. W. (1988), One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism (London: SCM).
- Jervis, L. A. (1995), '1 Corinthians 14.34–35: A Reconsideration of Paul's Limitation of the Free Speech of Some Corinthian Women', JSTNT 58: 51–74.
- Litfin, D. (1994), St. Paul's Theology of Proclamation: 1 Corinthians 1–4 and Greco-Roman Rhetoric (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Lüdemann, G. (1984), Paul, Apostle to the Gentiles: Studies in Chronology (London: SCM).
- Martin, D. B. (1990), Slavery as Salvation: The Metaphor of Slavery in Pauline Christianity (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- (1991), 'Tongues of Angels and Other Status Indicators', AAR 59: 547–89.
- (1995), The Corinthian Body (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Meeks, W. A. (1983), The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Meggitt, J. J. (1998), Paul, Poverty and Survival (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Mitchell, M. M. (1992), Paul and the Rhetoric of Reconciliation, (Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox).
- Murphy-O'Connor, J. (1980), 'Sex and Logic in 1 Corinthians 11.2–16', CBQ 42: 482–500.
- Pearson, B. A. (1973), The Pneumatikos-Psychikos Terminology in 1 Corinthians (Missoula: Scholars Press).
- Rosner, B. S. (1994), Paul, Scripture and Ethics: A Study of 1 Corinthians 5–7 (Leiden: Brill).
- Schmithals, W. (1971), Gnosticism in Corinth (Nashville: Abingdon).
- Theissen, G. (1982), The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- (1987), Psychological Aspects of Pauline Christianity (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Thiselton, A. C. (1977–8), 'Realized Eschatology at Corinth', NTS 24: 510–26.
- Thompson, C. L. (1988), 'Hairstyles, Head-coverings and St. Paul: Portraits from Roman Corinth', Biblical Archaeologist, 51: 99–115.
- Willis, W. L. (1985), Idol Meat in Corinth: The Pauline Argument in 1 Corinthians 8 and 10 (Chico, Calif.: Scholars Press).
- Winter, B. (1991), 'Civil Litigation in Secular Corinth and the Church: The Forensic Background to 1 Corinthians 6.1–8', NTS 37: 559–72.
- Wire, A. C. (1990), The Corinthian Women Prophets (Minneapolis: Fortress).

66. 2 Corinthians

MARGARET MACDONALD

INTRODUCTION

A. Literary Structure. 1. It is a generally held view today that 2 Corinthians is made up of more than one of Paul's letters. Although there is no MS evidence to support this theory, there are several problems in the text as we have it which raise the question of its unity. Among the more serious difficulties is the sharp break between the conciliatory tone of chs. 1–9 and the harsh, sarcastic tone of chs. 10–13. Several partition theories have been developed in order to explain these difficulties, and these theories may be divided into two major schools. (1) Some scholars divide the text into five or six fragments and then reconstruct the chronology of Paul's dealings with the Corinthians on the basis of these units (e.g. 2:14–6:13; 7:2–4 + 10:1–13:10 + 11–2:13; 7:5–16; 13:11–13 + ch. 8 + ch. 9 + 6:14–7:1; Betz 1992: 1149–50). (2) Other scholars do not view the points of discontinuity in chs. 1–9 as being severe enough to warrant theories of partition of those chapters, but nevertheless see a significant break between chs. 1–9 and chs. 10–13. Therefore, they argue in favour of a two-letter hypothesis. This is the position adopted here (cf. Furnish 1984: 35–41). Whether chs. 1–9 came before or after chs. 10–13 is a further subject for debate, but more scholars seem to be in favour of the priority of chs. 1–9. According to the proponents of the various partition theories, the NT work called 2 Corinthians is the product of an early editor who combined two or more fragments drawn from originally independent letters. However, some scholars continue to defend the integrity of the letter (e.g. Witherington 1995: 328–39).

2. In form and style 2 Corinthians closely resembles Paul's other works, and its authenticity has not been questioned. However, the language and content of 2 Cor 6:14–7:1 have struck many as being difficult to reconcile with Paul's other writings and, therefore, this passage has often been viewed as an interpolation.

B. Date and Social Setting. 1. In addition to the correspondence which was included in the NT, the Corinthian letters themselves bear witness to additional writings which are either non-extant or have been subsumed along with other letters within the body of 2 Corinthians (see 2 Cor A.1). 1 Cor 5:9 demonstrates that Paul wrote a letter prior to 1 Corinthians, probably concerning the immoral behaviour of church members. Some have identified this letter with 2 Cor 6:14–7:1. 1 Corinthians was written around 54 CE in response to a letter from the Corinthians which had raised several questions. The events which precipitated the correspondence known as 2 Corinthians are a subject of great debate and we are limited to conjecture concerning them. One possible reconstruction of events is as follows. It appears that between the time of the composition of 1 Corinthians and 2 Corinthians (or fragments thereof), Paul paid an emergency 'sorrowful visit' to Corinth (2 Cor 2:1). This probably was the apostle's second visit to the community (cf. 2 Cor 12:14; 13:1), the first being the occasion of the founding of the community in 50 or 51 CE. It seems that this second visit did not go well (2 Cor 2:1–11; 7:12) and Paul followed it up with a 'tearful letter' (2 Cor 2:4; 2:2–11; 7:5–12). Although some have identified this letter with 2 Cor 10–13, it is more likely that it has been lost. A subsequent report to Paul that his 'tearful letter' had produced the desired effect in the community led to the composition in Macedonia in 55–6 CE of 2 Cor 1–9 (2 Cor 7:5; cf. 2 Cor 2:12–13; 8:1; 9:2). Titus apparently delivered this letter to the congregation (2 Cor 7:4–16; cf. 2 Cor 8:17–18). However, the situation deteriorated again. Some months later Paul wrote 2 Cor 10–13, also probably from Macedonia. In this letter he stated his intention to come to the community a third time (2 Cor 12:14; 13:1). (This reconstruction follows Furnish 1988: 1191–2 closely and is based on the two-letter hypothesis. For an alternative reconstruction based upon the five-(or six-)letter hypothesis see Betz 1992: 1149–52.)

2. When Paul wrote 1 Corinthians, he responded to problems involving community division and behaviour, problems he felt were incompatible with membership in Christ's body. By the time of the composition of 2 Corinthians (or various letter fragments), community problems extended to include the nature of the apostle's relationship with the Corinthians. Indeed, some wonder whether the harsh, critical—even sardonic—tone of 1 Corinthians may have alienated its recipients to the extent that a second, more conciliatory letter was required. Convinced that the relationship was severely threatened, and of the need for reconciliation, Paul set out to defend his apostolic authority. By the time that 2 Cor 10–13 was composed (See 2 Cor A.1) the situation had become acute, due to the influence of apostolic rivals in the community. Throughout 2 Cor 10–13 Paul's preoccupation with these rivals is evident, but there are also insinuations in earlier chapters of threats by opponents to Paul's apostleship (e.g. 2 Cor 3:1–6). The nature of Paul's authority is a theme which runs throughout 2 Corinthians, and this text has therefore been of great interest to scholars concerned with the general question of how Paul exercised authority and distributed power in the community (Schütz 1975; Holmberg 1980; Meeks 1983; MacDonald 1988). Often these scholars draw upon social-scientific insights such as the foundational theories of the sociologist Max Weber on charisma and authority. Some of the specific issues under investigation include Paul's apostolic credentials and talents, his involvement in the collection for the Jerusalem church, and his attitude towards receiving material support from the congregation. Paul's use of a 'theology of the cross' (which locates power in weakness; 2 Cor 4:7–15) to anchor his apostolic authority in a divine mandate has also been of considerable interest.

3. Corinth became a Roman colony in 44 BCE and architectural, artefactual, and inscriptional evidence points to a strong Romanizing influence in this old Hellenistic city (Witherington 1995: 6–7). The growing awareness of the need to understand NT groups in the light of the context of Graeco-Roman society has had an important effect on the study of 2 Corinthians. For example, comparison of 2 Cor 8–9 to administrative correspondence in the empire has shed light upon the form and purpose of these chapters (Betz 1985). Increasingly, scholars are examining the influence of Greek rhetorical style upon Paul. The obvious use of such rhetorical devices as parody in 2 Cor 10–13 has invited further probing on the way Paul forms and develops his arguments in 2 Corinthians. It is now possible to say that rhetorical analysis of 2 Corinthians represents an important methodological approach, one which complements more traditional exercises in historical criticism. Rhetorical analysis sheds light on questions ranging from the purpose of the letter to its literary integrity (e.g. Young and Ford 1987; Marshall 1987; Craffon 1990; Witherington 1995). The recognition of the importance of rhetoric in the ancient world and in the letters of Paul has also contributed to a further understanding of Paul's emphasis on boasting and self-praise in 2 Corinthians. Public demonstrations of self-worth (which included performances of rhetoric) were a central means of establishing one's authority in a society which had an honour/shame orientation (Witherington 1995: 6, 432–7; 2 COR 11:12–14; 2 COR 4:1–6). Investigation of the structures of the patron-client relationship in the ancient world has also shed light on Paul's interaction with the Corinthians (Marshall 1987; Chow 1992; Witherington 1995; 2 COR 5:11–19; 2 COR 8:16–24; 2 COR 10:12–18).

C. Opponents. There has been extensive discussion concerning the identity of Paul's opponents in 2 Corinthians (e.g. Barrett 1971; Thrall 1980; Georgi 1986). The consensus is that the problems concerning opponents in 2 Corinthians must be distinguished from the factions and opposition apparent in 1 Corinthians, even though there may have been some connection between the two. In contrast to 1 Corinthians, in 2 Corinthians it is clear that the opponents were intruders, that is, they came from outside the community (2 Cor 10:13–16; 11:4, 19–20). It is also clear that they were Jewish (2 Cor 11:22). But there has been no general agreement on the nature of their Jewish teaching (Murphy-O'Connor 1990: 817). Some have viewed the opponents as Judaizers who were connected to the Jerusalem church (Barrett 1971). Others have understood their spirituality in light of diaspora Judaism and their mission as based in the demonstration of ecstatic experiences and the performance of miracles. Hellenistic Jewish missionaries may have propounded notions of Jesus as the 'divine man' (Georgi 1986: 246–83). There are several difficulties associated with extracting information concerning these opponents and their influence in the community. It is sometimes difficult to know whether Paul is responding directly to new problems created by the opponents who have penetrated the community from the outside, or to more general tendencies in Corinth which have been exacerbated by his rivals. How one interprets the evidence is determined to a significant extent by what one makes of possible thematic connections between 1 and 2 Corinthians (Matthews 1994: 199–200). In addition, although Paul sometimes quotes his rivals directly, his polemical stance makes it difficult to extract accurate information concerning their teaching. The apostle's use of various labels for his opponents, such as 'super-apostles' (2 Cor 11:5; 12:11) and 'false apostles'

(2 Cor 11:13), has also led to discussion of whether one or more groups of opponents are in view (see 2 COR 11:5–15).

D. Outline.

Introduction (1:1–11)

Address (1:1–2)

Blessing (1:3–11)

Paul the Conciliator (1:12–9:15)

Explanations and Future Plans (1:12–2:13)

The Authority of the Apostle (2:14–5:19)

Appeals for Reconciliation with the Apostle (5:20–7:16)

Appeals about the Collection (8:1–9:15)

Paul on the Attack (10:1–13:10)

Preliminary Defence (10:1–18)

The Fool's Speech (11:1–12:13)

Concluding Defence (12:14–13:10)

Conclusion: Greetings and Benediction (13:11–13)

COMMENTARY

Introduction (1:1–11)

(1:1–2) Address The address is in keeping with the normal pattern of Paul's letters (e.g. 1 Cor 1:1–3). Timothy is listed as the co-author. Although Sosthenes and Silvanus are also given this role in other letters, Timothy is most frequently mentioned (cf. Phil 1:1–2; Col 1:1–2; 1 Thess 1:1–2; Thess 1:1–2). It is not easy to evaluate the significance of this joint enterprise in modern terms. On the one hand, it is clear that Timothy's authority in the church was not equal to that of Paul; he was dependent upon Paul. On the other hand, Paul worked very closely with associates and they were instrumental to the success of his mission. Paul exercised his leadership as part of a team and it is misleading to think of the relationship between Paul and his fellow-workers as unilaterally hierarchical. In fact, the importance of the role of Paul's associates emerges especially clearly in 2 Corinthians (2 Cor 2:13; 7:6–16; 8:6, 16–24). At the very least we may say that Timothy is mentioned because he is with Paul and his presence serves to bolster the authority of Paul's message. In particular Timothy's previous work with the Corinthians means that his influence could enhance (or likewise detract from) Paul's position. Along with Silvanus he was involved in the establishment of the church in Corinth (2 Cor 1:19; cf. 1 Cor 4:17; 16:10–11). The addressees are described in such a way as to further corroborate this image of a network of relationships. They are described as the church of God in Corinth, including the 'saints' (a general term in the NT for believers, see OCB s.v.) throughout Achaia (the Roman province with Corinth as its capital). The church in Corinth belongs to a wider community held together by emissaries, letters, and hospitality. 2 Cor 1–9 and possibly also 2 Cor 10–13 were written from Macedonia (2 Cor 2:12–13; 7:5; 8:1; 9:2).

(1:3–11) Blessing As is usually the case in Paul's letters, a blessing or thanksgiving follows the greeting. Typically, the community is praised and their past relationship with the apostle is recalled. Themes to be developed at a later point are introduced. In this text the solidarity of the Corinthians with Paul in affliction is emphasized. Likewise, community and apostle share the hope of consolation. Implicitly, church members are being praised for their strength in the face of suffering. Particularly striking is the repetition of the term 'consolation' and its cognates (paraklēsis). It is a notion that is especially prominent in 2 Corinthians. For example, it is taken up again in 2 Cor 7:4–13, a passage illustrating that the affliction/consolation opposition must be understood in the light of the difficult relations and complicated exchanges between Paul and the Corinthians. Within the Pauline corpus, the term 'affliction' (thlipsis) occurs most frequently in 2 Corinthians. It is a term that can carry a wide variety of meanings (Garrett 1995), ranging from the apostle's own physical (?) sufferings (2 Cor 1:8), to the pain of a broken relationship with the Corinthians that inspired the 'severe letter' (2 Cor 2:4; cf. 7:7–8), to impoverishment (2 Cor 8:13). The affliction in Asia of which Paul speaks in 2 Cor 1:8 seems to have been so devastating that he narrowly escaped with his life. While other explanations cannot be ruled out entirely, some type of physical suffering is probably in view, brought about by persecution (perhaps in Ephesus, cf. 1 Cor 15:32) or disease. Recalling Christ's suffering in 2 Cor 1:5 serves the apostle's purposes well in order to convey the hope of comfort in the midst of affliction; as members of Christ's body, believers continue to share in his afflictions (cf. Col 1:24), but will also be comforted through him. The consolation/affliction opposition is one of many rhetorical strategies Paul employs to reinforce his authority in Corinth. The apostle's leadership clearly recalls the suffering Christ. Like Christ's authority, the apostle's authority is articulated in an unexpected way—through affliction. But this affliction carries the promise of consolation. It is meaningful because it leads to the consolation of believers, relating Paul's (and ultimately Christ's) life intimately to the circumstances of the Corinthians. The association of the consolation/affliction opposition with expressions of confidence (e.g. 2 Cor 1:7; 7:4) makes its function as an assertion of authority especially clear (Meeks 1983: 123).

Paul the Conciliator (1:12–9:15)

(1:12–2:13) Explanations and Future Plans

(1:12–14) The Community as Paul's Boast Paul begins with a declaration of the significance of his relationship with the Corinthians before he offers the explanation of the events that have caused the Corinthians to doubt his sincerity and authority. Although it implies assertiveness, it is misleading to think of boasting as a type of bragging. Rather, it is a term that Paul employs to communicate his ultimate priorities as an apostle and to express his confidence in his mission. It is a notion that appears frequently in 2 Corinthians. Not surprisingly, Paul also speaks of his ground for boasting when he defines his rights as an apostle in 1 Cor 9:15–16. Particularly intriguing is the phrase, 'on the day of the Lord we are your boast even as you are our boast'. The reference to the 'day of the Lord' (cf. 1 Cor 5:5; Phil 1:6, 10; 2:16; 1 Thess 5:2) suggests that Paul is convinced that his relationship with the Corinthians is fundamental to the participation of both parties in the culmination of the Christ event. On that day all will be judged and the apostle is confident that his conduct will be shown to be above reproach. Moreover, the parallelism in the phrase implies mutual dependence between the two parties. The meaning of Paul's apostleship is fundamentally related to the fruit of his labours. A similar sentiment surfaces in Rom 15:22–33 where acceptance of the collection (and ultimately of his Gentile mission) by the Jerusalem church appears to be fundamental to Paul's confidence in the legitimacy of his apostleship. In 2 Corinthians, the body of the Corinthian community (the church which Paul founded) is his boast: this is the manifestation of his apostleship. The boast of the Corinthian community, however, is also rooted in their connection, and no doubt loyalty, to Paul (cf. 5:12). Closely related to the theme of boasting is Paul's claim of having behaved in the world with 'frankness' (haplotēs). Although there is strong MS evidence for the alternative reading of 'holiness', the immediate and broader context suggests that 'frankness' (cf. 2:17) is the most likely possibility (for a summary of the evidence see Furnish 1984: 127). The reference to frankness reflects the ancient Greek notion of the rights of citizens to speak freely and to be open, even generous, in mutual dealings. It is a term which Paul uses to describe the nature of his ministry along with the synonym 'sincerity'; this language resembles notions found elsewhere in 2 Corinthians (2:17; 3:12; 10:2). Frankness, boldness, confidence, and the act of boasting are expressions of the value placed on assertiveness in the ancient Mediterranean world. Assertiveness, especially among men, was a means of preserving one's honour—one's reputation—and was integral to claims of authority. Especially in Acts the assertiveness of the apostles functions as a means of reinforcing the validity of their message (e.g. Acts 4:13, 29, 31; 9:27–9; Reese 1993: 9–11).

(1:15–22) Change of Travel Plans Here Paul is apparently responding to some charge of inconsistency based on a change of plan. It is impossible to be precise about the actual circumstances, but it seems that Paul's plans had changed at least twice. In 1 Cor 16:5–7 Paul announced his intention to visit Corinth briefly before going on to Macedonia. However, the plan he is accused of forfeiting here involved a visit both on the way to Macedonia and after leaving Macedonia; he would then have gone on from Corinth to Judea (probably bearing the collection). (See reconstructions of Paul's itinerary in Betz 1992: 1151; Furnish 1984: 143–4.) Although it is possible that Paul cancelled only the return phase of the anticipated double visit, most commentators believe the entire visit was cancelled (1:23). The reference to a double favour (v. 15) has a somewhat sarcastic ring. It may be in response to those who accused Paul of using flattery to win his audience; he had flattered the Corinthians with promises of a double visit (setting them above the Macedonians?) when he really had no intention of going twice (Furnish 1984: 144). Paul's response is unequivocal. He has not been fickle, answering yes and no in the same breath. In keeping with points he has made earlier in the chapter (1:12), he stresses that his actions as an apostle are based not on a human agenda but on divine initiative. He uses his critics' accusation of vacillation as an invitation to meditate on the absolute consistency of God and complete obedience of Jesus to God's will. In other words, since God is on Paul's side, inconsistency is ruled out. The place of Paul and the Corinthian community in God's plan is announced in vv. 21–2. As the one appointed by God to bring the gospel to the Corinthians, Paul in essence facilitates their joining with him as members of Christ's body. Their mutual relationship with Christ is so close that they have been anointed; they are now 'in Christ', incorporated into the Messiah, the anointed one. Receipt of the Spirit is also in keeping with messianic identity (cf. 1 Sam 16:13; Isa 61:1). Paul's arguments are not confined to doctrine. He also appeals to liturgical experiences, in his reference to the community's usual manner of giving assent: 'amen' (v. 20; cf. 1 Cor 14:16). He also recalls the experience of baptism by referring to the 'seal' and the Spirit as the first instalment of the divine promises (cf. Eph 1:13–14). In Colossians and Ephesians, remembrances of baptism play a central role in encouraging appropriate communal behaviour.

(1:23–2:13) The Painful Visit and the Letter of Tears Paul explains that it was to spare the Corinthians that he did not make another visit. We are probably to understand that between the time of the writing of 1 Corinthians and the composition of 2 Corinthians (or any segment of this document), Paul paid a visit to the Corinthians (cf. 2 Cor 12:14; 13:1). This may well have been an emergency visit (perhaps from Ephesus) brought about by a report of trouble in the community. It is to be distinguished from the cancelled visit described in 1:16 (cf. 1:23). The 'painful visit' probably involved a conflict with an individual and a resulting lack of support from the community. Paul's language calls to mind broken relationships and betrayal but also great love (2:4); it seems that he felt his place among the Corinthians was jeopardized severely (2:5–11; 7:8–12). His visit was apparently followed by a 'tearful letter' which was probably brought to the community by Titus and which was interpreted by some as being unduly severe (7:8). It was Titus who brought news of the turnaround in events after the community had received the letter (7:6–8). Some have identified the 'tearful letter' with chs. 10–13. However, because the problem mentioned in 2:5–11 concerns an individual offender and not 'super-apostles' as in chs. 10–13, others believe that the 'painful letter' no longer exists. Although the incest case of 1 Cor 5 which Paul discusses in uncompromising terms might lead to the suggestion that the 'tearful letter' is in fact 1 Corinthians, few hold this point of view today. We are limited to conjecture, but these verses offer information about Paul's comings and goings, and hints about the setting of the composition of 2 Corinthians (or parts thereof). It seems that from Ephesus (1 Cor 16:5–8) Paul travelled to the seaport of Troas where he hoped to find his 'brother' Titus (for other brother-helpers, cf. Phil 2:25; Philem 16). Paul's longing for Titus offers us a poignant glimpse into the significance of Paul's relationship with his fellow-workers (2 Cor 7:5–7). In Troas, Paul had considerable missionary success. The metaphor he uses calls to mind the importance of the household and workshop as an arena for conversion in the ancient world (see Hock 1980; MacMullen 1984: 25–42). Evangelical opportunity is described as a door being opened for him in the Lord (2:12). From Troas, Paul set out for Macedonia where he met up with (Titus 7:6). It is probable that it was from Macedonia that Paul wrote 2 Corinthians (or parts thereof). It is clear that by the time of the composition of these verses the problem of breakdown in relations between Paul and the Corinthians, caused by the case of the offender, had been resolved. The nature of the offence is to be distinguished from that discussed in 1 Cor 5 where Paul insists that the wicked person be driven out from the community like a malady that must be purged from the body (1 Cor 5:13; on the differences between 1 Cor 5:1–5 and 2 Cor 2:5–11 see detailed discussion in Furnish 1984: 164–6). In the case of 2 Corinthians, the offender has been punished by the community enough and now should be forgiven and consoled. Is Paul's leniency rooted in the nature of the offence, i.e. a challenge to his authority and not a case of immorality which is worse even than that found among the pagans (1 Cor 5:1)? It has been suggested that this offender was someone external to the community (see Barrett 1973: 212), but this theory has not gained wide acceptance. The pain/consolation opposition throughout the text is in keeping with the suffering/consolation opposition in 1:3–11. Paul uses language of contrast to move the discussion from a previously painful situation to a celebration of the nature of the reconciliation and love that now exists. But the frequently attested theme of the apostle who suffers unjustly surfaces here as well (2:3). Despite the presence of Christ, Paul and the community members will remain vulnerable to the intervention of evil until the day of the Lord. Satan can interfere with community matters and with the apostle's agenda (2:11; 11:3, 14–15; 12:7; cf. 1 Thess 2:18). He can cause innumerable misfortunes and suffering and one must always be watchful of his designs (Neyrey 1990: 176).

(2:14–5:19) The Authority of the Apostle

(2:14–3:6) The Legitimacy of Paul's Apostleship This section opens with a formula of thanksgiving which has perhaps been inspired by the good news brought by Titus of the community's compliance with the apostle's wishes (7:6–7; Thrall 1965: 129). Rich imagery is used to communicate what God has accomplished in Christ. Believers are described as being led in the manner of the triumphal procession of the general who returns victorious from battle. The notion of triumph in weakness which is so central to Paul's theology in 2 Corinthians may be in view here. It is important to note that it was the prisoners-of-war who were paraded through the streets during such processions and Paul may be identifying the apostles with them (Furnish 1988: 1194). 'Fragrance' refers to the odour of incense in sacrifice. Paul may be thinking of rituals associated with Roman celebrations of triumph or with Jewish temple practice. The image may also have been influenced by Sir 24:15 where fragrance is a sign of the presence of God/Wisdom (Murphy-O'Connor 1990: 819). In the accounts of martyrdom in later church literature, beautiful fragrance was a sign of God's presence and that God was on the side of the Christians (see Mart. Pol. 15). First the gospel and then the apostles are compared to a fragrance. The fragrance spreads throughout the world by means of the apostles and for some represents life, but for others, death. This black-and-white language offers a good example of 'language of belonging' and 'language of separation' which demarcates the boundaries of the community (Meeks 1983: 85–96). Here the negative perception of the outside society is particularly evident. But the fragrance is also said to spread 'in every place', implying a universal mission. There is a certain tension in Paul's letters between openness to the external society in the hope of winning new members and a strong desire to remain separate (MacDonald 1988: 32–42). In 2:16 the tone changes abruptly from thanksgiving to interrogation of the community concerning the specifics of their relationship with Paul. Before Paul engages in a dialogue concerning the objections raised against his apostleship, he raises a question designed to lead believers to the conclusion that apostolic claims must ultimately rest only in God. With the question 'Who is sufficient for these things?' he hopes to make them see the error of the presumption that an apostle's superior personal attributes are responsible for success in carrying out God's plan. The same idea is repeated in 3:5. Perhaps distinguishing himself from others who claim superior attributes, he makes the point emphatically that he is not a charlatan. The language is very strong and, given the suspicions about Paul's financial arrangements which are echoed later in the work, it is tempting to conclude that this label had been applied to him. Paul speaks literally of those who hawk (kapēleuein) the word of God. The Greek term occurs nowhere else in the NT but was employed by ancient critics of itinerant teachers to speak of the 'huckstering of wisdom' (Furnish 1984: 178). To those who would rebuke him for his lack of letters of recommendation, Paul replies that nothing could compare with the proof of commendation that lies in their existence as a church: the Corinthians themselves are the letter. Letters of recommendation were an accepted means of ensuring hospitality and receipt of some favour in the ancient world (cf. Acts 9:2; 22:5). One of the benefits that a patron might extend to his client was such a letter. Rom 16:1–2 makes it clear that Paul himself could make use of such letters in order to introduce a church member to the community; but in his personal dealings with the Corinthians such tools were not necessary. Perhaps the letters in question came from the Jerusalem church or from a patron thought to be more impressive than Paul. We are left to wonder whether the tendency to peddle God's word and/or the absence of letters of recommendation were accusations made by the offender (2:5–11) against Paul which found support among others in Corinth. What is clear is that Paul thinks such problems do exist with other would-be apostles. In response to possible objections Paul does two things: (1) he reminds the Corinthians that apostleship makes sense only if it comes from God (ultimately, Paul's only patron). Paul's ministry is a ministry of a 'new covenant', a theme developed in depth in 3:7–18; (2) he appeals to his confidence, sincerity, and forthrightness which are important means of establishing his credibility as an authoritative teacher in the ancient world (2:17; 3:4–6; 4:1–4; 5:6–8; cf. 2 COR 1:12–14).

(3:7–18) A Minister of the New Covenant By playing with various contrasting notions such as 'letter of law/Spirit,' 'death/life,' 'old covenant/new covenant', Paul compares the old relationship between God and his people with the new relationship established by God through Christ (on covenant, see ABD i. 1197–202). The issue of the letters of recommendation in 3:1–6 allows him to introduce the issue of the letter of the Jewish law. Beginning in 3:6, and continuing to v. 11, the law—the centre of the old covenant—is depicted in categorically negative terms. The letter kills and ministry based on letters chiselled on stone tablets (Ex 24:12; 31:18) leads to death (on death and the law, see ABD ii. 110–11; iv. 254–65). A very strong statement of the law's inadequacy for salvation is also found in v. 11 where the law is described as 'what was set aside'

(cf. v. 7). Paul admits that the old covenant was glorious, but it has been far surpassed in glory (vv. 7–11). These verses have been judged as shedding light on Paul's view of life under the law and generally as important for understanding the birth of the church in a Jewish context. Stressing that Paul's conviction that the law condemns and kills is based on his post-conversion understanding, and is not rooted in particular personal experiences of the law's limitations for Jewish life, E. P. Sanders has argued that the apostle represented the Mosaic covenant as less glorious simply because he had found in Christ something more glorious. Paul's thought and language proceeded from his conviction about Christ as the centre of salvation and it developed in very black-and-white terms: 'I cannot see how the development could have run the other way, from an initial conviction that the Law only condemns and kills, to a search for something which gives life, to the conviction that life comes by faith in Christ, to the statement that the Law lost its glory because a new dispensation surpasses it in glory' (Sanders 1983: 138). But there remains some ambiguity in Paul's thought (ibid. 138–9). On the one hand, the law has been set aside and does not save. But on the other hand, the old covenant may still be read profitably by members of the church: when Jews who are not members of the church read it, it is veiled, but when believers read it, it is unveiled (vv. 14–16). The reference to veiling recalls the covering that Moses placed over his face during his descent from Mt. Sinai (Ex 34:33–5; cf. 34:29–35). Some have understood the comparison between Paul's ministry and Moses' ministry that runs throughout vv. 7–18 in terms of a response to Paul's adversaries (Murphy-O'Connor 1990: 819). It has even been suggested that the source of the conflict is a midrashic document on Ex 34:29–35 that was composed by Paul's opponents and which Paul modified in these verses in the hope of correcting a mistaken view of Moses and the Mosaic covenant (Georgi 1986: 264–71). There has been considerable interest in Paul's use of Scripture here, including his dependence on the LXX and extra-biblical sources (Belleville 1993: 165–85; Stockhausen 1993: 143–64). The emphasis in vv. 7–18 is on freedom from the law (cf. Gal 5:18) and the transformation of believers. The believer's image, reflected in a mirror, becomes that of Christ (cf. 4:6; 1 Cor 11:7); and salvation involves increasing conformity to him (Murphy-O'Connor 1990: 820). The identification of Spirit with Lord (in Paul's letters usually referring to Christ) has raised doctrinal questions, but many commentators believe 'Lord' in vv. 16–18 refers directly to God (Thrall 1965: 136–7; Furnish 1984: 234–6).

(4:1–6) The Honourable Apostle Paul apparently responds to those who are denigrating his ministry by setting himself apart from his rivals. Paul's ministry is characterized by the persistence and boldness that are qualities of an honourable apostle (2 COR 1:12–14). The values of honour (public acknowledgement of worth) and shame (public denial of worth) frame the text. Shame also can have a positive value in the ancient world in the sense of 'having shame': that is, having appropriate concern for one's reputation. In this text what is shameful refers to the absence or loss of honour (on honour and shame see Plevnik 1993: 95–104). The shameful things that Paul has renounced are clearly negative: literally, 'the things of shame that one hides'. Has Paul been accused of dishonourable activity which is sequestered and secretive? The setting of the churches in private homes could certainly have fostered that impression. Paul believes that to act in a shameful manner is to display cunning and to falsify God's word (cf. 2:17). Behind Paul's declaration that he refuses to adopt shameful tactics probably lies an attempt to distance himself from rival apostles who mislead and exploit the congregation (cf. 11:20). Language of honour and shame is useful in communicating what should be valued most, i.e. what is the basis of true apostleship. Because honour and shame are rooted in the importance in the ancient Mediterranean world placed on public appraisal, these concepts also are useful in conveying the scope of evangelical mission. The central message is that the Corinthians have come to know the light of the gospel only through Paul's preaching (Furnish 1988: 1194). The reference to the veil is in keeping with 3:12–18 but gains further nuance in relation to the themes of secrecy and openness introduced here. The image of the sometimes blinding veil is part of Paul's admission that his preaching is not always successful: public acknowledgement which should follow honourable display and open statement of the truth is not always quickly forthcoming. The blindness of unbelievers, however, is not the result of Paul's tactics as an apostle but has been caused by the god of this world: Satan or Beliar (2 COR 6:14–7:1). The frequent notion of Paul's apostleship having purely divine origins is found again in vv. 5–6. In response to competitors who would 'preach themselves' (seek to gain acceptance by drawing upon personal attributes), Paul argues that he proclaims only 'Christ as Lord' (a confessional formula, Rom 10:9; 1 COR 12:3; Phil 2:10–11). The description of Paul as the Corinthians' slave for Jesus' sake is in keeping with the frequent use of slavery as a metaphor in Pauline Christianity (cf. 1 COR 9:16–23). Paul's self-enslavement has been recognized as a practical strategy for evangelization (low-status persons may be won through the evangelist's self-lowering) and as a rhetorical strategy for conveying the nature of his leadership. But the theological importance of the metaphor is especially visible here. Paul's self-abasement, communicated through the image of slavery, is closely associated with the theology of the cross (4:13–18): humiliation is followed by exaltation. It has been suggested that the effectiveness of the metaphorical representation of slavery as salvation is related to the fact that in Graeco-Roman society, slavery was an ambiguous and multifaceted concept, carrying connotations both of abasement and upward mobility (Martin 1990: 129–32). There is very strong language of separation here which is reinforced by an allusion to Gen 13 (v. 6, cf. 2 COR 2:14–3:6); church members see, but unbelievers are blind and perishing. The light of the gospel (v. 4) shines through Paul in a world that is otherwise dark and still very much influenced by evil.

(4:7–15) Power in Weakness Paul's theology of the cross is proclaimed throughout 4:7–18 (cf. 1 COR 1:17–2:5). The event of the death and resurrection of Christ means that the appearance of weakness and humiliation can carry the promise of power and exaltation (v. 14). Paul's theology of the cross (and statements about suffering) in 2 Corinthians must be understood in the light of a particular polemical context where Paul seeks to undermine the position of rivals who make too much of their personal superiority in relation to Paul's weakness.

Moreover, the theology of the cross is not about passivity in suffering, but about power in suffering. With sometimes biting irony, Paul protests against his rivals who find God on the side of strength and power (10:10–11). In 2 Corinthians the paradox of the crucified Messiah is proclaimed boldly. The ambiguous symbol of a suffering saviour offers Paul many possibilities to expose the folly of those who would attack him. Paul's theology of the cross has been of interest to feminist biblical commentators, who warn of the dangers of lifting Paul's message out of context and using it to advocate passivity and meekness in the face of suffering and oppression (Matthews 1994: 214–15). But there is no doubt that the symbol locates God on the side of the suffering, the weak, and the oppressed (vv. 8–10, cf. 1 COR 1:18–31; Bassler 1992: 331–2). In these verses the focus is on power in physical weakness. This notion is communicated through the beautiful image of the fragile clay pots which contain hidden treasure. It is also conveyed through the catalogue of hardships (vv. 8–9). Similar lists are found throughout 2 Corinthians and elsewhere in Paul's letters (6:4–5; 11:23–9; 12:10; Rom 8:35; 1 COR 4:9–13). Scholars have examined the literary relationships between the lists within 2 Corinthians and have even speculated about what these relationships might reveal about the literary integrity of the work (Witherington 1995: 398–9). The tribulations are described with vivid language which is reminiscent of the terms employed by philosophers in the ancient world who described their struggles in the overcoming of passion and search for wisdom (Fitzgerald 1988: 65–70; 148–201). Suffering is not glorified; on the contrary, it is experienced by the apostle as unjust (Neyrey 1990: 177–9); yet it is given meaning in two ways. First, suffering allows for identification with Jesus and, ultimately, resurrection with Jesus (vv. 10–14). Secondly, Paul's suffering mirrors Jesus' suffering and hence makes Jesus' life visible in the world. 'Flesh' (sarx) in v. 11 is a synonym for 'body' (sōma) in v. 10, but the term 'flesh' (see OCB 231) places more emphasis on physical existence, a connotation which is highlighted throughout this text (Murphy-O'Connor 1990: 821). Because his suffering bears witness to Jesus, Paul is able to argue that his suffering is for the sake of the Corinthian church which he founded and more broadly for the sake of his evangelical mission. The reference to Ps 116:10 in v. 13 allows him to link preaching (speaking) with proclamation of faith in the midst of suffering.

(4:16–5:1) The Fragility of Mortal Existence Interest in the limited nature of physical existence is maintained throughout these verses. Paul is strikingly honest about his own frailty (perhaps in response to those who would claim that physical weakness is incompatible with apostleship; cf. 10:10). He uses the contrast between his outer nature (his visible body) and inner nature (the faith and commitment to Christ which cannot be seen) to point to ultimate reality: that which is eternal and transcends physical existence. While in other places Paul gives the impression that he expects to live until Christ's return (1 Thess 4:15, 17), here Paul confronts the harsh reality of death (5:1). Several architectural images are conflated to convey the notion of heavenly existence. The literary-historical background of these images has been of considerable interest. It has been noted that the use of the image of a tent to refer to the mortal body occurs in many Hellenistic religious and ethical texts (Furnish 1984: 293). There has been extensive discussion of the meaning of the 'house not made with hands'. Often Paul has been understood as referring to the new spiritual body which will be given to believers (1 Cor 15:51–4). Others have argued that the text should be read in the light of Jewish and early Christian apocalyptic traditions which include the notion of an eschatological temple and new Jerusalem (2 Apoc. Bar. 4:3; 2 Esd 10:40–57; cf. Mk 14:58). Parallels between this passage and Phil 3:12–21 have been noted. The symbol of the heavenly commonwealth in Phil 3:20 resembles the heavenly dwelling of 5:1. If this interpretation is accepted, 5:1 should be understood as speaking primarily about believers as already belonging to another age and as having a new existence, rather than as addressing specifically the issue of the new spiritual body (Furnish 1984: 294–5; Murphy-O'Connor 1990: 821). A similar conflation of body imagery with architectural imagery occurs in Eph 2:19–22, but there the focus is clearly ecclesiological. Although many commentators have understood 5:1 as introducing a new subject, it has been included in this section because it acts as the climax of 4:16–18 which emphasizes the temporality and fragility of mortal existence (Furnish 1984: 291).

(5:2–10) Present Existence and Future Fulfilment The emphasis shifts somewhat from the limits of mortality to the ultimate shape of life with God and the nature of existence in this new eschatological age. It has been said that 5:1–10 is one of the most difficult passages in all of Paul's letters to explain adequately (Thrall 1965: 142). It has often been thought that Paul's recent escape from death (1:9) led him to doubt his previous belief that he and others would be alive at the Parousia (1 Thess 4:13–18; 1 Cor 15:51–2). The reference to nakedness in v. 3 has been instrumental to the theory that Paul is responding to fear surrounding an interim period between death of the physical body and resurrection of a new spiritual body. But this theory has also been disputed (Furnish 1984: 292–3). Paul does not really seem to be deliberately responding to a problem in the way that is so evident in 1 Thess 4:13–18. The fear of being naked may indeed refer to concern about an intermediate state between life and the adoption of the spiritual body (1 Cor 15:37–8; Barrett 1973: 154–5). Paul may be expressing his preference to avoid the intermediate condition altogether: that is, to live on earth until the resurrection (Witherington 1995: 391). But the reference to nakedness may also be a reminder of the harsh reality of final judgement (cf. 2 Cor 5:10) when a person's culpability will be exposed (Isa 47:3; Ezek 23:28–9; Murphy-O'Connor 1991: 52). An awareness of the importance of the values of honour and shame in the ancient Mediterranean world may also prove useful here (2 Cor 4:1–6). In the HB nakedness is strongly associated with shame and sin. To be shamed is to be involuntarily stripped naked (Neyrey 1993: 119–21). Presence before an honourable God requires that one may not be found naked, but have put on the heavenly garment/tent (ibid. 122). Although the NRSV translation 'when we have taken it off' fits best with the theory that Paul is referring to an interim period between death and adoption of a new spiritual body, there is good reason to adopt the strongly attested alternative reading 'when we have put it on' (Furnish 1984: 268). An understanding of the values of honour and shame may also help explain how this text fits within the broader discussion of apostolic suffering and authority. When the Corinthians turn against Paul might they be stripping him naked and/or rendering themselves exposed before a God who makes believers accountable for what has been done 'in the body' (v. 10)? That questions about Paul's apostleship are not far removed from the main argument here is made clear by the double assertion of confidence by which Paul reinforces his role as an honourable apostle (vv. 6–8; 2 Cor 1:12–14). Some have viewed the merger of the images of 'dwelling' and 'clothing' (cf. 1 Cor 15:53–4; Gal 3:27; Rom 13:14) to be somewhat awkward on Paul's part. However, they actually work well for Paul's purposes since they tie personal affiliation (the garment which must be put on) closely with communal commitment (the household that must be joined, the dwelling that must be entered). The main purpose of the imagery is to announce the nature of the new mode of existence: real life that 'swallows up' (kataptein; v. 4) all that is mortal. Comparison with Rom 8:18–27 is especially useful since it also refers to 'groaning' (Rom 8:23, 26) and highlights the role of the Spirit, as creation waits to be released from futility and suffering. Continuing to be plagued by limitations, groaning under his 'burdens' (cf. 1:6; 4:8, 17), Paul is moving towards his ultimate goal. The contrast between being 'at home' in the body and 'at home' with the Lord in vv. 6–10 reflects the tension between present salvation and future fulfilment that is characteristic of Paul's thought. The term for being away from home (ekdēmein), has a wider significance than leaving one's house: literally it refers to the act of leaving one's country or going on a long journey (BAGD 238). Paul's present life is shaped by Christ whom one must continue to please until one enters the heavenly commonwealth (cf. Phil 3:20). The presence of the Spirit acts as a foretaste of future fulfilment.

(5:11–19) Warnings against Reliance on External Appearances This text relates Paul's ministry to a reversal of earthly standards and the dawning of a new creation. The reference to 'persuasion' has been understood as a reference to rhetoric, the art of persuasion. Paul is acting like an ancient rhetor who will be judged by the Corinthians according to their consciences. The picture of the ambassador who entreats the assembly (5:20) also fits with this context. Paul presents God as his ultimate judge, but this passage functions as an indirect acknowledgement of the fact that the Corinthians have put Paul on trial, and of how important it is to Paul that the Corinthians recognize his authority (v. 11; Witherington 1995: 392–3). Paul says that he is not going to commend himself to the Corinthians again (v. 11), but in fact this is exactly what he does. In saying that he will not commend himself he means that he will not adopt the self-aggrandizing tactics of his rivals who boast in outward appearances. Paul may be distinguishing himself from apostolic rivals whom he feels adopt the disreputable tactics of sophists. Sophists were commonly accused of paying too much attention to external forms (appearance, clothing, delivery) at the expense of content (Witherington 1995: 393–4; 348–50). In v. 13 Paul offers an interesting insight into the nature of the comparisons the Corinthians were making. 'Madness' here perhaps refers to religious ecstasy (Furnish 1984: 308). His rivals probably displayed ecstatic experiences in public, and accused Paul of failing to produce these experiences as evidence of his apostleship. Paul seems to be claiming that ecstatic experiences should be reserved for private worship (cf. 12:1–7). The text invites comparison with 1 Cor 14:18–19 where Paul claims to speak in tongues frequently, but where he also makes it clear that in the public arena of the ekklesia he prefers understandable speech (which can include tongues if they are interpreted) to ecstatic speaking. In 1 Cor 14:23–5 he even expresses his fear that non-believers (potential converts) might witness uncontrolled glossolalia and assume that church members are mad! Warnings against reliance on external appearance, form, and display also underlie the statement that Paul no longer makes judgements from a human point of view. Paul admits that before his acceptance of Christ he judged Christ by worldly standards, perhaps according to the pathetic image of a crucified messianic impostor (v. 16). This passage offers an excellent illustration of how Paul's theological thought is fundamentally tied to the interpersonal struggles of human communities. It is reflection on the misguided nature of his rivals that leads him to locate his own priorities in the love of Christ and to articulate one of the strongest statements of universal salvation in his epistles (vv. 14–15; as reflecting credal affirmations cf. 1 Cor 15:3). By means of the doctrine of 'reconciliation' in vv. 18–19 Paul presents God's initiative, Christ's role, and his own mission (Paul is a minister of 'reconciliation'). Here Paul also may be drawing on a traditional formula (cf. Col 1:19–20; Eph 2:13–16) which he interprets in a new way. Given the predominance of the structures of patronage in the ancient world, however, it has been suggested that Paul may be casting God here as the great benefactor, Christ as the means of benefaction, and Paul as the human agent (or broker) of the stores of salvation: Paul is the one who serves (Danker 1989: 82–3; Witherington 1995: 396). In order to justify his mission and break with worldly standards, Paul ultimately relies on support for his conviction that God has transformed the world radically through Christ. The emphasis on newness and the proclamation in v. 17 'there is a new creation'—although some would translate this as 'he/she is a new creation' (see Witherington 1995: 395)—function as justifications of the birth of a new religious movement.

(5:20–7:16) Appeals for Reconciliation with the Apostle

(5:20–6:2) God Speaks through Paul This passage is thematically very closely related to the previous section. However, it introduces a new type of exhortation. As is frequently the case in Paul's letters, an appeal (v. 20; parakaleō) follows an affirmation (v. 19), the imperative follows the indicative. In fact, v. 20 sets in motion a series of appeals (appeals for reconciliation with Paul and concerning the collection) which continue until 9:15 (Furnish 1988: 1196). Here, Paul's apostolic authority is expressed in the very strongest of terms. Paul's human powers (his ability as a teacher or sage to influence an audience in antiquity) are secondary at this point; what is important is that God has conveyed legitimacy upon his mission. God has granted Paul authority and in fact speaks through him. It is God who appeals through Paul to the Corinthians. The move from doctrinal affirmation to ethical imperative in this text makes Paul's conviction explicit: the act of reconciliation which overcomes humanity's estrangement from God is played out on the societal level in the reconciliation which must occur between Paul and the Corinthians. As in the related text of Rom 5:1–11, language of justification (righteousness, OCB s.v.; ABD v. 757–68) is combined with language of reconciliation (Meeks 1983: 186). The appeal is very strong, linking a broken relationship with God to a broken relationship with the Corinthians. Paul may even have feared that the Corinthians were in danger of committing apostasy (Witherington 1995: 397). The citation from Isa 49:8 emphasizes the present nature of salvation, but also reinforces the urgency of the situation. The reference to the one who knew no sin having been made sin (v. 21) may refer to the sinless Christ taking on sin as a burden or being treated as a sinner for the sake of humanity (Gal 3:13); sin may also refer to a sin-offering here (Rom 8:3; cf. Isa 53:4–10).

(6:3–13) Commendation through Hardships A common goal of ancient rhetoric was to establish the speaker's ethos or character (Witherington 1995: 44, 398). Paul begins with assurances that he has placed no 'obstacle' before the Corinthians. He seems to have believed that ministers were very influential in facilitating or preventing access to salvation (Murphy-O'Connor 1990: 822). Paul presents eloquent wisdom (rhetoric devoid of content) as being able to empty the cross of its power in 1 Cor 1:17. In contrast to the self-commendations adopted by others, Paul has commended himself as a servant of God (2 Cor 4:1–6). As elsewhere in 2 Corinthians the metaphor of slavery, the theology of the cross, and the list of apostolic hardships work together to communicate the notion of a reversal of norms for judging claims of authority (2 Cor 4:7–15). Paul's listing of a catalogue of sufferings is in keeping with the Stoic and Cynic theme that the hardships of the sage demonstrate virtue and character (Fitzgerald 1988: 199–201). Paul gives these traditional elements distinctive meaning in relation to the Christ event (Witherington 1995: 400). The stress on reputation and recognition in vv. 8–9 illustrates the importance of public acknowledgement of worth in the 'honour and shame' societies of the ancient world. But here Paul is willing to entertain the reversal even of these most basic cultural values. The military metaphor in v. 7 is developed further in 10:3–5 and even more extensively by the author of Ephesians (Eph 6:11–17). The inclusion of poverty in the list of hardships (v. 10) is especially intriguing given the concerns about the collection which underlie chs. 8–9, and the fact that questions about Paul's acceptance and/or refusal of support from church members was at the heart of confrontation with opponents (11:7–11; 12:14–18; cf. 1 Cor 9:1–18). In vv. 11–13 Paul repeats that he has demonstrated the open speech and boldness which are the hallmarks of an honourable apostle (2 Cor 11:12–14) and he characterizes his relationship with the Corinthians as resembling the exchange between a father and his children (cf. 12:14).

(6:14–7:1) Warnings against Contact with Unbelievers This text seems to interrupt the appeals of 6:11–13 which are resumed at 7:2–3. A large number of occurrences of hapax legomena have been noted. The stringing together of a series of citations from Scripture which are not found elsewhere in Paul's letters (the allusions in 6:16–18 include Lev 26:12; Isa 52:11; Ezek 20:34; 2 Sam 7:14) has invited discussion. The vocabulary and ideas, especially the dualism, have been judged to be closer to the Qumran community than to Paul. Thus a great deal of doubt has been raised about the authenticity of these verses. There have been theories ranging from an 'anti-Pauline fragment' (Betz 1973: 88–108) to a 'Pauline interpolation of non-Pauline material' (Furnish 1984: 383), to a 'deliberative digression' which fits well within the present context of 2 Corinthians (Witherington 1995: 402). Some have understood this section to be part of the letter to the Corinthians mentioned in 1 Cor 5:9–11. In addition to the many literary problems this passage raises, the uncompromising distinction between believers and unbelievers (which seems to leave little room for the winning of new members) is surprising. It is difficult, for example, to harmonize the strong statement that one should not be mismatched with unbelievers (apistoi) with Paul's allowance for marriages between believers and non-believers to continue because of their evangelizing potential (1 Cor 7:12–16). However, there are points of contact between this text and others in Paul's letters where the church is envisioned as the temple of God made up of sanctified believers (1 Cor 3:16, 19) which must be kept pure. The corollary of this notion of holy temple is the view that members who threaten to bring impurity into the community should be treated as outsiders (1 Cor 5:1–5; Newton 1985: 110–14). On the question of maintaining community boundaries, it is also useful to compare this passage to 1 Cor 8 and 10 where the problem of food sacrificed to idols is discussed. Beliar is a name for Satan (or an evil spirit under Satan) which occurs frequently in Jewish intertestamental literature.

(7:2–16) Restoration of Good Relations The appeals of 6:11–13 are resumed in vv. 2–4. Many of the concepts related to the honour of Paul's apostleship such as 'boasting' and 'confidence' are reiterated (2 Cor 1:12–14). The nature of the intimate connection between apostle and community and the theme of comfort and affliction (2 Cor 1:3–11) are developed further in vv. 5–16. Many commentators have understood v. 5 as a resumption of the comments in 2:12–13, and this view figures prominently in theories about the partitioning of the letter (1:1–2:13; 7:5–16; 13:11–13 have been described as a 'letter of reconciliation'; Betz 1992: 1149–50). But these theories have also been disputed. It is also possible to understand the narrative beginning at v. 5 as an example of the comfort that occurs in affliction (v. 4); a comfort that is ultimately divine consolation (v. 6; Murphy-O'Connor 1990: 823). Without going so far as a theory of partition, it has been argued from a rhetorical perspective that vv. 5–16 constitute an amplification of some of the things mentioned in the narratio (explaining the disputed matter) of chs. 1 and 2. In other words, these verses represent a kind of retelling in a manner that would help Paul make his case as convincing as possible. The recapitulation may offer an indication that Paul was very concerned about the fact that he was being perceived as inconsistent with respect to his travel plans and about the results of the 'tearful letter' (2 Cor 1:23–2:13; Witherington 1995: 407). Paul informs listeners that the setting of the events where he experienced comfort in affliction was Macedonia. The afflictions from which his body had no rest are described as coming from 'within' and from 'without'. It is possible that he is referring to bodily suffering in the form of internal anguish and external malady (cf. 4:16). But the terms might also have communal connotations, referring to suffering resulting from encounters with those outside the body of Christ (cf. 1 Tim 3:7) and from problems within the church community (or a combination of community difficulties and physical afflictions, such as suffering resulting from contacts with non-believers and those occurring as a result of disease). With related terminology, Paul refers throughout his correspondence to those on the outside as non-believers (1 Cor 5:12, 13; Col 4:5; 1 Thess 4:12). In v. 5 Paul may be continuing to speak with an uncompromising voice towards non-believers as he did in 6:14–7:1. In discussing the arrival of Titus, Paul fills in many details which are alluded to in 2 Cor 2. Paul was consoled by Titus' arrival and by the news that issues concerning the offender (2:6–8) had been resolved. The 'letter of tears' (2:3–4) had apparently produced the desired effect of instilling repentance (v. 10). Paul describes the Corinthians as having proved themselves to be guiltless (v. 11): they exonerated themselves by dealing appropriately with the offender and by showing that they did not have misplaced loyalties (vv. 11–12). 'The one who did wrong' refers to the offender (2 Cor 1:23–2:13) and 'the one who was wronged' refers to Paul (v. 12). That what is at stake transcends the particular events of the dispute and involves the fundamental nature of Paul's relationship with the Corinthians is made clear by Paul's description of the consolation which has occurred as a longing, mourning, and zeal for the apostle (v. 7; cf. v. 12; 11:2). It is interesting to note that although Paul seeks concrete expressions of his authority by calling for loyalty to his position and by insisting that the offender be punished, at the same time he denies the ultimate importance of his personal authority; rather, the 'tearful letter' precipitated a rediscovery of the inseparable link between loyalty to Paul and loyalty to God (vv. 12–13). The contrast between godly grief and worldly grief in vv. 9–11 also represents a bestowing of salvific meaning upon the dispute. The painful experience (the Corinthians were grieved by Paul's letter, v. 8) was in actual fact the kind of godly grief which leads to 'repentance' (metanoia, vv. 9–10; see OCB 646–7; ABD v. 672–3). This is one of the few places where Paul employs the term (Rom 2:4; cf. 12:21; 2 Tim 2:25). Here it does not refer to repentance prior to entry into the church, but to believers repenting of some sin; it involves rediscovery of commitment to Paul, his gospel, and ultimately to God (Witherington 1995: 409). The subordination or denial of the obvious or earthly significance of the events in favour of an argument about divine purpose is an example of what sociologists of knowledge have called 'legitimation': the means by which the institutional world is explained and justified (Berger and Luckmann 1981: 79). Legitimation is involved in the construction and maintenance of the 'symbolic universe' (MacDonald 1988: 16, 10–11). Opposition, deviance, or heresy can give impetus to theorizing about the symbolic universe. The development of theological thought is accelerated by challenges posed to the tradition by opponents, deviants, or heretics. In the process of theorizing, new implications of the tradition emerge and the symbolic universe is transformed (Berger and Luckmann 1981: 125). Paul's evocative theology of comfort in affliction is articulated by means of this process. The information about Titus in this passages offers a good example of the importance of Paul's co-workers to his mission. Titus may be counted as a member of the small group of Paul's closest co-workers who were clearly subject to Paul but also could act as his representatives (Holmberg 1980: 57–67). An important companion of Paul, Titus was taken along to Jerusalem where he was the focus of a dispute about whether Gentiles needed to be circumcised. Paul vigorously resisted the appeal that his Greek co-worker be circumcised (Gal 2:1–3). Although he had apparently not met the Corinthians previously, Titus became Paul's representative in an attempt to bring about a reconciliation (v. 14). It is indicated at 8:6, 16–24, that Titus was sent to Corinth a second time to conduct work in support of the collection for Jerusalem (cf. 2 Cor 12:18). The close relationship between Paul and Titus is made clear by the fact that Titus' very presence is a comfort to Paul (vv. 6–7). Titus' connection with the Corinthian community is also cast in personal and emotional terms (vv. 13–15). He somehow participates in Paul's apostleship. It is useful to view Titus as a broker of Paul's authority. The attitude of the Corinthians with respect to Titus is one of obedience and they welcome him with fear and trembling (v. 15). An understanding of the centrality of the values of honour and shame in first-century society can shed light upon what was at stake in Titus' visit to Corinth. Because Paul has previously 'boasted' to Titus about the model behaviour of the Corinthians, the community can strip Paul of all honour if it fails to live up to its reputation; the community has the power to revoke all public recognition of the apostle's worth. How they treat Titus has a direct bearing upon their patron (v. 14).

(8:1–9:15) Appeals about the Collection

(8:1–15) A Call to Fulfil Previous Commitment Chs. 8–9 have figured prominently in theories about the fragmentation of 2 Corinthians. It has been argued that ch. 8 constitutes an 'administrative letter' which was delivered to Corinth by Titus and two 'brothers' (8:18–23). Comparison with literary parallels has revealed similarity to letters of appointment given to political or administrative emissaries (Betz 1985: 37–86, 131–9). Ch. 9 has also been viewed as an administrative letter. It may have had an advisory purpose: enlisting the help of the Achaians in bringing the collection in Corinth to fruition (ibid. 87–128, 139–40). Such partition theories have not seemed convincing to everyone. The mention of Macedonia and Titus, for example, in ch. 7 may prepare the way for the issues in chs. 8–9 and might be taken as a sign of literary integrity (Witherington 1995: 410, 413). While there is some disjunction suggested, for example, by the break in subject between 8:24 and 9:1 (with the usual formula: 'peri de', 'now concerning', e.g. 1 Cor 7:1; 8:1, 4; 12:1; 16:1), the evidence has sometimes been judged as insufficient to demand that ch. 9 be viewed as a separate letter (Murphy-O'Connor 1990: 823; Witherington 1995: 413). These chapters have been called an example of deliberative rhetoric (persuasion or dissuasion with a future orientation) designed to ensure that the audience fulfil a commitment previously made concerning the collection, and to illustrate that the apostle's behaviour with respect to the collection has been above reproach (Witherington 1995: 411). 1 Cor 16:1–4 provides the background illustrating that the collection for the relief of the Jerusalem church is something that had been initiated previously. It appears that Titus had made some progress in reviving the commitment to the collection and was being sent back to complete the task (7:6). Perhaps he used the atmosphere of reconciliation as an opportunity to invite the Corinthians to demonstrate the honour of their community by means of fulfilling their commitment to the collection (7:7–8, 10–11). In order to persuade the Corinthians, Paul appeals to the example of the Macedonians (including the Thessalonians and Philippians) who exceeded Paul's expectations in their generosity despite their extreme poverty (vv. 1–5). The Corinthians, in contrast, are described as having a surplus (v. 14). The implicit argument might be stated as follows: 'If the Macedonians in their extreme need are capable of such generosity, surely you are capable of as much!' Paul supports his argument with Christological thought. In a manner which recalls Phil 2:6–11, Paul speaks of Christ who was rich (perhaps a reference to pre-existence) becoming poor in order that the Corinthians might benefit from spiritual wealth (v. 9). But when Paul develops the implications of this theology for life in the community, the results are surprising (vv. 10–15). We do not hear a call to imitate Christ in the radical manner of the gospel invitations to give up all to follow him. Rather the focus is one of equity, balance, reciprocity, and accommodation. Gifts should be according to one's means (v. 11). Relief for the Jerusalem church should not cause strife for the Corinthians (v. 13). The Jerusalem church's abundance (spiritual benefits, Rom 15:26–7, or future monetary surplus) may in turn come to address the Corinthians' need (v. 14). This call for fair balance and partnership is supported by a citation from the LXX (Ex 16:18). Paul operates upon the premiss that believers should not be in need. He calls for generosity, but it is important to note that he does not call for a radical redistribution of wealth here. Paul's attitude to wealth has sometimes been judged as one of 'love-patriarchalism': social differences are allowed to continue but relationships must nevertheless be transformed by concern and respect. This attitude may have contributed to the organizational effectiveness of the Pauline churches in integrating members from different strata in an urban environment (Theissen 1982: 107–8). A second aspect of Paul's approach in governing his churches is detectable in the statement that 'he does not say this as a command' (cf. 1 Cor 7:6). The respect for the autonomy of the congregation and their freedom in decision-making is a striking feature of some of Paul's exhortations (Meeks 1983: 138–9). This type of assertion of authority may be contrasted with the rule-like statements which emerge in household codes of the Deutero-Pauline letters (Col 3:18–4:1; Eph 5:21–6:9).

(8:16–24) Recommendation of Titus and the Brothers Here Paul explains the specific arrangements he has made in order to bring the collection to completion. In vv. 16–17 he highlights the independence of his co-worker Titus: a close relationship between Titus and the Corinthians is presupposed and the fact that he is going to Corinth of his own accord is stressed (cf. 8:6; 12:18; 2 Cor 7:2–16). Paul appears to be setting in motion mechanisms to distance himself from the process of gathering the collection in Corinth even though he clearly believes that the activity has divine sanction (8:8–15). This 'distancing' can be further detected in the exhortation concerning the brother in vv. 18–20. Paul refers to the first individual who is to accompany Titus as 'the brother' (v. 18), while the second individual is described as 'our brother' (v. 22). The possessive suggests a more personal relationship with the apostle: the person probably was a regular member of Paul's entourage (Furnish 1988: 1197). Paul presents the first brother's initiative as being tied to the mission of the delegation and appears to take comfort from the fact that this brother is famous in all the churches for proclaiming the good news (v. 18). But he also discloses that this brother has been 'appointed by the churches' and implies that serious difficulties have dictated the necessity of an 'external auditor' of Paul's initiatives (vv. 19–20). Paul clearly attaches special significance to the involvement of Titus in the delegation; he is described as Paul's partner and co-worker. In addition, the two unnamed individuals are described with the Greek term apostolos, a term which conveys leadership and authority, often translated as 'apostle' in Paul's letters (see OCB 41–2). But apostolos has a fluid meaning in the Pauline correspondence and in this case it seems to be a designation for an official messenger or envoy (vv. 18–19; cf. Phil 2:25). vv. 20–1 offer a very strong indication that Paul was suspected of wrongdoing with respect to the collection and that he understood the involvement of the delegation as an integral part of his defence (cf. 12:14–18). It has been suggested that the complicated relationship between Paul and the Corinthians can be understood in terms of a struggle to establish patronage, and the collection issue probably played an important part in that struggle. While the securing of support from a wealthy patron was a usual means that itinerant teachers used to earn a living, it was a means that Paul resisted for many reasons including fear that it would contribute to factions in Corinth. Instead the apostle continued to insist that he would earn his own living (cf. 1 Cor 9:12, 18). Some Corinthians probably wished to act as Paul's patron and subjected him to attack because of his departure from normal social conventions. The attack seems to have included, ironically, accusations of greed and back-handed dealings concerning money (cf. 2:17; 4:2; 6:3; 7:2; 12:16–17). Paul, in turn, sought to reverse the situation and place himself clearly in the position of patron (or agent of Christ, their ultimate benefactor; Witherington 1995: 417–19). Against such a background, the collection emerges as a particularly thorny issue, for it must be accepted by Paul in a way that does not diminish his status as a patron and does not put him in the position of being the Corinthians' client. vv. 23–4 illustrate that while he is interested in establishing the credibility of Titus and the brothers, they are brokers of his apostolic authority. He is their patron and the patron of the Corinthians, but their success as his agents in winning the Corinthians is crucial to protecting his honour. In order to encourage success, Paul calls the Corinthians to live up to their reputation, to demonstrate the reason Paul boasted about them to Titus (7:14). The implication is the same as in 7:14: if they fail to live up to their reputation, Paul will be disgraced—he will be shamed. The emotional pleas of v. 24 thus become more easily explained in the light of what is at stake. The Corinthians must prove their love openly for the delegation (love for them is love for Paul).

(9:1–5) An Appeal to Community Honour Although it is by no means a unanimous opinion, ch. 9 has sometimes been judged to be a fragment of a separate letter (cf. 2 Cor 8:1–15).

One feature which appears to support the fragment theory is that in v. 2 Corinth is the subject of praise in relation to Macedonia, while in 8:2 the situation is reversed. However, there is no real contradiction here since Paul is referring to what the Macedonians have been told about the Corinthians' commitment to the collection, a commitment which they have as yet to fulfil. Both the argument about the Macedonian generosity and the point about the zeal of the Corinthians inspiring the Macedonians work together to galvanize the community into action. It is somewhat surprising that the focus in v. 2 is on Achaia while the focus in ch. 8 has been specifically on Corinth. But such a shift from the specific to the broader context of the province in which Corinth was located is in keeping with the opening of the letter (1:1). The reference to the brothers in v. 3 presupposes the discussion in 8:18–23. The emphasis on Paul's boasting about the Corinthians in vv. 2–4 is designed to repeat the same warning that has been articulated previously: the Corinthians must live up to their reputation. The importance of the values of honour and shame in shaping ethical injunctions and community life in general is clearly evident in v. 4. If Paul brings some of the Macedonians with him to Corinth and the community members have not as yet fulfilled their commitment, both the apostle and the Corinthian church will be humiliated; that is, shamed. As is also the case with the arrival of Titus and the brothers, the arrival of the Macedonians offers a potential occasion for the shaming of Paul and the Corinthian community, and this dishonour must be avoided at all costs (cf. 7:14; 8:24). Suspicions surrounding Paul's handling of the collection emerge once again in v. 5 (cf. 8:20–1). Once again Paul gives the impression that he wants to distance himself from the process of gathering the collection by insisting that the delegation bring matters to a close before he arrives in Corinth (cf. 2 Cor 8:16–24). Paul wishes the collection to be perceived as a voluntary gift and not as an 'extortion'. The Greek term translated as extortion (pleonexia) occurs in the list of vices in Rom 1:29, referring to covetousness (cf. 1 Cor 5:10, 11; 6:10). Related terminology also occurs in 2 Corinthians (2:11; 7:2; 12:17–18). No doubt is left by 12:17–18 that Paul was accused of fraudulent activity with respect to the collection (Furnish 1984: 428).

(9:6–15) Appeals to Scripture In this passage Paul justifies his exhortation in 9:1–5 on the basis of Scripture and with broad concepts of the significance of God's gracious actions in the world. A citation of the LXX (Ps 112:9) is included in v. 9, but there are many other allusions to Scripture throughout. The statement that 'one reaps what one sows' in v. 6 closely resembles Gal 6:7–9, but is based on a maxim which pervades the Wisdom tradition (e.g. Job 4:8; Prov 11:18, 24; 22:8; Sir 7:3; Furnish 1988: 1198). That the community's giving should not be under compulsion is in keeping with Paul's desire to respect the freedom of the congregation (cf. 8:8; Phil 8–14; 2 Cor 8:1–8). Paul justifies his statement with a slightly modified reference to the LXX (Prov 22:8–9) in the proclamation that God loves the cheerful giver (cf. Rom 12:8). The premiss announced loudly in v. 8 and which underlies many of these verses is that God is the giver who makes all things possible (cf. v. 15). For the one who has received—the believer—giving in return becomes a natural expression of one's participation in God's bounty. To communicate the notion of the believer's state as 'having enough of everything', Paul uses the term autarkeia which expresses the Greek ideal of self-sufficiency, the precondition for human freedom. Paul modifies traditional notions, however, with his insistence that self-sufficiency is not a purely human accomplishment but is made possible by God's beneficence (Betz 1985: 110). The emphasis on divine initiative continues with the citation of Ps 112:9 where Paul probably means us to understand 'his righteousness' not as a reference to the righteousness of the person who helps the poor (as in the psalm), but as a reference to God's righteousness (Furnish 1988: 1198). There are allusions to Isa 55:10 and Hos 10:12 in v. 10 which also support the notion of divine initiative. The images of harvest, growth, and plenty prepare the way for the announcement that the one who gives will be enriched even more (v. 11). vv. 11–13 make it clear, however, that generosity has more than the immediate effect of satisfying the need of the Jerusalem poor; it allows the Corinthians to contribute actively to the worship of God. The result of their giving is an abundance of thanksgivings to God. An alternative translation of dokimē in v. 13 as 'proof' rather than 'testing' (cf. 8:2, 8, 22) makes the connection with the sentiments expressed in 8:24 stand out more clearly. The collection allows for an open demonstration of their love and of their glorification of God. It is fundamentally an expression of their obedience to the gospel of Christ. Paul explains further that the generosity of the Corinthians will result in the Jerusalem Christians praying for them and expressing their love for them (v. 14). Rom 15:31 makes it clear that the apostle associates the acceptance of the collection for the Jerusalem church with the acceptance by the authorities there of what God has accomplished through Paul's ministry among the Gentiles (cf. Rom 15:31; Murphy-O'Connor 1990: 825). Perhaps Paul has these associations in mind when he joyously gives thanks to God for his indescribable gift (v. 15).

Paul on the Attack (10:1–13:10)

Chs. 1–9 reflect some problems in the community, but their tone is nevertheless often hopeful and conciliatory (e.g. 7:4–16). In contrast, the tone of chs. 10–13 is consistently harsh, anxious, and sarcastic. Therefore, most biblical scholars have accepted the theory that they originally constituted a separate letter. There is significant debate, however, as to where they fit in the chronology of letter fragments. They have frequently been identified with the 'tearful letter' mentioned in 2:3–4, 9, which means that the letter would have been written prior to chs. 1–9. Paul's more optimistic tone in the earlier chapters would then be understood as stemming from the resolution of most of the difficulties in the community. But several objections have been raised against this theory, based upon both the chronology of events suggested by the content of 2 Corinthians and the nature of the problem which is explicitly related to the 'tearful letter'. The suggestion of 7:4–16 is that at the time of composition of chs. 1–9, Titus had been to Corinth only once, while it appears that by the time 12:14–18 was composed he had been there twice. This implies that chs. 10–13 came later. Moreover, the case of the lapsed Corinthian brother dominates the concern in chs. 1–9 about the 'tearful letter' (2:3–11; cf. 7:8–12), but nowhere do we read about him in chs. 10–13. In fact, when Paul refers to the effect of the 'tearful letter' in 7:5–12, there is no explicit interest in the topic which so clearly dominates chs. 10–13: the threat of the rival apostles. Thus it seems best to consider chs. 10–13 as distinct from the 'letter of tears' and as having been composed at some point following chs. 1–9 (Furnish 1988: 1198–9). Paul's harsher approach in chs. 10–13 is the result of his struggle with apostolic rivals who have gained tremendous influence over the Corinthians in the interim and whom Paul considers as intruders. He may be revealing his awareness of the threat of 'false apostles' in 3:1–6, but by the time of composition of chs. 10–13 the situation has clearly become much worse.

(10:1–18) Preliminary Defence

(10:1–6) Claims of Divine Power These verses and indeed all of chs. 10–13 set the stage for Paul's impending visit (12:14; 13:1). Paul begins with an appeal to the example of the meekness and gentleness of Christ (v. 1). This may be his way of communicating that in his approach he is emulating the way Jesus conducted his earthly ministry. It seems more likely, however, that he is referring to Christ's voluntary debasement for the sake of salvation, revealed through the cross (cf. 8:9; Phil 2:6–11). In obeying Christ (v. 5), Paul participates in Christ's power in weakness. Although Paul perhaps expresses it most clearly in 13:3–4, all of chs. 10–13 is based upon one central conviction: the apostle's authority is rooted in the fact that his personal strength/weakness echoes the strength/weakness of the crucified/resurrected Christ. v. 1 contains a sarcastic reformulation of the accusation quoted in 10:10 about strong letters, but weak presence and speech. Paul is attacking those who evaluate him according to the criteria sophists use to judge rhetoric (Witherington 1995: 433; Furnish 1984: 462). In the process, he displays his own rhetorical skill in 'destroying arguments' and 'taking thoughts captive' in the hope of removing obstacles which stand in the way of spreading the gospel, here described as the knowledge of God (v. 5; cf. 2:14). A similar use of the imagery of siege warfare in conjunction with philosophical argumentation is made by Philo Conf. Ling. 128–31; cf. Prov 21:22; Furnish 1984: 458, 462). Paul reveals further information about the nature of the case against him in the reference to opponents who accuse him of 'acting according to human standards' (lit. acting according to the flesh; v. 2). Paul previously stated that his actions are not according to human standards (1:17; cf. 1:12). Many commentators believe that Paul was rebuked on account of a lack of charismatic performances and ecstatic experiences (12:1–10; 5:11–13). This is quite ironic given the charismatic basis of his ministry. The work of the sociologist Max Weber on charisma has been employed by biblical scholars in order to shed light on Paul's apostleship (MacDonald 1988: 47–9). Paul can be understood as claiming 'charismatic authority' in the sense that he views his powers and qualities as stemming directly from divine origins and as not accessible to everyone. This attitude can be seen for example in Paul's descriptions of his divine commission (1 Cor 15:8–9; Gal 1:15–16) and when he expresses his confidence that when he preaches it is as if God were the speaker (5:18–20). He proclaims his gospel not only verbally, but also through various 'charismatic' acts (e.g. 12:12; Rom 15:19; 1 Cor 2:4; 1 Thess 1:5). Paul's charismatic authority can be seen very clearly in vv. 3–6, for in this text the apostle's very humanity is qualified by a claim to divine power. The military imagery serves Paul well here, because it communicates his belief that he is empowered by forces which are beyond this world to conquer this world (cf. 6:7). Throughout the text Paul sends the message that he will not be intimidated. When the Corinthians have demonstrated their loyalty to him, he will be ready to deal firmly with his opponents (v. 6).

(10:7–11) Accusations against Paul Denied The call to recognize what is plainly evident is designed to alert the community to danger. Behind the appeal is probably an accusation made by the intruders which has won support among the Corinthians. The opponents appear to have based their authority on a special connection to Christ (implied in 'belonging to Christ'; cf. 11:4, 13, 23). They may have claimed access to special visionary experiences of the resurrected Christ (12:1–10; 5:11–13). But since Paul's commission as an apostle was also based on such experiences (1 Cor 9:1; 15:8; Gal 1:12) yet the basis of his authority was being judged as inadequate, it is more likely that the claim concerned a special connection to the historical Jesus or to his followers, perhaps those connected with the Jerusalem church (cf. 11:22). The fact that Paul did not know the historical Jesus, had initially persecuted the church, and had entered the circle of apostles late in the game proclaiming that he had received a revelation of Christ, seems to have led to widespread questions and suspicions about his apostolic status (1 Cor 15:7–9). If the question of connection with the historical Jesus is involved in his battle with the Corinthian opponents, it is a matter of charismatic authority versus tradition. Given the importance of the appeal to tradition in Jewish teaching, it is not surprising that tension between charismatic authority and tradition can be detected in the attempts to organize the early church (Rowland 1985: 266–7). Paul is unequivocal, however, in v. 8. His authority is charismatic (2 Cor 10:1–6); it was given to him by the Lord (i.e. the resurrected Christ; cf. 13:10). The concept of boasting which permeates (2 Corinthians 2 Cor 11:12–14) is employed in an interesting way here and throughout chs. 10–13; its use is characterized by ambivalence and irony which becomes even more pronounced in the fool's speech of 11:1–12:13. The opponents may have accused him of boasting too much of his authority, but Paul admits that such extremes are necessary for the health of the Corinthians. Boasting and self-promotion were the conventional means of articulating where honour and shame were to be found in Graeco-Roman society (Witherington 1995: 432). Paul is faced with the difficulty of harmonizing his conviction that in the early church many of the usual criteria for determining honour have been abandoned (e.g. skill in rhetorical performance), with the necessity of communicating priorities in a cultural context which demanded public demonstrations of worth. It sometimes seems to Paul that in communicating his priorities he is resorting to worldly standards: he boasts a little too much! In v. 10 Paul quotes an accusation made against him directly (cf. 10:1). He has been accused of weak physical presence and poor oral performance of rhetoric. It seems that even his critics acknowledge his skill in writing rhetorical pieces (Witherington 1995: 433). In vv. 9–11 Paul admits that his letters are strong, but instead of declaring that he is equally strong in speech, he uses the opportunity to bring the focus of community back to the content of his letters. The true nature of his strength will be made clear through his actions when he comes to Corinth and does what he has said in his letters. Underlying these verses may be the suspicion that Paul is avoiding direct contact with the Corinthians, perhaps relying too heavily on his talent as a letter-writer and on fellow-workers to act as his delegates.

(10:12–18) Opponents Accused of Interference In this section Paul moves from responding to accusations made against him to launching some attacks of his own upon his opponents (Furnish 1988: 1199). In v. 12 he is clearly being sarcastic: he would not even presume to compare himself with those who commend themselves! He probably has in mind here the use of letters of recommendation by his rivals (cf. 3:1–3). He rejects both the self-commendation of his opponents and the nature of their comparisons with one another as completely misguided. They act according to worldly commendations, when only commendation by the Lord is relevant (vv. 17–18). To make his point forcefully, he draws upon the contentious notion of boasting (citing Jer 9:23–4) in order to call for a return to central priorities: boasting should be done only in the Lord (v. 17; cf. 1 Cor 1:31; Phil 3:3). The exact meaning of vv. 13–16 is not always clear and there are severe problems in translating (esp. v. 13; see Barrett 1973: 263–6). However, the main point is clear: Paul's mission to the Corinthians has divine authorization; his opponents have not respected his prerogatives as the founder of the community and have interfered in his 'sphere of action' (v. 16). These verses reveal the somewhat curious preoccupation (at least from a modern perspective) of divisions of missionary labour. Paul's principle was that he would bring the good news only to communities where it had never been preached. 'Boasting of work already done in someone else's sphere of action' (v. 16) was 'building on someone else's foundation' (Rom 15:20). An understanding of the dynamics of patronage can shed light on Paul's exclusive claims and jealousy. Paul refers to himself as the Corinthians' spiritual parent in a way that conveys the nature of his relationship with them as their benefactor (12:14; Witherington 1995: 418; cf. 1 Cor 4:14–16). He endowed them with the gift of salvation and, in turning to other apostles, they betray the loyalty that should exist between patron and client and fail to honour him as clients should. Paul's desire for an increasing sphere of action expressed in vv. 15–16 is a means of calling for a strengthened relationship with the Corinthian community as their patron which will free him to move on, and bring the good news to new territories (cf. Rom 15:23–4).

(11:1–12:13) The Fool's Speech

(11:1–4) The Threat of Corruption The whole of 11:1–12:13 is dominated by the concept that Paul is speaking like a fool. To a certain extent, Paul engages in parody in this section: he imitates the tactics (sophistic eloquence and rhetorical self-praise) of his opponents (Witherington 1995: 436). But the reference to foolishness in the context of v. 1 makes it clear that he is not altogether comfortable with the measures he has adopted. He is in fact engaging in the kind of comparison which he has just rejected as ultimately irrelevant, and he therefore risks giving the impression that he shares the pre-occupations of his opponents (10:12–18). One can appreciate the difficulty of Paul's position; he lives in a society which demands public display of its itinerant teachers (cf. 2 COR 10:7–11). Yet there is a desperate and sometimes almost tragic sound to Paul's words, as he laments about an apostleship whose strength has not been recognized in weakness. In vv. 1–4 Paul makes use of a marriage metaphor to communicate the seriousness of the threat which has penetrated the community from the outside. The gravity of the situation as Paul perceived it would not have been missed by an audience of the time, for he appeals to the core values of honour and shame. Paul places himself in the role of father (cf. 12:14) of a virgin (the community) who is giving her in marriage to her one true husband (Christ). It is the father's duty to protect the honour of the virgin; and it is the virgin daughter's duty to remain chaste, symbolizing her shame (concern for reputation) and the shame of her whole household. But Paul fears that the virgin daughter will be violated by a seducer. The image of the corruption of the internal sanctity of the virgin daughter is a powerful means of communicating the nature of the threat which comes from the outside. Indisputable evidence is offered in v. 4 that the problem in the community is not only internal, but involves teachers from the outside who preach a message that Paul understands to be in contradiction to his own. The reference to proclamation of another Jesus may imply an appeal on the part of the 'false apostles' to greater continuity with the historical Jesus (cf. 10:7; 2 COR 10:7–11). vv. 2–3 are dense in allusions to Scripture and traditional notions of marriage. The role of the father in giving his virgin daughter in marriage is reflected in such texts as Gen 29:23 and Deut 22:13–21. The use of the marriage metaphor to address the relationship of the community with the divine draws upon the traditional notion of marriage as a metaphor for YHWH's relationship to Israel (e.g. Hos 2:19–20). The image of the virgin (community) joining together with the bridegroom (Christ) is developed further in Eph 5:21–33. The reference to Eve being deceived by the serpent presupposes the temptation story (Gen 3:1–24). In Jewish tradition the serpent became identified with the devil (Sir 2:24; cf. Rev 20:2). Paul's interpretation here, with its overtones of seduction and sexual conquest, may reflect knowledge of a Jewish legend contained in the pseudepigrapha (2 Enoch, 31:6; cf. 1 Tim 2:13–14) where the serpent is identified with Satan and Eve's deception involves sexual seduction (Murphy-O'Connor 1990: 826).

(11:5–15) The Super-Apostles The transition from 11:4 to 11:5 implies that those who come into Corinth are described sarcastically by Paul as 'super-apostles', tōn hyperlian apostolōn (cf. 12:11). It has also been suggested, however, that these super-apostles are not the intruders that Paul labels so negatively as 'false apostles', pseudapostoloi, in v. 13 (e.g. Barrett 1971: 249–53). Paul's qualified admission that the status of the super-apostles equals his own (cf. 12:11) has sometimes led to the conclusion that they were leaders of the Jerusalem church (cf. Gal 2:9); the false apostles may then have been their envoys, whom Paul condemns categorically as intruders (v. 13; for a full summary of the debate concerning identity of super-apostles, see Furnish 1984: 502–5). But the emphasis on rhetorical performance in oral delivery (v. 6) seems to support the notion that these super-apostles are themselves the intruders, who not only rate themselves highly, but have probably also gained considerable prestige in the community (Georgi 1986: 39). v. 6 has been judged to be a frank admission by Paul of a liability (Witherington 1995: 435). In these earliest stages of church development, norms are being institutionalized with respect to judgement of apostolic legitimacy and talent, and Paul is not always able to meet group expectations. He calls for a realignment of community norms based on true knowledge of God (v. 6; cf. 10:5). Paul's shifting of labels from super-apostles to false apostles does not necessarily imply that two different groups are in view, but may stem from Paul's shifting perspectives. According to some standards (which he himself rejects) these apostles are powerful leaders. But according to the ultimate standard of God, they are merely disguising themselves as apostles of Christ (v. 13). In vv. 7–11 Paul offers a specific example of his behaviour in order to defend himself against accusations concerning his authority and credibility. The Corinthians may have harboured suspicions about Paul's attitudes to money and dealings with the collection, and these ideas may have left the opportunity ripe for the intruders to gain support. Paul has refused financial support from the Corinthians and refers to his principle ironically and with exaggeration by speaking of committing sin (v. 7), and robbing from other churches for the Corinthians' sake (v. 8). Paul continued to work as an artisan while he conducted his missionary work (1 Cor 4:12; 1 Thess 2:9), apparently refusing the support to which other apostles were entitled (1 Cor 9:12, 15–18). This refusal to accept living expenses may have been related to the desire to avoid being a client of Corinthian patrons, and to the fear of contributing to the already serious problem of community factions (2 COR 8:16–24). But it may also have led to frustration among the Corinthians who may have argued that Paul abrogated societal conventions with respect to itinerant teachers and degraded himself (and them) with manual labour. Paul makes it abundantly clear, however, in v. 10, that he has no intention of changing his approach. The reference to friends from Macedonia in v. 9 may be in response to the charge that he has allowed himself to become a client of the Macedonians. Paul reveals that he did accept special gifts from the Philipian church in Macedonia (Phil 4:10–20), but was apparently unwilling to accept such support in Corinth. The question also arises as to whether Macedonian generosity in the collection (8:1–5) was related to the nature of the patronage relationship he had with them. But Paul continues to have confidence in his boast, making it clear that his attitude towards support from the Corinthian church is a public demonstration of his honour (v. 10) and is motivated by his love for the community (v. 11). In vv. 12–15 the accusation made against Paul concerning his refusal to accept financial support from the Corinthians is transformed by him into an indication of the false apostles' inadequacy and dishonesty. Only by accepting the same attitude to support as does Paul, might these apostles show themselves to be Paul's equal (v. 12). The implication is clearly that these false apostles have been taking advantage of the Corinthians. The description of Satan disguising himself as an angel of light echoes 11:3 and reflects Jewish legends about the deception of Eve by the devil (Apoc. Mos. 17:1–2; Adam and Eve 9.1 [Latin]; Adam and Eve 38.1 [Slavonic]; Furnish 1984: 494–5). The use of the terms 'apostle' and 'minister' (diakonos) (terms Paul applies to himself) in the condemnation of the intruders suggests that, despite the polemic and the parody, the threat to Paul's apostolic authority cuts to the heart.

(11:16–21a) The 'Wise' Corinthians In v. 16 Paul repeats the appeal of 11:11 to bear with him as he plays the part of the fool. It is almost as if he is aware that he has been digressing from his main speech in 11:2–15. He explicitly states in vv. 17–18 that he is speaking not with the Lord's authority, but boasting (2 COR 11:12–14) according to the human standards of his opponents. In vv. 19–21a the apostle employs irony and engages in extreme sarcasm. He draws upon the community's reputation for thinking itself wise (1 Cor 2:6–16; 4:10; 6:4–5) and ironically refers to their willingness to entertain fools (the false apostles). The implication is that now that he counts himself as a fool, they will surely entertain him! Paul denigrates the false apostles in v. 20 in a manner that implies their charlatanism and recalls the differing attitudes towards community support which divide Paul from his opponents (11:7–15). He sarcastically proclaims that he was simply too weak to adopt the belittling tactics of his opponents (v. 21a). This is, of course, an ironic jibe at the Corinthians' blindness in recognizing the strength of true apostleship, a blindness which is made especially evident by the accusation that Paul's bodily presence is weak (10:10). What appears to be his shame (weakness) he hopes to prove is in fact his honour (power; cf. 1 Cor 12:9).

(11:21b–33) The Self-Designations of Paul's Opponents The passage 11:21b–12:10 includes the heart of the 'fool's speech'. Declaring that he is engaging in foolishness, Paul nevertheless boasts in the same terms as his opponents and insists that he shares all of their claims to authority. In the process he reveals the self-designations of his opponents. 'Hebrews,' 'Israelites,' and 'descendants of Abraham' are three closely related labels pointing to a special claim of Jewish heritage (cf. Phil 3:5). It is impossible to attach a distinct significance to each term, but there may be differences of nuance. 'Hebrews' may refer primarily to ethnic descent, but also to geographical origin and familiarity with Hebrew or Aramaic (cf. Acts 6:1). With 'Israelites' the focus may be somewhat more upon a religious past, heritage, and tradition (Georgi 1986: 46). The conflict between Paul and the opponents in Corinth probably involves the question of whether the charismatic basis of the apostle's authority (a direct appeal to divine experience) is sufficient in the light of the greater appeal made to tradition by the false apostles (2 COR 10:1–6). 'Descendants of Abraham' may function to legitimate the authority they claim in propounding their particular understanding of the mission they undertake among the Gentiles: Abraham's promise was to be the father of many nations (cf. Rom 4:13–18; 9:6–8; Gal 3:16–18). The title 'ministers [or servants] of Christ' (diakonoi Christou), v. 23, is especially important because it represents a direct quotation of a designation that moves beyond claims concerning heritage and identity to give us a sense of how the opponents understood what they were doing (Georgi 1986: 32). The seriousness of the threat posed by the opponents may have been related to an approach and self-understanding which in many ways may have been quite similar to Paul's mission to be a minister of Christ Jesus (e.g. Rom 15:16). This is supported by the frequent use of the terms diakonos and diakonia throughout 2 Corinthians (on deacon, see OCB s.v.). The opponents' understanding of their connection with Christ may have differed from that of Paul, however, with respect to claims of a special relationship with the historical Jesus (2 COR 10:7–11; vv. 1–4, 5–15). Paul illustrates that he is a better minister/servant of Christ by describing a ministry of suffering and humiliation. He appeals once again to a catalogue of hardships (v. 23) which functions in 2 Corinthians in conjunction with the apostle's theology of the cross (vv. 30–1). This catalogue recalls the terms used by philosophers in the ancient world to describe their struggles in the overcoming of passion and in the search for wisdom (2 COR 4:7–15). But there is no heroism in Paul's attitude towards his troubles; v. 29 in fact records the sentiment of injustice in suffering. Yet suffering is far from meaningless; it offers demonstrative proof of Paul's weakness (v. 30), which is a sign of his identification with Christ (12:9). Because Paul appeals to the extent of his hardships to respond directly to the claims of superiority made by his opponents (v. 23), and because the theme of inappropriate boasting permeates the discussion (vv. 16–23), it is tempting to conclude that the opponents viewed their own apostolic struggles as heroic or as signs of their 'strength' of character. The sufferings mentioned in the catalogue of hardships cover many aspects of Paul's life: work as an artisan (vv. 23, 27), travel (vv. 25–6), persecution (vv. 23–6), church life (vv. 26, 28). Particularly intriguing is the reference to 'false brethren' in v. 26. The same term is used by Paul to describe those who seek to impose the law on Gentile Christians in Gal 2:4 (Murphy-O'Connor 1990: 827). The list offers evidence of persecution at the hands of both Jews and Gentiles. The legal basis for the 'forty lashes' is found in Deut 25:1–3. Being 'beaten with a rod' was a Roman punishment. Although a law prohibited the imposition of this punishment on Roman citizens, it was frequently ignored; Paul protests this punishment in Acts 16:37 (cf. Acts 16:22; 1 Thess 2:2; Furnish 1984: 516). In fact, the reference to the beatings offers evidence of one of many points of contact between this text and accounts in Acts. However, as is illustrated by comparing the reference to the narrow escape from Damascus (vv. 32–3) with the account in Acts 9:23–5, the stories do not always present the same picture of the apostle. While in 2 Corinthians the story illustrates Paul's humiliation and weakness, in Acts it communicates the apostle's bravery and invincible mission (Furnish 1988: 1201).

(12:1–10) Visions and Revelations of the Lord Paul continues his inappropriate boasting—his speaking like a fool (11:21)—by once again arguing that he can match any claims of status that his opponents might have. In v. 1 he gives the impression that he is ready to discuss the last contentious issue; he moves on to visions and revelations 'of the Lord' (probably to be understood as 'granted by the Lord': a genitive of origin; Furnish 1984: 524). That his reluctance to engage in this type of discourse is particularly great, however, is suggested by his description of his experience in the third person: 'I know a person in Christ...' (v. 2). Probably because of the importance attached to visions and revelations by his opponents, Paul wishes to convey the impression that such ecstatic experiences are relatively unimportant and even of no real significance for ministry. Paul's mission is based on what is seen concretely in the apostle and what is heard from the apostle (vv. 6–7). Paul emphasizes the nature of his dealings with church communities and his preaching of the gospel as definitive signs of his apostleship. But he nevertheless unwittingly offers here an indication of the significance of ecstatic religious experience for an early church group. The attitude towards it in this text appears to be more negative than that revealed by 5:13, where competition concerning ecstatic experience may also be in view (2 COR 5:11–19). Moreover, while Paul clearly sees a great difference between the revelation of the Lord he describes in vv. 2–4 and the revelation of God's Son which led to his becoming an apostle (Gal 1:15–16), the distinction may be less apparent to his audience. Ultimately Paul's apostleship is based upon revelation, but given the situation in Corinth he obviously feels that it is prudent instead to stress his physical (and earthly) weakness which discloses the power accorded to him by the Lord. In Paul's dispute with the opponents we can perhaps sense a trace of the difficulty of determining which charismatic experience of an apostle is authentic. In the early church writing, the Didache, attitudes towards riches on the part of itinerant charismatics became an important guide to determining which teachers were truly gifted (Did. 11–13). Paul tells us very little about the shape of his revelatory experience or what it meant; but he does announce that it could have led to elation (v. 7). He tells us he was caught up (cf. 1 Thess 4:17) to the third heaven (here equated with Paradise, see vv. 2, 4; cf. 2 Enoch 7 and Apoc. Mos. 37:5; Murphy-O'Connor 1990: 828). Other-worldly journeys were commonly described in ancient apocalyptic literature (Furnish 1984: 525–6). The mysterious quality that one would expect of such an experience is disclosed by Paul in the admission that he does not know whether the experience was in the body or out of the body (v. 3). His reference to a lack of knowledge about the event, however, may also be a way of communicating its relative unimportance. Similarly, Paul's announcement that he heard things that should never be told could be in keeping with the notion of a sealed revelation (Dan 12:4; Rev 10:4), but could also be a means of pointing to irrelevance of the event for the essence of his apostleship (Murphy-O'Connor 1990: 828). Having abandoned the role of the fool (and the parody of his opponents' tactics), Paul admits that he was prevented from boasting (or being too elated) by a thorn in the flesh, a messenger from Satan (v. 7). Most commentators have seen here a reference to a physical ailment (physical suffering is understood by Paul as a sign that Satan's power continues to influence the world; cf. 4:4; see Neyrey 1990: 167–80), but others have argued that Paul has an external enemy in mind, a non-believer or an opponent in the church (cf. 2 Cor 11:14–15; Murphy-O'Connor 1990: 828). Paul apparently prayed three times to the Lord to have the thorn removed (v. 8). The Lord responded by means of an oracle (v. 9). Grace is equated with power in v. 9 and refers to the force which sustains Paul and is disclosed in his weakness. Paul announces that it is his weakness that is the authentic source of his boasting, for it is a sign of the power of Christ dwelling within him. He offers a summary (v. 10) of the long catalogue of hardships in 11:23–8, but now explicitly states that he is content in his sufferings: these make known the paradox of his life as an apostle in imitation of Christ.

(12:11–13) The Signs of a True Apostle These verses are usually understood as the epilogue of the fool's speech (11:1–12:13). Paul takes up the voice of the fool once again. He has had to defend his own honour, since the Corinthians have not been commending him. This is the voice of a patron who feels he has not received the honour which is his due. Maintaining the ironic tone which dominates chs. 10–13, Paul admits that he is weak (he is nothing), but at the same time he is not at all inferior to the super-apostles whom the Corinthians admire so much (11:5; 2 COR 11:5–15). Paul tells the Corinthians that they have no reason to complain since 'the signs of a true apostle' were performed adequately among them (v. 12). The reference to 'signs' (σῆμεία) offers evidence of the existence of institutionalized norms in the community for determining true apostleship (2 COR 10:7–11). A similar focus on charismatic performance in the process of evangelization occurs in Rom 15:19 and in Gal 3:5. But Paul's admission of the importance of 'signs and wonders and mighty works' is intriguing, given his previous attempt to play down the importance of visions and revelations to his mission (12:1–10). Paul is speaking like a fool in vv. 11–13, but he nevertheless may be offering an indication that charismatic phenomena were central to Paul's initial acceptance in a community, even though such wondrous deeds were subsumed by the apostle within the larger purpose of preaching the gospel of Christ (Rom 15:18–19). In v. 13 Paul returns to the complaint made by the Corinthians of unfair treatment in comparison to other churches. This complaint involved the apostle's refusal to accept material support from the Corinthians (his refusal to become their client). The Corinthians argued that he did not adopt the same attitude in other places (notably Macedonia: 11:7–11; 2 COR 11:5–15). With biting sarcasm, Paul pleads for the Corinthians' forgiveness for not burdening them.

(12:14–13:10) Concluding Defence

(12:14–18) Suspicions of Wrongdoing concerning the Collection Having appealed to the Corinthians for obedience in 10:1–18, and having supported that appeal with the 'fool's speech' in 11:1–12:13, Paul now states his intention to come to Corinth a third time and offers further arguments in support of his position. These verses have played a part in theories concerning the chronology of the letter fragments of 2 Corinthians. The passage 7:4–16 suggests that at the time of composition of chs. 1–9, Titus had only been to Corinth once, while it appears that by the time vv. 14–18 were composed he had made a second visit. This implies that chs. 10–13 came later. Paul's third visit (v. 14; cf. 13:1) appears to be the visit that he had planned (1:16) but had postponed after the second painful visit (2:1; cf. 9:4). During the first visit the community was founded. In vv. 14–16 Paul restates a principle that he defended vigorously in 11:7–11 and alluded to sarcastically in 12:13: he will continue to support himself while he is with the Corinthians (2 COR 11:5–15). Paul presents this as the natural consequence of his parental relationship with the Corinthians and of his great love for them (vv. 14–15; cf. 1 Cor 4:15). But the practical application of this principle in the community involves the acceptance of Paul as patron of the community and the obligation to honour him with their love. There were probably Corinthians who felt that the reverse should take place; they wished Paul to act as their client and accept their gifts of material support (2 COR 8:16–24). But Paul feels that this would be as ridiculous a scenario as children ‘lay[ing] up’ (saving) for their parents. In vv. 16–18 Paul repeats a charge of deceitful trickery brought against him by the Corinthians and defends himself against it (cf. 2 COR 4:2). The discussion of the trip made by Titus and the brother recalls the description of the arrangements made by Paul for the impending visit in chs. 8–9. Because Paul seems so confident of his loyalty as a co-worker who accompanied Titus, the brother mentioned in v. 18 is most likely Paul’s representative referred to in 8:22 and not the brother who was apparently appointed by the churches to oversee the handling of the collection as a kind of external auditor (8:18–19; 2 COR 8:16–24). vv. 14–18 present information which acts as an important complement to the material in chs. 8–9: it offers unmistakable evidence that Paul was suspected of wrongdoing with respect to the collection and his delicate handling of the situation in chs. 8–9 should be read in that light. But the manner in which reference to the collection is fused with suspicions concerning Paul’s refusal to accept material support in vv. 14–18 leads to further information about the precise nature of the suspicions of the Corinthians concerning Paul and money. Paul was probably suspected of keeping for himself some of the money that he is collecting for Jerusalem. In short, he was being accused of fraud (Furnish 1988: 1202). Paul brings the discussion of the matter to a close with rhetorical questions which he is sure will highlight his innocence (v. 18).

(12:19–21) The Motives of Paul’s Defence Paul now seeks to counter the impression that he has been engaging solely in a personal defence based on past events and has not been addressing important matters of community well-being. He insists that he has in fact been working for the sake of building up the community because he fears that a complete breakdown of the relationship between himself and the community will occur when he arrives (vv. 19–20). Given that Paul has been responding to specific problems having to do with the false apostles and with community loyalty from 10:1 until now, it is surprising to hear him frame the situation in terms of a general problem with improper behaviour ranging from quarrelling to sexual immorality (vv. 20–1). The list of vices in v. 20 appears to be conventional (cf. Gal 5:20; Murphy-O’Connor 1990: 828). While Corinth has a history of sexual immorality (1 Cor 5:1–5; cf. 1 Cor 6:15–16), the problem does not surface elsewhere in 2 Corinthians. However, Jews in the Roman world frequently drew attention to sexual immorality in attempts to describe the sin and alienation in the pagan world (Newton 1985: 102–3). It may be that Paul is aiming to cast the sin of the Corinthians in the most negative terms. Behind vv. 20–1 may lie an attempt on the part of the apostle to describe the consequences of the community’s alienation from him as devastating. With all hope lost, there will be nothing left to do but mourn.

(13:1–4) The Serious Consequences of Disobedience At first glance it may appear that the legal statement requiring two or three witnesses for a charge refers to requirements to substantiate charges against Paul (12:16). However, the rule—a citation of Deut 19:15—concerns the establishment of proper criteria for conviction and punishment (cf. Deut 19:15–21; Mt 18:16), and this fits equally well with vv. 3–4 where Paul warns the community of the possibility of punitive action. Moreover, in non-diaspora Judaism the rule was often used to support the requirement that those suspected of wrongdoing were to be warned carefully of the possibility of punishment (van Vliet 1958: 53–62; Furnish 1984: 575). In stressing his multiple previous warnings, Paul apparently feels that he has met the criteria of the rule. There is an element of foreboding in his warning that he will not be lenient. He promises proof of Christ speaking in him (2:17; 5:20; 12:19) in the form of punishment of the Corinthians. The explanation of the meaning of the Christ event in v. 4 is in keeping with credal statements in Paul’s other letters (e.g. Rom 1:4): Christ was crucified in weakness but raised up to live by the power of God. Paul’s union with Christ means that his life is shaped by the power of God in the same way. He shares Christ’s weakness, but in dealing with the Corinthians, he will ‘live with him’ by the power of God. vv. 3–4 offer a good illustration of the theology finding expression in concrete human interaction. The theology of the cross functions to support censure in community ethics and discipline (2 COR 4:7–15).

(13:5–10) The Purpose of Paul’s Letter Paul’s tone in this section is more conciliatory than in the exhortations in 13:1–4, but v. 10 makes it clear that the same message frames both passages: severe discipline of the Corinthian community is a distinct possibility. Paul states, however, that he hopes that drastic measures will not be necessary and locates the purpose of his letter in the prevention of such measures. Paul certainly feels that he has been endowed with divine power in his dealings with the Corinthians (13:4), but qualifies the authority given to him by Christ in a way that ties his treatment of the Corinthians to the central goal of his mission. Paul has been given authority to build up (v. 10; cf. 12:19) and not to tear it down (an almost identical phrase is found in 10:8; cf. 2 COR 10:7–11). The notion of ‘upbuilding’ (oikodomē) occurs frequently in the Corinthian correspondence and refers to the harmonious development of the church in accordance with God’s designs (e.g. 1 Cor 3:9 and 14:26). We can only imagine the great sense of failure and defeat that Paul would have experienced if things did not turn out as he had hoped in Corinth and there had been a tearing down (or destruction, kathairesis; cf. 10:4). There are, in fact, several indications throughout vv. 5–9 that Paul’s sense of his own apostleship is bound up with the behaviour of the Corinthians. In an atmosphere of comparisons between apostles and challenges to apostolic authority, Paul invites the Corinthians to test themselves: have they displayed the faith that flows from the presence of Jesus among them? The implication seems to be that if they pass the test, Paul will also avoid failure (vv. 5–6). Nevertheless, to the end, Paul insists that what is most important is not the visibility of his apostolic credentials but the fact that he has acted in accordance with the truth of the gospel (vv. 7–8; cf. 4:2; 6:7). The apostle may be weak, and the Corinthians may even continue to view him as weak, as long as the Corinthians are strong; that is, strong in faith but not strong in self-importance. The relationship between apostle and community reflects the meaning of the cross. In weakness and suffering, strength and salvation are revealed. The announcement of the purpose of Paul’s letter in v. 10 seems incompatible with chs. 1–9 and is often viewed as an indication that chs. 10–13 should be viewed as a separate letter.

The third visit (12:14; 13:1) seems to be the one Paul intended to make after the Corinthians' contribution to the collection had been gathered (9:3–5). By the time of composition of chs. 10–13 the relationship between the Corinthians and the community had deteriorated to such an extent that Paul probably wondered whether the church would make a contribution at all and he felt a harsh letter was required to set matters straight. The reference to the people of both Macedonia and Achaia (Corinth was the capital of this province) making a generous contribution to the poor in Jerusalem (Rom 15:25–6) suggests that the letter did indeed achieve its purpose (Furnish 1988: 1202).

Conclusion: Greetings and Benediction (13:11–13)

Assuming the generally held view that 2 Corinthians harmonizes at least two separate letters (chs. 1–9; 10–13), it is not clear which of the fragments originally included these verses. In addition, different translations reflect a slightly different numbering of verses. The NRSV has three verses, but some translations break the passage down into four verses, numbering 'All the saints greet you' as v. 13. 'Saints' is a general term for believers (cf. 2 COR 1:1–2), but here probably refers to the saints of Macedonia, the place where 2 Corinthians (or much of the letter) was composed (7:5; cf. 2:12–13; 8:1; 9:2). The call to greet one another with a holy kiss occurs several times in Paul's letters (e.g. Rom 16:16; 1 Cor 16:20; 1 Thess 5:26). It recalls the ritual kiss during church gatherings, which was an intimate expression of the fellowship experienced in early church groups (Meeks 1984: 109). The benediction in v. 13 is longer than usual and resembles Eph 6:23–4. The reference to the Lord Jesus Christ, God, and the Holy Spirit should not be understood as a presentation of the formal doctrine of the trinity (Thrall 1965: 183).

REFERENCES

- Barrett, C. K. (1971), 'Paul's Opponents in II Corinthians', NTS 17: 233–54.
- (1973), A Commentary on the Second Epistle to the Corinthians (London: A. & C. Black).
- Bassler, J. M. (1992), '2 Corinthians', in C. Newsom and S. Ringe (eds.), The Women's Bible Commentary (Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox), 330–2.
- Belleville, L. L. (1993), 'Tradition or Creation? Paul's Use of the Exodus 34 Tradition in 2 Corinthians 3:7–18', in C. Evans and J. Sanders (eds.), Paul and the Scriptures of Israel (Sheffield: JSOT), 165–85.
- Berger, P. L., and Luckmann, T. (1981), The Social Construction of Reality (Harmondsworth: Penguin).
- Betz, H. D. (1973), '2 Cor 6:14–7:1: An Anti-Pauline Fragment?' JBL 92: 88–108.
- (1985), 2 Corinthians 8 and 9: A Commentary on Two Administrative Letters of the Apostle Paul, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- (1992), D. Freedman (ed.), 'Second Epistle to the Corinthians', ABD, i. 1148–54.
- Chow, J. K. (1992), Patronage and Power: A Study of Social Networks in Corinth (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Crafton, J. A. (1990), The Agency of the Apostle: A Dramatistic Analysis of Paul's Response to Conflict in 2 Corinthians (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Danker, F. W. (1989), II Corinthians (Minneapolis: Augsburg).
- Fitzgerald, J. T. (1988), Cracks in an Earthen Vessel: An Examination of the Catalogues of Hardships in the Corinthian Correspondence (Atlanta: Scholars Press).
- Furnish, V. P. (1984), II Corinthians, AB (Garden City NY: Doubleday).
- (1988), '2 Corinthians', J. L. Mays (ed.), HBC (San Francisco: Harper & Row), 190–203.
- Garrett, S. R. (1995), 'Paul's Thorn and Cultural Models of Affliction', in L. White and O. Yarbrough (eds.), The Social World of the First Christians: Essays in Honour of Wayne Meeks (Minneapolis: Fortress), 82–99.
- Georgi, D. (1986), The Opponents of Paul in Second Corinthians (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Hock, R. F. (1980), The Social Context of Paul's Ministry: Tentmaking and Apostleship (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Holmberg, B. (1980), Paul and Power: The Structure of Authority in the Primitive Church as Reflected in the Pauline Epistles (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- MacDonald, M. Y. (1988), The Pauline Churches: A Socio-Historical Study of Institutionalization in the Pauline and Deutero-Pauline Writings (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- MacMullen, R. (1984), Christianizing the Roman Empire: A. D. 100–400 (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Marshall, P. (1987), Enmity in Corinth: Social Conventions in Paul's Relations with the Corinthians (Tübingen: Mohr).
- Martin, D. B. (1990), Slavery as Salvation: The Metaphor of Slavery in Pauline Christianity (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Matthews, S. (1994), '2 Corinthians', in E. S. Fiorenza (ed.), Searching the Scriptures, ii. A Feminist Commentary (New York: Crossroad), 196–217.
- Meeks, W. (1983), The First Urban Christians (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Mitchell, M. M. (1991), Paul and the Rhetoric of Reconciliation (Tübingen: Mohr).
- Murphy-O'Connor, J. (1990), 'The Second Letter to the Corinthians', NJBC 8:16–29.
- (1991), The Theology of the Second Letter to the Corinthians (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Newton, M. (1985), The Concept of Purity at Qumran and in the Letters of Paul (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Neyrey, J. H. (1990), Paul, in Other Words: A Cultural Reading of his Letters (Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox).
- (1993), 'Nudity', in J. Pilch and B. Malina (eds.), Biblical Social Values and Their Meaning (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson), 119–25.
- Plevnik, J. (1993), 'Honour/Shame', in J. Pilch and B. Malina (eds.), Biblical Social Values and Their Meaning (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson), 95–104.
- Reese, J. M. (1993), 'Assertiveness', in J. Pilch and B. Malina (eds.), Biblical Social Values and Their Meaning (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson), 9–11.
- Sanders, E. P. (1983), Paul, the Law, and the Jewish People (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Schütz, J. H. (1975), Paul and the Anatomy of Apostolic Power (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Stockhausen, C. K. (1993), '2 Corinthians 3 and the Principles of Pauline Exegesis', in C. Evans and J. Sanders (eds.), Paul and the Scriptures of Israel (Sheffield: JSOT), 143–64.
- Theissen, G. (1982), The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity: Essays on Corinth (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Thrall, M. E. (1965), I and II Corinthians, CBC (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- (1980), 'Super-Apostles, Servants of Christ, and Servants of Satan', JSNT 6: 42–57.
- van Vliet, H. (1958), No Single Testimony: A Study on the Adoption of the Law of Deut. 19:15 Par. into the New Testament, Studia Theologica Rheno-Traiectina, 4 (Utrecht: Kemink & Zoon).
- Witherington III, B. (1995), Conflict and Community in Corinth: A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary on 1 and 2 Corinthians (Grand Rapids, Mich.: William B. Eerdmans).
- Young, F., and Ford, D. F. (1987), Meaning and Truth in 2 Corinthians (Grand Rapids, Mich.: William B. Eerdmans).

67. Galatians

G. N. STANTON

INTRODUCTION

A. Paul and the Galatian Churches. 1. Galatians was sent as a circular letter to a group of churches in Galatia, where it would have been read aloud, perhaps on several occasions in the context of worship (1:2). This is the most passionate of Paul's letters; only 2 Cor 10–13 is partly comparable. There has never been any doubt about the authorship of Galatians: here we meet Paul's pugnacious defence of 'the truth of the gospel' (2:5), as well as his exposition of the significance of God's disclosure of Jesus Christ (1:12). Paul's letter is carefully crafted, though in places the modern reader wishes he had clarified some of his statements. We do not know whether Paul's attempt to fend off the threat of the agitators who had infiltrated the Galatian churches met with immediate success. In the long run, however, Paul was successful: his insistence that Gentiles need not observe the whole Mosaic law (including circumcision) as an integral part of their commitment to Christ won the day, but the debates on this issue rumbled on in some circles well into the latter part of the second century (cf. Justin Martyr, Dialogue, 47), and even occasionally thereafter.

2. In places Paul uses strong language which must have made some of the first listeners to this letter wince (cf. 3:1; 4:30; 5:12). Occasional scholarly attempts to 'improve' Paul's line of argument by removing some verses as later non-Pauline additions have not won support. We can be confident that the letter we have is very similar to the letter Paul dictated to an amanuensis before adding the final section in his own handwriting (cf. 6:11). In view of the extent to which some of Paul's key points are expressed more judiciously in some of his later letters, it is perhaps surprising that the early scribes who copied it did not make more strenuous efforts to harmonize it with the 'later', more moderate Paul.

3. Galatians was written to quite specific circumstances which are difficult to reconstruct in detail, though the main issues at stake are clear. Paul's dispute with the agitators elicited some of his most profound theological statements. Only Romans has made a greater impact on later Christian thinkers and believers. In modern times Galatians has surpassed even Romans in the role it has played in reconstructions of the history of earliest Christianity. Interpretation of Paul's accounts of the Jerusalem 'council' (2:1–10) and of his clash with Peter at Antioch (2:11–14) is always prominent in discussion of the tensions within early Christianity.

B. The Galatian Crisis. 1. In order to unravel Paul's main lines of argument in this letter, it is necessary to have some appreciation of the circumstances that led to its composition. Paul had preached in Galatia once (or possibly twice—see 4:13) before he wrote this letter. His initial visit was related to 'a physical infirmity' he experienced (4:13). Probably as the result of his ministry, house-churches were established. In spite of Paul's displeasure at the later turn of events, the warmth of his initial relationship with the Galatian Christians is reflected in several passages (e.g. 3:15; 4:12–20; 6:1).

2. At some point after Paul had left Galatia, agitators from elsewhere had undermined some of his central convictions by confusing the Galatians and 'pervert[ing] the gospel of Christ' (1:7). The clearest statements concerning the agitators' 'false teaching' are in 4:10, 5:7–12, and 6:12–13, though parts of those verses are difficult to interpret. The agitators are encouraging the Galatian Christians to observe the Jewish 'special days, and months, and seasons, and years' (4:10). They themselves are Jews who have become Christians; they have been urging the Galatian Gentile Christians to be circumcised, i.e. to become full proselytes to Judaism as part of their commitment to the gospel of Christ (6:12–13). Paul believes that they have been selective in their approach, i.e. they have not insisted that the Galatians observe all the Mosaic commandments (4:3).

3. It is possible to glean a little more about the claims of the agitators by 'mirror-reading' some passages in Galatians. But as Barclay (1987) has rightly emphasized, mirror-reading is a hazardous operation. Not all Paul's statements are necessarily direct refutations of the claims of the agitators, though some scholars have assumed too readily that this is the case. Hence many questions have to be left open. For example, it is difficult to be confident about the relationship of the agitators to the 'false believers' who caused havoc among the Jerusalem Christians (2:3–6) and to 'the certain people from James' (2:12).

4. Since Paul and the agitators shared a number of convictions, it is inappropriate to refer to them as Paul's 'opponents'. They both seem to have used the term 'gospel' to refer to Christian proclamation (1:6–7). Like Paul, they believed that Jesus the Messiah was the fulfilment of the promises of Scripture. In all probability, in 4:21–31 Paul is responding to their interpretation of key passages in Genesis.

5. By mirror-reading 5:13–6:10 some scholars have claimed that Paul is opposing a second group in the Galatian churches, antinomians or Gnostics who have distorted Paul's proclamation of Christian freedom. However, in this section of his letter, Paul is far more concerned with general ethical principles than with false views. Paul is underlining two convictions: faith must be worked out in love (5:6); freedom is not an opportunity for self-indulgence, but for love of one another which is a bond as close as slavery (5:13).

C. The Recipients. 1. Where were the Galatian churches located? Scholarly opinion continues to be evenly divided between advocates of the 'north' and the 'south' Galatia theories. The former defend the traditional view that the recipients of this letter were ethnic Galatians (Galatai, Celts, see 3.1) who lived in the north of the Roman province; the Galatian churches were near modern Ankara. The latter note that in Paul's day the Roman province of Galatia stretched from Pontus on the Black Sea to Pamphylia on the Mediterranean coast, and insist that Paul wrote to churches at Antioch, Lystra, and Derbe in the south.

2. A decision is important for reconstruction of Paul's missionary journeys and career, but not for the interpretation of this letter. See Longenecker (1990: lxiii–lxviii), for a full discussion.

D. Date. Dates proposed range from 49 to 58 CE. If Paul wrote in 49 or 50, Galatians would be the earliest of his letters. If Paul wrote towards the end of the 50s, Galatians was written not long before Romans. Dating Galatians is closely related to a decision on two major questions: the location of the Galatian churches, and the relationship of Gal 2:1–10 to Acts. If, as seems likely, Paul's account of his visit to Jerusalem in 2:1–10 is his equivalent of Luke's account of the Jerusalem council in Acts 15, then Galatians was written at some point after that event which is usually dated to between 49 and 51 CE. (See further GAL 2:1–10 and 1PC B1.4.) The extent of the development in Paul's thinking between Galatians and Romans is only one of several issues that depend on the date one assigns to this letter. However, a decision cannot be made with any degree of confidence.

E. Genre. Of rather more importance for the exegesis of this letter is its literary genre, a question that has been prominent in recent discussion. Betz's theory that Galatians is an apologetic letter that presupposes the real or fictitious situation of the court of law has provoked lively debate. Betz (1979: 15) claims that the epistolary framework can be separated so easily 'that it appears almost as a kind of external bracket for the body of the letter'. Paul is defending himself against the accusations of his accusers before the jury that is to decide the case, i.e. the Galatians. Betz's critics acknowledge that this forensic rhetorical pattern of persuasion can be discerned in parts of chs. 1 and 2, but hardly in the letter as a whole. Some claim that Galatians is an example of deliberative rhetoric, i.e. that Paul is persuading the Galatians not to accept the claims of the agitators. While this is clearly the case in 1:6–9 and 6:12–16, this reading does not do justice to many other parts of the letter. The debate has been assessed critically by Kern (1998) who calls in question the various attempts to interpret Galatians in the light of Graeco-Roman rhetorical handbooks. Paul uses several Graeco-Roman and Jewish patterns of persuasion in what is, after all, an impassioned letter rather than a rhetorical discourse.

F. Structure. The introduction (1:1–9) and the conclusion (6:11–18) are clearly marked. There are three main sections in the letter. From 1:10 to 2:21 Paul relates the parts of his own story that are relevant to his overall purposes. The central arguments of the letter start at 3:1, but it is not easy to decide whether they end at 4:11, 4:30, or 5:1. The ethical exhortations in the third main section end at 6:10.

COMMENTARY

Introduction (1:1–9)

(1:1–5) Opening Greetings The literary form of the opening words is found in nearly all NT and early Christian letters: 'writer to addressees, greetings': 'Paul ... to the churches of Galatia, grace to you and peace ...' As in his other letters, Paul elaborates this opening formula, but only in Romans 1:1–6 is this done at greater length than in Galatians.

Paul's comments on his apostleship are striking. In numerous passages in his letters Paul refers to himself in positive terms as an apostle ('one who has been sent'). In v. 1, however, Paul stresses that his apostleship is not based on a 'human commission', nor has he been sent 'from human authorities'. Is this a direct response to his opponents in Galatia right at the outset of the letter? Have they been undermining Paul's authority by referring to its purely human origin, perhaps stressing that Paul had been sent as an apostle (merely) by the church at Antioch (Acts 13:1–3)? This may be the case, but as we noted above, Paul's forceful statements are not all to be read as direct responses to the jibes of his opponents. Paul emphasizes that he has been sent to the Galatian churches as an apostle by Jesus Christ and God the Father. God has shown that he is the Father of Jesus Christ by raising him to life; in vv. 3–4 God is the Father of Christians ('our Father').

In the opening phrases of several of his letters Paul refers to individual co-workers; see, for example 1 Cor 1:1, Sosthenes; 2 Cor 1:1, Timothy. In v. 2 Paul refers to an unnamed group of co-workers. The phrase, 'God's family', correctly alludes to the presence of men and women in the group, for in a context such as this, the Greek word adelphoi, literally 'brothers', includes 'sisters'.

Paul states that he is writing to the churches of Galatia. As noted above, it is not easy to be certain about their precise geographical location. Paul's other letters were written to individual churches, though they may soon have circulated more widely. Like 1 Peter (cf. 1:1), Galatians was intended to be a circular letter to a group of churches probably scattered over a wide area.

In v. 4 Paul makes three comments about the significance of the death of Christ. (1) In Paul's day many Jews believed that the death of a righteous man as a martyr would expiate the sins of others (see especially 4 Macc). Here the death of Christ is linked to this conviction in what several scholars have claimed is a pre-Pauline formula. The strongest indication that this may have been the case is the use of 'sins', whereas Paul himself prefers the singular, 'sin'. (2) In what may be Paul's own filling out of an early credal statement, the death of Christ is seen as a release 'from the present evil age'. Paul implies that there is a 'coming age' which he refers to in 6:15 as 'the new creation'. This contrast between two 'ages' is characteristic of apocalyptic thought. (3) Christ's giving up of his life for our release is in accordance with the will of God. 'The death of the Son is therefore a sacrifice enacted both by him and by God; and as such it breaks the mold of the old sacrificial system. The cross, that is to say, is not a sacrifice human beings make to God; it is fundamentally God's act, and as such the inversion of the sacrificial system.' (Martyn 1997: 91)

Paul concludes his extended opening greetings with a traditional doxology (v. 5). He does not do this in his other letters. Perhaps he does so here in the knowledge that his circular letter will be read in the churches in Galatia in the context of worship.

(1:6–9) Rebuke Immediately after the opening greetings in all Paul's other letters a thanksgiving to God for the readers is included. Thanksgiving is mentioned by Paul more often, line for line, than by any other Hellenistic author, pagan or Christian (O'Brien 1977). In stark contrast to Paul's other letters, however, there is not even a hint of a note of thanksgiving in Galatians. But there is one important point of similarity here with the other letters: here too the main theme of Galatians is introduced in the sentences that follow the opening greetings.

Paul's first word after the initial greetings, thaumazō, 'I am astonished' must have sent a shudder through the Galatian congregations when they heard it read, for they would have expected a thanksgiving. v. 6 includes Paul's only use of the verb metatithēmi, 'desert'; the closest parallels in Hellenistic writers refer to the desertion of one philosophical school for another. Here, however, the context is different: Paul is amazed that the Galatians are deserting 'the one who called you', clearly not Paul himself, but God whose call is 'in grace'. Although NRSV reads 'in the grace of Christ', 'of Christ' is not found in some early MSS; it is more likely to have been a later scribal explanatory addition than an omission. The Galatians' desertion has happened 'quickly', perhaps soon after the arrival of the agitators. The verbs in vv. 6–7 are in the present tense, confirming that the Galatians' apostasy is still happening as Paul writes.

Paul claims that the Galatians are 'turning to a different gospel', but he immediately denies that there is another gospel. The term 'gospel' has deep roots both in the Graeco-Roman world and in Isaiah. It may have been associated by the Galatians with the 'glad tidings' brought by a military victory or the birth of an emperor. In several key passages in Isaiah 40:9, 52:7, 61:1 the verb 'to proclaim good news' is used. Jesus seems to have applied the same phraseology to his own proclamation of God's coming kingly rule (e.g. Mt 11:5 || Lk 7:22; Lk 4:16–21). Soon after Easter the noun is used as a Christian technical term for 'God's good news about Jesus Christ'. For Paul, there can be only one gospel (though see Gal 2:7); if his opponents use that term, they are perverting God's good news.

In v. 7 Paul speaks openly about the agitators for the first time. Instead of naming them, he refers to them with disdain as 'some people'. 'There are some who are confusing you' is too weak, as is REB's 'there are some who unsettle your minds'. The same verb tarassō is used in Gal 5:10 (cf. also Acts 15:24) with the sense 'intimidate': the Galatians are being frightened out of their wits by the troublemakers who, from Paul's perspective, want to pervert the gospel. In the opening phrase of v. 8 (and again in v. 9) Paul uses the plural 'we'. While this could be an editorial 'we', and simply a reference to Paul himself, Paul is probably associating his co-workers with his proclamation (cf. Gal 1:2). Paul is speaking hypothetically: he is prepared to pronounce an anathema, God's curse, on himself (and his circle) and even on an angel-messenger from heaven if any of them should dare to proclaim a different gospel.

In v. 9 Paul throws caution to the winds and calls down an anathema on those who are now proclaiming a different gospel. The phrase, 'so I now repeat' may simply refer back to v. 8; more probably it is intended as a reminder that when he was last with the Galatians, Paul had solemnly warned them of the real risk that the gospel received by the Galatians might be undermined by others. The verb 'receive' is used here (and in 1 Cor 15:3) in a technical sense to refer to the careful transmission of tradition. In 1:12 Paul seems to contradict himself when he insists that he received the gospel through a revelation of Christ and not as transmitted tradition. But the contradiction is more apparent than real: the gospel does have central themes which can be passed on from one person to another (cf. 1 Cor 15:3–5), but ultimately it is God's act of disclosure or revelation.

Paul's Story (1:10–2:21)

(1:10–12) Proclamation of the Gospel Does v. 10 belong with vv. 8–9? The word 'for' (gar) in the Greek suggests this; Dunn (1993: 48) (among others) takes v. 10 in this way. However, gar is often so weak that it need not be translated—it is ignored in the NRSV. If so, then v. 10 may be read as the beginning of a lengthy section of the letter which runs as far as 2:21.

The NRSV translation of v. 10 implies a strong contrast between the accusation against Paul that he uses rhetoric to curry favour with his audience, and Paul's own claim that in his proclamation of the gospel he seeks only God's approval. This interpretation seems to be confirmed by the strikingly similar line of argument in 1 Thess 2:4–6. However, some commentators translate the Greek verb peithō in its literal sense as 'persuade', and take both parts of the opening sentence of v. 10 in a negative sense: Paul is rejecting his opponents' suggestion that he seeks to persuade his audience by the force of his rhetoric, and also their claim that he is persuading God to accept Gentiles on easier terms. The final sentence of v. 10 underlines Paul's rejection of crowd-pleasing rhetoric. Paul's many references to enslavement in this letter are usually negative, but this first reference is positive: Paul insists that he is a slave of Christ.

'For I want you to know' at the beginning of v. 11 is a formula Paul uses elsewhere (e.g. 1 Cor 12:3; 15:1) to underline the importance of what follows. In spite of the strongly polemical tone of this letter, Paul refers here to the recipients as 'brothers and sisters', perhaps as a conciliatory gesture. Paul's firm threefold denial in 11c and 12 that his gospel has merely human origins is a filling out of 11i, and probably a direct response to the jibes of his opponents. Paul's positive statement about the origin of his gospel at the end of v. 12 is one of the most important in the whole letter: it is expanded and expounded in the autobiographical sketch that follows. Paul insists that he received the gospel 'through a revelation (apokalypsis) of Jesus Christ'. This translation preserves the ambiguity of the Greek which can be construed either as 'Jesus Christ's disclosure of the gospel' or as 'God's disclosure of Jesus Christ as the content of the gospel'. The latter is preferable, especially in view of the filling out of v. 12 in vv. 15–16. The key noun in v. 12, apokalypsis is usually understood in the light of apocalyptic writings where it often refers to the unveiling of something or someone previously hidden, i.e. the 'revelation' or 'disclosure' of Jesus Christ. While not denying the validity of this traditional interpretation, Martyn (1997: 144) has argued forcefully that God's unveiling of Christ is 'basically qualified by the assertion that apocalypse is the invasive act that was carried out by God when he sent Christ and Christ's Spirit into the world and into human hearts' (3:23; 4:4, 6).

(1:13–17) Paul's Story, Part I When had the Galatians heard about Paul's pre-Christian way of life (v. 13)? We can only guess. Perhaps Paul had spoken about it on his initial visit to the Galatian churches. Or perhaps Paul knew that some information about his former life had circulated far and wide—well beyond the reports that had reached the churches of Judea to which he refers in 1:22–3. Or perhaps Paul had guessed or was aware that his opponents had used an account of his former way of life to undermine his authority and proclamation.

Paul's two references in vv. 13 and 14 to his way of life in Judaism are the only two references to Judaism in the NT. Not until the writings of Ignatius half a century later do we find 'Judaism' and 'Christianity' contrasted as two 'religions'. In earlier Jewish writings (2 and 4 Macc) 'Judaism' is used to contrast the distinctive Jewish way of life with Hellenism. In v. 14 Paul underlines twice over the 'out of the ordinary' zeal with which he observed the 'traditions of his ancestors', i.e. traditional Pharisaic interpretation of the law. Perhaps Paul is glancing sideways at the insistence of his opponents in Galatia on law observance: Paul concedes that formerly he himself had made the same claims concerning the law.

Paul's zeal had led him 'to persecute the church of God violently and to try to destroy it' (my tr.) The verbs are strong and in the imperfect tense: Paul's hounding of the church was not a one-off outburst, but a sustained attack which included violence. Why had followers of Christ roused Paul's ire? Some scholars have claimed that it was lax observance of the law by Christians that provoked Paul, but Paul himself does not say this. Were there Christians in the period between the Resurrection and Paul's call who did not keep the law fully? From his letters it is difficult to discern at what point Paul changed his mind about law observance; this does not seem to have happened immediately after his call on the road to Damascus. Luke does provide some relevant evidence in Acts, but it is difficult to interpret: in Luke's perspective the claim that Stephen and the Hellenists attacked the law before Paul's call was mischievous (see Acts 6:11, 13–14). So it is not as easy as some have supposed to argue that before his call Paul was in contact with Christians who did not observe the law.

It is more likely that early Christological claims, especially concerning the Messiahship of Jesus, were the trigger for the violence Paul used against 'the church of God'. Christians were claiming that a man crucified recently as a criminal was God's Messiah, but Paul knew all too well that such a person stood under the curse of the law (Gal 3:13). Hence Paul discerned that proclamation of a crucified Messiah was implicitly a threat to the law, though even after his call as apostle to the Gentiles it seems to have taken him some time to work out the radical implications of this conclusion.

Paul does not tell his readers the location of the churches he persecuted. The phrase, 'the church (assembly) of God' is striking. This very early Christian self-designation echoes the OT references to Israel as 'the assembly of Yahweh'. Although both synagōgē and ekklēsia are used in the LXX to translate the Hebrew phrase, there is no evidence that ekklēsia was ever applied to the Jewish community in a given place (Meeks 1983: 80). So the early Christian use of the term ekklēsia was one way Christians differentiated themselves from local Jewish communities. In retaining the phrase 'of God', Paul concedes that his persecution of the church was an attack on God.

In vv. 15–17 a single, long, rather complicated Greek sentence is retained as one sentence in the NRSV; it fills out the argument of 1:11–12 considerably. Paul's two main points are clear, even though, as we shall see below, some of the details leave questions unanswered. He emphasizes that his dramatic call to proclaim God's Son among the Gentiles was on God's initiative as a revelation or disclosure of his Son (see A4 above); he did not make contact with any other Christians in order to seek their advice or instructions, but went off on his own to Arabia.

Although it has often been customary to refer to Paul's conversion experience, and thereby to imply a conversion from Judaism to Christianity, Paul's carefully chosen phrases here indicate that he himself saw matters very differently. He did not decide to convert from one religion to another; in God's own time ('when it pleased God'), God called Paul to be an apostle to the Gentiles. Paul deliberately echoes phrases from Jer 1:4–5 and Isa 49:1, 6 to refer to his call, thereby aligning himself with the Hebrew prophets.

Paul acknowledges that there were apostles in Jerusalem before his call, but stresses that he felt no need to defer to their authority. Instead, immediately after his call he went off to 'Arabia', the kingdom of Nabataea south of Damascus. Betz (1979: 73) notes (with references) that recent excavations have brought to light a prosperous civilization with strong Hellenistic influences that was at its peak by the time of Paul's visit. Paul may have stayed in this area for up to two years, perhaps preaching in cities such as Petra to Gentiles already sympathetic to Judaism (so-called 'God-fearers') (so Hengel and Schwemer 1997: 127). This is a plausible historical reconstruction, but Paul tells us much less about his visit to Arabia than we would like to know.

At the end of v. 17 Paul reveals that he returned to Damascus following his stay in Arabia, thus implying that it was in or near Damascus that he experienced God's call. Although readers of Acts are told three times and with vivid details (9:3; 22:6; 26:12) that Paul experienced God's call near Damascus, Paul himself tells us much less in vv. 15–17, for his concerns in this letter are different. He focuses on his call to be an apostle to the Gentiles as God's initiative, and on his avoidance of those who might have been 'human sources' (cf. 1:12) for his gospel.

(1:18–24) Paul's Story, Part II: Visit to Jerusalem When did Paul go up to Jerusalem—three years after his return to Damascus, or three years after his initial call? Most scholars prefer the latter, though the former is not impossible. The NRSV translates the key verb hīstorēsai which refers to the purpose of Paul's visit to Jerusalem as 'visit', while the GNB translates 'obtain information from'. From the context 'visit' is preferable; if Paul had conceded that he obtained information from Cephas (the Aramaic form of Peter) he would have offered a hostage to fortune. No doubt during the period Paul spent as Cephas's house guest in Jerusalem he did gain some information about the life and teaching of Jesus, but from Paul's perspective that did not mean that he was dependent on Cephas for his understanding of the gospel. Some scholars have suggested that during this visit to Jerusalem Paul reached the agreement with Peter that is referred to in 2:7, but that is unlikely.

Paul is adamant about his independence from the leaders of the Jerusalem church. In v. 20 he confirms the accuracy of his autobiographical sketch with an oath. None the less it is important to bear in mind that Paul's purpose is not primarily to set out his story with chronological precision. His sketch is selective, for it is designed to rebut the claims of his opponents. Hence his repeated insistence (cf. vv. 17, 19) that with the exception of Cephas, he did not meet any of the other Jerusalem apostles. In 19b Paul adds a further exception, James the Lord's brother who is almost certainly referred to here as an apostle. However, the Greek may mean that Paul did not see any apostle (apart from Cephas)—though he did see James.

In order to underline his independence of the Jerusalem authorities Paul mentions in v. 21 that after his short visit to Cephas he then went well to the north and north-west of Jerusalem, to places in Syria (presumably including Antioch) and in neighbouring Cilicia. Defenders of the south Galatia theory believe that Paul's first visit to Galatia took place during this journey. Martyn, a defender of the north Galatia theory, believes that v. 21 tells strongly against the south Galatian theory; he notes that if Paul had visited the cities of (south) Galatia at this point, it would have suited his argument to have said so (1997: 184).

In vv. 22–3 Paul goes still further: at this time he certainly was not in contact with the Jerusalem authorities, for he was not known personally by the churches in Judea, including Jerusalem. In that area stories had circulated about his volte-face from persecutor to proclaimer, but he himself was not there, but far to the north. In v. 23 Paul quotes the report about him which had reached the Judean churches and had been received with thanksgiving to God (v. 24). No doubt only a summary is included, but some of the phrases seem to come directly from the report rather than from Paul himself. For example, Paul does not refer to the content of the Christian message as 'the faith', and he prefers the noun 'gospel/good news' to the verb 'proclaim good news'.

(2:1–10) Paul's Story, Part III: Conference in Jerusalem The meeting between Paul and Barnabas and Christians in Jerusalem was one of the most momentous events in the development of earliest Christianity. Was it intended to defuse a major crisis and to reconcile deep-seated differences? What were the main issues at stake? Although some details are unclear, the main points can be set out confidently.

The relationship of Paul's account in these verses of a conference in Jerusalem to Acts 11:29–30 and 15:1–29 has baffled scholars for many decades. A minority insists that the 'apostolic council' recorded in Acts 15 took place after Galatians was written. This would account for Paul's failure to refer in ch. 2 to the 'apostolic decree' (Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25) which, according to Luke, encapsulated the decisions reached at the 'apostolic council'. On this view the events recorded here are to be equated with Acts 11:29–30. However, most scholars accept that in spite of some glaring differences, there are enough similarities between the two passages to conclude that they record the same event from different perspectives. Even if Acts 15 draws on earlier sources, Luke wrote some three decades after Paul wrote Galatians—and, unlike Paul, Luke makes no claim to have been present himself. So

Acts 15 should be used with great care by the interpreter of Gal 2:1–10.

'After 14 years' probably refers to Paul's call (1:15–16) rather than his visit to Cephas (1:18–19). Paul is accompanied by Barnabas who is portrayed in 2:13 as a leader in the church at Antioch, as he is in Acts 14:26–8. So Paul and Barnabas probably travelled to Jerusalem as leaders of the church in Antioch, even though, for whatever reason, Paul does not state this explicitly. Paul emphasizes that the journey was undertaken at God's behest, 'in response to a revelation' (v. 2), i.e. not as the result of the anxieties or the decision of the church in Antioch.

With whom in Jerusalem did Paul discuss his convictions concerning the gospel he was proclaiming to Gentiles (v. 2)? The NRSV and the REB refer to one 'private' meeting with the leaders of the Jerusalem church who play a prominent part in vv. 6–10. Some commentators (including Betz 1979 and Martyn 1997) conclude (probably correctly) that two meetings are referred to in the Greek of v. 2, one with the whole church in Jerusalem, followed by one with the leaders.

Paul is anxious lest his fundamental conviction that Gentiles should be accepted without the requirement of circumcision be called in question or even rejected outright (2b). In v. 3 it becomes clear that Paul and Barnabas had taken Titus with them to Jerusalem (v. 1) as a test case. At first there is no dissension: the Gentile Titus was not compelled to be circumcised (v. 3). At this point the link between Paul's story in chs. 1 and 2 and the crisis in Galatia would have become crystal clear to those who heard this letter read aloud in churches in Galatia many hundreds of miles from Jerusalem. In chs. 1 and 2 Paul is narrating selected past events in his life not because he believed that his autobiography was interesting, but because he was convinced that his story was directly relevant to the disputes in Galatia. The phrase 'compelled to be circumcised' which is used in v. 3 with reference to Titus, recurs in Gal 6:12 with reference to the Galatian Christians. In v. 5 Paul insists that the stand he took on principle in Jerusalem was 'so that the truth of the gospel might always remain with you [Galatian Christians]'.

Paul's fury at the 'false believers' who had sneaked in like spies to 'enslave us' is not disguised; it is reflected in emotive language in vv. 4–5 and in the tangled grammar, which the NRSV partly unravels. Where did this attempt to thwart 'the freedom we have in Christ Jesus' take place? Some scholars posit an earlier occasion in Antioch, partly on the basis of Acts 15:1, while others believe that the disruption took place in Jerusalem itself. Who are the 'false believers' who posed such a threat? Paul concedes that they are 'believers' ('brothers' in the Greek), but is adamant that he did not yield to their demand that Gentile Christians should be circumcised. Like the agitators in Galatia, they are perverting the gospel of Christ (1:6–7). The 'false believers' are probably not identical with 'the certain people from James' referred to in 2:12.

In v. 6 Paul insists that the Jerusalem leaders made no demands on Paul: 'they imparted nothing further to me' (REB). Here, as elsewhere in this passage, Paul is ambivalent about the Jerusalem leadership. He recognizes that they are the 'acknowledged leaders' (2:2, 6, 9) of the Jerusalem church, though he himself is unimpressed by their status, for they have no special standing in God's eyes.

In vv. 7–9 Paul spells out the agreement that was reached, one which in Paul's eyes was a victory, not a compromise. The Jerusalem leaders recognized that Paul had been entrusted by God with the gospel 'for the uncircumcised', just as Peter had been entrusted with the gospel 'for the circumcised'. Most scholars now accept that Paul is referring here to a division of labour along ethnic (Jew / Gentile) rather than geographical (Israel / diaspora) lines. Paul is not referring to 'two gospels', one for each ethnic group; the very idea would have appalled him, as 1:7 confirms. The recognition that God was at work in making Peter 'an apostle to the circumcised' is in stark contrast to the reference to Peter in the account of the 'incident at Antioch' which follows in 2:10–14.

At last Paul names the leaders of the Jerusalem church: James, Cephas, and John (v. 9). They are referred to as 'pillars', as in supports for a building. Agreement is sealed by giving 'the right hand of fellowship', an act that had the same meaning in antiquity as it does today. 'By implication, the agreement sets up two cooperative but independent missionary efforts' (Betz 1979: 100). The only request made by the Jerusalem leaders to Paul and Barnabas was that they should remember 'the poor', i.e. they (probably the Antioch church) should support the Jerusalem church financially. Paul had no hesitation in accepting this request. We know from 1 Cor 16:1–3 that the Galatian churches did make weekly collections for the Jerusalem church (cf. also Rom 15:25–6).

What is left unsaid in vv. 1–10 must not be forgotten. The 'false believers' fade completely from the scene at v. 5. There is not even a hint that they accepted the agreement. And if, as most scholars think, Acts 15 records a different version of the discussions in Jerusalem, Paul's failure to mention the 'apostolic decree' is significant: either Luke has anachronistically added the decree to his account of the apostolic council, or it was such an embarrassment to Paul that he could not bring himself to mention it here.

(2:11–14) Paul's Story, Part IV: Incident at Antioch The clash between Peter and Paul recorded in these verses is in sharp contrast to the amicable agreement reached at Jerusalem. In the earlier parts of Paul's story an indication of the chronology is given, but there is none here. This is one of the reasons why some scholars reverse the order of the two events narrated in ch. 2: the crisis that arose in Antioch (vv. 11–14) was resolved by the agreement reached in Jerusalem (vv. 1–10). This reconstruction avoids the difficulty that in ch. 2 Paul does not indicate the outcome of his dispute with Peter at Antioch. But in such a carefully argued letter Paul is unlikely to have reversed the chronology, and in 2:1–10 there is no reference to food laws, the central issue at stake in Paul's clash with Peter.

Paul's failure to record the outcome of his face-to-face dispute with Peter is related to his primary concern to show that this incident has a direct bearing on the tensions in the Galatian churches. Even though the text gives no explicit indication of a change of scene from Antioch to Galatia at v. 14, most modern translations assume rather too readily that there is a major break at this point. However, the NRSV's footnote is helpful, and points the reader in the right direction: 'Some interpreters hold that the quotation extends into the following paragraph.' If so, then in 2:15–21 Paul is still addressing Peter in Antioch—but for the benefit of the troublemakers in Galatia. It is preferable to read the record of the incident at Antioch as undergoing a subtle metamorphosis in vv. 15–21 as Paul switches the focus of his attention from Antioch to Galatia.

In v. 11 Paul does not tell the reader why Peter came to Antioch (presumably from Jerusalem), nor does he give the reason for the dramatic confrontation. Only after the bald summary is given do the details emerge in vv. 12 and 13. Peter had been fully accustomed to eating with Gentiles in the church at Antioch; he was thoroughly at home in the mixed congregation there of Jews and Gentiles. But when 'certain people came from James', Peter backtracked. Presumably the visitors came at the behest of James to express the concerns of the Jerusalem church. If they were the false believers of 2:4–5, surely Paul would have said so. They were not urging abandonment of the Jerusalem accord over separate missions to Jews and to Gentiles, but raising concerns over Peter's regular practice of eating with Gentiles, a matter apparently not discussed in Jerusalem. Paul does not tell us whether the meals in question were regular meals, or the Lord's supper, or both. At this time Jews and Gentiles regularly had contact with one another, but there were differing attitudes to table fellowship. Peter and other Jewish believers seem to have been welcoming Gentiles to their tables, probably on Jewish terms. They are likely to have been 'accepting invitations to Gentile tables without asking too many questions (cf. 1 Cor 10:27), though presumably on the assumption that the Gentile believers would have been mindful of the basic food rules' (Dunn 1993: 121).

The verbs in v. 12b imply that Peter began to draw back and refrain from table fellowship over a period of time. Who was applying the pressure, and why was Peter afraid? The NRSV refers to 'fear of the circumcision faction'; this phrase is usually understood to refer to Jewish Christians who came from James and who were uneasy about what were perceived to be Antioch's lax attitudes to table fellowship with Gentiles. The REB interprets the Greek quite differently: Peter 'was afraid of the Jews'. The Jews may have been non-Christians. Longenecker (1990) and others accept R. Jewett's theory that at the time of the Antioch incident a rising tide of Jewish nationalism had provoked Jewish antagonism towards Jews who were thought to be adopting lax attitudes towards association with Gentiles. Under this political pressure, the Jerusalem Christians were 'trying to take measures to keep Gentile Christians from needlessly offending Jewish sensibilities'. Hence the concerns of the Jerusalem church were triggered by political rather than theological concerns.

These verses can be plausibly interpreted in several ways. Perhaps we have to accept that we do not know precisely why Peter acted in a way that led Paul to charge him with hypocrisy twice over in v. 13. What is clear is that Peter did not act impulsively and without support from other Jewish Christians. Even Barnabas, Paul's closest colleague (2:2, 9) 'was led astray'. It was Paul who was isolated, hence the emotive language (and perhaps even the lack of clarity) in vv. 11–14. Paul's own position becomes clear in v. 14. He believes that Peter (and Barnabas and all the other Jewish Christians) were 'not acting consistently with the truth of the gospel' when they compelled Gentiles to live like Jews, i.e. to share table fellowship with Gentiles only when meals had been prepared in accordance with Jewish dietary laws. ('Living like Jews' did not necessarily include circumcision; there is no indication that Peter was insisting that Gentile believers should be circumcised.) For Paul, a fundamental principle was at stake: Gentiles were being compelled to live like Jews in order to be accepted as members of the Antioch church. Hence Paul rounded on Peter in front of all those lined up against him. It is often pointed out that Paul's attack on Peter is at odds with his own exhortation in 6:1 to use a 'spirit of gentleness' when a fellow Christian is 'detected in transgression'.

Paul says nothing about Peter's response, and nothing about the outcome of the confrontation. Martyn (1997: 240), concludes that 'the Antioch incident ended in political defeat for Paul'. That is a possible, but not a necessary reading of the text. Perhaps Paul was more concerned to press home the theological issues at stake, as he does in the following verses, than to record the outcome of a painful episode.

(2:15–21) Works of the Law or Faith? Paul expounds vigorously the theological issues at stake in his dispute with Peter. He probably intends these verses (or at least vv. 15–18) to be part of his reply to Peter. Paul is unlikely to be recalling some seven years later the very words he used; no doubt these verses incorporate some of Paul's later reflections on the issues at stake. We do not know whether Paul formulated his convictions about 'justification by faith' in the light of his dispute with Peter, or whether he had developed them at an earlier point.

vv. 15 and 16 contain a set of programmatic statements that are expounded and underlined in the sections of Galatians that follow. In v. 15 Paul reminds Peter that both of them are Jews by birth, and hence view Gentiles as outside the law and therefore as sinners. Here Paul is echoing traditional views; perhaps he is even echoing the language used by the 'certain people from James' (v. 12). In the next verse Paul explains that v. 15 is by no means the end of the matter! In the lengthy v. 16 the phrase 'works of the law' is used three times and contrasted sharply with 'faith'. What does the former phrase refer to? Paul is refuting the claim made by the agitators in Galatia (and implicitly by Peter when he 'compel[led] the Gentiles to live like Jews', v. 14) that one's standing before God is dependent on carrying out the requirements of the Mosaic law. 'Works of the law' is taken by some scholars to refer to the Jewish 'identity markers' of sabbath, circumcision, and dietary laws, rather than to the Mosaic law per se, but the negative comments on the law that follow in ch. 3 make this unlikely.

Paul insists that a person is 'reckoned as righteous' by God (NRSV n.) on the basis of 'faith in Christ'. The meaning of the latter phrase is keenly discussed. It has traditionally been taken by translators and commentators to refer to the believer's faith in Christ, but a growing number of scholars insist that Paul is referring to Christ's own faithfulness to God, as in the NRSV footnote. The future tense 'will be justified' at the end of v. 16 is important; Paul is referring to the believer's ultimate standing before God.

