Once again Paul includes Peter with his use of 'we' / 'our' in v. 17. Paul seems to be referring to the stand he and Peter took before Peter backtracked: they had sought to base their standing before God solely on the basis of faith—and in so doing they had been dubbed 'sinners' by some. Paul vigorously refutes this criticism, and especially the inference that Christ has become a servant of sin. In v. 18 Paul refers directly to the incident at Antioch: he would show himself to be a transgressor if he were to backtrack (as Peter did) and 'rebuild the walls of the Law that I have torn down' (Martyn 1997: 256).

In vv. 19 and 20 Paul's statements about the Christian life are positive: both the incident at Antioch and the crisis in Galatia slip into the background. Although Paul repeatedly refers to himself in the first person singular, he is speaking on behalf of all Christian believers. 'Dying to the law' (v. 19) means being separated radically from it. For Paul 'dying to the law' takes place through identification with Christ's own crucifixion and death (v. 19c). When this happens the believer's life is no longer self-centred, but Christ-centred (v. 20).

The phrase 'Christ who lives in me' is rarer in Paul than reference to the Spirit who indwells the believer. Both phrases are less common than Paul's references to Christian experience as 'in Christ' (e.g. 5:6), 'in him', 'in the Lord', or 'in the Spirit' (e.g. 5:25). In v. 20b the NRSV's 'in the flesh' is misleading, especially in view of Paul's strongly negative use of 'the flesh' in 3:3 and 5:13, 16–22. Here 'flesh' is neutral; it refers to the believer's 'present mortal life' (REB).

Paul does not often refer to Christ as 'Son' or 'Son of God'. When he does so, it is usually in a particularly rich theological context, as in Gal 1:16, 2:20c, and 4:4–6. Both the latter passages refer to the Son's self-giving 'for us', 'for our redemption', a note first sounded in Galatians in the opening greeting at 1:4. Once again there is a division of opinion over 'faith'. Does Paul refer to the believer's faith in the Son of God, or to the Son's own faith (NRSV f.) or faithfulness?

v. 21 is a summary of the whole of vv. 15–21; in particular it underlines some of the key points of v. 16. Paul is probably responding directly to the claims of the agitators; the incident at Antioch has now faded from view. The agitators have claimed (or perhaps Paul thinks they have claimed) that Paul has wrenched asunder God's grace and the law. For Paul a person is reckoned as righteous in God's sight not through the law (synonymous in v. 20 with the 'works of the law', v. 16) but through faith in Christ (v. 16) whose death was not in vain (v. 21c) but was an act of self-giving love for us (v. 20c).

Paul's Central Arguments (3:1–5:1)

(3:1–5) How Did You Receive the Spirit? Paul continues the argument of the preceding verses and asks pointedly whether the Galatians received the Spirit by 'works of the law' or by 'believing what you heard' (v. 2). Attention is now focused directly on the Galatians who are roundly rebuked for the second time (cf. 1:6–19). Peter and the incident at Antioch are left far behind as Paul grapples vigorously with the issues at stake in the crisis in the Galatian churches. At nearly all the key points in ch. 3 Paul's argument is grounded on Scripture, but in this opening section Paul's appeal is to the Galatians' initial reception and continuing experience of the Spirit. The Galatian Christians are upbraided twice for their foolishness (vv. 1, 3); it is not their lack of intelligence that riles Paul, but their lack of discernment. Paul draws on contemporary patterns of polemical argument in suggesting that the Galatians have been 'bewitched' by the agitators. To use a modern-day equivalent, they have had the wool pulled over their eyes. In fact Paul reminds the Galatians that he used visual imagery in his initial preaching: Jesus Christ was 'publicly exhibited as crucified'. As in 1 Cor 1:23; 2:2, Paul contrasts his preaching of the crucified Christ with the rhetorical sophistry of his opponents.

v. 3 is particularly important for Paul's argument. The Galatians have received the Spirit as the basis of their Christian experience, and they ought to continue in the Spirit (cf. 5:25). Instead, they are 'now ending with the flesh'. Paul believes that some of the Galatians have succumbed (and others may follow) to the agitators' demands that circumcision is the mark of Christian identity. Paul returns to this topic more fully at 5:2–12; 6:12–13. Paul underlines and extends his central point in this section by asking a rhetorical question in v. 5 to which he expects a resounding 'no' as an answer. The tense of the verbs is important: God continues to sustain the Galatians with the Spirit; God continues to 'work miracles' among them. We do not know what form the miracles took, but Paul's main point is clear: God's Spirit continues to be experienced powerfully in the Galatian churches. For Paul, one's standing before God (past, present, and future) is not on the basis of carrying out the requirements of the law.

(3:6–14) Abraham Believed God In v. 6 Abraham is introduced for the first time; he remains on stage until 5:1, though in some sections he lurks in the background. Given the prominence of Abraham in numerous early Jewish writings, it is not surprising that Paul also should appeal to parts of the story of Abraham. Paul takes his listeners immediately to Gen 15:6 in order to argue that 'those who believe' (including Gentiles) (vv. 7–8) are descendants of Abraham.

Paul is probably refuting the agitators' version of traditions about Abraham. They are likely to have appealed to the reference to Abraham's meritorious deeds in Gen 14 and to Abraham's acceptance of circumcision in Gen 17:4–14 as the basis of his acceptance by God. Paul, however, focuses solely on Gen 15:6 with its reference to Abraham's faith in God as the basis of his standing before God. He develops his argument from Scripture in v. 8, claiming that through Scripture (in phrases from Gen 12:3 and 18:18) God 'declared the gospel beforehand to Abraham'. God's justification of the Gentiles by faith and his bestowal of his grace, peace, and favour upon them (i.e. his blessing of them, vv. 8 and 9) is nothing new: it is anchored in Scripture, and it was always part of God's purposes.

It is difficult to be certain about Paul's line of argument in vv. 10–12. He claims that reliance on observance of the law brings a curse, not a blessing, and quotes Deut 27:26 in support. Why does the law bring a curse? Paul seems to be implying that it is impossible to carry out the requirements of the law: since those who try to do so fail to keep the law completely, they are accursed. There is a solemn warning to the Galatians here: beware of the law's siren voice, for it brings a curse, not a blessing. If this is Paul's main point in v. 10, then vv. 11 and 12 make a rather different point: they are concerned once again with the contrast between faith and keeping the law as the basis of one's standing before God. In v. 11, Hab 2:4 underpins Paul's argument concerning faith; in v. 12, Lev 18:5 is cited to confirm that the law has to do with carrying out the requirements of the law and living by them. Living by faith

(v. 11) leaves no room for living by the requirements of the law (v. 12). Paul's comments on the law in vv. 10–12 are negative and harsh. The other side of the coin is expressed positively in vv. 13–14: 'Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law... so that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith.' This section ends where it began (vv. 2–5) with a reference to the importance of God's bestowal of the Spirit. But what does 'Christ became a curse for us' mean (v. 13)? 'The thought is of Jesus acting in a representative capacity... the law printing its curse on Jesus, as it were, so that in his death the force of the curse was exhausted, and those held under its power were liberated' (Dunn 1993: 177, who rightly refers to 2 Cor 5:21 as an important parallel).

(3:15–29) Abraham's Offspring Paul seems to sense that the argument of the previous verses has been complex. So he pauses, and in contrast to 3:1, addresses the Galatians in endearing terms in order to secure their attention. He then provides an illustration from everyday life: one cannot annul or add to a ratified will (by means of a codicil). Paul uses a form of argument found in other Jewish writers of the time: in order to make a particular point he rejects the accepted meaning of Gen 17:8 as a reference to the promises given to Abraham and the generations of his descendants. He takes 'offspring' ('seed' in the Greek) in its literal sense in the singular to refer to one person, Christ. So God's promises were given only to Abraham and to Christ; in vv. 26–9 Paul will insist that those who belong to Christ are Abraham's offspring, not Abraham's physical, i.e. ethnic, descendants.

In v. 17 Paul returns to his illustration of v. 15, but he now uses the term diathēkē, which can mean either 'will' or 'covenant' to refer to God's covenant with Abraham. The law came into existence 430 years after God's covenant-promise to Abraham. There is no hint here that the law was God-given; indeed Paul's point is that as the law came later than the covenant ratified by God, it could neither nullify nor modify the promise to Abraham. The latter point is only implicit: in v. 15 Paul has explained that one cannot add a codicil to a will. The agitators in Galatia may well have argued along totally different lines: Gen 17 confirms that Abraham observed the law even before it was given by God to Moses at Sinai. Paul presses home his argument in v. 18. 'The law' and 'the promise' are set in antithetical opposition: 'the inheritance' given to Abraham comes via the latter, not the former. What is 'the inheritance' granted by God? It 'is the church-creating Spirit of Christ' (Martyn 1997: 343).

The obvious question now has to be faced (v. 19). If the law came into existence much later than the promise to Abraham, and is therefore secondary, why was it given at all? Answer: it was added as a supplement to the promises (this is the force of the verb used) 'because of transgressions', a phrase which has evoked much comment. Was the law added to bring about a knowledge of transgressions, or even to provide some sort of remedy for them? While the Greek can be construed in this way, in view of the negative comments on the law that follow, this interpretation is unlikely. Paul probably states that the law was given 'to cause or increase transgressions'. The next phrase 'until the offspring would come' confirms that the law's role is limited to the period between Moses and Christ. In nearly all strands of Jewish thought, and presumably in the view of the agitators, the law had been given by God permanently.

The law's secondary role is underlined by the claim that it was 'promulgated through angels' (v. 19d). The NRSV's 'ordained through angels' implies a more positive sense than the context allows. The first listeners were bound to notice the absence of explicit reference to the involvement of God in the giving of the law by God. The silence is telling, especially in view of the way God's involvement in the giving of the promise to Abraham is underlined in the Greek by the placing of 'God' at the end of v. 18. Paul concedes that a mediator was involved in the promulgation of the law (v. 19d). The statement that follows (v. 20) is one of the most puzzling in Paul's letters, but its gist is clear. A mediator, Moses, was involved. But since God is one and needs no mediator between himself and his people, God was not involved at Mt Sinai! This is indeed a radical rejection of Jewish views about the giving of the law, but it is in line with the preceding and the following comments about the role of the law.

An obvious objection is faced squarely in the verses which follow (cf. 3:19). In the light of the negative comments about the law that have been made in the preceding verses, some listeners might have concluded that the law and the promise were fundamentally opposed to one another (v. 21a). Paul adamantly resists this conclusion, and then proceeds to spell out what continuing function the law has (vv. 22–5). First of all the hypothetical possibility that the law might have brought life is considered. In that case, Paul readily admits, God's 'rightwising' activity ('righteousness') on our behalf would be on the basis of the law. But since the law did not bring life, righteousness does not come as the result of keeping the law. Once again the careful listener will recall 2:16, where this theme rings out for the first time. vv. 22 and 23 are partly similar: both use the verb 'imprison', and both conclude with a reference to faith. But Paul does not simply repeat himself. In v. 22 he refers to the way Scripture has imprisoned the whole of humanity, indeed the whole of creation ('all things') under the power of sin. 'Scripture' probably refers to Deut 27:26 which Paul cited in 3:11; 'under the power of sin' is synonymous with 'under a curse' in 3:11a. This negative role played by the law had a positive outcome: so that the promise might be given to those who believe. In v. 23 Paul uses the pronoun 'we' for the first time since 3:13. The verses that follow confirm that Paul has in mind the Galatian Christians as well as himself. 'We' were imprisoned by the law; in the preceding verse sin plays this role. But the dark night did not last forever, with God's disclosure of Christ (cf. 1:12, 16) faith was revealed.

Paul clarifies his main point with an illustration in vv. 24–5. The law was our paidagōgos until Christ came, but with the coming of faith we are no longer under a paidagōgos. In many families in the Graeco-Roman world the paidagōgos, often a slave, played an important part in caring for children. Sometimes this person acted primarily as a teacher (hence 'pedagogue'), sometimes as a disciplinarian. What would this metaphor have meant to the listeners in Galatia when they first heard Paul's letter read aloud? The context confirms that Paul had a negative connotation in mind: the law, like the paidagōgos, provided unpleasant restraint for a limited period—until Christ came.

In v. 26 and in the grand finale to this section in v. 29 Paul brings discussion of who are true 'children of Abraham' back onto the agenda (cf. 3:16–19). In v. 26 those who are 'in Christ Jesus' are God's children, while in v. 29 those who 'belong to Christ' are Abraham's offspring; the expressions are synonymous. By now the listener will be well aware that one's standing before God is not grounded on law observance, but on faith. vv. 27–8 interrupt the argument of vv. 26 and 29 with a reference to baptism. Some of the phrases in these verses are found elsewhere in early Christian writings (see especially 1 Cor 12:13; Col 3:11); only the first pairing in v. 28, 'Jew or Greek', is relevant to the immediate context. Hence several scholars conclude that Paul is here citing an early baptismal liturgy. The person who is about to be baptized removes clothing, symbolizing the old order, and in baptism is 'clothed with Christ' (v. 27). In baptism all the social distinctions that lay at the heart of the society of the day are abolished. 'Religious, social, and sexual pairs of opposites are not replaced by equality, but rather by a newly created unity' in Christ Jesus (Martyn 1997: 377). Whether this radical vision was put fully into practice by Paul himself, and in the churches he founded, is another question.

(4:1–7) The Sending of the Son As at 3:15, Paul opens this section with an illustration from daily life (vv. 1–2). In this case he modifies the illustration to suit his present purposes. The heir to an estate is in fact in a better position than a slave, for, unlike a slave, he knows that one day he will inherit his father's property. The date at which the son received his inheritance was probably fixed by law, rather than by an individual father. Nonetheless Paul's main points in vv. 3–4 are well supported by the illustration. While waiting to receive the inheritance (cf. 3:18), 'we were enslaved'. But in God's own time, freedom was made possible through the sending of his Son (vv. 3–4). Paul takes the 'enslavement' theme further in vv. 8–9: the Galatians, having been freed from slavery, now want to be enslaved all over again.

What are the 'elemental spirits of the world' (v. 3; cf. 4:8–9) which enslaved believers before their redemption, and which now attract the Galatians? The phrase probably refers to the basic materials or principles that lie at the heart of the cosmos. For a Jew, the law fulfilled that function. In any case, the context (cf. especially 4:5, 10) strongly suggests that Paul includes the law as an essential part of the 'elemental spirits'.

vv. 4–5 contain one of Paul's richest Christological statements. Several scholars have claimed that it is a pre-Pauline confessional formula, partly because some phrases are not common elsewhere in Paul's writings, and partly because of its similarity to 'sending formulae' in Rom 8:3; Jn 3:17; 1 Jn 4:9 (and cf. Mk 12:6). Here Paul develops the theme of God's sending of the prophets to Israel: Jesus as God's Son is sent to redeem those 'under the law', i.e. Jews, so that 'we', all who are 'in Christ Jesus' (cf. 3:26–9) might receive adoption. 'Born of a woman' does not refer to the virginal conception of Jesus, but to his birth as a human being. 'Born under the law' may mean no more than 'born as a Jew', but in view of all the preceding negative statements about the law, 'under the law' probably includes a negative connotation.

The precise background to Paul's reference to believers' 'adoption as children' (v. 5) has been keenly debated. Is this phrase to be understood in the light of Graeco-Roman practices concerning the adoption of children? Or is there an OT/Jewish background? If the latter, then, as Scott (1992) has argued, Paul may have in mind an analogy with God's adoption/redemption of Israel from slavery in Egypt: believers were redeemed to adoption as sons of God from slavery under the 'elemental spirits of the world' (GAL 4:3). v. 4 refers to God's sending of his Son; in v. 6 God 'has sent the Spirit of his Son': for Paul, 'Christ/Son' and 'Spirit' are closely related and in some passages almost synonymous. In v. 6 it is the Spirit who cries out to God on behalf of the believer and calls God, 'Abba', Father. The retention of the Aramaic word 'Abba' in a letter to Greek-speaking Christians is striking; it almost certainly reflects Jesus' own preferred way of referring to God (Mk 14:36; Lk 11:2).

The argument of vv. 1–7 is brought to a climax in v. 7: the believer's adoption as a child of God means (negatively) release from enslavement to the 'elemental spirits of the world' and (positively) acceptance as an heir to God's promises to Abraham.

(4:8–11) Why Do You Want to be Enslaved Again? Paul once again speaks directly and forcefully to the Galatian Christians (cf. 3:1–5), and develops several of the themes of 4:1–7 further. Before they became Christians, Galatians were enslaved to 'beings that by nature are not gods', i.e. to idols (cf. 1 Cor 8:5; 12:2). Now as believers they have come to know, i.e. to experience, God's Spirit (cf. 3:1–5; 4:6). Paul immediately modifies this statement in v. 9b by emphasizing yet again God's initiative in redemption from enslavement to 'the weak and beggarly elemental spirits' (GAL 4:3): 'you have come...to be known by God'.

In v. 10 the link between the elemental spirits and the law becomes explicit. What are the special 'days, and months, and seasons, and years' that the Galatians now want to observe closely, probably under the influence of the agitators? Although v. 9c, 'you want to be enslaved' may suggest that the Galatians have not yet succumbed to meticulous observance of the Jewish calendar, v. 10 implies that they have done so. There is general agreement that Paul is referring to observance of the Jewish sabbath and festivals. Observance of 'months' probably refers to observance of the new moon which marked the beginning of each month; precisely what is meant by 'years' is uncertain. Martyn correctly notes that Paul's argument here is not even partly anti-Jewish (1997: 417–18): God's new creation in Christ (cf. 6:15) marks the end of the distinction between 'holy times' and 'profane times' that is basic to all peoples—one of the pattern of 'elemental pairs of opposites' to which the Galatians were enslaved (3:28; 4:3, 8–9).

(4:12–20) Paul's Perplexity Longenecker (1990: 184–7), has argued that v. 12 marks the opening of the final major section of the letter, the transition from the 'rebuke' section (3:1–4:11) to the 'request' section (4:12–6:10). However, the link between the emotional personal appeals of v. 11 and the entreaties in vv. 12 and 19–20 makes it preferable to align 4:12–20 closely with the preceding verses. In v. 12 Paul opens this section with a term of endearment, 'friends', which he has not used since 3:15; in v. 19 he refers to the Galatians as his 'little children'. Although vv. 12–20 have been dubbed an erratic and emotional aside, these verses make explicit Paul's passionate concern for the Galatians, a concern that begins at 1:6 with Paul's expression of astonishment at the Galatians' behaviour.

Paul's opening plea, 'become as I am', recalls the earlier autobiographical sections of the letter, from 1:11 to 2:14 (or even 2:18). As in several other passages in his letters (e.g. 1 Cor 4:16–17; 1 Thess 1:6; Phil 4:9), Paul refers to his own example as a model of Christian discipleship. To modern readers this smacks of bragging, but it was a conventional mode of instruction used by philosopher-teachers in Paul's day. The phrase 'I...have become as you' is an expression of Paul's friendship and solidarity with the Galatians. In spite of the pain the Galatians have caused Paul, he does not consider that he himself has been wronged (v. 12c); the implication is that they have wronged God or Christ.

The Galatians know more about Paul's illness than we do (v. 13)! Presumably an illness led to Paul's initial visit to the Galatian churches—or perhaps it detained him there longer than planned. The reference to Paul's 'first' proclamation of the gospel may imply a second visit, but surely Paul would have referred to any second visit in this extended discussion of his relationship with the Galatians. Paul's illness put the Galatian Christians 'to the test' (v. 14a), probably because their pre-Christian beliefs would have tempted them to draw the inference that Paul's illness was the result of demon possession. In fact, the welcome Paul originally received could hardly have been more enthusiastic: he was welcomed as 'an angel of God', as a representative of Christ Jesus himself. The latter phrase parallels the similar idea in Matt 10:40, where Jesus assures his disciples that whoever welcomes them, welcomes Jesus himself. vv. 15–16 express the breakdown of Paul's warm relationship with the Galatians. Although v. 15b is often taken to imply that Paul's illness was ophthalmic, it may be no more than a vivid expression of the Galatians' initial willingness to do almost anything in their support of Paul. v. 16 is taken as a rhetorical question in NRSV and some other translations, but the Greek can equally well be construed as an indignant expression of Paul's frustration at the Galatians' about turn. In vv. 17–18 the agitators are referred to explicitly, but as elsewhere, they are not named (cf. 1:7). The NRSV's 'they make much of you...so that you may make much of them' is too bland: the REB's double reference to 'lavishing attention' is preferable. Paul even claims that the agitators want to 'exclude you', i.e. to drive a wedge between Paul himself and the Galatians. The first half of v. 18 is probably an aphorism or proverb which Paul expands in order to press home his point: Paul had hoped that his absence from the Galatian churches would not impair his relationship with them.

The poignant expression in v. 19 of Paul's perplexity and pain has no close parallel in his other letters: Paul likens himself to a pregnant mother 'in the pain of childbirth'. His concern for the Galatians could not have been expressed more powerfully. Paul probably continues with the imagery of pregnancy in the final clause where he speaks of his hope that Christ will be 'formed', i.e. like an embryo or foetus, among the Galatians. In v. 20 Paul concludes this section with his wish to be present personally with the Galatians in the hope that their warm relationship might be restored. Paul knows that his letter will have to substitute for his presence. There is no confident expectation here (or elsewhere) that this letter will be more effective than the agitators who are still personally present in the Galatian churches.

(4:21–5:1) The Hagar and Sarah Allegory There is no agreement on the reason for the inclusion of these verses at this point in the letter. Some scholars suggest that they are an afterthought, or have even been displaced from elsewhere. Others link them to the exhortation of the final main section of the letter. The traditional and preferable view is to take them as Paul's striking final argument in his sustained exposition that starts at 3:1.

Right up until v. 21b Paul speaks negatively about the law—32 times in all; in every case he has the law of Moses in mind. It is no exaggeration to claim that from 2:16 to v. 21a Paul's view of the law is 'consistently malignant' (Martyn 1997: 37). In v. 21b, however, Paul's tone changes dramatically: nomos (law) is used positively for the first time in this letter. In this verse Paul speaks with heavy irony: you Galatians who desire 'to be subject to the law', listen to what the law really says, for it does have positive things to say. This verse must have focused the minds of the Galatians sharply on Paul's central concern: heard aright, the law bears witness to the gospel, as in the allegory of Hagar and Sarah that follows.

In vv. 22 and 23 Paul summarizes parts of the Hagar–Sarah traditions from Gen 16–21. In v. 22 the reference to 'a slave woman' and 'a free woman' echo the language (but not the thought) of 3:28, and especially the opening sections of ch. 4. In v. 23 a contrast is drawn between the child 'born according to the flesh', i.e. conceived naturally, and the child born 'through the promise', i.e. following God's promise to Abraham that his aged and barren wife Sarah would bear him a son. Paul's summary is terse: neither the mothers nor the children are named. Barrett (1982: 161) has argued convincingly that Paul is responding to the agitators' interpretation of the Hagar–Sarah traditions. 'The wording implies that the story is already before the Galatians; they will know that the slave is Hagar, the free woman Sarah'. Paul explains that this is an allegory, a form of interpretation in which individuals and key details in a narrative all represent someone or something else. Allegorical interpretation was used by Philo of Alexandria, a slightly earlier contemporary of Paul's, as well as by some rabbis. Philo's allegories were more elaborate and less related to the original context than Paul's. Paul states boldly that the two women are 'two covenants' (v. 24) even though Gen 17:21 refers to only one covenant, the one that God promises to establish with Isaac, whom Sarah will bear to Abraham. In fact Paul does not refer explicitly to the Sarah covenant, and does not even name her. Paul focuses on Hagar, who is said to come from Mount Sinai, a detail not mentioned in Genesis. Paul's further comment about Hagar in v. 25 led to several attempts by scribes to clarify his point. The NRSV provides the more difficult and therefore probably original reading; a note in the NRSV provides an equally well-attested reading, 'For Sinai is a mountain in Arabia.'

The verb sustoixeo 'corresponds to' in v. 25 is the key to these verses. The verb was used to refer to soldiers standing in the same line; it came to refer to the correspondence of categories in lists. Paul lines up in the same column, as it were, Hagar, Mount Sinai, children being born (even now) into slavery, the present Jerusalem who is in slavery with her children (vv. 24–5). In the other column Paul places the free woman (the unnamed Sarah), the Jerusalem above who is free, and who is our mother (v. 26). Paul does not take pains to balance the two columns precisely, for his main interest is in the contrast between two 'Jeruselems'.

Earlier in his letter Paul has been at pains to stress his independence from the Jerusalem Christian leaders (1:18–20); in 25b a further step is taken: the church of Jerusalem to whose authority the agitators appealed 'is in slavery with her children'. Paul's polemic could hardly be more acute. In stark contrast stands 'the Jerusalem above, our mother'; here Paul draws on a theme found in several OT passages (e.g. Ps 87; Isa 50:1; 66:7–11) and in Jewish writings (e.g. 4 Ezra 10:25–57). The phrase 'our mother' is surely intended to include both Jewish and Gentile Christians. In v. 27 Paul appeals to Scripture ('it is written') to sustain his point. The preceding verses make it clear that Paul interprets Isa 54:1 as a reference to Sarah: her barrenness and desolation will be reversed, for she will bear more children than 'the one who is married', i.e. Hagar.

In v. 28 Paul's earlier frustration with the Galatians 4:19–21) gives way once again to endearment, 'my friends, you are children of the promise, like Isaac', who is now named for the first time. The contrast between Isaac and Ishmael (not named) becomes even sharper in v. 29. Paul draws attention to Ishmael's persecution of Isaac, a tradition not found in the OT itself, though several Jewish sources do mention an argument between the two. A parallel is drawn with the agitators' 'persecution' of the Galatian Christians: 'so it is now also'. v. 29 sets out a further vivid contrast: whereas Ishmael and the agitators were 'according to the flesh', Isaac and the Galatians were born 'according to the Spirit'. The Galatians' experience of the Spirit has been prominent in several earlier passages (3:1–5, 14; 4:6); the contrast between flesh and Spirit will be developed further in 5:5, 16–26.

Paul relentlessly pursues his case against the agitators with a further citation of Scripture in v. 30, where Gen 21:10 is adapted slightly to fit the present context. The argument reaches its climax in v. 31. By now the listeners in the Galatian churches should have been able to draw the conclusion themselves: they are children of the free woman, Sarah, and so are the true children of Abraham. The strong language of the citation, 'Drive out the slave and her child', should not be read as an attack on Judaism: Paul's attention is focused sharply on the agitators and their claims.

Gal 5:1 has baffled commentators in ancient as well as modern times. There are two related difficulties. Although the Greek of v. 1a is so awkward that early scribes made several attempts to tidy it up, there is now general agreement that the NRSV and similar translations are appropriate. Opinion is still keenly divided, however, on the relationship of v. 1 to its context. NRSV, REB, and many other translators and commentators appeal to the contrast between slavery and freedom as an obvious link to the preceding verses: v. 1 is taken as a ringing conclusion to the Hagar–Sarah allegory. Others, including NIV, see it as the opening of a new section in which Paul turns to exhortation, and note the link with 5:13. Still others take it as a short independent paragraph that acts as a bridge between the allegory and the new themes of chs. 5 and 6. On balance, the NRSV's punctuation is to be preferred.

Exhortations (5:2–6:10)

(5:2–12) Neither Circumcision nor Uncircumcision Paul opens this section with a solemn appeal to the Galatians: 'Mark my words' (REB). In these verses with their repeated references to circumcision, the central issue at stake in Paul's dispute with the agitators is brought out into the open. v. 2 implies that some of the Galatians are on the point of succumbing to the agitators' insistence that they should be circumcised if they wish to become true children of Abraham; v. 3 implies that some have already done so. Paul is adamant that two corollaries follow: Christ will benefit them no more, and they will be obliged to keep the whole law of Moses. Perhaps the agitators had not been frank about the latter point. There is plenty of evidence to confirm that Paul is not misrepresenting Jewish teaching in his insistence that the Galatians cannot pick and choose which parts of the law they will observe.

vv. 4 and 5 summarize many of Paul's key points: most of the phrases occur in 2:15–21, Paul's opening exposition of the chasm between being justified by the law and living by faith, through the Spirit. 'Hope' is not used elsewhere in this letter, though the general theme of waiting for future salvation is prominent. In v. 6 Paul quotes a formula that he himself has probably coined. The first half, 'neither circumcision nor uncircumcision counts for anything', is repeated almost verbatim in 6:15 and in 1 Cor 7:19, though in each case the positive statement that follows is expressed differently. In 6b faith and love are related more closely than elsewhere in Paul's letters. 'Faith working through love' rules out any suggestion that Paul's ethical teaching has no moral demands.

vv. 7–12 are linked together more loosely than vv. 2–6. Here Paul rattles off several different images, though they are all related to the overall argument. vv. 7 and 8 recall Paul's opening appeal in 1:6–9. The reference to Christian living as a running race echoes 2:2. The question, 'who prevented you?' probably also refers to running races: Who cut in on you, or who side-tracked you? Since God ('the one who calls you') is in no way responsible for this, the agitators are responsible (v. 8). They are likened in v. 9 to a little yeast which leavens the whole batch of dough, a well-known image in antiquity for the power of evil. v. 10b is taken by Martyn (1997: 475), as a reference to the leader of the agitators, 'the man who is disturbing your minds'. This is not impossible, but the NRSV's 'whoever it is that is confusing you' is preferable; as in 1:7, the reference is general. Why does Paul claim in v. 11 that he is still being persecuted? And when did Paul ever 'preach circumcision'? This verse is one of the most puzzling in this letter. Elsewhere in his letters (e.g. 1 Thess 2:16; 2 Cor 11:23–9) Paul mentions the persecution he received at the hands of his non-Christian opponents, but that is not in view here. In 4:29 Paul refers to the agitators as 'persecutors', and it is their actions which are referred to again here. They seem to have claimed mischievously or mistakenly that at some stage following his call to proclaim Christ to the Gentiles (1:15–16), Paul did 'preach circumcision'. How or why they gained that information, we do not know. Perhaps they had received a false rumour concerning the circumcision of Titus (2:3). Paul's logic is clear: the agitators still claim that he is 'preaching circumcision'. If that were the case, Paul insists, then the agitators' persecution of him would have ceased. But since it has not ceased, it must be based on misinformation. Paul is so angry with the agitators that in v. 12 he makes 'the crudest and rudest of all his extant statements' (Longenecker 1990: 234). Attempts to soften Paul's plain speaking, either by euphemisms or by interpreting these harsh words figuratively as 'let them excommunicate themselves', are unconvincing.

(5:13–26) Living by the Spirit Paul now turns to general exhortations which are not directly related to the crisis in Galatia, though there are numerous linguistic links with the preceding sections. This is clearly the case in v. 13: its ringing reference to God's call to freedom is in contrast to the 'yoke of slavery' the agitators are imposing (cf. 5:1). As in 5:6b, Paul is aware that unbridled freedom can lead to antinomianism; hence Paul's insistence on loving commitment to one another which is as strong a bond as slavery.

In v. 13 Paul uses the word 'flesh' (sarx), one of the most problematic words for the translator of his letters. Earlier in Galatians 'flesh' is used in a purely neutral sense to refer to human or physical nature, but in vv. 13, 16, 17 (twice), 19, 24, and 6:8, 'flesh' is used in a negative, ethical sense to refer to a person's sinful or corrupt nature. Should the translator attempt to replicate the quite different ways in which the word is used? REB uses 'unspiritual nature' or 'old nature' for the negative references to sarx, and several different phrases for the 'neutral' uses. NRSV signals the different way in which Paul uses sarx in this section by translating it as 'self-indulgence' in v. 13, before reverting to 'flesh' in the remainder of the section.

As in 4:21b, Paul speaks about the law of Moses positively in v. 14, and cites Lev 19:18, 'love your neighbour'. Earlier in the letter the law has consistently been referred to negatively. The NRSV's 'the whole law is summed up' is misleading, for the verb means 'fulfil'. What then is intended by 'fulfilling the whole law'? Barclay's comment is apt: it describes 'the total realization of God's will in line with the eschatological fullness of time in the coming of Christ' (1988: 40). Paul uses withering sarcasm in v. 15 to denounce in-fighting in the Galatian churches. This may perhaps have been sparked off by differing attitudes to the agitators' claims, but we cannot be sure.

'Living by the Spirit' and 'gratifying the desires of the flesh' are set in opposition to one another in v. 16 which acts as a heading to vv. 17–24. The bald statement of v. 16 is expounded in v. 17: the two ways of living are 'at war with one another' (Martyn 1997: 493). The final clause of v. 17 has long baffled exegetes. A plausible interpretation envisages that the battle between 'Spirit' and 'flesh' frustrates the wishes of the believer. In v. 18 being 'led by the Spirit' is contrasted with being 'subject to the law', themes prominent in several passages earlier in the letter (e.g. 2:16; 3:1–5; 4:6–7). In vv. 19–21 Paul sets out a list of 'the works of the flesh' (NRSV) or 'the behaviour that belongs to the unspiritual nature' (REB). In vv. 22–3 there is a list of the virtues that are the fruit of the Spirit. Lists of virtues and vices were well known in the Hellenistic world; there are partial parallels in Jewish 'two ways' traditions. While there are numerous lists of vices in the NT writings, there is no comparable juxtaposition of substantial lists of virtues and vices; perhaps the closest NT parallel is Jas 3:13–17. Although some translations list the vices of vv. 19–21 in groups, NRSV correctly treats them as a random list of 15 items. Paul rounds off the list with a solemn warning, which he says, repeats teaching he gave them earlier—presumably when he was present with them: ‘those who do such things will not inherit the kingdom of God’. Here Paul may be using a common early Christian catechetical formula, for the wording is not characteristically Pauline.

The phrase ‘fruit of the Spirit’ (v. 22) is evocative: ‘the fruit’ is not the result of the believer’s effort, but of the gift of the Spirit. The nine items in the list of virtues are often grouped into three groups of three, though it is doubtful whether this was Paul’s intention. In the light of the opening verses of this section (vv. 13, 14) we can be more confident that Paul deliberately placed ‘love’ at the head of the list.

vv. 24 and 25 bring the argument of this section to a climax. Believers who identify with the crucifixion of Christ (cf. 2:19) have ‘crucified the old nature’ (REB). v. 25 explains how this is possible: by living by the Spirit. Although this is taken by some as the beginning of the next section of Paul’s exhortations, it is better to interpret this verse (with NRSV) in conjunction with v. 24: these two verses focus on the chasm between ‘flesh’ and ‘Spirit’, the theme first set out in the ‘headline’ in v. 16. v. 26 is a rather bland exhortation, though v. 15 confirms that it was sorely needed in the Galatian churches.

(6:1–10) Let us Work for the Good of All Nearly every verse in this section includes an explicit exhortation, but the links between them are loose. Even more problematic is the extent to which these exhortations are related to the specific needs of the Galatian churches. Some insist that they are very general and quite unrelated to the main arguments of the letter, while others discern close links at almost every point. A mediating position is more plausible than either extreme: Paul has adapted well-known ethical maxims to meet the needs of the Galatian Christians. Many of the maxims in this section can be read as extended expositions of several of the fruits of the Spirit listed in 5:22–3. As we shall see below, there are further important links between this section and the latter half of ch. 5.

The opening maxim in v. 1 is very general. Translated literally, the Greek reads, ‘you who are spiritual’; this is taken by some to refer to a specific group within the Galatian churches. But earlier in the letter Paul has insisted that all Christians have received the Spirit (e.g. 3:1–5; 4:6), so the NRSV is appropriate: ‘You who have received the Spirit’. The ‘spirit of gentleness’ enjoined recalls ‘gentleness’, one of the fruits of the Spirit (5:23). Paul’s concern for the erring believer is paralleled in Mt 18:15 and Jas 5:19. What is the law of Christ which is to be fulfilled (v. 2)? Since ‘fulfilling the law’ in 5:14 refers to the law of Moses, the use of the similar verb here strongly suggests that ‘law’ here also refers to the law of Moses—as ‘redefined and fulfilled by Christ in love’ (Barclay 1988: 134, 141). Dunn (1993: 323) is even more specific: ‘it means that law (Torah) as interpreted by the love command in the light of the Jesus-tradition and the Christ-event’. The maxims in vv. 3–5 come as something of an anticlimax after the rich exhortations of vv. 1–2. Perhaps they are partly related to weaknesses Paul is aware of in the Galatian churches. Or perhaps they are general maxims which have their place in nearly every community setting.

NRSV places v. 6 in a paragraph on its own, for this exhortation does not seem to be related either to those that precede or to those that follow. In 1 Cor 9:14 the right of preachers to be supported financially is asserted. This verse is rather different. It refers in general terms to the support (which surely included financial support) to be given by those under instruction in the faith to their teachers. In vv. 7–8 Paul adapts proverbial statements well known in antiquity, adding his own distinctive theological emphases. The sharp contrast between ‘flesh’ and ‘Spirit’ in v. 8 is in effect a summary of 5:16–25. The eschatological warning of 5:21c is echoed in the future tenses in v. 8, ‘you will reap corruption / eternal life’, and in the reference to reaping at harvest-time in v. 9.

By using the phrase ‘so then’, Paul indicates that v. 10 rounds off the series of exhortations which began at 5:13. The encouragement to the Galatian Christians to ‘work for the good of all’ encapsulates a bold vision. The churches in Galatia were tiny minorities in the societies in which they lived. As this letter emphasizes repeatedly, they had their own internal tensions and conflicts. But here they are urged to strive for the well-being of all without distinction. That special concern should be shown for those of the ‘household of faith’ is understandable.

Conclusion (6:11–18)

The final sentences of Paul’s letters usually summarize and press home its key points. Galatians is no exception. Betz (1979: 313) correctly notes that these verses are the hermeneutical key to the whole letter. Unlike Paul’s other letters, there are no personal greetings. This is as significant as the absence of the expected thanksgiving at 1:6 (Gal 1:6). In both cases a ready explanation is provided by the strained relationships between Paul and the Galatians.

Paul takes over from his amanuensis for the final sentences (cf. also 1 Cor 16:21; Col 4:18; 2 Thess 3:17; Philem 19). The reference to the ‘large letters’ he makes when writing himself is probably not a reference to his clumsy handwriting. When this letter was read aloud in the Galatian churches (1:2), the listeners would not have been aware of the change in handwriting. ‘Large letters’ probably signals the importance of the words which follow.

In vv. 12–13 Paul attacks the agitators explicitly and provides his own reasons for their insistence on circumcision. In claiming that they ‘want to make a good showing in the flesh’ Paul may be employing ‘barbed humor, inviting the Galatians to laugh at the Teachers’ (Martyn 1997: 561). It is not easy to see why an insistence on circumcision would enable them to avoid persecution. Were they currying favour with a powerful ultra-conservative group in the Jerusalem church (ibid. 562), or with a group of non-believing Jews who were incensed at the way Gentiles were being accepted into the ‘people of God’, i.e. as proselytes, without circumcision? We do not know. Paul claims that the agitators do not themselves obey the law (13a): they cannot pick and choose which parts of the law to observe (cf. also 5:3). Paul’s final jibe is that his opponents are boasting about their success in persuading some of the Galatians to undergo circumcision (13c). There is an appropriate form of boasting, however: Christ crucified (14a; cf. 3:1). For Paul the cross of Christ entails a radical break with 'the world'. Paul is not advocating a sectarian separation from the world, as 6:10 confirms; living by the Spirit entails the crucifixion of the flesh with its passions and desires (5:16, 24).

v. 15 is one of several very rich theological statements in the letter. It echoes 5:6, but caps the earlier verse with the claim that in Christ God is bringing about a new creation. The terse phrase, 'there is a new creation' is expounded in 2 Cor 5:17: the old order has passed away, everything has become new. In v. 16 Paul extends the blessing of God's peace and mercy upon those who follow this standard or rule, i.e. that there is a new creation in which the distinction between circumcised and uncircumcised is abolished.

The final phrase of v. 16 has evoked considerable discussion. Does Paul call down God's blessing upon a second group, 'the Israel of God', as well as upon those who follow the rule he has just enunciated? This interpretation is adopted by the NRSV: 'and upon the Israel of God'. Or does Paul refer boldly to Christian believers as the Israel of God? If so, the 'and' is understood as explanatory: 'that is to say', or 'namely'. The latter interpretation is now widely accepted. If Paul does refer here to Christians as the Israel of God, what becomes of non-believing Israel? This issue does not surface in Galatians, though in due course Paul did grapple with it in Rom 9–11. In v. 17 Paul refers to the marks (stigmata) he bore on his body as a result of the hostility he experienced as an apostle of Christ (cf. 2 Cor 11:23–30). There may be an undercurrent of irony: it is 'the marks of Jesus' rather than the mark of circumcision which Paul bears proudly. Although the final verse is similar to the final benedictions found at the end of all Paul's letters, the reference to the grace of Christ is particularly poignant in view of the content of the letter as a whole; it echoes the opening reference in 1:6 to God's call 'in the grace of Christ'.

REFERENCES

- Barclay, J. M. G. (1987), 'Mirror Reading a Polemical Letter: Galatians as a Test Case', JSNT 3: 73–93.
 — (1988), Obedying the Truth: A Study of Paul's Ethics in Galatians (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
 Barrett, C. K. (1982), Essays on Paul (London: SPCK).
 Betz, H. D. (1979), Galatians: A Commentary on Paul's Letter to the Churches in Galatia, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
 Dunn, J. D. G. (1993), The Epistle to the Galatians, BNTC (London: A. & C. Black).
 Hengel, M., and Schwemer, A. M. (1997), Paul Between Damascus and Antioch: the Unknown Years (London: SCM).
 Kern, P. H. (1998), Rhetoric and Galatians, SNTSMS 101 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
 Longenecker, R. N. (1990), Galatians, WBC 41 (Dallas: Word).
 Martyn, J. L. (1997), Galatians, AB 33A (New York: Doubleday).
 Meeks, W. (1983), The First Urban Christians: the Social World of the Apostle Paul (New Haven: Yale University Press).
 O'Brien, P. T. (1977), Introductory Thanksgivings in the Letters of Paul, NovTSup 49 (Leiden: Brill).
 Scott, J. M. (1992), Adoption as Sons of God, WUNT 2/48 (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck]).

68. Ephesians

J. D. G. DUNN

INTRODUCTION

The letter to the Ephesians is one of the most attractive documents in the NT and one to which many Christians turn when low in spirit. Its mood of elevated composure, sustained prayer, and uninhibited confidence in God (particularly chs. 1 and 3), and its vision of the church, united, growing to maturity and loved (chs. 2, 4, 5) have been uplifting and inspiring for countless individuals and communities over the centuries. This character and quality of the letter is unaffected by the disputes over its authorship and purpose.

A. Distinctive Features of Ephesians. 1. In comparison with the other Pauline letters, however, Ephesians is something of a puzzle. Unlike all the others, it is not directed to a particular church or situation or person. The words 'in Ephesus' (1:1), which most modern translations still include, are not present in the earliest and best MSS; and second-century references to the letter do not know it as sent to Ephesus (see Best 1987). The lack of specified addressees in the original text and absence of Paul's normal list of greetings are confirmed by the absence of reference to particular situations or problems known or reported to the author. This raises the question whether it was intended as a circular or catholic letter, rather like James and 1 Peter, though in these cases particular recipients are still specified.

2. The style of the letter (particularly chs. 1–3) is pleonastic, that is, marked by repetitions and redundancies. Note for example the long sentences which constitute 1:3–14 and 4:11–16 (single sentences in Greek), and the repetition and piling up of adjectives, phrases, and clauses such as we find in 1:17–19, 2:13–18, and 3:14–19. Anyone familiar with the other Pauline letters will recognize that Ephesians is exceptional on this point. If written at the same time as the other 'prison epistles' (including Philippians and Philemon), these differences become all the more striking. And if written by an unnamed amanuensis or secretary, the latter had far more scope for free composition than any of Paul's previous secretaries.

3. In some way most striking of all is the exceptionally close relationship between Ephesians and Colossians (see Mitton 1951: 279–315). Compare particularly:

Eph.	Col.	Eph.	Col.
1:15–17	1:3–4, 9–10	5:5–6	3:5–6
2:5	2:13	5:19–20	3:16
2:16	1:20–2	5:22, 25	3:18–19
4:2	3:12	6:5–9	3:22–4:1
4:16	2:19	6:21–2	4:7.
4:31–2	3:8, 12

Such identical phraseology can be explained only if both letters were written at the same time, or, more likely (given the differences already noted), by one letter deliberately drawing upon the other. Most scholars have concluded that the character of the interdependence is best explained as Ephesians using Colossians, in part at least, as a model.

Given such features, it is hard to avoid the question: is Ephesians really a letter? Or is it better explained as a meditative and expansive summary of what Paul stood for, with his characteristic letter openings and closings added to preserve this homage to Paul appropriately in the most characteristic Pauline form?

B. Was the Letter Written by Paul? 1. The traditional view, from the second century onwards, is certainly in the affirmative. The writer names himself as Paul in both 1:1 and 3:1. But for the past 200 years the issue has been disputed, and though several prominent contemporary scholars still hold to Pauline authorship (e.g. Barth 1974 and Bruce 1984), the majority have concluded that it was most probably written by someone else. In addition to the considerations already noted, two other features have carried weight.

2. The perspective seems to be second generation: 'the apostles' are looked back to as the foundation period (2:20) and designated as especially 'holy' (3:5). The self-reference in 3:1–13 at first looks to be strong evidence of Pauline authorship, but as we read through the paragraph the measure of boasting goes well beyond what Paul had previously claimed for his own role, and sounds more and more like a eulogy penned by an ardent admirer (cf. 1 Tim 1:15–16). Even with 3:1 and 4:1, the addition of the definite article turns the humble self-designation of Philem 1 and 9 ('a prisoner of Christ Jesus') into something more like a title ('the prisoner of Christ Jesus', 'the prisoner in the Lord').

3. The theological perspective also seems to have moved beyond that of the earlier Paulines, and even that of Colossians. In particular, the cosmic Christology of Col 1:17–19 seems to have developed into the cosmic ecclesiology of Eph 1:22–3. The 'church', characteristically the local church (in house, city, or region) in the earlier Paulines, is now (for the first time) understood consistently as the universal church. The talk of grace and faith in 2:5, 8–9, certainly has a Pauline ring, but the characteristic Pauline concern regarding the law in such talk is missing: the reference in 2:9 is to 'works', not 'works of the law'; the law is mentioned only briefly in 2:15. And the eschatology is more consistently 'realized': 'salvation' is an accomplished act (2:5, 8; 6:17); they are already raised and seated with Christ 'in the heavenly places' (2:6); there is no reference to Christ's coming again (contrast 4:15).

4. All in all, the evidence is most consistent with the hypothesis that the letter was written by a disciple of Paul some time after Paul's death, presumably writing to celebrate Paul's faith and apostolic achievement and using Colossians in part as a kind of template. If, alternatively, it was Paul who composed it, we would have to envisage a Paul who had so modified his perspective and style that it comes to the same thing; that is, in effect, 'the late Paul' is little different from 'the disciple of Paul'.

C. The Issue of Pseudepigraphy. 1. Many feel uncomfortable with the view that the letter was not composed by Paul himself. Since the letter claims to be written by Paul, does the denial of Pauline authorship not amount to a questioning of the letter's integrity? And does an author who falsely claims to be someone else not forfeit our confidence in what he has written? The issue of pseudepigraphy (falsely attributed writing) seems to undermine any claim to inspiration or canonical authority for the letter.

2. The problem is serious for today's use of such a letter since it seems to attribute an immoral motive to the real author. We today take for granted the conventions of copyright and that plagiarism is unacceptable. When someone writes in another's name, therefore, we naturally assume an intention on his part to deceive, to claim falsely an authority for his writing which he himself did not possess. It needs to be remembered, however, that the conventions of copyright are a relatively recent formulation (a consequence of the invention of printing). At the time when Ephesians was written there was no clear or legal conception of authorial ownership of a piece of writing. Once written, a document was in the public domain and could be used and reused, excerpted and expanded without attribution of source and without any thought of wrongdoing. In the NT itself we may cite Matthew's use of Mark or 2 Peter's use of Jude.

3. More to the point, the history of the formation of the biblical books themselves is a clear indication that disciples and successors of the originator of highly valued tradition were able to develop that tradition in the name of its originator. Writings such as the Pentateuch and Isaiah are generally recognized to be the work of several hands over a lengthy period. The Wisdom of Solomon and the corpus known as 1 Enoch could be attributed to those named as authors long after their death, without any thought of deceit. The teaching of Jesus could be elaborated differently by the different Evangelists without any sense of impropriety.

4. Ephesians makes best sense within this tradition. A close associate or disciple of Paul, who stood within the tradition begun by Paul and was recognized to do so, was seen to represent the Pauline tradition after Paul's death and was able to re-express it in some measure in his own terms. And he did so in Paul's name, without deceit; his words were acknowledged to be appropriate sentiments to ascribe to Paul. In other words, Ephesians probably represents the Pauline heritage some little time after Paul's death as seen from within. It expresses, we may say, the transition from Paul to Pauline.

D. To Whom, From Where, When, and Why. 1. Were the letter written by Paul we could date it firmly to the early 60s, presumably from his imprisonment in Rome, and not long before his death. Would it then have been a general letter to his churches? If so, why should that purpose not be indicated? And if it was a final summation of his message we might have expected it to come more in the form of a final testament (cf. Acts 20:18–35).

2. In the light of the above conclusions, however, the more obvious answer is that Ephesians is a meditative tract on Paul's theology, teaching, and significance in the form of a Pauline letter; for unspecified use, but probably to be read in church gatherings for worship and teaching; and written some time after Paul's death, but by someone close to him, and so within ten or so years of his death (that is, some time in the 70s or 80s). The close link with Colossians, the mention of Tychicus in particular (6:21–2), and the fact that the churches of the province of Asia attracted other letters over the following decades (Rev 2–3; Ignatius) suggests that it was written in Asia, and in the event became most closely associated with Ephesus in particular.

3. More specific purposes have been suggested: for example, an early attempt to draw in Gnostic ideas, or to provide a covering letter for an early collection of Paul's letters. However, nothing in the letter itself gives any real support to such views. At best we can deduce that the churches addressed continued to be concerned about Christianity's identity as Israel's heir and about the proper integration of Jews and Gentiles within the church.

E. The Message of Ephesians in Summary. 1. The great theme of the first three chapters is God: God whose purpose embraces all time and space and comes to focus in Christ. It is because the readers' faith and life is centred in this Christ ('in Christ' is a repeated theme) that they can have such confidence in God, based as it is both on God's resurrection of Christ from the dead and their own experience of his Holy Spirit and grace (ch. 1).

2. At the heart of God's universal purpose from eternity has been the retrieval of humanity from its state of death, the abolition of the divided state of humanity, and the bringing of all things to unity in Christ. Seen from a Jewish perspective, that deadness and dividedness had its principal manifestation in the disadvantaged state of Gentiles as contrasted with Jews. But Christ's death rendered that old division null and void and has made possible a reconciled and united community held together by Christ, which as a whole enjoys the privileges previously confined to Israel and so can function as the household of God, the place where God continues to meet with humankind (ch. 2). This reconciliation of Jew and Gentile within the gracious purpose of God was at the heart of the divine mystery which Paul in particular had been given the commission to unveil to all (ch. 3). The fact that the church is so much the medium now for the outworking of this purpose of God makes its unity and its proper working as facilitated by the ministry gifts given it all the more important. Only as it functions as the body of Christ and grows up into Christ can it fulfil the universal and cosmic role earlier ascribed to it (4:1–16).

3. Right functioning of the church also depends on believers living as the church in the world and walking in the light, with all the specific moral commitment, both positive and negative, implied. Conduct and relationships modelled on those of Christ are also part of the restoration of creation to serve its original purpose. The enabling of the Spirit in shared worship remains indispensable (4:17–5:20).

4. Particularly important, as the basic unit of society, are households and their several relationships; here too Christian households should have Christ as model and resource and thus provide a test bed for society in re-creation. At no time should they forget that they were involved in a spiritual warfare nor fail to maintain the appropriate equipment and co-operation (chs. 5:21–6:20).

F. The structure of Ephesians.

Greeting (1:1–2)

The Great Prayer and Meditation (1:3–3:21)

The Blessing of God (1:3–14)

Paul's Prayer (1:15–23)

A Reminder of What God Has Already Done in Them (2:1–10)

The New Humanity (2:11–22)

Paul's Stewardship of the Great Mystery (3:1–13)

The Opening Prayer Resumed (3:14–21)

The Exhortation (4:1–6:20)

The Church in its Calling and Confession (4:1–6)

The Character and Purpose of Ministry in the Body of Christ (4:7–16)

How to Live as the Church in the World (4:17–32)

Walking in the Light (5:1–20)

Household Rules (5:21–6:9)

Put on the Armour of God (6:10–20)

Conclusion and Benediction (6:21–4)

COMMENTARY

(1:1–2) Greeting It is typical of Paul that he adapts the normal letter address, 'X to Y, greeting' (Gk.) or 'peace' (Jewish). He emphasizes his apostleship (cf. 2 Cor 1:1; Col 1:1). He stresses the status of the recipients: they have been set apart for God ('saints') (cf. e.g. Rom 1:1; 1 Cor 1:1) and live by trust in God ('faithful') (as in Col 1:2). He transforms the Greek greeting (chairein) into the rich Christian term 'grace' (charis), and combines it with the equally rich Jewish concept of peace, wishing them the continued experience of God's generous favour ('grace') and all that makes for communal well-being ('peace'). On 'in Ephesus' see EPH. A.1.

The Great Prayer and Meditation (1:3–3:21)

(1:3–14) The Blessing of God This is one of the most beautiful passages in the Bible. It is unlike anything else in the Pauline letters (the nearest parallel is 2 Cor 1:3–11). In the Greek it can be punctuated as a single sentence. The repetition of key words, the piling up of phrases, and the circling round and steady enrichment of the central theme gives it a depth and resonance unsurpassed in Christian praise. It is a word to return to, to rest upon, to rejoice in, and not least, to enjoy. It should have been put to great music long before now.

It begins by sketching in the circle of blessing (v. 3). That circle starts with God. The word for 'blessed' (eulogētos) here is used only of God in the NT (e.g. Mk 14:61; Rom 1:25); it indicates that nothing more wonderful can be imagined or spoken of than God. Characteristic of this blessedness is that it reaches out to embrace God's human creatures ('with every spiritual blessing'). The circle is complete when those thus blessed affirm its source and resource in God.

This blessing is four-dimensional. It reaches from the beginning of time: chosen 'before the foundation of the world' (v. 4); predestined in love (v. 5; cf. Rom 8:29–30); the divine mystery (v. 9), that is, God's original but hidden purpose, now revealed (see 3:3–6); predestined and appointed (v. 11). And it reaches to the end of time: a plan for the fullness of time (God's appointed hour) to sum up everything in Christ (v. 10; see 1:20–3); the Spirit as the guarantee of the inheritance and the final redemption of God's own possession (v. 14). Here again the stress is on God's overarching purpose in control from the first—his good pleasure and will (vv. 5, 9), 'according to [his] purpose . . . according to his counsel and will' (v. 11).

Spatial imagery is also prominent. The blessings in which believers already share are those 'in the heavenly places' (v. 3), where the symbolism of higher (heavens above earth) denotes greater bliss in a way more problematic for modern readers (see also 6:12). The final union will embrace everything in the heavens and in the earth (v. 10). Most striking of all, however, is the repeated emphasis on the location and means of this blessing as 'in him (Christ)', a phrase which occurs no less than ten times (also 'through Jesus Christ'—v. 5).

The conviction is clear: that the whole of God's purpose from the beginning focuses in and through Christ (vv. 4, 9, 11–12); that Jesus and his death were the means by which personal liberation (redemption) and the forgiveness for wrongs done had been genuinely experienced (v. 7); that Jesus himself is the 'place' in which the blessings of heaven and the Spirit are to be known in the here and now, so that the very term 'Christian' denotes a life (and death) bound up with his (vv. 3, 5, 13–14); and, not least, that Christ in a real sense constitutes the hope for the world and final reconciliation, its climax and summation point (vv. 9–10).

The blessings themselves are indicated in a series of evocative phrases: 'holy and blameless before him in love' (v. 4); adoption as God's children (cf. Gal 4:5–7), formerly estranged (v. 5); 'redemption', the image of the costly liberation of slave or captive (cf. Rom 3:24; 1 Cor 6:19–20), and the experience of forgiveness for conscience-nagging wrongs committed (v. 7; cf. Col 1:14); knowledge and sense of personal involvement in God's purpose (v. 9); an awareness of being chosen by God (v. 11); a conviction as to the truth of the gospel and of the 'salvation' (wholeness) it brings (v. 13; cf. 1 Thess 1:5); and the experience of being marked out by the Spirit as belonging to God (the function of a 'seal')—the reference will be to the impact made by the Spirit (as e.g. in Rom 5:5; 1 Cor 6:9–11), rather than to baptism—and of the assurance the Spirit brings (cf. Rom 8:14–16), as being the first instalment and guarantee of the complete redemption/liberation still to come (vv. 13–14; cf. Rom 8:23; 2 Cor 1:21–2).

But the blessing is primarily directed to God. He is the subject of the main active verbs ('blessed, chose, destined...'). His love embraces the trustful in the sonship of the Beloved (vv. 4–6; cf. Rom 8:15–17, 29). It is his grace (the same word as in v. 2), the same outpouring of divine generosity which is the fountainhead of all human wellbeing ('his grace with which he has engrafted us... in accordance with the riches of his grace which he has lavished upon us', vv. 6–8, my tr.). He 'accomplishes all things according to his counsel and will' (v. 11). And all is 'to the praise of his glory' (vv. 6, 12, 14)—human bliss from beginning to end dependent on human recognition that God is the be-all and end-all.

It is important to note how characteristically Jewish is the language and thought. To begin a prayer to God with the evocation of his blessedness is distinctively Jewish (e.g. Ps 41:13; 72:18–19; the great Jewish prayer, the Eighteen Benedictions, 'Blessed are you, O Lord...', go back to Jesus' time). God's unconditional choice (v. 4) was fundamental to Israel's self-understanding (e.g. Deut 7:6–8). 'The Beloved' (v. 6) was a favourite name for Israel (e.g. Deut 33:12; Isa 5:1). The time perspective of the benediction is distinctive of Jewish apocalypses—the assurance that God's mysterious purpose is working towards its climax despite all human failure and catastrophe (vv. 9–10; cf. e.g. Dan 2:21; Mk 1:15); the Qumran community shared a similar conviction that the hidden mysteries had been revealed to them (EPH 3:1–13). And not least, there is the writer's sense that he and his readers (Gentiles included) had been embraced within the divine purpose which began with and worked through Israel: the purpose was that they should be numbered with the 'saints', the ones set apart to God (a title for Israel—e.g. Ps 16:3; 34:9), and without blemish, like Israel's sacrifices (v. 4; cf. e.g. Lev 1:3, 10; Ps 15:2); they had been appointed (lit. given a share) in Israel's 'inheritance' (vv. 11, 14), two words which would have evoked for any Jewish reader thought of the land, seed, and blessing promised to Abraham (cf. Gen 12:2–3; Deut 32:9; Jer 10:16); they were God's 'possession' (cf. Ex 19:5; Deut 14:2).

The difference is indicated, however, in the repeated 'in him'. This is the amazing feature of the benediction—the confidence and conviction that Jesus has been and is the key to unlock the mystery of God's purpose and to bring it into effect, for Gentile as well as Jew. Christianity today, long heir of elaborate creeds and dogmas regarding Christ, can scarcely appreciate what astounding claims were being made—that one who had lived only a generation or so earlier could thus unfold and embody the wonder of God's grace. So we find it equally hard to appreciate the impact which Jesus and then the message about Jesus must have made upon such hearers in the ancient Mediterranean world. It was a conviction which was not merely intellectual: the believing was matched by an experience of forgiveness, of being engrafted, and of the Spirit beginning the process of reclamation of human life and community for God (vv. 7–8, 13–14). But evidently the gospel thus focused on Jesus made such sense of reality, of the whole complex of time and space, of cosmos and history, that he could be thus seen at the centre of both cosmos and history, as the one who explained the all, and always 'to the praise of God's glory'.

(1:15–23) Paul's Prayer It was conventional in ancient letters to add a thanksgiving and prayer on behalf of those to whom the letter was sent (in Paul cf. particularly Rom 1:8–15; 1 Cor 1:4–9; Col 1:3–8). The opening words here (vv. 15–16) are typical of Paul and may indeed be modelled on Philom 4–5 and Col 1:3–4. The thanksgiving had in view particularly the two-sidedness of the readers' new relationships—faith in the Lord Jesus and love for all the saints (the 'all' might need some emphasis). Characteristic of Paul too was the habit of regular 'mention' of his converts in his prayers (Rom 1:9; Phil 1:3; 1 Thess 1:2).

But the prayer which follows surpasses anything else in Paul's letters, as rich as the preceding blessing and stretching the expectation of hope and the imagination of faith still further.

It is directed to God (not to Christ). He indeed is described as 'the God of our Lord Jesus Christ' (v. 17), with the recognition that Jesus, even in the fullness of his exalted Lordship, still acknowledges God as his God (cf. 1 Cor 15:24–8). This Christian faith, including the mind-blowing Christology of 1:22–3, is still monotheistic through and through. It is God who has done all the great work of salvation in Christ (vv. 19–23) and in whom hope is focused (vv. 17–18). He is 'the Father of glory' (v. 17; cf. Acts 7:2; Rom 6:4); the phrase should not be reduced to 'glorious Father' but should be allowed to resonate with all the overtones of God as the progenitor of all that is glorious and splendid (including v. 18). The richness of this divine resource is a repeated theme (vv. 7, 18–19; 2:4, 7; 3:8, 16).

The intercession falls into two parts. First for knowledge (vv. 17–19), knowledge being fundamental to well-being. The very diversity of the language (wisdom, revelation, knowledge, illumination) is a reminder that there are different kinds of knowledge. Here most in view is the knowledge which comes through an experience of revelation, of eyes being opened, and through the experience of personal relationship with God ('the eyes of your heart enlightened' is a wonderfully evocative phrase). When knowledge is reduced to knowledge of facts or of information which can be humanly discovered it will always be deficient for living (cf. Col. 1:9–11). Only in its richer form, dependent on inspiration from on high, does knowledge become wisdom (the echo of Isa 11:2 will be deliberate).

Here, however, the thought is directed more to the future: 'the hope to which he [God] has called you' (v. 18), a 'calling' (both invitation and summons) elaborated in the talk of the rich inheritance to be shared with the saints (see v. 14). When hope is based on such knowledge it can indeed be firm and confident. As in Col 1:4–5, so here, hope is not far from faith and love (cf. 1 Cor 13:13).

The second part (vv. 20–3) reflects further on the working of this great might of God: hope can be confident (v. 18) because the power at work in human experience (v. 19) is the same power which raised up Christ from the dead and exalted him as God's 'right-hand man'. The language was already credal (e.g. Acts 3:15; 13:30; Rom 10:9; 1 Thess 1:10) and the use of Ps 110:1 as a way of understanding what had happened to the risen Christ was well-established (e.g. Acts 2:34–5; Rom 8:34; 1 Pet 3:22). But it is here elaborated in an exceptional way.

The thought that Christ was thus set 'in the heavenly places' is peculiar to Ephesians (1:3, 20; 2:6). But the further thought that he was already dominant over all powers, both present and future, takes up Ps 110:1 combined with Ps 8:6 (1:20–2; a combination we find also in 1 Cor 15:25–7 and Heb 1:12–2:8). The combination is powerful since it links the idea of Jesus as the man/son of man who fulfils God's purpose for humanity as the climax of creation (Ps 8:4–6; cf. Heb 2:6–9) with that of Jesus as David's greater son given a share in God's sovereign rule (Ps 110:1; cf. Mk 12:35–7). The conviction obviously carried with it a psychological liberation from fear of the nameless forces which shape human existence (see 2:2 and 6:10–20). What a one was this Jesus that the note struck by his life, death, and resurrection should have had such continuing resonance and deepening reverberations in the subsequent decades.

If that was a challenging enough linkage, the final clauses (vv. 22–3) almost baffle comprehension (the major commentaries spend several pages discussing them). The climax of what God did 'in Christ' (v. 20) was to give him as 'head over all things for the church, which is his body' (vv. 22–3). The metaphor of the church as Christ's body goes back to 1 Cor 12 and Rom 12:4–8, and will later be elaborated with the idea of Christ as the head of the body (4:15–16). But here the thought is of Christ as head of all reality, given by God to or for the church (cf. Col 1:17–18). That would be a difficult enough thought, though 'head' can mean both 'ruler' and 'source' (fountainhead), and so Christ could be portrayed as embodying or epitomizing the rationale and pattern of divine creation. 'Given to/for the church' could then mean simply (!) that the church, here the universal church, had, through its faith in Christ and the God who worked through Christ, been given the key to understanding reality and enabled to rise above all that threatened human and social life.

The chief problem is the final clause, what it means and how it relates to what has gone before—'the fullness of him who fills all in all'. Does it refer to Christ or to the church? Does it draw on ideas familiar from later Gnostic texts—Christ as a kind of cosmic being which comprises the totality of sentient reality? The answer is probably that the writer has been carried away by his language and imagery and is playing on the familiar Jewish thought of God or God's Spirit as filling the cosmos (Jer 23:24; Wis 1:7; cf. Ps 139:7). Christ now embodies that fullness (cf. Col 1:19; 2:9). And the church, his body, is (or should be!) the place where God's presence in and purpose for creation comes to its clearest expression. Would that it were so!

(2:1–10) A Reminder of What God Has Already Done in Them This is one of the most forceful statements in the Bible regarding the human condition apart from God's grace and the way in which that grace operates for salvation.

The human condition apart from grace is described in vv. 1–3 in a series of vivid clauses; note the balance between a certain givenness of human character, social conditioning, and individual responsibility. (1) They had been 'dead through trespasses and sins' (vv. 1, 5; cf. Col 2:13). 'Death' is but one metaphor among many; others include 'weak' and 'enemies' (Rom 5:6, 10; cf. Eph 2:14–16). And the experience of grace (in conversion) can itself be likened to a dying (Rom 6:5–11). But a life enmeshed in its breaches of the moral code (transgressions) and repeated failings (sins) can well be likened to a state of death, where promptings of divine grace and love evoke no real response (cf. Luke 15:24; Rom 7:7–11—'I died'). (2) Their daily conduct had been determined by the standards of society (cf. Rom 12:2), the spirit of the age (v. 2). The latter metaphor is unique in the NT ('the ruler of the power of the air'; cf. Jn 12:31 and Acts 26:18), and draws on the common understanding of the day that hostile spiritual forces influenced or determined human behaviour (hence 6:11–17). We still today speak, for example, of a criminal 'underworld' and often enough feel ourselves victims of forces, some apparently malevolent in character, that we cannot control. (3) Human responsibility becomes more evident in the talk of a life conducted 'in the passions of our flesh, following the desires of flesh and senses' (v. 3; cf. Col 3:5, 7; Titus 3:3; 1 Pet 1:14). By 'flesh' Paul means the weakness of the physical constitution (flesh decays); life lived at that level, devoted to feeding human appetites (food, sex, power), is a life lived apart from God, subject to the law of diminishing returns and the law of increasing subservience to self-indulgent habit (cf. Gal 5:16–21). According to Rom 1:18–32, this circle of sin-begetting-sin is also an expression of divine wrath just as is the final judgement (Rom 2:5; cf. Col 3:6). To be noted is the fact that the writer no longer speaks of 'you', as in 2:2; Christian Jews as well as Christian Gentiles are 'by nature children of wrath' (v. 3, 'all of us'; v. 5, 'we'), all equally dependent on the initiative of divine grace (cf. 2:10).

Still more, however, is said about the way in which grace had worked to change both character and context. Again, it should be noted, as throughout ch. 1, the initiative is God's from start to finish: 'But God . . .' (v. 4). It is his mercy, love—'rich in mercy [cf. Rom 11:30–2], out of the great love with which he loved us' (cf. Rom 5:8)—and thrice-mentioned grace (vv. 5, 7, 8) which has been decisive. And the effective medium of God's action has been Christ—'with Christ' (v. 5), 'in Christ Jesus' (vv. 6, 7, 10). The three elements in the preceding analysis are in effect taken up one by one, in each case emphasizing the role of grace and of Christ.

(1) The state of deadness in trespasses and sins has been transformed—'made alive with Christ' (v. 5). This is the language of resurrection (Jn 5:21; 8:11; 1 Cor 15:22); the final proof of God's creative power is that he overcomes death (Rom 4:17). The idea of conversion as being bound up with Christ's death, so that Christ through his death becomes as it were a passageway to new life, is prominent elsewhere in the NT (e.g. Gal 2:19–20; 1 Tim 2:11; Heb 2:9–11). In the earlier Pauline letters the thought of sharing also in Christ's resurrection is reserved for the 'not yet' future (Rom 6:5; 8:11), but here, as in Col 2:13, that too is referred to the 'already' of conversion. It is a logical development to describe the new life experienced through the Spirit (Jn 6:63; 2 Cor 3:6) as a sharing in Christ's life, that is, his risen life. Whatever the finer points of theology, however, conversion was evidently experienced in the early days of Christianity as life-giving, life-changing.

(2) Countering the captivity to 'the ruler of the power of the air', God had not only raised them with Christ to new life, but also raised them with Christ to the heavenly places (v. 6; see 1:3). The astonishing claim was necessary, perhaps, to break the previous psychological dependency. Implicit, then, is the conviction that their lives now focused in and through Christ had in effect risen above the old captivating influences of the present world (cf. Gal 6:14; Col 2:15), or at least need have no fear of any such power (Rom 8:31–9). But more explicit here is the thought that they (writer and readers) were as it were trophies of grace to make clear to everyone the overwhelming generosity of God's purpose and its most effective implementation in and through Christ (v. 7).

(3) The answer to lives dominated by human weakness and self-indulgence is the recognition that salvation is given by grace, through faith, the very opposite of human contriving or manipulation—as a gift of God (v. 8). The language is very Pauline, but the thought has shifted somewhat from the earlier letters. (a) Salvation is here spoken of as a completed act, whereas earlier on Paul spoke of it as future (Rom 5:9–10; 13:11; 1 Cor 3:15), and of Christians as those 'being saved' (1 Cor 1:18; 2 Cor 2:15). There salvation covered the whole process of renewal and final redemption (Rom 8:23); here the thought is of the decisive character of what Christ has done and of the commitment to him and bound-up-ness with him. (b) Earlier too the talk of 'works' was always of 'the works of the law', that which was obligatory upon Jews as members of the covenant people—the key question being whether and how much of these laws were obligatory for Gentile believers. To which Paul had replied that only faith was necessary (Rom 3:19–20, 27–31; 9:30–2; Gal 2:15–16). Here the thought is broadened, or deepened. By 'works' the author here seems to mean any product of human effort: salvation is wholly and solely a 'gift' (v. 8). There is no scope for boasting in oneself, only in God (v. 9); the 'turned-in-upon-onself-ness' of the old life (v. 3) has been given a new focus and orientation. The outcome is a complete contrast to the old way of life—God's handiwork, a new creation on the template of Christ, 'good works' such as God had made humankind for in the beginning (v. 10; cf. 4:24; 1 Cor 3:10–15). There should be a contrast, should there not, between a life lived by grace, through faith, in Christ (v. 10), and a life determined by the desires of flesh and mind (v. 3)?

(2:11–22) The New Humanity The same ground is covered again in a second review of the readers' transition from past to present (cf. 5:8). This time, however, the review is not from the more general perspective (death to life) but from the Jewish perspective on Gentile disqualification from grace. The assumption is that God's saving purpose for humankind had been worked out through Israel, that Gentiles had hitherto been strangers to that promise, but that now through Christ the blessing of access to God and peace with God was open to all. The resulting new reality (the 'new humanity', v. 15) is sometimes understood as a third race (Christians) replacing the old division of the world into Jews and Gentiles (Lincoln 1990: 144). However, it would be more in tune with the paragraph to speak of the new humanity rather as the Israel which no longer defined itself by separation from the other nations but which is redefined to embrace all who believe in (Israel's) God through Christ (cf. Rom 2:28–9; 4:11–12; Gal 3:28–9; Phil 3:3). Either way, fundamental is the thought of Christianity as continuous with Israel of old and of being given to share in Israel's blessings, and that this has only been possible in and through Christ—'he is our peace' (v. 14). That this new humanity also fulfils God's purpose in creating humankind in the first place will be indicated in 4:24.

vv. 11–12 recall the former disqualification. Characteristic of Jewish self-understanding was the conviction that circumcision was a positive identity marker 'in the flesh' which set them apart definitively from other nations as God's elect nation (Gen 17:9–14). So much so that the world could be divided from a Jewish perspective into 'the uncircumcision' and 'the circumcision'—the whole range of differences focused in this one feature (as in Gal 2:7–9). Only Jews regarded lack of circumcision as something negative; in contrast, the typical Greek regarded circumcision as a form of mutilation. The added note that circumcision was 'made . . . by human hands' is an indication that the writer saw this evaluation of 'circumcision . . . in the flesh' as a boundary separating Gentiles from God's grace to be mistaken.

v. 12 lists the blessings from which Gentiles had hitherto been disqualified in ascending order of importance. Israel was not only a nation-state but a religious entity (a matter of continuing confusion from that day to this). 'The covenants of promise' (as in Rom 9:4) either refer to the regularly renewed covenant with the patriarchs (starting with Gen 12:3) or include such key promises as 2 Sam 7:12–14. The worst state to be in is 'having no hope [cf. 1 Thess 4:13] and without God in the world'.

'But now in Christ Jesus' (v. 13) those disqualifications have been removed from the nations (Gentiles). This is the subject of vv. 13–18, a nicely structured passage (chiasmus) where the repeated references to 'far off/near' and 'peace' (vv. 13–14, 17; echoing Isa 57:19; see also 6:15) bracket the central imagery of hostility reconciled 'in him' (vv. 14–16; see Schnackenburg 1991: 106). The key to understanding the passage is the recognition that the writer sees two hostilities/antagonisms as interrelated. He assumes the Jewish view (cf. 4:17–18) that Gentiles, by definition cut off from the grace given through Israel's God-given covenant(s), are distant from God (cf. Isa 49:1; 66:18–19; Acts 2:39) and in need of reconciliation with God (cf. Rom 5:10; Col 1:21). But that enmity had become entangled and confused with enmity between Jew and Gentile. Both were expressed in 'the dividing wall' (v. 14), possibly an allusion to the barrier which marked off 'the court of the Gentiles' from 'the court of Israel' in the Jerusalem temple, and which Gentiles could not breach except on pain of death—symbolizing Gentile exclusion from the presence of God. But the main barrier was formed by the law, with particular reference to the rules (especially purity and food rules) which reinforced the separation of Jew from Gentile (v. 15; cf. Acts 10:9–16, 28, 34–5; Gal 2:11–16; Col 2:16, 21).

Consequently, for easily understandable psychological and social, as well as religious reasons, at the heart of Paul's gospel (himself a Jew) was the claim that God in Christ had resolved both antagonisms, and that the one could not be reconciled in isolation from the other. The two being made one was integral to peace with God (vv. 14–15); reconciliation of either was possible only as reconciliation of both (v. 16). The theology of the cross at this point is an elaboration of the earlier 2 Cor 5:17–21 (cf. Col 1:22; 2:14). But it contains overtones of a self-sacrifice acknowledged by both sides as ending an ancient blood feud, and echoes of the sacrifice which bonded the parties to the covenant in Gen 15:7–21. The difference is that the one thus sacrificed continues to serve as and to maintain the bond thus created 'in him' (vv. 13, 17). The final imagery of v. 18 is of the reconciled peoples now able together to pass through the barrier which had previously divided them and together to celebrate their reconciliation in joint worship made possible by their common participation in the one Spirit (4:3–4; cf. again Phil 3:3); 3:12 says the same thing in complementary terms.

The outcome is not a new national or international entity, but individuals of all nations now sharing in privileges previously thought to be limited to Israel as a nation (v. 19; 3:6)—'fellowcitizens with the saints [see 1:4; cf. Phil 3:20; Heb 12:22–3] and members of the household of God' (RSV; cf. Gal 6:10; 1 Tim 3:15; Heb 3:5–6). Those who enjoyed security both of citizenship and family/household membership would have been in a minority in many ancient cities.

The imagery of the last three verses (20–2) changes to that of a building, in particular a temple. The image was a natural one (cf. e.g. Mt 7:24–7; 1 Cor 3:9–11, 16; 1 Pet 2:5). There are three significant features here. First, the mention of 'the apostles and prophets' as the foundation (v. 20; contrast 1 Cor 3:11); given the order, the 'prophets' are probably Christian prophets (cf. 3:5; 4:11; 1 Cor 12:28). The implication seems to be that a foundation period is being looked back to (cf. Rev 21:14). Second, Christ is the cornerstone; that is, either the keystone or capstone, given that the role of foundation has already been filled (Lincoln 1990: 155–6); or the cornerstone, the first stone laid in the foundation, in relation to which all other parts of the foundation were aligned (Schnackenburg 1991: 124). The metaphor was drawn from Isa 28:16 (understood as foundation) and in early Christian apologetic was often combined with Ps 118:22 (Mt 21:42; Rom 9:33; 10:11; 1 Pet 2:4, 6–8). Third, bringing the paragraph (vv. 11–22) to a climax is the emphasis on the harmonious interrelatedness of the whole structure (see also 4:16). To be noted is the fact that it is conceived as a growing (not a static) unity, a growth dependent on harmonious working together (v. 21), an ongoing process (the tenses are all present continuous) which can only happen and be maintained 'in the Lord'.

The end result (3:22) will be a people—no longer defined in national or ethnic terms—which functions as 'a dwelling place for God'. This is the hope which always lies behind the sacramental focus of God's presence in human-built temple or earthly grown bread and wine—a people as the mode of God's presence and action in the world (cf. Ex 19:5–6; Lev 26:11–12; Ezek 37:27; 1 Pet 2:5)—but which so often falls out of focus (cf. e.g. Isa 1:10–17; Acts 7:48–9; 1 Cor 10–11). The triadic formulation—for God, in the Spirit, interlocked through Christ and growing together in Christ—reflects the theological logic which led inexorably to the subsequent Trinitarian understanding of God (cf. 1:3–14).

(3:1–13) Paul's Stewardship of the Great Mystery A personal statement in self-defence is quite a common feature in Paul's letters—earlier over his apostleship (Gal 1:1–2:10; 1 Cor 15:8–11), or missionary practice (1 Cor 9; 2 Cor 10–12), or regarding his travel plans (e.g. Rom 1:9–15). Initially ch. 3 looks like a further example and provides one of the strongest supports for the view that the letter was written by Paul himself. But as the paragraph unfolds, the claims made move well beyond anything Paul ever claimed for himself earlier—a sustained measure of boasting in spiritual insight and commission with which the earlier Paul would probably have been uncomfortable (contrast e.g. Rom 11:13, 25; 16:25–6; 1 Cor 7:40; 14:37–8; 2 Cor 10:13–18; 12:1–13). It may thus ease the problem and make for a more consistent picture of Paul to conclude that these are the words of a close, ardent disciple of Paul rather than of Paul himself.

The opening self-identification as 'the prisoner of Christ' (v. 1; also 4:1; but note the definite article) is paralleled only in Philem 1 and 9 (cf. also Phil 1:7); it thus reflects the mood of the prison epistles, Paul's imprisonment providing both opportunity to survey his previous ministry and affording fresh opportunity for witness (cf. Phil 1:13–17; Philem 10, 13). Characteristic of Paul is his conviction that his calling was 'for the sake of the Gentiles' (v. 1; Gal 1:16; Rom 11:13) and that he had been given a special engagement for the work (vv. 2, 7, 8; cf. Rom 1:5; 15:15–16; 1 Cor 9:17; 15:10; Gal 2:7–9; Col 1:29). At the end of the paragraph too (v. 13) there is an awkwardly compressed twin Pauline theme that present sufferings foreshadow future glory (Rom 5:2–5; 8:17–21; 2 Cor 4:16–17) and that Paul's sufferings work to his converts' benefit (2 Cor 1:6; 4:7–12; Gal 4:19; Col 1:24; 2 Tim 2:10).

But the main burden of the self-testimony here is the revelation made known to Paul regarding 'the mystery' and Paul's understanding of it (vv. 3–4), to which he had previously briefly alluded (1:9–10). It had also been revealed to 'his holy apostles and prophets' (v. 5; see 2:20). But the emphasis quickly reverts to the fact that it was Paul who, first and foremost, and despite being 'the very least of all the saints' (cf. 1 Cor 15:9; on 'saints' see EPH 1:2), had been given the commission (3:7–8) to unveil this mystery (3:9–11).

'Mystery' is a term which echoes the language and perspective of Jewish apocalypses (already in Dan 2:18–19, 27–30; see e.g. Caragounis 1977). Typically the thought is of the divine purpose: it had been firm from the beginning (v. 11), but had been hidden through the generations (vv. 5, 9; Rom 16:25; Col 1:26), only to be revealed now at the appointed time, at the climax of the ages (cf. 1 Cor 10:11; Gal 4:4). Jewish apocalypses and the Qumran community make similar claims regarding their own insights.

The Christian insight, particularly of Paul, however, is quite distinctive. The mystery as now unfolded was different from the mysteries perceived by their fellow Jews. It was to the effect that God's purpose from the beginning had been to give the Gentiles a share in the same inheritance, the same body, the same promise (as Israel) 'in Christ Jesus' and 'through the gospel' (v. 6). To make known this now revealed mystery to the Gentiles and to everyone (but 'everyone' might not be part of the original text) was Paul's special commission (vv. 8–9).

The thought is certainly consistent with Paul's earlier references to the divine mystery—particularly Paul's first unveiling of the mystery to resolve the excruciating problem of Israel's rejection of the gospel (Rom 11:25–32). That the mystery focuses on the Jew/Gentile issue and involves the removal of the theological significance of that distinction is less to the fore in Col 1:27, but is clearly central here in Ephesians (cf. 2:11–22). The language and imagery underline how crucial the issue was at the beginning of Christianity: the gospel as an invitation to all to share in the special relationship with God which both the Jewish and the Christian Bible assumes to have been Israel's special and distinctive prerogative, but only (Christians add) prior to the coming of Messiah Jesus (cf. Gal 3:29). If a text like this still speaks, then a sense of continuity with Israel, but transposed into a different key, remains fundamental for Christian self-understanding.

As in Col 1:27, 2:2, and 4:3, the mystery is embodied, unveiled, and implemented in Christ (vv. 4, 8–9, 11; cf. 5:32; 6:19). Inevitably and unavoidably Christ is the key to and reason for the distinctiveness of the Christian mystery (cf. 1 Cor 1:24—Christ 'the wisdom of God'). Presumably it was the impact Jesus made in his ministry (in regard to sinners discounted by 'the righteous'), and, in Paul's case particularly the impact of Christ's post-crucifixion encounter with Paul (the two cannot have been at odds otherwise Christianity would have fallen apart), which caused the first believers to see that God's grace was for all equally and without reference to national, racial, or social identity (cf. Gal 2:5–16; 3:28). As Paul saw so clearly, it followed, as day follows night, that a gospel which failed to preach that message was no gospel and a church which failed to live that message was no church. The Christ in whom such differences are not wholly discounted is not the Christ of God's mystery.

As at the end of ch. 1, the cosmic dimensions of the divine purpose are not overlooked. It is the plan of the Creator which is in view (v. 9); there is no divorce between creation and salvation here (cf. Col 1:20). The audience in view in this unfolding of divine wisdom is not just every person but every power that can be envisaged or feared (v. 10; see 1:21). And as in 1:22–3, the church is the medium through which and stage on which this richly diverse wisdom of God is enacted (v. 10; cf. 3:21). At the very least that should mean that the church is (or should be) the prototype and test bed for reconciliation between peoples and between humankind and the creation of which it is part.

The thought unwinds with a reminder of the supreme gift which Christ has brought: that 'in him' there can be a boldness and confidence of access to God (v. 12; cf. 2:18; Heb 4:16; 7:25; 1 Pet 3:18), a boldness and confidence made possible precisely because of the insight embodied in the gospel regarding God's 'unsearchable riches' and 'many-sided wisdom' (mytr.), concerning the character of creation and his purpose for all humankind. In Christ it is given to know the character of God as nowhere else so clearly, and through the trust which Christ inspires, or 'through faith in him' (cf. 3:17), humankind in its rich diversity can draw near to this God with boldness (cf. Rom 8:15–16).

(3:14–21) The Opening Prayer Resumed In effect everything from 1:3 to 3:21 is an extended prayer. The section 2:1–3:13 is as it were a meditative break within the prayer proper—on the effect of conversion (2:1–10), on the reconciliation of former hostility between Jew and Gentile (2:11–22), and on the divine mystery committed to Paul (3:1–13). The meditation has been of such a lofty character, rising repeatedly to praise for the wonder of God's purpose now enacted in Christ, that the spirit of prayer has scarcely been diminished. But now the meditation passes back to prayer proper and the prayer at the end of such a profound meditation is drawn to a fitting conclusion.

As throughout the preceding chapters, the object of the prayer and devotion is God alone. To kneel is the appropriate acknowledgement of humble submission before and dependence on such an overwhelming majesty (v. 14; cf. Rom 14:11; Phil 2:10–11). At the same time, it is God experienced and approached as Father (v. 14) which is the distinctive Christian feature (Lk 11:2; Rom 8:15–16; Gal 4:6–7). And it is no inconsistency for Christians to recognize that this same God is the source of every family and nation's identity (v. 15)—the name indicating the character of the named (cf. Ps 147:4).

The petition echoes the earlier prayer in 1:17–19. But it falls more clearly into two parts. The first (3:16–17) is a prayer for the addressees' spiritual condition. The source is again the riches of God's glory: 'glory' here is almost synonymous with 'grace' as in 1:7; God's grace is his glory. The concern is that they should be strengthened in their innermost being (cf. Rom 7:22; 2 Cor 4:16; 1 Pet 3:4); sustained firmness of conviction, commitment, and motivation will be in view (cf. Col 1:11). The means is God's Spirit, as the powerful presence of God at work within the depths of human discipleship and within the human situation.

It may seem surprising that the prayer (v. 17) is for Christ to dwell in their hearts (the tense denotes 'come to dwell' rather than 'continue to dwell'). Had Christ not already come to dwell in the hearts of believers, at their conversion (cf. Rom 8:10; Gal 2:20; Col 1:27)? But believers do often pray for something (e.g. the presence of God's Spirit in their worship) which they believe or hope to be already the case. Such a prayer is a natural expression of concerned piety. Here it reminds us that we should not transform such language (Christ indwelling the heart) into formal definitions or dogmas which can then be used to classify 'genuine' conversion or faith. Or else we should say that the prayer is for believers to be converted afresh every day. The 'faith' here refers back to the faith mentioned in 3:12. To be noted also is the overlap between the Spirit and Christ (vv. 16–17): being strengthened through the Spirit and Christ indwelling are not clearly distinct experiences (cf. Rom 8:9–11; 1 Cor 6:17; 12:4–6).

It is equally important to recognize that this spiritual strengthening and indwelling is 'rooted and founded in love' (v. 17, my tr.; note the echo of Col 2:7). The double metaphor (a living plant, a well-constructed building) was typical of Jeremiah (e.g. 1:9–10; 18:7–9; 24:6; 31:28) and is used by Paul in 1 Cor 3:10–14. The love will presumably be God's initiating love and the divinely enabled human love in response, directed both to God and to the neighbour (Mk 12:28–33).

As in the first part of the prayer proper (1:15–23), so here, the second petition pushes through the constraints of human language and imagery (3:18–19). It is a prayer once again for knowledge (as in 1:17–19)—but such knowledge! (1) To comprehend (impossible!) what we might describe as the four dimensions (a not uncommon metaphor—Lincoln 1990: 207–13; Schnackenburg 1991: 150–1) of God's love (the Gk. sentence in v. 18 is incomplete); 'with all the saints' is a reminder that only a church conscious of its own dimensions through time and space can even begin to hope for the realization of such a prayer. (2) To know (in experience) the love of Christ which goes beyond knowledge (v. 19), where words and metaphors and symbols are inadequate to the task of describing such experience (cf. Col 2:2–3). (3) With the result that they may be filled with all God's fullness! What Col 1:19 and 2:9 ascribed to Christ alone, Ephesians prays may be true also of the church (1:23; 3:19)! The goal for the church is nothing less than that it embody the presence and love of God in the way that Christ did (cf. 4:13). Here the sequence of clauses implies that such a filling is the effect of appreciating and experiencing the mystery of God's love.

The prayer is brought fittingly to an end by a benediction (vv. 20–1) whose enthusiastic language matches the hyperbole of the preceding petition (cf. Rom 11:33–6). Such a petition can be put forward since it is addressed to a God whose goodwill and enabling grace far exceed human imagining (cf. Phil 4:7). He 'is able to do beyond everything, infinitely more than we ask or think' (v. 20, my tr.); as elsewhere in Ephesians, the language tumbles over itself in the attempt to express the completeness of trust beyond vision (cf. 1:19). To be noted, however, is that the enabling power is already 'at work within us'.

The final doxology (v. 21) ascribes glory to God both in the church and in Christ Jesus, since Christ in life, death, and resurrection is the paradigm of the one who most fully acknowledges God and the character of God, and since the church is the body of people on earth whose commitment is precisely both to live from and to live out that same acknowledgement.

The Exhortation (4:1–6:20)

(4:1–6) The Church in its Calling and Confession Paul's regular practice in his letters was to attach a sequence of appropriate exhortations to the main body of his letter. Here, even though chs. 1–3 have been more prayer than exposition, the same practice is followed. Chs. 4–6 contain mostly instruction (1) on how Christians should understand their mutual interdependence as the church (4:1–16) and (2) how they should conduct themselves in their lives within the world (4:17–5:20), (3) in their mutual responsibilities as households (5:21–6:9), and (4) in their battle against spiritual forces (6:10–20).

The exhortation begins with Paul's characteristic 'I exhort you' (v. 1; cf. Rom 12:1; 1 Thess 4:1), here with the same recall to his status as 'the prisoner' as in 3:1. The metaphor for daily conduct ('lead life') is 'to walk', a metaphor Jewish in origin (halakh means 'walk'; hence halakah, rules for conduct), which presumably reflects the fact that most moral issues arise from one's various contacts with others as one 'walks about'. The thought is not so much that a particular lifestyle or career can be regarded as a 'calling', as that the whole of life should be lived as an expression of and response to God's summons to live for him (cf. 1 Cor 1:26; 7:20; 1 Thess 2:12; 2 Thess 1:11).

No first-century Christian would need reminding that such a calling inevitably meant working and co-operating with others, with all the strains, misunderstandings, hurt feelings, and irritations which that involved. The church could never be reduced to a sequence of disparate individuals. The key to effective mutual co-operation is given in 4:2–3: a proper humbleness and meekness in self-esteem (very un-macho characteristics; cf. Phil 2:3 and Col 3:12); (2) patience and forbearance in love (cf. 1 Cor 13:4–5); and (3) an eager determination to maintain the unity of the Spirit and the peace which benefits all. To be noted is the fact that this unity is given by the Spirit, arising out of the shared experience of the one Spirit (cf. 1 Cor 12:13; Phil 2:1); it is not created by Christians, but can be destroyed by them! The peace of God (cf. 2:14–15) can function as a bond when there is genuine mutual respect (cf. Col 3:14–15).

The confession of 4:4–6 reinforces this unity by recalling its scope. It has an unconscious triadic structure—'one Spirit, one Lord, one God' (had it been more deliberate presumably 'one Spirit' would have come first in 4:4). By giving 'one God' the climactic position (4:6), and attaching to it the four 'all's, the writer reminds his readers that the ultimate foundation of Christian unity is God both in his oneness and in his altness as Creator (cf. Rom 11:36). The confession of Christ as 'one Lord' is in tune with this monotheism, or else Christian faith is misconfessed (cf. 1 Cor 8:6; 15:24–8; Phil 2:9–11). The importance of this distinctively Jewish emphasis on God as one is a reminder that the principal strains on Christian unity at this period came from the inclusion of Gentiles into Israel's privileged status (2:11–22).

That the 'one Spirit' gives the body its actual (as distinct from its confessional) oneness (v. 4), both as a shared experience (v. 3) and through the manifold workings of the Spirit's engagements, is spelled out more fully in 1 Cor 12:13–26 and Rom 12:4–8 (see also Eph 4:7–16). The ‘calling’ is one, because it is common to all believers (1:18; 4:1), without respect to rank or ability. In v. 5 the ‘one faith’ will have in mind in particular what was probably one of the earliest baptismal confessions, ‘Jesus is Lord’ (cf. Rom 10:9). The focus of unity is not so much a common formulation or common ritual as a common Lord; somewhat surprisingly, the Lord’s Supper is not mentioned.

(4:7–16) The Character and Purpose of Ministry in the Body of Christ The paragraph is a rich elaboration of the earlier Rom 12:4–8 and 1 Cor 12:4–31. Here too it is stressed at the points of emphasis (beginning and end, vv. 7, 16): (1) that the effective functioning of the church as Christ’s body depends on the recognition that each member has a function within the body and on each exercising that function; and (2) that each function is appointed and its exercise made effective by the enabling (engracement) which comes from Christ. The terms used are slightly different: the earlier Paul had spoken of ‘charism’ (charisma) as the function exercised in accordance with the ‘grace’ (charis) given (Rom 12:6–8); here the talk is of ‘grace’ given in accordance with the measure of Christ’s gift (v. 7). And in Rom 12 and 1 Cor 12 the head is simply another part of the body, whereas here Christ is the head of the body (v. 16; cf. 1:22). But the basic imagery is the same; that is, of the body as the model of a unity which is constituted by diversity, a unity which actually depends on the reality of mutual interdependence being expressed through the diverse engagements of its different members.

‘The gift of the Messiah’ (v. 7, mytr.) is elaborated in vv. 8–11. First (v. 8) by citing Ps 68:18, a passage lauding YHWH’s triumph over Israel’s enemies. Here it is taken as a description of Christ’s exaltation, presumably in the same vein as 1 Cor 15:24–6 and Col 2:15. And the text speaks of him giving rather than receiving gifts—the character of Christ’s triumph! But we know of a Jewish targum (interpretative translation) of the same passage which referred it to Moses and read it in a very similar way—Moses giving the law. So the reading here would have been quite acceptable.

The interpretation of the Psalm, which is appended (4:9–10), is probably a very early expression of the belief that Christ descended into the place of the dead (‘the lower parts of the earth’; cf. Ps 63:9; Mt 12:40; 1 Pet 3:19) prior to his ascension ‘far above all the heavens’ (cf. 1:3, 20; 2:6; Heb 4:14; 7:26). Some think a reference to incarnation is intended by the talk of descent, but the language and imagery are focused solely on the benefits and universal effect (cf. 1:23) of Christ’s resurrection and exaltation triumph; and a reference to Christ descending at Pentecost would be exceptional (Dunn 1989: 186–7).

‘The gift of the Messiah’ is elaborated, secondly, by itemizing the particular gifts given to the church (v. 11). The sequence of ‘apostles . . . prophets . . . teachers’ reflects the same evaluation as 1 Cor 12:28—apostles as church founders (e.g. 1 Cor 9:2), prophets and teachers as the most vital ministries in a church (Acts 13:1; Rom 12:6–7). Unexpected is the insertion of ‘evangelists’ as the third item (cf. Acts 21:8), and the linking of the fourth item as ‘pastors and teachers’—presumably reflecting an understanding of the church as both evangelistic and pastoral in concern.

The other major elaboration of the earlier imagery of the church as Christ’s body (vv. 12–16) is in terms of the purpose of these gifts and the character of the body’s growth. Noteworthy is the fact that these ministries do not constitute the whole of the body’s ministry, but are intended ‘for the equipment or making ready of the saints: for the work of ministry, for the building up of Christ’s body’ (v. 12, my tr.; the punctuation is important here; otherwise Lincoln 1990: 253). The ministry of the appointed few is to facilitate the ministry of all. Only so, presumably, can all come to the unity of the faith (v. 13): the unity of the confession (4:3–6) depends on the interactive ministries of the many (vv. 7, 16), in other words, a dynamic and not a static unity. The goal (and test—1 Cor 14:3–5, 12, 17, 26) is always the upbuilding of the body. Here the voice is indeed still the voice of Paul.

This point is reinforced by the following description of the unity of the body as a process, a process of growth, a unity to be attained (v. 13) as well as maintained (4:3). Here it is characterized as a unity of faith in and knowledge of God’s son: trust does not exclude knowledge (cf. 1 Cor 13:12; Phil 3:8, 10); experience does not render trust unnecessary (cf. 2 Cor 12:1–10; Gal 4:9). The goal is maturity. The measure of that maturity is the Christ (cf. Col 1:28). What is in view, it should be noted, is a corporate maturity: such maturity is not possible for the individual; it is possible only for the church, and for the individual as part of the body of Christ.

A negative measure of such maturity (v. 14) is the church’s ability to steer a straight course when the winds and waves of doctrinal speculation beat upon it—an odd change of metaphor within the sustained metaphor of the body (probably alluding to Isa 57:20; cf. Jas 1:6). The threat is all the more serious when human deceit (as in a dice game) and malice are involved, deliberate attempts to promote discordant views or counter ideologies, designed (we may infer) to boost some individual’s or group’s status or reputation. Here again, discernment as a gift to the congregation as a whole must normally be given precedence over the claimed insight of one or two. This fear of false teaching arising within the church smacks very much of a second-generation concern (cf. 1 Tim 4:1; Heb 13:9).

The final elaboration of the body metaphor (vv. 15–16) reverts to the imagery of growth, with Christ as both the goal and the source of its enabling (cf. 2:21; Col 2:19). The physiology implied is strange to modern ears, but the force of the metaphor is clear. The antithesis to naïve childish interest in alternative practices or views (v. 14; cf. 1 Cor 14:20–5; Heb 5:13–14) is ‘speaking the truth in love’ (v. 15), a balance easy to state (truth and love) but hard to practise (cf. Gal 4:16). It will not be accidental that the last word (v. 16) is ‘love’ (cf. 5:25).

(4:17–32) How to Live as the Church in the World There follows a section of more general, more or less all-purpose paraenesis, which stretches to 5:20. Unlike earlier Pauline letters, there seems to be no particular situation (in the Ephesian church or elsewhere) in view. The first part (vv. 17–24) parallels 2:11–10 in structure—a reminder (1) of the readers’ Gentile past (vv. 17–19), (2) of their conversion (vv. 20–1), and (3) of God’s purpose for them (vv. 22–4).

As in 2:11–12, the warning presupposes a Jewish perspective (vv. 17–19): that Gentile conduct was characterized by the futility of their vaunted reason and darkness of understanding, alienation from the life of God by their ignorance (cf. 1 Pet 1:14), and a hardness and callousness expressed in and reinforced by their self-surrender to sexual excess, impurity and greed (cf. 5:3; Col 3:5). The judgement is harsh but reflects Jewish conviction that they had been privileged with fuller insight into God's will for human conduct, and the generally higher sexual standards of Jewish communities (cf. Rom 1:21–31).

The recall to their conversion in this instance focuses on what they were then taught (vv. 20–1). Notable here is the reference to the Christ as a model for Christian conduct (cf. Rom 6:17; 15:1–3; Col 2:6); the 'truth in Jesus' is a moral truth. The 'if indeed' which begins v. 21 (mytr.; 'assuming that' RSV) is a typical Pauline cautionary note (cf. Rom 8:9, 17; 1 Cor 15:2; Col 1:23).

The exhortation which follows (vv. 22–32) takes the classic form: put off (vices) and put on (virtues) (see e.g. Schweizer 1979). The imagery is drawn from change of clothes, as indicating a change of character and lifestyle, and was familiar in the ancient world (here cf. particularly Col 3:8–12); it does not necessarily imply that a ritual change of clothes was already part of Christian baptism. Something of the moral transformation which Christian conversion entailed is here indicated (cf. 1 Cor 6:9–11), but also the Christian perception of the resulting difference in ethical values.

To be 'put off' (cf. Rom 13:12; Jas 1:21; 1 Pet 2:1) is a whole way of life characterized by 'deceitful desires' (v. 22, mytr.), the desire which constantly promises but never fully satisfies, which consumes but rarely fulfils; the 'old nature' (RSV) is marked by the twilight of desire. The antidote and alternative is a constant renewal in self-perception (v. 23; cf. Rom 12:2) and a daily assumption of and living out ('put on') the humanness which God intended and created, marked by the righteousness and holiness of God's reality (v. 24). Implicit is the conviction that Christ is the image of the new humanity, the completion of God's purpose in creating humankind, and the template for the recreation of the old humanity into the new (cf. 2:15; 4:13; Rom 13:14; Col 3:10).

The general exhortations which follow (vv. 25–32) focus particularly on personal relations and underline the importance of conversation, as a force for community building and as potentially destructive of community (cf. Jas 3:6–12). They are based on age-old proverbial wisdom, familiar among both Greek and Jewish moralists, but of no less value for that. Members of a church (of one another) should be able to speak the truth to each other (v. 25, using the words of Zech 8:16). The proverb that anger should not be retained beyond night-fall, thereby giving scope to the devil, was a valuable elaboration of the exhortation from Ps 4:4 (vv. 26–7).

The exhortation about the thief (v. 28) breaks the sequence on speaking, but reminds of the transformation brought about in some early Christian conversions and of the need to reinforce such a conversion by a determined change of motivation and lifestyle (cf. Rom 12:8; 1 Thess 4:11; Titus 3:14). To work in order to give indicates a very different set of values from those which normally govern society.

The final group of exhortations (vv. 29–32) contrasts (in an a-b-a-b format) contributions to conversation which are bitter, undisciplined, angry, and malicious and thus grieve the Spirit (which should distinguish them as believers, 1:13–14), with those which are beneficial, fitting, and impart grace to the other, marked by sensitivity, thoughtfulness, and the forgiveness which they themselves had experienced from God in Christ (Col 3:13). The mature Christian community is one where the Lord's Prayer petition about forgiveness can be prayed with complete sincerity.

(5:1–20) Walking in the Light The final block of general exhortations develops the earlier antithesis between the old life and the new (cf. 2:1–10 and 4:17–24) in three sharply drawn contrasts. First, the contrast between a life modelled on the love of God and Christ (vv. 1–2) and a life mismatched with the vices which warrant the anger of God (vv. 3–7). Second, the repeated contrast between light and darkness, between a life in the light, open to and in turn reflecting light's searching rays, and a life full of hidden shamefulfulness (vv. 8–14). And finally, the contrasts between unwisdom and wisdom, between a life which characteristically gains its inspiration from strong drink and a life whose character and direction is given by the Spirit (vv. 15–20).

As the first sequence of general exhortations was marked by a recall to their discipleship of Christ (4:20), so the second sequence begins with a striking double call to take both God and Christ as the model for personal relationships and conduct (vv. 1–2). Paul elsewhere speaks of imitating Christ (1 Cor 11:1; 1 Thess 1:6), but not of imitating God. The thought here, however, is of the child taking the loving parent as a model, and alludes particularly to God's forgiveness (following from 4:32) and mercy (cf. Lk 6:36); see further Wild (1985). So too their conduct (walk) is to be modelled on Christ's self-giving (cf. 5:25; Gal 2:20) and sacrifice (cf. Phil 4:18 echoing Ex 29:18) as a governing principle.

Another vice list (vv. 3–5) warns against sexual sins in particular, beginning with a repetition of the characterization of their former lifestyle (4:19) and adding porneia (illicit sexual relations), one of the most regular members of such lists (e.g. Mk 7:21; Gal 5:19; Col 3:5). Evidently the exploitation and abuse of sex was as seductive and as destructive then as now. Gossip about such matters should be discouraged lest it promote any implication that they don't matter. Conversation between close friends can so easily degenerate into shaming and foolish talk, and become caught in the swamp between buffoonery and boorishness (where Aristotle located the uncommon third term in v. 4); this is a further reflection on the dangers of too casual speech (4:29–32). Christian conversation should be marked instead by a spirit of thankfulness (v. 4).

The vice list is rounded off by a reminder that the sexually promiscuous, the dirty-minded, and the greedy or covetous person (but the terms are masculine) will not share the inheritance of God's kingdom (v. 5). This talk about inheriting the kingdom was evidently fairly common in earliest Christianity (1 Cor 6:9–10; Gal 5:21; cf. Rev 21:8; 22:15). It linked effectively into the most prominent feature of Jesus' proclamation (about the kingdom of God, e.g. Mk 1:15), but here reflects also the developed understanding of the exalted Christ as sharing in God's kingly rule (cf. Lk 22:29–30; 1 Cor 15:24–8; Col 1:13). It also links further back into the idea of Gentiles sharing in Israel's inheritance (1:14, 18). The abhorrence of idolatry was particularly Jewish, both as a fundamental sin and as associated with the three sins just named. The idolatry and debauchery of the golden calf episode remained an unhealed sore in Israel's conscience (e.g. 1 Cor 10:6–8). But the folly of taking another as god, rather than the one Lord God of Israel, had been a lesson requiring frequent repetition.

They should beware of empty and deceptive words on this point (v. 6; cf. Rom 16:18; Col 2:4, 8). The evident fact was that human society functioned in accord with the moral order in which God had set it: as in Rom 1:18–32, the wrath or anger of God can be understood in terms of the community-destructive outworkings of such self-indulgence (v. 6; cf. 2:2–3). The degenerative effect of promiscuous and selfishly acquisitive company (v. 7) is contrasted with the opening call to unconditional and sacrificial love (vv. 1–2).

The second set of contrasts are between light and darkness (vv. 8–14), a common metaphorical usage in religions generally to express the sharpness of the antithesis between new and old, between truth newly perceived and the old misconceptions. In the OT cf. e.g. Ps 36:9; 82:5; Prov 4:14–19; Eccl 2:13; a prominent contrast in the Dead Sea scrolls is between 'the sons of light' (the Qumran covenanters) and 'the sons of darkness' (the rest); in the NT see e.g. Mt 6:22–3; Acts 26:18; 2 Cor 4:6; Col 1:12–13; 1 Pet 2:9; 1 Jn 1:6.

The elaboration of the contrast here is a blend of the conventional and the more distinctively Christian. All would agree that goodness, righteousness, and truth are desirable virtues (v. 9), that a religious person will want to learn 'what is pleasing' to God (v. 10), and that part of the effectiveness of the imagery of light lies in the power of light to expose what would otherwise be hidden from sight (vv. 11–13). The distinctive Christian claim is that the light (the real, most effective light) is 'in the Lord' (v. 8). Equally characteristic of Paul's teaching is the claim that discernment of what pleases the Lord (v. 10) is given by renewal of the mind and through the Spirit (Rom 12:2; 1 Cor 2:14–15; Phil 1:9–10; 1 Thess 5:19–22). The power of light to expose the unsavoury and shameful recalls such passages as Jn 3:20 and 1 Cor 14:14–25 and echoes the warning notes of Mk 4:21–2 and Rom 13:11–14.

v. 14 may be a snatch of an early hymn (such as may be found under a heading such as 'The Gospel' in older hymnbooks today). If sung by early congregations it would function both as a recall to their conversion, as a reminder (like Rom 13:11) that falling asleep is a constant threat to be resisted, and as a promise of final waking from sleep, resurrection from death, and enlightenment from Christ.

In the final paragraph the contrast between unwisdom and wisdom (vv. 15–17) in effect draws upon the accumulated wisdom of Proverbs, Ben Sira, the teaching of Jesus gathered in the Sermon on the Mount, and so on. But it adds the ominous note recalled from 2:2 that such wisdom is needed because the context of the life of faith is stamped by evil (v. 16). That is why conduct must be 'careful' (v. 15; still attractive is the older KJV translation, 'walk circumspectly') and the significant time (the sense of the Gk. word used here) must be 'bought up' (v. 16). The latter exhortation is just the same in Col 4:5, and the metaphor more evocative than clear, but the emphasis is presumably on discerning and acting upon all too scarce opportunities for good and the gospel in the midst of lives which are all too pressurized and constricted. v. 17 presumably says the same thing in terms closer to those already used in v. 10.

The last contrast vividly recalls Acts 2:1–4, 12–16 and reminds us that many of the earliest Christian gatherings for worship were marked by spiritual exuberance (vv. 18–20). As at Pentecost the effect of the Spirit could give an impression of drunkenness. The difference is that strong drink taken in excess resulted in debauchery and dissipation (cf. again Rom 13:13). In contrast, fullness of the Spirit came to expression most characteristically in various psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs, by which the congregation was instructed, God was praised from the heart, and life lived in a spirit of thankfulness to God. To be noted is the fact that being filled with the Spirit is not regarded as a once-for-all event; the exhortation is to be (constantly or repeatedly) filled with the Spirit (see further Fee 1994). The distinction between the various forms of song is unclear (as in Col 3:16), but presumably includes OT psalms, hymns which came to birth in Christianity (such as Lk 1:46–55 and perhaps Phil 2:6–11), and spontaneous charismatic songs (cf. 1 Cor 14:15, 26). As elsewhere in Paul prayer is made not so much to Christ as to God the Father through Christ (cf. Rom 7:25; 2 Cor 1:20; Col 3:17).

(5:21–6:9) Household Rules What follows is constructed on the framework of a table of rules for good management of the household (Balch 1981). Household management was a common concern of political theorists and ethicists in the ancient world. Naturally so, since the household was generally understood to be the basic unit of the state or society. The health of society and stability of the state therefore depended on the basic relationships within the household—husband and wife, father and children, master and slaves. The second and third generation of Christians shared this concern: no doubt partly to demonstrate the good citizenship of small house churches which might otherwise have seemed subversive of traditional social values; but no doubt partly also as a means of bearing good witness to the quality and character of the Christian household (see Schweizer 1979).

The structure is particularly close to that of Col 3:18–4:1, which probably provided the precedent for those which followed (here and 1 Pet 2:18–3:7; cf. e.g. Titus 2:1–10; Didache 4:9–11; 1 Clem 21:6–9). The core teaching is fairly conventional (good ethics are by no means exclusively Christian). But the conventional is transformed by the Christian sense that all relationships have to be lived 'in the Lord' and with the unselfish, sacrificial love of Christ as the pattern and inspiration.

In the first part of the rule (5:21–33) the transformation begins at once. That wives should be subject to their husbands (5:22; Col 3:18; 1 Pet 3:1) accorded with the moral sensibilities of the time; here we need to recall that in the law and ethos of the time households were patriarchal institutions and that the paterfamilias (father of the family) had absolute power over the other members of the family. But the rule is already softened by prefacing it with a call to be subject to one another (5:21; cf. Gal 5:13; 1 Pet 5:5); in a Christian household the power of the paterfamilias was not absolute. And the reminder that wifely submission is to be 'as to the Lord' (5:22) sets the whole relationship within the primary context of mutual discipleship (cf. Mk 10:42–5).

It is true that the placing of the relationship of husband and wife parallel to that of Christ and church (5:23–4) seems to set the wife in an intrinsically inferior status (cf. 1 Cor 11:3). But that again reflects the ethos of the time (the marital law which treated wives as the property of their husbands was only changed in Britain in the 19th cent.). And the main thrust of what follows is clearly intended to transfuse and transform that given relationship with the love of Christ. The paradigm for the husband is Christ as lover and saviour, not as lord and master.

The beautiful imagery of 5:25–7, so beloved at wedding ceremonies, has in view the purificatory bath which the bride took prior to and in preparation for the wedding ceremony; Christ's self-giving had an analogous cleansing in view (cf. Ezek 16:8–14). Perhaps there is a side glance at baptism, but the primary thought is of the (corporate) Christian life as equivalent to the time between betrothal and the wedding ceremony, the marriage itself only taking place at the return of Christ (cf. 2 Cor 11:2; Rev 19:7–8; 21:2, 9–10). The cleansing is evidently a spiritual cleansing, and it comes 'by the word' (5:26; cf. 1 Cor 6:11; Titus 3:5–6; Heb 10:22).

5:28–33 develops a different aspect of the imagery, drawn from Gen 2:24 (5:31; cf. Mt 19:4–6). The idea of 'the two become one flesh' invites a twofold corollary: that a healthy love of the other is inseparable from a healthy respect for oneself (5:28–9; cf. Mk 12:31; Rom 13:8–10)—an important psychological insight; and that the love of Christ sustains the mutual love of husband and wife within the corporate context of the church, of their being individually and jointly members of his body the church (5:30, 32; cf. Rom 12:5).

The final exhortation (5:33) maintains the emphasis on each and every husband's responsibility to love his own wife. The wife is not so counselled, for the love in view is not marital or family love so much as the sacrificial and non-self-serving love of the more powerful for the disadvantaged. In a situation of given inequality between husband and wife the appropriate response of the wife was to respect her husband.

The second pairing within the household code (as in Col 3:20–1) is children and parents (6:1–4). As with the submissiveness of wives, so the obligation of obedience to parents (6:1) was a widely recognized virtue in the world of the time. But again it is qualified by an 'in the Lord' (though the phrase here is missing from some important MSS). And just as noteworthy is the unusual feature in such codes, of children being directly addressed; evidently they were regarded as responsible members of the house churches where such a letter as this would be read out. As in the case of the previous exhortation to husbands (5:25–33), so here the basic exhortation of Col 3:20 is elaborated, on this occasion by drawing in the scriptural authority for it—Ex 20:12 and the slightly fuller version of Deut 5:16—with the exegetical note inserted to point out that this was the first commandment with promise. As in other similar cases, the NT writer saw no difficulty in applying a promise relating to Israel's prosperity in the promised land to Gentile believers in another part of the Mediterranean world.

In contrast, the advice to fathers is left stark (6:4). Again it is fairly conventional. Only the father is addressed: the paterfamilias had sole legal authority over his children and primary responsibility for their paideia (training or discipline; the classic word in this context) and instruction; at the same time it was recognized that such power unwisely handled could easily provoke or goad youths and young men to a resentment which was destructive of household order and family. Again the Christian qualification is added—'the training and instruction of the Lord' (cf. Prov 3:11).

The final pairing in the household code is slaves and masters (6:5–9). The exhortation to slaves is closely modelled on Col 3:22–5. Again it is worth noting that they too are here recognized as full members of the congregation and having responsibilities as Christians to discharge the duties which their status as slaves laid upon them (cf. 1 Tim 6:1–2; Titus 2:9–10). If any are surprised that Paul did not question the morality of slavery, they should recall that slavery only became a moral issue as a result of the slave trade (only two centuries ago), and that in the ancient world slavery was simply an economic phenomenon, slaves being essential to the smooth running of the economy (though by no means solely on the bottom rung).

The exhortation recognizes the reality of slavery: obedience had to be unquestioning and orders carried out with fear and trembling (many masters treated their slaves harshly). But the thrust of the exhortation is to provide the slaves with the right motivation, so that their service might lose its servile character and become a way of serving the Lord with sincerity of heart (6:5), doing the will of God with a will, and not (as we might say) as clock-watchers or solely to catch the master's eye or to curry favour with him (6:7). Slavery too can be a form of discipleship (cf. 1 Cor 7:20–4). At the same time, they are reminded that their earthly masters are only that (6:5), and that both slave and free will receive from their heavenly Lord the appropriate recompense according to the good they have done (6:8; cf. 2 Cor 5:10).

In 6:9 the point is driven home directly to those in the congregation who were slave-owning householders (the assumption is that the household as a whole is Christian). In the spirit of OT slave legislation (Lev 25:43), they should forbear from threatening their slaves, remembering that both they and their slaves have the same Lord in the heavenly places, and that he is an impartial master—a common OT motif (e.g. Deut 10:17; 2 Chr 19:7) echoed elsewhere in the NT (Acts 10:34; Rom 2:11; Col 3:25; Jas 2:1).

(6:10–20) Put on the Armour of God The final strand of exhortation is one of the most vivid portrayals of the Christian life as a spiritual struggle, indicating the power of the hostile forces (vv. 10–12), the means of withstanding them (vv. 13–17), and the need for co-operative effort (vv. 18–20). The metaphor, be it noted, is of warfare, not of a school debate or of a business enterprise. As a piece, it is clearly constructed from a sequence of allusions to well-established Jewish motifs, particularly that of YHWH as the Divine Warrior (Isa 59:17; Wis 5:17–20). The writer would no doubt be conscious of the fact that the armour he describes is depicted by Isaiah especially as YHWH's own armour, armour which YHWH dons to effect judgement on human sin and social injustice (Isa 59:12–18).

The spiritual opposition is described both as 'the devil' (cf. 2:2; 4:27; Jas 4:7; 1 Pet 5:8–9), and as cosmic and spiritual powers in the heavens (vv. 11–12; cf. Rom 8:38–9; Col 1:16; 2:15). With this information added to that of the earlier references to the heavenlies (1:3, 20; 2:6; 3:10), we are given a clearer picture of the heavenly regions—presumably as a sequence of heavens (cf. 2 Cor 12:2–3), in which the lower heavens (nearer to earth) are inhabited by hostile powers, and the upper heavens are where Christ is seated (1:20–1). Modern cosmology is very different, and the extent to which such names ('rulers, authorities, cosmic powers') were already perceived to be metaphorical is unclear. What matters is the recognition that there are forces active through human fear and greed which can captivate whole groups and even societies and wreak all forms of evil, from the most subtle ('the wiles of the devil'; cf. 4:14) to the most inhuman. Those who have lived through any three or four decades of the twentieth century should need no convincing on that score. To designate them as 'spiritual powers' helps prevent such evil from being treated lightly or superficially (they are not merely 'flesh and blood') (see e.g. Wink 1984: 84–9).

The appropriate and necessary response (given the character of this evil) is to seek a strength commensurate with and more powerful than that evil—a spiritual strength to match a spiritual crisis (cf. Rom 4:20; 1 Cor 16:13), a strength from God, the strength of God himself (v. 10; the first OTecho—Isa 40:26). Correlated with (or an elaboration of) this strength is the equipment of the Divine Warrior, 'the panoply of God' (vv. 11, 13). Only that equipment and empowering will provide the fortitude and the means to withstand in a day when evil seems to be rampant (cf. 5:16), and having done all within one's power, still to stand one's ground; the sign of God's enabling is not so much clear-cut victory over evil, as the sustained will to resist evil, come what may.

The list of equipment is inspired by earlier, briefer metaphors, and the metaphors themselves are not fixed (e.g. in 1 Thess 5:8 the breastplate is faith). Nevertheless, the appropriateness of this listing is notable.

1. Belt (v. 14). In a day when clothing was much looser, it was necessary for the flowing cloak to be fastened firmly by a belt, otherwise movement would be hindered and action impeded (cf. Lk 12:37; 17:8). To be caught out in deceit or falsification was like tripping over one's own clothing; the belt of truth prevents one being 'caught with one's pants down'.

2. Breastplate (v. 14). The metaphor draws directly on Isa 59:17 (and Wis 5:18), describing YHWH's breastplate. There it is the fact that what God does is right which makes his judgement invulnerable to criticism (of partiality). Here the thought is of God's acceptance of those who trust in him as their breastplate which keeps them equally secure in the face of hostile criticism (cf. Rom 5:1–2; 8:31–4).

3. Shoes (v. 15). This is a more original image, but no doubt adapted from Isa 52:7, a passage which is also echoed in Acts 10:36 and cited in Rom 10:15. Why the word 'preparation' is added is unclear, but it strengthens the impression that what is in view is the responsibility of the church and believer to speak out the gospel of peace with God. Mission is the best form of defence; the church on the move will be more sure-footed in face of the encroachments of evil.

4. Shield (v. 16). Again the imagery is original; more typically God is a shield (e.g. Gen 15:1; Ps 18:2, 30; 28:7); in Wis 5:19 the shield is 'holiness'. But 'faith' is also appropriate (cf. 1 Pet 5:9). Faith and righteousness are two sides of the one coin in Pauline thought (Rom 1:17), just as the breastplate and shield have a similarly defensive function (hence 1 Thess 5:8). Trust itself can be exposed to quite a battering, but trust sustained keeps inviolate the one who so trusts (cf. Rom 4:16–22).

5. Helmet (v. 17). Here we are back with familiar imagery (Isa 59:17; 1 Thess 5:8; though in Wis 5:18 the helmet is 'impartial justice'). In 1 Thess 5:8 the helmet is 'the hope of salvation', which reflects the thought of the earlier Paulines that salvation is a still future goal (but 'hope' is confident hope). Here, however, as in 2:5 and 8, the question is raised whether the perspective has changed: that which keeps the head of the body (cf. 4:15) safe is the security of salvation realized and not just the confident hope of it.

6. Sword (v. 17). Notably the one offensive weapon is doubly denoted as 'of the Spirit', and as 'the word of God'. Again the imagery reflects older usage (Isa 49:2; Hos 6:5; cf. Heb 4:12). What is in mind is not just the written word, as though the thought was simply of the believer being well versed in scripture, able to cite the appropriate passage for all occasions (cf. Mt 4:1–11). The Spirit is here seen as an inspiring force, the Spirit that inspires the word from God appropriate to the occasion (Mk 13:11; Rom 10:8–17; 1 Pet 1:25). It is no accident that the enabling of powerful speech is one of the most regular charisms and marks of the Spirit in the NT (e.g. Acts 4:8; 1 Cor 2:4–5; 12:8, 10); despite immense developments in communication, the force of the spoken word is still immeasurable.

The final stress is on prayer (vv. 18–20), not, somewhat surprisingly, as part of the continuing metaphor of spiritual armour, but emphasizing none the less (by the greater elaboration given to the request) its importance in the warfare are just described. Christian soldiers must never forget that they need constant help from God. Moreover, since the previous imagery had been somewhat individualistic (despite the plural verbs), this last addition helps underline the importance of co-operation and mutual support in the warfare. Like the speaking (v. 17), the praying should look to the Spirit for inspiration (cf. Rom 8:26–7; 1 Cor 14:15; Jude 20); and the military mood is retained in the calls for alertness and application (6:18; cf. Lk 21:36).

The transition from exhortation to personal request (vv. 18–20) seems to be modelled on Col 4:2–4 (cf. Lk 21:15; Mk 14:38), with a final recapitulation of the 'mystery' motif and play on the contrast between Paul's imprisonment and his boldness as commissioned by God (3:1–12; cf. 2 Cor 3:12; 5:20; Phil 1:20; 1 Thess 2:2).

Conclusion and Benediction (6:21–4)

Most of vv. 21–2 is almost verbatim Col 4:7–8. It is of course conceivable that Paul wrote both letters at more or less the same time (thus unconsciously or deliberately giving Tychicus precisely the same commission each time). But the perspective of the letters is too different for that to be the most obvious solution. And in a letter thus far marked by its lack of specific reference to particular situations, this brief personal note rings somewhat oddly. It is more likely, then, that the author has drawn the language from Colossians to indicate the very Pauline effect he hoped his letter would have, and as an expression of what Paul would have wished to say had he himself still been able to dictate such a letter.

Since Tychicus appears only in the later Pauline letters (Col 4:7; 2 Tim 4:12; Titus 3:12; see also Acts 20:4) he probably emerged only in the Pauline circle at a late stage; like Epaphras (Col 1:7) he is remembered as a beloved brother and faithful servant of Christ. Whatever the precise historical circumstances, the reference reminds us that there must have been regular contacts between the Pauline churches.

The final benediction (vv. 23–4) is unusual in Paul, but it strikes the regular notes of grace and peace (1:2) and links them with two of the great Pauline words—love and faith ('love with faith'). Effective also is the final balance between divine enabling ('from [both] God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ') and human response ('all who have an undying love for our Lord Jesus Christ').

REFERENCES

- Balch, D. (1981), Let Wives be Submissive: The Domestic Code in 1 Peter (Missoula; Scholars Press).
- Barth, M. (1974), Ephesians (2 vols.; Garden City, NY: Doubleday).
- Best, E. (1987), 'Recipients and Title of the Letter to the Ephesians: Why and When the Designation "Ephesians"?', ANRW 2. 25. 4 (Berlin: de Gruyter), 3247–79.
- Bruce, F. F. (1984), The Epistles to the Colossians to Philemon and to the Ephesians, NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Caragounis, C. C. (1977), The Ephesian Mystery (Lund: Gleerup).
- Dunn, J. D. G. (1989), Christology in the Making, 2nd edn. (London: SCM).
- Fee, G. D. (1994), God's Empowering Presence: The Holy Spirit in the Letters of Paul (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson), 658–733.
- Lincoln, A. T. (1990), Ephesians, WBC 42 (Dallas: Word).
- Mitton, C. L. (1951), The Epistle to the Ephesians (Oxford: Clarendon).
- Schnackenburg, R. (1991), The Epistle to the Ephesians: A Commentary (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Schweizer, E. (1979), 'Traditional Ethical Patterns in the Pauline and Post-Pauline Letters and their Development (Lists of Vices and House-Tables)', in E. Best and R. McL. Wilson (eds.), Text and Interpretation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press), 195–209.
- Wild, R. A. (1985), '"Be Imitators of God": Discipleship in the Letter to the Ephesians', in F. Segovia (ed.), Discipleship in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress), 127–43.
- Wink, W. (1984), Naming the Powers (Philadelphia: Fortress).

69. Philippians

ROBERT MURRAY, SJ

INTRODUCTION

A. Character and Main Concerns of the Letter. 1. Equalled only by Philemon, Philippians is the most personal of Paul's letters. Among the categories listed by ancient theorists (Malherbe 1988), it combines features of a hortatory 'letter of friendship' (Fee 1995: 214) with those of a 'patronage letter' (Bormann 1995: 161–205). Unusually for Paul, the OT is seldom cited; his argument is passionately centred on Christ, yet he often uses Stoic language (see PHILE).

2. Although the letter's contents are conditioned by practical matters, the main emphasis is on strengthening the commitment and faith of the Philippian Christians, as was Paul's regular aim (Meeks 1983: 84–107). He urges them to follow the example of Christ in union with him (repeatedly expressed by 'sharing', koinōnia and its compounds), so as to grow in a Christlike mindset guiding both belief and action. This is expressed by several recurring verbs, especially phronein, 'think' or 'feel', which, together with 'rejoice', chairein, virtually structures the letter, creating a major inclusio from beginning to end.

B. The Addressees. 1. Philippi (Bormann 1995) stood on the plain of eastern Macedonia, about 16 km inland from its port Neapolis. It was refounded as a city by Philip II of Macedon in 358–357 BCE. Prosperous from mineral deposits and its location on a main east–west route, Philippi came under Roman rule in 167 BCE. Octavian, after gaining supreme power in 31 BCE, settled veterans here and gave the city the status of a colonia with citizenship by ius italicum. The population would have been mainly Macedonians, Greeks, and Romans. Acts 16:12–40 recounts Paul's visit with Silas (about 50 CE), conversion of Lydia, and misfortunes before he revealed his citizen status. The alarm of the city magistrates and their anxiety to see the last of Paul and Silas doubtless gave Christianity a prejudged start.

2. Apart from Acts, Philippians is our only source for the origins of this church. Lydia had been a Jewish God-fearer. All the people named in Philippians except Clement are Greek, but this does not exclude their having become Christians via Judaism. The church was doubtless mixed in ethnic and social character. It probably met in house-groups (Peterlin 1995: 135–70). By the time of the letter it had officers called episkopoi and diakonoi (1:11); presbuteroi are not mentioned. Paul refers to the Philippians' suffering for Christ (1:27–30; 2:15–17) and refers to 'opponents' (1:28), but without identifying them. Motives for hostility can be imagined on the part (respectively) of the civic authorities, the pagan public, Jews opposed to Christians, and Jewish Christians opposed to Paul.

3. The references to disunity have evoked many hypotheses (O'Brien 1991: 26–35). Theories of Gnostic opponents (Fee 1995: 19–32) are unconvincing. Tellbe (1994) plausibly suggests a crisis facing Gentile Christians unprotected by Jewish exemption from Roman cult practices. Others propose grounds for the quarrel mentioned in 4:2, especially disagreement over financial support for Paul (Peterlin 1995: 101–32, 171–216). This letter of only rarely polemical tone is subjected by some to a process which Barclay (1987) calls 'mirror-reading'; both the method and its criteria are open to criticism (Fee 1995: 7–10). Discord in the Philippian church at this time is probably best explained by the situation of Gentile converts vis-à-vis Roman civic pride and official cult and a tempting compromise offered by Jewish Christians (Tellbe 1994).

C. Paul's Situation. 1. The common view till this century was that Paul wrote from Rome in the early 60s CE. Even if he was only under house-arrest (Acts 28:30), this could mean painful frustration. On this view 'the (praetorium) imperial guard'

(1:13) and 'the emperor's [Caesar's] household' (4:22) would be in their regular bases in Rome itself.

2. Many today favour an earlier imprisonment, most preferring Ephesus in the mid-50s, about the probable time when Paul wrote 1–2 Corinthians and Romans, to which Philippians is said to be close in doctrine. Though there is no direct evidence for such an imprisonment, 1 Cor 15:32 and 2 Cor 1:8–10 might refer to it. Some epigraphic evidence is cited to argue that 'praetorium' and 'Caesar's household' could refer to a provincial governor's establishment. Communication between Philippi and Ephesus would be easier and quicker than with Rome.

3. Evaluation: in 2 Cor 11:23 Paul looks back on 'many' imprisonments, so that in theory any of them could be possible. However, the case for Ephesus is linked to the doubtful theory that Philippians is an amalgam (see PHIL D.2); the fewer letters are posited, the less need there is to suppose a shorter distance to be travelled. Similarities with Romans and 1–2 Corinthians need not tell against Philippians being dated a few years later. The epigraphic evidence is judged not relevant by Bruce (1980–1). In fine, the arguments for Ephesus have not overcome those for Rome (Fee 1995: 34–7).

D. Critical Questions. 1. Pauline authorship of Philippians is almost universally acknowledged, apart from some theories about 2:6–11.

2. The letter's unity and integrity have been challenged on grounds of apparent breaks in coherence and an order thought to be unsuited to its purpose (e.g. Collange 1979). Many hold that it has been re-edited from two or three letters by Paul, but disagree on where the cuts and rejoins are. The main reasons offered are an apparent ending and abrupt new start at 3:1, and the improbability that Paul left his thanks to the end.

3. Criticism (cf. O'Brien 1991: 10–18): no manuscript evidence suggests disturbance of the text. Any theory that an existing text has been rearranged by a redactor must show that it solves difficulties in the text better than maintaining the traditional arrangement. For Philippians it must explain credibly why and how the supposed redactor wove several letters by Paul into a new composition. In fact the problem at 3:1 is not solved but shifted from Paul to an unknown X with unknown motives. As for the postponement of thanks, Polycarp, writing to the same church at twice the length, likewise keeps business to the end (Phil. 13, see Lake 1912–13: i). The strongest argument, however, for the integrity of Philippians rests on appreciation of the whole as a structured masterpiece (Garland 1985; see PHIL F).

4. The theory that 2:6–11 is an already existing hymn that Paul quotes for his purpose, first proposed by Lohmeyer (1928), has come to dominate both exegesis of Philippians and study of early Christology and credal formulas, though the term 'hymn' remains imprecisely defined and the theory still takes various forms, including earlier composition by Paul. The literature is enormous; with the standard survey by Martin (1983); see now O'Brien (1991: 186–271). A rare voice questioning the theory's solidity and value for exegesis is raised by Fee (1992; 1995).

5. Evaluation: whatever the origin of this undeniably poetic passage, it actually exists only in Phil 2; the exegete must expound it in that context. If Paul quoted an existing text, by himself or another, it became part of his letter; any argument for its detachability raises similar problems to those for denying the letter's integrity (Hooker 1978). Arguments against Pauline authorship risk being circular (Fee 1995: 45). Hypotheses about the development of Christology have been allowed to determine the exegesis of the passage, again producing circular arguments. Heightened poetic style does not prove non-Pauline origin (Martin 1983: 57; Fee 1992). Recent literary analysis emphasizes that the passage is integrally embedded in its context and the whole letter. Many of its keywords recur, subtly transposed, in ch. 3 (Dalton 1979: 99–100; Garland 1985: 158–9). This does not prove it was not an already existing text, but isolating it becomes increasingly problematic.

6. These expressions of reserve, however, do not deny that the passage's theological importance reaches wider than its immediate function in Philippians, or that its pattern of Christ's descent and ascent is paralleled in other early Christological statements in solemn style.

E. 'Stoicism' in Philippians. 1. The frequency of Stoic language in Philippians is emphasized by Engberg-Pedersen (1994). The evidence is seldom noted even in larger commentaries. When compelling examples such as autarkēs (4:11) cannot be denied (e.g. Fee 1995: 427–35), commentators insist that Paul radically transforms Stoic themes, which are generally disparaged. Yet the use of Stoic ideas in Luke's account of Paul's sermon in Athens (Acts 17:22–31) is matched by passages in Paul's letters. In fact Stoicism had appeal for both Jewish and Christian preachers. 1 Clement, which should be dated not much later than 70 CE (Herron 1989), that is, only about ten years after Philippians, is full of Stoic ideas and terms, all interwoven with biblical, Jewish, and Christian themes.

2. Romans shows Paul readily adopting Stoic language for his message (e.g. 1:28, 12:2); perhaps he did this whenever he addressed converts with any degree of philosophical education. Whatever the reason, in Philippians his use of Stoic language is pervasive, serving most of his main themes: the emphasis on keeping a right mind (phronein), discernment to choose the better (dokimazein ta diapheronta), aiming (skochein) at the right end (telos); seeking contentment (autarkeia) in one's state, with joy (chara) even when suffering; community (koinōnia) lived out in good citizenship (politeuesthai) related to a state or model (politeuma), and still more. These expressions prove serviceable to Paul, though only up to a point; the reality of Jesus and the supreme value of knowing him in life and death, through faith and hope, are grasped only by experience (3:8–11). Yet the paradox seems true that 'it is when Paul is at his most Stoic that he is also at his most Christian' (Engberg-Pedersen 1994: 280). Paul's harnessing of Stoic ideas to the gospel in Philippians does not enter those areas where Christian Stoicism was to reveal its dangers (e.g. excessive anthropocentrism and distortions of asceticism).

F. The Structure of Philippians. The letter has a 'rondo' structure; after an 'overture' (here called 1B), comments on practical matters (sections 2, 4, and 6C) alternate with two major exhortations (sections 3 and 5) each centring on a narrative with a downward–upward movement; the first about Christ (2:5–11), the second about Paul (3:4–14). These and their contexts are linked by many corresponding words and phrases (Garland 1985: 158–9; Fee 1995: 314–15). Repetition of significant words or ideas occurs throughout the letter. Inclusio is used systematically, both to articulate sections of the argument and to make the letter's closing sentences echo keywords in the opening. The commentary notes these points in detail.

COMMENTARY

Introduction (1:1–11)

(1:1–2) Greeting Paul includes colleagues with himself in seven letters, and Timothy most often, but not as co-author; in 2:19–24 he occurs in the third person. Paul refers to them both as 'slaves' of Christ Jesus, as in Rom 1:1. Since this is an opening formula, it can hardly be a conscious anticipation of its application to Christ in 2:7, though this may strike a reader today. Paul uses the expression 'the saints' in six letters, thus or in the formula 'called [to be] saints'. Modern versions often paraphrase it as 'the holy people of God'; the phrase connotes the Christian claim to have been brought through faith in Christ into God's covenant people (Ex 19:6; 1 Pet 2:9–10). Though the words 'bishops and deacons' come from the Greek (see PHIL B.2), their meanings have changed so much since their NT use that it is less misleading to render them by (e.g.) 'pastors' or 'guardians' and 'assistants'. The inclusion of these ministers, as well as the repeated 'all', five times from 1:1 to 1:8 (admittedly unusual for Paul), have been seen as a first hint of the disunity that Paul will address more clearly later (Lightfoot 1879: 67; Peterlin 1995). At this point, however, this can hardly do more than raise a suspicion. v. 2, 'Grace to you and peace' slightly varies the word order of a formula Paul uses in opening and closing greetings. The 'grace' formula is echoed in 4:23 to wrap up the whole letter. Though the Holy Spirit is expressly named only three times (1:19; 2:1; 3:3), here the formula can be called implicitly trinitarian (cf. 4:7; see Fee 1995: 48–9).

(1:3–11) Thanksgiving and prayer v. 3, Paul begins every letter to a church (except Galatians) by thanking or blessing God for the good he has heard about his addressees. Here he mingles these two reactions with his prayer for them (1:3–4) and with joy (1:5), a combination he will recommend in 4:6, as in 1 Thess 5:16–18. This paragraph is like a musical overture which anticipates themes to be heard later (PHIL F). Joy (chara) is the first of these; with its verb chairein it runs right through the letter. The focus of Paul's joy is the Philippians' sharing (koinōnia) with him in the gospel (1:5). Koinōnia is a keyword in the letter; aspects of it can be expressed by 'partnership', 'fellowship', 'union', and 'communion'. It occurs again at 2:1 and 3:10. Koinōnos (sharer, partner) occurs in the compound form sunkoinōnos at 1:7 and the related verbs at 4:14, 15. The prefix sun- ('together') occurs twelve times in the letter, compounded with eight nouns or verbs; it serves to enhance Paul's constant emphasis on relationship, unity and joy in community, and in sharing with him. The Philippians, of course, knew what the sharing had meant. For other readers Paul reveals it gradually: work for the gospel (1:5); prayer for him in his imprisonment and preaching, which he calls 'shar[ing] in God's grace' with him (1:7); striving side by side (1:27; 4:3) a metaphor from athletics that will recur, and finally their gifts of material support (4:15–18). v. 6, 'I am confident' (1:6): with this Paul passes from the Philippians' action to God's. (The verb recurs at 1:25, 2:24, and 3:3–4.) What Paul is confident about here is that their faith is God's 'good work', from when he began it till he brings it to completion 'by the day of Jesus Christ'. Paul returns to the interplay of human effort and God's work at 2:12–13. 'The day of Jesus Christ' is the day of his expected return; the phrase occurs again at 1:10 and 2:16. Paul refers to it as an assumed point of faith for the Philippians, a future reality though of unknown date; not a matter for overexcitement as it had been in Thessalonica. (This may perhaps lend some slight support for later dating of Philippians.)

v. 7, the keyword phronein (see PHIL E.2) appears for the first time. Here it expresses a warm personal concern, based on mutual affection, to 'hold' others in one's 'heart'. Whose heart, holding whom? Most older versions took it as Paul's, holding that of his friends. NRSV opts for the reverse. Both are grammatically possible; the emphasis may be on the comfort Paul receives in his captivity and his service of the gospel from the thought of them, or on their thought and prayer for him in his situation. It makes little difference, because the relationship is mutual; they are sunkoinōnoi with Paul, they 'share in God's grace' with him. To understand the heart as Paul's perhaps makes the next sentence follow more smoothly. v. 8, Paul says his feelings are not merely his own. He lives in such union with Christ (Gal 2:20) that he experiences Christ's compassion as his own. 'Compassion' renders spagchna, literally 'bowels', an idiom borrowed from Hebrew, which can relate strong emotions to various internal organs.

v. 9, Paul circles back to what he began to say in v. 3. He wants them to grow in agapē, the kind of love he has described in 1 Cor 13, and will appeal to here in 2:1, 2. He does not say love for whom, either for himself or for each other; he simply prays that their capacity for loving may increase so that it overflows ever more and more. But he wants it to be far more than mere feeling; rather, to be directed by 'knowledge and full insight'. These words are of great importance for understanding the letter; they spell out what Paul means by phronein. The word rendered 'knowledge' is epignōsis, probably in the sense of a knowledge transcending ordinary cognition (gnōsis). This is best illustrated by Paul's use of the related verb in 1 Cor 13:12: 'Now I know only in part; then I will know fully, even as I have been fully known' (emphasis added); it is knowledge that at least approaches the knowledge that God has of us. 'Insight' renders aisthēsis which basically means perception, but the Stoics and other moral philosophers used it for moral knowledge gained by experience, and this is its probable meaning here (the only occurrence in the NT). v. 10, the verb 'determine' (dokimazō) primarily means the testing by which something comes to be approved. 'What is best' is literally 'the things that are different' i.e. morally better. Such choices lived out will lead Christians to such a state that Christ at his return will find them to be 'pure and blameless'. The former word probably refers especially to motives; the latter (lit. with no stumbling) may refer both to moral steadiness and to not causing others to stumble. All this will bear the 'harvest of righteousness' through Christ's gift and to God's glory. Paul's prayer contains a whole cluster of pregnant words concerned with moral experience that develops character, and especially the capacity for loving realistically. Cf. Phil 4–7. The desired 'knowledge' is of God; the 'insight' is experience that builds up that knowledge; the testing of all things (1 Thess 5:21) leads to knowledge of God's will (Rom 12:2; Eph 5:10), with the purification of motives and moral firmness; all add up to the global moral term 'righteousness'. These ideas, if not the same words, reappear in Paul's central affirmation of his deepest values in 3:8–12. They are fundamental for the whole theory and practice of discernment in Christian tradition; yet it was Stoicism that provided Paul with many of the keywords: there is no need to shy away from this conclusion.

Paul's Situation and his Reactions to it (1:12–26)

(1:12–18) What has been Happening Two keywords mark off this section as another loose inclusio. The first is 'progress' (prokopē, v. 12, obscured in NRSV's 'to spread the gospel'). This is picked up again in 1:25, where the progress is on the part of Paul's addressees. The other keyword is 'confidence'; it recurs in 1:14, of Christians heartened by Paul's successful witness despite his imprisonment, and again in 1:25 of Paul trusting that he will remain some time longer for the encouragement of the Philippians. Other keywords in this section are 'gospel' (1:12, 16, 27) and 'rejoice'/'joy' (chairō, chara, 1:18, 25).

In the first seven verses Paul assures his readers that two aspects of his situation which might be expected to cause him pain and frustration have rather had the opposite effect. The first is his captivity. He does not describe his circumstances except by the conventional 'chains' and the implication that it would be his guards who spread favourable impressions of him around the praetorium (1:13 probably in the regimental sense, Lightfoot 1879: 99–104). On the alternative theories based on Rome and Ephesus, see PHIL C. The traditional view, that Paul is writing from Rome, naturally refers to Acts 28; he had come 'in chains' (28:17) with a soldier guarding him (28:16), temporarily in a 'guesthouse' (28:23) but then for two years in lodgings where he could receive visitors (28:30). Philippians, for all its reticence, implies severer conditions than this. Perhaps after two years of waiting, on being called to have his case heard, Paul came under regulations requiring prison custody. Apologia (defence) in Phil 1:7 and 16 could refer to a formal hearing (cf. 2 Tim 4:6) but by reason both of its range of meaning and of its context here it can equally well refer to the 'apologetic' aspect of preaching. (Of course, such a series of events could have taken place in Ephesus, and no arguments seem decisive.) Paul does not explain how his imprisonment has encouraged Christians to witness to their faith more boldly (v. 14). Perhaps they are saying 'if Paul can do so much in chains, how much more should we dare to do in freedom?' If his guards have played a part, this could be cheering news also for his readers in a proud Roman colonia (Tellbe 1994: 110–11). v. 15, Paul sees two spirits at work in their activity, one of goodwill (eudokia) and love towards him, the other of envy (phthonos), rivalry (eris), and selfish ambition (eritheia, v. 17; 2:2), making some act not with pure motives (hagios, purely), but to cause Paul distress (thlipsis, v. 17; 4:14). The latter group is not identified, but they seem to be a part of the Christian community where Paul is. Clement of Rome, writing to Corinth not long afterwards (PHIL E.2), says that Peter and Paul were hounded to death by envy, jealousy, and rivalry (1 Clem. 5.2–5); see Brown and Meier (1983: 123–7; they also favour Rome as where Paul wrote Philippians, pp. 185–8). The trouble could well have begun with Jewish Christians who wanted the church to remain within Judaism and saw Paul's policy as misguided. Paul, however, regards all negative factors with a sublime equanimity, because for him they are outweighed by his supreme desire, to see Christ's gospel spreading; frustration and anger are simply overwhelmed by joy (v. 18).

(1:19–26) Paul's Hope and Confidence in Christ Paul turns from his reactions to recent events to envisage the foreseeable future. Inclusio markers are 'joy' (v. 26, picking up the related verb in v. 18), 'progress' (v. 25, from v. 12), and 'trusting' (v. 25, from v. 14). All three have now changed their subjects (see PHIL 1:12 and 1:18; 'joy' is now Paul's wish for the Philippians). The passage is full of the vocabulary of hope and confidence and the motives for these, and of a peaceful yet passionate equanimity, based on certainty of Christ's love. v. 19, this verse is pivotal, grounding both Paul's joy in the situation just described and his confidence for the future: 'I know [the verb is repeated at v. 25] that ... this will result in my deliverance.' Verbally this is one of the few OT allusions in Philippians; it reproduces the Greek of Job 13:16, in a passage that expresses Job's invincible trust in a transcendent justice. But in Paul's very different situation he is hardly likely to be comparing himself with Job; the coincidence of language could almost be accidental. 'Deliverance' is sōtēria (salvation); the NRSV's rendering seems to focus on Paul's vindication and release, but this does not exclude an implicit eschatological sense, as is clear, with reference to the Philippians in 1:28 and 2:12. Paul's first motive for confidence is his certainty that his friends pray for him as he does for them (1:14), and that their intercession is effective. Paul's second motive is revealed with the first of the three explicit references to the Holy Spirit in Philippians (see PHIL 1:2). 'Help' is epichorēgia, the act of supplying or providing for needs. Lightfoot (1879: 91) discusses whether the Spirit is the giver or the gift, and concludes for both. Chōrēgia and the related verb could still retain a note of generous bounty, from their origin in sponsorship of civic celebrations by rich Athenians. v. 20, 'eager expectation' (Gk. apokaradokia) evokes a picture of heads strained forward in anticipation. The only other occurrence in the NT is in Rom 8:19, where Paul sees the whole of creation thus longing 'for the revealing of the children of God'. Paul hopes that he, and still more the gospel, will not be brought into public discredit, especially at his trial. In the biblical world 'shame' refers not so much to an emotion as to public worsting and discrediting; the psalmists often pray to be spared it (e.g. Ps 71:1), but to see their enemies suffering it (e.g. Ps 70:2). Positively, Paul hopes to speak 'with all boldness': the last word is parrhēsia, which is what Peter and John showed before the Sanhedrin (Acts 4:13). It is contrasted with being put to shame also in 1 Jn 2:28, but at the eschatological judgement, not a human trial. However, Paul's focus here, that 'Christ will be exalted now as always in my body, whether by life or by death' may have an overtone of the special sense of parrhēsia which developed in the NT. The word was born in political and forensic contexts, meaning freedom of speech or outspokenness. It came to connote also courage in speaking out; finally in the NT it has a special sense of confidence in God, a gift of the Holy Spirit to all who become God's children in union with Christ, and through him have access (prosagōgē) to God. (See Rom 5:2; 2 Cor 3:12; Eph 3:12; Heb 4:16; 10:19; 1 Jn 3:21; 4:17; 5:14.) Paul need not have this sense fully in mind here, but he is hardly thinking merely of speaking boldly at his trial. He speaks from his awareness of constant union with Christ. If he is worsted, then Christ will be shamed in him; if he is enabled to speak well, Christ will be 'exalted' in him, and just as much if he dies as if he lives on, for neither circumstance can separate him from Christ. v. 21, thus Paul's thought flows straight into the third great expression of his spiritual equilibrium. First came prison or liberty; then being spoken of with love or with malice; now death or life, because 'to me, to live is Christ and to die is gain'. A psychological state undisturbed by fear or human attachments was the ideal for both Stoics and Epicureans; but for Paul, both his emotional balance and his whole range of values are entirely governed by his union with Christ, as he will make even clearer in 3:7–12. This serenity pervading Philippians, in contrast to Galatians and 2 Corinthians, suggests a spiritual state perhaps more appropriate to Paul's final years, and therefore to Rome. ('Gain', kerdos, reappears with its related verb in 3:7–8, referring to values which Paul has rejected and replaced by new ones.) He cannot make a choice even between living and dying (even though the latter would lead to his being 'with Christ' in the fullest sense) except by discerning Christ's will. This evidently leads him to decide that he must stay (v. 24); then immediately he says that he knows this with confidence (cf. 1:6, 19), for the Philippians' 'progress and joy in faith': (v. 25; cf. 2:17). Towards them, he is so far from Stoic apatheia as to want to come 'and share abundantly in your boasting in Christ Jesus' (v. 26). This is one of only three occurrences in Philippians of the word-group of kauchaomai, commonly rendered 'boast', that is so characteristic of Paul (55 of 59 instances in NT, 34 of them in 1–2 Corinthians; see TDNT iii. 645–54). His repeated concern with having (or not having) grounds for boasting is puzzling, especially given his teaching on 'works' in Romans 3–4; one can only conclude that the Greek words have a wider reference than self-glorification, and include joyful exultation for and with others, as seems the case here.

First Exhortation on Discipleship (1:27–2:18)

(1:27–30) Steadfastness in the Face of Opposition This paragraph is linked to what precedes, especially by 'gospel' (1:12, 16, 27), 'salvation' (1:19, 28), and 'faith' (1:26, 29). v. 27, 'conduct yourselves' translates the verb politeuesthai, 'to act as a citizen' (Lightfoot 1879; Brewer 1954). NRSV misses the political sense (important also in Stoicism), though it keeps it when the related noun politeuma 'commonwealth' or 'citizenship' occurs in 3:20. Miller (1982) shows that Judaism had appropriated this vocabulary, and argues that Paul follows this usage, implying that the church is the New Israel; but see Engberg-Pedersen (1994: 263) and Fee (1995: 161–2). It makes a difference whether Paul is urging the Philippians to show their Christianity in good citizenship, or has transferred the verb to a purely Christian context. His wish for their steadfast unity in fidelity to the gospel (rest of 1:27) might suggest the latter, but bold resistance to their opponents (v. 28) implies the public forum. The exhortation to unanimity in Christ already anticipates 2:1–5. Is then the 'one spirit' in 1:27 simply human unanimity (as NRSV implies), or does it point to the clearer reference to the Holy Spirit in 2:1? Fee (1995: 164–6) argues plausibly for the latter. For unanimity Paul could easily have used the Stoic homonoia (frequent in 1 Clement), just as his athletic metaphors ('striving side by side', v. 27, and 'contest', v. 30, NRSV 'struggle') are Stoic clichés (Tellbe 1994: III). What is essentially Christian is, of course, the hope of 'salvation' which 'is God's doing' (v. 28), and the sense that both faith in Christ and suffering for him are 'graciously granted' (echaristhē) as a privilege (v. 29), which Paul sees as binding them more closely to himself in Christ, v. 30. Faith in Christ is again linked with the idea of suffering in 2:17 and 3:9–10. The 'opponents' at whose hands suffering is expected probably refers to political and social pressure to take part in the imperial cult (Tellbe 1994). If politeuesthe indeed refers to good citizenship, Paul would be recommending this as the best defence (cf. Polycarp, Phil. 10.2). But the threat is also to the Philippian church's unity, and Paul is passionately concerned that this should be in and with the suffering Christ as Paul has preached him.

(2:1–6) Unity of Minds and Hearts v. 1, the tone of appeal now rises to a more intense level of feeling through a series of 'if' clauses, regular in the rhetoric of entreaty. This more solemn tone tells against supposing a 'hymnic' style only from v. 6 onwards. In prayers, the formula typically reminds a deity of past theophanies; here the idiom implies something like 'if x means anything to you, then prove it now'. Paul appeals to what he is sure the Philippians have experienced: 'encouragement in Christ', 'consolation from love', 'sharing in the Spirit', 'compassion [see PHIL 1:8], and sympathy'. Of these, sharing, koinōnia, is fundamental to all the others, above all since it is in (now certainly the Holy) Spirit. At last (v. 2) comes the apodosis to the four 'ifs': 'make my joy complete', the joy which Paul has expressed for himself in 1:4 and 18, and wished for them in 1:25. The desired response is described by four phrases which all express union of minds and hearts: two use the keyword phronein ('be of the same mind . . . of one mind'); the others are 'having the same love' (agapē) and 'being in full accord' (sumpsuchoi, united in soul). The most important words here were already established in 1:4–9, together with words compounded with sun-, 'together', to intensify the sense of sharing. In v. 3 Paul continues his description of the attitudes he desires by alternating dos and don'ts: not 'selfish ambition', which he has been suffering (1:17), nor conceit (kenodoxia, vainglory) but rather 'humility, regard[ing] others as better than yourselves'. The last phrases are significant for the letter's unity, being echoed both in 2:7–8 and in ch. 3. v. 4, another do and don't concerns looking to 'the interests of others'. The verb is skopeō, 'to aim' (like phronein, a Stoic word); it recurs (with its noun) in 3:14–17. In Paul's present context, of course, phronein essentially involves a right skopos of mind and heart, 'as in Christ Jesus' (v. 5).

Do the attitudes (and perhaps activities) not commended in vv. 3–4 point to actual divisions within the Philippian church? Whether 1:1–4 contains hints or not, the immediately preceding exhortation in 1:27–30 now makes a reference to disunity more likely, especially on such grounds as Tellbe (1994) suggests. This will be discussed later, where clearer indications occur. Here it is not certain how far breaches of unity have actually gone. 'Selfish ambition' (2:3) could be in Paul's mind because he has suffered from its effects (1:17). Other phrases he uses may well refer to the quarrel to be mentioned in 4:2, especially if others had joined in; but surely the main thrust of this appeal, as of the passage into which it leads, is to focus the Philippians' minds on their relationship with Christ; references to human faults need to be clearer to prove an actual state of conflict.

(2:5–11) Christ, the Focus and Model for Discipleship The standpoint of the following comments is outlined in PHIL D. vv. 5–11, most commentators, accepting a hymn theory, set the passage out like verse. This displays its elegant composition in short cola, as found in classical artistic prose, but does not prove it to be a hymn in terms of either Semitic or Greek models. The wide and imprecise use of 'hymn' in modern discussion has not helped (O'Brien 1991: 188). The opening exhortation follows smoothly from the preceding sentences, points to Christ as model, and continues with a narrative about him in language which is certainly poetic and goes beyond Paul's usual vocabulary, but not necessarily his capacity when moved. Many keywords are echoed later, especially in ch. 3. The following exegesis takes the passage as it stands in its context. However, the possibility that Paul is adopting the structure of an existing model for credal-type statements will be considered in conclusion.

v. 5, 'Let the same mind be in you that [was] in Christ Jesus': more literally, 'be thus minded in/among yourselves as also in Christ Jesus'. The first 'in' is ambiguous in Greek; the context favours 'among', i.e. in interpersonal relations. The unexpressed verb has to be understood; more complicated ellipses have been proposed, e.g. 'which you have by virtue of your [life] in [union with]'; but 'was' is most satisfactory. Paul points to Jesus, as known on earth, as the example for Christians in their relationships. This is rejected by some, for whom the hymn theory dictates their exegesis; they hold that the hymn was kerygmatic, proclaiming doctrinal truths about Jesus and that to make him a mere ethical model is somehow an inferior use of the hymn (cf. Martin 1983: 68–74, 84–8; Stanton 1974: 99–110; O'Brien 1991: 253–62). v. 6, 'who, though he was in the form of God': 'though' is an added interpretation; others suggest 'because' (Moule 1970). The Greek for 'was' is not the simple verb, but the participle of a stronger verb, huparchōn, 'existing'. Form (morphē) has a complex history (Behm, TDNT iv. 742–50). It connotes the outward aspect of something but not mere appearance; it also reflects the inward nature. Since God is incorporeal we must examine how Scripture describes theophanies. This suggests 'glory' as being what morphē implies, but this will not fit in v. 7, where morphē is that of a slave.

It is desirable to keep one word in both places, and 'form' remains the least unsatisfactory. This verse already raises the question whether it refers to Christ's pre-existence or to his life on earth, but first we must read further. Paul has just used the verb 'regard' (hēgoumai) in exhortation (2:3), and will use it thrice of his own values in relation to Christ in 3:7–8. 'Equality with God' seems like a repetition with variation of 'being in the form of God', but not all agree on this. Indeed, the meaning of this clause is the storm-centre of modern controversy on Philippians. 'Something to be exploited' interprets one word, harpagmon. It is important that in the Greek the negative governs not the verb 'regard' but this noun (Carmignac 1971–2). The actual order is: 'not [as] harpagmos did he regard being equal to God'. The issue is not pedantic; it is between two alternative 'stories'. These depend (1) on two possible senses of harpagmos and (2) on what is being contrasted with what. Harpagmos is a verbal noun from harpazō, to seize or snatch. Its form raises problems (BAGD 108; Hoover 1971; O'Brien 1991: 211–16); it can refer either to the act of seizing or the thing seized, and the sentence does not indicate when in the 'story' either of these was contemplated by Christ, in his 'pre-existence' or his earthly life. This question also affects how, in the next verse, we understand 'he emptied himself' and what follows; it is relevant also to the other Pauline passage which seems to parallel this passage most closely: 'For you know the generous act [lit. grace] of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, so that by his poverty you might become rich' (2 Cor 8:9).

The two lines of exegesis may be summarized as follows. First, most of the tradition, from the Greek fathers till recent times, assumes that vv. 6–11 are integral to their context and also that Paul believed in Christ's divinity and incarnation. Christ's being 'in the form of God' and 'equality with God' refer to his status 'before' his incarnation, which is the subject of v. 7. Christ, being by nature one with the Father, regarded this status as no harpagmos, i.e. not like a prize which he had won (and might fear to lose, as a freed slave would jealously treasure his new status and refuse slavish work). Instead, in trustful obedience to the Father, Christ 'emptied himself' and became not only mortal but actually like a slave, e.g. by washing feet, and above all by suffering a slave's death. The contrast implied by the placing of the negative is between Christ's status as Son of God and his acceptance of that of a slave. This summarizes the exegesis of Chrysostom (PG 62.217–37) and Isidore of Pelusium (PG 78.1071), both masters of Greek artistic prose as a living tradition.

The second line (or rather several lines, but all stemming from the same basic option) reads the negative as if it governed the verb 'regard', and harpagmon as a prize to be won. To mention an agent and immediately characterize him as one who did not seek to usurp divine status suggests a contrast with some figure who did that; thus some have proposed historical rulers (Seeley 1994); more have turned to the OT. Here lines diverge: one sees a contrast with rebellious deities, as in the myths (applied to human kings) in Isa 14:12–21 and Ezek 28, or (as an aetiology of evil and also against the post-exilic Jerusalem priesthood) in 1 Enoch (Sanders 1969). More widely canvassed is a contrast with Adam, following the tradition that he sinned by ambitious pride (hubris), wanting to become like God (surveyed in O'Brien 1991: 263–8); Wright (1992: 56–98) makes this integral to a comprehensive New Adam theology. But this reading of v. 6 rests on two unsafe foundations: first, that morphē in the NT can be a synonym for eikōn, the 'image' of God, as in Gen 1:26 (in favour, Martin 1983: 106–10; against, Behm in TDNT iv. 752: in Paul, Christis the eikōn of God); and second, on an unverified assumption that the tradition ascribing such hubris to Adam was in existence by the time of Paul. It is not found in the OT or pre-Pauline literature; it seems to have arisen (perhaps because of the obscure similarities between Ezek 28 and Gen 2–3) by ascribing to Adam the arrogant motives of the figures in Isa 14 and Ezek 28. The earliest hint of this is probably in Josephus, Ant. 1.47 (Procopé 1941–). The roles of Adam in Romans and 1–2 Corinthians are clear; proponents of a contrast with him in Phil 2 have yet to prove that Adam's hubris was already a theme that could be referred to by mere allusion. The most likely OT reference is quite different (see below). These and other proposed backgrounds (Martin 1983: 74–93; O'Brien 1991: 193–7) which generally assume the hymn theory as proved, mostly understand Christ's position in v. 6 as referring to his lifetime on earth, and harpagmos as an act of usurpation which he renounced. Yet not all who interpret thus oppose pre-existence, indeed, this is increasingly (and rightly) recognized as Paul's belief, expressed both here and elsewhere.

vv. 7–8, the older exegetical line (1) takes these verses as referring first to the incarnation, then to its continuation in Jesus' life and death. Some proponents of a type (2) theory try to make them refer only to Jesus' history, but the effort is forced. The last phrase, 'even death on a cross' was declared by Lohmeyer a secondary 'Pauline addition' because it did not fit into the 'hymn' as reconstructed by him (O'Brien 1991: 230–1). Simply on a stylistic analysis, it crowns a series of steps as a climax (not of height but of depth), the effect of which would strike ancient hearers with the force of shocking paradox (Fee 1995: 217). Its centrality for Paul is reflected in 3:10. A Christological complication was introduced by the Kenotic theory (Martin 1983: 66–8, 169–72) which interpreted the 'self-emptying' as a real abandonment of the nature of God. This misses the metaphoric character of 'he emptied' (ekenōsen; for its probable OT source see below); Chrysostom (PG 62.229) realized this, as part of the parable of a self-humbling king's son which he finds implicit in the the whole passage; it is explained by the following phrases in vv. 7–8. These are admittedly difficult. They are not typical of Paul's usage, and 'form', 'likeness', and schēma all seem rather weak ways of expressing the reality of Christ's humanity, which Paul surely wants to affirm as truly as his divinity. Morphē in a human context balances its previous divine context, and (as we saw) implies more than mere outward shape; but schēma does mean shape (though NRSV loosely renders it 'form'), while 'likeness' is also vague. And why is 'slave' mentioned before human status? The best answer lies in recognizing an allusion to the Isaian 'Servant' (Jeremias 1963; 1965). This is prima facie likely because that figure was so important for NT writers (Dodd 1952: 88–96). Though here all the words that favour an allusion are different from those usual in the NT, and imply the existence of a translation closer to the Hebrew

(e.g. doulos, 'slave', instead of pais, 'boy'), the cluster of significant ideas could well form a recognizable way of hinting at the Isaian figure. Thus he 'emptied himself' could evoke 'he poured out himself' (Isa 53:12), morphē could allude to the Servant's lost beauty (Isa 52:14; 53:2), and he 'humbled himself' to Isa 53:4. This proposal has been unjustly opposed; it has more explanatory power than others. It illuminates the paradoxical choice of morphē to connote both Christ's divine nature and his acceptance of 'slave' status, especially if we accept that behind the Isaian Servant lies the role of the king in the pre-exilic cult (Eaton 1979: 75–84). Doulos is then not merely a slave as in the Graeco-Roman world but the royal Son and Servant of the divine King, living and dying in obedience (as in v. 8) as Chrysostom realized. Christ's 'self-emptying', like that of the Isaian Servant, bears an implication of sacrificial self-giving, lived out physically on earth, but also revealing a quality intrinsic to divine love.

Several keywords here also help to anchor the passage in the letter as a whole. 'He humbled himself' gives the model for the humility recommended in 2:3. The root occurs again, together with words formed from morphē and schēma, in 3:21. As the Son 'was found' in the human race (v. 7), so Paul hopes finally to 'be found' in him (3:9). But these recurrences are transformed in a way that depends on the second part of the 'story' of Christ. The whole passage, 2:5–11, has a downward–upward movement. The shameful death by the cross is the lowest point; vv. 9–11 are the upward-moving reversal, a second stanza in terms of poetic structure.

v. 9, 'Therefore' (dio) implies God's acceptance of Christ's self-offering, not necessarily a reward. The verb 'highly exalted' (huper-hupsoō) expresses a superlative degree of honour. Paul delights in huper-compounds (Fee 1995: 221). Those who take the passage primarily as a Christological statement find it strange that the resurrection is not explicitly mentioned, but it is implicit in 'exalted'. 'And gave him' (echaristato) is more accurately 'graciously conferred on him'; the verb used of God's giving the Philippians the grace of suffering for Christ (1:29). This echo, occurring in such close proximity, links their sufferings with Christ's glorification after his passion; the upward movement is for them too. What has been conferred is 'the name that is above every name': in biblical idiom 'name' can be personal or titular; a name has meaning and is charged with power. What name is meant here? The choice is between Jesus and Kurios, 'Lord'. '[S]o that at the name of Jesus every knee should bend' (v. 10) might seem to favour 'Jesus', but the confession that 'Jesus Christ is Lord' (v. 11) points decisively to the latter. 'Jesus' is his human name; Kurios and Christos are conferred titles, as in Peter's proclamation 'God has made him both Lord and Messiah, this Jesus whom you crucified' (Acts 2:36).

Christos (Heb. māšîaḥ) denotes the expected 'Anointed one'; Kurios was the regular Greek rendering of 'ādōnāy, the reverent equivalent of YHWH, though it had many other uses, including for the emperor. But vv. 10–11 are an adapted quotation of Isa 45:23, the context of which is that YHWH has proclaimed that he alone is God; there he says 'To me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear.' Paul vastly expands

'every knee', and changes 'to me' to 'at the name of Jesus'; then he changes 'swear' to 'confess' adding the object clause 'that Jesus Christ is Lord (Kurios).⁷ At the beginning of the 'story' in 2:6 Jesus was 'in the form of God'; now he is 'hyper-exalted' and Paul adapts a text that denies that there is any God but YHWH, to say that God has given Jesus the supreme name, so that he may at last be adored by every being in the threefold cosmos and universally acclaimed as Kurios. But in this acclamation does Kurios function as the name YHWH, so that, God having conferred it on Jesus, a distinction is implied between God and YHWH? Or if Kurios functions not as a name but as an ordinary predicate, what other value for it is high enough to measure up to Paul's statements implying Jesus' divinity? (He must also have been aware of making a politically dangerous claim contrary to the imperial cult (Tellbe 1994: 111–14), but Paul's primary focus is theological.) The above dilemma seems inescapable: intolerable to Jews, and embarrassing to Christian exegetes who assume that rigorous monotheism was established long before Jesus and Paul. This is why theories of non-Jewish influences on early Christology have proliferated, encouraging theories that the 'hymn' in ch. 2 is non-Pauline. Recent research, however, is showing ever more clearly that, at least until the reconstruction of Judaism after 70 CE, Jewish theologizing took many forms and at least some were far short of the eventual monotheism (Segal 1978; Barker 1992). The total identification of YHWH with the High God 'ēl 'ēlyōn, and the redefinition of the latter's sons as angels, long remained incomplete, and the memory of how the king had been enthroned as 'Son of YHWH' haunted minds disaffected towards the second temple. The varieties of pre-rabbinic Judaism already contained the materials for the Christian interpretation of Jesus' life, death, and resurrection in relation to the divine unity. It is no longer enough to say that in v. 11 Kurios is 'the equivalent of Yahweh' and that 'Paul's monotheism is kept intact by the final phrase, "unto the glory of God the Father"', as in 1 Cor 8:6, 'one God the Father... and one Lord Jesus Christ' (Fee 1995: 222, 226); this only restates the dilemma above. Paul's faith can be understood only as already essentially trinitarian.

In conclusion, vv. 5–11 are fully integrated in the letter. Paul introduces the 'story' of Jesus to encourage the Philippians to humility and mutual respect by looking at him. Within that context the upward movement, effected by God's exalting of Christ, reminds them of the divine call behind the exhortation in 2:1–5, as if to say 'as disciples and members of Christ, you do not need to think of your own interests or dignity—leave it all to God; just contemplate (phroneite) the whole story of Christ. Whatever you have to suffer now, Christ is leading you to glory.' Within the letter as a whole, the passage is the climax of the first great exhortation. The second climax, in ch. 3, balances the first, both by verbal echoes and by repeating the downward-upward movement, now with reference to Paul. The movement corresponds to a pattern found (with variations) in a number of early quasi-credal statements, some more poetic in style, others less. The pattern would have taken shape in early meditation on Jesus' baptism, death, and resurrection in the light of OT texts, as in Acts 2:22–36. Its skeleton is in 2 Cor 8:9; freer variations appear in Col 1:15–20 and the Gospel of John, especially the prologue and the theme of lifting up and glorification. In early poetry we find it in the second-century Odes of Solomon, with typically Syrian emphasis on the descent to Sheol, in Odes 17, 22 (which brings Jesus' baptism into the pattern), 24, and 42. Since Paul was probably the earliest of all the writers involved, the variants of the pattern may well issue out from him.

(2:12–18) The Response Paul Desires from the Philippians

Paul returns to direct exhortation, now illuminated by Christ's example; 'you have always obeyed' echoes 'he became obedient' (2:8), and likewise has no named object, but implies primarily God (Lightfoot 1879: 115–16), rather than Paul (as NRSV). vv. 12–13, Paul has mentioned salvation as his hope both for himself (1:19) and for the Philippians, adding 'this is God's doing' (1:28). What is added now is emphasis on human collaboration with God: 'work out your own salvation... for it is God who is at work'. It is not, of course, autonomous labour. The force of 2:5–11 still directs the thought; the Christian's personal effort is with and in Christ. 'Fear and trembling' was proverbial from the OT; Paul usually uses it of human relations (1 Cor 2:3; 2 Cor 7:15; Eph 6:5), but here of a stance before God. At 1:15 Paul uses 'good pleasure' of attitudes favourable to himself, though usually in the NT it refers to God's benevolent will towards humankind (e.g. Lk 2:14; Eph 1:5). vv. 12–13 became a key text in all discussions of grace and free will.

v. 14, Paul echoes the Exodus story for both warning and encouragement, alluding to the people's repeated grumbling (Ex 15–17; Num 14–17) and 'arguing': with divided minds, doubting God's providence. v. 15, phrases in Deut 32:5 are turned from condemnation to encouragement: 'children of God without blemish' is what Moses said the people no longer were; Paul promises the Philippians that they can become so. A 'crooked and perverse generation' was said of the people; Paul applies it to the hostile environment in which the Philippians 'shine like stars' (with perhaps a hint of Mt 5:14, 16). He uses the present tense to encourage them, but in v. 16 there is a hint of pleading; on their 'holding fast to the word of life' depends his hope of being able to 'boast [cf. 1:26] on the day of Christ [cf. 1:10] that [he] did not run in vain'—again the athletic metaphor, used as in Gal 2:2; 4:11. v. 17, he changes to a metaphor of religious intensity: 'even if I am being poured out as a libation [eight words for one in Greek, spendomai] over the sacrifice and the offering of your faith, I am glad and rejoice'. Here the 'priests' are the Philippians (cf. 4:18); he is ready to be part of their offering. (Paul never uses cultic or priestly terms in direct designation of his apostolic ministry, but only by way of metaphor; this is true even of the concentrated cultic language in Rom 15:16. Priestly and sacrificial language can be applied to all members of the church.) 'Offering' here renders leitourgia, see PHIL 1:19. It came to refer to religious worship (hence 'liturgy'), especially in the Greek Bible, but it retained its financial connotations (Peterlin 1995: 195–9). Here it combines with 'sacrifice' in a cultic metaphor, meaning the life of Christian faith. (In 2:25, 30 the financial sense is more prominent.) v. 18, Paul ends this section with a burst of joy ('I am glad') using not different words (as NRSV) but chairō four times, twice compounded with sun-, to express his own joy and to call the Philippians to the same.

Timothy and Epaphroditus, Paul's Go-Betweens (2:19–30)

This section introduces two of Paul's helpers, but tells us more about his affection for them than the reasons for their journeys. On Timothy see Acts 16:1–3; 17:14–15; 19:22; he is not named in the account of Paul's first visit to Philippi, but the Christians there know him (v. 22), doubtless from the time mentioned in Acts 20:4. Paul's praise of him as alone iso-psuchon (lit. equal-souled) echoes his wish that they should all be sumpsuchoi (2:2). Apparently speaking of his present circumstances, Paul excepts Timothy alone from a judgement more sweeping than he made in 1:15–17: 'All ... are seeking their own interests, not those of Jesus Christ' (v. 21); he has urged the opposite attitude in 2:4. Timothy has 'served' (edouleusen, v. 22) 'the gospel' with Paul, like a son to him, both of them being slaves (douloi, 1:1) of Christ who took the form of a slave. As for Epaphroditus, Paul calls him 'brother' and uses two sun-words, 'fellow-worker' and 'fellow-soldier' (v. 25). He had come with a gift (4:18) as the Philippians' envoy (apostolos in the sense of šaliah, the agent of a synagogue, and leitourgos). Dissectors of Philippians argue that Paul would not have left his thanks to the end. Yet his appreciation is certainly implicit in vv. 25 and 30, where he uses leitourgia again in a 'non-liturgical' sense, for their subvention which Epaphroditus, at risk to his life, has brought. Admittedly his thanks are qualified; 'services that you could not give' (NRSV) is more literally 'your shortfall (husterēma) towards me'. See further PHIL 4:10–19. The Philippians had heard of Epaphroditus' illness; Paul has sent him back to relieve their anxiety about him (vv. 25–8). He wants them to receive Epaphroditus with joy and help people like him in honour (v. 29); he hopes shortly to send Timothy for more news and then soon to come himself (vv. 19–24).

What lies behind these dealings? (See PHIL A.3.) Peterlin (1995), analysing passages in Philippians and other letters in sociological categories, sees a community of house churches, differing in social and financial status and not all equally enthusiastic about regularly supporting Paul. Epaphroditus, he suggests, was well-off and willing to discharge a leiturgia, but not popular with all. This is a credible picture of relationships within the community but it neglects relevant external factors. As for grounds of dissension, when Paul saw serious trouble he usually spoke out plainly. The hints of discord or the grounds for suspecting criticisms of Paul in Philippians cannot compare with the evidence in 1–2 Corinthians. Clearly he is anxious for the Philippians' unity; but he seems to see the trouble as healable by recalling them to a right mind and renewed joy in Christ (cf. PHIL 4:8).

Second Exhortation on Discipleship (3:1–4:1)

(3:1–2) Transition These verses are widely held to belong to different letters (see PHIL D.2 and most commentaries). v. 1, the first phrase, 'Finally' (to loipon, lit. for the rest) is often a closing formula but equally can be a mere link like 'so'. The imperative chairete can mean 'farewell' but can equally remain a real imperative, 'rejoice' (as NRSV). Those who see vv. 1–2 as containing the end of a letter and the start of a fragment will take the first option in each case, but the second pair of options is perfectly possible and can support the case for the verse being a transition within one letter, as is defended here, following Reed (1996). Either way, the second sentence in v. 1 is difficult, because the three main terms in it are all obscure. (1) To what do 'the same things' refer, which Paul speaks of writing? (2) What does he mean by saying that his writing is not 'troublesome' for him? (3) What does he mean by being 'a safeguard' for his addressees? (1) On the assumption of a plurality of sources, 'the same things' are the various themes that Paul frequently addresses. On the 'integrity view', it means primarily rejoicing (just commended for the twelfth time), and probably also the warning (v. 2) that Paul is about to express, as often before (cf. 3:18). (2) Paul says that repeating this is not 'troublesome' for him, or something similar according to most interpretations. But the verb from which this adjective (oknēron) is formed primarily means 'to hesitate' or 'shrink'. Formulas using this word-group are common in Hellenistic papyrus letters in many contexts, e.g. of request or invitation: 'I say without hesitation ...' or 'Don't hesitate to ask ...' (Reed 1996); polite, persuasive formulas used when a writer feels tact is called for, as Paul might well here. In contrast, to say that writing the same things is 'not troublesome' seems rather pointless. (3) For his addressees, he says, his repetition is a 'safeguard' (asphales). Against what? The word negates ideas of stumbling or going wrong. Though it usually means 'safe' in a 'passive' sense (from danger, error, etc.), Paul applies it to his own action (calling for rejoicing) with reference to the effect he wants it to have on his readers, namely to stabilize and confirm them in faith and keep them from harm (what harm, we learn in v. 2). In conclusion, though the verse marks a transition, it need not be an unintelligibly harsh one: 'So go on, brothers [and sisters], rejoicing in the Lord; I don't hesitate to repeat this, while for you it is salutary.'

v. 2, the question of continuity arises again: there seems to be a sudden leap from gentleness to anger. Yet how harsh this feels depends on how one word is translated. The threefold 'look' (blepete) has often been taken as 'beware of' (as NRSV). But the latter sense normally requires a preposition not used here; without it, the probable sense is 'look hard at'. The verse is still a warning, and the strong language and its objects still have to be explained, but the tone now sounds less shrill. On a stylistic analysis (cf. Reed 1996: 84–8), the triple imperative balances the three imperatives in the three previous verses: 'receive', 'hold in honour', and 'rejoice' (2:29, 30; 3:1). The first three are addressed to friends; the second three refer to people regarded as enemies. A parallel occurs in 3:17–19. The transition here remains arresting, but it can be seen to be bridged.

(3:2–11) Paul's 'Transvaluation of Values' through Christ Whatever personal tensions there are within the community, Paul wants to draw their minds back to Christ as he did in ch. 2, but this time by telling them his own story, how he 'emptied himself' of secure pride so as to be with Christ, and how his only aim now is to follow the 'upward call' to the end. Judaism is where he started, but non-Christian Judaism would hardly be familiar to this church formed mainly of Gentile converts. Yet they are being troubled by people urging circumcision, contrary to the Jerusalem decision (Acts 15) not to impose it on Gentile converts and Paul's efforts to uphold this. This can account for Paul's starting-point in v. 2 and (to some extent) moderate the shock of his strong language. He may be quoting expressions that he had used on previous occasions (cf. 3:18) to raise his converts' morale by mocking at opponents. The first two could be turning back terms used by the 'enemy'; the third (katatomē) is a sarcastic play on 'circumcision' (peritomē), changing the prefix to one implying destruction. It is clear that circumcision is the issue, but not an attack on Jewish Christians as such, provided they do not deny that Gentile converts are true Christians and heirs to the promises to Israel. v. 3, Paul recalls his teaching on the 'true circumcision' through faith in Christ (Rom 2:25–9); now he adds the charismatic experience of Gentile Christians 'who worship in the Spirit of God'. He wants them to remain content as they are; but he does not explain why circumcision has been urged on them. He uses his regular antithesis of 'flesh' and 'spirit', but after 3:1 there is no more anger like that in Galatians. The suggestion of Tellbe (1994: 116–20; PHIL B.3) is plausible: all circumcised Jews could enjoy the exemptions granted by Rome to Judaism as a permitted religion, even if some were now also Christians; but uncircumcised Gentile Christians, even though recognized by Jewish Christians on the basis of Acts 15, could not. If they refused to take part in the imperial cult (surely important in a proud colonia), Paul's converts would be 'disloyal citizens' and incur persecution, as they already had (1:29). The Jewish Christians offer a way out: join us and live at peace. They might insist that it would involve no infidelity to Christ; but Paul could only see it as undermining his whole work of extending membership of God's people on the sole basis of faith in Christ crucified.

vv. 4–11, this may be why Paul leaves the circumcision issue, to tell (doubtless retell) his personal story. He is a Jewish Christian, once proud of his birth, observance, and zeal (vv. 5–6; cf. Acts 26:4–11). But he has undergone a complete 'transvaluation of values', which in vv. 3–11 he expresses by a series of keywords with changed applications. He recalls his former confidence in Jewish practice; we have seen at 1:6, 25, and 2:24 that he now bases this only on Christ. His righteousness was once based on the law (v. 6); now, solely on his faith in Christ (v. 9). In vv. 7–8 Paul plays on an accounting metaphor of gain (kerdos and verb kerdainō, cf. 1:21) and loss (zēmia and verb zēmnioumai); his assets have changed places by his new reckoning. Indeed, the metaphor of gain and loss, though quite different from that implicit in 2:6–8, corresponds in effect to Christ's regarding his divine status as 'no prize to be clung to' (oukh harpagmon) and, instead, 'emptying himself' (cf. Fee 1995: 314–15). The allusion continues in Paul's hope 'that I may gain Christ and be found in him' (vv. 8–9), as Christ was found in solidarity with the human race (2:7); when finally 'the books are opened', Paul hopes to be acknowledged as Christ's, because he has renounced all his assets to trust totally in him. What he now calls them (skubala, 'filth') recalls the invective of v. 2. v. 9 succinctly summarizes Paul's teaching on justification (Fee 1995: 319–26), which his converts would know well. v. 10 corresponds to 2:6–9 at the turning-point from descent to ascent. 'To know Christ', implies intimate, experiential knowledge, cf. 1:9; this is why Paul does not keep the order of Christ's crucifixion and exaltation, but interweaves them, just as the power of Christ's resurrection, the sharing (koinōnia) of his sufferings, and becoming like him in his death are experienced as interwoven in Christian prayer, liturgy, and life. As Christ was in the form of God and took the form of a slave (2:6–7), so Paul wants only to be 'con-formed' (sum-morphizomenos), moulded into that morphē. (The vocabulary recurs in 3:21.)

(3:12–16) Following the Upward Call with Paul v. 12, Paul's upward way (from v. 11) corresponds to 2:9–11, but glory is far ahead; to 'attain the resurrection' is an object of humble hope, desire, and effort. Paul knows that he has not 'obtained' (elabon) this or 'been made perfect' (as NRSV fn., cf. PHIL 3:15) 'but I press on' (diōkō, lit. pursue; last used of his former zeal in persecution, 3:6), 'to grasp it' (katalabō), as I have been grasped by Christ Jesus' (my tr.). Though the words are different, the image stands in striking counterpoint to harpagmos in 2:6; NRSV obscures this by using 'make [one's] own'. vv. 13–14, Paul repeats the verb, merging his accounting metaphor into that of running a race, a cliché of popular ethics that he has used before; 'straining forward' (epekteinomenos) renews the image in 'eager expectation' (PHIL 1:20). See further Pfizner (1967: 134–56). 'The goal' (skopos; its verb skopeō occurs in 2:4 and 3:17) is anything aimed at, but 'prize' (brabeion) belongs to athletics. The aim and the prize are pursued in response to 'the upward call' (as NRSV fn.) of God in Christ Jesus.

v. 15, this completes Paul's own downward-upward 'story', which corresponds to 2:6–11; now he turns to his addressees, and first to 'those of us . . . who are mature' (teleioi, lit. perfect). At v. 12 he has just disclaimed the related verb for himself. The mystery cults used these terms to refer to grades of initiation, and Paul could on occasion draw on that vocabulary for a metaphor (e.g. 4:12); Gnostic sects used it systematically. Koester (1961–2) and others find hints of Gnostic opponents here and elsewhere, but such theories go beyond exegesis. Neither is there need to posit charismatics who have got above themselves, as in Corinth, where Paul refers, perhaps with irony, to 'the perfect' (1 Cor 2:6). Here Paul returns to his major theme of a Christlike mindset (phronein); he is leading up to his concluding appeals in 4:2 and 4:8. He has held up the supreme model in 2:5–11 and told his own story; he seeks to persuade, not to bludgeon. He invites any who may 'think differently' to be attentive and receptive to God's interior revelation. 'This is not the language or mode of polemics' (Fee 1995: 353).

(3:17–4:1) Citizens of earth and heaven In 3:17–19 Paul holds up examples and counter-examples. Obviously he has told his own story to invite imitation, but in calling the Philippians to be his 'fellow-imitators' (sum-mimētai) he puts himself beside them, as in 3:15; Christ, not Paul, is the model. Secondly, he tells them to 'observe' (skopeite) those who live according to the 'example' (typos) you have in us'; here speaks a teacher, not one demanding a personality-cult. In contrast, in vv. 18–19

Paul renews past warnings against 'many' whom (as his urgent tone shows) he regards as a serious threat. Their 'end is destruction' (apōleia); in 1:28 this fate awaits opponents who are probably persecutors, but Paul's tears suggest a group within the church. They are 'enemies of the cross of Christ', yet nothing marks them as Jewish Christians. 'Their god is their belly' might refer to converts who, on the dietary issues discussed in 1 Cor 8, allow themselves too much liberty. 'Their minds are set (phronountes) on earthly things' and 'their glory is in their shame'—these phrases are enigmatic, but they could apply to Christians who, in face of the state cult and social pressures, chose to enjoy the sense of civic glory but with the shame of compromise, taking part in meals connected with public sacrifices and, in Paul's view, reducing Christianity to one among other acceptable philosophies.

If something like this was the case, v. 20 follows appositely: it is right to want to be good citizens, 'but our citizenship (politeuma) is in heaven'. Politeuma recalls the related verb in 1:27 and reinforces the case for taking it in civic terms, though many have understood both words more loosely in terms of way of life. The noun (often rendered 'commonwealth') refers to the state of which one is a citizen, either directly or by citizenship of an enfranchised colony, as Philippi was of Rome. Paul valued Roman citizenship and readily appealed to it at need; but just as humankind, created in God's image, has authority only by that title, so has any state. Hence for Christians (as also for Jews), God's politeuma is primary. Thus Paul's contemporary Philo, speaking of the patriarchs as 'sojourners on earth', says that heaven is their native land, in which they have their citizenship (politeuontai, Philo, Conf. Ling. 78–9), and a second-century apologist says exactly the same of Christians (Letter to Diognetus, 5). The heavenly politeuma is not merely an ideal; Christians actually live in two orders, of which the earthly is under the judgement of the heavenly. They are related not only 'vertically' but also eschatologically; 'it is from there that we are expecting a Saviour (sōtēr), the Lord Jesus Christ'. 'Saviour' contrasts with the 'destruction' facing the 'enemies of the cross', as sōtēria and apōleia are contrasted in 1:28. But sōtēr was also a title used in the ruler-cult; applied to Christ it makes a higher claim for him, just as 'Christ is Kurios' does over against the emperor. 3:21 winds up the parallelism of chs. 2:1–18 and 3 with many significant echoes. 'He will transform [metaschēmatisei, schēma, 2:8] the body of our humiliation' (cf. 'humility', 2:3 and 'he humbled himself', 2:8, all from the same root tapeinos 'that it may be conformed [sum-morphon, cf. morphē, divine and then human, 2:6–7] to the body of his glory [doxa, cf. 2:11 and in contrast just above, 3:19], by the power [energeia, cf. the twofold use of the related verb at 2:13] that also enables him to make all things subject to himself'. To savour how these echoes work, and then to see how 3:21 virtually sums up 1 Cor 15:20–8 and 2 Cor 3:18–5:10, is better than any commentary, but Fee (1995: 381–4) is good. 4:1 concludes the main exhortation: 'Therefore . . . stand firm in the Lord in this way'; for the rest, it overflows with words of love and joy, among which one (epipothētoi, beloved) echoes Epaphroditus' yearning in 2:26.

Final Exhortation, Thanks for Support, and Conclusion (4:2–23)

(4:2–3) Last Appeal for Harmony As already noted, recent exegetes find hints of disunity, and perhaps of different causes, in many passages (PHIL B.3), but 4:2 is the first place where Paul comes to naming names. Yet even here the trouble between Euodia and Syntyche is not defined more than as a failure 'to be of the same mind' (to think, phronein, the same). Garland (1985: 172–3) sees the whole letter as leading up to this; Peterlin (1995) constructs a total picture, defining the roles of episkopoi, diakonoi, and 'co-workers' (sunergoi, 2:25; 4:3); the two women are diakonoi, leaders of two house-groups in conflict, probably over material support of Paul. In contrast, Fee (1995: 385–400) after a survey of theories concludes that none is proven; we know neither the cause of the quarrel, nor the identity of the 'loyal companion', nor of the Clement named here, nor whether Lydia (Acts 16:14) was still there (perhaps identical with one or other of the women, or the 'companion'). The clearest indications of trouble in Philippians point to persecution and the temptation of Jewish Christianity (Tellbe 1994), but there is no hint of these as the issue in 4:2. One thing seems clear: the quarrel is serious and worries Paul; if 2:1–5 is related to it, it seems to have divided the community.

(4:4–9) Last Call to Joy, Peace, and 'Right Thinking' in Christ Yet whatever the trouble is, Paul seems confident that the cure is to recall the Philippians to the charismatic joy of their first coming to faith, exactly as he reminded their neighbours in Thessalonica how 'in spite of persecutions you received the word with joy inspired by the Holy Spirit' (1 Thess 1:6). His constant insistence on joy is not mere cheerfulness; this and following Christ with a right mind are the keys to Paul's strategy towards the Philippians. In vv. 4–7 he invites them to share the spirit of his initial greeting and prayer for them, with a few new touches. v. 5, 'Let your gentleness (epieikēs) be known to everyone': most versions have something similar. But the basic sense of epieikēs is 'seemly', decent or equitable; the phrase could be a last word on good citizenship, much as in 1 Pet 3:16. 'The Lord is near': in joy or suffering, or if the latter leads to death, all the nearer. v. 6, 'Do not worry about anything': as Paul has demonstrated regarding liberty or captivity, life or death (and is about to add, plenty or hardship). The basis is a perfect trust in God, expressed in prayer like that in 1:3–11 and here, which brings peace as in v. 7. Paul sums up his appeals for a right mind in Christ in vv. 8–9, now using a synonym as in 3:13. Few versions do justice to the heightened solemnity of tone (reminiscent of 2:1–4) and of vocabulary, which (like 2:6–11) includes several words beyond Paul's usual range. Neither there nor here need this point to a content author, despite the fact that both the rhetoric and the content of v. 8 are typical both of popular (especially Stoic) philosophy and of Hellenistic Judaism. This somewhat troubles Fee (1995: 413–19), but it need not (cf. PHIL E). Paul could harness this language to his gospel when he found it appropriate. In v. 9, as in 3:17, he reminds his pupils of what they have learned from him; he speaks with no arrogance but as a true teacher.

(4:10–23) Paul's Attitude to Gifts Received and Last Greetings The section composed of vv. 10–19 takes up from that in 2:19–30, completing the rondo pattern in the letter (PHIL F); the last appearance of several keywords also marks the overall inclusio: rejoice, v. 10; be concerned (phronein), v. 10; be humbled (tapeinounthai, obscured in NRSV), v. 11; share (koinōnos words, but now in a financial idiom), vv. 14, 15; gospel, v. 15; glory, v. 20. A simple reading may find behind this and 2:19–30 no more than a simple story, to which Paul refers with modest and undemanding gratitude; but there are hints of more complicated feelings (Peterlin 1995: 209–16). The Philippian church has supported Paul generously since the beginning (vv. 15–16). Paul is, and wants to appear, duly grateful, but in the embarrassment of need (chreia, 2:25; v. 16) he has to speak of shortfall (husterēma, 2:30; hustēresis, v. 11; NRSV conceals this by a bland paraphrase both times). But again, he wants not to seem demanding (v. 17); hence his assurances that he has learnt to be content with whatever he has (vv. 11–13). Here Paul shows the same equanimity as in 1:18 and 22; perhaps with a touch of mock solemnity, he uses the Stoic word autarkēs ('self-sufficient'; NRSV 'content', v. 11) and a metaphor from the mystery cults (lit. I am initiated into everything, v. 12). But then he fears that he may seem to be indifferent to the support which he actually needs. 'Mirror-reading' runs the risk of straying into imaginative fiction; but Paul's words here, almost as much as in 2 Corinthians, do suggest that he is facing several lines of criticism. Finally he stops trying to explain, and turns to praising their gift by describing it (by a metaphor already used in 2:17) as a sacrifice pleasing to God (v. 18), and praying that God will meet all their needs. The passage ends with a doxology. We do not know how successful this letter was in restoring harmony. No evidence remains to the contrary, in contrast with what 1 Clement reveals about Corinth some years after Paul's letters.

The letter closes by sending usual affectionate greetings and mentioning the emperor's household (v. 22), a hint (as 1:13) of successful influence on Paul's part, perhaps through his Praetorian contacts.

REFERENCES

- Barclay, J. M. G. (1987), 'Mirror-reading a Polemical Letter: Galatians as a Test Case', JSNT 31: 73–93.
- Barker, M. (1992), The Great Angel: A Study of Israel's Second God (London: SPCK).
- Bormann, L. (1995), Philippi. Stadt und Christengemeinde zur Zeit des Paulus, NovTSup 78 (Leiden: Brill).
- Brewer, R. R. (1954), 'The Meaning of Politeuesthe in Philippians 1.27', JBL 73: 76–83.
- Brown, R. E., and Meier, J. P. (1983), Antioch and Rome (New York: Paulist).
- Bruce, F. F. (1980–1), 'St Paul in Macedonia: 3. The Philippian Correspondence', BJRL 63: 260–84.
- Carmignac, J. (1971–2), 'L'importance de la place d'une négation: OYX APIAI' MON H' HΣATO (Philippiens II.6)', NTS 18: 131–66.
- Collange, J.-F. (1979), The Epistle of Saint Paul to the Philippians, tr. A. W. Heathcote (London: Epworth).
- Dalton, W. (1979), 'The Integrity of Philippians', Bib. 60: 97–102.
- Dodd, C. H. (1952), According to the Scriptures (Welwyn: Nisbet).
- Eaton, J. (1979), Festal Drama in Deutero-Isaiah (London: SPCK).
- Engberg-Pedersen, T. (1994), 'Stoicism in Philippians', in idem (ed.), Paul in his Hellenistic Context (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Fee, G. (1992), 'Philippians 2:5–11: Hymn or Exalted Pauline Prose?', BBR 2: 9–46.
- (1995), Paul's Letter to the Philippians, NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Garland, D. E. (1985), 'The Composition and Unity of Philippians', NovT 27: 141–73.
- Herron, T. J. (1989), 'The Most Probable Date of the First Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians', Studia Patristica, 21, ed. E. A. Livingstone (Leuven: Peters).
- Hooker, M. (1978), 'Philippians 2.6–11', in E. Ellis and E. Grasser (eds.), Jesus und Paulus, 2nd edn. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht).
- Hoover, R. W. (1971), 'The HARPAGMOS Enigma: A Philosophical Solution', HTR 64: 95–119.
- Jeremias, J. (1963), 'Zu Phil ii 7: 'EAYTON EKENΩΣEN'', NovT 6: 182–9.
- (1965), 'The Servant of God in the New Testament', in The Servant of God, SBT 20 (London: SCM), 97–9.
- Koester, H. (1961–2), 'The Purpose of the Polemic of a Pauline Fragment (Philippians III)', NTS 8: 317–32.
- Lake, K. (1912–13), (ed. and tr.), The Apostolic Fathers I–II, LCL (London: Loeb).
- Lightfoot, J. B. (1879), Saint Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians, 4th edn. (London: Macmillan).
- Lohmeyer, E. (1928), Kyrios Jesus: Eine Untersuchung zu Phil. 2, 5–11 (Heidelberg: C. Winkler).
- Malherbe, A. J. (1988), Ancient Epistolary Theorists, SBLBS 19 (Atlanta: Scholars Press).
- Martin, R. P. (1983), Carmen Christi: Philippians 2:5–11 in Recent Interpretation and in the Setting of Early Christian Worship, 2nd edn. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Meeks, W. A. (1983), The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Miller, E. C. (1982), 'Πολιτεύεσθε in Philippians 1.27: Some Philological and Thematic Observations', JSNT 15: 86–96.
- Moule, C. F. D. (1970), 'Further Reflexions on Philippians 2:5–11', in W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin (eds.), Apostolic History and the Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans), 264–76.
- O'Brien, P. T. (1991), The Epistle to the Philippians: A Commentary on the Greek Text, NIGTC (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Peterlin, D. (1995), Paul's Letter to the Philippians in the Light of Disunity in the Church, NovTSup 79 (Leiden: Brill).
- Pfizner, V. C. (1967), Paul and the Agon Motif, NovTSup 16 (Leiden: Brill).
- Procopé, J. (1941–), 'Hochmut', RAC xv. 795–858.
- Reed, J. T. (1996), 'Philippians 3:1 and the Epistolary Hesitation Formulas', JBL 115: 63–90.
- Sanders, J. A. (1969), 'Dissenting Deities and Philippians 2:1–11', JBL 88: 279–90.
- Seeley, D. (1994), 'The Background of the Philippians Hymn', Journal of Higher Criticism, 1: 49–72.
- Segal, A. (1978), Two Powers in Heaven (Leiden: Brill).
- Stanton, G. V. (1974), Jesus of Nazareth in New Testament Preaching, NTSMS 27 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Tellbe, M. (1994), 'The Sociological Factors behind Philippians 3:1–11 and the conflict at Philippi', JSNT 55: 97–121.
- Wright, N. T. (1992), The Climax of the Covenant: Christ and the Law in Pauline Theology (Minneapolis: Fortress).

INTRODUCTION

A. Colossae. 1. The sparse unexcavated ruins of what had been a large and prosperous Hellenistic city are located in the valley of the river Lycus 12 miles east of Denizli in Turkey. Seleucid promotion of its neighbours Laodicea and Hierapolis in the third pre-Christian century ended Colossae's virtual monopoly of the wool production of the valley. None the less the cyclamen purple (colossinus) fleeces of Colossae (Pliny, Nat. Hist. 21.51) continued to rival the glossy black wool of Laodicea (Strabo, Geog. 12.8.6). They were the mainstay of the local economy. Access to international markets was facilitated by the location of the cities on the great 'common highway' linking Ephesus (120 miles west) with the Euphrates (ibid. 14.2.29). The population was mainly pagan but in 213 BCE, in order to enhance commerce and trade, Antiochus III installed 2,000 Jewish families from Mesopotamia (Josephus, Ant. 12.148–53). By 62 BCE the amount of the temple tax confiscated by the Roman governor (20 pounds of gold) reveals that there were at least 11,000 adult male Jews in the Lycus valley (Lightfoot 1904: 20).

2. The Lycus valley was evangelized by Epaphras (4:13), a native of Colossae (4:12), who had been commissioned by Paul (see Col 1:7). Paul's appreciation of the contrast between his own arrival in Philippi and Thessalonica, where he had to start from scratch each time, and his experience in Corinth (Acts 18:2–3) and Ephesus (Acts 18:19; 1 Cor 16:19), where Prisca and Aquila furnished him with a well-established base, helped him to the realization that travellers returning home would be the most effective apostles. They started with built-in advantages: they did not have to look for work, they were known and trusted, they had networks of family, friends, and acquaintances, who could be guaranteed to listen, at least initially. Most, if not all, of the converts made by Epaphras were pagans (1:21; 2:13).

3. The volcanic springs and underground rivers alerted Strabo to the unstable character of the Lycus valley, 'if any country is subject to earthquakes, Laodicea is' (Geog. 12.8.16). A major earthquake hit in 60 CE (Iac., Ann. 14.27.1). Both Laodicea and Hierapolis were rebuilt, but Colossae never recovered; note the silence of Pliny (Nat. Hist. 5.105). Its long slide into oblivion terminated in the ninth century CE when the site was definitively abandoned.

B. Authenticity. 1. There is no consensus regarding the authorship of Colossians. The case against authenticity has been most comprehensively argued recently by Schenk (1987) and Furnish (1992), but the reasons they assemble—style, conception of Paul's role, Christology, eschatology, and literary dependence—are not compelling.

2. Style was once thought to be the definitive argument against Pauline origin (Bujard 1973), but when analysed in a more sophisticated way it appears that Colossians is perfectly at home among the accepted letters (Neumann 1990: 213). Moreover, the stylistic variations between all the Pauline letters are far from insignificant (Kenny 1986: 80), and the influence of co-authors and secretaries can no longer be ignored (Murphy-O'Connor 1995a: 34). There is no standard of Pauline style to which doubtful letters can be compared.

3. Paul, we are told, is presented as the peerless, transcendent apostle. This is not in fact the case. The language of Colossians is certainly universalist, e.g. 'the gospel which you heard, which has been preached to every creature under heaven, and of which I, Paul, became a minister' (1:23; cf. 1:6, 28), but the lack of the article before 'minister' shows that Paul does not consider himself the unique agent, and the hyperbole is precisely paralleled by 1 Thess 1:8, both as regards tense and extension. Paul had to stress his universal, but not exclusive, responsibility in writing to a church that he did not found directly (2:1). It is also asserted that Colossians gives Paul's sufferings a vicarious value, whereas in the authentic letters they are viewed kerygmatically. This argument has no foundation. It is due to the mistranslation of a key verse; see Col 1:24. The identification of the gospel as 'the mystery' (1:26–7; 2:2; 4:3) is a Pauline paradox, since the whole point is that it is no longer a secret. It does not, therefore, convey a different perspective on revelation.

4. The Christology of Colossians can be seen as fundamentally different from that of the authentic letters only if it is assumed that Paul was in full agreement with everything that appears in Colossians. In fact the situation is parallel to that of 1 Corinthians where Paul quotes Corinthian statements with which he is in flat disagreement. The cosmic dimension, which is most visible in 1:15–20, does not represent Paul's thought. It is quoted from a Colossian hymn, which Paul edits severely to incorporate his own vision of Christ (see Col 1:15–20). His adversaries 'had done their best to give Christ a prominent place in the realm of cosmic speculation. What they had not done, and the editor now proceeds to do, is to recognize his earthly activity' (Barrett 1994: 146). Contrast 1:19 with 2:10, and note the stress on the crucifixion (1:20; 2:14). The vision of the church as 'the body of Christ' (1:18a; 2:19) is simply a more graphic statement of the union of believers with Christ and each other (Gal 2:20; 3:27–8). The distinction between the individual Jesus Christ ('the head') and his 'body' was imposed on Paul by the circumstances at Colossae. It does not appear in 1 Cor 12:12–27 or Rom 12:4–5 because the position of Christ was not an issue in those churches.

5. It is claimed that the realized eschatology of Colossians is incompatible with the future eschatology of the authentic letters. On only two occasions, however, is the resurrection of believers presented as a past fact (2:12; 3:1), and in context this is nothing more than a vivid expression of their passage from 'death' to 'life' (2:13; cf. Rom 6:11). Standard Pauline future eschatology appears in 1:22–3, 28; 3:4, 6, 24–5.

6. The charge that Colossians is the work of a secondary imitator, because it conflates phrases from Romans, 1–2 Corinthians, Galatians, and 1 Thessalonians, exaggerates the import of verbal reminiscences, while at the same time failing to provide a justification for the proposed redactional technique in only parts of Colossians.

C. Date of Composition. 1. Of the six who send greetings to Colossae, five also salute Philemon (see COL 4:10–14). The names of Timothy (1:1; Philem 1) and Onesimus (4:9; Philem 10) appear in both letters, as does that of Archippus as one of the recipients (4:17; Philem 2). Opponents of the authenticity of Colossians claim that its author borrowed the personalia from Philemon in order to give Pauline colouring to Colossians, but cite no evidence to show that this was a normal tactic to get a forgery accepted—it was not considered necessary by the author of Ephesians—and fail to explain the changes in order and qualifications. Hence, Colossians must be dated to the same imprisonment as Philemon 4:10, 18; Philem 1, 9, 23.

2. This incarceration took place at Ephesus (1 Cor 15:32; 2 Cor 1:8) in the years 53–4, rather than at Rome in the early 60s (contra Dunn 1996: 41). When in Rome all Paul's attention was focused on Spain (Rom 15:24, 28), but Philem 22 and Phil 1:26; 2:24 reveal plans to visit Colossae and Philippi. The action of Onesimus is explicable only if Paul was in the vicinity of Colossae (Lampe 1985). The speed of the contacts between Paul and Philippi (Phil 2:25–30) exclude Rome as the place of imprisonment.

3. Assumptions regarding Paul's theological development cannot be given any weight in this discussion (against Bruce 1977: 411–12). Even if we could be absolutely sure of the precise chronological order of the letters, it would mean little. The letters are not homogeneous segments of an ongoing research project, each one building on its predecessor, but reactions to specific problems, in which what Paul says is conditioned by the needs of the recipients, and by his own estimate of what will be an effective response.

D. The False Teaching. 1. Hooker's (1973) view that there was no systematic false teaching at Colossae does not really account for the language of 2:8–23. Paul is reacting to a doctrinal problem, which has been described in at least forty-four different ways (Gunter 1973: 3–4)! There is a useful survey of the more notable opinions in O'Brien 1982: xxx–xxxviii. A decisive breakthrough was made by Francis's (Francis and Meeks 1973: 163–207) lexicographical work on tapeinophrosynē and embateuō in 2:18, which provided a basis for an understanding of the genitive in 'worship of angels' as subjective. His outline of Jewish ascetic mysticism, which is the socio-religious framework of his hypothesis, has been developed thoroughly by Sappington (1991). The polemic material in 2:8, 16–23 contains both direct and indirect references to the content, function, and medium of revelation, as well as to the prerequisites for its attainment. Sappington (ibid. 170) concludes, 'the Colossian error is strikingly similar to the ascetic-mystical piety of Jewish Apocalypticism. The errorists sought out heavenly ascents by means of various ascetic practices involving abstinence from eating and drinking, as well as careful observance of the Jewish festivals. These experiences of heavenly ascent climaxed in a vision of the throne [of God] and in worship offered by the heavenly hosts surrounding it. It seems that these visions also pointed to the importance of observing the Jewish festivals, probably as evidence of submission to the law of God.' There is no evidence that this attitude towards religious experience was systematically propagated at Colossae. Some of the converted Gentiles must have been God-fearers, who brought it with them from the synagogue, and proposed it as a supplement to the teaching of Epaphras.

2. This reconstruction implies that the problem with which Paul had to deal at Colossae was in no way similar to the situation he had faced in Galatia. There he had to counter a direct attack on his authority, and a vision of Christianity which in practice gave the law greater importance than Christ. Here he has to deal with a fashionable religious fad without intellectual depth, whose proponents floated in a fantasy world. His concern is to restore a sense of reality, to set the feet of the misguided on solid ground. They grasped at shadows. He had to show them that Christ was substance (2:17). The approach adopted by Paul in Galatians would have been completely inappropriate at Colossae. Understandably, therefore, the themes and terminology typical of Galatians are lacking in Colossians.

COMMENTARY

(1:1–2) Greeting Prior to his break with Antioch (Gal 2:11–14; Acts 13:1–3) Paul had been secure in his ecclesial identity (cf. 1–2 Thessalonians). Subsequently he did not represent any church (1:25), and had to identify himself as a Christ-commissioned missionary. The formula used here is a simplification of that which he adopted in Gal 1:1. The selection of Timothy from among the many with Paul (Col 4:7–14) for mention in the address suggests that he was co-author of the letter (Murphy-O'Connor 1995a: 16–34).

Rather than address the church as such (cf. 1–2 Thessalonians, Galatians, 1–2 Corinthians) Paul writes to its members as fellow-believers (cf. Rom 1:7; Phil 1:1). 'Saints' does not imply personal holiness. It reflects the usage of OT where the 'holy' is that which is 'set apart for God' (Lev 11:44). Exceptionally, 'saints' is interpreted (the kai is explicative; BDF §442(9)) by 'loyal', because some at Colossae, e.g. Archippus (cf. COL 4:17), had been led astray by false teaching (2:8).

The opening greeting of the Pauline letters normally mentions a double source of divine benefactions, 'from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ'. The absence of the second element here may be due to the mention of 'in Christ' in the first part of the verse (Aletti 1993: 46).

(1:3–8) Thanksgiving In all Pauline letters, with the exception of Galatians, 1 Timothy, and Titus, the address is followed by a report on how Paul has thanked God for the recipients. When the formula 'I give thanks to the gods' appears in contemporary letters it is never a banal convention and always evokes what is upmost in the writer's mind (Schubert 1939: 173). Similarly in Paul. The thanksgiving is designed to win the favour of the readers—and so parallels the rhetorical exordium—but the compliments carefully reflect Paul's assessment of the state of the community, and reveal his concerns (Murphy-O'Connor 1995a: 55–64).

The length of the thanksgiving here is disputed, but even those who extend it to 1:14 (Moule 1968: 47), or even 1:23 (Aletti 1993: 49), consider 1:3–8 a subsection in which Paul notes the reasons for his gratitude (Lohse 1968: 40; O'Brien 1982: 7).

Paul's knowledge of the believers at Colossae depends on the report of Epaphras (1:4, 8), who had been deputed by Paul to evangelize the Lycus valley (1:7). The NRSV reading 'on your behalf' is to be rejected (cf. RSV, NJB). While the quality of its witnesses might seem worthy of confidence, the reading is excluded by the titles given to Epaphras (Abbott 1897: 200). In particular 'servant of Christ' suggests a duly authorized missionary (cf. 2 Cor 11:25; Phil 1:1). Note that Tychicus is given the same titles (4:7), and he is certainly Paul's representative. The fact that Epaphras was imprisoned (4:12–13; Philem 23), whereas Epaphroditus of Philippi was not (Phil 2:25), indicates that the authorities understood Epaphras to be Paul's agent.

Among the virtues of the Colossians Paul singles out their Christian confidence, and their love which reaches out to all (Philem 5), virtues which are inspired by their hope of a guaranteed heavenly reward (1 Thess 1:3). The Colossians had been made aware of their assured future by the preaching of Epaphras (1:6–7), which was anterior to the false teaching. The qualification of the gospel as 'the word of truth' (1:5; cf. Gal 2:5, 14) is intended to underline its reliability (Ps 119:43) by contrast with the 'empty deceit' (2:8) of the false teaching. The sterility and parochialism of the latter is indirectly stigmatized by the universal creativity of the word of God (1 Thess 2:13; 1 Cor 1:18; Rom 1:16; cf. Isa 55:10–11), a dynamic force changing the world as it is transforming the Colossians (3:16). Their experience corroborates the true understanding of the message; the 'grace of God' is not merely a favourable attitude on the part of the divinity but tangible benefaction. It is typical of Paul that he evokes love a second time (1:8); the fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22), it is the very being of the believer (1 Cor 13:2). This is the only mention of the Holy Spirit in Colossians.

(1:9–11) Prayer for the Future Having complimented the Colossians, Paul now reveals his attitude towards them (cf. 2:1). They have been the object of his constant concern, but his status as a prisoner (4:10) has meant that he can only pray for them. He begs God that they may know his will, that they may do good works, and that they may persevere. It is the responsibility of believers to discern what God demands of them (Phil 1:9–10). There is no longer a law to dictate their actions. The emphasis on 'wisdom,' 'understanding,' and 'knowledge' as divine gifts with a purpose beyond themselves is designed to counter the false teachers' insistence on ascetical practices as prerequisites (2:16, 21–3) for visions which were an end in themselves (2:18). Paul does not exclude contemplative knowledge of God (1:10c), but it must be accompanied by fruitfulness in 'good works' (1:10b; cf. Eph 2:10; Jn 15:16). A permanent lifestyle, different from that of those who belong to the world (2:20; 2 Cor 4:7–11; Phil 2:14–16), and resistant to cowardice and a desire for vengeance, is made possible only by the power of God. His 'glory' is his visibility in history (1:27), which can only be a display of 'might' (1:11; cf. Eph 1:19).

(1:12–14) Conversion There is in fact no break in the sentence, but the importance of the contents merits a special heading. In order to motivate the thanksgiving of the Colossians Paul describes the crucial change in their existence in terms and images drawn from the liturgy of baptism (Käsemann 1964: 160). The key sentence is 1:12, which is then explained in 1:13–14 (cf. Acts 28:16). The combination of two virtual synonyms, 'the share of the portion', is common in the Essene hymns (Kuhn 1968: 117), which also attest a use of 'saints' encompassing both angels and believers (1QS 11:7–8; Benoit 1982). The Colossians have already been empowered to live in the realm of light where God's holiness is experienced. The implication is that the ascetic practices and visions advocated by the false teachers are unnecessary. 1:12–14 is the key to understanding 2:13–15 (Sappington 1991: 203).

In 1 Thess 5:5 Paul contrasted the past and present of believers in terms of 'darkness' and 'light' (cf. Rom 13:12). His use of 'power' here in conjunction with 'darkness' is meant to evoke the societal constraints which promote the inauthentic behaviour of non-believers; all are 'under the power of sin' (Rom 3:9). Deliverance is the transferral to an alternative environment identified as 'the kingdom of the son of God's love' (1:13; cf. 1 Cor 15:23–8). The genitive of quality is a Semitism ('beloved'; cf. BDF §165), but Paul chose the expression (contrast 1:7; 4:7, 9, 14) in order to give prominence to 'love', which stands at the beginning of the process of salvation (Rom 5:8). In the form displayed by Christ it is the basic characteristic of the believing community (2:2; 3:11–14; cf. Gal 3:27–8; 1 Cor 13:2). The vague 'redemption' is clarified by 'the forgiveness of sins'. The formula is found in Paul only here (cf. 2:13; 3:13), and has a liturgical ring. By incorporation into Christ ('in him') in baptism (cf. Acts 2:38) the structures of the world are replaced by new values.

(1:15–20) The Christological Hymn Note the change in the layout of the Greek text in Nestle-Aland, 27th edn. (1993). It is generally recognized that Paul here offers a corrected version of a hymn in circulation at Colossae (3:16; cf. Eph 5:19). Many efforts have been made to recreate the original form of this hymn, but none has won significant support (Schmauch 1964: 48–52; Benoit 1975). The multiplicity of hypotheses, however, underlines the reality of the problem, not the futility of the quest. No serious exegesis is possible without a decision regarding tradition and redaction. In my view the ordered repetition of formal features recommends the reconstruction of two four-line strophes:

- | | | |
|----------|---|--|
| (v. 15a) | 1 | Who is (the) image of the invisible God |
| (v. 15b) | 2 | Firstborn of all creation |
| (v. 16a) | 3 | For in him were created all things |
| (v. 16f) | 4 | All things through him and to him were created. |
| (v. 18b) | 1 | Who is (the) beginning |
| (v. 18c) | 2 | Firstborn from the dead |
| (v. 19) | 3 | For in him was pleased all the Fullness to dwell |
| (v. 20a) | 4 | And through him to reconcile all things to him. |

The first lines of each strophe begin with 'who is', and the second lines with 'firstborn'. The third lines commence with 'for in him', which is followed by a verb in the passive ('were created/was pleased'), whose subject is a universal ('all things/all the Fullness'). The fourth lines contain three identical expressions, 'all things', 'through him', and 'to him'. So many correspondences must be intentional. They are the result of careful planning to achieve perfect balance between the two strophes. No one who had made such an effort would destroy the elegance of his or her creation. In consequence, the elements which break the pattern (vv. 16*bcd*e, 17, 18*ad*, 20*bc*) must have been added by another hand. It is theoretically possible that such redactional activity had taken place before Paul incorporated the hymn into his letter. It is more probable, however, that the additions were made by Paul, because identical retouches appear in the hymn in Phil 2:6–11 (Murphy-O'Connor 1995*b*).

The basic theme of this hymn is the mediation of Christ, first in creation, then in reconciliation. The titles in the first two lines of each strophe evoke the figure of Wisdom—'image' (Wis 7:26), 'beginning' and 'firstborn' (Prov 8:22; Sir 1:4)—who was present with God from eternity (Wis 9:4, 9), and participant in creation (Prov 3:19; 8:30; Wis 8:5; Sir 1:9; 24:9; Ps 104:24). These titles are the reason why Paul could not simply repudiate the hymn; they were rooted in the revelation of his people. The titles are justified by the third and fourth lines of each strophe, which are introduced by 'because'. All efforts to determine in what precise sense Christ can be said to be both the instrument and the end of all creation have failed. That ambiguity, not clarity, was intended is underlined by the plethora of unsatisfying explanations of the indwelling 'Fullness' (v. 19). Only in 2:9 do we discover that 'Fullness' is a surrogate for God, who is said to 'dwell in' both people (T. Zeb. 8:2; Jub. 1:17; 1 Enoch 49:2–3; cf. 2 Cor 6:16) and places (LXX Ps 67:17). No Jew would have understood either as meaning intrinsic divinization. It is simply a way of speaking about divine favour. What the Colossians would have understood is an open question, as is the exact manner in which Christ can be both the instrument and end of reconciliation. In what possible sense can all creation, which includes inanimate beings, have offended Christ, thereby creating the need for reconciliation?

Paul saw the hymn as a perfect example of 'beguiling, persuasive speech' (2:4). Formal perfection clothes an abstract vision of a cosmic Christ. The phrases are redolent of profundity, but yield no unambiguous understanding of Christ's person and mission. The hymn could be sung or recited by all Colossian Christians in the belief that they were articulating a mystery beyond their comprehension. Initiates, on the other hand, could debate endlessly the questions that still test the ingenuity of exegetes, or develop an interpretation only remotely related to the letter of the text, e.g. the creative power of God, once thought of as Wisdom, is now thought of as Christ (see Dunn 1980: 187–94).

In addition to the truth of the titles given to Christ, Paul had a second reason to retain the hymn. It could be turned against the false teachers. By inserting v. 16*b–e* Paul restricts the meaning of 'all things' (v. 16*a*) to intelligent beings, and makes it explicit that the angelic powers are inferior to Christ who, according to the premiss of the hymn, brought them into existence and to whom they are ordered. The ineffable names of the spirit powers are drawn at random from Jewish tradition (details in Schlier 1961). There is no intention to describe grades of the celestial hierarchy (Lightfoot 1904: 150). Paul further diminishes the attractiveness to the Colossians of such powers by inserting 1:20*c*. Like humans (1:21; 2:13; 3:7, 13), angels also need reconciliation; 'some of the angels of heaven transgressed the word of the Lord, and behold they commit sin and transgress the law' (1 Enoch 106:13–14; cf. 2 Apoc. Bar. 56:11–13). Manifestly only good angels can be effective mediators with God, but how are mere terrestrials to know which is which? Paul allows the Colossians to draw their own conclusion regarding the futility of the exercise.

Parallel to the addition of 'death on a cross' in Phil 2:8*c*, Paul here insists on the brutal modality of Christ's achievement by inserting, 'making peace by the blood of his cross' (v. 20*b*). Whereas the traditional teaching that Paul received mentioned only the death of Christ (Rom 1:3–4; 4:25; 8:34; 10:8–9; 1 Cor 15:2–7; Gal 1:3–4; 1 Thess 1:10), he typically stresses the 'blood' of Christ (Rom 3:25; 5:9; 1 Cor 10:16; 11:25, 27). With the exception of the gospels and Heb 6:6; 12:2; Rev 11:8, he alone in the NT uses 'cross' and 'crucify' (cf. 2:14).

Paul's choice of the verb 'to make peace' probably has less to do with any supposed animosity between heavenly beings, or between celestials and terrestrials, than with the internal situation of the Colossian church, whose unity had been compromised (cf. 2:2; 3:15). The theme of unity is fundamental to the additions in vv. 17 and 18*a*. The former sums up the first strophe, by parodying it. 'He is before all things' echoes the ambiguity of 'firstborn' (temporal? qualitative?). The assertion that 'all things hold together' in a human being (v. 17*b*) gives an impression of unity whose precise meaning evaporates on inspection. Lightfoot (1904: 154) perfectly catches the spurious profundity of the expression by commenting 'He impresses upon creation that unity and solidarity which makes it a cosmos instead of a chaos'. How exactly is this achieved? 'The action of gravitation . . . is an expression of His mind!'

Paul becomes completely serious in his introduction to the second strophe. The church must be characterized by the organic unity of a living 'body' (v. 18*a*). The insight is but an extension and clarification of 'you are all one person in Christ Jesus' (Gal 3:28 = Col 3:11). The distinction between 'head' and 'body' does not appear in 1 Cor 12:12–27 or Rom 12:4–5 because the supremacy of Christ was not questioned at Rome or Corinth. In this instance 'head' would appear to mean both 'superior' (2:10) and 'source' (2:19). The cosmic dimension of the original hymn has been reduced to ecclesiology.

(1:21–3) The Thesis of the Letter These verses both sum up what has been said, and enunciate the major themes of the letter in inverse order. Thus they function as the rhetorical partitio (Aletti 1993: 120). vv. 21–2 evoke the past, present, and future of the Colossians. The passive voice 'having been alienated' must be taken seriously (v. 21; cf. 1:13; Phil 2:15); the Gentiles had inherited their polytheism and their acceptance of the false values of a corrupt society. To extricate them from this situation divine intervention was necessary, but it was not an act of glorious triumph (v. 22). 'Body of flesh' distinguishes the individual Jesus from incorporeal beings, but also hints that his death was the result of something happening to his body, the violence of the crucifixion (v. 20*b*). Reconciliation is presented as a past achievement, but this does not imply a realized eschatology, since its conditional aspect is immediately made clear ('provided that', v. 23).

The Colossians have been given the opportunity (1:12; cf. Gal 5:1) to appear guiltless at the final judgement. How precisely they must comport themselves is outlined in 3:1–4:1. More fundamentally, however, they must remain committed to the salvific vision conveyed by the gospel they initially accepted (1:5–6). The alternative against which they are warned is the theme of 2:6–23. The hyperbole of ‘preached to every creature under heaven’ (v. 23b) echoes that of 1 Thess 1:8, and the lack of the definite article before ‘servant’ underlines that Paul is not the sole apostle. 1:24–2:5 develops Paul’s own understanding of his service of the mystery.

(1:24–2:5) Servant of the Mystery The NRSV offers a widespread mistranslation of 1:24b, which has given rise to a series of false problems to which a variety of answers have been proposed, some of which are used to deny Pauline authorship of Colossians (Kremer 1956). A literal translation, which respects the order of the words, simplifies the matter considerably (Aletti 1993: 135): ‘I complete what is lacking in the sufferings-of-Christ-in-my-flesh’ (cf. Gal 2:20; 2 Cor 4:10–11). There is no reference to the individual Jesus Christ. Paul’s sufferings are those of Christ because Paul is a member of the body of Christ (cf. Phil 3:10), and because Paul’s sufferings reveal the present reality of grace as those of Christ did (2 Cor 4:10–11). Paul has no choice but to struggle on until all have heard the gospel (cf. Rom 15:19; 2 Tim 4:17). He is a minister of the church (1:25), not in virtue of a human commission (1:1; cf. Gal 1:1), but in virtue of the stewardship entrusted to him by God in order to further the economy of salvation (1 Cor 4:1; 9:17). The ‘word of God’, which Paul preaches in word and deed, is now described as ‘the mystery’ (1:26; cf. Eph 3:1–9). Divinely ordained future events (for the background see Brown 1968), which for the false teachers were still a secret to be penetrated laboriously, in fact have already been made plain, not merely to a group of initiates, but to all believers. ‘Glory’, the brilliance of God’s action in history, is the antithesis of secrecy. The content of the mystery is Christ precisely as present among the believers, no longer in Jerusalem, to which they must trek (Isa 60:1–7), but where they are (Aletti 1993: 143). Hence all attention must be focused on him as the source of authentic, certain knowledge (2:3). The acquisition of such knowledge is not a matter of asceticism. They must be ‘instructed by love’ (against NRSV; cf. Spicq 1958–9: ii.202–8) in order to penetrate the riches of wisdom and knowledge hidden in Christ (2:2), who ‘loved me, that is, gave himself for me’ (Gal 2:20; BDF §442(9); cf. 1:22).

(2:6–23) Warning against Errors The original commitment of the Colossians was to the Christ as Jesus the Lord (2:6; Lightfoot 1904: 174). Jesus is the truth of Christ (Eph 4:21). His historicity is fundamental to salvation. The believers must not permit themselves to be returned to the domain of darkness (cf. 1:13) by accepting merely human speculation which, despite the claims made for it, in fact regresses to the basic religious perspectives common to (fallen) humanity (‘elements of the world’, 2:8), e.g. the need for asceticism in order to advance in religious knowledge (v. 20; Gal 4:3); see Sappington (1991: 169).

‘Elementary teaching’ (Heb 5:12) appears to be the best sense in this context of a term, stoicheion (element), which has a wide variety of meanings according to the framework in which it is used (for a survey see Bandstra 1964: 5–30). Many scholars, however, prefer to understand ‘elements of the world’ as the basic components of the material universe—earth, water, air, and fire. This is certainly the best-documented meaning in contemporary literature, but to make sense here it has to be understood metaphorically of (1) the basic factors in human existence, which for Paul were Law, Sin, Death, flesh, or (2) the planets which exercise control over humans and determine the calendar; such astral beings are associated with angels. Neither of these usages is attested at the time of Paul.

The function of the genitive ‘of deity’ (v. 9) is to explain ‘Fullness’, which 1:19 had left unspecified (Lohse 1968: 150; BDF §§165, 167). As in 1:19, ‘indwelling’ here does not mean divinization. ‘Bodily’ has been interpreted in at least five different ways (Moule 1968: 92–3). The two most probable are ‘really’ (as opposed to seemingly; cf. v. 17) and ‘in physical form’. The two are not incompatible. Divine favour and salvific action are concentrated exclusively in the humanity of Christ. Necessarily, therefore, he is the sole source of fulfilment, and he has authority over all spirit forces (v. 10; Grudem 1985).

What has already been achieved for the Colossians should be a cause of thanksgiving (v. 7). To drive this home Paul employs a series of five vivid, dramatic images (vv. 11–15), in which attempts have been made to find traditional material (Lohse 1968: 160; Wengst 1972: 186–94). The results have been inconclusive. Through Christ the whole body of flesh (and not a mere symbolic token), i.e. the entire framework of habits and desires opposed to God, has been removed (v. 11; cf. v. 18). This is true only in theory; it must be made real in practice (cf. Gal 5:13–24). The active faith of the recipient is necessary for baptism to be a dying and rising with Christ (v. 12; cf. Rom 10:9). The realized eschatology of ‘you were co-raised’ (cf. 3:1) must be read in the perspective of the future eschatology of 1:22, 27; 3:4, 6, 15–16. It is simply a more graphic version of ‘God made alive’ (v. 13). ‘Life’ and ‘death’ are used here in their existential sense of the presence and absence of virtue (cf. 2 Cor 2:16; Philo, Fug., 55). With vivid imagination Paul presents humanity as having defaulted after signing an agreement to obey the will of God. The bond thus became an accusation (v. 14). God, in his generosity, forgave the fault and cancelled the debt.

The moment when this happened—‘nailing it to the cross’—was the crucifixion of Christ. The image is not totally consistent, and the metaphor must not be pressed too hard. For other interpretative options see O’Brien (1982: 121–6). A new image, whose antithesis appears in 2 Cor 2:14, is introduced in v. 15. God (the emperor) awards a Roman triumph to Christ (his victorious general), who, having stripped angelic beings of their power, led them in a procession that normally ended in executions (Hafemann 1986: 18–39). Some explain the sudden appearance of ‘principalities and powers’ by identifying them as the angels who recorded the transgressions of humanity. In this case the ‘handwriting’ would be the book of life (Ps 56:8; Isa 65:6; 1 Enoch 81:2–4; Sappington 1991: 208–23). The mention of spirit powers, however, could have been occasioned by the situation at Colossae to which Paul now turns.

The ‘therefore’ introducing v. 16 implies that the direct polemic against the false teachers (vv. 16–23) stems from the doctrinal base established in vv. 9–15. The reality of Christ highlights the insubstantial nature of the proposed alternative (v. 17), which was rooted in 'a quest for higher religious experience through mystical-ascetical piety' (Carr 1973: 500). In addition to strict observance of the Jewish calendar (v. 16; cf. Isa 1:13–14; Ezek 46:4–11), the false teachers demanded fasting and/or the exclusion of certain foods (v. 21). They believed that obedience won God's favour, and that asceticism purified the person (v. 23). Together these two constituted the 'humility' (v. 18), i.e. mortification, that was the prerequisite for revelatory experiences (Sappington 1991: 163). The NRSV translation of v. 18a should be abandoned in favour of 'Let no one condemn you, delighting in humility and the angelic worship [of God], which he has seen upon entering' (O'Brien 1982: 134). In visions the adept 'entered' the heavenly world (Francis and Meeks 1973: 163–207), and participated in the worship offered by the angels assembled around the throne of God (Isa 6; Ezek 1; 1 Enoch 14). It was to this other world that the false teachers had relegated Christ.

This claim to religious superiority is brutally dismissed by Paul as overweening conceit rooted in silly ideas concocted by a fleshly intelligence (v. 18b). This fundamentally egocentric attitude is the antithesis of the sharing that characterizes the Body of Christ and, in consequence, separates those who persist in it from Christ, the only source ('head'; cf. 1 Cor 11:3) of the Body's vitality (v. 19). The being of a Christian is to 'belong' to Christ (1 Cor 3:23).

What the Colossians enjoy (cf. 1:12–14; 2:11–15) is not definitive. It can be lost. Through death in Christ (v. 12) they have been freed from the religious perspectives of fallen humanity (v. 20; cf. v. 8), but they will return to a state of slavery if they again accept the values and standards of society (Gal 4:8–11). The emphasis on ascetic practices associated with Judaism (cf. LXX Isa 29:13) is due to the situation at Colossae (vv. 21–2), but the principle is of wider application (Gal 5:1, 13). Such practices might appear to exhibit spiritual strength and superiority, but in fact they indulge the egocentricity of fallen humanity because they are 'self-imposed' (v. 23).

(3:1–4:1) How the Colossians Ought to Live Having brought out the implications of dying with Christ (2:20–3), Paul now spells out the consequences of rising with Christ (3:1–4). If believers have been raised, then their concern must be with 'above' not with 'below'. The contrast is inspired by the characterization of the practices of the false teachers in 2:23, and appears to forget that these were only means to reaching 'the things that are above' (cf. 2:18). For Paul, however, the central figure in heaven is Christ, whose authority is emphasized by his position at God's right hand (Ps 110:1; 1 Cor 15:25).

'Do not set your minds on things that are on earth' (3:2; cf. Phil 3:19), if taken literally, would negate the ethical directives which follow. Such imprecision regularly caused confusion in Paul's communities, e.g. his insistence that Christians were totally free of the Mosaic law permitted the Corinthians to conclude that they could do what they liked (cf. 1 Cor 6:12; 10:23). Paul's intention here was not to exclude involvement with society (cf. 1 Cor 5:9–10), but to prohibit acceptance of its values (cf. Rom 8:5–6). Believers no longer 'belong to the world' (2:20). By contrast with the glorious revelation at the parousia (3:4) of the intimate union between Christ and believers (cf. Gal 2:20; Phil 1:21), their new life can be considered 'hidden' (3:3), but this is relative, because the action of grace must be seen if the gospel is to spread (1:6; cf. 1 Thess 1:6–8; 4:12; 2 Cor 3:2, 18).

'Whatever in you is earthly' (3:5) is literally 'the members on the earth'. Paul identifies the parts of the body with the sins they commit (cf. Rom 6:13, 19; 2 Apoc. Bar. 49:3). The admonition does not parallel Mt 5:29–30. Lists of vices characteristic of unredeemed pagan humanity (Wis 14:22–9) have already appeared in 1 Thess 4:3–6; Gal 5:19–21. The first five mentioned here (5:5) can be related to sexuality, though the last-mentioned has a wider extension. The connection between greed, the original sin (Rom 7:7), and idolatry is axiomatic in Judaism (cf. T. Judah, 19:1). Pagans are simply 'those who covet' (Pal. Tg. on Ex 20:17; b. Šabb. 146a). The second five vices (5:8) all involve intemperate speech that makes genuine communication impossible. The social consequences of lying (5:9a) are even more disastrous. Without trust there can be no community.

To the Galatians Paul had said 'you have put on Christ' (Gal 3:27; cf. Rom 13:14). The image of putting on a person is without parallel in antiquity, and owes its origin to the convert's assumption of a new environment by entering the church, which is the body of Christ. The insight is developed here in a contrast between 'the old man' and 'the new man' (5:9b–10). Both are primarily social concepts. The 'new man' is the sphere 'where' (3:11) the divisions which characterize society ('the old man') no longer exist (Gal 3:28). Just as society dictates the behaviour of its members, so the believing community is the source of authentic moral knowledge. The goal of the ongoing renewal of the 'new man' is a type of knowledge characterized by creativity. This can only be a knowledge born of love (Phil 1:9–10; contrast Rom 2:17–18), which empowers the other not only to see but to act. The community, which is Christ (3:11), exemplifies the ideal of his self-sacrificing love, and enables the members to pattern their lives on his example (2 Cor 5:14–15). Instead of the contempt that produced the divisions typical of society—Jews despised pagans, who looked down on barbarians (i.e. anyone who did not speak Greek), who spurned Scythians as the epitome of human degradation (cf. 2 Macc 4:47; 3 Macc 7:5)—the believers must make Christ present in the world by exhibiting those virtues 'which reduce or eliminate friction: ready sympathy, a generous spirit, a humble disposition, willingness to make concessions, patience, forbearance' (Moule 1968: 123). Forgiven by God they must forgive. Loved by God they must love. Unless sheathed in love no virtue can be perfect (3:14; cf. Spicq 1958–9: i. 268–75). Love alone excludes pretence. Others (details in Schmauch 1964: 80–2) translate 'the bond of perfection' and understand the genitive as purposeful ('the bond that leads to perfection') or objective ('the bond that produces perfection'). These are less satisfactory, because for Paul there is no perfection beyond love (1 Cor 13).

Fully aware of the tensions within the church at Colossae, Paul expresses a wish that peace may reign there. In society peace is often no more than an uneasy truce to be abandoned the moment an advantage presents itself. The Colossians should be grateful that they are not in that situation. Authentic peace, which is defined by reference to the self-sacrifice of Christ, is first a subjective attitude which then results in a community of love (3:15; cf. 1 Cor 7:15; 14:33). In a living body the hand cannot be at war with the foot. According to 1 Cor 6:7, members who sue one another are in fact suing themselves—a ridiculous situation.

The ideal community is not merely an absence of antagonism. There is a much more positive dimension (3:16). The expression 'word of Christ' is unique, but synthesizes a number of concepts found earlier in the letter; 'the word of the truth, the gospel' (1:5) is 'the word of God' (1:25), which is 'God's mystery, that is Christ' (2:3). Its power within each one (1:6, 10) must find socially beneficial expression. The emphasis on 'teaching and admonishing' was demanded by the presence of false teachers at Colossae, who taught some believers the hymn that Paul quotes in 1:15–20. In practice 'yourselves' means 'one another' (NRSV; cf. 3:13) but heautous (cf. 1 Cor 6:7) was chosen to underline that believers are organically unified in a single 'body', and thereby to remind them that their source of life is Christ (2:19). Theological development is part of the natural evolution of the community. In consequence, it must (a) be homogeneous with the gospel that brought the community into being (1:6), and (b) take place in a public context. 'Psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs' suggest the liturgical assembly, in which inspired insights into the mystery of Christ (1 Cor 14:26) were proffered for the consent of the community (1 Cor 14:16; cf. 1 Thess 5:21–2). Such community singing must be an expression of gratitude to God (3:16c), but so too must every other human activity (3:17). It is made possible in, through, and by Christ; thus it must mirror his comportment. But Jesus was sent because of God's fatherly concern for humanity (1:12), and so in the last analysis gratitude must be directed to God.

Generic directives are followed by three pairs of reciprocal admonitions dealing with the relations of wife–husband, child–father, and slave–master (3:18–4:1). The nature of the socio-religious matrix in which such household codes were formulated has occasioned vigorous debate (Balch 1992), whose inconclusiveness is the inevitable consequence of the wide variations within the form. Conscious of a tradition of sensible social management, Paul formulates a series of guidelines designed to persuade the Colossians to leave the mystical world of visions and angels, and to return to the real world where the fabric of daily life was woven from a multitude of interpersonal relations, of which the most basic were the three pairs listed here (Aristotle, Politics, 1.1253^b7). The only really distinctive feature is the motivation by reference to the Lord, which here means Christ (Aletti 1993: 249). The social distinctions, which are fundamental to these admonitions, can be reconciled with the abolition of such distinctions in 3:11 only on the assumption that not all members of a family were converted to Christianity.

The literal translation of 3:18 is 'women be subject to men', but the context demands limitation to marriage, as some copyists have tried to convey by various additions. The admonition that a Christian woman be submissive to her non-believing husband (3:18) is to remind her that her new freedom (cf. Gal 5:1) does not exempt her from the obligations she undertook in marriage. Such behaviour is 'fitting' for a Christian because of its missionary potential (cf. 1 Pet 3:1). The obligation to love laid on the husband (3:19) indicates that the wife is a non-believer, since Christians by definition love one another (3:14; cf. 1 Thess 4:9). The temptation to treat her harshly might be due to her refusal to convert.

What is said to slaves stands out from the other admonitions both quantitatively and qualitatively (3:22–5). It is unlikely to have been inspired by the case of Onesimus (4:9), or by agitation among Christian slaves at Colossae (Aletti 1993: 254). Rather it reflects Paul's habitual attitude towards slaves who accepted Christianity. Within the community he took it for granted that they would show and share the love that was its most characteristic feature, but he made no effort to change the social order. Paul does not demand that Onesimus be manumitted, but that he be received 'no longer as a slave, but more than a slave, a beloved brother' (Philem 16; cf. 1 Cor 7:17–24). Paul's sole concern here is that slaves should not obey orders to the letter while their hearts raged, and hate corroded their spirits. The internal tension had to be resolved in order to permit the transforming effect of grace to become visible (4:5–6). The witness value of the comportment of believers was always a major concern (cf. 1 Thess 1:6–8; 4:12; 2 Cor 4:10–11). The warning of a future judgement (3:24–5) underlines the seriousness of Paul's concern.

Christian masters also have obligations to their slaves (cf. Sir 7:20–1, 31–3). They are not required to love them or to free them, but to treat them 'justly' and 'fairly' (4:1). The terms are related as 'knowledge' and 'discernment' in Phil 1:9. In each case the first deals with the obvious and clear, whereas the second comes into play when a sure feeling for what is appropriate is required.

(4:2–6) Concluding Exhortations As Paul had given thanks (1:3) and prayed for the Colossians (1:9), so now they must do likewise (v. 2). The prayer in question is primarily petition (O'Brien 1982: 237) for the glorious return of Christ (3:4; cf. 1 Cor 16:22). Their incessant awareness of, and orientation to, this goal is the best guarantee of the vigilance required of all believers if they are to persevere (1:23). Gratitude for what they have already been given (1:12–14; 3:11–12) should enhance their attentiveness. It is typical of Paul to request prayers for himself (1 Thess 5:25; Philem 22). It is a means of participation in the mission of the church (3:3; 2 Thess 3:1; Phil 1:19). The Colossians must beseech God (a) for Paul's liberation from prison in order to continue his mission (cf. 1 Cor 16:9; 2 Cor 2:12), and (b) for his ability to 'reveal' the mystery effectively. The divine passive of 1:26 finds its human herald in 4:4 (Aletti 1993: 260). Despite Paul's emphasis on the verbal dimension of such communication, it is likely that he also has in mind the existential aspect, in which his comportment reveals Christ (2 Cor 4:10–11; cf. 1 Cor 2:1–5).

It is to this aspect that Paul now alerts the Colossians. It is not enough to pray. They must also exhibit a presence in society that will prove attractive to non-believers (v. 5; cf. 1 Thess 4:12; Phil 2:14–16). Every opportunity to induce them to believe must be availed of. The speech of Christians should be winning and witty, and tailored to the needs of each interlocutor (v. 6). They must insinuate not dominate.

(4:7–18) Final Greetings The two bearers of the letter are introduced in a chiasmic pattern (vv. 7–9). Paul tactfully remains quiet regarding the personal history of Onesimus, simply noting that he has become a Christian ('brother'; cf. Philem 10), and has Paul's respect and confidence ('faithful'). The same adjectives are applied to Tychicus, who in addition is called 'minister' and 'fellow-servant in the Lord', exactly as is Epaphras (1:7; 4:12). If the latter was an official delegate of Paul to Colossae, Tychicus now enjoys the same status. He can speak for Paul with authority, not only with respect to personal news from Ephesus, but as regards the interpretation of the letter in its impact on the growth of the community (2:2).

Greetings are sent by six men with Paul, who with one exception also appear in Philemon but in a different order:

Col 4:10–14	Remarks	Philem 23–4
Aristarchus	<– my fellow-prisoner	Aristarchus (3)
Mark	<– cousin of Barnabas	Mark (2)
Jesus	<– called Justus
Epaphras	<– one of you, a servant of Christ
	Jesus my fellow-prisoner →	Epaphras (1)
Luke	<– beloved physician	Luke (5)
Demas		Demas (4)

It is curious that Timothy, the co-author of both letters (1:1; Philem 1), is not mentioned in either list. Aristarchus of Thessalonica is well known from several references in Acts (19:29; 20:4; 27:2). Nothing is known of Jesus who, like Paul, had taken a similar-sounding Hellenistic Roman name. It is unlikely that his name appears in Philem 23 (O'Brien 1982: 307). Mark is mentioned in Acts 12:12, 25; 15:37–9, and in 2 Tim 4:11. In a poignant note Paul remarks that these three are the only Christians of Jewish origin to have stayed with him (3:11). Had they come with him from Antioch? The implication is that the following three collaborators are Gentiles. Luke and Demas appear in 2 Tim 4:9, 11. Despite his imprisonment, Epaphras, the apostle of Colossae (1:7), remains active on behalf of his converts (3:12). He prays that they may be stable in their maturity (cf. 1:28–9), and be filled with 'everything willed by God' (Lightfoot 1904: 238), whose essence is spelt out in 2:2–3, 10. Paul's independent knowledge of how hard Epaphras had worked to establish the gospel in the Lycus valley (v. 13) must have come from Onesimus (v. 9). The testimony would have been all the more impressive coming from one who at that stage was a pagan (Philem 10). The exclusive concentration on Laodicea in what follows suggests that Epaphras had not been successful in Hierapolis.

Paul sends his personal greetings to believers in Laodicea, and in particular to the believers who assembled in the home of Nympha (v. 15). The fact that he singles out a particular individual confirms that he had never visited the Lycus valley (cf. 2:1; Rom 16). Nymphan could be the accusative of the feminine name Nympha (O'Brien 1982: 246) or of the masculine name Nymphas (Moule 1968: 28). There is little difficulty in deciding which of the accompanying pronouns, 'her' or 'him', is original. No copyist would change the masculine into the feminine, because of its implication regarding the status of a woman. The contrary, however, is eminently probable, given the instinctive patriarchal bias of copyists. Women were fully the equal of men in the Pauline communities (cf. 1 Cor 11:2–16), and presided over house churches (cf. Rom 16:1–2).

For the public reading of the letter at Colossae (v. 16; cf. 1 Thess 5:27) the 'whole' community (cf. Rom 16:23; 1 Cor 14:23) must have been assembled from the various house churches in the city. The exchange of letters with Laodicea implies that the differences between the two churches were significant, otherwise two letters would be pointless. None the less the two communities had enough in common to make the reading of the other's letter worthwhile. The letter sent by Paul to the Laodiceans has been the centre of a vigorous debate. The current consensus refuses to identify it with any known document (Anderson 1992). It has been constructed out of Colossians by Boismard (1999).

Paul's request that Archippus should be informed of an admonition addressed to him (v. 17) implies that Paul knew that he would not be present when the letter was read in public (contrast 2 Thess 3:11–12; Phil 4:2–3), even though he was part of the leadership group of a house church (Philem 2). The most natural explanation is that Epaphras had informed Paul that Archippus had been won over by the false teachers. The desertion of a leader of his status explains the urgency of the letter. A response could not await the release of Paul or Epaphras. Had Archippus simply moved to Laodicea (Lightfoot 1904: 242) the matter would have been dealt with in that letter.

Paul regularly used secretaries (Rom 16:22), and thus had to write the last paragraph in his own hand to authenticate the letter (4:18; cf. 2 Thess 3:17; Gal 6:11; Philem 19; 1 Cor 16:21; Richards 1991: 173–7).

REFERENCES

- Abbott, T. K. (1897), A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistles to the Ephesians and to the Colossians, ICC (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Aletti, J.-N. (1993), Saint Paul: Épître aux Colossiens, Ebib ns 20 (Paris: Gabalda).
- Anderson, C. P. (1992), 'Laodiceans, Epistle to', ABD iv. 231–3.
- Balch, D. (1992), 'Household Codes', ABD iii. 318–20.
- Bandstra, A. J. (1964), Law and the Elements (Kampen: Kok).
- Barrett, C. K. (1994), Paul: An Introduction to his Thought (London: Chapman).
- Benoit, P. (1975), 'L'Hymne christologique de Col i, 15–20: Jugement critique sur l'état des recherches', in J. Neusner (ed.), Christianity, Judaism and Other Greco-Roman Cults: Studies for Morton Smith at Sixty, SJLA 12/1 (Leiden: Brill), i. 226–63.
- (1982), 'Hagioi en Colossiens 1.12: Hommes ou Anges?', in M. D. Hooker and S. G. Wilson (eds.), Paul and Paulinism: Essays in Honour of C. K. Barrett (London: SPCK), 83–101.
- Boismard, M.-E. (1999), La Lettre de saint Paul au Laodicéens, Cahiers de la Revue Biblique (Paris: Gabalda).
- Brown, R. E. (1968), The Semitic Background of the Term 'Mystery' in the New Testament, FBBS 21 (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Bruce, F. F. (1977), Paul: Apostle of the Free Spirit (Exeter: Paternoster).
- Bujard, W. (1973), Stilanalytische Untersuchungen zum Kolosserbrief als Beitrag zur Methodik von Sprachergleichen, SUNT 11 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht).
- Carr, W. (1973), 'Two Notes on Colossians', JTS 24: 492–500.
- Dunn, J. D. G. (1980), Christology in the Making: An Inquiry into the Origins of the Doctrine of the Incarnation (London: SCM).
- (1996), The Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon: A Commentary on the Greek Text, Greek New Testament Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Francis, F. O., and Meeks, W. A. (1973) (eds.), Conflict at Colossae, SBLBS 4 (Missoula: Scholar's Press).
- Furnish, V. P. (1992), 'Colossians, Epistle to the', ABD i. 1090–6.
- Grudem, W. (1985), 'Does kephale ("Head") Mean "Source" or "Authority" in Greek Literature? A Survey of 2,336 Examples', Trinity Journal, 6: 38–59.

- Gunther, J. J. (1973), St. Paul's Opponents and Their Background: A Study of Apocalyptic and Jewish Sectarian Teachings, NovTSup 35 (Leiden: Brill).
- Hafemann, S. J. (1986), Suffering and the Spirit: An Exegetical Study of II Cor. 2:14–3:3 within the Context of the Corinthian Correspondence, WUNT 2/19 (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck]).
- Hooker, M. D. (1973), 'Were there False Teachers at Colossae?', in B. Lindars and S. Smalley (eds.), Christ and Spirit in the New Testament: Studies in Honour of Charles Francis Digby Moule (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Käsemann, E. (1964), Essays on New Testament Themes, SBT 41 (London: SCM).
- Kenny, A. (1986), A Stylometric Study of the New Testament (Oxford: Clarendon).
- Kremer, J. (1956), Was an den Leiden Christi noch mangelt: Eine interpretationsgeschichtliche und exegetische Untersuchung zu Kol 1, 24b, BBB 12 (Bonn: Hanstein).
- Kuhn, K. G. (1968), 'The Epistle to the Ephesians in the Light of the Qumran Texts', in J. Murphy-O'Connor (ed.), Paul and Qumran (London: Chapman), 115–31.
- Lampe, P. (1985), 'Keine "Sklavenflucht" des Onesimus', ZNW 76: 135–7.
- Lightfoot, J. B. (1904), Saint Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (London: Macmillan).
- Lohse, E. (1968), Die Briefe an die Kolosser und an Philemon, MeyerK (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht).
- Moule, C. F. D. (1968), The Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, CGTC (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Murphy-O'Connor, J. (1995a), 'Tradition and Redaction in Col 1:15–20', RB 102: 231–41.
- (1995b), Paul the Letter Writer, GNS 41 (Collegeville, Ind.: Liturgical Press).
- Nestle-Aland (1993), Novum Testamentum Graece, 27th edn. (Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft).
- Neumann, K. J. (1990), The Authenticity of the Pauline Epistles in the Light of Stylistic Analysis, SBLDS 120 (Atlanta: Scholars Press).
- O'Brien, P. T. (1982), Colossians, Philemon, WBC 44 (Waco: Word).
- Richards, E. R. (1991), The Secretary in the Letters of Paul, WUNT 2/42 (Tübingen, Mohr [Siebeck]).
- Sappington, T. J. (1991), Revelation and Redemption at Colossae, JSNTSup 53 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Schenk, W. (1987), 'Der Kolosserbrief in der neueren Forschung (1945–1985)', ANRW 2. 25. 4 (Berlin: de Gruyter), 3327–64.
- Schlier, H. (1961), Principalities and Powers in the New Testament, QD 3 (Fribourg: Herder).
- Schmauch, W. (1964), Beiheft zu E. Lohmeyer: Die Briefe an die Philipper, Kolosser und an Philemon, MeyerK (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht).
- Schubert, P. (1939), Form and Function of the Pauline Thanksgivings, BZNW 20 (Berlin: Töpelmann).
- Spicq, C. (1958–9), Agape dans le Nouveau Testament: Analyse des textes, Ebib (2 vols.; Paris: Gabalda).
- Wengst, K. (1972), Christologische Formeln und Lieder (Gütersloh: Mohr).

71. I Thessalonians

PHILIP F. ESLER

INTRODUCTION

A. Preliminary Issues. 1. Date Paul probably wrote I Thessalonians from Corinth within a matter of months after his initial visit to Thessalonica, in about 50–51 CE (so Best 1972: 7–13; Barclay 1993: 515). It is widely agreed that I Thessalonians is the earliest extant Christian text, a precious document which brilliantly illuminates one segment of the Christ-movement less than twenty years after the death of Jesus.

2. The Significance of the Epistolary Form It can hardly be without significance that the earliest document extant from the followers of Christ takes the form of a letter. Much research has been conducted recently which analyses the formal structures of Graeco-Roman epistolography (Stowers 1986), and their relation to early Christian letters, including those of Paul (Doty 1973), and I Thessalonians in particular (Boers 1976). But we should be careful not to miss the distinctiveness of I Thessalonians. While it does have many of the features seen in Graeco-Roman letters, there is no extant letter like this from the surrounding context, in that it combines personal features (such as the elaborate thanksgiving in 1:2–3:13) with instructions and end-time exhortation (Koester 1979). I Thessalonians, a carefully composed writing, 'is an experiment in the composition of literature which signals the momentous entry of Christianity into the literary world of antiquity' (ibid. 33).

3. An important insight of Robert Funk (1967) is that the letter substitutes for the personal presence of Paul. In this regard Funk accepts and develops the ideas of Koskenniemi (1956) that in the Greek world the letter was designed to extend the possibility of friendship between the parties after they had become separated—that is why parousia ('presence' or 'arrival'), philophronēsis ('affectionate kind treatment', 'friendship'), and homilia ('being together', 'communion', 'conversing') are basic to the conception of the Greek letter. 'Absent in body, but present through this letter' is a common Greek formula reflecting this phenomenon. Funk (1967: 265) suggests that Paul must have thought of his presence as the bearer of charismatic, even 'eschatological', power, even though he certainly does not equate his parousia with that of Christ and this theme is more clearly seen in I Cor 5:3–5 than in I Thessalonians.

4. It is uncertain if Paul is replying to a letter. Frame (1912: 157), Faw (1952: 220–2), and Malherbe (1990) think that he was, but most think that he was not. Paul could have learned of the situation in Thessalonica from Timothy (so Best 1972: 171 and Jewett 1986: 92).

5. Lastly, in this connection, it should be noted that most of the letters which survive from Graeco-Roman antiquity are from one individual to another and Paul is usually writing to a group or groups. We would expect this to make some difference. There is, indeed, some interest in group-oriented letters, especially those to a family (Stowers 1986: 71–6). Most of our evidence on family letters comes not from Greek epistolary theorists (preoccupied with the concerns of free adult males) but from Egyptian papyri. There is a letter from Cicero (in exile) to his family in Stowers (1986: 74–6).

6. Context Thessalonica, located at the head of the Thracian Gulf, was founded by Cassander in c.316 BCE on the site of an older city. There is some archaeological and literary evidence for the usual assemblage of Hellenistic features and buildings, such as an agora, a Serapeum, a gymnasium, and a stadium (Vickers 1972). In due course Thessalonica passed into Roman hands, where its situation on the Via Egnatia, the great Roman road running from the Adriatic to the Black Sea, gave it great strategic and commercial significance. It is not surprising that it became the capital of the province of Macedonia. From surviving inscriptions it seems to have had a vibrant religious life, with numerous cults (Edson 1948; Donfried 1985; 1989).

7. There is little doubt that Thessalonica would have contained the same sharp division between a small wealthy, aristocratic élite and a much larger non-élite characteristic of the Graeco-Roman cities of the East. Jewett (1993) has usefully pointed out that the dominant form of housing for the non-élite would have been tenements, not the more spacious villa type houses.

B. The Nature of the Christ-Following Community in Thessalonica.

1. Jews or Gentiles or Both? In 1 Thess 1:9 Paul tells his audience they turned to God from idols to serve the one true God. This strongly suggests they were idolatrous Gentiles prior to conversion, for he would not describe Jews as turning from idolatry (de Vos 1999: 146–7). Many scholars refuse to accept this conclusion, mainly because it is contrary to what Acts 17:1–9 says, with its picture of Paul preaching in a synagogue and winning converts among Jews, God-fearers, Greeks, and rich women. But Luke is probably just following his typical pattern here (Lührmann 1990: 237–41), possibly based on his desire to depict an early movement of Christ-followers made up of Jews and Gentile God-fearers (Esler 1987: 36–45).

2. Exactly what sort of idolatry the Thessalonians had previously engaged in is uncertain. Jewett (1986: 127–32; 165–7) has mounted a significant argument that Paul's converts were impoverished manual workers who had seen Cabirus, their saviour-god, hijacked by upper-class interests. This view has, however, been criticized as lacking evidence and also as resting on the false assumption that an end-time ideology is necessarily founded on some form of deprivation (Barclay 1993: 519–20).

3. Social Status Recent research on the social structure of Pauline communities has tended to favour socially stratified congregations with wealthy members providing a house for the meetings of the community and virtually acting as patrons to the members. But the fact that Paul does not mention the name of any person in Thessalonica raises the possibility that the whole congregation came from the poor non-élite, living in tenements (Jewett 1993). De Vos (1999: 154) sees in Thessalonica an audience of 'free-born artisans and manual-workers'. Corinth and Thessalonica thus represent very different types of the early Christ-movement (Barclay 1992). The difficult life of an urban artisan has been well described by Hock (1980: 31–47). The community may also have embraced agricultural day labourers (Schöllgen 1988: 73, 76).

4. Opposition to the Christ-Followers in Thessalonica Paul's initial proclamation in Thessalonica was attended by great conflict (agōn) in public (2:2). Furthermore, great affliction (thlipsis: 1:6) accompanied the reception of the word by the Thessalonians and, just as Paul had warned them that they would continue to be afflicted (3:4), so they are at the time he writes the letter (3:3). They have suffered at the hands of their fellow Thessalonians (2:14).

5. The best explanation for such opposition lies in the more general issue raised by Paul's aim of having the Thessalonians abandon their traditional gods in favour of the monotheistic brand of faith he was preaching, an aim achieved as far as his addressees were concerned, since they had turned to God from idols (1:9). To appreciate what this means we need to understand the everyday reality of paganism in this part of the empire (see MacMullen 1981).

6. Kinship, politics, economics, and religion were inextricably interrelated. Pagan rites were foci of economic and social interaction, playing a key role in maintaining the local political and economic system. The social dimension could be seen in crowds in theatres attached to shrines, with readings, music, and dancing (ibid. 18–24); economic aspects included coins minted and fairs attached to festivals (ibid. 25–7); and very important were meals at these festivals, generally involving meat not otherwise eaten and much wine and often partaken by thiasoi in small groups of diners, where the idea was found that the god might join those who were dining (cf. Plut. Mor. 1102A). Here gross indulgence often occurred (ibid. 36–40; cf. 1 Cor 8:10) in the eidoleion where the statue of the deity was located.

7. Jews and Christ-followers who abstained from these celebrations were likely to be accused of misanthropy (MacMullen 1981: 40). If people became Christ-followers in great numbers the local temples would be less frequented and the meat trade could suffer (so it was in Bithynia before Pliny's actions: Ep. 10.96; MacMullen 1981: 41). More dangerous was the charge of atheism, since the élite believed that the hoi polloi needed to take part in the local worship to ensure political stability (MacMullen 1981: 2–3). Later on there is explicit reference to such behaviour as 'godlessness' (atheotēs), but there is no reason such a charge could not have been made in Paul's time (Barclay 1993: 515). To be respectable and decent meant taking part in the cult; old was good and new was bad. Thus, religion served to strengthen the existing social order (MacMullen 1981: 57–8). To deny the reality of the gods was absolutely unacceptable—one would be ostracized for that, even stoned in the streets (ibid. 62).

8. The particular proposal that the conflict centred on a charge that the Thessalonian followers of Jesus were contravening 'the decrees of Caesar' (explained by Judge 1971) rests on little but the historically dubious account of the Thessalonian mission in Acts 17:1–9 (also see de Vos 1999: 156–7). Nevertheless, as Donfried (1985) has argued, any abandonment of the imperial cult as part of a general rejection of idols would not have been well received in Thessalonica, where coins reveal signs of a cultic devotion to the emperor as early as 27 BCE.

C. The Character of the Letter: Theology and Identity. 1. Established Suggestions as to the Character of the Letter There has been much interest among critics in seeking some broad description with which to characterize the nature of 1 Thessalonians. The two most popular sources for an overarching description are popular Hellenistic philosophy and rhetoric and Jewish biblical and extra-biblical traditions, since both areas, individually or jointly, have influenced what Paul has to say to his audience (Perkins 1989: 325–7). The numerous attempts to categorize 1 Thessalonians as a whole using the conceptual frameworks available to first-century Mediterranean persons can be referred to as ‘emic’, a useful social-scientific term (derived from ‘phonemic’) referring to insider, native, or indigenous points of view, as opposed to ‘etic’ (derived from ‘phonetic’), meaning the perspective of an outsider trained in contemporary social-scientific ideas and approaches (see Headland, Pike, and Harris 1990). One of the fundamental insights of the social sciences is the fundamental importance of the distinction between these two perspectives. Yet modern persons trained in twentieth-century ideas who seek to understand—however incompletely—a pre-industrial culture removed from them in space or time will usually find it necessary to employ both emic and etic perspectives in order to translate the experience of that culture into a framework they can understand (Esler 1995: 4–8). So, we will first consider some existing solutions to the nature of the letter from an emic point of view, and then briefly propose some etic perspectives which will be employed in the Commentary.

2. The first emic perspective consists of those derived from the Hellenistic setting. Donfried (1989) and Smith (1989: 170) regard the letter as one of consolation, having as its main purpose to console (paramuthein) the Thessalonians at a time when they were suffering the effects of persecution. While 1 Thessalonians contains several consolatory elements (see Commentary), the existence of other dimensions, however, raises some doubt as to whether ‘consolation’ is appropriate as a general designation for the letter (Chapa 1994). One other dimension to the letter, most prominently advocated by Malherbe (1989c), is that of exhortation. Malherbe (1987: 68–78; 1989d) has argued that Paul’s aim in the letter is closely in tune with elements of Graeco-Roman moral philosophy dealing with how, in a context of friendship between persons, one of them exhorted the others to maintain existing forms of behaviour, even though Paul modifies these traditions to accord with his own theology and interests. Malherbe (1987: 74) recognizes that hortatory themes are explicitly prominent only in 1 Thess 4–5, but argues that his self-description in chs. 1–3 serves a hortatory function by reminding them of his example.

3. The second prominent emic perspective involves Jewish traditions, expressed in biblical and extra-biblical literature, which speak of a decisive change in the cosmos which God is going to bring about. The fact that such ideas, especially expressed in the notions of the coming parousia of Christ and the salvation and deliverance from wrath for his followers that will result (1:6–10; 4:13–18), should figure so prominently in a letter addressed largely if not exclusively to former idolaters constitutes one of the most remarkable features of 1 Thessalonians. This is especially surprising when one considers that other areas of Jewish tradition play a fairly small part in Paul’s message, since although some of his statements bear marks of having originated in Israelite Scripture (as noted in the Commentary), there is, as de Vos (1999: 146–7) notes, no explicit quotation from the OT and no reference to any OT figure (such as Abraham, for example) or to cultic language. Moreover, nowhere else in Paul’s letters is the theme of dramatic future redemption so pronounced (Jewett 1986: 168). At a more general level, however, it has been reasonably argued, by Perkins (1989) for example, that Paul’s desire to install Jewish categories and images in the hearts and minds of his converts in Thessalonica—with its profusion of pagan cults also competing for adherents (Donfried 1985; 1989)—is a more prominent theme in the letter than moral education of the sort advocated by Malherbe and others. This proposal seems to be more in tune with the markedly non-élite status of the recipients of the letter.

4. A Social Identity Approach to 1 Thessalonians Alternative ways of characterizing 1 Thessalonians, which are capable of comprehending possibly a broader range of issues and of facilitating useful contemporary applications, can be derived from the etic perspectives developed by modern social scientists.

5. One promising approach is that offered by social identity theory, a flourishing area of social psychology developed by Henri Tajfel and others in the 1970s and 1980s (see Tajfel 1978; 1981; Tajfel and Turner 1979; 1986; Brown 1988; Robinson 1996) and utilized in a recent monograph on Galatians (Esler 1998, esp. at 40–57) and in Esler (2000) dealing with Galatians and 1 Thessalonians. This theory explores the extent to which persons acquire and maintain a valued social identity, that is, that part of their sense of self which derives from belonging to one group rather than another, a process which is likely to be the focus of stereotypification and denigration. Social identity is more significant in group-oriented cultures (such as those present in the first-century Mediterranean world) than in modern individualistic cultures (such as those of northern Europe and North America). Social identity theory always insists on the primacy of the question ‘Who do we say we are?’—which was expressed in the first-century Mediterranean world most directly in discourses of group-belonging derived from kinship or fictive kinship). Nevertheless, this theory also finds a place for ethical norms (as helping members maintain their sense of identity in new and ambiguous situations) and narratives of the past and future (as telling them who they are in relation both to where they have come from and whither they are proceeding). Even a conceptual apparatus usually (and reasonably) designated as ‘theological’ (and for 1 Thessalonians, see Marshall 1982) can serve a vital role in the processes of group differentiation and categorization which lie at the heart of this theory. Modern illustrations of the (often violent) dynamics of social identity lie to hand in the ethnic differentiation evident in Northern Ireland, Bosnia, Kosovo, Rwanda, and Israel/Palestine.

6. As will be noted in detail in the Commentary, 1 Thessalonians can be interpreted as an attempt by Paul to establish and maintain a desirable social identity for his Thessalonian converts in the face of the allure and threats posed by rival groups, and in relation to past, present, and future (Esler 2000). It is noteworthy, however, that in spite of Paul’s seeking to nourish their group identity in a manner which includes pronounced outgroup stereotypification, he does not recommend ill-treatment of outsiders (which is an all too common concomitant of such an attitude) but, on the contrary, actually advocates doing good to outsiders (3:12; 4:12). There is a strong countercultural dimension to Paul's position here.

7. It is worth noting that proposing social identity as an overall framework for interpreting the letter, with issues traditionally referred to as ethical or theological here seen as contributing to Paul's overall task of strengthening the Thessalonians' sense of who they were, in no way forecloses on any claims his ethics and theology have to a privileged ontological status. To suggest that resituating biblical data within frameworks originating in the social sciences in some way prejudices Christian truth-claims is an unfortunate misconception of the social-scientific approach to interpretation which is still entertained in some quarters where the fact that every word in the New Testament is socially embodied does not seem to be taken with sufficient seriousness.

8. While social identity theory exists at a fairly high level of abstraction, within its broad reach other areas of social-scientific research can be used in relation to particular parts of 1 Thessalonians. Chief among them are the bedrock realities of Mediterranean culture (as compellingly modelled by Malina (1993) on the basis of the work of social anthropologists in the last few decades) and millennialism, the study of how certain contemporary pre-industrial peoples in Africa, the Americas, and the South Pacific have responded to the disruption or destruction of their traditional life styles by European colonization by generating myths of future deliverance which describe the coming destruction of the Europeans and the restoration of traditional lifestyles, the return of the ancestors, the provision of cargo, and so on (Esler 1994: 96–104; Duling 1996). Jewett (1986) has applied such insights to both 1 and 2 Thessalonians.

D. Outline.

The Prescript and Thanksgiving (1:1–10)

The Prescript (1:1)

The Thanksgiving (1:2–10)

Paul's Ministry in Thessalonica (2:1–16)

The Divine Basis for the Initial Visit (2:1–4)

Their Behaviour and Example (2:5–12)

The Response of the Thessalonians (2:13–16)

The Present Situation (2:17–3:13)

Paul's Desire to Visit the Thessalonians (2:17–20)

Timothy's Mission (3:1–5)

Thankful Receipt of Timothy's Report (3:6–10)

Prayer for the Thessalonians (3:11–13)

Living a Life Pleasing to God (4:1–12)

Keeping the Traditions (4:1–2)

Purity (4:3–8)

Brotherly Love (4:9–12)

The Lord's Coming (4:13–5:11)

The Circumstances of this Coming (4:13–18)

The Need for Wakefulness (5:1–11)

Final Exhortations and Greetings (5:12–28)

Honouring Leaders (5:12–13)

Christian Identity-Indicators (5:14–22)

Prayer for the Thessalonians (5:23–4)

Closing Prayer and Instructions (5:25–8)

COMMENTARY

The Prescript and Thanksgiving (1:1–10)

(1:1) The Prescript Paul follows the form of opening current in Graeco-Roman letters consisting of sender(s), recipient(s), a greeting, and sometimes a prayer for health or prosperity, in that order. Here the senders are himself, Silvanus, and Timothy, with Timothy being mentioned again later (3:1–10). Paul does not describe himself in v. 1 as an apostle, although he does use that term of himself (and perhaps Silvanus and Timothy) at 2:7. The recipients are 'the congregation' (ekklēsia; 'church' in NRSV seems a little anachronistic here) 'of the Thessalonians (which is) in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ'. With this expression, in the very first verse, Paul inaugurates the issues of identity through group-belonging which will fill this letter. Social identity embraces the mere fact of belonging to a group (the 'cognitive' aspect) and its 'evaluative' and 'emotional' dimensions, that is, the positive or negative connotations members have about belonging and how they feel toward insiders and outsiders (Esler 1998: 42). Here the Thessalonians are invited to assess their membership of the congregation as extremely valuable through its close (though unexplored) relationship with their divine Father, an expression that constitutes the first of many instances of kinship language in the letter (Esler 2000), and the Lord Jesus. Although other groups are not yet mentioned, theirs is one plainly worth belonging to.

(1:2–10) The Thanksgiving This section, consisting of one long sentence, comprises the thanksgiving that Paul includes in all his letters except Galatians, after the address and greeting. For Pauline thanksgivings, see Schubert 1939. Some see this section as ending as late as 3:13, but this suggestion probably strains the notion of thanks beyond its breaking-point. v. 2, Paul notes that he constantly thanks God for the Thessalonians and mentions them in his prayers. He is obviously happy with them. v. 3, one reason for his positive regard now emerges: his memory of their work of faith (pistis), labour of love (agapē) and steadfastness of hope (elpis) in 'our Lord Jesus Christ' before our God and Father. The triad of faith, love, and hope, which is common in the Pauline corpus (1 Thess 5:8; Rom 5:1–5; 1 Cor 13:13; Gal 5:5–6) and later NT documents (Eph 4:2–5; Col 1:4–5; Heb 6:10–12; 10:22–4; 1 Pet 1:3–8), may well be an invention of Paul himself (Best 1972: 67). These three characteristics of becoming a follower of Christ are not just theological virtues but constitute distinctive badges of group identity. The Thessalonians, pushed to say who they were, could have given the distinctive answer, 'People characterized by faith (in Christ), love and hope'.

v. 4, Paul, describing them as 'brothers' (adelphoi; NRSV has 'brothers and sisters'), says he knows of their election (eklogē). The notion of election, with its long history antecedent to Paul of describing God's choice of Israel as his own people, is now redirected to designate the ex-idolatrous Thessalonians as a group with an extraordinary status and destiny as specially chosen by God. Here Paul both amplifies (or reiterates) their understanding of themselves and also enhances the positive connotations of belonging to such a group. The use of adelphoi, the first of seventeen instances in the letter, continues the kinship discourse already begun with the two references to the Father. The word may include women (so Koester 1979: 36 and NRSV), as it must do in Galatians in the light of Gal 3:28, but it is possible that here it does not, even though some women may have been converted by Paul (see Fatum 1997). v. 5, this verse, in which Paul states how his gospel came among them not only in word, but in power and in the Holy Spirit and with full conviction, outlines either the occasion and manner of their election or the grounds by which Paul inferred the fact of their election. It is essential to give Paul's reference to power and the Holy Spirit its full force and meaning. He is reminding the Thessalonians of the miracles and other charismatic phenomena (probably prophesying, glossolalia, visions, and auditions) which accompanied their reception of his preaching. Such ecstatic phenomena, although rare, if not unheard of, in domestic settings in first-century cities of the Graeco-Roman East, were characteristic of Paul's mission (Esler 1994: 40–51), as he also later reminded the Galatians (Gal 3:1–5). Charismatic phenomena created an exciting zone of Spirit-filled experience unique to his congregations. Once again, the group-differentiating element to this language should not be missed—another way of describing their identity was as a group actually filled by God. v. 6, they became his and the Lord's imitators in the way they received the word in spite of persecution (thlipsis) in the joy of the Holy Spirit. The difficulties experienced by the Thessalonians, already implied by the reference to their endurance in 1:3, now surface openly in relation to their initial conversion. Possible reasons for external opposition to the Thessalonians turning to Christ, especially through neglect of cults considered vital to civic well-being, were considered above (cf. 1 THESS B 4). One insight of social identity theory is that external opposition and persecution will often encourage members to act in terms of their group membership, so that such past suffering, now brought again to mind by Paul, probably strengthened their involvement with, and commitment to, the congregation. The 'joy inspired by the Holy Spirit' probably extends to the euphoria enjoyed by those who experience powerful dissociative states caused by divine possession (Esler 1994: 42).

vv. 7–9, they 'became an example to all the believers in Macedonia and Achaia'. In other words, they provided an admirable ensemble of attributes of belonging to a Christ-believing group which was recognized as applicable to other such groups in neighbouring areas. Paul focuses on their faith (pistis) as the key feature (it was mentioned first in v. 3), knowledge of which has now spread so far that he has no need to say anything about them, because others tell him what success he had among the Thessalonians, how they turned from idols 'to serve a living and true God' (cf. 1 THESS B.1). Archaeological, epigraphic, numismatic, and literary evidence shows that a number of pagan cults were present in Thessalonica in Paul's time, including those of the Egyptian goddesses Serapis and Isis (who offered salvation and eternal life), Dionysus, Zeus, Asclepius, Demeter, and, most importantly, Cabirus (Edson 1948; Donfried 1985; Jewett 1986; Kloppenborg 1993). This was not unusual in the empire which exhibited a pullulation of beliefs (MacMullen 1981: 1). The pagan cults of Thessalonica represent some of the outgroups against whom the Thessalonians must now seek to distinguish themselves so as to build and maintain a positive social identity. v. 10, Paul concludes by mentioning that now they are waiting for his (i.e. God's) son from heaven, 'whom he raised from the dead—Jesus who rescues us from the wrath that is coming'. Here we see that Paul has managed to persuade his Gentile converts to accept deeply Jewish tradition relating to the Day of Anger when the wicked will be condemned and the good saved. The notion of 'the day (of judgement)' is a common feature of Israelite end-time speculation (see Joel 2:1–2; Zech 9:16; Mal 3:1–2; for the last judgement, see 1 Enoch 1:1–9; 2 Esd 7.33–44; Apoc. Abr. 29.14–29). At the same time, this brief reference to what the future holds for them, although greatly developed later in the letter, further contributes to differentiating the Thessalonians as a positively valued in-group from negatively valued outsiders (Esler 2000). Myths of the future developed by millennial movements in modern pre-industrial settings virtually always serve this function.

Paul's Ministry in Thessalonica (2:1–16)

(2:1–4) The Divine Basis for Paul's Initial Visit vv. 1–2, addressing them again in the language of fictive kinship as 'brothers', Paul reminds the Thessalonians how fruitful has been the work which he began among them (2:1). He then offers some precise information about his inauguration of his mission in Thessalonica, mentioning that, in spite of the suffering and abuse he (and presumably Silvanus and Timothy) previously experienced (hubristhentes: physically assaulted and dishonoured) in Philippi, with God's aid (lit. in our God) he courageously preached God's gospel to them in the midst of great conflict (agôn, 'opposition' NRSV). The ill-treatment in Philippi may be the same as that recorded in Acts 16:19–24, where Paul and Silas (i.e. Silvanus of 1 Thess 1:1) were dragged to the lawcourts, experienced hostility from the crowd, and were then stripped, flogged, and thrown into prison on the order of the magistrates. Later they were delivered (Acts 16:25–40) and moved on to inaugurate the mission in Thessalonica (Acts 17:1–9). In any event, the Thessalonians must have known of the events—which involved being grossly shamed in public in a culture where honour was the primary virtue—to which Paul alludes. His point is that, in spite of this extreme type of opposition, he persevered when he came to Thessalonica, even though there too he encountered conflict (agôn). Paul is not 'boasting' in our modern sense in saying this. He is doing what any honourable first-century Mediterranean man would do—setting out the foundation for his claim to respect and to authority. Moreover, the references to conflict in Philippi and then in Thessalonica illustrate the extremely competitive, indeed violent, context in which Paul's efforts to establish in-groups of Christ-believers had been conducted in the face of the actions of opposing out-groups.

v. 3, Paul now begins to make more explicit the basis and nature of his activity and status. His appeal (paraklēsis) refers here to his initial preaching, whereas elsewhere in the letter paraklēsis relates to his exhortations contained within it (so 4:1). Paul denies that the source of his preaching was error, impurity, or deception, although he does not say precisely what charges against him led to this denial; presumably the Thessalonians did know (Best 1972: 93–4). It is even unclear whether he is responding to attacks from outside or inside the Christ-movement, or from Israelites or Gentiles. v. 4, his authority comes from God. He has been approved by God to be entrusted to preach the gospel, and so he does, not to please men but the God who scrutinizes our hearts (see Jer 11:20; 1 Sam 16:7). In Mediterranean terms, Paul presents himself as the loyal client of his divine patron, who knows him fully and has entrusted him to act as a broker to others, by distributing his benefaction (the gospel) to people who will become his clients, indeed his children.

(2:5–12) Their Behaviour and Example vv. 5–6, Paul did not flatter them, that is to say, did not please the Thessalonians by attributing to them honour they did not possess, nor try to exploit them for personal gain. Nor did he seek honour (doxa, ‘praise’ NRSV) from anyone at all. Again, it is unclear precisely from which figures Paul might be distancing himself here. One possibility consists of the wandering philosophers, such as Cynics (Malherbe 1989b: 38–9) and magicians of this period, whose sincerity was questionable (see Lucian, De morte Peregrini, 3, 13). Alternatively or in addition, Paul may have in mind other members of the Christ-movement, such as the wandering apostles and prophets bent on living off congregations who are mentioned in the Didache (11.3–12), with something like the latter suggested by the next verse. v. 7, although as Christ’s authorized apostle, that is, emissary or broker (apostolos), he held a position of considerable honour in relation to the Thessalonians, he was gentle (that is, not insisting on the benefits which rightly belonged to such an honourable position), like a wet-nurse or nursing mother comfort her children. For the word translated here as ‘gentle’ (ēpioi) there is a variant, ‘infants’ (nēpioi), which is somewhat better attested in the manuscript tradition, but the total inversion of the imagery in the rest of the verse which this reading would produce, with the Thessalonians now the children, suggests ‘gentle’ was the original form.

Malherbe (1989b) has drawn attention to the similarity of Paul’s language in 2:1–12 to that used of ideal Cynic philosophers (as opposed to money-grubbing charlatans) by Dio Chrysostom (40–120 CE), even to the extent of Dio’s using the image of the nurse to epitomize how a good philosopher will treat his audience. Malherbe’s (ibid. 46, 48) conclusion, however, that Paul’s use of such language suggests he need not have been replying to an attack on him, is improbable. In this conflict-ridden and group-oriented culture it was inevitable that Paul would be attacked (2:1–2) and not at all surprising that in reply he would avail himself of a convenient stock discourse, in this case, perhaps, that of genuine travelling philosophers versus false ones (Koester 1979: 42). This discourse had probably become conventional long before Dio, writing after Paul, had utilized it himself.

v. 8, the sentiment here builds on v. 7. Because Paul cared so deeply for them (homeiromenoi—a rare word; Koester 1979: 42) and they had become very dear (agapētoi) to him, he gladly decided to share with them not only the gospel but his whole being. Paul is here drawing upon the strong bonds of love and group solidarity that characterized family life in this culture. v. 9 provides a specific interpretation of how Paul shared his whole being with them. He asks the Thessalonians, (his) ‘brothers’, to recall that while he preached the gospel of God to them he worked night and day so as not to be a burden on them. Paul here reveals that he preached to the Thessalonians in a very low-status occupation as a craftsman of some sort (perhaps a tent-maker—Acts 18:3), not in the context of a synagogue, thus providing further evidence for the Thessalonians being a Gentile community (see 1 THESS 1:9). Hock (1980) has amply described how a craftsman’s shop would have functioned as a locus for Paul’s evangelism. That Paul could celebrate manual labour in this way suggests that his addressees also belonged to the non-élite in Thessalonica (Jewett 1993). This observation finds further support in the fact that there is not a single member of this congregation socially prominent enough for Paul to address by name (unlike the case in Corinth). v. 10, the Thessalonians are witnesses that he worked among them in a manner that was holy, just, and blameless. Behind this assertion may lie sentiments to the contrary that Paul was aware were being expressed about him in the city.

vv. 11–12, once again Paul returns to the pervasive family imagery of the letter, although now changing its gender, by saying that they know he treated each one of them like a father his children (v. 11), urging (parakalein), encouraging (paramuthein), and offering witness (marturein, ‘pleading’ NRSV) as to how they should ‘lead a life’ (lit. walk, peripatein) worthily of the God who called them into his kingdom and glory (v. 12). At the end of v. 12 the reference to God’s kingdom and glory reinforces the elevated and honourable nature of the group to which they belong and the glorious destiny in store for them. These are central themes in the letter as a whole. They emphasize the measureless superiority of the Christ-believing in-group to all out-groups in this environment.

The word peripatein in v. 12 is important (it also appears at 4:1, twice, and 4:12). It also occurs in Romans (4 times), 1 Corinthians (twice), 2 Corinthians (5 times), and Galatians (once). In the NT the verb can mean just ‘to walk around’ (Mk 2:9), but Paul uses it for the ‘walk’ of life. According to Seesemann (1967: 944–5), Paul relies on it in exhortatory contexts, particularly in the moral sense, a meaning which could only have derived from the LXX, since it is unknown in classical Greek. An LXX example of this meaning is at 2 Kings 20:3 (where Hezekiah says he has walked before God in truth and with a perfect heart) and Eccl 11:9; Sir 13:13. Yet a moral or ethical dimension alone is too narrow for v. 12 (4:1 and 4:12); it essentially means ‘to live’ or, within a social identity framework, ‘to adopt a particular identity’.

(2:13–16) The Response of the Thessalonians Dispute rages as to whether these verses are authentic to the letter or constitute a later insertion. The case for inauthenticity was argued by Baur (1873–5), and has recently been supported by many scholars including Pearson (1971), Boers (1976: 151–2), Koester (1979: 38), and Schmidt (1983). A much more limited interpolation theory regards 2:16c as a marginal gloss inserted into the text after the sack of Jerusalem in 70 CE. Typical reasons for inauthenticity (see Koester 1979: 38) include the unnecessary resumption of the thanksgiving at 2:13, interruption of the close connection between 2:12 and 2:17, alleged non-Pauline use of Pauline terms (such as mimētai, ‘imitators’, in 2:14), the characterization of the Judeans in 2:14 as in conflict with Paul’s attitude in Rom 9–11, lack of a historical point of reference for the last phrase in 2:16 (‘the wrath to the end has come upon them') before 70 CE, and the absence of any allusion to these verses in 2 Thessalonians. Koester also considers a polemic against a third party would destroy the writer–recipient relationship he is trying to reshape.

It is submitted, however, that the better view is that 2:13–16 are authentic, as argued by Okeke (1980–1), Donfried (1984), Jewett (1986: 36–41), and Weatherly (1991), to name a few. There is no reason in the textual tradition to doubt their authenticity and the arguments just mentioned are unpersuasive. Thus, v. 13, beginning with a thanksgiving, marks a natural transition from Paul's message to its impact on the Thessalonians. As to mimētai, Paul uses the very word and in a very similar construction at 1 Thess 1:6 (and also at 1 Cor 4:16 and 11:1), so its use at 2:14 is Pauline. Okeke (1980–1) has offered an explanation for why we should not expect Paul to follow the same argument in this letter as when addressing the Romans. This particular point can be made more emphatically, however. A social-identity approach to Galatians has revealed how far Paul will go in stereotyping Israelites even when they are a part of his congregations (Esler 1998); we would expect such attitudes to apply a fortiori when his audience is Gentile, as in Thessalonica. Finally, there are other possible candidates for the catastrophe referred to in 2:16, such as the riot and massacre that occurred in Jerusalem in 48 CE (Jos. Ant. 20.112 and J. W. 2.224–7; Jewett 1986: 37–9).

Even among the critics in favour of 2:13–16 being authentic, however, one sometimes encounters a wish that the verses were not Pauline (see Jewett 1986: 41), perhaps reflecting a modern aversion to the powerful in-group/out-group antipathies of the first-century Mediterranean world which are largely alien to modern North American and northern European culture and which interpreters are often slow to recognize in NT texts.

v. 13, Paul thankfully recalls their acceptance of God's word, which is active among those who believe. Here he again shows his closeness to them and also reminds them of the nature of the power present in this group, as already mentioned in 1:4. The implication is that none of the other groups in Thessalonica have anything like this to offer. v. 14, his Thessalonian 'brothers' became imitators of the Christ-following congregations (ekklēsiai) in Judea (who had been persecuted by other Judeans (Ioudaioi), because they experienced just the same treatment at the hands of their own fellow-countrymen. To translate Ioudaioi as 'the Jews' (with NRSV and most other trs.) misses the extent to which this people (whether living in Judea, Galilee, or further afield) were regarded by others (and saw themselves) as oriented to Judea, and to Jerusalem and the temple within it. This point becomes very clear in Book 11 of Josephus' Jewish Antiquities, when Cyrus sends the Judeans home to Judea; thereafter in this text Josephus almost always refers to them under this name.

For the nature of the opposition to the Thessalonians, cf. 1 THESS 5.4. The opposition in Judea must have been somewhat different, as it would have drawn upon peculiarly Israelite opposition to the Christ-movement, of the sort perhaps that had previously motivated Paul himself to try to destroy it (Gal 1:13; Phil 3:6).

v. 15, Paul now attacks the Judeans just as we would expect once we shed modern notions of ethical behaviour and attempt to enter the harsh first-century Mediterranean world of violent stereotyping and vilification of out-groups. He denigrates the Judeans as those who killed the Lord Jesus (even though he had been crucified by the Romans) and the prophets and who persecuted him, acting in a way not pleasing to God and opposed to all human beings. In the last phrase Paul seems to go so far as to pick up and mouth for the benefit of his ex-idolatrous converts negative views on Judeans current in certain Graeco-Roman circles (see Stern 1974–80; Esler 1987: 76–80). The idea that the Judeans had killed the prophets was a common one among early Christ-followers (see Lk 13:34; Mt 5:12; 23:31, 35, 37; Acts 7:52; Rom 11:3). References to killing prophets are found in Scripture (1 Kings 19:10) and from extra-scriptural accounts, as in important texts such as the Lives of the Prophets and the Martyrdom of Isaiah. v. 16, thus the Judeans have hindered him from preaching to the Gentiles so that they might be saved. A possible mechanism for such hindrance emerges in the picture of how the Judeans interfered with Paul's mission in Philippi as recounted in Acts 16:11–24, if that account is historical. The result is that the Judeans have always filled their sins to the brim, perhaps referring to the repeated failure of Israel during history, and the anger has finally caught up with them. Although it is not easy to find an incident corresponding to the statement that the anger has come upon the Judeans, one possibility is the riot and massacre which occurred in Jerusalem in 48 CE (Jewett 1986: 37–8).

The Present Situation (2:17–3:13)

Paul recounts his long-standing desire to visit them, and how he sent Timothy instead. Generally, Funk (1967) argues that the traditional Greek epistolary topic of friendship (philophronēsis; see Koskeniemi 1956) has been transformed into a new topic of the Christian letter, 'apostolic parousia'.

(2:17–20) Paul's Desire to Visit the Thessalonians v. 17, Paul has previously described himself as a nursing mother (2:7) and as a father (2:11) to them; now he retains the familial imagery but presents himself as (for a short period) having become an orphan in relation to them—but physically, not emotionally. The notion of 'absent in body but present in mind' was a common topic in Graeco-Roman epistolography (Funk 1967: 264; Stowers 1986: 59). The expression of his eagerness to come to them, part of the friendly letter framework, is a fairly common one in Paul's letters (cf. Rom 1:11; 15:23; 2 Cor 8:16–17; Phil 1:8). v. 18, yet although he earnestly sought to be physically with them again and wanted to come to them on a number of occasions, Satan prevented him. The idea of there being a hindrance to his coming is one of the structural features Funk isolates as belonging to the apostolic parousia (also found at Rom 1:13; 15:22). Moreover, the reference to Satan suggests Paul senses a supernatural force thwarting his desired visit to the Thessalonians (Best 1972: 126–7). vv. 19–20 provide the basis for Paul's missing the Thessalonians and desiring to be with them. For it is they who are his hope, joy, and crown of his claim to honour; in the presence of his Lord Jesus at his parousia they will be his honour and his joy. Here the typical Mediterranean connection of the honour of the individual and the publicly acknowledged worth of the group to which he or she belongs comes through loud and clear. At his parousia Jesus will reward those who are his own, so that those responsible for their conversion, here Paul, will earn a massive accretion of honour and joy from so public an acknowledgement.

(3:1–5) Timothy's Mission vv. 1–2a, because he was no longer able to endure (i.e. his separation from them) he resolved to stay behind alone in Athens and send Timothy. In Acts, Paul moves from Thessalonica to Athens (17:16–34), with a brief intervening stay in Beroea (17:9–15). vv. 2–5, according to Funk's parousia schema, this is the despatch of the emissary aspect (also see 1 Cor 4:17; 16:12; 2 Cor 8:18–24; 9:3–5; 12:17–18; Phil 2:19–23), usually containing (1) a statement that someone has been or will be sent, here 1 Thess 3:2a (just noted); (2) his credentials, here 1 Thess 3:2b (Timothy is his brother and fellow-worker in God for the proclamation of the gospel of Christ); and (3) purpose, here 1 Thess 3:2c–4 (Timothy was to strengthen and encourage them in the faith, lest anyone be agitated by the current tribulations, which they knew would come, just as he had foretold when he was with them). In v. 5, Paul offers a summary of his purpose in sending Timothy: because he could no longer endure, he sent Timothy to learn about their faith, lest the tempter had been successful or his labour fruitless.

(3:6–10) Thankful Receipt of Timothy's Report v. 6, Timothy has recently returned to Paul bearing the good news of their faith (pistis) and love (agapē), that they always have a good memory of him and that they want to see him as much as he wants to see them. The first element of this good news is that the Thessalonians are preserving two parts of the (characteristic) Pauline triad mentioned at 1 Thess 1:3, namely, faith and love; these are vital attributes of the group identity Paul has wanted them to acquire. Nevertheless, Timothy's (or Paul's) omission of any mention of the third attribute—hope—may be deliberate, given what he will say to them later (4:10, 13). As the founder of a congregation who wants them to imitate him, he naturally rejoices that he is still so warmly regarded by them. According to Funk, vv. 6–9 relate to the benefits which accrue from the apostolic parousia—both to Paul and to his addressees (see also Rom 1:13; 15:32; 1 Cor 4:18–19, 21; Phil 2:19). vv. 7–8, Paul states that their faith has encouraged him in a time of every distress (anagkē) and persecution (thlipseis); if they stand firm he can go on living. Here 'faith' is a very general word denoting their whole identity as Christ-believers. Paul does not specify the affliction and tribulation and it is not possible to correlate this information with the descriptions of his activity in Acts at around this time, in either Beroea (Acts 17:10–15), Athens (Acts 17:16–34), or Corinth (Acts 18:1–17). This is another reason against putting too much reliance on Acts as a historical source for Paul's experience at this time, a problem discussed in 1 THESS B.1 in relation to the very different pictures given by Paul and Luke of the foundation of the congregation in Thessalonica. vv. 9–10, because of the Thessalonians, Paul is able to offer joyful thanksgiving to God.

v. 10, day and night he prays most earnestly to see them and—but now a darker note intrudes—to amend the shortcomings (husterēmata) of their faith. Shortcomings? Hitherto there has been no explicit mention of any deficiency in their faith (which here has the same meaning of Christ-following identity as at 3:7), even if a lack of hope was strongly implied at 3:6. Yet Paul is now opening up the theme that even among his splendid and beloved Thessalonians there are problems. Timothy's report could not, after all, have been a uniformly positive one. Accordingly, even if Funk (1967) is right to see in v. 10 an invocation for divine approval and support for the apostolic parousia (as also in Rom 1:10; 15:30–2; 1 Cor 4:19; 16:7), the fact that an absent Paul might need to be present in epistolary form to correct as well as to praise must not be forgotten.

(3:11–13) Prayer for the Thessalonians v. 11, Paul now begins the detailed text of a prayer (especially signalled by verbs in the optative mood in vv. 11, 12) which he had described in summary form in v. 10 and which continues until the end of v. 13. The first invocation (as in v. 10) is that God their Father and their Lord Jesus might guide his way to them. v. 12, the second invocation of the prayer begins to pick up the shortcomings mentioned in v. 11: Paul prays that God may make them increase and abound in love (agapē) for one another and for all, just as Paul does for them. Although they are characterized by love already (1 Thess 3:6), Paul prays that they will show even more love. There is room for improvement. It is significant that this love must not only be directed to the members of the congregation (a reality to be designated, quite naturally, as philadelphia, 'brotherly love', at 4:9) but also to everyone, that is to all outside the congregation. This represents a significant, indeed countercultural, modification of group-oriented ways of behaving which were then the norm. The theme will be taken up again later (4:12).

v. 13, thirdly, Paul prays that they (God and Jesus) may strengthen the Thessalonians' hearts in holiness so that they may be blameless before their God and Father at the parousia of their Lord Jesus with all his saints. This invocation directs the recipients of the letter to the future dimension of their existence, the return of Jesus. The omission of hope in 1 Thess 3:6 suggested certain difficulties with their understanding of what the future held in store and, before proceeding to details (4:13–18), Paul reminds them in abbreviated form of the goal of their existence. The Lord will return and they must be blameless in holiness when he does. The word 'holiness' (hagiōsunē) refers to the Spirit-charged zone of existence they have entered by joining the congregation; its opposites are 'impurity' (akatharsia, 4:7, and porneia, 4:3), the label for the filthy world of idolatry and immorality which they have left behind (see 1 THESS 4:3).

Living a Life Pleasing to God (4:1–12)

Lührmann (1990: 245) refers to this material, reflecting Paul's initial preaching, as 'ethics'. But 'ethics' as a differentiated province of human activity with a heavily individualistic tendency is quite a modern concept, having acquired its current status since the time of Kant (1724–1804). In the ancient world there was discussion of appropriate ways to behave, but set within wider frameworks of domestic or civic life. From the perspective of social-identity theory, on the other hand, norms for behaviour are values which define acceptable and non-acceptable attitudes and behaviours for group members. Norms bring order and predictability to the environment and thus assist in-group members to construe the world and to choose appropriate behaviour in new and ambiguous situations. Thus they maintain and enhance group identity (Brown 1988: 42–8; Esler 1998: 45). Even if critics are correct in seeing Israelite tradition, such as that found in the so-called Holiness Code of Lev 17–26 (Hodgson 1982), as lying behind some of what Paul says in 1 Thess 4:1–12, the usefulness of a social-identity approach to the material would persist. Throughout Israelite history norms, derived from the law and its interpretation, served to differentiate Israel from other groups (Esler 1998: 82–6) and Paul's reappropriation of some of those norms within a setting of the novel intergroup differentiation inaugurated with the establishment of congregations of Christ-followers is unsurprising.

(4:1–2) Keeping the Traditions v. 1, 'Finally, brothers', says Paul, thus indicating that he is moving on to a new series of points relating to the maintenance of their group identity which he has just signalled (in 3:6–13) is not quite as good as it should be. He wants them to 'walk' (peripatein: cf. 1 THESS 2:12) and to please God in accordance with the traditions they had previously received (parelabete) from him (no doubt when he founded the congregation), and thus to do better and better. Paul uses the word peripateō to create an inclusio in 4:1–12, by placing it (twice) at the beginning of the passage (v. 1) and once at the end (v. 12). We are justified in translating it broadly, 'be of a particular identity', an identity which certainly includes moral norms, rather than the narrower 'behave in a particular way'. The exhortation to 'please God', reminds us that a major foundation for normative behaviour among this group is the very personal one of pleasing their heavenly Father (and patron). v. 2, Paul specifically reminds them of the existence of commands, that is, the instructions relating to norms, which he had previously given 'in our Lord Jesus Christ'. The last phrase indicates that these are distinctive to Christ-followers; they are emblems of group-belonging.

(4:3–8) Purity v. 3a, God's will is their sanctification (hagiasmos). Koester (1979: 43) reasonably moves away from too individualistic an interpretation by suggesting that hagiasmos should not be understood as a task of moral perfection for the individual, but as the reassessment of the values for dealing with each other in everyday life (i.e. it concerns relationships). Yet this really fails to bring out the full significance of this word. As suggested elsewhere (Esler 1998: 157–8), sanctification language in 1 Thessalonians (which covers hagios and hagiōsunē at 3:13, hagiasmos here and at 4:4 and 7, and hagiazō at 5:23) provides a semantic framework for expressing the ideal identity of his Gentile converts parallel to the language of righteousness which Paul reactively appropriates from Israelite tradition and deploys in Galatians and Romans when the Christ-following groups he addresses also include Israelites (Esler 1998: 141–77). This is vital language in the letter relating to norms which serves to encapsulate the very distinctive identity of the Thessalonian in-group in contrast to idolatrous out-groups. vv. 3b–6 list a number of aspects to this identity, with vv. 7–8 summarizing the position. v. 3b, the first dimension to their 'sanctification' is that they refrain from porneia, which probably means sexual sin of all types (Best 1972: 161), which Paul presumably implies was characteristic of the idolatrous world they had left behind. Thus the norm (of sexual propriety) is firmly embedded in a contrast between in-group and out-group.

v. 4, is one of the most difficult verses in the letter. (God also wills that) each one of them should know 'to acquire' (or, perhaps, 'to keep'—ktasthai; NRSV has 'control') his skeuos ('vessel') in sanctification (hagiasmos) and honour. There are two main options: (1) 'to keep or control one's body', which involves giving ktasthai a somewhat unusual meaning, or (2) 'to acquire one's wife'. As to (1), sometimes in the post-NT Greek world (but not before) the body is called the container of the soul (Maurer 1971: 359). But Paul does refer to human bodies at 2 Cor 4:7 as 'clay vessels', bearing a treasure. Maurer (p. 365) says the reference is not to the bodies as bearing the soul but the message, but why should not this be the sense in 4:7? This interpretation of skeuos as body, preferred by a number of patristic writers (such as Tertullian and Chrysostom), in spite of a rather unusual sense for ktasthai, is the most likely meaning. Lührmann (1990: 245–7) argues strongly that skeuos means 'body' to include men and women—anthrōpoi—as in 1 Cor 7 (which assumes adelphos and philadelphia as used in 1 Thessalonians do cover both genders). This meaning also seems far better adapted to the reference to sexual misconduct in the previous verse and to what follows in v. 6 (see below).

As to (2), there is a Jewish but not a Greek background for calling a woman a vessel (Maurer 1971: 361–2: 'to use as a vessel', 'to make one's vessel', are to be regarded as established euphemisms for sexual intercourse). If so ktasthai (present tense) in an ingressive sense ('to gain') would mean to marry (as a defence against fornication) and in a durative sense ('to possess'—which would normally require the perfect tense) would mean to hold their own wives in esteem (as a defence against fornication—thus the phrase would correspond exactly to 1 Cor 7:2). This interpretation also fits quite well with v. 6 which would then be a warning against adultery with the wife of a member of the congregation. But this interpretation involves an unpleasant nuance of skeuos (women as containers for semen) which is unknown among Greek authors and is found only in some fairly erotic passages in Israelite works (Bassler 1995: 55).

There are other, less likely, possibilities for skeuos. Donfried (1985: 342) argues that it means the penis, being a reference to the strong phallic symbolism in the cults of Dionysus, Cabirus, and Samothrace prevalent in Thessalonica. With ktasthai it means 'to gain control over one's penis, or over the body with respect to sexual matters'. Bassler (1995) makes an interesting new suggestion that it refers to one's virgin partner.

v. 5, Paul contrasts this behaviour with its opposite, the lustful passion of the Gentiles who do not know God. It seems much more plausible that 'lustful passion' is a reference to how the idolatrous Gentiles treat their bodies rather than their wives. Graeco-Roman wives were meant to live respectable lives at home, bearing their children and attending to domestic affairs. Greek or Roman men passionately involved with their wives were regarded as oddities. Best's (1972: 165) attribution to Paul of the notion that 'pagan marriage is motivated by lust' is culturally indefensible. v. 6a, Paul offers another piece of advice, beginning with an infinitive, whose connection with what has preceded is difficult. It could be a new topic: '(It is God's will—understood from v. 3—that the Thessalonian converts) should not wrong (hyperbainein) or defraud (pleonektein; NRSV has 'exploit') his brother in commerce (pragmati). This is unlikely, since it breaks up a chain of thought that is otherwise completely devoted to sexual misconduct decried in v. 3 and pragma in the singular is not used of commerce (Best 1972: 167). It is preferable to interpret pragma as 'matter' (so NRSV) or 'area', referring back to the misuse of one's body in the lustful manner of pagans. In this context huperbainein and pleonektein could have the meanings just attributed to them, in which case Paul would be warning the Thessalonians not to engage in sexual misconduct with the wives or husbands of other members of the congregation. But Paul is unlikely to have introduced such a limitation. What he is actually saying is that they should not 'outdo' (huperbainein) or 'gain the advantage over' (pleonektein) their brothers in the area of sexual conduct, that is, stop acting like the pagans around them for whom sexual conquests were a matter of pride and the more one achieved the more one had to boast about. Such competition was typical behaviour among unrelated males in this culture (Paul also attacks the same kind of attitudes and practices in Gal 5:26; Esler 1998: 230). Once again, Paul is differentiating this group from the sinful outsiders. v. 6b–c, he reminds them that God will take vengeance on this behaviour just as he had previously told them. There is a strong context for God as avenger in Israelite tradition (Deut 32:35; Ps 99:8; Mic 5:15; Nah 1:2).

v. 7, Paul begins to sum up the discussion initiated at v. 3 by reminding them of the rival brands of identity on offer: either the sanctification (hagiasmos), to which God has called them, or impurity (akatharsia), here (like the instance at 2 Cor 12:21) being related to the condition and product of porneia in v. 3. These words describe the stark alternatives available to in-group and out-group. v. 8, Paul next reminds them of the divine dimension to the norms that are integral to their identity: the one who 'disregards', or 'rejects' (athetein), does not disregard a human being but the God who puts the Holy Spirit into them. Paul has already reminded them of the Spirit (see 1 Thess 1:5), which above all means the powerful charismatic phenomena associated with having, in effect, God within, and he now reiterates this message in the context of group norms in the area of sexual propriety.

(4:9–12) Brotherly Love v. 9, now Paul turns to another subject, brotherly love (philadelphia), although still within the broad subject of the shortcomings announced at 3:10 and the need to abound even more in their agapē mentioned at 3:12. Brotherly love is something that Paul says he has no need to write about because they have been 'God-taught' (theodidaktōi) to love (agapan) one another.

Although there is a treatise by Plutarch on the subject, the word philadelphia is rare in early texts of the Christ-movement. Paul uses philadelphia only once elsewhere (Rom 12:10), and there are only a few instances in the rest of the NT (Heb 13:1; 1 Pet 1:22; 2 Pet 1:7 (twice)). The adjective philadelphos occurs at 1 Pet 3:8. There are only three instances in the Septuagint, at 4 Macc 13:23, 26; 14:1 (which Klauck (1990) sees as a source for Paul), while philadelphos also appears, at 2 Macc 15:14; 4 Macc 13:21; 15:10. Perhaps the connection of 'Philadelphos' with the Ptolemies has discouraged its wider use in biblical texts. Betz (1978: 232) notes that there is no obvious explanation why this term was regarded as proper in the Christian context, since it was apparently considered as just part of agapē and there was no further need to explain it; it may have come to Paul from Hellenized Judaism. Aasgaard (1997) has argued for striking parallels between Plutarch's understanding of philadelphia and Paul's thought on the subject.

Yet in a context in which Paul was intent on maintaining the appropriateness of kinship patterns from the surrounding culture to his Thessalonian congregation, the use of a word at home in Greek perceptions of the family had a lot to recommend it. More particularly, brotherly love characterizes the alternative to behaving like unrelated males always in competition, which he criticized in v. 6a. Lying close to the heart of the identity Paul is recommending to the Thessalonians is the model of harmonious relations among a respectable family in the surrounding culture (Esler 2000). While the reference to their brotherly love at v. 9 is the most obvious example, the word adelphos occurs four times in the passage (4:1, 6, 10 (twice)).

Theodidaktos is unattested prior to Paul; he may have coined the word. He could be alluding to Lev 19:18 (so Lührmann 1990: 248), or to Isa 54:13 or Jer 31:33–4, but this is unlikely for a Gentile congregation. Marshall (1982: 115) has a good explanation: Paul is saying that the Spirit empowers humans to love. This is in accord with Gal 5:22 (see Esler 1998: 203). Kloppenborg (1993) has suggested another source of philadelphia, and theodidaktos, namely, that Paul is utilizing the local popularity of the Dioscuri, Castor and Pollux, whose devotion to one another was widely regarded as exemplifying philadelphia, and that theodidaktos evokes the Dioscuri as a pattern for imitation. But such a derivation is highly unlikely from the author of 1 Thess 1:9. How is it possible, contra Kloppenborg, that two pagan gods could offer the Thessalonians 'an appropriate mimetic ideal in a situation in which disparities in moral character lead to rivalry and tension' (1993: 237)?

v. 10a, Paul praises them for showing agapē to all the brothers in the whole of Macedonia, which brings out the fundamental importance of group solidarity, a typical theme in this culture. vv. 10b–11, he urges them to do even better and to make it their ambition to live quietly, to mind their own affairs, and to work with their hands as he had previously warned them. The most likely explanation for this advice is that Paul wanted his audience, probably urban craftsmen and labourers of low status, to keep a low profile and therefore avoid attracting antipathy from out-groups for reasons discussed in 1 THESS 5:4. Within their social level, Paul was suggesting that they live the quiet, hardworking life of honourable men (see 1 THESS 4:12). Hock (1980: 46–7) believes that this is a recommendation to keep out of politics (by paying special levies, going on embassies to Rome, entertaining the governor, undertaking public services). Such a withdrawal from public life was especially identified with the Epicureans and many more in the first century, sometimes being coupled with advocacy of philosophers of retirement and working with one's own hands. Yet Hock's proposal seems socially unrealistic in relation to a more likely audience of the urban poor who would never have been in a financial position to engage in such activities in the first place, let alone to withdraw from them. v. 12, Paul ends this section with a purpose clause: so that they may adopt a respectable identity (peripatein euschēmōnōs; NRSV has 'behave properly towards') towards outsiders (hoi exō) and be dependent on no one. Thus Paul concludes with peripatein, the word used twice when he opened this discussion (4:1).

The Lord's Coming (4:13–5:11)

These verses deal in some detail with the future destiny of those who believe in Christ and, to a lesser extent, with those who do not. The letter has previously referred to the future in store (1:10), especially the parousia of Christ (2:19; 3:13), but now we have the events and their significance set out in some detail. Although the word 'eschatology' has been applied by NT scholars to this subject for over a century now (as an example, see Best 1972: 180), the various (and differing) theological agendas that have become attached to that word have left its meaning rather obscure, except in the vanishingly rare case of critics who indicate precisely what they mean by it. Accordingly, in what follows the data in 4:13–5:11 will be considered within two other frameworks which, although derived from social-scientific research, have the potential to throw light on this absorbing picture of the future dating to the very early stages of the Christ-movement.

First, within social-identity theory (a sub-area of social psychology—cf. 1 THESS C.5–8), a group's distinctive orientation towards the future can help foster among the members a cognitive sense of belonging to the group, and also nourish the evaluative and emotional dimensions of membership. In other words, the members tell themselves who they are—and in a very positive way—in relation to where they are going. A striking modern example of this is the Hausa, a group of Sudanese Muslims, who spend their whole life as if they are undertaking a pilgrimage, a haj, to Mecca, even though most of them never get there (Esler 1998: 42). Secondly, social anthropologists have investigated many groups, generally (although not always) suffering from some form of colonial oppression or disturbance of traditional ways of life, who develop or revive narratives of a coming transformation of the world which will leave them radically restored to their proper place and, often, destroy those who oppress them (Duling 1996; Esler 1993; 1994: 93–109). These phenomena are generally referred to as instances of 'millennialism' or 'millenarianism'. Examples of millenarian mythopoesis, discussed elsewhere (Esler 1993: 187–8; 1994: 101–4), include the ghost dance among North American Indians in the late nineteenth century and the cargo cults of twentieth-century Melanesia (in the South Pacific). Jewett (1986: 161–78) has usefully applied millenarian ideas to 1 and 2 Thessalonians (the latter letter he regards as authentic). Millennialism provides a second useful etic framework for contextualizing this part of 1 Thessalonians. It is worth noting that although deprivation of some sort cannot simply be said to explain the origin of millennial movements, it is often one aspect of the experience of the membership and provides an important part of the context that needs to be taken into account in understanding its futurist myth.

(4:13–18) The Circumstances of this Coming v. 13, Paul wants them to know that they should not grieve about those who 'are sleeping' (NRSV 'who have died'), 'as others do who have no hope'. Apparently some of the people in Thessalonica whom Paul converted have died since and worries have arisen among the Thessalonians concerning their status at the parousia of Christ. Clearly, as already noted, belief in the parousia, even though it is a vision of the future heavily indebted to Israelite tradition, is embedded in this ex-Gentile group, so that the problem is whether those who die in faith beforehand will participate in Christ's glorious return. The sharp distinction between in-group and out-groups Paul maintains throughout the letter is evident here in the reference to 'the rest who have no hope'. Hope (elpis) was included at 1 Thess 1:3 as one of the three primary elements of the identity of Christ-followers and the fact that Paul is worried they might be deficient in hope also surfaces in Timothy's notable failure to include it in his report to Paul of the current condition of the Thessalonians (at 1 THESS 3:6). It is beside the point to suggest that it was not correct that the rest of men had no hope whatsoever (as does Best 1972: 185); Paul is using the notion of hope to differentiate Christ-followers from other groups; the (probably inaccurate) stereotyping of the others is essential to this strategy. v. 14, Paul sets out what should be the basis for their hope: if they believe that Jesus died and rose, so also will God bring with him those who have died (lit. fallen asleep) through Jesus. In millennial movements elsewhere the return of the ancestors is a common feature of the futurist myth. Here Paul links the inclusion in the parousia of those who have already died to the belief in the death and resurrection of Jesus which was central to their faith in him.

v. 15, first emphasizing the authority of what he is about to say (it is a 'word of the Lord'; v. 15a), Paul now expands upon the precise nature of the vindication he is holding out for those who have died. Those who are living, who survive to the parousia of the Lord, will not have any advantage over those who have died (v. 15b). It is difficult to know what Paul means by a 'word of the Lord' here. Possible meanings include a saying of Jesus (not otherwise extant), a statement by a prophet among the Christ-followers, a fragment of some unknown text, or (perhaps most likely) his own view but spoken as the Lord's agent and therefore the Lord's. It is also unclear whether the 'word of the Lord' relates only to the statement in v. 15 or whether it extends to the end of v. 17. The former is more likely, because Paul had presumably already told them the broad outline of what we have in vv. 16–17; v. 15 contains the new element that required to be supported by the appeal to authority.

vv. 16–17, the Lord himself—accompanied by a cry of command, the call of an angel, and the trumpet of God—will come down from heaven and those who have died in Christ will rise first, then those who are living, who survive, will be snatched up together with them in the clouds to a meeting with the Lord in the air, so to be with the Lord for ever. Here we have a futurist myth derived partly from Israelite tradition but given a new slant in the context of the belief in Christ's death and resurrection which saw him exalted to the right hand of God (Acts 2:33; Rom 8:34). The myth deals with Christ's descent (based on his preceding ascent to God) which presupposes a first-century cosmology in which heaven is located above the earth. The cry of command is probably to be taken as uttered by Jesus and as addressed to the dead that they should rise. A trumpet also appears in connection with resurrection and the end-time at 1 Cor 15:52 (also see Isa 27:13; Zeph 1:14–16). While most myths relate to past events, helping a particular group to gain access to its formative, primordial past (Eliade 1989), a myth of the future such as this is rather different. It serves to stress the goal rather than the basis of a social order and thus has a prescriptive rather than a proscriptive function (Doty 1986: 44–9; Esler 1993: 186). Paul's Thessalonian converts would have been reassured by the details of this narrative that another order of reality existed, and that the difficult events of their present and recent past were occurring within a context controlled by heavenly forces who would ultimately restore their fortunes beyond their wildest dreams. Yet although the creation of hope in a future vindication forms part of such mythopoiesis, it is not the end of the story. For a futurist myth such as this also creates an imaginary experience in the present of that which is to come, and thus reinforces the social identity of its addressees at a time when they are exposed to external threat (Esler 1994: 109).

(5:1–11) The Need for Wakefulness v. 1, Paul indicates that he does not need to tell them about dates and times, presumably because he has already done so. He does not want to become involved in the discussion of an end-time calendar. v. 2, what they already know is that the day of the Lord will come like a thief in the night, that is, quite unexpectedly. The 'day of the Lord' was well established in Israelite tradition. It was to be a time of joy for some and terror for others. Thus Isaiah had written that on 'that day' a great trumpet would sound and the scattered ones in Assyria and Egypt would come to worship the Lord on Jerusalem's holy mountain (Isa 27:13). Zephaniah, on the other hand, had presented a bleaker picture: a day that would be a day of wrath, of anguish and torment, of destruction and devastation, when the Lord would bring dire distress upon the people (Zeph 1:14–18). Paul must have imparted some of this material to his ex-idolatrous converts, no doubt painting a happy future for them and an unhappy one for sinful out-groups.

v. 3, Paul illustrates his previous statement with two connected examples showing how people will not escape. First, it is just when people are saying 'peace and security' (eirēnē kai asphaleia) that suddenly disaster overtakes them just as, secondly, the pain of childbirth comes upon a pregnant woman. The latter example is a commonplace of domestic human experience (although often mentioned as a sign of the End: Mk 13:8), but the former relates to the political realities of Thessalonica. Some coins minted at Thessalonica contained slogans with the similar words 'freedom and security', probably reflecting the advantages the local élite derived from Rome and the Roman imperial cult (Jewett 1986: 124). The 'peace' to which Paul refers is presumably the Pax Romana. Paul is alluding to the fragility of the comfortable relationship between the rulers of the city and Rome (Hendrix 1984), which could at any time suffer a disastrous reverse.

vv. 4–5, Paul introduces the imagery of light and darkness to distinguish between Christ-followers, whom the day (of anger) will not 'surprise... like a thief', and others in Thessalonica. The Christ-followers are all sons of light and sons of day who do not belong to night or darkness; by implication, then, the others are sons of night and sons of darkness who do not belong to light or day. Such a powerful dualism presents very starkly the nature of the opposed identities of in-group and out-group, the first highly positive and the second very negative indeed. Here we have a good example of the stereotypical group-categorization characteristic of the way one group generates a favourable social identity for itself. vv. 6–7, Paul persists with his continuing process of group differentiation in a related area of imagery by exhorting them not to sleep like the others (by implication, people of the night) but to keep awake and be sober—for those who sleep and those who get drunk do so at night. v. 8, since he and they belong to the day, he says, they should be sober, thus reinforcing still further the reality of group differentiation using imagery of day and night which he began way back at v. 4. Yet now he adds a new element—they should do so having put on the breastplate of faith and love and the helmet of hope of salvation. In this latter clause he summons before his readers the triad of faith, love, and hope (and in that order) which he introduced in the third verse of the letter. This is really to pile identity-descriptors on identity-descriptors!

When Paul refers to putting on (endusamenoi) the breastplate of faith and love (thōraka pisteōs kai agapēs) and the hope of salvation for a helmet (perikephalaian elpida sōtērias), he is alluding either to Isa 59:17 or Wis 5:18 (which is presumably dependent on Isaiah), or both. The Isaian passage reads: 'He put on (enedusato) righteousness as a breastplate (dikaïosunēn thōraka) and placed the helmet of salvation (perikephalaian sōtēriou) on his head', while the one from Wisdom has: 'He will put on righteousness as a breastplate (endusetai thōraka dikaïosunēn), and he will don true judgement instead of a helmet.' Paul has changed the phrase 'breastplate of righteousness' to 'breastplate of faith and love', while adding the word 'hope' to the expression 'helmet of salvation', which he otherwise retains. Paul's treatment of the possible Septuagintal source(s) means, first, that faith and love represent a way of describing the condition of being a Christ-follower analogous to that expressed by 'righteousness'. Secondly, however, the alteration indicates that in writing to Gentiles he has deliberately chosen to substitute the former for the latter, presumably because he found 'righteousness' inappropriate for such an audience (Esler 1998: 156–7). The function fulfilled by the language of holiness in relation to a Gentile audience in 1 Thessalonians is served later in relation to mixed Israelite and Gentile groups in Galatians and Romans by the discourse of righteousness.

v. 9, Paul's statement that God has destined them not for anger but for obtaining salvation through their Lord Jesus Christ makes explicit for the first time the nature of the fate, the awesome wrath of God (see Zeph 1:14–18, noted above), hanging over out-groups, who are again sharply differentiated from the believers in Christ to whom salvation will be extended. The nature of that salvation is set out in 1 Thess 4:16–17, while the ambit of the anger is not. v. 10, Jesus Christ is described as the one who died for us so that 'awake or asleep' (that is, dead, as in 1 Thess 4:13–16), we will live together with him. This the first time in Paul's correspondence that we find the important formula 'Christ died for' with a further word or words indicating the person(s) for whom he died (also see 1 Cor 15:3; 2 Cor 5:14; 5:15; Rom 5:6; 5:8; 14:15). De Jonge (1990: 233–4) has argued that this expression, which preceded Paul's use of it since he cites it in 1 Cor 15:3 as a tradition he had received, always serves as a foundation for the claim that God's salvation has become reality or at least has been inaugurated, to highlight the new state of life into which Christ-followers have been transferred. Within a social identity framework, one might add that the notion of Jesus' death for his followers is what enables the creation of their identity and also fills it with positive evaluative and emotional dimensions. v. 11, the sentiment is similar to, while going a little further than, that of 4:18.

Final Exhortations and Greetings (5:12–28)

This section contains a series of largely unrelated pieces of advice, ending with prayers.

(5:12–13) Honouring Leaders vv. 12–13, Paul asks the Thessalonians to respect those who labour amongst them, who 'care for' (or, possibly, with the NRSV, 'have charge of') 'you . . . and admonish you'. He wants his addressees to esteem them very highly in love because of their work and to be at peace with one another. Best (1972: 226) reasonably suggests that we should not interpret these verses as indicating there was a ministry among the congregation in the city. The fact that the 'leaders' are described by their activities and not by titles suggests that they have none. Clearly Paul is at pains that the Thessalonians should not engage in the antagonistic conduct common among unrelated males in this culture.

(5:14–22) Christian Identity-Indicators Paul here strings together various aspects of desirable identity-indicators. Some of them are norms (that is, 'ethical' duties), but others, such as to rejoice and pray, are not. vv. 14–15, the statements here constitute what are essential norms for maintaining the identity of Christ-followers. It is noteworthy, however, that in spite of the group-differentiation that Paul has pursued throughout the letter, he specifically extends the scope of their doing good from the members of the congregation to everyone. There are limits to how far he will go with the process of group-categorization and certainly the all-too-common advocacy of violence against out-group members plays no part whatever in his perspective. vv. 16–18, rejoicing and continual prayer are essential aspects of their identity as Christ-followers. v. 19, they must not quench the Spirit, by which Paul means that they must permit the charismatic gifts associated with the coming of the Spirit—which was a major distinguishing feature of the movement and no doubt made it attractive to members, because of the euphoria Spirit-possession can produce. v. 20, prophecy is one of the gifts of the Spirit (see 1 Cor 12:10) and Paul calls on them not to despise it. vv. 21–2, Paul mentions further attitudes which should characterize the identity of the Thessalonians.

5:23–4 Prayer for the Thessalonians vv. 23–4, Paul prays that God will sanctify (hagiazō) them, thus seeking divine renewal of the sanctification he has already made clear was central to their new identity in contrast to the world of impurity (akatharsia) around them (1 Thess 4:7). Sanctification primarily refers to their present condition, but Paul then goes on to pray that they will be blameless at the parousia. The one who calls is faithful and he will effect this.

(5:25–8) Closing Prayer and Instructions v. 25, now he asks them to pray for him (and presumably Silvanus and Timothy); this enlivens the sense of his presence to them in the letter.

v. 26, the source of the holy kiss of the movement is unknown; possible sources include the historical Jesus, Judaism, or pagan religion. v. 27, suddenly Paul changes to first person singular, presumably because he has taken the stylus in his own hand to write the last few words (as at 1 Cor 16:21; Gal 6:11), and solemnly commands them to read the letter to all the brothers. It is hard to determine how all the brothers (and a textual variant adds 'holy' to brothers) relate to the Thessalonians mentioned in the first verse. Perhaps he means to ensure that those who first received the letter should read it aloud to everyone in a meeting of the congregation (Best 1972: 246–7). v. 28, Paul ends with a form of benediction which must have become conventional among Christ-followers.

REFERENCES

- Aasgaard, R. (1997), 'Brotherhood in Plutarch and Paul: Its Role and Character', in H. Moxnes (ed.), Constructing Early Christian Families: Family as Social Reality and Metaphor (London: Routledge), 166–97.
- Balch, D. L., Ferguson, E., and Meeks, W. A. (eds.) (1990), Greeks, Romans, and Christians: Essays in Honor of Abraham J. Malherbe (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Barclay, J. M. G. (1992), 'Thessalonica and Corinth: Social Contrasts in Pauline Christianity', JSNT 47: 49–74.
- (1993), 'Conflict in Thessalonika', CBQ 53: 512–30.
- Bassler, J. M. (1995), 'Skeuos: A Modest Proposal for Illuminating Paul's Use of Metaphor in 1 Thessalonians 4:4', in White and Yarbrough (1995: 53–66).
- Baur, F. C. (1873–5) Paul: The Apostle of Jesus Christ (London: Williams & Norgate). German original, Paulus, der Apostel Jesu Christi (1845).
- Best, E. (1972), A Commentary on the First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians, Black's New Testament Commentaries (London: Adam & Charles Black).
- Betz, H. D. (1978), 'De fraterno amore (Moralia 478A–492D)', in H. D. Betz (ed.) (1978), Plutarch's Ethical Writings and Early Christian Literature (Leiden: E. J. Brill), 231–63.
- Boers, H. (1976), 'The Form Critical Study of Paul's Letters. I Thessalonians as a Case Study', NTS 22: 140–58.
- Brown, R. (1988), Group Processes: Dynamics Within and Between Groups (Oxford: Basil Blackwell).
- Chapa, J. (1994), 'Is First Thessalonians a Letter of Consolation?', NTS 40: 150–60.
- Collins, R. F. (ed.) (1990), The Thessalonian Correspondence (Leuven: Leuven University Press).
- De Jonge, H. J. (1990), 'The Original Setting of the Christos Apethanen Hyper Formula', in Collins (1990: 229–35).
- Donfried, K. P. (1984), '1 Thessalonians 2:13–16 as a Test Case', Interpretation, 38: 242–53.
- (1985), 'The Cults of Thessalonica and the Thessalonian Correspondence', NTS 31: 336–56.
- (1989), 'Cults and the Theology of 1 Thessalonians as a Reflection of its Purpose', in M. P. Horgan and P. Kobelski (eds.), To Touch the Text: Studies in Honor of Joseph A. Fitzmyer, S.J. (New York: Crossroad), 243–60.
- Doty, W. G. (1973), Letters in Primitive Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- (1986), Mythography: The Study of Myths and Rituals (Alabama: University of Alabama Press).
- Duling, D. C. (1996), 'Millennialism', in R. L. Rohrbaugh (ed.), The Social Sciences and New Testament Interpretation (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson), 183–205.

- Edson, C. (1948), 'Cults of Thessalonica (Macedonica III)', HTR 41: 153–204.
- Eliade, M. (1989), The Myth of the Eternal Return (London: Penguin).
- Esler, P. F. (1987), Community and Gospel in Luke–Acts: The Social and Political Motivations of Lucan Theology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- (1993), 'Political Oppression in Jewish Apocalyptic Literature: A Social-Scientific Approach', Listening: Journal of Religion and Culture, 28: 181–99.
- (1994), The First Christians in their Social Worlds: Social-Scientific Approaches to New Testament Interpretation (London: Routledge).
- (ed.) (1995), Modelling Early Christianity: Social-Scientific Studies of the New Testament in Its Context (London: Routledge).
- (1998), Galatians (London: Routledge).
- (2000), '"Keeping it in the Family": Culture, Kinship and Identity in 1 Thessalonians and Galatians', in J. W. van Henten and A. Brenner (eds.), Families and Family Relations as Represented in Early Judaism and Early Christianity: Texts and Fictions, Studies in Theology and Religion (Leiden: Deo), ii. 145–84.
- Fatum, L. (1997), 'Brotherhood in Christ: A Gender Hermeneutical Reading of 1 Thessalonians', in H. Moxnes (ed.), Constructing Early Christian Families: Family as Social Reality and Metaphor (London: Routledge), 183–97.
- Faw, C. E. (1952), 'On the Writing of First Thessalonians', JBL 71: 217–25.
- Frame, J. E. A. (1912), Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians (New York: James Scribner's).
- Funk, R. (1967), 'The Apostolic Parousia: Form and Significance', in W. R. Farmer, C. F. D. Moule, and R. R. Niebuhr (eds.), Christian History and Interpretation: Studies Presented to John Knox (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press), 249–68.
- Headland, T. N., Pike, K. L., and Harris, M. (eds.) (1990), Emics and Ethics: The Insider/Outsider Debate, Frontiers of Anthropology, 7 (Newbury Park, Calif.: Sage).
- Hendrix, H. L. (1984), 'Thessalonians Honor Rome', Ph.D. dissertation, Harvard University.
- Hock, R. F. (1980), The Social Context of Paul's Ministry: Tentmaking and Apostleship (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Hodgson, R., Jr. (1982), '1 Thess. 4:1–12 and the Holiness Tradition (HT)', in K. H. Richards (ed.), Society of Biblical Literature 1982 Seminar Papers (Chico, Calif.: Scholars Press), 199–215.
- Hooker, M. D., and Wilson, S. G. (1982) (eds.), Paul and Paulinism: Essays in Honour of C. K. Barrett (London: SPCK).
- Jewett, R. (1986), The Thessalonian Correspondence: Pauline Rhetoric and Millenarian Piety (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- (1993), 'Tenement Churches and Communal Meals in the Early Church: The Implications of a Form-Critical Analysis of 2 Thessalonians 3:10', BR 38: 23–42.
- Judge, E. A. (1971), 'The Decrees of Caesar at Thessalonika', RTR 30: 1–7.
- Klauck, H.-J. (1990), 'Brotherly Love in Plutarch and in 4 Maccabees', in D. L. Balch, E. Ferguson, and W. A. Meeks (eds.), Greeks, Romans, and Christians: Essays in Honor of Abraham J. Malherbe (Minneapolis: Fortress), 144–56.
- Kloppenborg, J. S. (1993), PHILADELPHIA, THEODIDAKTOS and the Dioscuri: Rhetorical Engagement in 1 Thessalonians 4:9–12', NTS 39: 265–89.
- Koester, H. (1979), '1 Thessalonians—Experiment in Christian Writing', in F. F. Church and T. George (eds.) (1979), Continuity and Discontinuity in Church History: Essays Presented to George Hunston Williams on the Occasion of his 65th Birthday, Studies in the History of Christian Thought, 19 (Leiden: E. J. Brill), 33–44.
- Koskenniemi, H. (1956), Studien zur Idee und Phraseologie des griechischen Briefes bis n. Chr (Helsinki: Suomalainen Tiedeakatemia).
- Lührmann, D. (1990), 'The Beginnings of the Church in Thessalonica', in Balch, Ferguson, and Meeks (1990: 237–49).
- MacMullen, R. (1981), Paganism in the Roman Empire (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Malherbe, A. J. (1987), Paul and the Thessalonians: The Philosophic Tradition of Pastoral Care (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- (1989a), Paul and the Popular Philosophers (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- (1989b), '"Gentle as a Nurse": The Cynic Background to 1 Thessalonians 2', in Malherbe 1989a: 35–48 (first pub. in NovT 12 (1970), 213–17).
- (1989c), 'Exhortation in First Thessalonians', in Malherbe 1989a: 49–66 (first pub. in NovT 25 (1983), 238–56).
- (1990), 'Did the Thessalonians Write to Paul?', in R. R. Fortna and B. R. Gaventa (eds.), The Conversation Continues: Studies in Paul & John in Honor of J. Louis Martyn (Nashville: Abingdon, 246–57).
- Malina, B. J. (1993), The New Testament World: Insights from Cultural Anthropology, rev. edn. (Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox).
- Marshall, I. H. (1982), 'Pauline Theology in the Thessalonian Correspondence', in Hooker and Wilson (1982: 173–83).
- Maurer, C. (1971), S. V. skewos, TDNT vii. 358–67.
- Okeke, G. E. (1980–1), '1 Thess 2:13–16. The Fate of the Unbelieving Jews', NTS 27: 127–36.
- Pearson, B. A. (1971), '1 Thessalonians 2:13–16: A Deutero-Pauline Interpolation', HTR 64: 79–94.
- Perkins, P. (1989), '1 Thessalonians and Hellenistic Religious Practices', in M. P. Horgan and P. J. Kobelski (eds.) (1989), To Touch the Text: Biblical and Related Studies in Honor of Joseph A. Fitzmyer (New York: Crossroad), 325–34.
- Robinson, P. (ed.) (1996), Social Groups and Identities: Developing the Legacy of Henri Tajfel (Oxford: Butterworth Heinemann).
- Schmidt, D. (1983), '1 Thess 2: 13–16: Lingistic Evidence for an Interpolation', JBL 102: 269–79.
- Schöllgen, G. (1988), 'Was wissen wir über Sozialstruktur der paulinischen Gemeinden?', NTS 34: 71–82.
- Schubert, P. (1939), Form and Function of the Pauline Thanksgivings, BNZW 20 (Berlin: de Gruyter).
- Seesemann, H. (1967), 'Πατέω and compounds in NT', TDNT v. 943–5.
- Smith, A. (1989), 'The Social and Ethical Implications of the Pauline Rhetoric in 1 Thessalonians', dissertation submitted to Vanderbilt University (Ann Arbor: University Microfilms International).
- Stern, M. (1974–80), Greek and Latin Authors on Jews and Judaism (2 vols.; Jerusalem: Israel Academy of the Arts and Sciences).
- Stowers, S. K. (1986), Letter Writing in Greco-Roman Antiquity (Philadelphia: Westminster).
- Tajfel, H. (1978), Differentiation between Social Groups: Studies in the Social Psychology of Intergroup Relations (London: Academic Press).
- (1981), 'Social Stereotypes and Social Groups', in H. Tajfel, Human Groups and Social Categories: Studies in Social Psychology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- and Turner, J. C. (1979), 'An Integrative Theory of Intergroup Conflict', in W. G. Austin and S. Worchel (eds.), The Social Psychology of Intergroup Relations (Monterey, Calif.: Brooks-Cole), 33–47.
- (1986), 'The Social Identity Theory of Intergroup Conflict', in S. Worchel and W. G. Austin (eds.) (1986), Psychology of Intergroup Relations (Chicago: Nelson-Hall), 7–24.
- Vickers, M. (1972), 'Hellenistic Thessaloniki', JHS 92: 156–70.
- Vos, C. de (1999), Church and Community Conflicts: The Relationships of the Thessalonian, Corinthian, and Philippian Churches with their Wider Civic Communities, SBL DS 168 (Atlanta: Scholars Press).
- Weatherly, J. A. (1991), 'The Authenticity of 1 Thessalonians 2:13–16: Additional Evidence', JSNT 42: 79–98.
- White, M. L., and Yarbrough, O. L. (eds.) (1995), The Social World of the First Christians: Essays in Honor of Wayne A. Meeks (Philadelphia: Fortress).

72. 2 Thessalonians

PHILIP F. ESLER

INTRODUCTION

A. The problem of authenticity. 1. The dominant preliminary issue in the interpretation of 2 Thessalonians is the controversy as to whether Paul wrote this letter or not. The answer greatly affects how the letter is to be understood. It should be noted at once that there is virtually no support for reversing the traditional order of 1 and 2 Thessalonians (for reasons well explained by Jewett (1986: 24–30); contra Trudinger (1995), revisiting the views of J. Weiss and T. W. Manson). Doubts as to the authenticity of 2 Thessalonians are stimulated primarily by its close literary relationship to 1 Thessalonians. Many critics, but especially William Wrede (1903), have noted that the topics in the two letters are covered in the same sequence and the themes of the first letter are reflected with minor variations in the second, even if there are few examples with exactly the same wording. Thus, the renewed thanksgiving of 1 Thess 2:12 is repeated at 2 Thess 2:12, prayers in the optative mood introduced by ‘the Lord (God) himself’ appear at similar points (cf. 1 Thess 3:11–13 and 5:23 with 2 Thess 2:16–17 and 3:16), and there are many verbal parallels (see Menken 1994: 36–9 for the comparative data and Best 1972: 50–1). Only 2 Thess 2:1–12 has no parallel in 1 Thessalonians. On the other hand, both letters are very different in these respects from the other Pauline letters. These literary similarities occur in spite of some major differences in the contents of the two letters, especially in relation to views on the parousia (with 1 Thessalonians saying that Christ is expected to come soon and suddenly while 2 Thessalonians argues that his coming will be preceded by other events) and the lack of personal details about Paul and the Thessalonians of the type found in 1 Thess 2:1–12; 13–16; and 3:1–13. The tone of 2 Thessalonians is also generally agreed to be rather cold in comparison with that of 1 Thessalonians.

2. Many critics consider that the best explanation for such features is that 2 Thessalonians is an imitation of the other letter written later to Thessalonica or to some other community of Christ-followers which draws upon the earlier letter to enhance its authority. While those who consider 2 Thessalonians inauthentic usually seek to reconstruct a situation which would render its creation plausible, given our incomplete knowledge of the Christ-movement in the first century their failure to come up with a convincing particular audience and setting does not, as sometimes suggested (Jewett 1986: 3–18; Barclay 1993: 526), itself invalidate their arguments, although it will mean they are less than compelling. Supporters of authenticity, on the other hand, need to explain what had happened that induced Paul to write a second letter to Thessalonica using language and structure so similar to that in 1 Thessalonians; and to the present writer the difficulties with this hypothesis are greater than those raised by the view that the letter is not by Paul (see Bailey 1978–9). As Menken (1994: 27–43) argues, while no one argument is capable of sustaining a case for inauthenticity, overall this seems the preferable solution, in spite of very respectable views to the contrary. Possible explanations for 2 Thessalonians on either hypothesis will now be addressed. Particular issues relating to this debate will come up in the comments below.

B. Some Possible Explanations for 2 Thessalonians if Authentic.

1. Best (1972: 59) suggests that 2 Thessalonians was written by Paul from Corinth shortly after 1 Thessalonians ‘to meet a new situation in respect of eschatology and a deteriorating situation in respect of idleness’, although he notes that ‘we do not know from where Paul received his information’. He proposes that Paul probably wrote with much of 1 Thessalonians in his memory rather than that he worked from a copy of 1 Thessalonians.

2. Jewett (1986: 176–8, 191–2) has a much more particular explanation. It is that ‘for some reason’ Paul’s first letter, impacting on a community alive with millenarian excitement, actually provoked the radical members at Thessalonica, who misunderstood Paul to such an extent as to conclude that the day of the Lord had arrived and to behave in accordance with this belief (e.g. by curtailing certain everyday activities such as work). Paul responds by writing 2 Thessalonians, a refutation of this false doctrine written in a very different tone.

3. Barclay (1993) has proposed an interesting new answer to the relationship between the eschatologies in 1 and 2 Thessalonians which offers a more specific explanation for how the Thessalonians misunderstood Paul’s first letter. After noting Wrede’s (1903: 526) difficulty in suggesting a convincing setting for the letter, Barclay argues that the references to fierce persecution (1:4–9), the problem of people not working (3:6–13), and the claim by some that the day of the Lord is here (2:2) suggest a specific situation. Having examined and rejected existing answers as to what ‘the day of the Lord’ means at 2 Thess 2:2 (see commentary), he proposes a new alternative, namely, that in 1 Thessalonians it is possible to draw a distinction which Paul did not himself draw between parousia (4:13–18) and the day of the Lord (5:1–11) and the latter is associated with the sudden destruction of unbelievers. So, maybe some Christians in Thessalonica reacted to a local (or perhaps widespread) disaster by claiming that it manifested the wrath of God, thereby creating turmoil and encouraging some to give up their jobs and and continue urgent, full-time evangelism. Thus Paul is compelled to write another letter perhaps only a matter of weeks after the first wherein the friendly encouragement gives way to a more frigid and authoritarian tone.

4. A major question hanging over proposals like those of Jewett and Barclay is that if Paul’s first letter had been misunderstood why would he not try to persuade them with a completely new approach, rather than risking a letter which stylistically aped the earlier one, and also strongly protest about their egregious misinterpretation of the earlier letter. 2 Thess 2:2 certainly does not fulfil the latter function, in contrast with 1 Cor 5:9–13, which clearly indicates how Paul went about correcting a misimpression drawn from an earlier letter.

C. Possible Explanations for 2 Thessalonians if Inauthentic.

1. Proponents of the inauthenticity of 2 Thessalonians have come up with a variety of dates and situations for the letter. Wrede himself dated it to about 100 CE and suggested it was written not for Thessalonica (for Thessalonians would ask where it had lain all these years) but for another church which knew of the existence of other Thessalonian correspondence. Masson (1957) proposed that it was written about 100 CE to counter the belief that the day of the Lord had come. On the other hand, Marxsen (1968: 37–44; 1982) favoured an earlier date, around 70 CE, arguing that the letter was intended to counter Gnostics, especially their (false) claim that the day of the Lord had come. If Paul's letters had been collected, as generally supposed, by about 100 CE, an earlier date for the composition of 2 Thessalonians would be preferable (see 2 THESS 3:17).

2. 2 Thessalonians has been understood as a response to millennialism in a Mediterranean context. The three substantive issues of local context recognized in the letter are the existence of some form of oppression being suffered by the addressees (1:4–6), the disturbance caused by the message that 'the day of the Lord has come' (2:1–12), and the disorderly conduct of certain Christ-followers who are refusing to work for a living. On the (preferable) assumption that these issues derive from an actual situation somewhere in the ancient Mediterranean world, and do not just comprise a notional setting aimed at allowing someone to draft a letter in Pauline style, we are faced with what modern social scientists refer to as an outbreak of millennialism. Across the world, we know of many instances of groups, generally (although not always) suffering from some form of oppression or disturbance of traditional social patterns, who generate or revive narratives of a coming transformation of the world which will radically restore them to their proper place and, often, destroy those who oppress them (Duling 1996; Esler 1993; 1994: 93–109). Examples, discussed elsewhere (Esler 1993: 187–8; 1994: 101–4), include the ghost dance among North American Indians in the late nineteenth century and the cargo cults of twentieth-century Melanesia. Jewett (1986: 161–78) has usefully applied millenarian ideas to 2 Thessalonians, although his treatment is affected by his view that the letter is authentic. The view adopted here is that millennialism provides the best framework for contextualizing the letter in a general way, even though we cannot be sure for which troubled community of first-century Christ-followers it was written. Although biblical critics generally use the now rather tired and overworked word 'eschatological', which derives from a theological agenda, to refer to end-time speculation in such texts as Dan 7–12 and 1 Enoch, the framework of 'millennialism' allows a fresh set of questions originating in real social experience to be posed to texts such as 2 Thessalonians. Attempts, such as that of Menken (1994), to discuss this dimension to 2 Thessalonians almost solely in relation to (the undoubtedly important) framework of end-time speculation in Israelite biblical and extra-biblical literature, have an unnecessarily limited focus.

3. It is always worth remembering that the social context of the ancient Mediterranean world in which this example of millennialism occurred was radically different from modern, individualistic cultures of Europe and North America. The ancient Mediterranean world was one where, at an appropriate level of abstraction and without in any way denying local variations, people found meaning by belonging to groups (especially the family), honour was the principal social value, all goods (material and immaterial) were regarded as existing in finite quantities, and relationships between patrons and clients (sometimes mediated by other individuals referred to as 'brokers'; see Moxnes 1991) were common as a way of dealing with access to limited material and social goods. These are the most important of an ensemble of cultural features originally identified and applied to the NT by Bruce Malina in 1981 (now see Malina 1993).

4. The fact that Paul probably did not write 2 Thessalonians does not entail taking a condemnatory attitude to whoever—pseudonymously—claimed he had. Pseudonymity is a common feature in the Bible (Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Isa 40–55 and 55–66), let alone in the profuse writings of the Pseudepigrapha themselves (see Bailey 1978–9: 143–5). Meade (1986) has plausibly argued that the phenomenon occurred when it was felt necessary to make traditions capable of application to new situations, so that it becomes an assertion of authoritative tradition, not literary origin. The closeness of the style of this pseudepigraphic document to 1 Thessalonians is perhaps explicable out of the high respect in which its author held Paul. It is reasonable, therefore, that some time in the first century, probably after Paul's death in Rome in the later 60s, someone faced with a situation having the three broad features mentioned above sought faithfully to reinterpret Pauline tradition in a way which would benefit those addressed. The (non-Pauline) authors of Ephesians, Titus, and 1 and 2 Timothy adopted the same strategy, although faced with very different situations.

5. In what follows I will refer to the author of this letter as 'Paul' (with inverted commas) or 'the author' because of the view taken here that the historical Paul was not its author.

D. Structure. 2 Thessalonians, like 1 Thessalonians, can be given a structure based on thematic, epistolary, or rhetorical considerations (helpfully summarized by Jewett 1986: 222–5). It is doubtful, however, whether the rigorous application of ancient rhetorical or epistolary categories to various sections of the letter does much to further our understanding of it. Accordingly, in the commentary I will adopt the following (pragmatic) structuration, essentially thematic in type, while making occasional reference to possible epistolary or rhetorical subdivisions:

- Prescript (1:1–2)
- Thanksgiving and Encouragement (1:3–12)
- The End and the Man of Lawlessness (2:1–12)
- Encouragement to Persevere (2:13–17)
- Mutual Prayer (3:1–5)
- Warning against Idlers (3:6–12)
- Conclusion (3:13–18)

COMMENTARY

(1:1–2) Prescript This is the beginning of one long sentence (1:1–12). Rhetoricians would call this section the 'exordium'.

Letters in the ancient Mediterranean began with a prescript, comprising the names of the senders and the addressees and a brief greeting, in Greek typically chairei, 'hail'. These verses constitute the prescript to 2 Thessalonians. The senders (Paul, Silvanus, and Timothy) and addressees ('ekklēsia, the community'—'church' sounds a little anachronistic—'of the Thessalonians in God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ') are the same as in 1 Thessalonians, while the greeting has been Christianized (a practice possibly inaugurated by Paul) even further here by an additional reference to Jesus Christ as Lord and God as Father. v. 2, by invoking upon the addressees grace (charis) and peace (eirēnē; Heb. šālôm) from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ, comes close to putting them on an equal footing, unless we are meant to see God as patron and Jesus Christ as broker in accordance with common Mediterranean social patterns, that is, a mediator who gives clients access to the resources of a more powerful patron (Moxnes 1991: 248).

(1:3–12) Thanksgiving and Encouragement v. 3, after the prescript, Paul often includes a thanksgiving for the good qualities of his addressees (Rom 1:8–10; 1 Cor 1:4–8; Phil 1:3–6; but not in Galatians, where Paul is too annoyed with his audience to engage in the usual courtesies!). Yet here he says 'we must always give thanks to God', rather than 'we thank God', which seems to some critics a rather more formal expression, even though he does go on to mention that their faith is growing and their love for one another increasing. The first person plural may reflect the fact that three persons are named as senders of the letter, or represent an example of the 'epistolary plural', where a single writer talks of himself or herself in the plural.

v. 4, virtually all translations (including the NRSV) have 'Paul' saying something like 'we ourselves boast' among the communities (NRSV 'churches') of God concerning your steadfastness and faith in all persecutions (diōgmoi) and afflictions (thlipseis). But 'boast', which carries a negative connotation to modern ears, is a mistranslation. In a group-oriented culture dominated by honour as the pre-eminent virtue and always needing to be acknowledged by others, 'Paul' is saying that 'we ourselves base our claim to honour' on the qualities mentioned. He can say this in relation to the relevant public (here 'the communities of God') either because he is intrinsically linked to the Thessalonians' endurance and faith as their progenitor, or because he is closely connected with the Thessalonian Christ-followers who now exhibit these qualities, or both. Also see 1 Thess 2:19; 2 Cor 9:2–3. The presence of persecutions and oppressions among whatever group of Christ-followers for which 2 Thessalonians was originally destined provides either the motivation for, or reinforcement of, narratives of future deliverance of the sort prominent in the text.

v. 5 begins 'This is evidence' (endeigma). But to what stated previously does endeigma refer? Possibly to their faith and steadfastness while they suffer persecution and tribulation (Best 1972: 254–5), but it is more probable, given the tight interconnection of v. 4, that it refers to the fact that Paul lays his claim to honour on these characteristics: 'our claiming honour from your endurance and faith before the other communities (who did not demur) is a sure sign that God will also count you worthy'. The judgement Paul has in mind is the judgement of God at the end-time (usually, although not very helpfully, referred to as 'eschatological') commonly described in Israelite literature (1 Enoch 1:1–9; 2 Esd 7:33–44; Apoc. Abr. 29:14–29; D. F. Russell 1964: 379–85). Without doubting their actual existence for the original audience of 2 Thessalonians, the troubles referred to in the text are capable of interpretation as the 'woes' before the end attested in other Israelite and Christian literature (Dan 12:1; 2 Apoc. Bar. 25.2–4; Mk 13:19, 24; Rev 7:14). Thus we see a merger of experience and religious tradition located in biblical and non-biblical Israelite literature typical of this text and other early Christian literature. It is likely, however, that Menken (1994: 85–7) is mistaken in seeing the current sufferings of the Thessalonians (which will absolve them from future judgement) as caused by their own sinfulness, since this conflicts with the good things said about them earlier in the text.

vv. 6–7a, the sentiment here represents a rather bald example of the law of revenge (lex talionis). Although modern European or North American readers might find this puzzling, in ancient Mediterranean culture serious insults, which desecrated one's honour, had to be avenged. Thus God will bring vengeance on those who have dishonoured his people (see Deut 32:35–6) and therefore slighted him as well. This is a fairly common biblical theme. In particular Isa 66:6 refers to 'the voice of the LORD dealing retribution to his enemies' and Aus (1976) has suggested that this section of Isaiah may have influenced this verse and what follows. 'Rest' (anesis) refers to the absence of tension and trial. The persecution and oppression mentioned in vv. 6–7 may be likened to the disturbance of traditional lifestyles suffered by North American Indians or Melanesians at the hands of European conquerors or colonists. In North America and Melanesia (in the South Pacific) millennial myths developed which described a coming convulsion in the cosmos when the white people would be swept away, so that the traditional lifestyles would be restored, the ancestors return, the game revisit the plains, or cargo be dropped on the people from the sky (see Esler 1994: 101–4, and literature cited there). The punishment for the oppressors and vindication of the oppressed in 2 Thessalonians reflects a somewhat similar social experience. v. 7b, the author now specifies when (or by what means) the events just mentioned will occur, literally: 'at the revelation (apocalypsis) of Lord Jesus Christ from heaven with the angels of his power'. First-century Christ-followers thought Jesus had gone to heaven after his resurrection and that he would return from there (1 Thess 1:10; 4:16; 1 Cor 1:7; 1 Pet 1:7, 13). Such beliefs were fortified (if not stimulated) by Israelite traditions describing future vindicators of Israel, such as 1 Enoch 48:4–6 and Dan 7:13. Normally Paul uses parousia of the future coming of Jesus, the sole use of apocalypsis in this regard being at 1 Cor 1:7. The angels represent the heavenly host or court who accompany God when he comes in judgement (Zech 14:5; 1 Enoch 1.9), although the early Christ-movement attached them to Jesus (Mk 8:38; 13:27).

v. 8, in flaming fire, Jesus will mete out vengeance (ekdikēsis) on those who do not know God and those who do not obey his gospel. The notion of fire as a feature of the vengeance God would inflict on his enemies originates in the OT (Isa 66:15–16) and here the theme is linked to the activities of Jesus.

There seems no basis for seeking to distinguish those mentioned into two groups comprising Gentiles and Israelites. v. 9, we now learn what the vengeance will consist of: 'the punishment of eternal destruction, separated from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his might'. The punishment does not consist of total annihilation, but of exclusion from God and, importantly in an honour-driven society, from his exalted and powerful honour. This vision is very different from the tortured future in store for the wicked in later Christian texts. v. 10 further specifies the occasion for these events: 'when he comes to be glorified [i.e. greatly honoured] by his saints' etc., while also evoking the fate of the blessed as contrasted with that of those who will be punished. Honour is shared among groups and here his followers revel in the great things he has done. The notion of 'the day (of judgement)' is a common feature of Israelite end-time speculation (see Joel 2:1–2; Zech 9:16; Mal 3:1–2).

vv. 11–12, 'Paul' informs the Thessalonians that he regularly prays for them, by asking God to make them worthy of his calling and powerfully fulfil every good resolution and work of faith. The object of all this is specified in v. 12: 'so that the name of our Lord Jesus may be glorified [i.e. greatly honoured] in you, and you in him, according to the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ'. Although this situation has been described as 'mutual glorification' (Menken 1994: 94), it is possible to improve on such a designation. For here we have the typical Mediterranean phenomenon of sharing honour among the members of a group. If we understand God as father or patron, Jesus as broker, and the believers as clients, we have a fictive kinship arrangement in which Jesus honours (and is honoured in) them and they honour (and are honoured in) him.

The final statement, 'according to the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ', indicates a very close relationship between the two, if not necessarily equating Jesus with God (Best 1972: 272–3).

(2:1–12) The End and the Man of Lawlessness v. 1, 'Paul' now moves on to what is called in epistolary nomenclature the 'body' of the letter, or in the language of rhetoric the partitio (covering vv. 1–2), with the probatio beginning at v. 3. Paul begs them in connection with 'the coming (parousia) of our Lord Jesus Christ and our being gathered together (episyngagōgē) to him'. In Hellenistic Greek the word parousia referred to the arrival of a high official at a city or town, to the accompaniment of elaborate greetings and celebrations. But the word came to be applied to the imminent arrival of Jesus from heaven (1 Thess 2:19; 3:13; 4:15; 5:23; 1 Cor 15:23; Mt 24:27, 37, 39; Jas 5:7, 8). The notion of God gathering in his people is found in the OT, either from exile (Isa 27:13; 43:4–7; Jer 31:8) or for final salvation (2 Macc 2:7; Sir 36:10). In Psalms of Solomon 17:26 it is said that the Messiah will gather in the people. Modern parallels exist in the form of the individuals who focus and lead a millennial movement (Esler 1994: 99).

v. 2, the content of Paul's entreaty is that his addressees should not be quickly shaken in mind or alarmed, either by a prophetic utterance ('a spirit') or a word or letter 'as though from us', saying that 'the day of the Lord is already here'. This is one of the most important verses in the letter. 'A letter as though from us' can mean either a forgery or a letter which he did write that is now being misinterpreted. If Paul had actually written 2 Thessalonians, he would have signally failed to address either alternative. For he neither denounces the letter as a forgery nor seeks directly to correct the misinterpretation. The statement is easier to interpret on the hypothesis of pseudonymity. Paul's letters were difficult and liable to be misunderstood (see 2 Pet 3:15–16). This could have been the fate of 1 Thess 4:13–5:11. There were several statements in this passage that could have been used to support an argument that the day of the Lord had come. 2 Thess 2:2 makes good sense as an attempt by its author to counter a misinterpretation of 1 Thess 4:13–5:11.

Barclay (1993: 526), who considers 2 Thessalonians authentic, canvasses earlier suggestions as to whether the 'day of the Lord is here' means: (1) a literal event—altering the structure of the universe, which is unlikely since no such event had occurred in the experience of the audience of 2 Thessalonians; (2) an internal and personal reality, entry into a new world, which remains a popular view, especially if linked to some kind of spiritualized or Gnostic understanding of the parousia; or (3) something which has not yet occurred but is imminent, an option that is now generally regarded as grammatically impossible. Barclay himself proposes a fourth alternative. It is possible to draw from 1 Thessalonians a distinction that Paul did not himself make between parousia (4:13–18) and the day of the Lord (5:1–11), the latter being associated with the sudden destruction of unbelievers. Perhaps the Thessalonians interpreted certain calamitous events in the early 50s of the first century as the sudden destruction of unbelievers, thus triggering a belief that 'the day of the Lord' had arrived. If one regards the letter as inauthentic and takes what is probably the more likely view that the parousia and the day of the Lord would have been understood by the recipients of 2 Thessalonians as referring to the same event, what meaning might one attach to 'the day of the Lord is here'? One possibility is that people had appeared claiming to be Christ and that such claims were troubling the target audience of this letter (so Menken 1994: 100–1). Mk 13:6 (to be dated sometime shortly before or after 70 CE) provides a basis for this suggestion.

vv. 3–4, Paul expresses concern that someone might deceive them. Deception prior to the end is also mentioned in the Markan apocalypse (13:5) and here seems to relate to the date of the parousia. The second clause in v. 3 opens with the words 'because unless', which begin the protasis of an anacoluthon, a sentence containing two conditions, which continues until the end of v. 4 without being rounded off with an apodosis, a statement of what will happen, presumably requiring something like 'the parousia of the Lord will not occur'. The first condition required is the apostasy or rebellion (apostasias). The lack of specification as to who will apostasize and in what way suggests that the author could count on the original recipients of 2 Thessalonians knowing what was meant. For modern readers, however, both aspects are difficult. At a general level the word refers to the dramatic breakdown of the legal, moral, social, and even natural order which is predicted in certain Israelite and NT texts of the period before the end (Jub. 23:14–21; 2 Esd 5:1–13; 2 Tim 3:1–9; Jude 17–19). Yet uncertainty surrounds the issue of whom the apostasy will involve:

Israelites, Christ-followers, Gentiles, or representatives from all three possible groups.

The second condition needing to be fulfilled is the revealing of 'the lawless one' (lit. the person of lawlessness: ho anthrōpos tēs anomias), immediately described as 'the one destined for destruction' (lit. the son of destruction). Expressions similar to these occur in the OT (Ps 89:23; Isa 57:4) and in the Qumran literature (1QS 9:16, 22; CD 6:15; 13:14). In Jn 17:12 Judas is called 'a son of destruction'. It is then stated that he (the lawless one) 'opposes and exalts himself above every so-called god or object of worship, so that he takes his seat in the temple of God, declaring himself to be God'. While this figure plainly encapsulates the lawlessness (or the 'sin', if—as seems unlikely—the variant reading here is correct) which will characterize the apostasy preceding the End, it has not proved easy to identify him with any known character in Jewish or Christian literature. It is even unclear whether he is a human or supernatural figure, although we should be careful to avoid the modern tendency sharply to distinguish these realms. Elsewhere we find false messiahs and prophets predicted for the time before the End (Mk 13:21–2) and presumably the person of lawlessness is somewhat similar. We must presume that in the millennial mythopoiesis (that is to say, the creation of myth, see Esler 1993: 186–7) which had already occurred in the community for which this letter was written the person of lawlessness had been allocated a central role. The details in v. 4 show how this mythopoiesis was able to draw upon existing aspects in Israelite tradition in describing how the lawless person would behave. He will be like Antiochus IV Epiphanes who tried to extirpate Israelite religion and identity (in the period 167–164 BCE), as described in 1 Macc 1:16–64 and Dan 11:36–7, Pompey (who entered the temple in Jerusalem; see Pss Sol. 17:11–15) and Caligula who wanted to install statues of himself in the temple (Jos. J.W. 2.184–5).

v. 5, 'Paul' asks if they do not remember that he used to tell them (i.e. on more than one occasion) of these things when he was still with them. This statement, loosely based on 1 Thess 3:4, serves to provide an air of reality to the pseudonymous fiction. There is no mention in 1 Thessalonians of either the apostasy or the person of lawlessness. vv. 6–7, the author affirms that 'you know what is now restraining (katechon) him, so that he may be revealed when his time comes. For the mystery of lawlessness (anomia) is already at work, but only until the one who now restrains (katechōn) it is removed.' These are extremely difficult verses (see Lietaert Peerbolte 1997; Powell 1997). The chief problems have to do with the movement from a restraining power or thing to a restraining person, with the person of lawlessness as the implied subject of restraint, and with the identity of the restrainer and the restraint. But even to translate the Greek using 'that or who restrains' means opting for one among several possibilities (others being 'possess' or 'hold sway'). Possibly (see below), the original readers of this letter knew what or who was meant, although the expression does not occur elsewhere in Jewish or Christian writings dealing with the End. This phenomenon may have been an element of the mythopoiesis concerning the End with which they were familiar. The answer may simply be beyond us (Best 1972: 301). Yet one option worth mentioning, suggested by Strobel (1961: 98–116) and based on the possible influence of Hab 2:3 as interpreted in Jewish and Christian tradition, is that the restraining power is God's plan of salvation and the restraining person is God himself. Less likely is the idea that the power is the Roman empire and the person is the emperor himself, especially in view of the author's lack of interest in the political realm. Lietaert Peerbolte (1997), finally, makes the interesting suggestion that these words are deliberately obscure, allowing 'Paul'—who has no answer for the delay of the parousia—to create the illusion among the readers of 2 Thessalonians that there is an answer of which the original Thessalonians were aware.

v. 8, 'then the lawless one (ho anomos) will be revealed, whom the Lord (Jesus) will destroy with the breath of his mouth, annihilating him by the manifestation of his coming.' Whatever or whoever restrains the lawless person (an equivalent of 'the person of lawlessness' at v. 3), there is no doubt that it is Jesus who will kill him once he is revealed. The author's determination to make this point leads him to it before he has actually described the lawless one's revelation (in vv. 9–10). The manner of the killing, by 'the breath of his mouth', derives from Isa 11:4 ('by the breath of his lips he will kill the impious'; LXX). vv. 9–10, in a second relative clause the author describes the coming of the lawless one as taking place through Satan's activity with 'all power, signs, lying wonders, and every kind of wicked deception for those who are perishing'. The picture of signs and wonders which will be worked by agents of evil before the End is reminiscent of Mk 13:22; Rev 13:14; 19:20. vv. 11–12, 'For this reason', presumably their failing to accept the love of the truth, God sends on them a power of delusion to make them believe in falsehood, 'so that all who have not believed the truth but took pleasure in unrighteousness (adikia) will be condemned'. Menken (1994: 117) points out that divine causality appears here to match the human causality of the preceding verse. There is an OT context for God inspiring false prophets in 1 Kings 22:23 and Ezek 14:9, while an idea somewhat similar to what is said here occurs at Rom 1:18–32.

(2:13–17) Encouragement to Persevere vv. 13–14, quite suddenly 'Paul' changes tack, by launching into a second thanksgiving (following the precedent in 1 Thess 2:13). The reason for the thanks is that God has established the notional Thessalonian addressees (who stand for the original audience of this letter) as a differentiated and privileged group in the world, with a particular history and a glorious destiny (which links the thanks to the previous material about the End). They are 'brothers [NRSV has "brothers and sisters"] beloved by the Lord', whom God (as in OT traditions of divine election) chose 'from the beginning [though the uncertain Gk. could also mean "as the first fruits"; NRSV] for salvation through sanctification (hagiasmos) by the Spirit and through belief in the truth'. God called them to this through 'Paul's' gospel, to obtain the exalted honour (doxa) of Jesus Christ. Such descriptions serve the fundamental purpose of delineating their identity, that is, providing answers to the always vital question 'Who are we?' The word 'sanctification' in particular serves to distinguish them and their present experience from the welter of idolatry and immorality implied as characteristic of the world outside the group. On the other hand, 'salvation' expresses the future goal of their existence; it is very common for people to tell themselves who they are in terms of their sense of where they are going (Esler 1998: 42, 175). In this heavily group-oriented culture, it is natural that the members of the group will share in the honour of their most honourable and honoured leader.

v. 15, the author encourages them to stick resolutely to the traditions (paradosis) which they have received by word of mouth (dia logou) or in a letter. It is likely that the original recipients of 2 Thessalonians would have interpreted the letter mentioned here as 1 Thessalonians. The oral proclamation referred to was presumably teaching they had already received with which 'Paul' concurred. We must imagine a situation, therefore, in which the author is saying in effect, 'Just as the Thessalonians were told by Paul to rely on his earlier letter and the teaching given them in the community, so too must you'. vv. 16–17, moving easily from thanks to intercession, 'Paul' now offers a prayer that Jesus Christ and the God 'who loved us and through grace gave us eternal comfort (paraklēsis) and good hope' might comfort (parakalein) and strengthen their hearts 'in every good work and word'. The prominence of Jesus in this prayer indicates the fairly high Christology characteristic of the letter. 'Good hope' seems to derive from mystery cults as a way of referring to life after death (Best 1972: 321); mystery cults, such as those of Eleusis, offered their adherents a relation of intense communion, often ecstatic in nature, with a god.

(3:1–5) Mutual Prayer Many critics arguing for a rhetorical structure to the letter regard v. 1 as beginning its exhortatio. Epistolary theorists tend to see here the beginning of a series of moral admonitions (Jewett 1986: 224–5). vv. 1–2, in a way somewhat similar to that of 1 Thess 5:25, 'Paul' asks the adelphoi, literally 'brothers' but presumably also meant to include female members of the congregation (so perhaps 'brethren'), to 'pray for us, so that the word of the Lord may spread rapidly and be glorified [i.e. "greatly honoured"] everywhere, just as it is among you, and that we may be rescued from wicked and evil people; for not all have faith'. If 2 Thessalonians is pseudonymous, such a sentiment conveys an aura of verisimilitude, but also serves to legitimate—that is, to explain and justify the existence and identity of—whatever community this letter was originally intended for. They would be reassured of the value of their faith and of the fact that their sharp differentiation from sinful and uncomprehending outsiders was just what Paul had indicated would be the lot of the Thessalonians. Yet a similar conclusion could be drawn if the letter is authentic, only now it would be the Thessalonians themselves for whom the point was being made. The hostile reception that Paul and his co-workers had received figures both in the clearly genuine correspondence (such as Rom 15:30–1; 2 Cor 1:8–11; and 1 Thess 2: 2) and also in the deutero-Pauline writings, such as in 2 Tim 3:10–11; 4:16–18).

v. 3, the author asserts the faithfulness of the Lord, who will strengthen and guard them from the evil one, and this quality stands in stark contrast to the lack of faith (and the evil associated with it) mentioned in the previous verse. It is noteworthy that although this statement is probably based on 1 Thess 5:24, here the faithful one is the Lord (that is, Jesus Christ) and not God, which indicates the move to a higher Christology in 2 Thessalonians. v. 4, now 'Paul' expresses his confidence in the Lord that they are following and will continue to follow his commands. In a pseudonymous letter this is a way of encouraging the target audience to adhere to the message associated with Paul. Specifics of the instruction will be provided in 3:6–12. v. 5, 'Paul' prays that the Lord may 'direct your hearts to the love of God and to the steadfastness of Christ'. This prayer takes the audience to the source of their ability to carry out the instructions. It is probable that the author appeals to Christ's steadfastness to provide them with a role model during the current difficulties they are experiencing.

(3:6–15) Warning against Loafers v. 6, 'Paul' commands the 'Thessalonians' to avoid every member of the congregation who is living 'in a disorderly way' (ataktōs) and not in accordance with the tradition (paradosis) they received from him. The word ataktōs appears again at v. 11, where the author describes how certain of his addressees are behaving, and 'Paul' himself denies he behaved in such a way at v. 7. It is reasonably clear from the associations of the word in vv. 6–15 that by 'disorderly' the author means 'not in accordance with the discipline of working and supporting oneself', thus behaving like a loafer (hence 'living in idleness' in the NRSV). Scholars have long explained this idleness as rooted in 'eschatological' excitement produced by a belief in the imminence of the parousia of Christ (see R. Russell 1988: 105–7). Several examples of millennialism in modern times, moreover, have revealed that a belief in the imminent or actual transformation of the world can produce, not surprisingly, a breakdown in belief in the need for everyday activities, such as work. Rejection of work and the usual social order can be associated with exaggerated behaviour and often a belief in a return to a Golden Age which preceded the current period and its tribulations (Jewett 1986: 173–5; Esler 1994: 101). In the unknown community for whom 2 Thessalonians was written it is likely that such attitudes had made an appearance and needed to be attacked. If Menken (1994: 130–3) is correct in assuming that underlying the order which 'Paul' would like to be restored is the rule of work that originated in the sin of Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden in Gen 3:17–19, it is possible that those refusing to work were appealing to the alleged re-establishment of prelapsarian bliss to support their position.

R. Russell (1988) proposes a different view (which has been challenged recently by Romaniuk 1993), that this idleness has nothing to do with end-time excitement, but is a result of the urban poor finding support within the social networks of Christ-fearers and then giving up work. A similar view has more recently been presented by Jewett (1993), who proposes that the early Christ-movement was likely to have been located in the tenement houses of the non-élite, where the system of internal support would have been jeopardized by the refusal of some members to contribute.

vv. 7–8, 'Paul' offers himself as a model for them, inasmuch as he did not exhibit the disorder of idleness when he was amongst them, but worked day and night so as not to be a burden on them by eating at their expense. Imitation of Paul is a reasonably common theme in the genuine Pauline epistles (1 Cor 4:16, 11:1; Phil 3:17; 1 Thess 1:6). v. 8b is closely based on 1 Thess 2:9, and there are similar statements at 1 Cor 9:12; 15:18; 2 Cor 11:7–8; 12:13. In these passages, however, Paul is seeking to allay any suspicion that he preached the gospel for personal profit, while in 2 Thessalonians the point is made to encourage the target audience to imitate him in this respect. v. 9, the author notes he had a right to be supported by the congregation, even though he did not exercise it, in order to offer them a model for imitation, a theme introduced in v. 7. v. 10, by mentioning that he had previously told them in their presence that anyone unwilling to work should not be fed, 'Paul' makes explicit the precise nature of the disorder which has been implied hitherto—the fact that some members of the congregation are living off the others. There are parallels to this saying (which has been frequently cited out of its context ever since), in Prov 10:4; 12:11; 19:15; and Pseudo-Phocylides, Sentences, 153–4.

v. 11, here again is a reference to disorder, now with an unequivocal core meaning brought to the surface in v. 10, together with the disturbing news—expressed in a pun—that some of them are not busy at work (ergazomenous) but busybodies (periergazomenous). Presumably the author has in mind here some exaggerated type of behaviour of the sort common among millennial movements, but its precise nature remains unclear. Not only are they not working, but they are interfering with the work of others. v. 12, 'Paul' follows up the statement in v. 11 with a direct exhortation to the troublemakers here: 'to do their work quietly and to earn their own living' (lit. eat their own bread). The reference to quietness here suggests that their current state is one of loud activity or excitement, no doubt associated with the millennial belief that 'the day of the Lord is already here' (2:2).

(3:13–18) Conclusion vv. 13–16, there is a great diversity of views among those advocating epistolary or rhetorical analyses of the letter as to where the divisions fall in these verses (Jewett 1986: 224–5). The first four verses (13–16) can either be connected with the previous section, which would mean 'Paul' wanted the 'Thessalonians' to do good to the disorderly and idle troublemakers, or, more likely, constitute a separate section at the end of the letter—beginning with a general exhortation to them to do good (v. 13). Those who do not are to be ostracized (although, as we see in the next verse, only to a limited extent) so that they may be put to shame (v. 14). Here we see the typical association in Mediterranean culture between honour and group-belonging. Nevertheless, such a person is not to be treated as an enemy, but admonished as a brother (v. 15). The person is socially separated as a form of discipline and for a limited time (subject no doubt to a change of behaviour on the malefactor's part). Exclusion from the community for various reasons and for a limited time was also practised at Qumran (see e.g. the CD 8:16–18). v. 16, 'Paul' prays that the Lord will give them peace at all times and remain with them; in 1 Cor 14:33 Paul notes that God is a God of peace not disorder.

v. 17, it was a practice in ancient letter-writing for an author to use a scribe and add a few words at the end in his own handwriting. Paul adopts this practice elsewhere in 1 Cor 16:21; Gal 6:11; Col 4:18 (leaving aside the issue of whether Colossians is authentic or not). This device would only be effective as a proof of authenticity in relation to the original of the letter, since the difference in the two hands apparent there would disappear in subsequent copies. Although the author of 2 Thessalonians seems to claim—wrongly—that this was Paul's universal practice, Jewett's (1986: 6) conclusion that this itself indicates authenticity since otherwise the author would be casting doubt on other Pauline letters not bearing the addition is unwarranted if the letter were written before the collection of Paul's letters towards the end of the first century. On the other hand, 1 Thessalonians does not bear Paul's self-attestation and this strengthens Jewett's point if 2 Thessalonians was originally directed to Christ-followers who possessed 1 Thessalonians. The self-conscious (and unique) way in which the author draws attention to the practice in 3:17 by saying that 'This is the mark' (sêmeion, sign) is itself suspicious. v. 18, the letter ends with a standard benediction.

REFERENCES

- Aus, R. D. (1976), 'The Relevance of Isaiah 66.7 to Revelation 12 and 2 Thessalonians 1', ZNW 67: 252–68.
- Bailey, J. A. (1978–9), 'Who Wrote II Thessalonians?', NTS 25: 131–45.
- Barclay, M. G. (1993), 'Conflict in Thessalonika', CBQ 53: 512–30.
- Best, E. (1972), A Commentary on the First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians, Black's New Testament Commentaries (London: Adam & Charles Black).
- Duling, D. C. (1996), 'Millennialism', in R. L. Rohrbaugh (ed.), The Social Sciences and New Testament Interpretation (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson), 183–205.
- Esler, P. F. (1993), 'Political Oppression in Jewish Apocalyptic Literature: A Social-Scientific Approach', in Listening: Journal of Religion and Culture, 28: 181–99.
- (1994), The First Christians in their Social Worlds: Social-Scientific Approaches to New Testament Interpretation (London: Routledge).
- (1998), Galatians (London: Routledge).
- Jewett, R. (1986), The Thessalonian Correspondence: Pauline Rhetoric and Millenarian Piety (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- (1993), 'Tenement Churches and Communal Meals in the Early Church: The Implications of a Form-Critical Analysis of 2 Thessalonians 3:10', Biblical Research, 38: 23–42.
- Liettaert Peerbolte, L. J. (1997), 'The Katechon, Katechōn of 2 Thess. 2:6–7', NovT 39: 138–50.
- Malina, B. J. (1993), The New Testament World: Insights from Cultural Anthropology, rev. edn. Orig. 1981 (Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox).
- Marxsen, W. (1968), Introduction to the New Testament (Oxford: Blackwell).
- (1982), Der zweite Thessalonicherbrief (Zurich: Theologischer Verlag).
- Masson, C. (1957), Les Deux Épîtres de Saint Paul aux Thessaloniens (Neuchâtel: Delachaux and Niestlé).
- Meade, D. G. (1986), Pseudonymity and Canon: An Investigation into the Relationship of Authorship and Authority in Jewish and Early Christian Tradition, WUNT 39 (Tübingen: Mohr).
- Menken, M. J. J. (1994), 2 Thessalonians (London: Routledge).
- Moxnes, H. (1991), 'Patron–Client Relations and the New Community in Luke–Acts', in J. H. Neyrey (ed.) (1991), The Social World of Luke–Acts: Models for Interpretation (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson), 241–68.
- Powell, C. E. (1997), 'The Identity of the "Restrainer" in 2 Thessalonians 2:6–7', BSac 154: 320–32.
- Romaniuk, K. (1993), 'Les Thessaloniens étaient-ils des paresseux?', ETL 69: 142–5.
- Russell, D. F. (1964), The Meaning and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic (London: SCM).
- Russell, R. (1988), 'The Idle in 2 Thess. 3.6–12: An Eschatological or a Social Problem?', NTS 34: 105–19.

Seesemann, H. (1967), 'Pateō and compounds in NT', TDNTv. 943–5.
 Strobel, A. (1961), Untersuchungen zum eschatologischen Verzögerungsproblem: Auf Grund der Spätjüdisch-urchristlichen Geschichte von Habakuk 2, 2 ff. (Leiden: Brill).

Trudinger, P. (1995), 'The Priority of 2 Thessalonians Revisited: Some Fresh Evidence', Downside Review, 113: 31–5.

Wrede, W. (1903), Die Echtheit des zweiten Thessalonikerbriefs untersucht, TU NS 9/2 (Leipzig: Hinrichs).

73. The Pastoral Epistles

CLARE DRURY

INTRODUCTION

These three letters purporting to be from Paul to two of his close companions clearly belong together as a set. They have always been placed together in the New Testament, their concerns and language are shared. Certain key words and ideas permeate the three, connecting them and holding together what at first sight might seem a rather amorphous collection of ethical injunctions and doctrinal assertions. 1 Timothy and Titus are very similar in character and subject-matter, their teaching concentrating on church order and ethical exhortation. Sandwiched between them, 2 Timothy is more personal than the other two; Paul is in prison, while in the other two he is free. His character and behaviour in adversity are presented as models to Timothy which arouse the reader's sympathy and admiration.

A. Authorship. 1. The claim that Paul himself wrote the letters seems at first sight obvious and incontrovertible. All three begin with a greeting from the apostle and contain personal notes and asides such as 'I urge you, as I did when I was on my way to Macedonia' (1 Tim 1:3); 'I left you behind in Crete' (Titus 1:5) and 'When you come, bring the cloak that I left with Carpus at Troas, also the books and above all the parchments' (2 Tim 4:13). Combined with such emotional appeals as 2 Tim 1:3–5; 4:6–8, the impression of Pauline authorship seems clear.

2. But things are not so straightforward: signs of the late date of the letters proliferate. The organization of the church under officers such as bishops and deacons is well advanced (e.g. 1 Tim 3:1–13; 5:3–13) and mirrors the situation found in late first-century and early second-century Christian writings such as 1 Clement and the letters of Ignatius and Polycarp. The situation of the letters seems inauthentic too; they are addressed to two travelling companions whom 'Paul' has apparently just left (1 Tim 1:3; Titus 1:5) and expects to see again soon (1 Tim 3:14; 2 Tim 4:13; Titus 3:12). Yet they contain teaching of the most rudimentary kind which close associates might be expected to know.

3. The teaching that characterizes the Pastorals lacks the fire and passion of the original Pauline epistles; the immediacy of eschatological expectation that lay behind much of Paul's teaching (e.g. 1 Cor 7:17–31) has gone. Judgement and the future appearance of Christ are still expected, but it is the ordered life of the community that is focal. There is no mention of key Pauline ideas such as the cross, the church as the body of Christ, or covenant. Paul's struggle to identify the role of the law in his new understanding of salvation is absent; in the Pastorals, the law fulfils its normal function of identifying, restricting, and punishing evildoers (1 Tim 1:8–11). The teaching of the Pastorals focuses upon the ordered life of the community emphasizing such virtues as piety or godliness

(e.g. 1 Tim 2:2; 2 Tim 3:5; Titus 1:1) and good conscience (1 Tim 1:5, 19; 3:9; 2 Tim 1:3). Individual behaviour is bound up in the well-being of the whole group, and there is a clear sense that the church has a future as a community; its organization is designed to enable sound doctrine to continue (1 Tim 4:6; 2 Tim 3:10). The ethical teaching is not solely inward-looking, but also aims to ensure that the church is acceptable to the outside world. The behaviour of its members must not draw attention to them as part of a new and suspect cult, they must conform in every way to the moral standards and expectations of the larger community.

4. By the end of the first century the figure of Paul had assumed authority for many in the church and, as his significance grew, so did narratives about his life and interpretations of his teaching. The Acts of the Apostles provides evidence of this sort of development; the figure of Paul is employed to present the author's own image of the Gentile church and its origins. In Paul's speeches in Acts there is nothing that directly contradicts the ideas we find in Paul's own letters, but the picture that emerges is one of a more conciliatory and less theologically sophisticated figure. Both Acts and the Pastoral Epistles witness to a time in the church's development when Paul had become a legendary figure and different groups were competing to be regarded as his true successors. This trend continued well into the second century: the apocryphal Acts of Paul provide evidence of speculation and legends which grew up around the figure of Paul. The longest and most complete of them, the Acts of Paul and Thecla, provides a model of the woman's role as teacher and baptizer that the Pastoral Epistles deplore (1 Tim 2:11–15). According to Marcion, the second-century heretic, Paul alone had presented the true Christian message of love and grace.

5. Thus the origin of the Pastoral Epistles begins to become clear: the author emphasizes the importance of handing on true teaching through leaders such as Timothy and Titus, authorized by Paul so that false doctrine could be refuted and its promulgators condemned, 'Timothy, guard what has been entrusted to you. Avoid the profane chatter and contradictions of what is falsely called knowledge' (1 Tim 6:20; cf. 2 Tim 2:1–2, 14–19; Titus 1:1–5; 3:8–11). While a small and declining number of scholars still argue for Pauline authorship, most prefer to see the author's modesty and his admiration for Paul behind his pseudonymity; he was passing on Pauline tradition and the credit was due to Paul rather than to him. The letters can be seen as documents written in and for a community which wanted to hold fast to what they considered true Pauline teaching in the face of persecution or opposition from different kinds of Christian teachers. On the other hand, some of Paul's teaching on practical matters—teaching about the remarriage of widows for example, and about the ideal ascetic life—is contradicted in the Pastorals (e.g. 1 Cor 7:7–8; cf. 1 Tim 2:11–15; 3:2–5). The situation the author was addressing was so different he felt he had the authority to alter Paul's original teaching.

6. This implies that the personal notes and reminiscences, which occur throughout the letters (1 Tim 1:3; 2 Tim 4:13; Titus 1:5), are conscious forgeries included to add authenticity. So some scholars (e.g. Miller 1997) have suggested that the Pastorals are a semi-pseudonymous work, containing fragments of genuine Pauline material with later teaching added to these 'notes' to form the epistles as we have them. But a growing number of scholars see the Pastorals as entirely pseudonymous. They argue for complete and intentional pseudonymity; the writer used the device of the letter form, and included the kind of personal details that would convince his readers of the letters' authenticity. If the device was successful the author's opponents would be unassailably refuted. The personal notes are trivial in nature and do not fit with details of Paul's life we know from his undoubted letters, or from the story as presented in Acts. But they were an important part of the fiction and for the author's purpose to work, the fiction must be convincing.

B. Character and Situation of the Pastorals. 1. The concerns expressed in the Pastoral Epistles focus on sound doctrine and good behaviour. The two are closely linked in the author's mind and are contrasted with the ideas and behaviour of his opponents. A group within the author's church is trying to convert members of the community to its own way of thinking and living (e.g. 1 Tim 1:3–7, 18–20; 4:1–10; 6:3–4; 2 Tim 2:24–6; 3:13–17; 4:3–5; Titus 1:10–2:2). This group of people, heterodox from our author's point of view, was having such success in persuading others of its ideas, that the Pastoral Epistles were written to contradict their theories and denounce their behaviour. They are characterized as disputatious and given to theological speculation and argument—teaching which leads to disharmony in the community (e.g. 1 Tim 6:3–10). The methods the author employs to contradict false teaching and to encourage attachment to his point of view are a combination of exhortations to virtue and condemnations of the teachings of his opponents with warnings of the dire results of following them. Because we have no independent record, we cannot be certain who the opponents were or exactly what they were teaching; we have to reconstruct what we can from the epistles themselves.

2. The author counters his opponents with his appeal to tradition. Paul, well known and revered as the apostle to the Gentiles, hands on the tradition to two junior companions, Timothy and Titus, who, in turn, are instructed to transmit it to the communities in their care. Within these communities, officers of blameless character will be charged with preserving and handing on this sound doctrine and ethical instructions to the rest. In this way there could be no doubt of the authenticity of the teaching the author presents; it has been transmitted by a direct and faultless route. The character of the officers of the community is a major theme in 1 Timothy and Titus. They were key people in maintaining true doctrine and in keeping order and discipline within the community.

3. Alternating with instructions about church organization and ethical teaching are brief kerygmatic statements about God's plan of salvation (1 Tim 2:5–6; 3:16; 6:13–16; 2 Tim 1:9–10; 2:11–13; Titus 3:4–7). These doctrinal sections present familiar ideas about salvation history, none of them inconsistent with Pauline and other New Testament teaching. Indeed Pauline language is sometimes employed; but the ideas are not developed theologically. Their form is often rhythmical; they may have liturgical origins.

4. The organization of the church and the relationship of its members to one another is based on the Graeco-Roman household. Household codes are found elsewhere in the NT epistles (Col 3:18–4:1; Eph 5:22–6:9; 1 Pet 2:18–3:7) but their use in the Pastorals is developing so that the church can be described as the household of God (1 Tim 3:15). The development is not complete—the terminology is used sometimes in its original sense and sometimes with the sense of church office (e.g. in 1 Tim 5:1, 17, the Greek word presbuteros is used both for 'older man' and for 'elder') but evolution can be seen to be taking place.

5. In the passages of ethical teaching the Pastoral Epistles share some of the ideas about how a virtuous life should be lived with contemporary pagan philosophers as well as with other Christian and Jewish writers. Comparisons with the works of Plutarch, who lived in the second half of the first century, and Epictetus, a Stoic philosopher of the first half of the second century, illuminate our understanding of the Pastorals' teaching about moderation or restraint (sōphrosunē) and piety or godliness (eusebeia). These terms describe the kind of civic and private virtues that were common subjects for discussion among Greek and Roman moralists at the time. In the Pastorals the meaning of eusebeia is both doctrinal and ethical; it is a word used to describe the kind of lifestyle the author advocates that arises out of a belief in the doctrinal claims he makes; good behaviour is inextricably linked with belief in sound doctrine. Pagan writers also help to put in perspective social issues such as the role of women. The place of women in society was as much an issue for pagan writers as it was for Christians (see Beard, North, and Price 1998: i. 297–9).

COMMENTARY

1 Timothy

(1:1–2) The form of the opening greeting is familiar to readers of NT epistles. It follows the conventions of letter-writing of the first few centuries CE, with the sender naming himself and greeting the recipient of the letter. Here, the writer names himself as Paul, apostle of Christ Jesus, as he does with minor variations in the other two letters. The recipient here is Timothy, well known from Pauline epistles and Acts as Paul's companion and fellow-worker (e.g. Rom 16:21; 1 Cor 4:17; 16:10; Col 1:1; 1 Thess 1:1; Acts 16:1). Several points stand out in this introduction: Paul's authority is stressed and is in no doubt; not only is he an apostle of Christ Jesus, he is commanded by God. The formality of the greeting, unexpected in a letter between friends and colleagues, has contributed to the belief that the letter is inauthentic. At the heart of the greeting two unusual epithets are employed, God is called

'our Saviour' and Christ, 'our hope'. Outside the Pastorals, only in Cor 1:27 is Christ identified as 'hope' and there it is 'Christ the hope of glory'; God our Saviour is found in the Pastorals a number of times, but elsewhere in the NT only in the Magnificat (Lk 1:47) and in the doxology of the epistle of Jude (Jude 25). The writer wants to make it clear that the message he brings is the true message of salvation, so he presents himself as the apostle Paul, commissioned by God the origin of salvation. Hope and salvation are closely connected; the work of salvation started at the incarnation will be continued through the church and completed at Christ's return.

v. 2, Timothy, the recipient of the letter, is called a 'loyal child in the faith' as is Titus in Titus 1:4. The word gnēsios, translated 'loyal', implies legitimacy in the Greek. In distinction to others who will be invoked, later (e.g. Hymenaeus and Alexander, 1:20), Timothy is Paul's legitimate successor. He is a child and therefore inferior to Paul, but the tradition passed from one to the other is true and authoritative. The threefold salutation is slightly different from those found in other Pauline letters. Grace and peace are familiar; here, mercy is added in the middle of the formula, where 'to you' is found elsewhere (e.g. Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:3; 2 Cor 1:2; Gal 1:3). Mercy is a particular concern in the Pastoral Epistles, where the word appears five times of the ten occurrences in the whole Pauline corpus. God the Father, or Creator, and Christ Jesus our Lord are invoked again at the end of the salutation as the origins of Christian 'virtues'.

(1:3–7) The situation envisaged at the opening of the letter is that Paul has left Timothy behind in Ephesus while he has travelled on into Macedonia. Such a situation cannot be fitted into any reconstruction of Paul's life that can be pieced together either from his own letters or from the narrative in Acts. They provide the kind of personal details that lead some readers to argue for authenticity, while others claim that it is exactly the kind of information a pseudonymous author would include to add verisimilitude to his pretence, bringing the characters to life by placing them in relationship to one another in a real setting.

Having established his credentials, the author introduces one of the main concerns of his letter; he wants to combat false teaching and to discredit the teachers. The teachers cannot be identified with any certainty, nor what they were teaching. 1:3–11 provides clues about the teaching; we are told that the opponents occupy themselves with 'myths and endless genealogies which lead to speculations' (v. 4). It may be that a Gnostic group was teaching in the author's community and perverting the faith as he understood it by mythological speculations about creation and salvation. Because his readers must have known who he was referring to, he does not need to identify his opponents specifically, but sets his view of Christian virtues such as love, a pure heart, and a good conscience against the vices of speculative theory and vain discussion.

(1:8–11) Here he adds a further dimension to the description of his opponents. They desire to be teachers of the law, presumably the Jewish law, without understanding what it is they are talking about; its true meaning is to regulate the behaviour of lawless and disobedient people. The vices listed in vv. 9–10 are an odd collection, including specific acts such as murder, matricide, and parricide alongside general characteristics such as sinfulness, unholiness, and profanity. At different levels such behaviour would incur disapproval in almost any society, not just under Jewish law. The list is obviously meant to be contrasted with the list of virtues in 1:5. The writer's central theme, that good doctrine leads to good behaviour, is contrasted with the effects of following unsound teaching. He does not explain this teaching very clearly; but simply by placing the lists alongside one another he points up the contrast.

The qualities belonging to the faith, such as love issuing from a pure heart and a good conscience, are not typical of the teaching in Paul's genuine letters. Paul would certainly not dissent from the ideas expressed, but he uses different language to describe them. The Pastor's view of the law is very different from Paul's own too. For Paul the law symbolized the old dispensation, and its relationship to salvation brought through Christ was extremely complex; it was God-given but restrictive and negative in its effects (e.g. Rom 7:4–25; Gal 3:1–14). The Pastor, on the other hand, sees it in a much more mundane way: it is a God-given guide to behaviour, which, when abused, works against sound teaching.

(1:12–17) 1:3–11 and 18–20 provide a framework for these verses. This biographical section, illustrating God's mercy to his apostle Paul, has the effect of giving Paul tremendous prominence. The section takes the form of a thanksgiving, and describes the radical volte-face of the sometime persecutor turned faithful disciple. The story is familiar not only from Acts (9:1–22; 22:3–21; 26:9–20), but also from 1 Cor 15:8–10 and Phil 3:1–5. The story of the complete conversion of the persecutor is a tale worth telling. But here more than anywhere else the fate of Paul is inextricably linked with the story of salvation. 'Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners—of whom I am the foremost.' Paul's sinfulness is vividly described: 'I formerly a blasphemer, a persecutor, and a man of violence', but he 'received mercy' because he acted out of ignorance. The sharp contrast between the persecutor and the believer is shown to be an intentional part of God's plan so that Paul might be an example for others, to demonstrate above all the perfect patience of Jesus Christ. So the tale serves a dual purpose; Paul is a typical example of a convert, but his special case gives him a special position as an apostle as the next few verses show. Paul himself talks of his former life in 1 Cor 15:9 and Phil 3:4–8, to make a similar point, but here the language is stronger and less forgiving. Acts is much closer to this passage when it speaks of the ignorance of unbelievers before their conversion (e.g. 3:17; 13:27; 17:23).

The central Christian belief (v. 15), that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, is introduced by a formula that assumes general acceptance. The formula is found five times in the Pastoral Epistles (1 Tim 1:15; 3:1; 4:9; 2 Tim 2:11; Titus 3:8), often, as here, drawing attention to a significant doctrinal statement. It is not clear why the author uses the phrase with some doctrinal assertions and not with others. Often, as in this case, it seems that a quotation is being employed. The significance of the expression, 'Christ came into the world to save sinners', lies in the second half of the statement: the writer is not so much interested in the pre-existence of Christ, which may be implied, as in the soteriological effect of his coming (cf. 3:16 and 2 Tim 1:10). It introduces the idea of Paul's sinfulness which in turn shows him as a prototype believer and recipient of grace. Patience or forbearance (makrothumia) is a defining characteristic of God in relationship with his people in the Jewish Scriptures. The words found in Ex 34:6–7 where God is described as 'merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness, keeping steadfast love for the thousandth generation' are repeated and echoed frequently in later Jewish writings to contrast the long-suffering constancy of God with the sinfulness and fickle nature of his people (Jon 4:2; 2 Macc 6:14–16; Wis 11:23; 12:16). Here the attributes have been transferred to Christ, through whom God is working out salvation. Eternal life is in the future, it is a focus for belief grounded in Christ 'our hope' (1:1) for the future and based on what has already been achieved.

(1:18–20) This section follows awkwardly from the doxology in v. 17 and it is far from clear what 'these instructions' refers to. It may look back to 1:3 where Timothy is urged to give certain instructions, or forward to the injunction to 'fight the good fight' later in the same verse. The word paraggelia, translated here as 'instruction', occurs with its cognates six times in 1 Timothy (cf. 1 Tim 1:3; 4:11; 5:7; 6:13, 17) demonstrating how important was the passing on of sound doctrine through properly commissioned people. The prophecies referred to in v. 18 are not to be understood as scriptural prophecies, but recall prophetic experiences such as that described in Acts 13:1–3 and referred to in 1 Tim 4:14.

The imagery of fighting or warfare was widespread among philosophers and religious groups in the ancient world and is found elsewhere in the NT epistles (1 Cor 9:7; 2 Cor 10:3–6; Eph 6:10–17; 2 Tim 2:3–7, where the image is linked with that of athletic competition). The repetition of the virtues of faith and a good conscience from 1:5 provides a framework for the central section of this chapter. Further emphasis is given by reference to two men, Hymenaeus and Alexander, who have 'reject[ed] conscience' and 'suffered shipwreck in the faith'. They have therefore been 'turned over to Satan'. As in 1 Cor 5:5, this is a powerful image describing the radical effects of exclusion from the Christian community. Hymenaeus is mentioned again, alongside Philetus, at 2 Tim 2:17, where their talk is said to spread like gangrene. Alexander the coppersmith is mentioned in 2 Tim 4:14 where he is said to have done Paul great harm. It is impossible to say whether both refer to the same man. Their rejection of the faith is to be contrasted with the steadfastness of Paul and Timothy; by the end of the first chapter, we are left with a clear impression of the apostle and of his legitimate successor; they are the transmitters of the true teaching of the church.

Church Organization and Behaviour (2:1–3:13)

The discussion in chs. 2 and 3 changes from concern about the opposition to a description of the kind of behaviour that should characterize members of the church towards both one another and outsiders. The detailed arrangements for the leadership of this household and relationships within it suggest that the church is becoming more at home in the world. For Paul, who felt he was living at the end of the age, there was a strong tension between living in this age but belonging to the next. This not only affected his sense of purpose but his ethical teaching as well. Now the situation is different. Eschatological hope is still very much alive (e.g. 6:14–15, 18–19), but there is no sense of urgency or immediacy. There is a more long-term viewpoint; the church must be firmly established, and respectable, so as to avoid adverse publicity.

(2:1–7) Prayer is the first duty of a member of the community. Four words are used to describe the prayers, 'supplications, prayers, intercessions, and thanksgivings' but no distinction is made between them. More significant is that prayers are to be made for everyone, particularly kings and those in authority, and not just for members of the community. For God is Creator and Saviour, and desires that every human being should be saved. Prayer for the emperor caused difficulties for Jews and Christians; their refusal to acknowledge his authority sometimes led to persecutions, but there are a number of passages in the NT which follow the same line as this (Rom 13:1–7; 1 Pet 2:14, 17; Titus 3:1; Acts passim). The aim of such prayer was to avoid the possibility of persecution, and so lead a peaceful life 'in godliness and dignity'. There is similar teaching in other first- and second-century Jewish and Christian writers, and the reasons given often echo those given here (e.g. 1 Clem. 61; Tert. Apol. 30; Jos. J.W. 2.197). The nouns translated 'godliness' and 'dignity' are characteristic of the Pastorals and betray their Hellenistic setting; they translate words (eusebeia and semnotēs) found elsewhere in the NT only in Acts and 2 Peter. They illustrate the results of living in harmony with the authorities; the ability to devote oneself to the worship of God which results in a respectable and responsible life not outwardly distinct from that of their pagan neighbours. Knowledge of the truth recurs in 2 Tim 2:25; 3:7; Titus 1:1, and helps emphasize the accessibility of the Christian message to all reasonable people.

(2:5–6) presents a summary of the true teaching that is the focus of that Christian message. It appears to contain a quotation (NRSV presents it as verse), and is a succinct telling of the drama of salvation in a rhythmical and poetic form—a kind of credal statement (cf. 1 Tim 3:16; 6:13–16; 2 Tim 1:9–10; 2:11–13; Titus 3:4–7). God is one and the Saviour of all people. Christ's role is as mediator; he alone links God and humankind. His humanity is stressed to show solidarity with those he saves—the same word is used in Greek for 'human' and 'humankind'. The word 'mediator' is applied to Christ in the NT only here and in Hebrews (8:6; 9:15; 12:24, where he is mediator of the covenant as Moses was in Gal 3:19). The emphasis on a single God and a single mediator may be an attack on the kind of Gnostic 'myths and speculations' referred to in 1:4, and the stress on Christ's humanity may have been included to refute Docetism.

Christ's self-giving as a ransom, also found in Titus 2:14, uses language similar to Paul's in Romans 3:24 and 8:23 and to that used in Mk 10:45, Mt 20:28, where 'he came ... to give his life as a ransom for many'. Here, by contrast, the language is totally inclusive; he gave his life as a ransom for all. The language of ransom implies that payment is being made to obtain the freedom of captives or slaves and has as its background both the manumission of slaves and the freeing of Israel from Egypt at the Exodus. By the time the Pastoral Epistles were written, the language of ransom had become central in Christian thought. In the context of 1:15 freedom from sin is implied. As part of God's plan for salvation, Jesus' death undoubtedly came at the right time. In the Greek the phrase 'testimony at the right time' is part of the credal statement of vv. 5–6 rather than a comment upon it.

(2:7) Paul's own role in God's plan is emphasized again. He was not only an apostle but also herald and teacher of the Gentiles. The word translated 'herald' is rare in the NT, and is found elsewhere only in 2 Tim 1:11, where it also refers to Paul, and in 2 Peter 2:5, where it refers to Noah. The cognate verb is, however, found throughout the NT. Paul's appointment as teacher of the Gentiles provides the means for God's plan for universal salvation to proceed. The picture of Paul as apostle to the Gentiles accords with that in Paul's own letters and with the narrative of his journeys in Acts. The insistence on Paul's authority is exaggerated, much more than would be necessary in a genuine letter from Paul to his friend. But in the context of this letter the insistence on authority has its place: the true message of salvation is being handed on to the next generation.

(2:8–15) Returning to the subject of prayer, Timothy is now given instructions about the necessary physical as well as emotional attitude. A distinction is drawn between the attitude suitable for men and that for women. Men are to pray with hands raised; they can pray anywhere, in private as well as in communal worship. Their emotional state 'without anger or argument' as a prerequisite to proper prayer recalls the teaching of Old Testament prophets (e.g. Hos 6:6; Am 3:14–15; 5:4–7).

The Pastor then turns to the behaviour of women. First they are to dress and behave modestly. This teaching can be paralleled in Plutarch's Advice to a Bride and Groom, 'It is not gold or precious stones or scarlet that makes a woman decorous, but whatever invests her with that something which betokens dignity, good behaviour and modesty' (Mor. 141e). Women were gaining a certain amount of freedom and independence in the Roman empire, and this was no doubt as true among Christian women as non-Christian women. But like other conservative writers, Christian and non-Christian, the Pastor is concerned that women should remain in what he perceives as their proper, subordinate position. Other NT writers make the same sort of point, particularly about the public behaviour of women. It was necessary for the successful continuation of the faith and to avoid persecution, that women should behave in a seemly way in meetings of the community. Part of this was an insistence that women should not teach or be perceived to be in a position of authority over a man (cf. 1 Cor 14:34).

The reason given by the Pastor for women's subordination goes back to Adam and Eve (cf. 1 Cor 11:8–9). First, he claims that primacy in time implies superiority of status. Second, it was, he claims, Eve who was deceived, not Adam. He is departing from the Genesis narrative at this point. Certainly, Eve ate the fruit first, but she was quickly followed by Adam, and they were both punished. According to some Jewish traditions, Eve's sin was a sexual one, she was seduced by the serpent, so salvation could be achieved only by bearing children. An idea of this sort may lie behind 2:14–15 which places Eve's transgression in such close proximity to the solution that salvation for women rests in bearing children. In any case, a woman's most important role in the Graeco-Roman world was to be the mother of children. For the Pastor, the family and the household were the focus of the church, so bearing children and bringing them up in the faith was vital for its successful survival and growth.

The teaching about women's subordination should not be understood outside its own context. In Rom 16:1 a deacon called Phoebe is commended by Paul. His teaching in 1 Cor 11 and 14 suggests that already in the middle of the first century some women were behaving with a freedom which was unacceptable to the leaders of the church. The popular story of Thecla, told in the Acts of Paul and Thecla, is evidence that this trend continued into the second century.

(3:1–7) 'The saying is sure' may refer back to what has just been said, as in 4:9 or Titus 3:8, or forwards to the instructions about church offices. When the same phrase was used before in 1:15, it introduced an important Christological saying, as it does in 2 Tim 2:11. It is not quite clear here if either the preceding saying or what follows is thought by the author to have this special significance. The writer's teaching about women is important to him but so is his teaching about church officers which follows.

vv. 1b–7 concern the office of the episkopos, literally overseer, but translated in the NRSV as bishop. The discussion indicates that the church has reached a settled situation, where it needs capable and dignified men to run it. But the information we are given is tantalizingly incomplete, for while the qualities required of a bishop are clearly set out, his duties are not described. If, as is quite likely, one of the patterns of organization and worship in the early church was the synagogue, then the episkopos would, like a Jewish synagogue leader, lead the community and represent its interests in the outside world. His good character and reputation among outsiders was essential for the community's welfare and continuing stability. The parallel drawn in 3:5 between the household and the church provides another clue. Graeco-Roman households which consisted of family, slaves, and more loosely dependent groups of people were run by a paterfamilias who had complete authority. The church in the Pastoral Epistles is seen as the household of God; everyone—men, women, children, elders (presbyteroi), servants (diakonoi)—has his or her place in it and its smooth running is overseen by an episkopos who must be of impeccable character.

The list of virtues expected of such a community leader is conventional in both Jewish and Hellenistic societies, including that favourite 'restraint' (sōphrosunē, translated in the NRSV as 'temperate'). His duties include a responsibility for teaching, that is handing on the tradition as he has had it handed on to him. There are some points that may be surprising to a modern reader; the episkopos is expected to be married and to be the head of a household (3:2, 4–5). Furthermore he is to be 'married only once', literally, 'the husband of one wife'. Polygamy is not being forbidden here; remarriage after divorce may be in question, or it may be that the remarriage of widowers is also excluded for episkopoi. If so, the rules are different for different groups in the community, for young widows are encouraged to remarry (5:14). Perhaps, though, this is rather an extreme translation of the Greek; what is meant is that the episkopos should be a faithful husband to his wife, but that sequential monogamy is not out of the question. His conversion to Christianity must not be recent. There may have been important individuals in the community who felt that their standing or wealth qualified them to become leaders in the church. But to be an episkopos one must be firmly rooted in the faith; the implication must be that the church itself is firmly established too.

We do not know whether each community had one episkopos, or more. Ignatius, who was bishop of Antioch in Syria, argued strongly in the first decade of the second century for a monarchical episcopate, that is, having one episkopos as overseer of the Christian communities in each town, who presides over and is distinct from the deacons and from the elders, 'that you may be joined together in one subjection, subject to the bishop and to the presbytery, and may in all things be sanctified' (Ign. Eph. 2.2; cf. 20.2). But it is certain that there was no universally accepted pattern of leadership at this period, and from the Pastoral Epistles themselves no clearly defined organization can be discerned.

(3:8–13) Just as there is information about the character but not the duties of the episkopos, only the virtues necessary for a deacon are described in vv. 8–13. Indeed, the virtues of episkopos and deacon overlap to a great extent. This suggests that the functions were clearly understood already in the community being addressed; the issue was to find suitable people to perform the functions. The Greek word diakonos, translated 'deacon', originally meant 'servant', but in the apostolic fathers (e.g. Didache 15; Ign. Trall. 2, 3; Ign. Magn. 6, 13) and the NT Epistles it is used to describe an officer of the church (e.g. Rom 16:1; 1 Cor 3:5; Eph 6:21; Phil 1:1; 1 Thess 3:2; cf. Acts 6). The narrative in Acts 6 traces the diaconate back to the Jerusalem church when 'seven men full of the Spirit' were appointed to distribute food to the Greek-speaking widows of the church. This may be later rationalization of the origin of the office, linking the function of serving to the diaconate when its origins were already obscure. In Mk 10:45 Jesus uses the verb cognate with diakonos when he says 'I came not to be served but to serve'. The qualities of an episkopos and a deacon were similar; their roles apparently not dissimilar except for a greater emphasis on management and teaching in the case of the episkopos. Little information is given here about the work of a deacon, but it is clear that a test was necessary for those aspiring to become deacons to prove themselves blameless. The 'mystery of the faith', God's hidden purpose only understood by believers, refers to the true teaching of 2:5–6 and 3:16.

In the midst of the description of a deacon's character is a verse about women. The word translated 'women' also means wives in Greek, so there is a real possibility that the verse describes the qualities required in a deacon's wife rather than in a woman deacon. If that is the case, they must be as far beyond reproach as their husbands. On the other hand, Phoebe is called a deacon in Rom 16:1, so it is possible that this verse refers to the qualities such women need. If so, their role must be limited by the constraints put on women's behaviour in 2:11–12, where women were told to be submissive to men and to learn in silence, and were forbidden to teach or have authority over men. The characteristics mentioned are reminiscent of those necessary for episkopoi and deacons. A deacon, like an episkopos, must be married only once, literally 'the husband of one wife', and must be a good head of his household. Single men, slaves, and, to judge by this qualification, women, seem to be excluded from holding office. The requirements that an episkopos should be hospitable and a teacher are not included for deacons, but Timothy is referred to as a deacon in 4:6, and since he was expected to 'pass on all these instructions', in other words, to teach, it may be that the categories are quite fluid and ill-defined. The fact that the church presents must be respectable, so all its representatives must be beyond reproach.

(3:14–16) vv. 14–15 open with a personal note designed to add verisimilitude to the fictional situation. It is common in the Pauline epistles to refer to personal travel plans, so this reference places the epistle firmly in its genre as well as supporting the picture of Paul's personal involvement. The use of the word 'household' summarizes the whole section from 2:1 to 3:13. More will be said of the household later in this letter and also in the other two. But the picture we have so far presents a picture of a solid establishment, run by responsible figures. Any assailant will have a difficult task.

The 'mystery of our religion' is described in the quoted formula which follows. For similar passages see 1 TIM 2:5–6. The word translated 'religion' is eusebeia; normally in the Pastorals eusebeia and its cognates denote piety or godliness, here it carries a sense of the system of belief that inspires piety. The earlier formula in ch. 2 dwelt on the human nature of Christ; this confessional formula consists of three pairs of contrasted statements. The main point of contrast being the last word of each line: in the first pair flesh and spirit, in the second it is angels and Gentiles, in the last pair the contrast is between the world and glory. The structure is chiasmic, ABBAAB (where the earthly world is represented by A, the heavenly by B) which makes the formula memorable and helps unify the whole. In every line the verb is in the same tense and is followed by a noun in the same case preceded, with one exception, by 'in'. Heaven and earth are being contrasted and yet shown to belong together, united by the revelation of Christ and its effects. There is no direct reference to Christ's death and resurrection, nor to the end of the world, but a clear picture is created of the unifying and universal nature of the coming of Christ. Christ's triumph and glory are placed in contrast to the teachings of demons which are to be the subject of the next passage. The household of God rests on sure foundations.

(4:1–5) No attempt is made to elucidate the confessional statement, instead, the author moves on to describe dangers of his opponents' teaching, and the importance and strength of true doctrine. The contrasts between flesh and spirit, earth and heaven are emphasized by reference to revelation through the Spirit in vv. 1–2. The Spirit who inspires true prophetic utterances has foretold opposition to the faith in 'later times', or the last times. It was a commonplace idea in Jewish and Christian apocalyptic that the end would be preceded by a time of persecution and suffering (e.g. Mk 13; 1 Cor 15:24–8). The sense of urgency and immediacy are absent from the Pastoral Epistles, but there is a lingering feeling that before the end there will be difficult and dangerous times.

The opposition described in these verses comes from people whose teaching is dangerously close to that of the author and yet markedly different. It seems to be based on asceticism; marriage was rejected and so was the eating of certain foods. Paul had faced similar problems in Corinth, but his response, recommending celibacy as the ideal, was conditioned by his belief in the imminence of the end (e.g. 1 Cor 7:8–9, 25–31). The perspective of this writer is longer, he envisages a future for the church, so marriage and the procreation of children who will be brought up in the faith is important to him. Sexual asceticism would rob the church of the next generation of believers. The Pastor feels so strongly about his opponents that he claims that their teaching is inspired by demons (v. 1). His own monotheism is clear and, in contrast to such teachers as Marcion, he believes that ‘everything God created is good’. Like Jesus when discussing Jewish food laws (Mk 7:19), he believes all food may be eaten. This particular controversy may support the thesis that some, at any rate, of his opponents were Jewish.

(4:6–10) The rest of the chapter continues in the same tone; encouraging Timothy as a ‘good servant’ or ‘deacon’ to pass on to his fellow Christians the sound teaching he has received, while avoiding or rejecting the ‘profane myths and old wives’ tales’ of the opposition. We are given little more information about the content of sound teaching or of its opposite. Presumably, both were well known to the recipients of the letter and did not need to be spelt out, but the false myths obviously play an important part in the opponents’ teaching (cf. 1:4). Eusebeia, here translated ‘godliness’, appears again as the most important Christian virtue. It characterizes behaviour now and holds promise for the life to come.

In v. 9 the formula ‘the saying is sure’ is repeated (cf. 1:15; 3:1). Again, it is not clear whether it points back to what has gone before, or forwards, or whether it is meant to refer to the whole passage about holding fast to the faith and rejecting false teaching. v. 10 mentions hope again (cf. 1:1). As well as looking back to the historical events of Christ’s life and death, attention was fixed on hope for the future (cf. 2 Cor 1:10). God’s universal salvation here is more limited than in 2:6 ‘especially to those who believe’, but there is no suggestion of an alternative fate for those who do not believe.

(4:11–16) Timothy is again addressed personally. Such personal references help to carry the fiction of Pauline authorship. He is instructed to teach, to exhort, and to read aloud: in other words, to pass on the tradition he has received from Paul, until Paul himself arrives (cf. 2:14–15). Teaching was one of the functions allocated to the episkopos: Timothy is not named as an episkopos anywhere in the Pastorals, but he is portrayed as carrying out some similar functions (in Ign. Magn. 3 the church is recommended to respect and obey their episkopos despite his youth). He is to set an example by his behaviour and deportment. He is gifted as a teacher, from the time he was commissioned by the laying on of hands by the council of elders (also referred to in 2 Tim 1:6). Laying on of hands was a means of transferring the power of the Spirit from one person to another for teaching or healing. It was a transference of authority, a commissioning or consecration to a particular office or task.

Further Matters of Church Order (5:1–6:2)

Like ch. 3, this passage concerns church organization. Here the subject is widows and elders. In Greek the word presbuteros is used to designate old age as well as being the title of an office in Judaism and Christianity. This can lead to ambiguity in interpretation; the natural reverence for the senior members of the group developed into hierarchical organization. For the modern reader it is not always easy to distinguish between the two uses of the term, particularly at the stage of development we see in the Pastorals when the original use is still found alongside its titular use. In vv. 1–2 the meaning is the original one, ‘older men’, as can be seen from the context. Later in the chapter instructions are given for presbuteroi, the leading ‘elders’ of the community.

(5:3–16) The instructions concerning widows are extremely detailed and precise compared with those relating to other groups (3:1–7, 8–13; 5:17–22). We have already seen that the position and activities of women were of particular concern to the Pastor. This group of women commands his special attention. It was regarded as a special duty among the Jews to care for widows who had no family to provide for them. This is the group referred to here as ‘really widows’. Women who would otherwise be genuinely destitute deserved the community’s support, whereas those who had families able to support them were not the financial responsibility of the community. The clear moral message of the author stands out in v. 8; failure to provide for widows in one’s family was tantamount to a denial of the faith. Widows have a religious duty themselves: to offer prayers night and day (v. 5). But the widow ‘who lives for pleasure’ (v. 6) does not deserve the community’s support. The reference to such women may be to highlight the plight of the ‘real widow’, or there may have been such a case within the community and known to the readers.

(5:9–16) It seems, however, as if ‘real widow’ may have a titular sense as well. The expression in v. 9, ‘Let a widow be put on the list’, suggests some sort of formal enrolment; perhaps, like the term ‘elder’, the word had acquired a technical sense. Those enrolled might consist of ‘real widows’ or be a separate group. In any case, qualifications for enrolment are strict and are reminiscent of those for bishops and deacons in ch. 3. The enrolled widow must be 60 years old or more, she must have been married only once, and she must have brought up children. If the widows of 5:3–5 are included in this group, they also have the religious duty to pray continuously for the community. In v. 11 the subject changes to younger widows, a group of women whose behaviour the author finds particularly unacceptable. His characterization of these young women, though it may have been based on his knowledge of one or two individuals, is a gross over-generalization, and one that has done women harm. His solution, as in 2:15, is marriage and childbearing.

(5:17–22) As a council, the group of elders exercised authority in the community (cf. 4:14; Titus 1:5, etc.). Here we find rules for their payment and their discipline. Some may have achieved their status as elders simply on account of their age, and a group of them, ‘those who rule well’, are worthy of double honour or double payment (the same word is used in Greek to denote payment and honour). Any ambiguity about the word here disappears in the light of v. 18 which contains the scriptural quotation also found in 1 Cor 9:9. There is further justification for the disciplinary procedures by an allusion to a catchphrase also quoted in Mt 10:10 and Lk 10:7.

The disciplining of elders is based on the Jewish system of public accusations supported by at least two witnesses; this has the double effect of ensuring that casual accusations are not made and that 'the rest' would be put off committing the same sin. The rest may refer to the whole community or just the other elders. Impartiality, a word used only here in the NT, is to be the basis of all judgements. Timothy is urged 'not to ordain anyone hastily'. This could imply that extra care taken about the appointment of elders would avoid the need for discipline later.

(5:23–6:2) Before turning to instructions for slaves, a personal instruction is given to Timothy about drinking wine. Ostensibly it is a personal note referring to Timothy's health, which helps support the impression of intimacy between the two. It may also be a roundabout way of attacking the asceticism of the writer's opponents (cf. 4:3–4). Church officials are to be neither drunkards nor ascetics. 5:24–5 contain general truths which may be meant to refer back to the elders of the previous verses, or, more generally, to members of the congregation.

(6:1–2) Slaves are given special instructions, though there are no corresponding instructions for their masters as there are in other epistles (e.g. Col 3:22–4:1; Eph 6:5–9). The institution of slavery is not questioned here or elsewhere in the NT; it was seen as a necessary part of society. The only issue was how slaves should be treated by their owners, but the Pastoral Epistles are not concerned even with that issue. The slaves are divided into two groups, those who belong to non-believing masters and those whose masters are members of the community. Unquestioning obedience is demanded of the first group so that the name of the church should not fall into disrepute. Those who are slaves of Christian masters are advised not to presume on their shared beliefs, though they are all brothers and sisters, sons and daughters of one God. Nevertheless, the social constraints that exist in their everyday lives are not to be overstepped.

(6:2b–21) The apparently haphazard collection of teaching, unified by its hortatory character, links false teaching with bad conduct and identifies eusebeia, godliness or piety, with true wealth. As we have seen, piety in the Pastorals denotes the manner of life of a true believer who honours God as Creator and Redeemer of all, and who treats other human beings with respect (cf. 2:2; 4:7, 8; 5:4). It also separates sound teaching from false. False teachers believe that what they call piety is a source of mercenary gain, while 4:8 points to its real value. In vv. 3–10 piety is contrasted with all kinds of vices ranging from envy to morbid craving for controversy, from wrangling to a desire for wealth. Teaching about the vanity of riches here and in 6:17–19 frames a paragraph describing the true Christian life.

vv. 11–12 present the reverse image; the righteousness and piety of the person who shuns the attractions of wealth are contrasted with the behaviour described in vv. 3–10. The list of antisocial and untruthful behaviour in vv. 4–5 is balanced against the beliefs of one who pursues godliness, in language already familiar, Timothy is exhorted to pursue virtues which have been recommended before, and to fight the good fight. vv. 13–16 contain a doxology or liturgical formula similar to others in the Pastorals (see 1 TIM 2:5–6). It illustrates the ideas of salvation and hope with which the epistle began. God the Creator, whose glorious and transcendent nature is extolled in a series of rich images, will bring about the second manifestation of Christ at the right time. God's transcendence is thus balanced with his involvement in human history, in the two appearances of Christ, one past, one still to come. Jesus Christ is introduced, in his first manifestation, as an example of faithful testimony before Pilate. Although this does not fit neatly with any of our gospel accounts, that he supremely bore witness to the truth is undeniable for the Pastor. As with the other similar passages, the language is poetic and defies precise interpretation, but the rhetoric is clear: God is one, he desires the salvation of all believers through the mediation of his Son, Jesus Christ.

In the final injunction to Timothy the importance of handing on the tradition is repeated, for that is 'what has been entrusted' to him. 'What is falsely called knowledge' became part of the title of Irenaeus' late second-century refutation of Gnosticism.

2 Timothy

2 Timothy shares many of the concerns of 1 Timothy and Titus, and many of the same expressions, but there is a difference of tone. There are far more personal touches in this letter; people are mentioned by name, fellow-workers, friends, and relations as well as opponents. The relationship between Paul and Timothy is made to seem closer and less formal. There are more references, mostly indirect, to Paul's letters particularly to Romans.

Greeting and Warnings (1:1–18)

The opening greeting recalls that in 1 Timothy, but the call is by the will of God rather than by his command (cf. 1 Cor 1:1; 2 Cor 1:1; Col 1:1; Eph 1:1). Paul is said to be an apostle for the sake of the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus, which expands the idea of Christ Jesus, our hope, in 1 Timothy. 'In Christ' is an authentically Pauline expression, but there is no sense that the author has grasped the deep metaphysical meaning of life in Christ as understood by Paul himself. Timothy is called 'beloved' rather than 'loyal' or legitimate child here (see 1 TIM 1:1–2). Thus we already have a hint of the different tone of the letter; there is not so much concern about passing on the authentic tradition.

Paul's letters often open with a thanksgiving like this, but different Greek words are used here, perhaps because the Pauline word eucharisteō which originally meant 'give thanks' had acquired special eucharistic connotations by the time this letter was written. The tension Paul himself clearly felt between his Jewish ancestry and his Christian faith is lacking here (1:3; cf. Rom 9–11). Timothy's own ancestry in the faith is exemplary: his grandmother Lois and his mother Eunice were believers before him. Meanwhile, the closeness of the relationship between Paul and Timothy is emphasized by Paul's constant prayers for Timothy and by the emotional memory of tears and the anticipation of joy when they meet again. This, together with the naming of Timothy's mother and grandmother, provide the kind of personal details that add to the sense of authenticity. But the very fact that three generations of Christians within one family are mentioned implies a post-Pauline date; 3:15 makes it clear that Timothy had been brought up as a Christian from childhood.

From 1:6 it seems that Timothy received the laying on of hands from Paul himself rather than from the council of elders as was suggested by 1 Tim 4:14. They may refer to two separate occasions where authorization or commissioning was given for different purposes, or they may simply reflect the different tones in 1 and 2 Timothy, the latter being more personal, the former more formal and official. What is certain in both cases is that through the laying on of hands God's Spirit is passed from one to the other, whether from Paul the apostle or from the council of elders. The qualities imparted by the laying on of hands are both new and familiar in these epistles. Self-discipline translates one of the sōphrosunē words familiar from the other two epistles, and together with the spirit of power and love is contrasted with the spirit of cowardice. The idea of cowardice is linked with that of shame in the next paragraph, with the mention of Paul's imprisonment. The Pastor instructs Timothy not to be ashamed of bearing witness to the gospel or of Paul's imprisonment (cf. Rom 1:16). Philippians presents a clear account of his imprisonment and of its effects on Paul and his fellow Christians. Neither 1 Timothy nor Titus mentions it, but here it adds to the sense of authenticity. Paul has by now acquired the status of a hero, someone of whom his successors must not be ashamed; another indication of the late date of these letters.

The link between God's saving work in the past and the present sufferings of the apostle are continued in the kerygmatic passage that follows in 1:8–14. It is a summary of the theological doctrine of the kind the Pastor makes in 1 Timothy and Titus (cf. 1 Tim 2:5–6; 3:16; 6:13–16; 2 Tim 2:11–13; Titus 3:4–7). Like those passages, it depends on Pauline teaching, it uses some Pauline language, but is subtly and markedly different from Paul. For example, Paul rarely uses the verb 'to save' in the past tense (a notable exception being Rom 8:24, where it is in the context of future hope). The ideas expressed in v. 10 are based on the teaching in Romans 16:25–7, 'the proclamation of Jesus Christ according to the revelation of the mystery that was kept secret but is now disclosed'. The notion that God's plan of salvation was a mystery hidden from people for generations before the appearance of Christ was one that quickly took root. It created a historical schema which could link events and prophecies from Scripture not only with Christ's life and death, but into the present and up to his future reappearance. Although the idea has Pauline roots, it is expressed here in language typical of the Pastorals: Christ is described as Saviour, his appearance as epiphaneia, a word found in the NT only in the Pastorals (cf. 1 Tim 6:14; 2 Tim 4:1, 8; Titus 2:13) and in 2 Thess 2:8. Christ's death had the effect of abolishing death and through the gospel he brought life and immortality. The Greek word translated 'immortality' actually means 'incorruptibility', an associated but not identical idea. Immortality, translating a different Greek word, is said in 1 Tim 6:16 to belong to God alone. Paul himself talked of resurrection rather than immortality, so again we are presented with Pauline ideas presented in un-Pauline terms.

(1:11–14) We are brought into the present by the reference to Paul's appointment as apostle and teacher, both familiar terms, and herald, already used once in a similar way in 1 Tim 2:7 (elsewhere in the NT only in 2 Pet 2:5). In Greek the word is related to the verb 'to preach', and to 'proclamation'. This triple role has led to Paul's imprisonment, but Paul can remain steadfast because of his trust in God and his assurance of vindication. 'What has been entrusted to me' is a better translation of 1:12 and refers back to 1 Tim 6:20; with the help of Christ and the Holy Spirit, the sound teaching will continue uncorrupted. The line beginning with Christ, and passing to Paul, now continues through Timothy.

(1:15–18) Paul is presented in these verses as being held in a prison in Rome, where he was visited by the faithful Onesiphorus. The example of Paul's faithfulness and that of Onesiphorus (cf. also 4:19) is contrasted with the behaviour of those in Asia who have turned against Paul, including two individuals, Phygelus and Hermogenes. Nothing else is known about these two men, but the verb used for 'turn away' is found also in 4:4 and Titus 1:14 where it has a sense implying the rejection of true teaching, rather than personal rejection. (A man named Hermogenes the coppersmith is mentioned in the Acts of Paul and Thecla, 3:1, where he is a companion of Paul but a hypocrite and flatterer. Onesiphorus is also mentioned in the next paragraph.) Ephesus, where Timothy receives these letters, was the capital of the Roman province of Asia, the western part of modern Turkey.

Charge to Timothy (2:1–3:9)

(2:1–7) Timothy is urged to 'be strong in grace' following the example of Onesiphorus. Again he is presented as the link in the chain between Paul and the church at the time of the Pastorals. He has heard Paul's gospel directly and indirectly through the teaching of others. What has been entrusted to him, he is to pass on to those who will, in their turn, teach others. But the role of a faithful Christian is not simply belief and loyal transmitting of tradition, it entails suffering as well. This is a theme that is hardly touched upon in 1 Timothy and Titus, but is prominent in 2 Timothy. Three images are used to describe this wholehearted commitment to the gospel: a Christian must be like a soldier dedicated to serving his commanding officer, like an athlete winning a race according to the rules, or like a farmer toiling over his crops. The three images are not explained; Timothy is told to work out their meaning for himself, with the help of the Lord (v. 7), but the general sense is clear. Work is involved in all three images, they are familiar from Paul's epistles and other NT works, and are found in popular teaching of the time. The first two belong quite closely together, they involve willing obedience to a commanding officer or to the rules of competition. The farming image recalls 1 Cor 9:7–12.

(2:8–13) v. 8 recalls Rom 13–4 and 1 Cor 15:20. It represents a formulaic summary of the author's message. Jesus Christ, whose own suffering is not mentioned but is assumed behind this passage, was raised from the dead. The Son of David, he was human, even though of royal descent. In a few words much is implied to contradict the opponents' teaching. The preaching of this message had led to Paul being held in chains like a criminal in a Roman prison. But his enthusiasm for the spreading of the gospel was not diminished or held back by his imprisonment; this epistle is meant to provide proof of that. For the sake of the gospel, Paul is even willing to be held as a criminal, innocent though he is, so that those who believe, 'the elect', may obtain salvation and share in eternal glory along with him. Salvation and glory are familiar themes in the Pastorals, but glory is normally a property of God. The idea of sharing in his glory after death or after the end of the world is, however, a frequent image in Paul (Rom 8:21, 30, etc.)

A rhythmical passage follows (vv. 11–13), introduced by the formula 'the saying is sure' (cf. 1 Tim 1:15; 3:1; 4:9; Titus 3:8). It explains in poetic form the salvation that is in Christ Jesus, for his suffering and death are patterns for the suffering and death of his followers, and the results of his endurance will be shared with those who also suffer in his name. The parallel saying in v. 12b makes the same point but in the negative, while 2:13a emphasizes that Christ remains faithful to the purposes of God whatever human beings do. The ideas are based on Rom 6, but are developed further. It is impossible to know whether the Pastor included here, as possibly elsewhere (for refs. see 2 TIM 1:9–10), existing liturgical passages, but the emphasis on the need for faithfulness in suffering fits this context perfectly.

(2:14–26) From the encouragement to remain faithful, the passage turns to countering heterodoxy. The ultimate aim set out in 2:24–6 is to bring the heterodox back into the fold. Correction rather than expulsion is the theme here (cf. 1 Tim 1:20 where Hymenaeus and Alexander have been handed over to Satan). Repentance is in God's gift, he provides the only way that the heretics can be released from the power of the devil into whose snare they have fallen. We are reminded of 1 Tim 2:4 where God desires the salvation of all.

Before we reach this conciliatory point, however, we learn something of what the opponents were teaching. They liked above all to enter into disputes about words. The Greek word, logomachein, to dispute or wrangle about words, is found in related forms also in 1 Tim 6:4 and Titus 3:9. Clearly, acceptance of sound doctrine means not asking questions or questioning definitions. A clear exposition of accepted doctrine was the only proper method of teaching. Discussion could only lead to dispute, and so must be avoided. If the teacher is above reproach, then opponents have no grounds for raising questions. As is often the case in these epistles, good behaviour and sound doctrine go hand in hand. If, like those in 2:4–6, Timothy works at expounding the truth clearly, literally 'cutting a straight path', then he will have nothing to feel ashamed of before God or people. Profane chatter was the subject of a warning in 1 Tim 6:20, as it is here. There it was coupled with 'what is falsely called knowledge', here it is said to lead to impiety and will spread like gangrene; a vivid medical image. Hymenaeus and Philetus are singled out. Like other named people in the letters we cannot be sure whether they were known to the community at the time of writing, if they were well-known historical figures, or if they are fictitious characters introduced to make the situation more vivid and realistic. The particular impiety of the two named heretics is the belief that the resurrection has already happened. This idea was already prevalent in Paul's lifetime and resulted from one possible interpretation of his own teaching (e.g. 1 Cor 15). It became a popular idea among some Gnostics and sometimes accounted for their dismissive attitude to the physical body. The teaching of Paul was regarded as authoritative by both Gnostics and anti-Gnostics in the second century. Both groups could interpret his teaching in ways which supported their own outlook. The Pastoral Epistles stand out firmly against 'knowledge falsely so-called' and became the basis for many later anti-Gnostic positions.

The building metaphor of vv. 20–2 is common in Christianity, and is found elsewhere in the Pastorals (1 Tim 3:15), where it is associated with the author's favourite metaphor, the household of God. Behind this passage lies Isa 28:16, quoted by Paul in Rom 9:33. From the same chapter of Romans comes the inspiration for the image of different utensils. But here it is not used in the same way as in Rom 9:21, which is about election, nor in the same way as the image of different parts of the body in 1 Cor 12. At first glance it seems to be a parable about important and less important vessels, along the same lines as the body metaphor, but some of the meaning has become lost in the retelling. The NRSV translation obscures the meaning further; the words translated 'special' and 'ordinary' mean 'honourable' and 'dishonourable' in Greek. From the context we can understand the passage to be an instruction to Timothy to cleanse himself of any teaching except that advocated already as sound doctrine, thus he and those he teaches will become useful, that is honourable, utensils. Again, orthodoxy is closely bound up with ethics. The list of qualities Timothy should cultivate, begun in v. 15 but then interrupted, continues in v. 22. His youth, mentioned in 1 Tim 4:12, is not to be an excuse for immature behaviour. The qualities mentioned in vv. 22–4, are already familiar from this letter and its companions; there is particular emphasis on avoiding quarrels and controversies which is the special interest of 2 Timothy, and it is worth noticing that the injunction to be an 'apt teacher' was used in 1 Tim 3:2 of the episkopos.

(3:1–9) The distress of the last days was a common theme in Judaism and early Christianity. Sinfulness and corruption of all sorts would prevail for a time, but it was believed that none of this was beyond God's control or outside his purpose. The gospels present us with a picture of cosmic terrors, such as earthquakes, famines, and eclipses (e.g. Mk 13:14–27). Like the commentary on Habakkuk by the Jews of Qumran (1QpHab), and like 1 John, 2 Timothy sees the distress in terms of human sin and apostasy. A long list of such vices is added which follows the conventions of its time, but many of the vices appear elsewhere in the Pastorals, either as characteristics to be avoided or whose opposites are recommended for Christian leaders. The list in Greek has a certain coherence, lost in translation, because of alliteration at the beginning or end of the adjectives, and because the first two and last two begin with the prefix phil-. That these vices belong to heterodox Christians becomes clear in v. 5. Timothy, and through him the whole congregation, are warned to keep out of such people's way.

The group of people thought to be most at risk from these apostates are women. The mocking diminutive is used, 'little women', translated by the NRSV as 'silly women'. It is not immediately obvious whether 'overwhelmed by their sins and swayed by all kinds of desires' refers to their disposition towards this sort of teaching or whether they are seen as particularly sinful women. Taken in conjunction with 1 Tim 2:11–14 (and 1 Cor 14:35), it is clear that there were women in the early church anxious to learn. In Acts there are several accounts of women being attracted to the words of an apostle's preaching. Stories told about Thecla (written down in the late second century as the Acts of Paul and Thecla), who renounced the prospect of marriage to follow Paul and devote her life to spreading the gospel, illustrate the kind of response from women that the Pastor deprecates. Thecla's vocation is justified in the stories by miraculous escapes from death; there is no doubt that she is portrayed as having arrived 'at a knowledge of the truth'.

Jannes and Jambres were the names given in some Jewish traditions to the Egyptian magicians summoned by Pharaoh to oppose Moses and Aaron in Ex 7:8–13 etc. Just as Moses' opponents' success was short-lived, so those who opposed the work of God now, by insinuating themselves into households, would fail before long.

Paul as Exemplar (3:10–4:8)

Paul's own steadfast character and his heroism under persecution are set out as an example of true faith. This glowing description of his character, though framed in the first person, bespeaks hagiography not autobiography. He is the model for Christians in times of persecution. The three cities, Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra, where the persecutions took place, are mentioned in Acts 13 and 14 as places where Paul and Barnabas were persecuted by the Jews, jealous of their success. Paul has not yet encountered Timothy at this point in the Acts narrative. It is probable that 2 Timothy and Acts are using the same sources here, unless one depends on the other for information. The example of Paul's persecutions illustrates the possibility of persecution for believers. But just as Paul was saved many times, so would his followers be. The opponents are held up as contrasts to Paul's character (3:14). The situation described at the beginning of the chapter will go from bad to worse as more and more people are led astray. The same situation was foreseen in 1 Tim 4:1. A chain reaction will take place; after one person has been deceived into believing the opponents' falsehoods, he, in turn, will deceive others.

(3:14–17) As well as having the model of Paul before him, Timothy must continue to follow the teachings of the sacred writings, an expression used by Greek-speaking Jews to describe their bible. He has been taught Scripture from childhood; the reference is to his mother and grandmother (2 Tim 1:5), but he has also had teachers such as Paul. Scripture is rarely quoted in the Pastoral Epistles, and there is no description or explanation of the development of Christianity out of and away from Judaism. It is probable that opposition is coming, at any rate some of the time, from Jewish Christians, but apart from differences about myths, genealogies, and the law, we are not told much about where the differences lie. Here Scripture, presumably including the law, is given unequivocal approval. If the NRSV translation of 3:16 is taken, the usefulness of all Scripture arises from the fact that it is divinely inspired. The alternative reading in the margin assumes that only those passages inspired by God are useful, i.e.

it assumes that some parts are not so inspired. This was indeed the belief among some early Gnostic groups such as the Marcionites, so it makes most sense to follow the NRSV translation. It is the usefulness of Scripture that is the significant point; different kinds of usefulness are immediately listed. v. 17, 'everyone who belongs to God' (cf. 1 Tim 6:11), probably refers to anyone in a position to teach or lead the congregation; such a person needs to be well versed in Scripture as well as in Christian doctrine. The result will be good works (as in 1 Tim 2:10).

Ch. 4 contains more intensely personal material than any other part of the Pastoral Epistles. The first section gives the impression, like 1:3–7 of being a personal 'testament'; the passing on of instructions from an important person to his followers is a literary form found elsewhere in the NT, but it also has a long scriptural tradition (e.g. Deut 31:24, Isa 8:16). Its content is kerygmatic, like other doctrinal passages in the Pastorals; this is the most solemn both in form and content. Judgement is mentioned for the first time, which adds a note of real seriousness; in the presence of God the Saviour, Christ will judge the living and the dead. A picture of a God who had to approve one's behaviour occurs in 2:14–19, but without mentioning judgement. Here, in language reminiscent of 1 Cor 15:21–8 (cf. Acts 10:42; 1 Pet 4:5), judgement becomes explicit. But the favourite terminology of the Pastorals is not absent; Christ's appearing, or epiphaneia, referring to his second coming, recurs in 1 Tim 6:14; 2 Tim 4:8; and Titus 2:13 (and in 2 Tim 1:10 the same word refers to his incarnation), but 'kingdom' is mentioned only here and in 4:18. Timothy's role is to preach the gospel, in favourable and unfavourable times, to make sure that the message is properly understood. 'The time is coming', has a sense of urgency about it, particularly as it seems to refer to events that are already beginning to take place (cf 3:1–9). Sound doctrine will be rejected in favour of false teaching, myths will be believed instead of the truth. The prediction by Paul of the events that are happening in the community addressed by the Pastorals gives the sense that present events are part of God's plan and Paul knew what was to happen. In spite of suffering, Timothy must continue his good work, and not be put off by the apostasy of some members of the community.

Paul's death is imminent; in 2 Timothy it has been made clear that he is in prison: now, in poignant language reminiscent of Phil 2:17 (the only other use in the NT of the verb 'pour out as a libation', NRSV), Paul reveals that he is to be put to death. Looking back, Paul reviews his Christian ministry as a fight he has fought and as a race he has run, two familiar metaphors (1 Tim 6:12, cf. 1 Cor 9:25, 2 Tim 2:5; cf. Phil 2:16; 3:13–14). His life is a model to Timothy and to all believers, the reward that awaits him and others who follow him is sure; it is the garland given to victors in athletic competitions, understood by Paul to be the reward for a life of virtue, and so used also in the early church of the reward for martyrs (cf. Mart. Pol. 17:1; 19:2).

Personal Comments and Salutations (4:9–22)

(4:9–15) Many individuals; friends, fellow-workers, and companions of Paul are referred to, adding conviction to the pretence of Pauline authorship, and persuading some commentators that at any rate fragments of the letters are genuine. Timothy must endeavour to visit Paul in prison, for, as he mentioned in 1:15, many others have left him. Only Luke remains (but cf. 4:21 where Paul seems to have several companions). Demas, whose name is found together with Luke's and Mark's in Col 4:14 and Philem 24 has actually deserted him (Demas is also named in Acts of Paul and Thecla, as is Hermogenes the coppersmith, cf. 2 Tim 1:15; this is possibly the same person as in 4:14. Both are said to be hypocrites). Crescens and Titus seem to have left but not deserted him. Tychicus is also mentioned in Titus 3:12 and in Acts 20:4; Col 4:7; Eph 6:21. The reference to the cloak, books, and parchment left behind at Troas adds a final touch of verisimilitude to the picture. Alexander, possibly the same person as the Alexander of 1 Tim 1:20, is mentioned as an enemy. He may be the Alexander of Acts 19:33 who was a Jewish silversmith, not a coppersmith. At any rate this Alexander was well known to the community as an opponent.

(4:16–18) It is difficult to identify Paul's 'first defence' (4:16) with anything we hear about in Acts or in the other epistles, apart possibly from that mentioned in Phil 1:7, 16. There it is the defence of the gospel that is referred to, here, it seems to be a more technical court appearance. However, historical identification is neither possible nor necessary to understand the picture the author is presenting. Paul has survived one trial; the trial resulted in his desertion by his friends, but he was enabled to defend the gospel with God's help. 'All the Gentiles' probably refers to those at his trial, but may be a reference to his whole Gentile mission. That time he survived, the next time he will be saved for God's heavenly kingdom. He expects to die now, but his death will not be the end (cf. 4:8).

(4:19–21) The final greetings name some familiar and some unfamiliar people. Prisca and Aquila are mentioned in an almost identical way at the end of Romans (16:3, cf. 1 Cor 16:9 where they themselves send greetings). Onesiphorus is familiar from 1:16. Erastus was the name of the city treasurer of Corinth (Rom 16:23), and in Acts 19:22 Paul sends a man called Erastus with Timothy from Ephesus to Macedonia. Trophimus appeared in Acts 20:4; 21:29, as an inhabitant of Ephesus. None of Paul's current companions are mentioned elsewhere in the NT. Perhaps they were names familiar to the community. As a further personal touch Paul urges Timothy to travel before winter, because travel during that season was difficult and dangerous (cf. Titus 3:12).

The final blessing is modelled on those in Gal 6:18; Phil 4:23; and Philem 25.

Titus

Greetings and Instructions on Dealing with Deceivers (1:1–16)

(1:1–4) The opening greeting of Titus is longer and fuller than its counterparts in 1 and 2 Timothy and includes a summary of the gospel message. Paul is named again as the sender, but here he is called slave as well as apostle as in Rom 1:1. Faith and knowledge of the truth are said to accord with godliness or eusebeia (cf. 1 Tim 2:2, etc.). The idea of God's plan of salvation is clearly set out again, here strengthened by the assertion that God never lies. This is never explicitly said of God elsewhere in the NT but it is a thought underlying the notion of prophecy fulfilment throughout the NT. God's plan of salvation includes his promises in the past, and their fulfilment in the work of Christ, and in the work of those who proclaim the gospel, as well as the hope of eternal life. Both God and Christ are named as Saviour, because Christ carried out God's work of salvation on earth. The title 'Saviour' is used frequently in the Pastoral Epistles; in Titus, for example, God and Christ are each described as Saviour three times. Two elements of the blessing are present in v. 4, rather than three as in 1 and 2 Timothy.

Titus, like Timothy in 1 Tim 1:2 is called 'my loyal child', in other words, legitimate successor. From Paul's own letters he is known to be a Greek whom Paul and Barnabas took to Jerusalem (Gal 2:1, 3) and who was associated with the Corinthian church (2 Cor 7:6–16; 8:6, 16–17, 23; 12:18). In 1 Tim 4:10, he is said to have been sent to Dalmatia. Like the setting of 1 and 2 Timothy, this setting is fictitious.

(1:5–9) The situation envisaged at the beginning of the epistle is that Paul has instigated a successful mission in Crete and it is now Titus' job to continue the work, 'putting it in order'. (Crete is mentioned elsewhere in the NT only in Acts 27, when Paul did not visit the island intentionally, but his ship was wrecked as it sailed past.) Putting things in order consisted first in appointing elders in every town (cf. Acts 14:23), which in turn would discourage opposition. Qualifications are given for elders here which resemble those given in 1 Tim 3 for bishops (episkopoi) and deacons. The use of the conjunction 'for' at the beginning of v. 7 heading the list of qualities necessary for an episkopos implies an overlap in their roles; perhaps, as in Jewish communities of the diaspora, the episkopos was drawn from the ranks of the elders. In 1 Tim (5:1, 17, 19) it is not clear that this was the case; there a council of elders with an episkopos at its head may have been envisaged. The episkopos is the steward of God's household, a favourite image of the church in the Pastorals (e.g. 1 Tim 3:4; 5:12, 15). Paul, who was fond of using metaphors of service and slavery to describe his own role, used it of himself once in 1 Cor 4:1. But there he is the steward of the mysteries of God. To the exemplary character of the episkopos, familiar from 1 Tim 3, is added the necessity of his having 'a firm grasp of the word', that is, a clear understanding of the Christian message. This will enable him not only to present the church's teaching clearly but also to refute those who contradict it.

(1:10–16) The character of those who contradict is then set out. That some of them are Jewish Christians now seems clear (v. 10). This fits with the impression given in 1 and 2 Timothy but not made explicit there. They are native Cretans, converted to Christianity from Judaism and now apparently reverting in some way to their old faith and possibly advocating the circumcision of Gentile Christians. But as in 1 Tim 1:4 and 2 Tim 4:4, it is their teaching of Jewish myths that occupies the author's attention. Since we are given no further information, however, it is not possible to know whether these were Gnostic myths or more traditional scriptural myths. They also imposed Jewish commandments on their followers; perhaps food laws which the author did not accept (cf. 1 Tim 4:3–5), and which may be alluded to in 1:15. Ascetics, whether Jewish or not, who refused to eat certain foods were condemned in 1 Tim 4:4, for 'all things created by God are pure'. Here such people are condemned as having corrupt consciences; this is very strong condemnation for people whose understanding about purity is different from one's own. But it is the obverse of believing that sound faith leads to good behaviour. However, it contradicts Paul's teaching on such matters in Rom 14 and 1 Cor 8–10 where he is able to accommodate both points of view.

Membership of the Community (2:1–3:11)

The main section of Titus is reminiscent of 1 Timothy in that it describes the qualities of members of the community, interspersed with short doctrinal statements. Here the concern is not with the officers of the community, but with its ordinary members. It is introduced by the injunction to Titus to teach what is consistent with sound doctrine. This seems to entail good behaviour on the part of all members of the community. What follows resembles the lists of instructions about behaviour in other NT epistles (Col 3:18–22; Eph 5:22–33; 1 Pet 2:18–3:9), but here the grammatical form is different. Nevertheless, the list of qualities and duties required contains no surprises. Older men (not elders here; a related but not identical word is used) are encouraged to be temperate (cf. 1 Tim 6:11), serious (semnos, cf. 1 Tim 3:8, 11), and prudent (sōphrōn, cf. 1:8; 1 Tim 3:2). These are virtues that would be admired throughout the Hellenistic world but specifically Christian virtues follow; they are to be sound in faith, in love, and in endurance (cf. 1:9; 1 Tim 6:11; 2 Tim 3:10). A summary, in other words, of the qualities listed in ch. 1.

Older women have more detailed instructions: prohibitions as well as positive admonitions. This is a much more general group than the widows of 1 Tim 5. They are to be reverent, and like those in 1 Tim 3:11, they must not be slanderers or slaves to drink. They can be teachers, presumably of the younger women, certainly not of men (1 Tim 2:12), they taught the female Christian virtues and not matters of doctrine. These virtues are then listed. To the modern eye they encourage submissive attitudes; they are, however, typical of attitudes everywhere in the Graeco-Roman world (e.g. Plut. Mor. 140c, 142d). It is possible that the opponents of 'sound doctrine' taught that women could remain single and continue to lead a full Christian life, and like Thecla become an itinerant preacher (see 2 Tim 3:1–9). In any case, that kind of behaviour in no way conforms to the ideals of this author, who believes a woman's role is properly that of wife and mother, her salvation dependent on her fulfilling those roles submissively (cf. 1 Tim 2:9–15). The motivation given here, however, is to prevent the church being discredited. Nothing in the behaviour of the members of the community must attract negative comment from its neighbours.

Titus is urged to be a model for younger men in his behaviour and teaching. Here it is opponents not secular neighbours who must find no object for criticism in the behaviour of the young men. The Pastoral Epistles show no sense of their community being threatened by persecution in a serious way, but the author does not want to attract attention to the church by odd or antisocial behaviour. Paul had a similar concern about people in Corinth speaking in tongues (1 Cor 14:23–5).

Like women to their husbands, slaves are to be submissive to their masters. The teaching about slaves corresponds to contemporary thinking in every way. Just as attitudes to the position of women have changed beyond all recognition, so have attitudes towards the institution of slavery. But at the time the letter was written the institution was never really questioned, though there was discussion of the proper treatment of slaves, particularly among the Stoics (e.g. Seneca, 'On Master and Slave', Epistles, 47). In parallel household rules in other NT epistles, the behaviour of masters to slaves, husbands to wives, and fathers to children is introduced to balance the picture (Eph 6:1–9; Col 3:18–4:1; 1 Pet 2:18–3:7). The Pastoral Epistles enjoin no such commitments. The reason for the slaves' submissive and obedient attitude that the letter recommends is given in 2:10 in a way very typical of the Pastoral Epistles; they are to be 'an ornament to the doctrine of God our Saviour'. In other words, sound doctrine and ethics are inextricably linked even for slaves.

(2:11–15) contains a typical doctrinal statement, interrupted by ethical exhortations in v. 12, recalling other such passages in the other two epistles, but resembling most closely that in 2 Tim 1:9–12. The close relationship between the death of Christ and the removal of sin is here expressed more clearly than anywhere else in the three epistles and in a way that entirely conforms to Paul's own teaching. Typically for the Pastorals, the incarnation of Christ and his sacrifice are linked with the hope and expectation of his future coming. The Greek of 2:13 is ambiguous. The NRSV chooses to identify God our Saviour with Jesus Christ. Since he is nowhere else called God in the Pastoral Epistles—indeed his humanity is stressed in 1 Tim 2:5—the alternative translation, 'our great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ' is to be preferred. But, on the other hand, the immediate context of the verse with its imagery of royal epiphany might have encouraged the author to use the most exalted imagery of Christ at his parousia.

The grace of God has brought salvation to all; the soteriology of the Pastorals is almost always inclusive rather than exclusive (e.g. 1 Tim 2:4, 6). The qualities that grace enables us to learn have been mentioned before, and include words belonging to the piety (eusebeia) as well as restraint (sōphrosunē) groups. The connection between God's gracious act of salvation in Christ's coming and death with present Christian behaviour has never been expressed more clearly. The word used for redemption here is cognate with that used for ransom in 1 Tim 2:6; Christ's death is the price of redemption. The idea of purification of a people is not Pauline as ideas of ransom are, but is reminiscent of 1 Pet 2:9. The final injunction adds weight and authority to his teaching.

(3:1–2) The face the church presents is to be that of peaceful and helpful people, both in the public realm towards the government and also towards private individuals. The injunction to be subject to rulers is familiar from 1 Tim 2:2 and from Rom 13:1–7 (cf. also 1 Pet 2:13–17 where it is placed in a list of duties as it is here). 'Remind them', an expression also used in 2 Tim 2:14, seems to introduce a general instruction for the community as a whole rather than for a particular group.

(3:3–8a) The courtesy which is owed to those outside the church is explained by reference to the experience of each individual in the community before becoming Christian. Usually in the Pastorals lists like this provide a contrast between the behaviour of the opponents and that advocated for believers. Here, on the other hand, the list points up the contrast between the good moral behaviour of members of the community which arises out of sound doctrine and the same people's earlier moral turpitude. The two lists only partly correspond with one another; there are closer links with similar lists in Eph 2:2; 5:8; 1 Cor 6:11. So it is clear that lists of 'before and after' behaviour were becoming a commonplace of Christian preaching. The use of the metaphor of slavery to sin is familiar from Paul (e.g. Rom 6:6).

(3:4–8a) describes the means by which this change has come about for believers. This is the final summary of 'sound doctrine' in the epistles, signalled by 'the saying is sure' in v. 8. As always in the Pastorals, the soteriology is theocentric. God is Saviour, and salvation comes not as a reward for good deeds but from God's mercy. The incarnation, not Christ's death, is identified here as the turning-point in salvation history when God's goodness and loving kindness (philanthrōpia, lit. love for human beings) were revealed. The crucifixion is referred to only twice in the Pastorals, as the decisive soteriological moment, in 1 Tim 2:6 and Titus 2:14. The author prefers to balance the first and the future epiphanies to describe God's work of salvation; this passage can be paralleled with 2:11–14 where the future manifestation of Christ completes the process of salvation.

The decisive moment for individuals was baptism, here described as the water of rebirth and renewal; the moment when 'he saved us'. Justification by grace, a truly Pauline idea, is not explained, but like 'saved' in v. 5, the emphasis is on a past event, enabling believers to become 'heirs according to the hope of eternal life'. The process of salvation is not yet complete, but believers can feel certain of their part in it. Paul's understanding of justification is complex, but contrasts faith as the central element of salvation with works of the law. The Pastoral Epistles' emphasis, on the other hand, is on the close relationship between belief in sound doctrine and the good works which follow. The two ideas are not opposed to one another, but are distinctly different.

(3:8b–11) concerns relationships between Titus and members of the community who indulge in controversy and argument. Such behaviour is contrasted with the good works that profit the whole community. That the difficulties are caused by Jewish Christians is suggested by the fact that some of the debates concern the law. Genealogies are also mentioned as a focus of dispute as they were in 1 Tim 1:4. After two attempts at putting them straight, Titus is told to ignore such argumentative people; they are the cause of their own condemnation.

Personal Matters (3:12–16)

Personal details at the end of the book add a final touch of verisimilitude to the fictional situation. Paul hopes that Titus will come to him soon in Nicopolis, a city not mentioned elsewhere in the NT and probably to be understood as the city of Nicopolis in Epirus. Since the city does not appear in Acts and is not mentioned by Paul, any attempt to locate this letter at a particular point in Paul's life as we know it is impossible. Artemas is unknown to us. Tychicus was mentioned in 2 Tim 4:12 and the name appears elsewhere in the NT (Acts 20:4; Eph 6:21; Col 4:7). Zenas the lawyer is unknown but Apollos is known to us from both 1 Corinthians and Acts (1 Cor 1:12; 3:4–6, 22; 4:6; Acts 18:24; 19:1). Perhaps we are to envisage them as the bearers of the Epistle to Titus. They are to be well looked after and perhaps given financial support for their onward journey. Travel in winter was inadvisable, so Paul had decided to spend the winter in Nicopolis. A final injunction to good works precedes the final greeting.

REFERENCES

- Beard, M., North, J. A., and Price, S.R.F. (1998), Religions of Rome (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
 Miller, James D. (1997), The Pastoral Letters as Composite Documents (2 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).

74. Philemon

CRAIG S. WANSINK

INTRODUCTION

A. Paul's Imprisonment. The apostle Paul, according to 1 Clem. 5, 5–6, was 'in chains' seven times. In 2 Cor 11:23, Paul himself boasts of having experienced 'far more imprisonments' than his detractors. Ironically, the one who had formerly imprisoned Christians (cf. Acts 8:3; 22:4; 26:10) frequently found himself incarcerated. During one such experience, he wrote to Philemon and the church that was in his house. Only twenty-five verses long, Paul's letter is replete with rhetorical dissonance, subtlety, and wordplay. The epistle offers little insight into its provenance or dating. Whether it was written in Rome, Ephesus, Philippi, or elsewhere is not of primary concern. Whether it was written towards the end of Paul's life or towards the beginning of his mission is not revealed. Rather, the most salient aspects of the letter are Paul's rhetoric and his imprisonment (cf. vv. 10, 13, 22).

B. Onesimus. 1. Although the figure of Onesimus is not introduced until almost half-way through the letter (in v. 10), the interpretation of this figure has typically framed how the epistle has been approached. Onesimus generally is seen in one of three ways: (1) as a runaway slave (cf. Lohse 1971; R. P. Martin 1974; Caird 1976; Nordling 1991); (2) as an estranged slave, appealing to his owner's friend (amicus domini) (cf. Lampe 1985; Rapske 1991; Bartchy 1992); or (3) as a slave, sent by Philemon, to serve Paul in prison (cf. Knox 1959; Winter 1984; 1987; Wansink 1996).

2. The first two characterizations generally focus on vv. 11, 15, and 18, and, as discussed in the commentary below, tend to undervalue Greek wordplays, conventions of ancient slavery and, particularly, Paul's location (in prison). For a number of additional reasons, it seems unlikely that Onesimus either ran away or was estranged from his master: (1) If Onesimus had run away or faced estrangement, his owner probably would not have known where he was. Here, however, Philemon appears to have known that Onesimus was with Paul (Winter 1987). (2) It seems unreasonable to believe that Onesimus would run away from his master in order to escape into prison.

Such a hypothesis seems to ignore Paul's imprisonment. (3) If Onesimus were estranged from Philemon and in need of reconciliation, his conversion to the Christian faith—under such conditions—could well appear feigned and opportunistic. (4) Although Paul asks that Philemon support Onesimus, he does not request pity or forgiveness on behalf of Onesimus. Onesimus is not presented in any way as remorseful or repentant.

3. It appears that Onesimus neither ran away nor was estranged from his master. Writing from prison, Paul thanks the recipients of the epistle for their support. He sees his relationship with them as similar to that of 'partners'. And when he returns a person who had been with him in prison, he feels justified in asking that this person be received with respect and care. That is the situation in Paul's letter to the Philippians. That is also the situation in Philemon. In Philippians, Epaphroditus was messenger and minister to Paul's needs. He had been sent to Paul by the Philippians, he had served this prisoner on their behalf, and he then returned to his community. Onesimus, similarly, appears to have been sent by Philemon to serve Paul while he was in prison. During this service, however, something unique happened. Onesimus became a Christian and Paul had now found a new colleague in ministry. If the pagan slave Onesimus was sent by his owner to 'refresh' the imprisoned, if he was no runaway looking for quick redemption and forgiveness, generations of Christian interpreters have cheated Onesimus out of the integrity of his faith.

COMMENTARY

Prescript and Thanksgiving (1–7)

(1–3) Prescript The references in vv. 1 and 9 reflect Paul's first written use of the appellation 'prisoner of Christ Jesus' (cf. 2 Tim 1:8; Eph 3:1; 4:1; 3 Cor. 3:1). Some see this expression as reflecting only Paul's presence in prison. Others understand it metaphorically, in the light of triumphal marches (cf. Stuhl-macher 1981) or initiations into mystery cults (cf. Reitzenstein 1978). Most interpreters, however, see Paul's status as 'prisoner' as resulting either 'because of' or 'for the sake of' Christ Jesus (cf. PHILEM 9; PHILEM 23 offers an alternative interpretation). 'Philemon, our beloved brother and fellow worker' (NASB). Ironically, only one other individual in this letter is referred to as 'beloved': Onesimus (in v. 16). 'Co-worker': like the four persons mentioned in v. 24, Philemon is a fellow worker, apparently one who assists the imprisoned apostle. v. 2, 'Apphia': some commentators see her as Philemon's wife. Regardless, she is a Christian (i.e. 'sister'). 'Archippus': the appellation 'fellow-soldier' (cf. Phil 2:25) does not necessarily refer to one who performs a specific task within the church. Because soldiers were well known for their loyalty, the title may represent a character attribute (for other martial imagery, see PHILEM 23). The admonitions to a certain Archippus in Col 4:17 led Knox to ask if Paul's admonitions in Philemon were directed primarily to Archippus (cf. Knox 1959). 'To the church in your house': the earliest Christians gathered and worshipped in private homes (cf. PHILEM 22). v. 3, salutation: 'Grace to you and peace'. To readers of Greek epistles, charis ('grace') would have sounded similar to the typical epistolary greeting chairein ('greetings'; cf. Jas 1:1). Paul thus uses word-play in a way in which his greeting bears theological import. His use of the word 'peace', in the second part of this greeting, probably reflects the typical Hebrew and Aramaic salutation shalom (šālôm).

(4–7) Thanksgiving The thanksgiving establishes the major themes and expectations of the epistle. v. 4, although this letter is addressed to an entire house-church, the Greek makes clear that Paul's thanksgiving is now directed to one individual, presumably Philemon. v. 5, Paul acknowledges that he has heard of Philemon's 'love' and 'faith' towards Jesus and all 'the saints'. In v. 6 Paul expounds on this faith and in v. 7 the love. v. 6, 'I pray that the sharing of your faith may become effective when you perceive all the good that we [other ancient authorities read 'you'] may do for Christ'. The word for 'sharing'—koinōnia—is a technical term frequently associated with commerce in the Graeco-Roman world (cf. Sampley 1980). Cf. v. 17 where Paul more explicitly uses the language of commerce. Paul refers to 'the good' again in v. 14. v. 7, 'joy', a typical catchphrase of Pauline rhetoric in Philippians is frequently used during times of persecution. Paul notes his own joy and comfort in Philemon's love, 'because the hearts (splagchna) of the saints' had been 'refreshed' through Philemon. Here Paul sets the stage for the main concerns in the letter. Similar references reappear in v. 12, where Paul describes Onesimus as his splagchna and in v. 20 where Paul encourages Philemon to 'refresh my heart (splagchna) in Christ'. Note that around the year 110 CE, when the bishop Ignatius was being taken in chains to Rome, he wrote to the Ephesians, thanking them for 'refreshing' him through Crocus and others whom they had sent to be with him while he was a prisoner (cf. Ign. Eph. 2. 1–2) (cf. Wansink 1996).

Body: Paul's Request (8–20)

vv. 8–9, Paul opens his request by acknowledging that although he is 'bold enough' to command Philemon to do his duty, he would rather appeal to him 'on the basis of love' (cf. vv. 5, 7). Paul notes that he makes such an appeal as a 'prēsbutes, and now also as a prisoner of Christ Jesus'. The Greek term prēsbutes has been translated both as 'old man' and as 'ambassador'. When the received text is emended (Lightfoot 1904) or when comparisons are made to 2 Cor 5:19b–20a and Eph 6:20 (cf. Stuhl-macher 1981), this word sometimes is translated as 'ambassador'. However, since Paul has just announced that he would not exploit his authority to give commands (v. 8), referring to himself now as an 'ambassador' would seem contradictory. Furthermore, recent lexical studies emphasize that 'old man' would be the most appropriate translation for this Greek term (cf. Gnilk 1982; Birdsall 1993). Paul, thus, is seeking empathy. He is old and, furthermore, he is in a situation inappropriate for a person of his age: he is a prisoner. These two epithets share at least one key characteristic: both the elderly and the imprisoned were seen as vulnerable and dependent upon others (Hock 1995). 'Prisoner of Christ Jesus': the point seems to be that prisoners were dependent on support from outsiders (cf. v. 13). At the same time, the constellation of military metaphors in this letter points to an even richer meaning for this appellation (cf. PHILEM 23). v. 10, 'Onesimus': literally 'useful' in Greek. In this first reference to Onesimus, Paul is not explicit about how these two came to be together. Apparently Philemon already knew. 'My child': in the Pauline and Deutero-Pauline literature, Onesimus, Titus (Titus 1:4), and Timothy (1 Cor 4:17; Phil 2:22; 1 Tim 1:2, 18; 2 Tim 1:2; 2:1) are the only specific individuals whom Paul refers to as his children. The language, thus, is quite intimate. As in 1 Cor 4:17 and Phil 2:22, here Paul uses the word 'child' in commending to the addressee the one whom Paul, himself, is sending. 'Whose father I have become': Onesimus was converted by the imprisoned apostle. v. 11, by postponing the word 'Onesimus' to the end of v. 10, the Greek highlights the wordplays in v. 11. Immediately we are told that Onesimus was formerly 'useless' (achrēstos) but 'now is useful' (euchrēstos) both to you and to me'. In what respect was Onesimus 'useless' (achrēstos)? It is difficult to know if Paul is using this expression in a literal, figurative, or simply rhetorical sense. The reference to 'Onesimus' as having been 'useless' would have sounded ironic to the original readers of this letter. The wordplay is even more notable when we look at achrēstos in the light of v. 10. Onesimus became a Christian while with Paul. Before Onesimus met Paul he was not a Christian. He was achrīstos (without Christ). In Koine Greek, achrīstos and achrēstos were homophones. Thus, Paul is saying: Before Onesimus was a Christian, he was named Onesimus (or 'useful'). At that time, however, he was not truly useful, because he was achrēstos/achrīstos. Now that he is a Christian, however, he is truly useful (cf. Winter 1987). As Philemon's messenger and minister to Paul, Onesimus would be useful to both persons. v. 12, 'I am sending him, that is, my own heart, back to you.' The Greek verb employed here is frequently used to refer to the return of messengers or envoys. 'My own heart' (cf. PHILEM 7, 20): the Greek word spagchna, translated as 'heart', is also a synonym for the Greek word paīs (child) (cf. Artemidorus, Oneirocritica, I. 44). v. 13, 'I wanted to keep him with me' (Paul wants Philemon to make his own choice; vv. 9, 14, 21), 'so that he might be of service to me in your place'. In prison, Paul would have been dependent on outsiders for food, clothing, the delivering of letters, etc. v. 14, 'I preferred to do nothing without your consent, in order that your good deed might be voluntary'. In v. 6, Paul prays that Philemon might effectively share his faith when he perceives 'all the good that we [the imprisoned?] may do for Christ'. Here Paul expects that Philemon—with free will and this knowledge—will use his goodness appropriately. v. 15, 'Perhaps this is the reason he was separated from you for a while'. Those interpreters who claim that Onesimus was a runaway slave tend to see this verse as Paul's euphemistic handling of a delicate situation (cf. Stöger 1971; Lohse 1971). The Greek word translated as 'separated', however, does not necessarily mean 'ran away'. Slaves were often separated from their owners, conducting business for them, delivering letters, helping others, or simply working where their labour was needed (cf. D. B. Martin 1990). What Paul directly acknowledges is that this separation has resulted in a change in Onesimus' status and how he is to be viewed. v. 16, 'no longer as a slave but more than a slave, a beloved brother'. Onesimus was converted in prison and just as Philemon is referred to as 'beloved' (v. 1), just as he is referred to as Paul's 'brother' (vv. 7, 20), so Onesimus here is referred to as a 'beloved brother'. vv. 17–18, 'If he has wronged you in any way, or owes you anything, charge that to my account.' The 'if' which begins this sentence makes the apodosis hypothetical (cf. C. J. Martin 1992). Onesimus did not necessarily wrong Philemon or owe him anything. At the same time, slavery in the Graeco-Roman world often resulted from personal bankruptcy or need. Under these conditions, individuals were slaves because they were in debt to their masters. Furthermore, even if a slave owed his master nothing, if that slave were to be freed, the owner would expect recompense: he would be reluctant to give away what he considered to be an investment. v. 19, 'I, Paul, am writing (egrapsa) this with my own hand'. The epistolary aorist functions like a signature on a typed letter (cf. Gal 6:11; Col 4:18; 1 Cor 16:21). Paul is serious about this request. 'I say nothing about your owing me even your own self'. Paul apparently was responsible not only for the conversion of Onesimus but also for that of Onesimus' owner. v. 20, 'Yes, brother, let me have this benefit from you in the Lord!' In v. 7, after Paul writes that the hearts of the saints had been refreshed through Philemon, he refers to him as 'brother'. Here, similarly, Paul refers to Philemon as 'brother', and asks that he benefit him by refreshing his heart in Christ. Just as Philemon refreshes 'the hearts of the saints', so he is to refresh Paul. The verse has, however, yet another implication. In v. 12, Paul refers to Onesimus as 'my heart'. Paul's reference to Onesimus in v. 20 hinges on the equation Paul makes in v. 7. Thus, when Paul writes 'let me have this benefit (onaimēn) from you in the Lord', the term onaimēn is not coincidental. In a letter inundated with wordplay, the similarities between onaimēn and Onesimus (onēsīmos) would have been obvious to a Greek-speaking audience. Thus, Philemon here is called upon to refresh both Paul and Onesimus.

Final Prayer, Greetings, and Blessing (21–5)

vv. 21–2, Paul is confident about both Philemon's obedience and his own release from prison. Furthermore, he asks Philemon to prepare lodging for him. House-churches were not only for worship, Christian meetings, and moral instruction, but also for hosting travellers and guests. Just as Paul had prayed for Philemon (cf. PHILEM 4), so he asks that this community pray for him in his imprisonment. Paul employs the second person plural pronoun, clearly emphasizing his relationship with the entire community. v. 23, 'Fellow prisoner'. The Greek sunaiχmalōtos actually means 'fellow prisoner of war'. The term points to more than merely shared imprisonment. When Paul, by implication, refers to himself both as a 'soldier' (cf. PHILEM 2) and as a 'prisoner of war', the implication is that Paul's imprisonment followed naturally from his commitment to Christ Jesus. Like famed Roman soldiers, and like Socrates, Paul and Epaphras refused to desert their posts, regardless if it would lead to imprisonment or death (cf. Knox 1955; Wansink 1996). v. 24, Paul refers to the others with him as 'fellow workers' (cf. PHILEM 1). Of Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, and Luke, the latter figure has provoked the most interest. In 2 Tim 4:11, he is the last person to remain with the imprisoned apostle. In Col 4:14, he is called 'the beloved physician'. Because ancient sources see illness as a terrifying threat faced by the imprisoned, it is interesting to note that each of the references to Luke—the physician—appears only in epistles said to have been written from prison. v. 25, a traditional final greeting.

REFERENCES

- Bartchy, S. S. (1992), 'Philemon, Epistle to', ABD v. 305–10.
- Birdsall, J. N. (1993), 'ΠΙΠΕΣΒΥΤΗΣ in Philemon 9: A Study in Conjectural Emendation', NTS 39: 625–30.
- Caird, G. B. (1976), Paul's Letters from Prison (Oxford: Oxford University Press).
- Gnilka, J. (1982), Der Philemonbrief (Freiburg: Herder).
- Hock, R. F. (1955), 'A Support for His Old Age: Paul's Plea on Behalf of Onesimus', in L. M. White and O. L. Yarbrough (eds.), The Social World of the First Christians: Essays in Honor of Wayne A. Meeks (Minneapolis: Fortress) 67–81.
- Knox, J. (1955), 'Philemon', in G. A. Buttrick (ed.), The Interpreter's Bible (New York: Abingdon), xi. 555–73.
- (1959), Philemon Among the Letters of Paul: A New View of Its Place and Importance (Nashville: Abingdon).
- Lampe, P. (1985), 'Keine "Sklavenflucht" des Onesimus', ZNW 76: 135–7.
- Lightfoot, J. B. (1904), St Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (London: Macmillan).
- Lohse, E. (1971), Colossians and Philemon, trans. W. R. Poehlmann and R. J. Karris, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Martin, C. J. (1992), 'The Rhetorical Function of Commercial Language in Paul's Letter to Philemon (Verse 18)', in D. F. Watson (ed.), Persuasive Artistry: Studies in New Testament Rhetoric in Honor of George A. Kennedy, JSNTSup 50 (Sheffield: JSOT), 321–37.
- Martin, D. B. (1990), Slavery as Salvation: The Metaphor of Slavery in Pauline Christianity (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Martin, R. P. (1974), Colossians and Philemon, NCB (London: Oliphants).
- Nordling, J. G. (1991), 'Onesimus Fugitivus: A Defense of the Run-away Slave Hypothesis in Philemon', JSNT 41: 97–119.
- Rapske, B. M. (1991), 'The Prisoner Paul in the Eyes of Onesimus', NTS 37: 187–203.
- Reitzenstein, R. (1978), Hellenistic Mystery-Religions: Their Basic Ideas and Significance, trans. J. E. Steely (Pittsburgh: Pickwick).
- Sampley, J. P. (1980), Pauline Partnership in Christ: Christian Community and Commitment in Light of Roman Law (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Stöger, A. (1971), The Epistle to Philemon, ed. J. L. McKenzie, trans. M. Dunne (New York: Herder & Herder).
- Stuhlmacher, P. (1981), Der Brief an Philemon, EKKNT (Zürich: Benziger).
- Wansink, C. S. (1996), 'Chained in Christ': The Experience and Rhetoric of Paul's Imprisonments, JSNTSup (Sheffield: JSNT).
- Winter, S. (1984), 'Methodological Observations on a New Interpretation of Paul's Letter to Philemon', Union Seminary Quarterly Review, 35: 3–12.
- (1987), 'Paul's Letter to Philemon', NTS 33: 1–15.

75. Hebrews

HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE

INTRODUCTION

Among the letters attributed to St Paul appears a lengthy work celebrating the person and work of Jesus Christ and encouraging fidelity to his covenant. Although the attribution is certainly secondary, the document is a masterpiece of early Christian homiletics, weaving creative scriptural exegesis with effective exhortation.

A. Authorship. 1. Hebrews does not name its author. A reference to 'our brother Timothy' (13:23) may have occasioned the tradition that Paul composed the work. Differences in style and theology between Hebrews and the assuredly genuine epistles of Paul make that attribution most unlikely. Attempts to preserve some degree of Pauline authorship have centred on ch. 13 and its epistolary conclusion (13:18–25), which some have seen as Paul's endorsement of a collaborator's work. Although the conclusion may be an addition, it coheres with the body of the homily and is probably by the same, non-Pauline, hand.

2. The tradition of Pauline authorship was not uniform. Tertullian, in late second-century North Africa, attributed Hebrews to Barnabas. In second-century Alexandria learned leaders of the Church knew but doubted the attribution to Paul. Clement of Alexandria reconciled popular tradition with literary analysis by suggesting that Paul had dictated the text to a scribe such as Luke or Clement of Rome. In the third century, Origen summarized earlier speculation, agreed that the contents were worthy of Paul, but concluded that 'God only knows' who actually wrote it. More recent scholars have proposed other candidates, including Apollos and Sylvanus. Evidence for any is indecisive and the author remains anonymous.

B. Date. 1. Dating is equally problematic. Suggestions have ranged from the middle to the end of the first century. Some scholars have argued that the lack of an explicit reference to the destruction of the Jerusalem temple, which occurred in 70 CE during the Jewish revolt against Rome, dates the work prior to 70. Yet Jewish authors after 70, including the historian Josephus and the compilers of the Mishnah, refer to the temple and its cultic system as extant. Hopes for restoration remained alive and expressed themselves in terms of the presence of ideal realities. Furthermore, Hebrews refers not to the temple reconstructed by Herod the Great, but to the tabernacle of Scripture. Hebrews is interested in biblical symbolism, not the fate of the cultic site. The condition of the temple is, therefore, irrelevant to dating.

2. While a specific date proves elusive, the general range within which Hebrews was written is clear. The work is certainly known to 1 Clement, an exhortation from the leadership of the church at Rome to Corinth. Although the date of 1 Clement is debated, it is not likely to be later than 110 CE. At the other end of the spectrum, the traditions in Hebrews certainly required time to develop. It is unlikely that they reached their current form before 50 CE. The homily, therefore, was composed in the second half of the first century, probably between 55 and 90 CE.

C. Addressees. The greeting from 'those from Italy' (13:24) suggests that the intended recipients of the work's written form were also 'Italians'. It is possible that they were a community, military or mercantile, located outside the homeland, but it is more likely that they were in Italy itself, where Hebrews is known by the end of the first century. Paul's epistle to the Romans indicates that by approximately 55 CE a Christian congregation flourished in the capital. This community, or some portion of it, could have been the intended recipients of the homily.

D. Genre and Structure. 1. The end of ch. 13 (13:18–25) reads much like a letter and has close parallels with Pauline epistles. The rest of the text differs markedly from the other letters of the New Testament. The conclusion, therefore, was probably designed to transmit the work to a distant audience.

2. As a whole Hebrews is a striking example of rhetoric serving scriptural exegesis. In making God's word effective (1:1–4; 4:12–13) the text revels in human words. It abounds in ornamental devices, including alliteration, anaphora, assonance, chiasm, litotes, paronomasia, and other figures of speech. Hebrews deploys a rich vocabulary, using illustrations and metaphors from various spheres: agriculture (6:7–8), athletics (5:14; 12:1–3), education (5:12–14), law (9:16–17), and seafaring (6:19).

3. Defined as 'word of exhortation' (13:22), Hebrews clearly adapts the homiletic forms of Hellenistic Judaism. The text grounds its exhortations not in general appeals to logic or emotion, but in exposition of an authoritative text. Some sections, e.g. chs. 3 and 4, illustrate formal homiletic patterns built around exposition of a cited text. At the centre of Hebrews a lengthy exposition of the significance of the Day of Atonement reveals a similar structure. A preface summarizes and introduces certain themes (8:1–5). A citation from Jer 31:31–4 follows. The homilist then explores the text in balanced units playing upon several antitheses (9:1–10:10). A summary repeats elements of the scriptural text (10:11–18); a hortatory application follows (10:19–39).

4. Homiletic devices appear in other portions of the work. Stern warnings against the dangers of apostasy punctuate the text (2:1–4; 6:1–20; 10:26–31; 12:14–17; 12:25–9). The catalogue of exemplars of faith in ch. 11 resembles appeals to examples of virtue in Hellenistic moral discourse. Exegetical strategies also vary, from the concatenation of scriptural citations in ch. 1 through the playful reflection on Melchizedek in ch. 7.

5. The interplay of exegesis and exhortation in carefully balanced segments leads to a climactically ordered composition that builds an appeal for renewed faith. That structure may be outlined as follows:

Exordium: The Definitive Word (1:1–4)

Christ Exalted and Humiliated, a Suitable High Priest (1:5–2:18)

A Catena of Scriptural Citations (1:5–14)

Transitional Admonition: To Attend Carefully (2:1–4)

The Subjection and Glorification of the Son (2:5–9)

Christ and his Family (2:10–18)

Christ Faithful and Merciful (3:1–5:10)

A Homily on Faith (3:1–4:11)

Transitional Exhortation: Approach the Merciful High Priest (4:14–16)

The Merciful Christ and the High Priests (5:1–10)

The Priestly Work of Christ (5:11–10:18)

Transitional Admonition (5:11–6:20)

Scriptural Reflection: Christ and Melchizedek (7:1–28)

Scriptural Reflection: Christ's Sacrifice and the New Covenant (8:1–10:18)

Exhortation to Faithful Endurance (10:19–12:13)

Transitional Admonition: Hold Fast to the Faith; Warning and Encouragement (10:19–39)

A Celebration of the Faithful (11:1–12:3)

A Homily on Endurance (12:4–13)

Final Advice about Life in the New Covenant (12:14–13:17)

Transitional Admonition (12:14–17)

Sinai and the Heavenly Jerusalem (12:18–29)

Concluding Exhortations (13:1–17)

Benediction and Epistolary Postscript (13:18–25)

E. The Message of Hebrews. The homily balances exposition and exhortation. The exposition portrays Christ as the cause of the addressees' salvation (2:10; 5:9; 9:14) and the model for their behaviour (12:1–2). The exhortation has two aspects expressed in recurring motifs. On the one hand the homilist urges his addressees to 'hold fast' to what they have, their confession, their partnership with Christ, the virtues that are appropriate to that partnership (3:6; 3:14). He also urges them to 'move' either 'in' towards the Christ who can be for them a source of aid and comfort, or 'out' to 'endure' a world that challenges their commitments and confession (13:13). Warnings alternate with hopeful assurances based on Christ's presence as a sympathetic mediator (4:14–16; 7:23–4). Covenant fidelity requires faith, hope, and charity (10:22–5), but also specific virtues (13:1–17).

COMMENTARY

Exordium: The Definitive Word (1:1–4)

Hebrews begins sonorously, with a ringing evocation of the person at the centre of the theology of the work. Alliteration and assonance mark the opening verse, which builds in a series of balanced clauses to the affirmation of the Son's exalted status. In the process, the homilist sounds several key themes interwoven throughout the homily. v. 1, God's speech of long ago forms the foundation of Hebrews, which will use texts from the Torah, the Prophets, and the psalms to construct its message. The exegesis of those texts aims to make the word of God a vital reality. v. 2, the final and definitive vehicle for God's revelation is the 'Son'. That he has spoken 'in these last days' suggests not merely that he delivered his message recently, but that the context of his speech is the final act in the salvific drama, the imminent divine judgement; cf. 9:28; 10:25; 12:18–29. The note that the Son is 'heir of all things' introduces a recurrent theme (cf. v. 4; 1:14; 3:1; 6:17; 9:15; 12:25–9), among both Hellenistic Jews (e.g. Philo, Quis Heres) and early Christians. The latter expected to be heirs of God's kingdom (e.g., Mt 5:5; 25:35; 1 Cor 6:9–10), immortality or eternal life (Mt 19:29; Mk 10:17; Lk 10:25; 1 Cor 15:50), salvation (1 Pet 1:4–5), or the heavenly city (Rev 21:2–7). The basic structure of the motif resembles Gal 3:23–47, where Christ's status as heir secures the inheritance of his followers. An evocation of Christ's role in creation balances the affirmation of his eschatological status as heir. Like other early Christians (Jn 1:3; 1 Cor 8:6; Rom 11:36; Col 1:16), Hebrews exalts the significance of Jesus by transferring to him attributes of divine Wisdom (Prov 8:22–31). v. 3, Sapiential tradition is transparent in the affirmation that the Son is the 'reflection of God's glory', which echoes Wis 7:26. The description of Christ as the 'imprint of God's very being' juxtaposes a monetary image (charaktēr: 'stamp') and a metaphysical term (hypostasis). The former term parallels affirmations about Christ as the 'image' (eikōn) of the divine (cf. 2 Cor 4:4; Rom 8:29; Col 1:15). The philosophical term reappears at 3:14 and 11:1 with varying connotations. Creation is not the sole venue of the Son's activity. Like the powerful force of divine Wisdom who 'pervades, penetrates and renews' all things (Wis 7:24–7), the Son too 'sustains all things by his powerful word'. The Jewish philosopher and exegete Philo also remarked frequently on the sustaining activity of the Logos or Word of God (Som. 1.241; Quis Heres, 7; Migr. Abr. 6). Such affirmations may underlie Hebrews, although here the divine word is embodied in a human person. The homilist is not concerned with cosmology, but with the way in which the Son sustains a community struggling to be faithful (cf. 4:14–16; 12:1–2). The heart of the Son's activity is his sacrificial death, whereby he effected 'purification for sins'. This phrase adumbrates the complex theme of Christ's priestly action that will dominate the central chapters (8:1–10:18, esp. 9:13–14, 26). Of equal structural significance is the picture of the Son's session 'at the right hand'. The image derives from Ps 110:1, the celebration of the enthronement of an Israelite king. Inspired by Jewish literature portraying the exaltation of the persecuted righteous (e.g. 1 Enoch 45:3; 79:27–9; T. Levi 2–5; Wis 2:4–5), early Christians regularly affirmed God's vindication of Christ in terms of his exaltation, using Ps 110:1 to refer to that event (Mt 22:44; Acts 2:34–5; Eph 1:20; 1 Pet 3:22). The Psalm's imagery reappears at key points in Hebrews (1:14; 8:1; 10:12; 12:2), articulating its structure and advancing the heavenly status of the Son as a ground for hope. Unlike other early Christian texts, Hebrews also uses another verse from the Psalm to establish a relationship between Christ and Melchizedek (cf. Ps 110:4 at 5:6; 6:20; 7:1–28). v. 4, the affirmation that the Son is 'superior to the angels' has been construed as polemic against Christians or Jews who accorded too high a status to angels or against Christians who considered the exalted Christ an angel. Hebrews offers no evidence of such polemical concerns elsewhere. The remark stands in continuity with the scenario of exaltation, in which a status higher than the angels is common (cf. Phil 2:9–10; Col 1:15–18; Eph 1:21; 1 Pet 3:22). The phrase affords a transition to the collection of citations about the exalted one in v. 5. The exordium ends with an argument about Christ's 'inherited' name. To obtain a special name is also part of a process of exaltation (cf. Phil 2:9; 3 Enoch 12:15; Philo, Conf. Ling. 146). Though not specified, the name is certainly 'Son', a title that begins the following catena and plays a role in the contrast between Christ and Moses (3:6). The imagery of 'inheritance' associated with the moment of glorification stands in tension with the affirmation of the Son's role in creation. The homilist has not systematized his Christological traditions but has interwoven two formally distinct models in his affirmation of Christ's heavenly status.

Christ Exalted and Humiliated, a Suitable High Priest
(1:5–2:18)

(1:5–14) A Catena of Scriptural Citations The rest of the chapter consists of citations from Scripture, primarily the Psalms.

Formally, the chapter resembles collections of citations made by members of the sectarian community at Qumran (4QFlor; 4QTestim). Like such collections, this catena applies scriptural verses to a contemporary situation. The catena in its entirety exalts the Son, arguing that he is superior to beings assumed to be of high status, the angels. v. 5, the rhetorical question introducing Ps 2:7 links the catena with the exordium and, with the reference to the angels in v. 14, frames the catena. The artificial connection between the frame and the contents suggests that, at least in part, the collection derives from a traditional florilegium serving catechetical or apologetic needs. The first text cited, Ps 2:7, which reappears at 5:5, is linked with 2 Sam 7:14, a combination attested in the Dead Sea scrolls (cf. 4QFlor 1.10–11 and 18–19). Both texts originally expressed Israel's royal ideology, according to which the king, at his accession ('today'), became God's adopted son. 2 Sam 7:14 is part of Nathan's oracle, promising YHWH's fidelity to David's household. Early Christians linked Ps 2:7 with Christ's baptism (Mt 3:16–17; Mk 1:10–11; Lk 3:21–2) and exaltation (Acts 13:33–4). 2 Sam 7:14 applies to believers, not Christ, at 2 Cor 6:18 and Rev 21:7. v. 6, the introduction of this verse has raised difficulties. The most natural reading suggests that the homilist construes the verse to be a call to angels to worship the Son at his birth. Some scholars refer 'the world' to the supernal or heavenly realm. Others take the adverb 'again' temporally and construe the event to be Christ's parousia. The adverb in this context has no temporal sense, but simply links verses in the catena (cf. v. 5; 2:13). The homilist apparently has appropriated a florilegium focused on the eschatological exaltation of Jesus and reinterpreted it within the framework of his understanding of Christ as the agent of creation as well as redemption (1:2–3). The text focuses on the lofty status of the Son, so high that even the angels must worship him even when he enters the cosmos. v. 7, the next verse refers not to Christ but to the angels with whom he is compared. Ps 104:4 originally hymned the power of God who makes even winds and fire instruments of his word. The homilist exploits the grammatical ambiguity of the Greek translation to construe the text to mean that God can make his angels mere winds and his other, presumably supernatural, servants mere flames. vv. 8–9, the image of mutable angels contrasts with the vision of eternal stability in Ps 45:6–7, which originally praised the majesty of the Israelite king at his wedding. The psalm glorified the monarch for his righteousness and claimed that this quality distinguished him from other kings. Hebrews takes the 'companions' of the Son to be other members of the divine realm, or angels, to whom Jesus, because of his 'anointing' as heavenly priest, is superior. His throne, the locus of his authority, is also eternal (cf. 4:16). The ambiguity of the addressee proved attractive to the homilist. The first verse could be construed to say that the king's throne, or foundation of his authority, is God. Alternatively, 'God' could be taken as a vocative, a title of majesty applied to the Son. Similar ambiguity surfaces in v. 9, which could be read as 'O God, your God has anointed you'. Although Hebrews does not otherwise use the title 'God' for the Son, the ambiguity here was probably intentional. The Son who is the 'stamp of God's very being' (1:3) could well be styled 'God'. vv. 10–12, the next citation derives from Ps 102:25–8, a lament contrasting the pitiable state of the sup-plicant with the Creator's majesty. Unlike the ambiguous vocative, 'O God', in the previous citation, the divine name 'Lord' is clearly a vocative in the first verse of this psalm. The psalm originally addressed YHWH; the homilist, who believes the Son to be involved in creation (1:2–3) applies the title to him. The remainder of the psalm evokes the assuring images of stability associated with the Son (cf. 6:18–19; 7:21–4; 13:8). v. 13, the catena closes with an explicit citation of Ps 110:1, forming an inclusio with the exordium (1:3). v. 14, the concluding comment recalls the language of Ps 104, cited in v. 7. Angels merely serve the heirs, who share the Son's inheritance (1:2, 4).

(2:1–4) Transitional Admonition: To Attend Carefully The first of several warning passages interrupts the exposition of Scripture, which continues in 2:5–9. The exhortation shifts focus and tone. Previously Hebrews had emphasized the heavenly status of the Son; the text now highlights Christ's participation in suffering humanity. v. 1, the warning not to 'drift away' bespeaks anxiety about defection from the community that pervades the warning passages (cf. 6:4; 10:25, 29; 12:17, 25). Whatever the external factors, such as persecution (10:32–4), the image of casual drifting suggests that lassitude or indifference was perceived to be part of the addressees' problem; cf. 12:12–13. vv. 2–3, Hebrews regularly uses the threat of punishment as part of its exhortation to renewed fidelity. The 'message declared through angels' is the Torah itself. Scripture does not ascribe such a role to angels, although Ps 68:18 intimates their presence at Sinai. Later Jewish tradition does, however, accord a role to angels in delivering the Torah (cf. Jub. 1:27–9; 50:1–13; Jos. Ant. 15:126). The question 'how can we escape?' implies an a fortiori argument. Here the contrasting parts of the analogy are the ancient Hebrews, warned by angels about the consequences of transgression, and contemporary Christians. The chronological progression of the proclamation, from the Lord, to his followers, then to contemporaries, may reflect traditional formulations about the spread of the gospel (cf. Acts 10:36–9). v. 4, the description of contemporary reality in terms of 'signs, wonders and miracles', based upon OT accounts (Deut 4:34; Ps 135:9; Jer 32:20–1), recalls Christian experience (e.g. Mt 11:20; Mk 6:4; 1 Cor 12:10; Gal 3:5). That displays of power confirm the gospel is an apologetic commonplace (Mk 16:20; Acts 3:1–10; 14:3–11).

(2:5–9) The Subjection and Glorification of the Son The text at the centre of the next section, Ps 8:4–6, exhibits thematic connections to the scriptural catena of the first chapter. It may have been part of a traditional catena on which our homilist based his exposition. He subjects the verse to a Christological reading in terms of the incarnation and suffering of the Son. v. 5, the introductory comment continues the contrast between Son and angels. Its reference to the 'world to come' reinforces the notions of imminent judgement and cosmic transformation intimated by Ps 102, cited at 1:10–12. vv. 6–8a, the studied imprecision of the citation formula ('someone . . . somewhere') is paralleled in first-century Jewish interpreters (Philo, Ebr. 61; Deus Imm. 74). Ps 8 praises God's powerful majesty and questions the significance of humanity in the face of the divine glory ('What are human beings . . .?'). The psalmist responds to his query by affirming the lofty status of humankind, made 'a little lower than the angels', thus 'crowned . . . with glory and honour' and set in a position of dominion with 'all things under their feet'. Thus the psalm finally celebrates humanity's status in the created order. The citation omits one clause from the original, 'You have set him over the works of your hands'. The verse, focusing on the present world, might have made the homilist's rereading more difficult. The NRSV captures the psalm's original sense, but obscures the basis for the homilist's interpretation. In Greek the psalm reads: 'What is man that you are mindful of him or the son of man that you care for him?' In v. 7 the psalmist's response uses the singular pronoun in referring generically to the human beings to whom all things are subject. vv. 8b–9, by exploiting ambiguities in the text, the homilist construes the primary referent of the passage to be not humankind in general but Christ. He may or may not know of the attribution of the title 'Son of Man', connected with Dan 7:13, to Jesus (cf. e.g. Mt 8:20; 12:40; 24:27 and parallels; Jn 1:51; 12:23; Acts 7:56). He does interpret the singular nouns 'man' and 'son of man' in the first verse to refer to an individual, not a collectivity. He interprets the psalmist's response in v. 7 not as parallel affirmations of the exalted status of all humans, but as a brief synopsis of Christ's story. Finally, he construes the adverbial phrase, 'a little bit', in v. 7 as temporal ('for a little while'), not qualitative. His first comment in v. 8 treats the notion of subjection. He continues to use the singular, not specifying its antecedent, but noting that, contrary to the absolute phrasing of the psalm, 'all things' have not been brought into subjection 'to him' (not 'to them' as in the NRSV). The subjection envisioned is apparently the subordination of Messiah's enemies promised by Ps 110 (cf. 1:13). The final eschatological victory remains to be achieved, as in 1 Cor 15:27. In the interim what can be seen, at least with the eyes of faith, is Jesus, whose human name appears for the first time. The homilist refers to Jesus with phrases from the psalm, applying 'for a little while made lower than the angels' to his incarnation and 'crowned . . . with glory and honour' to his exaltation. These phrases frame the note that the exaltation took place 'because of the suffering of death'. He concludes by recognizing that Jesus' death was for others. The biblical expression 'tasted' death (Isa 51:17; 4 Ezra 6:16; Mt 16:28; Jn 8:52) refers to death's bitter reality. For the phrase 'by the grace of God' some MSS and patristic citations read 'apart from God', which could evoke the forlorn cry of Jesus on the cross (Mt 27:46; Mk 15:34), but this understanding conflicts with 5:7 which describes God as hearing the prayers of Jesus. The phrase was probably a marginal gloss, inspired by 1 Cor 15:27, noting that God is not among things subjected to the Messiah.

(2:10–18) Christ and his Family The note in v. 9 that Christ tasted death for all foreshadows this section, which describes the salvific effects of Christ's death and explicitly introduces the title 'high priest'. v. 10, concern about what is 'fitting' to say of God is common in Hellenistic theology (cf. Ps.-Arist. De Mundo, 397b; Plut. De Is. et Os. 78, 383A). The emphasis of such theology on the loftiness of the divine suits the designation of God as Creator 'for whom and through whom all things exist'. The homilist, however, focuses on the appropriate relationship between means and end in the salvific process. God's purpose to bring 'many children [lit. sons] to glory' may reflect the original meaning of Ps 8, cited in vv. 6–7. The divine plan clearly involves participation by Christ's followers as fellow heirs in his eschatological rule; cf. 1:13–14. 'Pioneer' describes the agent of glorification, the one who has already been glorified (cf. 2:8–9). The relatively rare epithet (Gk. archēgos, lit. fore-leader) appears in Acts 3:15; 5:31, and Heb 12:2. Both attestations in Hebrews involve untranslatable wordplays. The term here suggests Christ's role as the path-breaker on the way to heavenly glory (cf. 'forerunner' at 6:20). What is fitting is God's making this agent 'perfect through suffering'. Hebrews develops the notion of perfection in complex ways. Applied to Christ, it refers to the way in which he is made fit to fulfil his duties as a special kind of priest (cf. 5:8–10; 7:28). In that office he is able to bring perfection to his followers (9:9; 10:14; 11:40; 12:2, 23). The key to Christ's perfection is his experience of suffering that renders him compassionate and sympathetic (2:17–18; 5:9). v. 11, what binds the Son to his siblings is not simply physical kinship but sanctity. The cultic language hints at the theme of Christ's priesthood and the effects attributed to his sacrificial death (cf. 9:13–14; 10:1–2, 10, 14; 13:12). There is ambiguity in the formulation of the unity between sanctifier and sanctified, which the NRSV resolves with the translation 'have one Father'. The Greek states simply 'are all of one'. While other interpretations of the 'one' are possible (e.g. Adam, Abraham), the resolution is appropriate in this context which had just pointed to God, the source and goal of all (2:10). Hebrews has thus applied to the Christian community the kind of expression of solidarity often found in Jewish sources (e.g. Philo, On Virtues, 79). Because of their spiritual relationship, Jesus can address his followers with familial language. v. 12, Ps 22:22, construed as a remark of Jesus, provides evidence for his relationship to his followers. The citation reflects the early church use of kinship categories for the community of faith (e.g. Rom 1:13; 16:4; Acts 1:15). The only other saying attributed to Christ in Hebrews, at 10:5–7, is also a citation from the Psalms. Ps 22, a prayer of supplication in time of distress, is prominent in the passion narratives (Mt 27:35, 39, 43, 46, and par.; Lk 23:35; Jn 19:24). The homilist may evoke such texts here, but he focuses on a verse not cited elsewhere. As a simple proof text, Ps 22:2 establishes that the speaker, presumed to be the Messiah, preaches to his 'brothers and sisters'. The second clause indicates that the status of children of God is a matter of 'the congregation'. The Greek term ekklesia, used again at Heb 12:23, is the common designation for the Christian assembly. v. 13, two more scriptural verses support the solidarity of Christ and his followers. They probably derive from Isa 8:17–18, although the first also resembles 2 Sam 22:3 and Isa 12:2. The separation between the verses highlights the notion of 'trust' in the first. The attitude attributed to the 'pioneer' foreshadows the complex notion of faith that Christ and his followers are meant to share (11:1–12:3). v. 14, attention shifts from the relationship between Christ and his followers to the act establishing that relationship. The fact that Jesus fully shares in 'flesh and blood' exemplifies the insistence of Hebrews on Christ's full humanity (cf. 2:17; 5:7–10; 12:1–4). Depiction of Christ's death as a struggle against 'the one who has the power of death . . . the devil', evokes an ancient mythical theme. In Jewish apocalyptic sources it comes to expression as the Messiah's victory over demonic forces (As. Mos. 10:1; T. Levi 18:2; 1 Enoch 10:13; 2 Esd 13:1; 1QM 1:11–17). Early Christian texts apply the scheme to Jesus, who conquers the diabolical world (Mt 12:25–30; Lk 10:18; Jn 12:31; 14:30; 16:11; 1 Jn 3:8; Rev 12:7–10), or more specifically death (1 Cor 15:26, 55; 2 Tim 1:10; Rev 20:14; 21:4; Od. Sol. 15:9; 29:4). v. 15, the liberating result of Christ's combat with the devil resembles the key episode in the myths of heroes such as Orpheus or Heracles who descend to the underworld to free death's captives. The homilist was no doubt familiar with such myths and their metaphorical applications, where a major theme is the 'fear of death', often seen to be a basic human problem (Eur. Or. 1522; Lucr. De rerum naturâ, 1.102–26; Epict. Diss. 1.17.25). The Stoic philosopher and dramatist Seneca, for example, portrayed the story of Heracles as a model of liberation from the fear of death (Herc. Furens 858–92; cf. Herc. Oetaeus 1434–40, 1557–9, 1940–88). For Hebrews, it is not Stoic acceptance of death, but assured hope in heavenly glory that effects liberation. v. 16, a parenthetical remark concludes the theme of Christ and the angels that framed the scriptural catena of the first chapter. Christ's action in 'coming to help' (lit. grab hold of) continues the imagery of the hero's quest to free death's captives. The object of the hero's attention are the 'descendants [lit. seed] of Abraham'. This group includes not only the physical descendants of Abraham among whom Jesus lived but also those who stand in the tradition of Abraham's faith, the heirs of God's promises (cf. 6:13–17; 11:8–19). Hebrews thus shares an early Christian claim to be the true seed of Abraham; cf. Lk 1:55; Gal 3:8–9, 29; 4:28–31; Rom 4:1–25; Jn 8:33. v. 17, the reflection on the 'fittingness' of God's action concludes with a summary involving important Christological themes. The affirmation that Jesus was 'like his brothers and sisters in every respect' will later (4:15) be modified, but the insistence on his humanity remains constant. His human experience qualifies Jesus for his office of 'high priest'. The title appears for the first time, although the exordium (1:3) alluded to it. The character of Christ's priestly office and ministry stands at the heart of Hebrews (chs. 7–10). The 'merciful' character of this high priest comes to expression in his intercessory function (4:14–16; 7:25). The fact that he is 'faithful' serves as the starting-point of the homily on fidelity in the next chapter. Both attributes have a pastoral function. Christ's mercy grounds Christian hope; his fidelity inspires those facing difficulty (cf. 12:1–2). v. 18, the point that Christ, because tested, is able to aid, reappears at 4:14; 5:7–8; 12:1–2. It is clear that the 'perfection' of Christ, mentioned at 2:10, involves the qualities that make Christ the high priest that he is.

Christ Faithful and Merciful (3:1–5:10)

(3:1–4:11) A Homily on Faith

(3:1–6) Moses and Jesus as Examples of Faith From 3:1 through 4:13 a homiletic reflection focuses on the need for continued fidelity. Prior to the citation of a text to be interpreted, a preface introduces the theme, contrasting two examples, Moses, the servant (3:5), and Christ, the Son (3:6). The contrast exalts Jesus, as do other comparisons of the first several chapters; yet it contains an ironic note. The exalted status of Son requires greater fidelity because with it comes greater testing, as ch. 12 will argue. The assumption that God's children will be exposed to special testing is an explicit part of the homily that follows. v. 1, the description of the addressees as 'partners' (Gk. metochoi) involves a term applied to the angelic 'companions' of the Son at 1:9. Etymologically it is related to the verb 'to share' (metechain), used for Christ's participation in human physical characteristics (2:10). His true companions are his 'brothers and sisters' (2:10–14) who 'share' in the Holy Spirit (6:4). Their participation in things 'heavenly' (cf. 6:4; 8:5; 9:23; 11:16; 12:22) is not an irrefragable guarantee but is contingent on their response to the 'calling'. Hence the following exhortation is necessary. The description of Jesus as high priest continues the theme introduced at 2:17. The unusual epithet 'apostle' applies to Christ only here in the NT. It suggests the common notion of Jesus as 'one sent' from God; cf. Mk 9:37; Mt 10:40; 15:24; Lk 10:16; Gal 4:4; Jn 3:17, 34 and frequently. The title also evokes the image of the hero sent to release death's captives (2:10–16). The 'confession' (cf. 4:14; 10:23) may refer to fixed liturgical formulations but probably encompasses the general content of the community's faith.

v. 2, Hebrews compares Moses and Jesus on the basis of Num 12:7, where YHWH confirms the position of Moses as leader of the Israelites when Aaron and Miriam had murmured against him. The original Hebrew affirmed that Moses was 'entrusted' with all of God's 'house', that he was, in effect, the chief steward of the people of Israel. The Greek translation can be understood as a statement about the faithfulness of Moses. v. 3, the homilist plays with the term 'house', drawing an analogy between a house and its builder and Moses and Jesus. The analogy is inexact; Jesus is not said to be the builder of Moses. Nor is he said to be the builder of the house. v. 4, lest there be any misunderstanding, the homilist indicates clearly that the builder of the house of which he speaks is God, earlier described as the Creator of all (2:10). Despite the clarification, the analogy associates Jesus, to whom divine titles can be applied (1:8, 10), with the Creator. v. 5, the homilist cites again Num 12:7 in order to specify the distinction between Jesus and Moses. In Num, YHWH had contrasted other prophets to whom he communicated in visions and dreams with 'his servant' Moses, to whom he spoke face to face. Thus 'servant' was a title of honour, indicating the unique status of Moses. The notice indicating what the service involves, 'testimony to things that would be spoken', relegates Moses to a function analogous to that of the angels (1:14). v. 6, Hebrews recontextualizes the passage from Numbers by reflecting on the categories appropriate to a household. The homilist contrasts the title 'servant' to the designation 'Son', which Scripture had attested for Jesus (1:5). In the process he introduces the title 'Christ'. The contrast between children and servants, used by other early Christian authors (Gal 4:1–7; Jn 8:35), may be a rhetorical commonplace. The homilist embellishes the contrast by indicating the relationship of the Son to the household. Unlike a servant 'within' the household, the Son is 'over' it, a position appropriate to his exalted status (1:3, 13; 2:7). The household itself is not, as Numbers originally suggested, the people of Israel, but 'we', the brothers and sisters whom Jesus leads to glory (2:10–13). Membership in the household is conditional on maintaining a strong identity with the people of God, expressed by two virtues. The term for the first, translated 'confidence' by the NRSV, connotes more than a subjective psychological state. It is a confident self-assurance that issues in a bold 'freedom of speech', manifested in prayer (4:16; 10:19; for this sense of the word, cf. 1 Jn 3:21; Eph 3:12) and in public confession (10:35; cf. Mk 8:32; Jn 7:13; Phil 1:20; Eph 6:19). The second, translated 'the pride that belong(s) to hope' by the NRSV, also connotes external behaviour. The homilist calls upon his addressees to 'boast' about their hopes, as did other early Christian leaders (Rom 5:2; 2 Cor 3:12; 11:30; 12:9; Jas 1:9; 4:16). He will continually insist on the importance of hope (6:11; 7:19; 10:23; 11:1).

(3:7–11) The Text for a Homily: Psalm 95 The homilist now cites Ps 95:7–11, the final portion of a hymn praising YHWH's power and inviting the worshipper to attend to the divine command. The psalmist's application of the experience of the Exodus to his own day involves a typological use of Scripture common in the OT (cf. Isa 41:17; 42:9; 43:16–21; Hos 2:16–20), post-biblical Judaism (Sir 16:10; CD 3:7–9), and early Christianity (cf. Mk 6:34; Jn 6:30–1; 1 Cor 5:7; Acts 7:17–53). The Israelites of the Exodus generation, in fact, constituted a standard negative example that could be adapted to specific homiletic contexts, as at 1 Cor 10:1–22. v. 7, the notion that the Holy Spirit is the source of Scripture (also at 9:8; 10:15) is no doubt traditional; cf. Acts 28:25; 1 Clem. 13:1; 16:2. The initial word of the citation, 'Today', calls for an actualization of the scriptural experience in the lives of the people of Israel. The homilist, following the psalmist's lead, applies the psalm's message to his addressees (4:7, 11). v. 8, the psalmist recalls the rebellion of the Exodus generation at Meribah and Massah (Ex 17:7; Num 20:1–13; Deut 6:16; 9:22; 33:8). The Greek translates these place names etymologically as 'rebellion' and day 'of testing'. v. 10, the traditional versification of Hebrews follows that of the original psalm, which associates the period of forty years with God's wrath against the Exodus generation (cf. 3:17). The divine displeasure was thus limited to that period. Our homilist inserts a particle 'therefore' that, in effect, repunctuates the psalm. He associates the 'forty years' with the period during which the Israelites tested God, as described in v. 9. v. 11, divine oaths are of special significance; cf. 6:13–20; 7:20–2. The term 'rest' in the original psalm referred to the 'resting place' of the land of Canaan; the homilist will suggest another understanding at 4:1–11.

(3:12–4:11) Homiletic Exegesis: Let Us Enter God's Rest The application of the psalm develops in three balanced segments, 3:12–19; 4:1–5; 4:6–11, each of which features a verse from the psalm. The whole aims to show that the threat and the promise contained in the text apply to the situation of the addressees. v. 12, the summons to 'Take care' is common in the NT; cf. Mt 24:4; Acts 13:40; 1 Cor 10:18; Col. 2:8; Heb 12:25. The danger against which the homilist warns involves fundamental attitudes and commitments. The translation 'unbelieving heart' puts the emphasis on belief. The phrase would be better rendered 'faithless heart', suggesting a concern with infidelity in a broader sense. The homilist specifies the danger by warning against 'turning away' from God. This warning involves a wordplay in the Greek between 'faithless' (apistias) and 'turn away' (apostenai). The example of the rebellion in the desert recorded in Num 14 inspires the connection. The description of God as 'living' is a traditional one (cf. Deut 5:26) that reappears at Heb 9:14; 10:31; 12:22. v. 13, the homilist sounds a more positive note, using a verb, 'to exhort one another', related to the description of his own work at 13:22; cf. also 12:5. The conceit that the 'today' of the psalm is the present of the homilist reappears at 4:7. The description of the danger as the 'deceit of sin' is another traditional motif; cf. Rom 7:11; 2 Thess 2:10; and 2 Cor 11:3, which alludes to Gen 3:13. v. 14, the verse recalls emphases of the introduction to the homily. For the term 'partners', see 3:1. The homilist had insisted on the conditional character of the partnership with Christ at 3:6. As the virtues recommended at 3:6 involved active behaviour, so too the homilist here calls for something more than a subjective attitude. The noun translated 'confidence' by the NRSV could be translated 'resolution', the stance appropriate for soldiers confronting an enemy. The word is also the same as that used for the 'being' of God at 1:3 and may subtly call upon the addressees to hold fast to the divine reality which they have experienced in Christ; cf. 11:1. v. 15, the homilist cites again the first verse of the psalm. The connective 'as it is said' obscures the relationship of the citation to the immediate context. The phrase should be translated 'by saying' and refers to the way in which the addressees are called upon to exhort one another in v. 13. v. 16, the homilist probes the application of the text with a series of questions, each of which uses a phrase of the psalm, a technique frequently exemplified in Philo's exegesis (e.g. Quis Heres, 115, 260–1; Spec. Leg. 3.25). These questions direct attention to the details of the failure of the ancient Israelites. The response that 'all who left Egypt' were at fault may recall YHWH's comment to Moses at Num 14:22, although that comment had allowed some exceptions. v. 17, using the psalm's traditional association of forty years with the period of wrath (cf. Num 14:33, 34), the homilist asks again at whom the wrath was directed. That the bodies of the sinners fell in the desert alludes to Num 14:33 and conjures up an image of judgement. v. 18, at Num 14:43 Moses had addressed the Israelites as people 'disobedient to the Lord'. v. 19, the series of questions concludes with an observation that draws the first portion of the homily to a climactic close. The translation of the NRSV, attributing the failure of the desert generation to 'unbelief', is too restrictive. As the allusions to Num 14 in the previous verses make clear, the problem is portrayed as disobedient 'infidelity'. Whatever the attitudes and behaviours of the addressees may have been, Hebrews portrays the danger confronting them in stark terms.

4:1, attention now shifts to the 'rest' promised in the last verse of the psalm. A warning continues the monitory tone of the last verse and introduces the notion that the 'rest' remains available in the present. The suggestion that the rest is 'promised' introduces a theme that recurs through the rest of the text (6:12, 15, 17; 7:6; 8:6; 9:15; 10:36; 11:9, 13, 17, 33, 39). v. 2, the homilist again emphasizes the continuity between the revelation of old and that of his own day, while highlighting the importance of a faithful response. The term 'good news' (euaggelion) plays on the Greek word for 'promise' (epaggelia) in the previous verse. The 'good news' announces a message of hope for the fulfilment of God's promises. The phrase 'the message they heard' (lit. the word of hearing) recalls a Pauline phrase for the gospel (cf. 1 Thess 2:13). It emphasizes the notion of oral communication explicit in the psalm's opening verse. For the notion that members of God's people from the past may be 'united by faith' with the eschatological community, see 11:39–40. While members of the faithless desert generation were not so united, those who are faithful will share in the promised inheritance. v. 3, the next comment indicates who deserves to inherit the divine rest, the 'we' of the homilist's own community. To reinforce that point, he cites the last verse of the psalm, contrasting the 'they' of the desert generation with the 'us' of his community. The problem remains of how the promise of a divine rest is available to contemporaries, particularly if the rest envisioned by Scripture is the 'resting place' or homeland of Canaan. The homilist hints at his solution by noting that the divine 'works' were 'finished at the foundation of the world'. v. 4, the homilist now explains the relevance of the allusion to Genesis. With a comment that the Author of Scripture once spoke about the 'seventh day', the homilist cites Gen 2:2, which reports that God himself rested after completing the work of creation. For our homilist, this verse thus interprets the significance of the phrase 'my rest' in Ps 95:11. v. 5, lest there be any doubt about the connection, the homilist cites again the relevant verse of the psalm. His interpretation exemplifies the rabbinic technique gezera shewa, which draws together two passages linked by a common word. At its simplest, this technique interpreted an ambiguous word in one context by its clear meaning in another. The technique could also link passages whose themes or motifs might be mutually illuminating. Such is the use of the technique in this context. The homilist suggests that 'God's rest' mentioned in the psalm is not something earthly but is a place or state into which God himself entered at the time of creation. Hence, to focus on the land of Canaan as the resting place of the people of God is erroneous.

4:6, the homilist now moves into his final stage of explication of the scriptural text, summarizing the force of the argument thus far. 'Disobedience' prevented the original recipients of the divine promise from attaining it. The promise, therefore, remains open. v. 7, a citation of the first verse of the psalm introduces a historical argument reinforcing the point that the promise was not fulfilled by entry into Canaan. As tradition indicates, 'David' was the author of the psalm. v. 8, the homilist draws an inference. Since David was subsequent to Joshua, he could not have called for faithful attendance upon God's word, and the consequent receipt of the divine promise, if that promise had been fulfilled in Joshua's day. The evocation of Moses' successor, whose name is the same as that of Jesus, may suggest another comparison between the 'pioneer' (2:10) of the new covenant and a counterpart of old, but the comparison is not developed. v. 9, in drawing his conclusion that a promised rest remains available to his own community, the homilist returns to his gezera shewa argument in vv. 4 and 5. The link between Ps 95:11 and Gen 2:2 suggested that the promised rest was connected with God's rest on the primordial sabbath. The specific term 'sabbath rest' appears here for the first time in Greek literature. It evokes not simply repose, but the joyous observance of the day characteristic of Jewish tradition. v. 10, nonetheless, entry into that state follows the cessation of labour. This portion of the homily suggests that the 'labours' confronting the addressees involve struggle against the temptation to rebel or go astray. Later portions of the homily will suggest that active external oppression (cf. 10:32–9; 12:1–4; 13:13) is also involved. v. 11, rest is finally to be achieved in the festive presence of God, in that 'heavenly city' to which the faithful aim (11:13–16; 12:21–3; 13:14). The exhortation closes with a reference to the negative example of disobedience provided by the desert generation.

(4:12–13) Concluding Reflection: The Power of God's Word A brief poetic flourish reinforces the homiletic warning developed since 3:1. It focuses on the word of God that came to expression in the text of the psalm and in the homilist's exposition. It also draws to a close the theme of God's speech that runs through the first several chapters (cf. 1:1; 2:2, 6, 12). Church fathers and some modern commentators interpret this passage as a reference to Christ and the Word of God, a title used of Christ in Jn 1:1–14, but the passage does not have such a precise focus. v. 12, the homilist relies on traditional imagery as he personifies the word of God as something 'living and active'. God's word had often been seen as the instrument of divine creative (cf. Gen 1:3; Ps 33:9; Isa 55:11; Sir 42:15; Wis 9:1) and judgemental (Amos 1:2; Jer 7:1–3) activity. Such language invites personification, which could become elaborate, as at Wis 18:14–16, where the divine word is a warrior, bearing a sharp sword against the Egyptians. The comparison to a 'two-edged sword' is rooted in poetic comparison of the tongue to a sword (cf. Isa 49:2; Ps 57:4). The word issuing from the tongue could be similarly described. The Jewish exegete and philosopher Philo exploits the image extensively, interpreting various biblical swords as symbols of the divine Logos ('Word' or 'Reason'). Thus in De Cherubim, 38, he finds the 'flaming sword' of Gen 3:4 as the word uniting God's goodness and royal power and, in Quis Heres, 130–2, 234–6, he introduces the divine Logos as a cosmic principle accessible to the human reason through logical analysis. Christians used the image of the divine word as a sword in hortatory (Eph 6:17) and eschatological contexts (Rev 1:16; 2:12; 19:15). Hebrews emphasizes the judgemental function of the divine word and the one from whom it issues. Imagery of the innermost portions of the human person, both spiritual ('soul' and 'spirit') and physical ('joints' and 'marrow') suggest how penetrating the word can be. The two pairs are meant to be evocative, not precisely definitive of the components of the human self. The key point is that the word is critical or 'able to judge' the workings of the human heart. v. 13, the personification intensifies as the word becomes the Judge. That no creature is 'hidden' before God is a commonplace for Graeco-Roman philosophers (e.g. Epict. Diss. 2.14.11; Marc. Aur. Medit. 12.2), for Jews (Jer 11:20; 1 Enoch 9:5; Ep. Arist. 132–3; Sib. Or. 8.282–5; Philo, Abr. 104; Cher. 96), and for early Christians (1 Cor 4:5; 1 Thess 2:4; Rom 8:27). The description of all as 'naked and laid bare' involves colourful language, used of a wrestling hold and of a sacrifice, where a victim's neck would be 'laid bare' to the priest's knife. The concluding remark that it is to this judge that we must 'render an account' involves one more verbal play on the Greek logos, which means both 'word' and 'account'.

(4:14–16) Transitional Exhortation: Approach the Merciful High Priest Since the beginning of the exhortation at 3:1, our homilist worked with the theme of 'fidelity', exemplified by Jesus and called for in his followers. He now treats the second attribute accorded to Jesus at 2:17, mercy. He begins development of the theme with another hortatory comment. v. 14, as at 10:19, the homilist bases his exhortation on a statement of what his audience possesses. That Jesus is a 'high priest' appeared at 2:17, although the title's significance remains to be seen. That he has 'passed through the heavens' is implicit in the image of his exaltation (1:3, 13; 2:7–9; 9:11). The title 'Son of God', a fuller form of the title Son (1:5) reappears at 6:6; 7:3; 10:29. The juxtaposition of the name Jesus and this majestic title may be characteristic of liturgical formulas to which the homilist refers when he speaks of the community's 'confession'. For similar language, cf. Rom 1:4; 1 Thess 1:10; Acts 9:20; 1 Jn 1:7; 4:15; 5:5. The exhortation to 'hold fast' reinforces analogous calls in the preceding exhortation (3:6, 14). v. 15, the homilist's pastoral sensitivity is evident in his balanced exhortations. In contrast to the threatening warning about the judgemental word of God, he now highlights the consoling thought of a 'sympathetic' heavenly figure. The claim that he has been 'tested' formed the last comment on the human experience of Jesus (2:17). A more graphic description of his testing will follow at 5:7–10. The similarity of Christ and his followers has one qualification, that he was 'without sin'. Such an affirmation, common in early Christian sources (cf. 2 Cor 5:21; Jn 7:18; 8:46; 14:30; 1 Jn 3:5, 7; 1 Pet 1:19; 2:22; 3:18), here grounds the claim that Christ was a 'blameless' offering in his self-sacrificial death (cf. 9:14). v. 16, the call to 'approach', repeated at 10:22, is part of the author's exhortation to move in an appropriate direction, towards rest (4:11), perfection (6:1), and ultimately God. The cultic image of approaching the sanctuary in worship (cf. Ex 16:9; Lev 9:7; 21:17; 22:3; Num 10:3–4; 18:3) is commonly used for believers (cf. 7:25; 11:6; 12:18, 22). Although rooted in cult, the image applies to the whole covenant relationship with God. The specific goal of the believer's movement is the divine 'throne', previously mentioned at 1:8. The characterization 'of grace' highlights the quality of mercy on which the homilist now focuses. The summons to approach 'with boldness' (cf. 3:6) calls for confident self-expression before God, which Christ's human prayer also exemplifies (5:7). The combination of 'mercy' and 'grace', common in Jewish and Christian texts (cf. Wis 3:9; 4:15; 1 Tim 1:2; 2 Tim 1:2; Titus 1:4; 2 Jn 3), offers a comprehensive definition of the 'help' available. The assistance from on high is 'timely' or 'in a time of need' (NRSV) as 2:18 had suggested, because the addressees are also being tested.

(5:1–10) The Merciful Christ and the High Priests The reflection on the person and work of Christ concentrates on his status as the true and eternal High Priest. The theme, introduced at 2:17 and repeated at 4:15, now undergoes its first stage of development. Here the homilist compares Christ with ordinary earthly high priests, showing points of contact and hinting at the superiority of the heavenly high priest. The description of ordinary high priests (5:1–4) makes three general points about their function, their relationship to their followers, and their relationship to God. These points will be treated in inverse order in their application to Christ (5:5–10). v. 1, high priests are intermediaries par excellence. Their central responsibility is to make 'gifts and sacrifices', a generic description of sacrifices (cf. 3 Kgdms 8:64; Ep. Arist. 234; Heb 8:3; 9:12). Our homilist characterizes these as having to do with 'sin'. Although priests in Scripture were responsible for various offerings, including the daily sacrifice (Ex 29:38–46), and thanksgiving and purificatory sacrifices (Lev 2–7), Hebrews concentrates on the sacrifice unique to the high priest, the offering for sins on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16). Details of that ritual provide the material for the exposition in chs. 8–10. v. 2, the second point of comparison, an idealized picture of a high priest, focuses on the theme of sympathy mentioned at 4:15. The ordinary high priest should 'deal gently' with sinners. The verb (metriopathein), unique in scripture, is carefully chosen. Not synonymous with 'sympathize' (4:15), its philosophical usage (cf. Diog. Laert. Lives of the Philosophers, 5.31; Plut. On Restraining Anger, 10 (Mor. 458c); Philo, Virt. 195; Abr. 257; Leg. All. 3.129) suggests a restraint of emotion, particularly of anger. Christ, as heavenly high priest, does that and more. The earthly high priest can restrain his anger because, like his fellows, he is 'subject to weakness'. Hebrews will develop this notion, with the qualification about Christ's sinlessness already enunciated (4:15). The characterization of the sinners as 'ignorant and wayward' reflects the stipulation that sin-offerings apply only to unwitting offences (Lev 4:2; 5:21–2; Num 15:22–31; Deut 17:12). This restriction parallels the exclusion of wilful sins from the pale of forgiveness (6:4–8; 10:26–31; 12:17). v. 3, the requirement that the high priest sacrifice for himself and for the people pertains to the Day of Atonement; cf. Lev 9:7; 16:6–17. The fact that ordinary high priests had to sacrifice for themselves contributes to the homilist's argument about Christ's superiority (7:27; 9:7). v. 4, the final point of comparison is that the high priest is not self-appointed, but 'called' by God. This stipulation applies to the first high priest of the biblical tradition, Aaron, appointed to the office by God (cf. Ex 28:1; Lev 8:1; Num 16–18). Aaron continues the list of biblical figures used as foils for Christ, but the contrast between Christ and him is not further developed.

5:5–6, taking the points of comparison in inverse order, the homilist begins by noting how Christ was called to office. He does so by construing two verses from the Psalms as divine speech to the Son. The first, Ps 2:7, is familiar from Heb 1:3. The second, Ps 110:4, derives from a text, the first verse of which was cited at Heb 1:13. While Ps 110:1 was associated with Christ's exaltation, the current verse appears here for the first time in early Christian literature. The verse originally attributed priestly status to an Israelite king. Its allusion to the 'order of Melchizedek' may have been an attempt by Davidic poets to effect reconciliation with ancient Canaanite traditions in Jerusalem. For our homilist the phrase presents an opportunity, for the attribution of priestly status to the addressee does not, in itself, affirm that the addressee, in his construal the Messiah, can be entitled 'high priest'. Ch. 7 will show how 'priesthood according to the order of Melchizedek' is really a superior, because heavenly and eternal, form of high priesthood. For the moment, the juxtaposition of the two verses permits the linking of two central Christological titles, Son and High Priest. That connection causes difficulties for readers seeking a systematic Christology. Yet the homilist is unconcerned with the chronological relationship between the designations of Christ as Son and High Priest. It is clear that, for him, Christ is the Son eternally (1:3), and that he becomes High Priest at the point where he is 'perfected' or exalted

(7:28). What is important for Hebrews is that Scripture attests Christ as both. v. 7, Hebrews now recounts part of the human experience of Jesus that made him capable of sympathy. The portrait of Jesus offering 'prayers and supplications' generically resembles the scene at Gethsemane (cf. Mt 26:36–46; Mk 14:32–43; Lk 22:40–6), but the details differ. The homilist may have been inspired by stories of various prayers of Jesus, including his cry on the cross (Mt 27:46; Mk 15:34), but the overall pattern embodies traditional notions of the ideal prayer of the righteous. The content of the prayers is not explicit, but the one addressed 'who was able to save him from death', suggests that the prayer sought deliverance. The 'loud cries and tears', not part of Gethsemane accounts, derive from the Psalms (Ps 22:1–2, 24; 116:8) and recur in Jewish traditions (1QH 5:12; 2 Macc 11:6; 3 Macc 1:16; 1 Esd 5:62; Philo, Leg. All. 3.213; Quis Heres, 19). That Christ was heard 'because of his reverent submission' is part of the same portrait of a saint's prayer. The word for 'reverent submission' (Gk. eulabeia) appears in Philo's description of the prayer of Moses (Quis Heres, 22) and has connotations of the 'fear of the Lord' (Prov 1:7). That Christ 'was heard' does not indicate that he was spared death; the homilist clearly alludes to Christ's exaltation in which he was brought out of death; cf. 2:10; 13:20. v. 8, that Christ 'learned through... what he suffered' involves a common Greek proverb (cf. Aesch. Ag. 177; Hdt. 1.207) about experience as teacher. The Jewish proverbial notion that suffering can be a form of divine chastisement (cf. 12:4–11) may also be in the background, but the homilist has a hortatory goal. Christ can be sympathetic because of his suffering; he also serves as a model of obedience to the divine will; cf. 10:5–10; 12:1–3. v. 9, the final point of comparison between Christ and earthly high priests relates to the effect of their actions. Christ 'perfected' (cf. 2:10) is, in his exalted state, a 'cause of salvation'. The immediate context suggests Christ's exemplary role; chs. 8–10 will describe how his sacrifice achieves salvific effects. The note that salvation is for 'those who obey him' reinforces its conditional character (cf. 2:1–4; 3:6, 14). v. 10, a paraphrase of Ps 110:4, already cited at 5:4, concludes the section. The claim that the verse designates Christ a 'high priest' requires explanation, but the homilist dramatically delays his expository tour de force.

The Priestly Work of Christ (5:11–10:18)

(5:11–6:20) Transitional Admonition The interlude falls into three sections, two (5:11–6:3; 6:4–12) of direct exhortation and one (6:13–20) offering scriptural assurance about the reliability of God's promises. 5:11, an apology for the difficulty of the material is a common rhetorical device. Apology turns quickly to criticism of the addressees, accused of being 'dull in understanding'. The same term, meaning 'sluggish', concludes the exhortation at 6:12, but on a more optimistic note. Hence the accusation is clearly a rhetorical move, designed to challenge not condemn the addressees. 5:12, the challenging tone continues with the suggestion that the addressees are spiritually underdeveloped, needing to learn their elementary catechism. The 'oracles of God' are Israel's Scriptures (Acts 7:38; Rom 3:2; 1 Pet 4:11). The contrasting images of 'milk' and 'solid food' commonly represent educational levels (e.g. 1 Cor 2:6–8; 3:18–23; Philo, Agr. 9; Epict. Dis. 2.16.39). 5:13, the homilist exploits the educational referents of the image. Those who imbibe educational pabulum are at the elementary level, concentrating on grammar and rhetoric, not the 'word of righteousness', i.e. moral philosophy. In this context such secular language evokes another order of 'righteousness' (dikaïosyne), that provided by the heavenly high priest, who 'loves righteousness' (1:9). 5:14, play on the imagery continues. The contrast between milk and solid food parallels the contrast between the infant and the 'mature' person, who can tolerate solid food. Adults are also those who exercise, and the phrase 'trained by practice' evokes both the gymnasium and the common application of athletic imagery to the moral life (e.g. 1 Tim 4:7; 2 Pet 2:14; Heb 12:11; Philo, Conf. Ling. 181; Agr. 42). The final phrase, 'distinguishing good from evil', reinforces the secular referent of the imagery, but, for Hebrews, to make such a distinction is ultimately to follow Christ (12:1–2). Hence to be 'mature' (teleios) is more than a matter of physical and intellectual maturation. 6:1, a verbal play on the connotations of the language emerges in the call to press on to 'perfection' (teleiotes). The summons suggests, as does the underlying moralizing image, that perfection is in the hands of the addressees. It later becomes clear that their moral efforts depend upon the perfecting that Christ's sacrifice affords (10:14). The homilist calls for an understanding of that reality and a life lived in the light of Christ's example (12:1–2). He will not rehearse the basics of Christian belief and practice. v. 2, the 'instruction about baptisms' may involve the distinction between Christian initiation and other similar rites, as at Acts 18:25; 19:3–5. For the ritual 'laying on of hands', see Acts 8:17; 19:6. v. 3, a pious aside makes a conventional appeal to God's will; cf. 1 Cor 16:7, and, for similar appeals, Rom 11:10; 1 Cor 4:19; Acts 18:21; Jas 4:15.

6:4, the homilist declares four things to be 'impossible'; cf. 6:18; 10:4; 11:6. This solemn declaration begins a stern warning, soon to be balanced by a more encouraging message. The belief that it is impossible to restore apostates resembles other early Christian expressions of rigorism, such as the notion of the unforgivable sin (Mt 12:32; Mk 3:29; Lk 12:10) or the 'mortal sin' of 1 Jn 5:16. The homilist does not indicate whether the grounds for this judgement, repeated in a slightly different form at 10:26–31 and 12:15–17, involve divine unwillingness to accept repentance or a subjective inability of apostates to repent. It appears to be a matter of definition; those who put themselves outside the pale of salvation cannot be retrieved. Various images define belonging to the Christian community. To be 'enlightened' is a common Christian image for reception of the gospel; cf. 1 Cor 4:5; Eph 1:18; 2 Tim 1:10; Jn 1:9; 1; Pet 2:9; Jas 1:17. The image has not yet become an equivalent for baptism. To have 'tasted the heavenly gift' could allude to the eucharist (cf. Acts 20:11) but is more likely to be a general reference to all that is involved in salvation. For similar gifts, see Acts 2:38; 10:45; Rom 5:15; 2 Cor 9:15; Eph 3:7. v. 5, the 'powers of the age to come' recalls the description of the confirmation of God's word (2:4). v. 6, the heart of the belief about apostates comes to expression. In rejecting the one whose death brings salvation, they join those who disgracefully executed him. The solemn designation of Christ as Son of God reinforces the heinousness of apostasy. v. 7, a vivid agricultural image, contrasting two types of soil, links the two halves of the exhortation. Such imagery is common in Scripture (Isa 5:1–2; 28:23–9; Ezek 19:10–14), in the parables of Jesus (Mk 4:3–9; Mt 13:1–9; Lk 8:4–8), and in other Jewish homilies (e.g. Philo, Quis Heres, 204). 'Ground that drinks up the rain' recalls the promised land (Deut 11:11). The human counterpart of that image has yet to be described. v. 8, the desolate briar patch recalls the land of the garden of Eden, cursed after the fall (Gen 3:17–18). The fiery destiny of such land may involve ordinary agricultural practice, but the image of burning evokes eschatological fire; cf. Mt 13:30, 42; 25:41; Rev 20:14. The image of consuming fire reappears at 12:29. v. 9, an address to the recipients as 'beloved' begins the expression of encouragement. Underlying the positive remarks is the traditional triad of faith, hope, and love (cf. 1 Thess 1:13; 1 Cor 13:3; Col 1:4–5), taken in inverse order. For another use of the triad, see 10:22–4. v. 10, confidence for the future is based on past experience of the community's loving behaviour. The expression resembles flattering remarks addressed by Christian leaders to their congregations (cf. 1 Thess 1:2; Rev 2:19; Ign. Rom. proem). v. 11, for the full assurance of hope, cf. 10:22. 'To the very end' recalls the warning of 3:14. v. 12, to follow the homilist's advice will prevent the addressees from becoming 'sluggish' (cf. 5:11). The opposite condition is a combination of fidelity and patience. The latter term, appearing only here in Hebrews, connotes more stalwart perseverance than passive patience. It will find echoes in later calls for endurance (10:32–6; 12:2). Such virtues will have their reward, expressed once again in terms of 'inheriting the promise'; cf. 1:14; 4:1, 8.

6:13, the final portion of the chapter develops the notion of the promise and suggests as a reason to be assured of it the divine oath that guarantees it. The homilist reflects on the oath that God swore to Abraham at Gen 22:16–17. The pericope anticipates a reflection (7:20–5) on the divine oath mentioned at Ps 110:4. The remark that God 'swore by himself' is based on Gen 22:16, a verse that caught the attention of other Jewish interpreters such as Philo (Sacr. 91–4; Leg. All. 3.203–7). 6:14, the content of the oath derives from Gen 22:17. Hebrews thus focuses on one element of the divine promise to Abraham, that he would be the father of a great nation (Gen 12:2–3; 15:5; 17:5), and ignores the correlative promise of land (Gen 12:7; 13:4). 6:15, the description of Abraham's action repeats the language of 6:12. Abraham's endurance involved his willingness to sacrifice Isaac, an episode used at 11:17–19 to illustrate Abraham's faith. 6:16, the human act of swearing helps explain the significance of God's oath. Philo offers a similar analysis about the supportive function of oaths (Somm. 1.12) and suggests that the divine oath was designed to help human beings accept God's promises (Abr. 273). 6:17, that God's purposes are 'unchangeable' is a common affirmation of Scripture (Num 23:19; 1 Sam 15:29; Ps 89:35; Isa 40:8; Jer 4:28) and of later Jewish authors (Philo, Deus Imm.). 6:18, the 'two unchangeable things' are apparently God's word and the confirming oath. A pastoral application of the reflection now develops. It is not immediately clear on what word and oath the addressees should rely. The following chapter (7:20–2) indicates that the relevant oath is found in Ps 110:4, confirming Christ's priesthood 'after the order of Melchizedek'. The homilist probably considers Ps 2:7, cited most recently at 5:5 in connection with Ps 110:4, as the basic divine word. The description of Christians as those 'who have taken refuge', could be translated even more graphically as 'who have fled for refuge'. The language hints at the image of wandering sojourners that will develop in ch. 11. The image of 'flight' towards God, based on Plato, Theaetetus, 176A–B, is common in Hellenistic religious philosophy. For a Jewish use, cf. Philo, Fug. 63. The homilist orients flight not to the transcendent world but towards an eschatological 'hope'. 6:19, the image of the anchor, unknown to the biblical tradition prior to Hebrews, is common in Greek literature (e.g. Pind. Odes 6.101; Plato, Leg. 12.961c; Philo, Sacr. 90) as a symbol of stability and security. The imagery shifts abruptly from stability to movement, from the nautical to the sacral. The language of movement derives not from the image of the anchor but from its referent, the heavenly high priest and his movement into the divine realm. The 'inner shrine' is the most sacred part of the tabernacle, separated by a special curtain from the external portion of the tabernacle; cf. Ex 26:31–3; 40:3; Mt 27:51. 6:20, the reference to the 'curtain' and the action of Jesus as high priest anticipates the treatment of the high priests in chs. 8–10. Only the high priest could enter the innermost sanctuary and only on the Day of Atonement. Jesus has made that move as a 'forerunner'. The epithet, recalling the description of Jesus as 'pioneer' (2:10), emphasizes that his experience grounds his followers' hopes. The concluding phrase reiterates the key verse, Ps 110:4, that warrants considering Christ a high priest.

(7:1–28) Scriptural Reflection: Christ and Melchizedek The 'long and difficult' (NRSV: 'much...that is hard') (cf. 5:11) discourse begins. The first stage, ch. 7, explores the implications of the insight that Ps 110:4 can apply to Christ. The homilist's strategy is to interpret the only scriptural passage other than Ps 110 where the figure of Melchizedek appears. vv. 1–2, Gen 14:17–20 describes the encounter between Abraham and Melchizedek after Abraham had defeated a coalition of five kings and rescued his kinsman Lot. Abraham first meets the king of Sodom when Melchizedek of Salem abruptly appears, blesses Abraham, and in return receives a tithe of his spoils. Phrases selected from the passage convey the essential points deserving comment. v. 2b, interpretation begins with etymologies, which are technically incorrect. Melchizedek's name is an ancient theophoric formation meaning 'Zedek [a Canaanite deity] is my king'. Similarly 'Salem' is not the equivalent of the Hebrew word for 'peace' (shalom). Nonetheless, the etymologies 'king of righteousness' and 'king of peace' were current among first-century Jewish interpreters (Philo, Leg. All. 3.79; Jos. J.W. 6.438). Apart from their evocation of traditional Messianic attributes, the etymologies play no further role in the chapter. v. 3, Scripture's silence implies attributes of Melchizedek that make him resemble the 'Son of God'. In the absence of any record of Melchizedek's ancestry, birth, or death, he can be described as a 'priest forever'. Speculation on Melchizedek was rife in the period. The Qumran sectarians thought of him as an angelic judge (11QMelch). Philo uses him to symbolize the divine Word (Leg. All. 3.79–82). An elaborate legend about Melchizedek, probably dating to the late first century, appears in 2 Enoch. Later rabbis identified Melchizedek with the archangel Michael (Abot R. Nat. [A] 34). Gnostic Christians knew of Melchizedek as an angel (Hippol. Haer. 7.26; the Nag Hammadi tractate Melchizedek; Pistis Sophia 1:25–6). None of these traditions is explicit here, but they form the background to the use of Melchizedek to explain the significance of Christ.

v. 4, reflection on Melchizedek's superiority to the levitical priests begins with the phrase that Abraham gave a tithe to Melchizedek (Gen 14:20). v. 5, Num 18:21–32 stipulates that Israelites had to give a tithe to the priests, who were of the tribe of Levi and thus ultimately descended from the patriarch. v. 6, that Abraham, with no physical relationship to Melchizedek, gave him a tithe suggests a hierarchy: Melchizedek > Abraham > levitical priests > Israelites. That Melchizedek blessed Abraham constitutes the second point for comment. The mention of 'the promises' continues a subordinate theme from 6:13–15. v. 7, despite the apodictic remark that the greater blesses the less, numerous examples attest the opposite (Job 31:20; 2 Sam 14:22; 1 Kings 1:47). The principle is clearly an ad hoc formulation. v. 8, the mortal Levites stand in stark contrast to the other recipient of a tithe, Melchizedek. The restrained formulation, 'it is testified that he lives', alluding to the fact that Scripture does not record Melchizedek's death (v. 3), does not explain Melchizedek's immortality. vv. 9–10, the relationship of givers and recipients of tithes confirms the hierarchical relationship between Melchizedek and the Levites. The introductory remark, 'one might even say' recognizes the argument's playful quality.

v. 11, the exegesis turns to the effectiveness of the priestly action. 'Perfection', the goal of the addressees (6:1), begins, as will later be apparent (9:14; 10:14), with the forgiveness of sins and ability to participate in the covenant community. If the Levites had produced such perfection, Ps 110:4 would not have predicted another priesthood. A parenthetical comment connects the priesthood with the law. v. 12, although the parenthesis seems to be a casual aside, the connection is significant. If the priestly basis of the law is eliminated, then the law itself becomes invalid. For the quasi-logical language of 'necessity', cf. 8:3; 9:16, 23. v. 13, only members of the tribe of Levi could serve as priests (Ex 28:1–4; Num 1:47–54). v. 14, as a descendant of David (Mt 1:1; 9:27; 15:22; Mk 10:47; Lk 1:32; Rom 1:3; 2 Tim 2:8; Rev 22:16), Jesus, reverently styled 'our Lord' (cf. 2:3; 13:20), was of the tribe of 'Judah'. Hence, he could not have been a priest according to the stipulations of the law.

v. 15, what is 'even more obvious' is that old priestly order and its law have been changed. v. 16, the opposition between Levites and the order of Melchizedek is framed in terms of a dichotomy between the 'physical', better translated 'carnal', and 'life'. That life is 'indestructible' because it is eternal (v. 3). A distinction between flesh and spirit underlies the opposition, and the 'spirit' will surface at 9:14, but Hebrews is careful not to express the significance of Christ in static, metaphysical terms. The spirit is ultimately embodied; cf. 10:1–10. v. 17, Scripture's silence testified to Melchizedek's life. The words of Ps 110:4, understood as addressed to the Son, attest the eternality of his priesthood. vv. 18–19, a summary of the argument focuses not on priesthood but on law. In contrast with the weakness of the priestly-legal system stands, not the effective reality of the new priest, but the hope that he inspires. The homilist thus continues the theme articulated at 6:19. The cultic image of 'approaching' God has been (4:16) and will be (7:25; 10:22) used of Christian life. Christ's 'approach' guarantees access for his followers.

v. 20, relying on the demonstrated significance of divine oaths (6:13–18), the homilist focuses on the first half of Ps 110:4, where God 'confirmed' his promise of priestly status 'with an oath', a phenomenon not attested for other priests. v. 21, Ps 110:4 is cited. v. 22, the surprising inference introduces the theme of a new covenant, anticipating chs. 8–10. Christ's role as guarantor or 'surety' parallels functions accorded to quasi-divine intermediaries such as Philo's Logos (Quis Heres, 205–6). The divinely assured status of the heavenly high priest gives his followers their assurance.

v. 23, a new argument, based on the opposition between multiplicity and unity, contrasts levitical priests and Christ. The fact that priests of old replaced one another in succession was implicit in the notion of ancestry (7:3, 5, 8). The natural inference is that they were 'many in number'. v. 24, Christ, by contrast, 'continues forever'. The Greek verb (menein) had applied to Melchizedek at v. 3. The motif surfaces at the beginning (1:11–12) and end (13:8) of the homily. v. 25, the earlier affirmation (5:9) that Christ as priest is a 'source of salvation', is now connected with his intercessory activity. The traditional notion that the exalted Christ is a heavenly intercessor (Rom 8:34; Jn 17:9; 1 Jn 2:1) is connected with Christ's priesthood here and at Heb 9:24.

v. 26, the chapter concludes with a rhetorically elaborate celebration of the heavenly status of Christ. The note that it is 'fitting' for there to be such a high priest resembles the claim that Christ had to be perfected through suffering (2:10); both are part of the divine plan of salvation. The attributes of Christ are traditional. For his holiness, see the application of Ps 16:10 to him at Acts 2:27; 13:35. For his sinlessness, see 4:15. v. 27, the contrast between Christ and ordinary high priests again relies on the opposition between multiplicity and unity, but the precise referent of the priestly sacrifices 'day after day' is unclear. The distinction between an offering for the priest's sins and one for the people reflects the ritual of the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:11, 16), not the daily offering. The Torah required the tāmīd, animals sacrificed twice daily, morning and evening (Ex 29:38–42; Num 28:3–8), accompanied by a meal offering (Ex 29:40–1; Lev 6:14–23; Num 28:5). High priests could, but were not required to, make these offerings. Although the Torah does not differentiate the functions of the two types of offering, Philo (Quis Heres, 174) suggests that the meal-offerings were for the priests, the animals for the people. Hebrews apparently knows that tradition. The notion that Christ died 'once for all' in an act of self-sacrifice is traditional (Rom 6:10; 1 Pet 3:18); Hebrews will focus on it (9:12, 25–8; 10:10). v. 28, a neat antithesis summarizes the comparison of the chapter, concluding with a solemn affirmation about the eternal status of the heavenly high priest.

(8:1–10:18) Scriptural Reflection: Christ's Sacrifice and the New Covenant

(8:1–7) The Work of the Heavenly High Priest From 8:1 through 10:18 the homilist develops an integrated exposition, focused on Jer 31:31–4. Ch. 7 treated the personal status of the Son. These chapters examine his work, using the antitheses of earthly and heavenly, new and old, interior and external. The organization of the material resembles the homiletic pattern of chs. 3–4. The introduction to this homily, extending to 8:7, indicates the main point of the argument and introduces two of the oppositions on which the subsequent exegesis depends. v. 1, the chapter begins with another allusion to the key Ps 110:1 and its image of the exalted one (cf. 1:3, 13; 4:14). v. 2, designation of Christ as a 'minister' (leitourgos) uses a common term for priests. The place where this minister serves is the 'true' cultic site. Much of the next two chapters explains what it means to be the true place of worship. Here the two terms 'sanctuary' and 'tabernacle' suggest further developments. The latter term is the technical designation of the tent of the Exodus. It is that structure, not the Davidic or Herodian temple, that is in view. While 'sanctuary' could be a synonym, the homilist's later usage suggests that the term refers to the innermost part of the tabernacle. The distinguishing feature of this whole complex is that God, not human beings, set it up. The homilist begins to play with the widespread notion of a heavenly temple or sanctuary. Based upon ancient notions of a heavenly plan for the earthly temple (Ex 25:40; 1 Chr 28:19), Jewish interpreters developed the belief in a heavenly temple or divine palace (1 Enoch, 14:10–20; T. Levi, 3:2–4; Wis 9:8; 2 Apoc. Bar. 4:5; b. Hag. 12b; Gen. Rab. 55:7). The book of Revelation (3:12; 7:15; 15:5, etc.) relies heavily on the notion. Similar ideas appear in Greek sources (Ps.-Plato, Epin. 983E–84B; Sen. Ben. 7:7:3; Heracl. Ep. 4), although the cosmos is usually the 'true' temple, the inner portion of which is heaven itself. Hellenistic Jewish interpreters such as Philo could use both images (cosmos as true temple: Spec. Leg. 1.66; heaven, i.e. the noetic world, as true temple: Vit. Mos. 2.74). v. 3, what priests do is as important as where they do it. For priests offering 'gifts and sacrifices', cf. 5:1. Christ's offering is nothing other than himself (7:27; 9:12–14). v. 4, that Christ could not be a conventional priest was clear from 7:14. v. 5, Ex 25:40 mentions the heavenly pattern shown to Moses. Description of what was copied from that plan as a 'shadow' recalls Plato's famous 'Myth of the Cave' (Resp. 7.515A–B). The 'shadows' in the phenomenal world are far removed from the reality of the noetic world (cf. Philo, Ebr. 132–3; Vit. Mos. 2.74). The homilist continues to utilize Platonic terminology in the opposition between heaven and earth, but he will finally resist Platonic metaphysics. The other term used of the earthly place of worship, translated 'sketch' by the NRSV, may intimate some of his hesitation. The word more commonly means 'outline' or 'prefiguration', although it does mean 'copy' in the LXX (Ezek 42:15, and Aquila's version of Ezek 8:10 and Dan 4:17). In this context it surely has that meaning, although in ch. 10 the homilist will shift from a horizontal to temporal dichotomy and he may now be preparing the way. v. 6, that Jesus is a 'mediator' of a new covenant recalls the claim that he is a guarantor (7:22) who serves an intercessory role (7:25). The notion of a 'new covenant' anticipates the quotation in vv. 8–12. The qualitative distinction between the covenants rests on the 'promises' that they contain. Although much is contained in the theme of 'promise' (4:1; 11:13–16, 39–40; 12:22–4), the distinctive element here is the effective forgiveness of sins (8:12; 9:14, 26–8; 10:16–18). v. 7, a contra-factual argument, analogous to the point (7:11) about the new priest mentioned in Ps 110, introduces the dichotomy between new and old.

(8:8–13) Jer 31:31–4: The Text for a Homily v. 8, the introductory comment attributes the oracle to an unnamed speaker. The NRSV, not inappropriately, specifies God as the author of the message. The text of Jeremiah itself claims ‘the Lord’ as speaker. In its original context Jer 31:31–4 (LXX 38:31–4, to which the citation conforms closely) is part of a series of oracles (chs. 30–3) offering hope to the Israelites of the exilic period that YHWH would restore them to their homeland. At that time, God would re-establish his relationship with them and renew their hearts and minds. Later Jewish groups, such as the sectarians at Qumran, understood the ideal of a ‘new covenant’ to refer to their own eschatological community (CD 6:19; 8:21; 10:12). Although they did not elsewhere cite this text, early Christians used the notion (Mt 26:28; Mk 14:24; Lk 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25; 2 Cor 3:6). The citation will help the homilist to specify what the ‘better promises’ of 8:6 entail. v. 10, the distinction between a covenant of external observance and one of internal, heartfelt adherence adds a third dichotomy to the antitheses between heaven and earth, old and new. Repetition of the verse at 10:16 indicates its thematic significance. v. 12, from the exordium (1:3) onwards, the homilist stressed the significance of the forgiveness of sins effected by Christ. The conclusion of the citation indicates that under the new covenant such forgiveness will be a reality. Again, repetition of the verse at 10:17 underlines its significance. v. 13, ominous language, using terminology for an ‘obsolete’ law, reinforces the negative tone of 8:7 and recalls the need for a change in law (7:11).

(9:1–10) The Earthly Sanctuary The homilist begins to contrast old and new covenants by reviewing the structure and rituals of the tabernacle. v. 1, announcing the theme of the section, the first verse casts the ‘earthly’ or ‘worldly’ sanctuary in a negative light. v. 2, Hebrews relies on several OT passages: YHWH’s instructions for the tabernacle (Ex 25:1–31:11; Bezalel’s construction of the tabernacle (36:1–39:43); YHWH’s authorization to set it up (40:1–15); and the account of the compliance by Moses (40:16–38). The ‘first’ tent is the outer portion of the whole tabernacle. For the ‘lampstand’, see Ex 25:31–9; 37:17–24; 40:4; for the ‘table’, Ex 25:23–8; 37:10–15; for the ‘bread’, Ex 25:30; 40:23; Mt 12:4. Most MSS record the standard designation of the outer portion of the tabernacle as ‘the Holy Place’. Some MSS, however, including P46, the oldest witness to Hebrews, reverse the standard designation and call this space the ‘Holy of Holies’. The homilist may have inverted the normal designation to emphasize the multiplicity of the external tabernacle. Although odd, the terminology of ‘Holy Place’ for the inner sanctuary is consistent; cf. 9:12. v. 3, the ‘curtain’ has already appeared (6:19) as the boundary of the space accessible to the high priest. v. 4, for the ‘altar of incense’, see Ex 30:1–10; 37:25–8; 40:5. According to the Pentateuchal accounts it should be in the outer sanctuary, but 2 Macc 2:4–8 closely associates this altar and the ark and 2 Apoc. Bar. 6:7 depicts an angel removing both from the inner sanctuary. For the ‘ark of the covenant’, Ex 25:10–15; 37:1–5; 40:3; for the ‘manna’, Ex 16:33–4; for ‘Aaron’s rod’, the budding of which determined his selection as priest, Num 17:1–11; for the ‘tablets of the covenant’, Ex 25:16. v. 5, for the ‘cherubim’, and the ‘mercy seat’, see Ex 25:17–22; 37:6–9. The latter is the cover of the ark that was the focal point of the rites of the Day of Atonement. Paul refers to it at Rom 3:25. The kind of discussion ‘in detail’ to be avoided appears in the elaborate allegories of the tabernacle’s cosmic significance among Jewish interpreters (Philo, Vit. Mos. 2.97–100; Cher.).

v. 6, the ‘ritual duties’ of priests in the outer tabernacle included trimming lamps (Ex 27:20–1) and setting ‘show-bread’ on the table (Lev 24:5–9). The note that the priests ‘go continually’ into the sacred space does not reflect contemporary practice, but describes what Scripture requires. v. 7, the ‘once a year’ Day of Atonement on the tenth day of the seventh month (Lev 16:29–31) involves an elaborate ritual, performed only by the high priest. He first sacrifices a bull for himself and his household (Lev 16:6, 11), then a he-goat for the people; another animal not mentioned here, the scapegoat, is expelled into the desert. The high priest enters the inner sanctuary to sprinkle the ark twice, first with the bull’s blood, then with a goat’s blood (Lev 16:14–15). The non-biblical restriction of the sacrifice’s effect to sins committed ‘unintentionally’ conforms to Jewish tradition (m. Yoma, 8.9; t. Yoma, 5.60). v. 8, the homilist explores the ritual’s deeper meaning. As at 3:7, the inspiration of the ‘Holy Spirit’ highlights the contemporary application of Scripture. v. 9, the antecedent of ‘this’ is ambiguous but is most likely the ‘first tabernacle’ of v. 6. The translation of the NRSV suggests that the ‘present time’ is a time of unfulfilment, the time ‘during which’ (kath’ hen) ineffective sacrifices are being offered. The translation thus makes the subordinate clause temporal, defining the ‘present’. It should, instead, be rendered as a relative clause, translated ‘according to which’, and construed as modifying the ‘symbol’, i.e. the tabernacle. For our author, the ‘present time’ is not dominated by the old cult, but by Christ’s sacrifice. The tabernacle prefigures inadequately what is now effectively present through Christ’s sacrifice, which affects the human heart. Scripture has no word for ‘conscience’ (syneidesis), which is common in the Hellenistic world. It appears in Jewish (Wis 17:10; Jos. Ant. 16.100) and early Christian literature (e.g. Rom 2:15; 1 Cor 4:4; 1 Pet 2:14; 1 Clem. 1.3). v. 10, the homilist criticizes the superficiality of levitical sacrifices. The language refers in a general way to the system of purity laws covering ‘food’ (Lev 11; Deut 14) and ‘baptisms’ or washings (Lev 15; Num 19); ‘drinks’ are not mentioned in the Pentateuch. For a similar denigration of cultic externalism, see 13:9. The ‘time of correction’ is not a future hope, but the present era of the new covenant.

(9:11–14) The Ritual of the Heavenly Sanctuary Attention shifts to the present, defined by the moment when ‘Christ came’ as High Priest in an act symbolized by the yearly ritual. The fact that his priesthood involves ‘things that have come’ reinforces the positive view of ‘the present’ suggested by the previous verses. The ‘greater and more perfect tent’ has been understood in various metaphorical senses, but our homilist is quite restrained. He simply evokes the image of passage through the heavens associated with Christ’s exaltation (2:10; 4:14) and suggests that the passage involves the true (8:2) tent that God pitched. That something ‘not made with hands’ is superior to a manufactured product is a commonplace of Jewish (Isa 46:6; Philo, Vit. Mos. 2.74–6), pagan (Plut. De Tranq. Anim. 20 (477C–D), Ps.-Heracl. Ep. 4), and Christian (Mk 14; 58; Acts 7:48) sources. The designation as ‘not of this creation’ confirms the tent’s heavenly (8:5) status. v. 12, the homilist operates with the notion of a heavenly archetype for the earthly sanctuary. Christ’s ‘once for all’, or absolutely singular (cf. 7:27) passage through the heavens (4:14) involved entry into an exalted supernal realm, the ‘Holy Place’ equivalent to the earthly inner sanctuary; cf. vv. 2–3. For the ‘blood of goats and calves’ cf. v. 7. The claim that Christ’s self-sacrifice brought ‘redemption’, or purchase out of bondage, is traditional. Cf. Lk 1:68; 2:38 for the same noun. For the notion, see Mt 20:28; Mk 10:45; Titus 2:14; 1 Pet 1:18; Acts 7:35. v. 13, an a fortiori argument concludes the comparison between old and new rituals of atonement. Disparaging references to Pentateuchal rites constitute the weaker end of the analogy. To the elements of the ritual of the Day of Atonement, ‘blood of goats and bulls’, the homilist adds an allusion to the unrelated ‘ashes of a heifer’, used in purification rituals. Cf. Num 19. v. 14, the stronger pole of the analogy is Christ’s death, assumed, with many early Christians, to be a cleansing, sacrificial act; cf. Acts 15:9; Eph 5:26; Titus 2:14; 1 Pet 3:21; 1 Jn 1:7, 9. The ‘blood’ shed in that death is of far greater value than animals’ blood since it belongs to the Son; cf. 10:4. It is only by virtue of the ‘eternal Spirit’ that blood can be sprinkled in the ‘true’ or ‘heavenly’ sanctuary. The homilist’s quasi-Platonic dichotomy (8:5) renders comprehensible the intimate connection of ‘heavenly’ and ‘spiritual’. It also makes some sense of the mythological notions of a passage through the heavens and a sprinkling of blood in that sphere. Ambiguity remains about the role of the spirit and the character of the connection between spirit and blood. The ‘eternal Spirit’ could be the divine spirit that raises Christ’s act to a transcendent plane, or his own spirit, by virtue of which he attains the divine realm. Tension within this motif will remain until ch. 10. Christ’s cleansing sacrifice is spiritual because it affects ‘conscience’, cf. v. 9. ‘Dead works’ are sins (6:1) that contrast with works of love (10:24). ‘Worship’ involves prayer (13:15), but also the ‘sacrifices’ of good works (10:24; 13:6).

(9:15–22) The New Covenant To connect the motifs at work, the homilist resorts to a play on words possible in Greek, where the meaning of diathēkē can range from ‘contract’ or ‘treaty’ to ‘will’ or ‘testament’. For a similar wordplay, see Gal 3:15–18. v. 15, Christ as ‘mediator’ appeared at 8:6. For the common designation of Christians as ‘called’, see Rom 1:6; 1 Cor 1:2; Jude 1; Rev 17:14. The addressees had been named ‘partners in a heavenly calling’ at 3:1. Ordinary legal usage dictates that the promise of an ‘inheritance’ (1:14; 6:17) implies the death of a testator. The death in the case of this testament/covenant ‘redeems’ the heirs from their transgressions, as already noted in v. 12. v. 16, legal language describes the requirements for a testament to be enforced; the death of the testator must be ‘established’ or formally registered. v. 17, further technical language, ‘to take effect’, to be ‘in force’, continues to re-emphasize the point that a testament presupposes death, something not required for ‘covenants’. v. 18, the fact that there is a discrepancy between the social and legal presuppositions of testaments and covenants prompts the observation that the inauguration of the first covenant required bloodshed. The sacrifice concluding the ratification ceremony at Ex 24:3–8 foreshadows Christ’s death. v. 19, reading of ‘every commandment’ was the first act in the establishment of the Sinai covenant (Ex 24:7). The remark that the reading was ‘according to the law’ embellishes Scripture but reinforces the connection between cultic act and law; cf. 7:11. Details from various rituals are conflated. The blood of ‘calves’ was part of the Mosaic ritual. The phrase ‘and goats’, omitted by some ancient MSS, evokes the Day of Atonement, as v. 12. Water and hyssop pertain to the ritual of the red heifer (Num 19:8, 18, 20). All three elements appear in the purification of lepers (Lev 14:2–6). v. 20, the citation of Ex 24:8, firmly, if artificially, connecting blood and covenant, resembles the words of institution of the eucharist (Mt 26:28; Mk 14:24; Lk 22:20; 1 Cor 11:24–5). The homilist does not develop such an allusion. v. 21, consecration of the Mosaic tabernacle involved anointing (Ex 40:9), not sprinkling with blood; the verse may allude to the installation of Aaronid priests (Lev 8:15, 19, 26). v. 22, the connection of blood and forgiveness appears in a common Jewish maxim; cf. b. Yoma, 5a; b. Menah. 93b; b. Zebah. 6a.

(9:23–8) The New Heavenly Sacrifice Balancing 9:11–14, a new description of Christ’s ‘heavenly’ action incorporates the image of ritual purification developed in the previous verses. v. 23, the contrast between heavenly reality and earthly copy (NRSV: sketch) repeats the language of 8:4, although it is clear from 9:14 that the true ‘heavenly things’ are human consciences. The homilist thus takes a cosmic image to symbolize a personal reality. v. 24, the description of Christ’s entry into heaven (cf. 4:14; 8:1–2; 9:11–12) uses decidedly Platonic language (‘copy’, ‘true one’, ‘heaven itself’). As at 7:25, the intercessory role of the heavenly high priest, who ‘appears in the presence of God’, comes to the fore. v. 25, a renewed contrast between Christ and ordinary high priests emphasizes the multiplicity of the latter (cf. 9:7) and the distance between them and their offering (cf. 9:12). v. 26, a reductio ad absurdum articulates the contrast between Christ and ordinary high priests. Had he been merely one of them, his sacrifice would have been unceasingly repeated. The insistence on the ‘once for all’ character of Christ’s sacrifice (7:27; 9:12; 10:10) continues the Platonizing dichotomy between the phenomenal, earthly ‘many’ and the stable, heavenly ‘one’. The unique character of Christ’s act, however, derives from its eschatological position ‘at the end of the age’. v. 27, that it is ‘appointed for mortals to die’ is a Greek proverb; cf. 4 Macc 8:11. The notion of a post-mortem judgement, distinct from the final general judgement (Dan 7:26; Mt 25:31–46; 2 Thess 2:12; Rev 20:12) is traditional in Greek sources (Plato, Resp. 10.614B–621D; Plut. De Fac. 27–30). v. 28, the application of Christ’s sacrifice to ‘the sins of many’ evokes Isa 53:12; cf. Mk 10:45; Rom 5:19. Early Christians expected His coming a ‘second time’; cf. Mk 13:24–7; Acts 1:10–11; 1 Cor 15:23–4; Rev 1:7.

(10:1–10) The True Sacrifice The final stage of the exposition of Jer 31 indicates that Christ inaugurated the new and interior covenant by an act of conformity to God’s will. v. 1, for the old as ‘shadow’ see 8:5. The contrast between a shadow and the ‘true form’ (eikōn) may derive from Plato’s discussion of language (Cra. 439A). The homilist playfully exploits the potential of the categories: the ‘true form’ that causes the shadow is ultimately shown to be the ‘body’ of Christ (v. 10). The ineffectiveness of the law and its cult was already stressed at 7:11, 19. v. 2, the homilist argues that the purification effected by the old sacrifices was only skin deep (cf. 9:13); had they been truly and decisively effective, they would not need to be repeated. v. 3, the function of the old sacrifice to remind sinners of their acts may be an extension of Num 5:15. The recollection of sins in the old covenant contrasts with the forgetfulness of sin in the new (8:12; 10:17). v. 4, the apodictic denial of the effectiveness of sacrifice radicalizes such prophetic critiques of cultic formalism as 1 Sam 15:22; Ps 50:8–15, 51:16–19; Isa 1:12–17; Jer 7:21–6; Hos 6:6. ‘Bulls and goats’ alludes again to the Day of Atonement; cf. 9:12–13. vv. 5–6, as at 2:12–13 verses from a psalm express Christ’s intentions. The homilist recontextualizes the psalm as an utterance of Christ upon entering ‘the world’, where the decisive ‘heavenly’ sacrifice really occurs. Hebrews cites Ps 40:6–8, in its Greek form. The original psalm praised YHWH for his benefactions, promised obedience, and asked for assistance. The homilist focuses on the promise, contrasting heartfelt obedience and external cult. The phrase ‘a body you have prepared for me’, the Greek translation of the Hebrew ‘you have given me an open ear’, serves the homilist well. v. 7, the parenthetical remark in the original psalm about the ‘scroll of the book’ probably referred to the ‘law of the king’ (Deut 17:14–20); the king thus accepts the responsibility for abiding by the law. Hebrews probably understands the remark to allude to the whole OT, assumed to be written about Christ. v. 8, exegesis of the psalm focuses on the contrast between external cult and heartfelt obedience. The homilist begins by collecting all the allusions to rejected cultic acts. v. 9, after highlighting the psalm’s profession of willingness to obey, the homilist draws a sweeping conclusion. The solemn submission to God’s will, taken to be the inaugural act of the new covenant, supplants the whole cultic system. v. 10, that Christ’s death conformed to God’s will is commonplace; cf. Gal 1:4; Eph 1:5–11; 1 Pet 3:17. For God’s will that believers be sanctified, see 1 Thess 4:3. Christ’s act of obedience made God’s will his own. The Gethsemane story (Mt 26:42; Lk 22:42) and the fourth gospel (Jn 4:34; 5:30; 6:38–40; 19:30) express similar claims about Christ’s obedience. Hebrews makes that obedience decisive for establishing the new covenant. That Christ’s act of obedience took place in a sacrificed ‘body’ is significant. The homilist finally resolves the tensions between metaphysical vocabulary and historical narrative by insisting on the locus of the ‘real’ and ‘true’ in Christ’s embodied act. Christ’s obedient disposition unites heaven and earth. Significantly the composite name ‘Jesus Christ’ appears for the first time; cf. 13:8.

(10:11–18) Summation The homilist weaves together the themes of the last several chapters. v. 11, the weakness of the old cultic system is by now familiar; cf. 7:11, 19; 9:9–10; 10:1–4. v. 12, the notion of Christ’s session from Ps 110:1, last mentioned at 8:1, re-emphasizes the finality of his priestly act. v. 13, citation of Ps 110:1b, last mentioned at 1:13, points to the culmination of the salvific process. An eschatological horizon dominates the final chapters of Hebrews. v. 14, for the notion of ‘perfection’, see 2:10. It is now clear that, applied to believers, ‘perfection’ means the cleansing of conscience effected by Christ’s sacrifice. Worshipers so perfected are still ‘being sanctified’. The present tense of the verb implies that the process is a continuing one. ‘Sanctification’ within the community of the new covenant is thus distinct from the ‘perfecting’ that enables participation in that community. v. 15, the solemn introduction underscores the importance of the following citation. For another ascription of Scripture to the Spirit, see 3:7. v. 16, a slightly modified quotation of Jer 31:33, previously cited at 8:10, emphasizes that the new covenant involves ‘hearts and minds’. v. 17, Jer 31:34b, cited at 8:12, is enhanced with the phrase ‘and their lawless deeds’, which emphasizes the effective remission of sin essential to the new covenant.

Exhortation to Faithful Endurance (10:19–12:13)

(10:19–24) Transitional Admonition: Hold Fast to the Faith An exhortation to live as members of the new covenant recalls many previous exhortations, while stressing faith (v. 22), hope (v. 23), and love (v. 24). For the traditional triad, see 1 Cor 13:13. v. 19, for Christian ‘confidence’, or better, ‘boldness’, see 3:6; 4:16. All Christians can now go where only the high priests of old could go, into God’s presence. The blood of Jesus, because it cleanses conscience and inaugurates a new covenant (9:14–22), makes such entry possible. v. 20, the ‘way’ designates the Christian movement in Acts 9:2; 18:25; 24:14. It is ‘new’ because available only in the new covenant and ‘living’, like God’s word, 4:12, Christ, 7:25, and God, 10:31, because it derives from those vital realities. The ‘curtain’ (cf. 6:19; 9:3, 7) marks the boundary to God’s presence; only those who are ‘perfected’ may enter. A parenthetical comment emphasizes that approach to God is made possible by Christ’s flesh, offered in his bodily sacrifice (10:10). Syntax is ambiguous, but the phrase probably defines the ‘way’ rather than the ‘curtain’. v. 21, a similar remark about Christians having a ‘high priest’ appeared at 4:14. His position over the ‘house of God’ reflects 3:6. v. 22, the addressees were earlier summoned to ‘approach’ (4:16). That hearts have been ‘sprinkled clean’ recalls 9:13–14 and may evoke Ezek 36:25–6. ‘Washing’ with ‘pure water’ clearly alludes to baptism. v. 23, for maintaining the ‘confession’, see 3:1–6. Scripture (Deut 7:9; Ps 145:13) affirms that God is faithful. That God’s promises are secure has been a constant theme; cf. 4:1; 6:12–17; 8:6; 9:15. v. 24, the call to ‘provoke one another’ reflects the Greek notions of the moral life as contest; cf. Xen. Mem. 3.3.13; Isoc. Con. Dem. 46; Pliny, Ep. 3.7. The summons to ‘good deeds’ is frequent in early Christian exhortation, e.g. Mt 5:16; 26:10; Jn 10:32; 1 Pet 2:12; Rom 12:17. For more such deeds, see 13:1–6. v. 25, the reference to the behaviour of ‘some’ indicates part of the perceived problem that Hebrews addresses. The prophetic warning about the coming ‘Day’ of the Lord (cf. Isa 2:12; Joel 1:15; 3:14; Am 5:18; 8:9; Zeph 1:14; Zech 14:1) became a part of early Christian expectation (cf. Mt 10:15; 1 Cor 1:8; 3:13; 5:5; 2 Cor 1:14; 1 Thess 5:2, 4; 2 Thess 2:2; 2 Pet 3:10; 1 Jn 4:17). The ominous tone introduces the following warning.

(10:24–39) Warning and Encouragement As in previous exhortations, the homilist balances threat (vv. 24–31) with encouragement (vv. 32–9). v. 26, the emphasis on wilful persistence in sin recalls the Pentateuchal distinction between high-handed and inadvertent sins; cf. Num 15:25–31 and Heb 9:7. The denial of a new ‘sacrifice for sins’ echoes the warning about the impossibility of repentance for apostasy (6:4–8). v. 27, the image of a ‘fury of fire’ characterizes judgement scenes; cf. 2 Apoc. Bar. 48:39–40; 2 Thess 1:7–8; Rev 11:5; 20:14. For God as ‘consuming fire’ see 12:29. v. 28, not all violators of Torah were subject to the death penalty. The generalization rests on cases involving blasphemy (Lev 24:14–16) or idolatry (Deut 17:2–5). Deut 19:15 requires ‘two or three witnesses’ for any conviction; Deut 17:6 applies the requirement to the death penalty imposed for idolatry. v. 29, the a fortiori argument recalls the warning at 2:2–3. For ‘spurning the Son of God’, see 6:6. The notion of ‘outraging the Spirit’ recalls warnings about the ‘sin against the Spirit’ (Mk 3:29; Lk 12:10). v. 30, the first quotation is from Deut 32:35, cited in the same form in Rom 12:19. The second citation is from either Deut 32:36 or Ps 135:14. v. 31, falling into God’s hands (cf. 2 Sam 24:14; Sir 2:18) can be positive, but, when divine judgement is involved, it can be ‘fearful’, as was the theophany at Sinai (cf. 12:21). v. 32, encouragement begins with a call to remember the ‘hard struggle’ of the past. Ch. 12 further develops the athletic image. For the language of being ‘enlightened’, see 6:4. v. 33, the repeated mention of ‘abuse’ (cf. 11:26; 13:13) suggests a component of the addressees’ experience. Paul too experienced theatrical ‘exposure’ (1 Cor 4:9) in the persecutions that he suffered. Those who are ‘sharers’ or ‘partners’ in a heavenly calling (cf. 3:1) must also share in the community’s suffering. v. 34, compassion on ‘those in prison’ characterized early Christians; cf. Mt 25:36; Phil 2:25; 1 Clem. 59:4. ‘Plundering of possessions’ could involve judicial seizure, as at Polybius 4.14.4, or acts of mob violence. Exhortation to accept such tribulations ‘cheerfully’ was traditional; cf. Mt 5:12; Lk 6:22; Rom 5:3; 2 Cor 11:21–30; Acts 5:41; 1 Pet 4:13. v. 35, the virtues interwoven in the last verses of the chapter, ‘confident boldness’, ‘endurance’, and ‘faith’, summarize the ethos inculcated by Hebrews. Here ‘boldness’ is directed more towards the external world than towards God; cf. 3:6, 4:16, and 10:19. The final chapters reinforce the expectation of a just ‘reward’ for such behaviour; cf. 10:36; 11:6, 26; 12:2, 11. v. 36, exhortations to ‘endurance’ are common in early Christian sources; cf. Rom 2:7; 5:3; Lk 8:15; 21:19; Rev 3:10; 1 Clem. 5:5. Concern with this virtue pervades the final chapters; cf. 11:27; 12:2, 7; 13:13. To do ‘the will of God’ is the heart of covenant fidelity; cf. 10:9; 13:21. vv. 37–8, a composite citation melds Isa 26:20 (‘a little while’) and Hab 2:3–4, in its Greek form. The original prophecy records a vision of judgement to be visited upon Israel. It is that judgement that ‘will not delay’. The Greek translation renders the verse as a prediction of one ‘who is coming’, facilitating construal of the text as a prediction of Christ’s second coming. v. 38, Paul cites Hab 2:4 at Gal 3:11 and Rom 1:17 as part of his arguments contrasting faith and ‘works of the law’. Our homilist, remaining closer to the prophetic text, contrasts faithful endurance and ‘shrinking back’. v. 39, the exhortation ends on a positive note, as at 6:9.

(11:1–12:3) A Celebration of the Faithful The list of faithful heroes resembles in scope and details many reviews of Israel’s history (Sir 44–50; 1 Macc 2:49–64; 4 Macc 16:16–23; 18:11–13; Wis 10; Philo, Virt. 198–205). It also resembles lists of examples of a virtue, such as Philo’s treatment of hope (Praem. 11–14). The chapter abundantly displays the techniques of rhetorical ornamentation. Most obvious in English is anaphora, or initial repetition of the phrase ‘by faith’ extending up till v. 31. After an introduction the chapter falls into four major sections treating successive segments of Israel’s history. The whole celebrates individuals and groups who exemplify desired attitudes and virtues, trust in God’s promises and faithful endurance in the face of persecution.

(11:1–3) Introductory Remarks on Faith The first three dense and allusive verses provide a programmatic introduction to the chapter. They suggest the complexity of faith as both intellectual and moral, and of faith’s objects as both transcendent and eschatological. v. 1, a formal definition, like Plato’s definition of medicine (Symp. 186c) or Plutarch’s of curiosity (On Curiosity, 6.518c), introduces the chapter. The word translated ‘assurance’ in the NRSV is the same (hypostasis) used of God’s ‘very being’ at 1:3 and of the steadfastness of the addressees at 3:14. A subjective meaning is not attested. Although there may be a hint of the ethical sense, it is difficult to construe with the following phrase. Philosophical connotations are probably at the forefront. The homilist thus defines faith in terms of its ultimate object, the ‘reality of things hoped for’, the content of God’s promises. Similarly, the word translated ‘conviction’ (elegchos) has objective connotations. Faith is thus defined, in terms of the actions that it inspires, as the ‘proof of things unseen’. Those invisible things are both the objects of future hope and the transcendent realities, God and his exalted Son, that guarantee hope. Rom 8:24 similarly connects hope and things unseen. v. 2, this programmatic verse defines the aim and method of the chapter. The word translated ‘receive approval’ in the NRSV (emarturēthēsan) means more literally ‘received testimony’. It was by virtue of their faithfulness that the ancestors were recorded in Scripture. Cf. 11:4, 5 for examples of this ‘testimony’, v. 3, the first element of the catalogue is distinctive, although it appropriately begins the temporal sequence by referring to creation. For creation in similar catalogues, see Sir 43; 2 Macc 7:28. The verse suggests that faith plays a role in the reception of scriptural truth; it produces ‘understanding’. Creation by God’s word recalls Gen 1:3 and related accounts (Ps 33:6; Wis 9:1; Jn 1:1–3; Heb 1:3; 1 Clem. 17:4). The creation of the visible from the invisible, resembling other formulas for creation (2 Macc 7:28; 2 Enoch 24:2; Rom 1:20; 4:17), denies the autonomy of the natural world.

(11:4–7) The Primordial Heroes v. 4, the first exemplar performed an ‘acceptable sacrifice’ (Gen 4:4) and died a martyr’s death (Gen 4:8). The notion that Abel ‘still speaks’ derives from Gen 4:10 where his blood cries out, but here the speaking ‘by faith’ suggests that Abel offers an example to be followed. Heb 12:24 will further play with the image. v. 5, Gen 5:24 reports that God took Enoch, presumably in death. Jewish tradition (e.g. Sir 44:16; 1 Enoch, 12:3; 15:1; 2 Enoch, 22:8; 71:14; Philo, Mutat. 38; Jos. Ant. 1.85; 3 Enoch) interprets removal as translation to heaven, an understanding reflected in the LXX, cited here. That Enoch ‘pleased God’ rests on Gen 5:22; the addressees will be summoned to do likewise (13:16). v. 6, two conditions for those who ‘approach’ (cf. 4:16; 7:25; 10:1, 22) God help define faith’s cognitive content. Insistence on God’s existence is a common Jewish tenet (e.g. Wis 13:1; Philo, Opif. 170; 2 Esd 7:23; 8:58). Belief in divine providence focuses on God as one who rewards; cf. 2:2; 10:35; 11:26. The image of the 'seeker' is common in the Psalms (14:2; 34:10; 53:2; 119:2); cf. Am 9:12, cited in Acts 15:17. v. 7, Noah's story (Gen 6:8–9:17; Sir 44:17) highlights characteristic themes. He believed in the 'unseen' event of divine judgement. That he 'condemned' the world may allude to traditions that he preached repentance (1 Clem. 7:6; Sib. Or. 1.125–36; Sifre 43). What follows intensifies the connection between faith and 'being an heir'.

(11:8–22) The Faith of Abraham Appeals to Abraham and the other patriarchs were common in Jewish and early Christian literature; cf. Sir 44:19–21; 1 Macc 2:52; 4 Macc 16:20; Wis 10:5; Acts 7:2–8; Rom 4; Gal 3:6–9. v. 8, Abraham 'set out' from Ur of the Chaldees to Canaan; cf. Gen 11:31–12:4. His 'inheritance' was something unseen and hence unknown. v. 9, Abraham's time in Canaan further illustrates the alienation that faith can produce. Cf. Gen 17:8; 23:4, for Abraham as sojourner in Canaan. The traditional connection with Isaac and Jacob suggests the communal context of faith. v. 10, an interruption to the story suggests the content of the promised inheritance. The city on 'foundations' recalls scriptural images of Jerusalem (Isa 54:11; Ps 87:1). Like Philo (Leg. All. 3.83; Somm. 2.250), the homilist redefines the ideal city as the heavenly reality to which Christians aspire (12:22). Description of God as 'architect and builder', found in Hellenistic Jewish sources (Philo, Opif. 146), echoes the Platonic image of the divine Craftsman (Tim. 28A–29A). v. 11, Gen 17:15–18:15; 21:1–7 relates Isaac's conception and birth. The reference to Sarah appears variously in ancient witnesses. In some, she is the subject of the sentence; in others, more likely original, she is associated with Abraham. In either case, her prominent involvement in the process renders the image of the faithful community more inclusive. Abraham's belief that God 'who promised' (cf. 6:13) is faithful echoes the homilist's own (10:23). v. 12, Paul too (Rom 4:19) described the aged Abraham as 'good as dead'. Abraham's rescue from a metaphorical 'death' parallels the actual deliverance of Enoch (11:4) and foreshadows the resurrection; cf. vv. 19, 35. A scriptural phrase (Gen 22:17; cf. Dan 3:36) describes the ultimate results of Isaac's birth.

v. 13, Heb 6:15 remarked that Abraham did receive the promised progeny. As 4:1 made clear, other promises remained unfulfilled. The patriarchs in Canaan resembled Moses outside the promised land (Deut 32:48; 34:4); they could see the object of their hopes only 'from a distance'. For 'foreigners and sojourners', see Gen 23:4; 47:4, 9; Lev 25:23; Ps 39:12; 1 Chr 29:15; Eph 2:19; 1 Pet 1:1; 2:11. Similar imagery in Greek sources describes the human condition 'on the earth', in exile from the heavenly home, cf. Plato, Ap. 41A; Phd. 61E, 67B; Philo, Quis Heres, 82, 267. v. 14, the 'confession', particularly in Gen 23:4, provides grounds for holding that even in the land of Canaan the patriarchs were seeking their homeland elsewhere. The argument parallels the elimination of Canaan as the true 'resting place' of God's people at 4:7–8. v. 15, a contra-factual argument (cf. 4:8; 7:11; 8:7; 10:12) precludes the identification of Haran as the desired destination. v. 16, with Canaan and Haran eliminated, the homeland must be heavenly. God is frequently styled the God of the patriarchs; cf. Gen 28:13; Ex 3:6; Mt 22:32; Mk 12:26–7. The heavenly 'city' that God prepared receives a fuller description at 12:18–24.

v. 17, like the first (11:4) and last (12:1–3) examples, faith involves sacrifice. The most poignant episode of Abraham's story is the Aqedah (Binding) of his son Isaac (Gen 22:1–14). The episode captured the imagination of Jewish (Wis 10:5; Sir 44:20; 1 Macc 2:52; 4 Macc 16:18–20; Jub. 17:15–18; Jos. Ant. 1.222–36; Philo, Abr. 167–207) and Christian (Rom 8:32; Jas 2:20–3) interpreters. v. 18, recollection of the promise of Gen 21:12 emphasizes the horrific challenge of God's request. v. 19, as in vv. 10 and 11, the homilist explains Abraham's motives in terms of a belief that he advocates. The phrase 'figuratively speaking' suggests not simply that the recovery of Isaac from the altar was a metaphor, but that the whole episode prefigured Christ's deliverance from death. v. 20, Gen 27:27–40 records Isaac's blessings of Jacob and Esau. v. 21, Gen 48:8–22 records Jacob's blessing on Ephraim and Manasseh. Gen 47:31 notes Jacob's action in 'bowing in worship' at the head of his bed. The Greek translation, cited here, renders 'bed' as 'staff'. The action indicates that Jacob's blessing is connected with his fidelity to God. v. 22, the reference to Joseph's prophecy (Gen 50:24) introduces the following section. His request to transfer his bones (Gen 50:25) hints at hope for their future.

(11:23–8) The Faith of Moses v. 23, for similar appeals to Moses, see Sir 45:1–5; Acts 7:20–34. Moses as a faithful servant appeared at Heb 3:1–6. For his infancy, see Ex 2:1–10. Philo (Vit. Mos. 1.10–11) and Josephus (Ant. 2.218) expand on the episode. The detail that his parents 'did not fear' is unbiblical and stands in tension with the notice that the Hebrew midwives were afraid (Ex 1:17, 21). Hebrews intimates what the addressees' attitude should be. After this verse some MSS refer to the slaying of an Egyptian (Ex 2:11–12; cf. Acts 7:24). v. 24, as Abraham rejected the security of his earthly homeland, Moses rejected his princely status; cf. Ex 2:10. A romance by Artapanus, preserved in Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 9.27.1–37, significantly embellished this portion of Moses' story. v. 25, Moses' choice of suffering over pleasure interprets Gen 2:11–15, where he identifies with the Israelites. The language recalls the story of Herakles' choice of a life of toil (Xen. Mem. 2.1.21–34), which exhibits a similar parenthetic intent. v. 26, as with other heroes (vv. 10, 11, 19), the homilist explains the motivation of Moses. How Moses might have understood his sufferings to be 'for the Christ' is obscure. Perhaps as a visionary (v. 27) he foresaw the Messiah's coming and acted accordingly. v. 27, Ex 2:15 reports the departure of Moses; cf. Acts 7:29. That he encountered God 'face to face' appears at Ex 33:11; Num 12:8; Deut 34:10; Sir 45:5. v. 28, for the celebration of the first Passover, see Ex 12:1–28.

(11:29–40) The Faith of Prophets and Martyrs v. 29, attention shifts to groups within ancient Israel and the survey moves more rapidly. For crossing the Red Sea, see Ex 14. v. 30, Josh 6 recounts the fall of Jericho. v. 31, for Rahab and the spies, see Josh 2:1–21; 6:17. v. 32, the judges are listed out of scriptural order. For Gideon, see Judg 6–8; Barak, Judg 4–5; Samson, Judg 13–16; Jephthah, Judg 11–12. David and Samuel occupy 1 and 2 Samuel. v. 33, for 'shutting the mouth of lions', see Judg 14:6; 1 Sam 17:34–5; Dan 6:19–23. v. 34, for quenching fire, see Dan 3 and the LXX addition, Pr Azar 26–7, 66. 'Strength out of weakness' may allude to Gideon (Judg 6:15), Samson (Judg 16:17), or heroines such as Esther and Judith. v. 35, 1 Kings 12:17–24; 2 Kings 4:18–37 record resurrections. Eleazar (2 Macc 6:18–31) and the seven youths (2 Macc 7) endured martyrdom hoping for resurrection. v. 36, chains and imprisonment evoke Jeremiah; cf. Jer 20:2; 29:26; 37:15. v. 37, Zechariah was 'stoned' (2 Chr 24:21). Christian sources (Tert. Scorp. 8; Hippol. On the Antichrist, 31) attribute the same fate to Jeremiah. The Martyrdom of Isaiah 5:11–14 reports that he was 'sawn in two'. The 'skins of sheep and goats' recalls the distinctive mantle of Elijah and Elisha; cf. 1 Kings 19:13 (LXX); 2 Kings 2:13–14 (LXX). v. 38, 'deserts' are the home of Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings 19:4; 2 Kings 2:8). 'Caves' sheltered judges (Judg 6:2), prophets (1 Kings 18:4; 19:9), and rebels (2 Macc 10:6). 'Holes in the ground' appear in Scripture (e.g. Ob 1:3; Zech 14:12), but not as homes for heroes. v. 39, the note that the heroes were 'recommended' repeats the theme that they 'received testimony' (11:2). Like the patriarchs (11:13), they did not attain the 'promise' of eschatological salvation. v. 40, that salvation, 'something better', is the 'heavenly city' of 12:18–24. To enter that realm requires being 'made perfect', which is only possible through Christ's sacrifice; cf. 7:19; 10:10, 14. Although such perfection is available with the inauguration of the new covenant, its effects extend to the heroes of the old.

(12:1–3) Faith's Author and Perfecter The catalogue of heroes culminates in the paradigmatic case of one faithful to God in the face of suffering and rejection, Jesus. v. 1, The metaphor of a cloud for a group is classical (Homer, Iliad, 4.274). They are 'witnesses' both as spectators of life's athletic contest and as those who testify to God's fidelity. To 'lay aside every weight' furthers the athletic imagery. The description of sin as 'clinging closely' connotes hostility. To depict the moral life as an athletic contest is a homiletic commonplace; cf. Acts 20:24; 1 Cor 9:24–7; Gal 2:2; Phil 2:16; 2 Tim 4:7. v. 2, Jesus, the 'pioneer' (cf. 2:10), is also the 'perfecter' of faith, who has completed the course and thereby provided 'perfection' for others; cf. 2:10; 5:8–9; 7:28; 10:14. The ambiguous preposition translated for the sake of' (anti) could mean 'instead of'. The goal-oriented character of Jesus' conduct is suited to the image of the race and to the theme of reward; cf. 10:34; 11:6, 16, 26. For the 'shame' of death on a cross, see Cicero, Contra Verrem, 1.5.62; Gal 5:11; Phil 2:8. An allusion to Ps 110:1 concludes the references to the text; cf. 1:3, 13; 8:1; 10:12. v. 3, Jesus' followers must accept hostility and dishonour as did he; cf. 10:33; 13:13.

(12:4–13) A Homily on Endurance v. 4, the imagery shifts from racing to the 'struggle' of boxing. For a similar image, see Sen. Ep. 13:2. vv. 5–6, the homilist cites Prov 3:11–12 in its Greek form. v. 7, sapiential literature frequently offered advice on educational discipline; cf. Prov 5:12; 13:24; 15:32; Job 5:17; Sir 22:6; 23:2. Such advice could then be construed as a principle of theodicy: suffering was meant for human education; cf. Prov 6:23; 2 Macc 6:12–17; 2 Cor 6:9; Eph 6:4. v. 8, suffering is particularly required for those who share the status of the Son; cf. 5:7–9. v. 9, an analogy between human and divine fathers uses a solemn liturgical epithet, 'Father of spirits'; cf. 2 Macc 3:24; Dan 5:14; 1 Enoch 37:2–4; 1QH 10:8; Rev 22:6. v. 10, the analogy contrasts the 'seeming' benefits of earthly discipline with the true benefit of divine discipline, which produces 'holiness'; cf. 10:14. v. 11, the contrast of temporary pain and long-term gain is proverbial; cf. Prov. 23:13–14; Wis 3:5; Diog. Laert. Lives of the Philosophers, 5.1.18. For the 'fruit of righteousness', see Am 6:12; Prov 11:30. 'Peace' and 'righteousness' frequently appear together; cf. Isa 32:17; Ps 85:10. v. 12, the image of 'drooping hands' and 'weak knees', derived from Isa 35:3, comports with the athletic imagery of vv. 1–3. v. 13, Prov 4:26 in Greek supplies the image of 'straight paths'. The promise to 'be healed', echoing Prov 4:22, ends the admonition on a positive note.

Final Advice about Life in the New Covenant (12:14–13:17)

(12:14–17) Transitional Admonition v. 14, the call to 'pursue peace' is common in Jewish homiletics; cf. Ps 34:14; T. Sim. 5:2; m. 'Abot, 1:12; Mt 5:9; 1 Pet 3:11, citing Ps 34:14. For the connection of sanctity and seeing God, see Mt 5:8. v. 15, the 'root of bitterness' recalls Deut 29:18, a warning against apostasy from the covenant community. Such behaviour could involve detestable idols (Deut 29:17) through which many could be 'defiled'. v. 16, for Esau's sale of his birthright, see Gen 25:29–34. Based upon his marriage to the Hittites Judith and Basemath (Gen 26:34), Jewish tradition (Jub. 25:1–8; Philo, Virt. 208; Gen. Rab. 65) portrayed him as lewd and 'immoral'. v. 17, what the addressees 'know' is Gen 27:30–40, the story of Esau's attempt to reverse Isaac's blessing of Jacob. The detail of Esau's weeping embellishes the biblical story; cf. Jub. 26:33; Jos. Ant. 1.275. That he found 'no place for repentance' reinforces the earlier warnings (6:4–8; 10:26–31); cf. Deut 29:20.

(12:18–29) Sinai and the Heavenly Jerusalem Visions of eschatological realities ground the ethical exhortation. v. 18, marvellous phenomena evoke divine theophanies. 'What can be touched' recalls the palpable darkness of Ex 10:21. 'Fire... darkness... tempest' all characterized the events at Sinai; cf. Deut 4:11. 'Gloom' is a poetic term embellishing the biblical description. v. 19, the 'trumpet' recalls Ex 19:16; the 'voice' is from Deut 4:12. For eschatological trumpets, see 1 Thess 4:16; 1 Cor 15:52; Mt 24:31; Rev 8:2. For the frightened plea, see Ex 20:19; Deut 5:25. v. 20, the prohibition of Ex 19:12–13 was a cause of fear. v. 21, the reaction of Moses to the golden calf (Deut 9:19) expresses his terror at Sinai. v. 22, 'Mt. Zion', in Jerusalem, is the place of God's presence; cf. Ps 2:6; 48:1; Isa 8:18; 1 Kings 14:21; 1 Macc 4:37. Mountain and 'city' are frequently associated; cf. Mic 4:1; Joel 2:32; Am 1:2. Speculation about a 'heavenly Jerusalem' was a part of apocalyptic literature; cf. Rev 21:2–7. For the phrase 'living God', see 3:12; 9:14; 10:31. 'Innumerable angels' are present at theophanies (Deut 33:2; Ps 68:17–18) and in the heavenly court (Dan 7:10; 1QS 11:8). Their 'festal gathering' recalls the joyous 'sabbath celebration' of 4:9. v. 23, the 'assembly of the first-born' are the fellow heirs of the 'firstborn' Son; cf. 1:6, 13; 3:1. Being 'made perfect' now characterizes the presence in the heavenly assembly of those who have been cleansed (10:14) and who share Christ's exalted status (2:10). v. 24, for Jesus as 'mediator' of the covenant, see 8:6; for his blood, see 9:14. The 'better word' is his message of true and lasting remission of sin; cf. 9:14; 10:16–18. For an allusion to Abel's blood crying out, see 11:4. v. 25, the transition to a renewed warning is abrupt. The call to 'see' recalls 3:11; the a fortiori analogy resembles 2:1–4. The 'one who warns from heaven' is probably God, whose speech has been heard throughout Hebrews. v. 26, Hag 2:6 in Greek predicts a cosmic earthquake, a regular feature of the coming Day (10:25); cf. 1 Enoch, 60:1; 2 Esd 3:18; Sib. Or. 3.675; Mt 24:29; 27:51. The image of universal destruction recalls Ps 102:26–7, cited at 1:10–12. v. 27, an exegetical comment focuses on the adverb 'yet once more', better translated 'once, for all time'. Used also for Christ's definitive sacrifice (9:26–8), the word implies not an alteration but a definitive 'removal' (cf. 7:12; 11:5) of the created order. 'What cannot be shaken' are those abiding realities, the heavenly 'rest' (4:11) and the 'heavenly city' (12:22; 13:14). v. 28, expectation of an eschatological 'kingdom' rests on texts such as Dan 7:18 (LXX). For Jesus, the reign of God began within his own ministry (Lk 11:20). For Hebrews, God's eschatological rule, inaugurated at least in a preliminary fashion by Christ's exaltation, requires 'thanks' in a community of worship; cf. 13:15. v. 29, the passage concludes with an adaptation of Deut 4:24, part of a warning to remember the covenant and to shun idolatry; cf. Ex 24:17; Deut 9:3.

(13:1–17) Concluding Exhortations v. 1, for 'mutual love', see Rom 12:10; 1 Thess 4:9; 1 Pet 1:22; 2 Pet 1:7. v. 2, for encouragement to 'hospitality', see Mt 25:35; Rom 12:13; 1 Tim 3:2; Titus 1:8; 1 Pet 4:9. Various scriptural figures 'entertained angels'; cf. Gen 18:2–15; 19:1–14; Judg 6:11–24; 13:3–23. v. 3, the addressees had a history of supporting prisoners; cf. 10:34. v. 4, Christians regularly advised chastity; cf. 1 Cor 5:1–13; Eph 5:3–5; 1 Thess 4:3–7. v. 5, 'Love of money' was generally viewed unfavourably; cf. Mt 6:19–21, 24–34; Lk 12:22–34; 1 Tim 6:10; Jas 5:1–5. Exhortations to 'be content' were commonplace in classical moralists; cf. Epict. Diss. 1.1.27; Marcus Aurelius, Meditations 10.1. For God's promise not to forsake his people, see Deut 31:6, 8; Josh 1:5. v. 6, the response to God's promise is a prayer of trust, Ps 118:6 (LXX).

v. 7, references to 'leaders' frame the next block of exhortations; cf. 13:17. The addressees are to 'consider' them, as they did Jesus (12:2). For other calls to 'imitate' leaders, see 1 Cor 4:6; 11:1; 1 Thess 1:6; 2:14; 2 Thess 3:9; 1 Clem. 5:2–7. v. 8, the concise formulation of the eternal presence of Christ parallels Ps 102, cited at 1:12. v. 9, warnings against 'strange teachings' are conventional in second-generation Christian literature; cf. Col 2:8; Eph 4:14; 1 Tim 1:3–7. The opposition of 'grace' and 'food' hint at ill-defined controversies, perhaps over Jewish dietary observances, Jewish or philosophical ascetical practices, or various forms of sacral dining. v. 10, to whatever the practice criticized in v. 9, the homilist poses the alternative of the Christians' 'altar', probably an allusion to the 'once for all' sacrifice of Christ on the cross. To that sacrifice priests of the old cult have no access. Access is now expressed in terms of the 'right to eat' of the sacrifice. The homilist may suggest that Christians have a sacrifice from which they do have the 'right to eat', i.e. the eucharist. Yet he may simply use a metaphor for access to the true, spiritual sacrifice of the high priest. v. 11, attention turns to the ethical implications of participation in Christ's sacrifice as the homilist introduces a cultic image based on Lev 16:27. The bodies of the animals sacrificed on the Day of Atonement are burnt, and hence not available for physical consumption. More significantly, the burning takes place 'outside the camp'. v. 12, the parallel to the death of Jesus reflects traditions about the locale of his crucifixion (Jn 19:17–20 and perhaps Mt 21:39; Lk 20:15). v. 13, the application of the latest sacrificial image reinforces the appeal to accept the reproach and 'abuse' of being Christian; cf. 10:33; 11:25–6; 12:2. v. 14, Christians thus are like Abraham, expecting the final coming of the heavenly Jerusalem; cf. 11:10; 12:22. v. 15, Lev 7:11–18 designates 'sacrifices of praise' as a specific form of offering, communion sacrifices offered with unleavened bread, but the phrase comes to be used as a metaphor for prayer; cf. Ps 50:14, 23; 107:22. The latter meaning seems to be in view here, where the sacrifice is specified as 'fruit of lips' (Prov 18:20; Hos 14:3; Ps. Sol. 15:3; 1QS 9:4–5. Thanksgiving psalms in particular 'confess' the Lord's name; cf. Ps 44:8; 54:6; 99:3. v. 16, the language of sacrifice is applied to moral behaviour at Rom 12:1–2; Phil 2:17; 1 Pet 2:5. With such worship (cf. 12:28) one can, like Enoch, please God; cf. 11:5–6. v. 17, for a similar call to obey leaders, see 1 Pet 5:5. Herm. Vis. 3.9.10 displays an analogous concern for the account that a leader would have to render; cf. 4:12–13.

(13:18–25) Benediction and Epistolary Postscript v. 18, petitions for prayer are common in epistles; cf. 1 Thess 5:25; 2 Thess 3:1; Rom 15:30; Col 4:3; Ign. Trall. 12:3; Eph. 10:1; 21:1. Paul at 2 Cor 1:12 makes a similar appeal to his 'clear conscience'. v. 19, for the hope to come 'very soon'; cf. 1 Tim 3:14. v. 20, similar benedictions appear in many epistles; cf. 1 Thess 5:23; 2 Thess 3:16; 2 Tim 4:22; Rom 15:33; 1 Clem. 64a. The reference to bringing 'back from the dead' is the most explicit description of the resurrection in a text that deals primarily with Christ's exaltation. There were, however, allusions to resurrection at 11:12, 19. The epithet 'great shepherd' is unusual in Hebrews and may reflect such traditions as Jn 10:11, 14; Herm. Vis. 5.2.1; Herm. Sim. 10.1.1. The 'blood of the covenant' is a motif firmly rooted in Hebrews; cf. 9:14, 22–3; 12:24. v. 21, for similar doxologies, see Phil 4:20; Rom 16:20; 2 Tim 4:18; 1 Pet 5:11; 1 Clem. 64b. v. 22, 'word of exhortation' is apparently a technical term for a homily (Acts 13:15). v. 23, news and travel plans often appear in letters; cf. 2 Tim 4:20–1; Philem 22; Col 4:7–8. 'Timothy' is probably Paul's companion; cf. Acts 16:1–3; 17:14–15; 1 Tim; 2 Tim. v. 24, for personal greetings, see 1 Thess 5:26; 2 Thess 3:17; Phil 4:21–2; 2 Tim 4:19, 21; Rom 16:21–3; Col 4:10–18; 1 Pet 5:13–14. v. 25, a wish for grace or peace constitutes the standard epistolary farewell; cf. 1 Thess 5:28; 2 Thess 3:18; Philem 4:23; 2 Tim 4:21b; Philem 25; Rom 16:20; Eph 6:23; Col 4:18b; 1 Pet 5:14b; 1 Clem. 65:2.

For further reading see Bibliographical Guide.

INTRODUCTION

A. Language and Text. 1. James is written in good, but not elegant Greek. The author has composed short sentences rather than long and beautiful periods. Paronomasia and other Greek speech forms show that the letter is not simply a translation from a Semitic original, but it cannot be proved that the author used the LXX. The high occurrence of Semitisms (Mussner 1987: 30–2) cannot be explained by the use of traditional material only. Of special interest are parallels to the Hebrew Dead Sea scrolls. Bilingualism was widespread in first-century Palestine, even the scribe of the great Isaiah scroll from Qumran (1QIs^a) was fluent in Greek. Apparently the author of James was also a bilingual Palestinian Jew.

2. Claims that a scrap of papyrus from Qumran (7Q8) contains Jas 1:23–4 have been disproved (RevQ 18 (1997), 307–24), by showing it to be part of 1 Enoch 103 in Greek. Fragments of James are preserved in three papyri of the third century P²⁰, P²³, and P¹⁰⁰). The whole letter is included in the fourth-century codices, Sinaiticus (Σ) and Vaticanus (B), the latter attesting the best text-form. The text of James is not so well preserved as that of other NT documents, which might partially be explained by its rather complicated canonical history.

B. Literary Genre and Subject-Matter. 1. James is an encyclical letter to an unknown number of Greek-speaking (Jewish) Christian churches. Starting with the Letter of Jeremiah (Jer 29; cf. 2 Macc 1–2; 2 Apoc. Bar 78–86; Par. Jer. 6:17–23) there was a tradition of Jewish letters to the Diaspora (Tsuiji 1997; Niebuhr 1998). Early form-critics assigned James to the literary genre of the Hellenistic diatribe (Dibelius 1976), but it is doubtful that this is more than a literary style (Baasland 1988). There are some parallels to synagogal homilies, but also to the structure of the Manual of Discipline (1QS) and the annexed Rule of the Congregation (1QSa) from Qumran (Beck 1973). Formal parallels exist also to Christian catechetical traditions and writings (connected with baptism?) such as the Matthean Sermon on the Mount or the Lukan Sermon on the Plain, 1 Peter, and the Didache. The use of an elementary narrative marshāl form (1:23–4; 2:2, 15–17), not attested in the earlier wisdom literature but in the Jesus tradition, is a rather ancient feature.

2. In the opening paragraph on temptation (1:2–18), James already introduces most of the other main subjects of his letter. That the ‘word (logos) of truth’ (1:18) must be obeyed is the theme of 1:19–27. The practical ‘testing of faith’ (pistis, 1:3) is treated at length in 2:1–26. The ethics of speech (1:19–21, 26–7) is a very important subject (Baker 1995), especially in the admonition for teachers (3:1–12). That wisdom (sophia) and humility (tapeinōsis) belong together (1:5, 9–10) finds its exposition in 3:13–4:12. The apocalyptic admonition of the rich (1:10–11) continues in 4:13–5:6. What ‘endurance’ (hypomōnē, 1:3–4) means in practice is explained in the last part of the letter (5:7–20). As it is typical for the internationality of wisdom literature, parallels to James can be found not only in the OT and Jewish writings, but also in Near-Eastern and Graeco-Roman wisdom traditions. The book of Proverbs is cited and Sirach probably and the Wisdom of Solomon possibly alluded to, but the strongest allusions are to the words of Jesus and other early Christian traditions. James’s combination of wisdom, ethics, and eschatology resembles the Enochic tradition (1 Enoch, 92–105) and the thinking of the Essene community of Qumran (Davids 1982: 51–4; Penner 1996), especially in a very fragmentary Sapiential work (4Q185).

C. The Religious Teaching. 1. Wisdom Theology. The letter grows out of the OT and intertestamental wisdom traditions. God who created the world will also bring it to eschatological completion in a new creation. The work of God in creation, salvation, and new creation forms a unity mediated by divine wisdom.

2. Christology. James can speak about Jesus in the same way as he speaks about God (Karrer 1989). Jesus is not only the promised Messiah (christos) but also Lord (kyrios). Apparently, the author does not reveal all that he knows about Jesus (Mussner 1987: 250–3), but the letter may even see in him the incarnation of God’s pre-existent wisdom. The teachings of Jesus are treated as the ultimate revelation of wisdom.

3. Eschatology. The letter anticipates the Second Coming of Christ in the near future who is pictured as judge like the Son of Man in the Enochic and the Synoptic traditions. This expectation implies belief in the resurrection of Jesus.

4. Anthropology. Portraying the eschatological goal as human perfection, the author is not a perfectionist or illusionist. He sees clearly that believers can do wrong and need repentance and forgiveness. Following the Jewish idea of the ‘evil inclination’, for James sin is not only an act of human decision, but a cosmic power.

5. Soteriology. Since it seems quite unsure that James reacts directly against the theology of Paul (Johnson 1995: 111–16) the letter should primarily be understood on its own terms. The OT as interpreted and supplemented by Jesus is the ‘perfect law’. But salvation cannot be obtained by a fulfilment of this law alone, since the members of James’s community are also prone to fail. God’s forgiveness is necessary, but how it is mediated is only hinted at. Spiritual rebirth by God’s free will and word, baptism in the name of Jesus, submission to God, prayer and repentance all play their part (Konradt 1998). There might be allusions to Jesus’ vicarious suffering as the Servant of the Lord, but James concentrates on the warning that there is no relation to God without an elementary ethical commitment to human beings. With his emphasis on loving God and one’s neighbour inspired by Jesus’ double commandment James comes near to the Pauline ‘faith working through love’ (Gal 5:6), but he lacks Paul’s deep theological definition of faith. For James belief in the existence of God and, using older terminology (cf. 1 Cor 12:9; 13:2), belief in his miraculous power is also faith. Paul's stress of the sovereignty of God has a certain parallel in James's emphasis on the election of the poor and humble.

6. Ethics of Speech. In an age of ideology and media propaganda it is appropriate to remember that disputes and even wars often start with words. The truly wise know to govern their tongue.

7. Poor and Rich. Today the letter attracts theologians from the Third World since in following the teaching of Jesus, James is very critical of the rich. Nevertheless, salvation is not guaranteed by bad material circumstances but is obtained by loving God and one's neighbour.

8. Testing and Suffering. Believers must make a difference between temptations caused by their own evil desires and God's testing especially through oppression and persecution. Suffering should create anticipated eschatological joy.

9. Prayer. There are two main functions of prayer, namely to ask for wisdom and to obtain healing. Prayer should connect the believer with God and meet his elementary needs without guaranteeing material wealth. The author lived with Jesus' promises on prayer.

10. Judaism. The Jewish character of James is so strong that in former times some scholars hypothesized an only secondarily Christianized Jewish document (similarly Ludwig 1994). But this overlooks how strongly James is embedded in Jesus' teaching (Deppe 1989) and early Christian tradition. If rather early, the letter might have been read also to some synagogue congregations not yet decided about the new Messianic faith (Schlatter 1932: 62). James is an interesting example of Jewish-Christian dialogue. The letter shows the deep roots of the Jesus movement in the OT and also in Jewish Wisdom and Apocalyptic without denying its own identity, that of belief in the Messianic fulfilment.

D. The Author. 1. The simple presentation of a certain 'James' as author in the prescript (1:1) may already point to the most famous bearer of this name in NT times, 'James, the brother of the Lord' (cf. Jude 1). In the fourth century Helvidius made James out to be a blood brother of Jesus and Jerome considered him a cousin, but the second-century tradition thought of a step-brother stemming from an earlier marriage of Joseph (Bauckham 1990: 19–32). James did not follow Jesus (Jn 7:5) and was converted only by an appearance of the risen Lord (1 Cor 15:7). As a representative of the family of Jesus he was the leader of an influential group in the primitive Jerusalem community (Gal 1:19; Acts 1:13). When after the persecution of Agrippa I (41–4 CE) the twelve left Jerusalem, James became the only leader (Acts 12; Gal 2:9). The interfering of Jewish Christians close to him in the mixed community of Antioch (Gal 2:11–14) might be due to a widespread Jewish belief that Syria was part of a greater Holy Land and subject to its special regulations (Bockmuehl 1999). Such a belief can also explain the sending of an encyclical diaspora letter. Although being himself a conservative Jewish Christian at the Apostolic Council of 48 CE (Acts 15) James consented to the inclusion of Gentile Christians without total obedience to the Torah (Hengel 1985; Bauckham 1995). At the instigation of the high priest Ananus he died in 61 CE as a martyr for his belief in the messiahship of Jesus (Jos. Ant. 20. 200). Wherever in the early church the letter was believed to be authentic it was also ascribed to this James.

2. Many scholars put forward serious doubts against the authorship of James (Popkes 1986; Pratscher 1987; Konradt 1998), but with our deeper insight into the Hellenization of Judaea the argument of Greek language and style has lost much of its force. An encyclical Greek letter to the Diaspora could have been composed with the help of a secretary, as Jerome thought (PL 23. 639). Some scholars try to distinguish between an earlier version by James himself and a later edition by a rhetorically skilled writer (Davids 1982; Martin 1988). There are similarities between the vocabulary of James and Luke-Acts (Davids 1982: 49). That the letter does not refer to the Gentile mission and to problems of ritual law could be explained by an early date.

3. Some further observations may strengthen the case for authenticity. Obviously, the family of Jesus shared traditions of a pre-Qumranic non-sectarian Essenism (Sacchi 1993; Boccaccini 1998) that originated in the movement of the pious and often poor ḥasidīm (Betz and Riesner 1994: 143–7). The letter shows some proximity to the Enochic literature and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs which originated in such circles. Later James and his community lived near the Essene Quarter of Jerusalem (Riesner 1993; 1998b), which enhances the significance of the letter's parallels to the Dead Sea scrolls (Mussner 1987). James 'might well have formed a bridge between Galilean Christian Nazirites and the Qumran Covenanters' (Adamson 1989: 20), but an identification of the author with the Qumran 'Teacher of Righteousness' is fanciful. Besides Q, Matthean and Markan Jesus traditions (Hartin 1991) there is also knowledge of the Lukan special tradition (Davids 1982: 47–9) that was probably handed down by Jewish Christians gathered around the relatives of Jesus in Jerusalem and Judea (Riesner 1994). The letter is marked by a certain Judean local colour (Davids 1999). The Enochic flavour connects James, the Lukan special tradition, and Jude, also ascribed to a brother of Jesus.

E. Date and Place of Composition. 1. If the letter is pseudographic it must have been written after the death of James in 61 CE or more probably after the destruction of Jerusalem and the dispersion of its Jewish Christian community in 70 CE. Then parallels to such writings as 1 Peter, 1 Clement, and the Shepherd of Hermas are to be taken as signs of common socio-economic problems in Christian communities at the turn of the first to the second century (Frankemölle 1994). Under the pseudography hypothesis the letter could have been composed almost anywhere in the Roman world where Greek-speaking Christians were living, but some prefer Syria (Konradt 1998).

2. At the present time the authenticity hypothesis is gaining new defenders (Stulac 1993; Johnson 1995; Bauckham 1999), according to whom the letter was written from Jerusalem, where James resided, either before or after the Apostolic Council of 48 CE. Following earlier voices (Zahn 1906: 125–8; Mayor 1913) it is argued by some that the letter should be dated early (Moo 1985: 33–5; Penner 1996: 276–7). It could have been addressed to dispersed Jewish Christians (cf. Acts 8:1–3) between Alexandria, Antioch, and Cilicia (Geyser 1975) when rumours were heard that in circles of the Greek-speaking 'Hellenists' (Acts 6–7), to whom Paul later belonged (Acts 11:19–26; 13:1), obedience to God was rendered superfluous by faith. There are some striking parallels with 1 Cor 1–4. Could both James and Paul be reacting against Jewish Christians with former ties to Essene, Therapeut, and Baptist circles (1 Cor 11:2; 3:4–6; cf. Acts 18:24)? The instigators of the persecution seem to be the rich and politically influential (2:6–7). This fits better the time until the middle of the 40s (Riesner 1998a: 108–36), when the Jewish Christians were oppressed by the Sadducean oligarchy (Maynard-Reid 1987) and Jewish kings such as Agrippa I (Acts 3–9; 12). After the second half of the 40s persecution was instigated rather by Zealot movements (cf. Acts 15:1; 23:12–22).

F. Canonicity. 1. The parallels between James and 1 Peter are to be explained not by literary dependence but by the use of common Jewish-Christian material. At the turn of the first to the second century James was possibly known to Clement of Rome and the Roman Shepherd of Hermas, two writers heavily indebted to Jewish Christian traditions. At the end of the second century Irenaeus of Lyons, who was a native of Asia Minor, seems to have used James, but there is no trace of the letter in Tertullian's works. According to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 6.14.1) Clement of Alexandria wrote a commentary on all the Catholic Epistles at the turn of the third century, although in his preserved works James is not clearly cited. But at the beginning of the third century Clement's pupil Origen explicitly cited Jas 2:26 as scripture (PG 12. 1300). In the first half of the fourth century Eusebius wrote that formerly the authenticity of the letter was strongly disputed, although in his time it was read in most of the churches (Hist. Eccl. 2.23.25; 3.25.3). Probably the Jewish Christian origin of James had complicated its acceptance.

2. The letter is not included in the Muratorian Canon, compiled around 200 CE in Rome possibly by Hippolytus. But this can be due to the fragmentary nature of the list, since Hippolytus seems to have known James. The letter was part of the canon lists of Athanasius of Alexandria (367 CE), Innocent of Rome (405 CE), and the North African provincial synods of Hippo (393 CE) and Carthage (419 CE), but possibly already of the lists of the synods of Laodicea (360 CE) and Rome (382 CE).

3. Luther expressed severe doubts about its canonicity as James seems to contradict Paul's doctrine of justification by faith (Rom 3:20, 28; 4:16; cf. Jas 2:24). This position is still strongly defended (Lautenschlager 1990; Klein 1995). Together with other disputed writings (Hebrews, Jude, and Revelation) Luther placed the 'epistle of straw' at the end of his famous German translation of the NT from 1522. However, the letter was accepted without reservations by Calvin and the Reformed churches. In 1548 the council of Trent affirmed the canonicity and expressed its doctrine of justification in terms of James. The Common Declaration on Justification by the Roman Catholic and Lutheran churches from 1998/9 tries to bring together the different NT perspectives. James is part of the NT of the Orthodox churches, but was included in the Syriac Bible only since the fifth century. This seems astonishing in view of the influence of Jewish-Christian traditions in Syria. Apparently, the letter was sent to a very limited number of Greek-speaking communities.

G. Outline. Following Luther many thought that the letter has no good order, but today most discover a careful structure. If one pays attention to such formulas as 'my brothers [NRSV and sisters]' or 'listen' (RSV behold) and to such Jewish devices of composition as catchwords or symbolic numbers (3, 5, 7) the following structure seems possible:

Prescript (1:1)

Joy in Temptations (1:2–18)

Hearing, Speaking, Doing (1:19–27)

The Love Command and Dead Faith (2:1–26)

Ethics of Speech for Teachers (3:1–12)

The Wise and Humility (3:13–4:12)

Warning to the Rich (4:13–5:6)

Patience until the Coming of the Lord (5:7–20)

The overall structure—first some sort of beatitude (1:2, 12), then reprimand of the rich (4:13–5:6), then final exhortations (5:7–20)—resembles the Sermon on the Plain (Lk 6:20–49).

COMMENTARY

Prescript (1:1)

The prescript uses the common short form of the Hellenistic letter (cf. Acts 15:23; 23:26). The sender is introduced as 'James a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ'. As in the prescripts of Paul's (Gal 1:3; 1 Cor 1:3, etc.) and other NT letters (2 Pet 1:2) God and Jesus are put on the same level. In a Jewish environment this could cause the accusation of di-theism. In the first sentence of the letter the writer does not hide his faith in Jesus as the 'Christ'. The Greek christos translates the Hebrew masiah, 'the anointed', the Jewish king of the end-time promised by the OT. The addressees are 'the twelve tribes in the Dispersion (diaspora)', referring either generally to the Christians as the wandering people of God (cf. 1 Pet 1:1) or, as is more probable, to scattered Jewish-Christian communities outside Palestine. The prescript ends with the typical Greek formula of greeting (chairein).

Joy in Temptations (1:2–18)

(1:2–4) From Trials to Completion The unusual imperative to enjoy 'trials' (peirasmoi, v. 2) is explained by the fact that 'the testing of faith' can 'produce endurance' (v. 3). This idea with close parallels in Rom 5:2b–5 and 1 Pet 1:6–7 might have been part of early Christian baptismal instruction, ultimately going back to the teaching of Jesus (Mt 5:11–12; Lk 6:22–3). From endurance results, as 'full effect, that you may be complete [teleios, RSV perfect]' (v. 4), a goal that connects James with the Dead Sea scrolls (tāmim, 1QS), Paul (1 Cor 2:6; Phil 3:15; Col 4:12) and Matthew's Gospel (Mt 5:48; 19:21). In James as in Qumran and the rest of the NT completion is understood to be eschatological.

(1:5–8) Prayer for Wisdom That completion is still in the future is illustrated by the admonition to ask for more wisdom (v. 5). The phrasing reminds one of Jesus' logion about asking and receiving (Mt 7:7; Lk 11:9–10) and his promise of wisdom in times of trial (Lk 21:15). That God gives 'simply (haplōs) and without grudging' (own tr.) has its background in the Q-saying, Mt 7:7–8; Lk 11:13. In contrast to God human beings can be 'double-minded' (dipsychos) even in prayer (v. 8). At this point James apparently coined a new Greek word for a Palestinian-Jewish anthropological idea. That such a person is 'unstable in all his ways' (RSV) reminds one of the two-ways tradition (cf. Mt 7:13–14) that is already attested in Qumran (1QS 1:8 etc.) and became prominent in early Christian ethical teaching (Did. 1:1). That one should ask 'in faith never doubting' (1:6–7) is also inspired by Jesus' teaching (Mt 21:21–2; Mk 11:23–4).

(1:9–11) The Lowly and the Rich The raising up of the lowly and the bringing low of the rich and mighty (vv. 9–10) is an important motif of the Lukan special tradition (Lk 1:48, 52; 14:11; cf. Mt 23:12). That (rich) men 'disappear like a flower' (vv. 10–11) is already proverbial in the OT (Isa 40:6–7; Ps 103:15; cf. 4Q185; Mt 6:30; Lk 12:28 and Mt 13:6; Mk 4:6) and here expressed in a quite Semitic way.

(1:12–15) God and Temptation Beatitudes on those who 'endure temptations' are frequent in Jewish apocalyptic (Dan 12:12 Theod.; Ex. Rab. 31:3) and the Jesus tradition (Mt 5:3–11; Lk 20:22), v. 12 being possibly an unknown beatitude of Jesus (Adamson 1976: 68). The denial that God is the author of temptation (v. 13a) may correct a certain interpretation of the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6:13; Lk 11:4; cf. 1 Cor 10:13). Tempting someone to do evil is against the character of God (v. 13b; cf. Sir 15:11–12). Like Augustine (PL 38.453), the author seems to see in the testing of the faith of Abraham and Job something different. Although James believes in the involvement of demonic powers in temptation (3:15; 4:7) here he stresses human responsibility (v. 14; cf. 1 Enoch 98:4). The use of the term 'desire' (epithumia) is near to the psychological-ethical discussion in Qumran and the Rabbis (Kirk 1969–70; Marcus 1982) about the 'evil inclination' (yēser hā-ra') and not to Gnostic speculation about the evil of materiality. The personification of human desire giving birth to sin and death has its background either in Gen 3 (cf. Rom 7:7–12) or Prov 7:22–3. The triad 'desire, sin, death' (v. 15) forms a strong contrast to 'temptation, endurance, life' (v. 12).

(1:16–18) God's Perfect Gift The admonition in vv. 16–17 recapitulates some motives of the 'epitome of exhortation' in 1:2–15. The first part of v. 17 may be the quotation of a pagan proverb in hexameter form, but an allusion to a word of Jesus (Mt 7:11; Lk 11:13) is also possible. The 'perfect gift' (v. 17a) should not be restricted to wisdom (cf. 1:5), but characterizes all that God is doing. The designation of God as 'Father of lights' (v. 17b), that is the creator of the stars, is only found in a document from a wider Essenism (As. Mos. 36, 38, cf. T. Abr. 7:6; CD 5:17–18; 1QS 3:20). In contrast to human beings God does not waver and this is shown (as in Qumran) with an allusion to the majestic, regular movements of the stars. What kind of celestial phenomenon could be meant by the changeable shadow (v. 17c) is unclear, but comparable language is found in 4:14. In sharp contrast to human behaviour in 1:15, God performs a new creation by spiritual birth from his 'free will' (v. 18, own tr.). This idea has an antecedent in the apocalyptic preaching of John the Baptist (Mt 3:9; Lk 3:8), is clearly attested in the Jesus tradition (Mt 18:3; Jn 3:3, 5), and is common to all important strata of NT Christianity (1 Cor 4:15; Rom 12:2; Eph 1:5; Titus 3:5; 1 Pet 1:3; Jn 3:3–8; 1 Jn 3:9; 4:7). The idea appears often in baptismal texts, very close to James are the Petrine (1 Pet 1:23) and the pre-Johannine traditions (Jn 1:12–13). The 'word of truth' (v. 18) should not be restricted to the OT (cf. Ps 119:43) or OT law. The idiom has no real Jewish parallels but is attested in NT texts about conversion (2 Cor 6:7; Eph 1:13; Col 1:5; cf. 2 Tim 2:15). Possibly, in letters arguing with Christians under a certain Essene influence 'word of truth' is a designation for mission preaching (including elementary ethical instruction). Already Philo and the romance Joseph and Asenath, both in contact with Egyptian Essenic-Therapeutic circles, describe conversion as a coming from death to life and truth, implying the forgiveness of sins. When believers are called 'first fruits', this is the cultic language of offering (Ex 23:16; Lev 27:26; Deut 14:23, etc.) and may be a hint at Jesus' vicarious death and resurrection (cf. 1 Cor 15:20).

Hearing, Speaking, Doing (1:19–27)

(1:19–21) Quick to Hear, Slow to Speak 'You must understand this, my beloved' (v. 19a) marks a new section. The Semitic formulated proverb (v. 19b) has many parallels in wisdom literature (Sir 5:11; Eccl 5:1, etc.) as has the following theme 'slow to anger' (Eccl 7:9). Anger does not produce the divine standard of 'righteousness' (v. 20). Speech ethics has the negative aspect of getting rid of all false speech (v. 21a) and the positive one 'to receive [RSV] with meekness the implanted word (logos emphutos)' (v. 21b), an idiom reminding one of the explanation of the parable of the sower in its Lukan form (Lk 8:13; cf. 1 Pet 1:23). This enhances the possibility that as with 'the word of truth' (1:18) we have here an abbreviated term for the early Christian paradosis including the words of Jesus. Similar language is used in connection with mission preaching (Acts 1:14) and baptism (Col 3:8). A pre-Qumranic prayer (4Q504) earlier expressed the hope that God would 'sow' his word inwardly into man. The seed metaphor stresses the life-giving power of God's word. That the 'implanted word' has 'the power to save your souls' (v. 21c) may allude to Jesus' teaching about his words as the criterion of eschatological salvation (Mk 8:35–8; Lk 9:24–6).

(1:22–5) Doers, not Merely Hearers of the Word This admonition (vv. 22–3b) resembles Jesus' parable of the building of a house, stressing the importance of not only hearing but doing his word (Mt 7:24–7; Lk 6:47–9; cf. Origen, Hom. in Gen. 2.16). The use of mirrors as illustration (vv. 23b–4) was common in the religious and philosophical teaching of the ancient world. The idiom 'the perfect law . . . of liberty' (v. 25; cf. 2:15) is crucial for every general understanding of James. The strongly Semitic expression 'hearer of forgetfulness' (own tr.) argues against a Stoic background. As 'the royal law' in 2:8, 'the perfect law' should be understood as the OT law as interpreted and completed by Jesus (cf. Mt 5:17, 48). There might be a traditio-historical connection (Riesner 1997: 362–4) between Jas 1:21 ('meekness', 'saving the souls') and v. 25 ('law of freedom'), Jesus' invitation to bear his 'yoke' (i.e. law) as 'rest for your souls' (Mt 11:28–30), Paul's 'law of Christ' (Gal 6:1–2) that makes free (cf. Gal 5:1) and the pre-Johannine Amen-saying about the freedom from sin (Jn 8:34–6). Mention of the 'law of freedom' in Qumran (1QS 10:6, 8, 11) is disputed (cf. Ex 32:16), but similar language is found in Philo (Omn. Prob. 45).

(1:26–7) Pure Religion ‘Religion’ (thrēskeia) is defined primarily in ethical and not in ritual terms (v. 26). The quality of speech is the criterion for what is in the human heart (cf. Mt 12:34; Lk 6:45). To remain ‘unstained by the world’ (v. 27c) here means an ethical dualism (cf. 1 Enoch 48:7; 108:8; Apoc. Abr. 29:8; T. Iss. 4:6) and not a material one as in Gnosticism. To ‘care for orphans and widows’ (v. 27b) is a common command in the OT (Deut 14:28; Jer 5:28; Sir 4:10, etc.) and was practised with great care in the primitive community of Jerusalem (Acts 6:1–6). The ‘pure and undefiled’ religion (v. 27a; cf. Philo, Leg. All. 1.50) is addressed to ‘God, the Father’. To call God three times ‘Father’ (1:17, 27; 3:9) is unusually often in a Jewish writing and might echo Jesus’ regular address to God.

The Love Command and Dead Faith (2:1–26)

(2:1–4) No Faith with Favouritism In James ‘faith’ is closely bound to ethics, but this does not imply a low Christology. Jesus is called the ‘Christ’ (v. 1), fulfilling the OT and Jewish Messianic hope, but much more also. In view of the close parallel in 1 Cor 2:8 (kyrios iēs doxēs) ‘glory’ is to be seen as modifying ‘Lord’, meaning ‘the Lord of glory’ (v. 1). This designation may allude to Jesus’ transfiguration (Lk 9:32; cf. Jn 1:14). The term is found in 1 Enoch 22:14; 25:3; 27:3; 5:75:3 referring to God, but in 63:2 it may refer to the (pre-existent) ‘Son of Man’ (cf. 63:11). He is also called the ‘Lord of Wisdom’ (63:2), whose ‘mystery’ was not recognized by the kings and other powerful men (63:2–4). The messianic ‘Son of Man’ is in possession of the glory of God that Adam, the first man, had lost (Apoc. Mos. 20–1; cf. Gen 2). Thus Jesus’ designation as ‘Lord of glory’ may hint at his pre-existence and the fact that he was not recognized although God’s glory was revealed in him. The Jewish-Christian background of the letter is shown by the reference to the sitting order (Riesner 1995: 207–8) of a synagogue building (synagōgē, v. 2). The assembled community in James is not called ‘synagogue’ but by the more theological term ‘church’ (ekklesia, 5:14). The poor man is humbled by being given a bad place, whereas the rich receive seats of honour (vv. 2–3). Biased judgement of the poor (v. 4) is criticized by the OT (Lev 19:15), and also by Jesus (Lk 18:6). Concern for the poor is one of the main subjects of the Lukan special tradition.

(2:5–7) Poor and Rich The address ‘listen my... brothers’ (v. 5a) is also found in James’s speech at the apostolic council of Jerusalem according to Acts 15:13, but nowhere in the rest of the NT. Obviously, v. 5b reminds the readers of Jesus’ blessing on the poor as heirs of the kingdom of God (Mt 5:3; 5; Lk 6:20), although the basileia is not promised to the poor generally but to those ‘rich in faith and loving God’ (own tr.). The writer points to the experience of his readers: whereas they dishonour the poor, they themselves are brought to court by the rich (v. 6; cf. Lk 18:3). The rich also ‘blaspheme the excellent name that was invoked over you’ (v. 7). Since this cannot be the name of God it must be the name of Jesus invoked in baptism (cf. Acts 2:38; 8:16; 10:48; Herm. Sim. 9.16.3). v. 7 forms another curious parallel to the speech attributed to James in Acts 15:17.

(2:8–13) Love as the Royal Law Loving ‘your neighbour as yourself’ (Lev 19:18) is called the ‘royal law’ (nomos basilikos, 2:8). Jesus had already declared this OT command and love for God as the summary of the whole law (Mt 22:37–9; Mk 12:30–

1, and esp. Lk 10:25–8) and thus made it the law of the Messiah-King and his kingdom (basileia). For James the law is indivisible (v. 10; cf. Mt 5:18–19; Lk 3:9). The order of the commandments (Ex 20:13–14; Deut 5:17–18) on adultery and murder is (against Mt 19:18; Mk 10:19) the same as in Lk 18:20. To act against the poor (v. 9) is like murder and is judged by the law as such (v. 11; cf. Jer 7:6; 22:3; Sir 34:26; T. Gad. 4:6–7). When the law is again called a ‘law of freedom’ (v. 12) it is stressed that it is the law of Moses as interpreted, supplemented, and altered by Jesus (cf. 1:25). That ‘mercy’ is the criterion of judgement (v. 13) echoes Jesus’ beatitude on the merciful (Mt 5:7).

(2:14–17) Faith and the Needs of the Poor Here the writer for the first time introduces his conviction that faith (pistis) without works cannot save (v. 14), because such a faith is ‘dead’ (v. 17). ‘Having works’ is here defined as fulfilling the elementary claims of human behaviour. Someone pronouncing a blessing on brothers and sisters who lack both clothes and ‘daily food’ (cf. Lk 11:3) without helping them in their basic needs (vv. 15–16) would be unmerciful and sin against the teaching of Jesus (Mt 25:35–6; cf. 1 Jn 3:17). In the primitive community of Jerusalem there was a ‘daily distribution’ for the needy (Acts 6:1).

(2:18–20) No Faith without Works An imaginary interlocutor poses a question that is used by the writer to advance his argument: ‘But someone will say, “You have faith and I have works”’ (v. 18a). Since it would be illogical for an adversary to claim that he has deeds whereas James has faith, the probable meaning (Dibelius 1976: 156) of the objection is that faith and deeds can be separated since God has distributed them separately among different people. But according to James the sheer belief in the existence of the one God (cf. Deut 6:4) has no more saving power than the trembling belief of the demons in God’s supreme power (v. 19). There seems to be a play on the two related meanings of the Greek verb deiknumi, ‘to show’ and ‘to demonstrate’. Since for the writer faith without the practical proof of works is only an intellectual assent without personal commitment nothing can be ‘shown’ by it. But works can be ‘shown’ and by them someone’s faith is demonstrated (v. 18b). So he repeats his conviction that ‘faith without works is barren’ (v. 20; cf. 2:17).

(2:21–4) The Example of Abraham In Jewish tradition the binding of Isaac (2:21; cf. Gen 22) was the capstone of a series of testings of Abraham (1 Macc 2:52; Jub. 17:17; 19:8; m. ’Abot 5:3, etc.) and his final declaration as ‘righteous’ because of his acts of mercy (T. Abr. A 1.17; Tg. Ps. J. on Gen 21:33). Since Paul also in the context of justification and works (Rom 4:3) refers to the same scripture (Gen 15:6) many suppose a direct (polemical) reaction on James’s side (v. 23). But the terminological parallels can be explained by both authors referring to the Jewish tradition (Konradt 1998: 241–4). James uses this tradition as self-evident without arguing against Paul’s new interpretation of Abraham’s example apparently not known to him. For a direct connection one has to assume that the rather intelligent author of James did misrepresent the teaching of Paul. Paul argues against justification by ‘works of the law’ (erga nomou, Gal 2:16; 3:2, 10; Rom 3:20, 28; cf. 4QMMT col. 27; 4QFlor 1:6–7), that is acceptance of circumcision, purity, feasts, and other ritual regulations as a condition of salvation.

James has nothing to say about the ritual law but writes about elementary moral obligations (erga). Of course, James could react against a misunderstood liberalistic Paulinism, especially if the letter is rather early and written without first-hand knowledge either of Paul himself or of his letters. But James seems to be arguing not at all against a theological position but against an unchristian lifestyle. He faced problems similar to those of Paul in Corinth (1 Cor 1–4!), not like the disputes in Galatia. One should not misrepresent James, v. 24 does not read ‘man is justified by works alone’. For James faith is ‘active along with . . . works and faith [is] brought to completion by the works’ (v. 22). There are obvious terminological differences: whereas James could speak of a ‘dead’ or ‘barren’ faith (without works), for Paul faith without any sign of new life would not be faith at all.

(2:25–6) The Example of Rahab Even a problematic person such as this prostitute was proved righteous by risking her life to help the people of God (v. 25; cf. Josh 2:1–15). The maxim of 2:17, that faith without works is dead, is repeated (v. 26). One can say that ‘James, like Paul, is repeating what Jesus said. Paul repeats Mt 5:3, James repeats Mt 7:21–7. Paul is representing the beginning whereas James is representing the end of the Sermon on the Mount’ (Jeremias 1954–5: 371).

Ethics of Speech for Teachers (3:1–12)

The leading role of ‘teachers’ (didaskaloi) is part of a Jewish-Christian background (Zimmermann 1988: 194–208). The writer (‘we’) belongs to this class (v. 1) but he warns that ‘not many . . . should become teachers’ because of their special responsibility in view of God’s coming judgement (cf. Lk 12:48). Although the whole letter is an admonition to become ‘perfect’ the writer himself confesses to ‘many mistakes’ (v. 2) showing his realistic and honest anthropology.

(3:2a–3) The Tongue like a Horse’s Bit The controlling power of the tongue over the whole person (Sir 14:1; 20:1–7; Prov 10:19; Eccl 5:1) is illustrated by this example (cf. Ps 32:9).

(3:4–5a) The Tongue Like a Ship’s Rudder As with the previous example there are many parallels not only in Greek but also in Jewish Hellenistic literature (especially in Philo). Probably both illustrations had already become proverbial.

(3:5b–6) The Tongue as a Fire Fire in scrub and brushwood is a common phenomenon in Palestine. ‘World of iniquity’ (v. 6) forms a Semitic construction (1 Enoch 48:7; cf. Lk 16:9, 11; 18:6). Outside the words of Jesus only here is the term gehenna for ‘hell’ used. At its source is the Hinnom (Aram. gehenna) Valley, cursed by Jeremiah (7:31–4), and encircling the southwestern hill of Jerusalem (1 Enoch 26–7), where James, the brother of the Lord, and his community resided.

(3:7–10a) The Untamed Tongue The writer expresses a deep anthropological scepticism: wild beasts can be tamed, but not the human tongue (vv. 7–8). It is full of death-dealing poison (Ps 139:4; cf. 1QH 5:26–7). The criticism of blessing God but cursing man has many OT and Jewish parallels, but Jesus’ admonition seems especially close (Lk 6:28; cf. Rom 12:14). The connection between the belief in man being created in the image of God and the prohibition of cursing man is part of the Jewish ethical tradition (Mek. to Ex 20:26; Gen. Rab. to 5:1; Slavonic Enoch 44:1; 52:126; cf. Lk 6:27–8).

(3:10b–12) No Double Talk This is an important consequence of the concept of integrity contrasted with ‘double-mindedness’ (1:8). The image of plants producing appropriate fruit (v. 12a) is common in Stoicism, but a very near parallel can be found in the words of Jesus (Mt 7:16; Lk 6:44). The last sentence (v. 12b) formulates a condensation of the first image of salt and sweet water springs (v. 11) so common side by side on the edges of the Jordan rift valley.

The Wise and Humility (3:13–4:12)

After strongly warning the teachers the admonition for them continues in a more positive way. Its background might be the example of the ‘meekness’ (3:13) of Jesus, the incarnate Wisdom (Mt 11:28–30; cf. Jas 1:21). The idea that wisdom is given to the humble has also a close parallel (Hoppe 1985: 139–45) in Jesus’ logion about the revelation to infants (Mt 11:25; Lk 10:21).

(3:13–18) The Meekness of Wisdom As in Paul (1 Cor 1–4) the criterion of wisdom, coming from above or below (v. 15), is ethical, especially the avoidance of strife (v. 16). The description of the ‘wisdom from above’ (v. 17) reminds one in some way of Paul’s description of love in 1 Cor 13:4–7. Even closer are the parallels in the lists of virtues in the Qumran Manual of Discipline (1QS 4), Paul (Gal 5:22–3), and the Matthean beatitudes (Mt 5:3–10). At the end (v. 18) there might be an intentional echo of Jesus’ beatitude on the peacemakers (Mt 5:9).

(4:1–3) Passions as Cause of Wars ‘Conflicts and disputes’ have their origin not only in social circumstances, but are also traced back to the war within human beings (v. 1). For Christians prayer should precede all human aspirations (v. 2), but even Jesus’ promise on prayer (Mt 7:7–8; Lk 11:9–10) can be misused ‘to spend what you get on your pleasures’ (v. 3).

(4:4–6) Grace to the Humble The antagonism between ‘friendship with the world’ and being an ‘enemy of God’ (v. 4) is like the ethical dualism in the Enochic literature (1 Enoch 48:7; 108:8), Qumran (Jub. 30:19–22), and 1 Jn 2:15–17, but a parallel can also be found in the Jesus tradition (Mt 6:24; Lk 16:13). v. 5 may introduce a citation from an unknown work (NRSV), but it is also possible to translate the verse (cf. 4:11) as two rhetorical questions: ‘Does scripture speak in vain? Does the spirit which he made to dwell in us crave enviously?’ (Johnson 1995: 280–2). Apparently, pneuma refers neither to the Holy Spirit nor to the human spirit but to a type of good inclination given by God (cf. T. Dan. 5:1–3; T. Jos. 10:2–3; T. Ben. 6:4). The Greek noun phthonos, ‘envy’, was never connected with God. In fulfilling the promise of Scripture and the right human desire God gives a ‘greater gift’ (v. 6, own tr.) which should be identified with the wisdom (cf. 3:13–18) he will grant to the humble. This is argued by a citation of Prov 3:34 in a specific text-form found also in 1 Pet 5:5. The whole context of Prov 3:19–35 forms the background of Jas 3:13–4:10.

(4:7–10) Humble before God This imperative section has a clear structure. There are three couplets of imperatives (vv. 7b–9), framed by two other imperatives with the subject of submitting oneself to God (vv. 7a, 10), thus forming a fivefold structure. Submission to God and resistance to the devil makes Satan flee (4:4; cf. Lk 4:13). The idea of ‘drawing near to God’ (v. 8) is expressed in cultic language (Ex 19:22; 24:2; Deut 16:16; Ps 122; 145). The imperative to ‘mourn’ (v. 9) may echo Jesus' woe against the rich (Lk 6:25). v. 10 seems to be a rather clear allusion to the logion of Jesus concluding the parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector (Lk 18:14; cf. Lk 14:11; 1 Pet 5:6). So, perhaps, here 'grace' (4:6) may include not only the gift of wisdom, but also the forgiveness of sins.

(4:11–12) God as Only Lawgiver and Judge The letter's three important motifs, not to speak evil against or judge a brother (cf. Mt 7:1–2; Lk 6:37–8), and to be a doer of the law, are summarized (v. 11). No human being can be the final judge since this is the privilege of God (cf. Rom 14:4) who gave the law (v. 12).

Warning to the Rich (4:13–5:6)

(4:13–17) Tomorrow Belongs to God This admonition resembles the polemic in 1 Enoch 97:8–10 and the parable of the rich fool (Lk 12:16–21), the latter itself showing parallels to the Enochic tradition. In contrast to the rich in 5:1 the merchants here seem to be members of the community (v. 13). Under Palestinian conditions they could try to become rich only through trade. Whereas the criticism of care about tomorrow may echo Jesus' teaching (Mt 6:25–34; Lk 12:22–31), 'mist' was a very common metaphor for the passing of life (v. 14). The most dangerous consequence of human 'arrogance' (v. 16) is to forget God, who governs life (v. 15; cf. 1 Enoch 94:8). The Semitic-style maxim in v. 17 reminds one of Jesus' parable of the watchful servants (Lk 12:47).

(5:1–3) Warning to the Rich v. 1 reads like an abbreviation of Jesus' woe against the rich (Lk 6:24–5), vv. 2–3 could be an allusion to his words on treasures (Mt 6:19–21; Lk 12:33–4). That hoarded goods and their decay will be a witness in the last judgement (v. 3) is also expressed in 1 Enoch 96:7.

(5:4–6) The Oppression of the Poor and the Just What makes things even worse is that the rich gain their goods by injustice. Keeping back the wages of the labourers (v. 4) is an old prophetic accusation (Jer 22:13; Mal 3:5; cf. Tob 4:14). That at this point God's name 'Lord of hosts' (kyrios sabaoth) is cited means that doom is imminent. v. 5 may allude not only to Jer 12:3, but also to Jesus' parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Lk 16:19, 25). The condemnation and killing of the righteous man (v. 6) could be a general attack on judicial murder (cf. Wisd 2:12), but the change from plural to singular is remarkable. In the Lukan special tradition 'the rulers' are singled out as those killing Jesus (Lk 23:13, 35; 24:20; Acts 3:17; cf. 1 Cor 2:8). 'The righteous one' (ho dikaios) was a primitive Jewish-Christian designation of Jesus as the Messiah (Acts 3:14; 7:52; 22:14; cf. Lk 23:37; 1 Pet 3:18; 1 Jn 2:1), a Jewish antecedent is found only in 1 Enoch 38:2; 53:6 (cf. Isa 53:11). Bearing this traditio-historical background in mind, the remark on non-resistance could hint not only in general at the suffering of the righteous, but especially at Jesus' suffering as the Servant of the Lord (Isa 53:7; cf. 1 Pet 2:23).

Patience until the Coming of the Lord (5:7–20)

The last part of the letter treats some problems typical for the life of every community until the end of time. Although it is possible that the coming of God is in view (cf. T. Judah, 22:2; T. Levi, 8:11; As. Mos. 10:12; 1 Enoch 92–105, etc.) it seems more probable that 'until the coming (parousia) of the Lord' (v. 7) refers to the Second Coming of Christ, since the Greek expression has become almost technical in early Christian documents (1 Thess 2:19; 4:15; 5:23; 1 Cor 15:23; Mt 24:3, etc.).

(5:7–9) The Example of the Patient Farmer There could be an allusion to Jesus' parable of the growing seed (Mk 4:26–30), directed against Zealot aspirations to create a pure community. 'The early and the late rain' (v. 7) points to a Syro-Palestinian background, 'the precious fruit of the earth' to rather small farms with short rations. In the OT (Joel 4:13) and in the Jesus tradition (Mt 13:30, 39; Jn 4:35) harvest is a picture for God's judgement, which in James is seen in the near future (v. 8). Against the tendency to judge others once and for all the community members are reminded that God will judge them according to their own standard (v. 9). The warning against 'judging' (krinein) forms an important motif in the Synoptic tradition (Mt 7:1–2; Lk 6:37). That the judge 'is standing at the doors' (v. 9) does not refer to the place of judgement but points to its imminence (cf. Mk 13:29; Mt 24:33; Rev 3:3, 20).

(5:10–12) The Example of the Persecuted Prophets Starting with the Deuteronomistic History (1 Kings 19:10), Jewish tradition (Dan 9:6; T. Levi, 16) spoke of the persecution and martyrdom of the prophets (v. 10). This motif is also found in the synoptic tradition (Mt 23:29–39; Lk 11:47–51; Mk 12:1–12). Jesus compared his destiny (Lk 13:32–3) and that of his followers (Mt 5:11–12; Lk 6:22–3) with the fate of the prophets. If 'the steadfast are called happy' (v. 11a) this might be a reminiscence of Jesus' beatitude of the persecuted. That Job is singled out for his patience (v. 11b) has its background rather in Jewish legends, such as the Testament of Job, than in the OT. Augustine (PL 40.634) thought that 'the purpose of the Lord' refers to the passion of Jesus. But the construction of the sentence is Semitic and refers to the 'outcome' (telos) of Job's story when God showed that he is 'compassionate and merciful'. Perhaps considering the situation of persecution, when believers had to defend themselves in courts, brought to the writer's mind Jesus' warning not to 'swear' (v. 12; cf. Justin Martyr, Apol. 1.18.5). In the Jesus tradition this prohibition is found only in the Matthean special material (Mt 5:34–7) yet in a more elaborate form. The doubling of 'yes and no' here is not a kind of strong affirmation, but a Semitic expression for 'let your yes be yes and your no be no'. This part of the logion was apparently already known to Paul (2 Cor 1:17). The Essenes were famous for denying the oath of loyalty to any human ruler (Jos. J. W. 2.135; cf. Ant. 15.370–2; Philo, Omn. Prob. 84), but the Damascus Document allowed swearing in court (CD 9:9–10; 15:1–2; 16:8–11).

(5:13–15) The Prayer of the Elders for the Sick As the community will ever experience inner strife and outer persecution, so illness of its members will never end before the parousia. Both the sick and the healthy should address God in prayers and psalms (v. 13). But since in the early Christian communities the charisma of healing was present (cf. Mk 16:17–18; 1 Cor 12:9, etc.) a special prayer for the very sick is recommended. They should call 'the elders of the church' (v. 14a) who are either bearers of an office (cf. Phil 1:1; 1 Tim 3:1–7; 5:17; Titus 1:5, etc.) or only respected members of the community, perhaps with special experience in healing. 'To pray over' the sick indicates a laying on of hands as it was known in the OT (Ps 35:13; Tob 1:19; Sir 7:35, etc.) and in contemporary Judaism (1QapGen 20:21–2, 29). Oil as an agent of miraculous healing is mentioned only in the Markan form of the pre-Easter mission of the disciples (Mk 6:13). That the sick person is ‘anointed in the name of the Lord’ (v. 14b) may hint at this tradition (cf. Mk 9:38). In any case it shows that healing is not a magical rite but practised as part of the lordship of Jesus. Customarily, oil in Jewish (Isa 1:6; Lk 10:34; Jos. Ant. 17.172, etc.) as in pagan contexts (Pliny, NH 23:39–40; Galen 2:10, etc.) was used as a popular remedy for all kinds of illness. Here, however, it could be a visual sign of the Holy Spirit through whom Jesus worked his healing miracles (Lk 6:16–21 referring to Isa 61:1–2; cf. also Life of Adam, 36; Apoc. Mos. 9:3). ‘The prayer of faith’ (v. 15a) means the elders’ faithful prayer which stands under a great promise (cf. 1:5–8; 4:3). ‘That the the prayer of faith will save the sick and the Lord will raise them up’ is interpreted either as mental strengthening, eschatological salvation, or physical healing. Although elements of the first and second possibilities may play a role, the third interpretation is the most probable. In the gospel tradition the verbs ‘saving’ (sōzein) and ‘raising up’ (egeirein) are also used for physical healing (cf. Mk 5:23, 28, 34; 10:52; Jn 11:12, respectively Mk 1:31; Mt 9:5–7; Jos. Ant. 19.294). In the prayers of the elders the petition for forgiveness is included (v. 15b).

(5:16–18) The Effective Prayer of all Community Members The writer shows an intuitive insight into the relation between sin and mental as well as physical health when he admonishes his readers generally to mutual confessions of sins and to common prayers (v. 16a). The interdependence of forgiveness by God and one’s readiness to forgive others is stressed as in the Lord’s Prayer (Mt 6:12; Lk 11:4). There was a widespread belief in Judaism that the prayer of a just man is especially effective (v. 16b). One is reminded that according to early church tradition James, the brother of the Lord, himself was ‘just’ (dikaïos) and therefore a man of powerful prayer (Hege-sippus, in Eus. Hist. Eccl. 2.23.4–7). Here, in accordance with Jewish tradition (2 Esd 7:109; m. Ta’an. 2:4; b. Sanh. 113a), the example is Elijah and his prayer for rain (1 Kings 18:42–5). The timespan of ‘three years and six months’ (v. 17) is found not in the OT but in the words of Jesus (Lk 4:25). The Lukan special tradition shows a certain interest in Elijah as a prototype for Jesus (Lk 7:11–17; 9:51–62, etc.), but here in James it is stressed against popular Jewish legends (Jeremias, TDNT ii. 929–30) and perhaps also against speculations of some on the person of John the Baptist (cf. Jn 1:24–7) that Elijah is a ‘man of like nature’ (RSV) as the believers (v. 17). The whole formulation of the example has a strong Semitic flavour.

(5:19–20) Bringing Back the Sinners The letter ends with a realistic but positive remark. Even believers can ‘wander from the truth’ (v. 19). This could be an allusion to the parable of the lost sheep in its Matthean form (Mt 18:12–14), but the theme of the ‘bringing or coming back’ (epistrephō) of a sinning brother is also prominent in Luke’s special tradition (Lk 17:3–4). Probably the promise of ‘saving the soul’ is assigned to the convert, not to the converter, as is also the ‘covering of a multitude of sins’ (v. 20). This last expression, which was known in Jewish-Christian tradition (1 Pet 4:8; 1 Clem. 49:4; 2 Clem. 16:4; cf. 1 Cor 13:4–7), could allude to Prov 10:12, but the LXX differs. In one part of the Christian tradition this formulation was regarded as a saying of Jesus (Clem. Al., Paed. 3.91.3; Didascalia, 4). In any case, the last words of a sometimes stern letter remind the readers of the chances of repentance, forgiveness, and reconciliation.

REFERENCES

- Adamson, J. (1976), The Epistle of James (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
 — (1989), James: The Man and His Message (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
 Baasland, E. (1988), ‘Literarische Form, Thematik und geschichtliche Einordnung des Jakobusbriefes’, Aufstieg und Niedergang der Römischen Welt, 2:25/2 (Berlin: De Gruyter), 3464–84.
 Baker, W. R. (1995), Personal Speech-Ethics in the Epistle of James (Tübingen: Mohr).
 Bauckham, R. J. (1990), Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
 — (1995), ‘James and the Jerusalem Church’, in R. J. Bauckham (ed.), The Book of Acts in its Palestinian Setting (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans), 419–80.
 — (1999), James: Wisdom of James, Disciple of Jesus the Sage (London: Routledge).
 Beck, D. L. (1973), ‘The Composition of the Epistle of James’, Ph.D. diss., Princeton Theological Seminary, 1973.
 Betz, O., and Riesner, R. (1994), Jesus, Qumran, and the Vatican (London: SCM).
 Boccaccini, G. (1998), Beyond the Essene Hypothesis (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
 Bockmuehl, M. (1999), ‘Antioch and James the Just’, in B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (eds.), James the Just and Christian Origins (Leiden: Brill), 155–98.
 Davids, P. H. (1982), The Epistle of James (Exeter: Paternoster).
 — (1999), ‘Palestinian Traditions in the Epistle of James’, in B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (eds.), James the Just and Christian Origins (Leiden: Brill), 33–57.
 Deppe, D. B. (1989), The Sayings of Jesus in the Epistle of James (Chelsea, Mich.: Bookcrafters).
 Dibelius, M. (1976), James (Philadelphia: Fortress).
 Frankemölle, H. (1994), Der Brief des Jakobus (Gütersloh: Gütersloher).
 Geyser, A. S. (1975), ‘The Letter of James and the Social Condition of his Addressees’, Neotestamentica 9: 25–33.
 Hartin, P. J. (1991), James and the Q Sayings of Jesus (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
 Hengel, M. (1985), ‘Jakobus der Herrenbruder—der erste Papst?’, in E. Grässer and O. Merk (eds.), Glaube und Eschatologie (Tübingen: Mohr), 71–104.
 Hoppe, R. (1985), Der theologische Hintergrund des Jakobusbriefes, 2nd edn. (Würzburg: Echter).
 Jeremias, J. (1954–5), ‘Paul and James’, ET 66: 368–71.
 Johnson, L. T. (1995), The Letter of James (New York: Doubleday).
 Karrer, M. (1989), ‘Christus der Herr und die Welt als Stätte der Prüfung. Zur Theologie des Jakobusbriefes’, Kerygma und Dogma, 35: 166–88.
 Kirk, J. A. (1969–70), ‘The Meaning of Wisdom in James’, NTS 16: 24–38.
 Klein, M. (1995), ‘Ein vollkommenes Werk’: Vollkommenheit, Gesetz und Gericht als theologische Themen des Jakobusbriefes (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer).
 Konradt, M. (1998), Christliche Existenz nach dem Jakobusbrief (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck).
 Lautenschlager, M. (1990), ‘Der Gegenstand des Glaubens im Jakobusbrief’, ZTK 87: 163–84.
 Ludwig, M. (1994), Wort als Gesetz. Eine Untersuchung zum Verständnis von ‘Wort’ und ‘Gesetz’ in israelitisch-frühjüdischen und neutestamentlichen Schriften (Frankfurt: Peter Lang).

- Marcus, J. (1982), 'The Evil Inclination in the Epistle of James', CBQ 44: 606–21.
- Martin, R. P. (1988), James (Waco: Word).
- Maynard-Reid, P. U. (1987), Poverty and Wealth in James (New York: Maryknoll).
- Mayor, J. B. (1913), The Epistle of Saint James, 3rd edn. (London: Macmillan).
- Moo, D. J. (1985), The Letter of James (Leicester: Intervarsity Press).
- Mussner, F. (1987), Der Jakobusbrief, 5th edn. (Freiburg: Herder).
- Niebuhr, K. W. (1998), 'Der Jakobusbrief im Licht frühjüdischer Diasporabriefe', NTS 44: 420–43.
- Penner, T. C. (1996), The Epistle of James and Eschatology (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Popkes, W. (1986), Adressaten, Situation und Form des Jakobusbriefes (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk).
- Pratscher, W. (1987), Der Herrenbruder Jakobus und die Jakobustradition (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck).
- Riesner, R. (1993), 'Jesus, the Primitive Community, and the Essene Quarter of Jerusalem', in J. H. Charlesworth (ed.), Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls (New York: Doubleday), 198–234.
- (1994), 'James's Speech (Acts 15:13–21), Simeon's Hymn (Luke 2:29–32), and Luke's Sources', in J. B. Green and M. Turner (eds.), Jesus of Nazareth: Christ and Lord (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans), 263–78.
- (1995), 'Synagogues in Jerusalem', in R. J. Bauckham (ed.), The Book of Acts in Its Palestinian Setting (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans), 179–211.
- (1997), 'Paulus und die Jesus-Überlieferung', in J. Ådna, S. J. Hafeman, and O. Hofius (eds.), Evangelium, Schriftauslegung, Kirche (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck), 346–65.
- (1998a), Paul's Early Period: Chronology, Mission Strategy, Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- (1998b), Essener und Urgemeinde in Jerusalem (Giessen: Brunnen).
- Sacchi, P. (1993), 'Recovering Jesus' Formative Background', in J. H. Charlesworth (ed.), Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls (New York: Doubleday), 123–39.
- Schlatter, A. (1932), Der Brief des Jakobus (Stuttgart: Calwer).
- Stulac, G. M. (1993), James (Leicester: Intervarsity Press).
- Tsuji, M. (1997), Glaube zwischen Vollkommenheit und Verweltlichung. Eine Untersuchung zur literarischen Gestalt und zur inhaltlichen Kohärenz des Jakobusbriefes (Tübingen: Mohr).
- Zahn, T. (1906), Introduction to the New Testament I (London: Kregel).
- Zimmermann, A. F. (1988), Die urchristlichen Lehrer, 2nd edn. (Tübingen: Mohr).

77. I Peter

ERIC EVE

INTRODUCTION

A. Date, Authorship, and Provenance. 1. Despite attempts of scholars such as R. Perdelwitz, B. H. Streeter, H. Windisch, H. Preisker, and F. L. Cross in the first half of the twentieth century to argue to the contrary, 1 Peter should be read as a genuine letter. Earlier attempts to argue that 1 Peter was a baptismal sermon or liturgy that was subsequently incorporated into a letter have now largely fallen out of favour.

2. 1 Peter was quickly accepted as an authentic apostolic writing. The first probable citations from 1 Peter are in Polycarp's epistle to the Philippians (c.130 CE), and the letter is also referred to at 2 Pet 3:1. It is first cited explicitly as a Petrine writing by Irenaeus (in the late second century), and thereafter its use becomes widespread.

3. Despite 1 Pet 1:1, the author is unlikely to have been the apostle Peter. The cultured Greek of the epistle makes it perhaps the most literary composition in the NT. The apostle Peter probably knew some Greek, but 1 Peter does not look like the product of an unlettered (Acts 4:13) Galilean fisherman. It employs a sophisticated vocabulary incorporating several NT hapax legomena, and its author appears to have some command of the techniques of Hellenistic rhetoric. He is also intimately acquainted with the OT in the LXX, whereas we should have expected the Galilean Peter to have been more familiar with an Aramaic Targum or the Hebrew.

4. One cannot save Petrine authorship by arguing that Peter employed a secretary. If one argues that this secretary was Silvanus, the travelling companion of Paul (e.g. Selwyn 1958) or an anonymous amanuensis of the Roman church (Michaels 1988) the letter then becomes the product not of Peter, but of the secretary, since it is the latter's language that the epistle exhibits (see Beare 1970).

5. The epistle appears to rely heavily on traditions and not on personal reminiscences of Jesus. It is not clear that similarities between 1 Peter and, for example, Romans and Ephesians require literary dependence, but at first sight the letter does have a deutero-Pauline feel. Yet many distinctive elements of Pauline theology (e.g. justification by faith) are entirely absent from 1 Peter, and even where characteristic Pauline expressions, such as 'in Christ' are employed, they are hardly used in a distinctively Pauline manner (see 1 Pet 5:14). The epistle also shows some affinities with non-Pauline writings such as James, Hebrews, and 1 Clement. This suggests either that all these writings are drawing on common traditions, or that at least some of them were sufficiently well known to our author to have influenced his language (in favour of literary dependence, see Beare 1970; in favour of common catechetical and liturgical traditions, see Selwyn 1958; Achtemeier 1996). Knowledge of any of these writings would point to a date later than the apostle Peter is meant to have perished, in the Neronian persecution (c.66 CE). Indeed, the thought and tenor of the epistle would seem to place it towards the end of the first century, at a stage of development not far removed from that of the Pastoral Epistles (see Best 1971).

6. More specifically, the use of the code name 'Babylon' for Rome (5:13; cf. Rev 14:8; 16:19; 17:5; 18:2, 10, 21) probably reflects the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE. There must have been time for Christianity to have spread into a wide region of Asia Minor (1:1) and for the name 'Christian', apparently first coined in Antioch (Acts 11:26), to have become current (4:16). There is, however, still a lively eschatological expectation (4:7, 17), and the letter must be early enough to have been known to Polycarp. All this points to a date somewhere between 70 and 100 CE (so Best 1971; Balch 1981; Elliott 1982; on the inconclusiveness of some of this evidence, however, see Achtemeier 1996).

7. It is conceivable that, as Harnack first argued, the ascription to the apostle Peter was added to the epistle in the second century to secure its place in the canon (although there is no evidence for this). A more probable explanation, however, is that the letter was issued from a circle of Peter's followers in Rome in his name after his death (so Best 1971; Elliott 1982; Achtemeier 1996; on the general issue of pseudepigraphy see EPH c). To be sure, once doubt is cast on the authorship, doubt may also be cast on the identification of Rome ('Babylon') as the place of origin, since this could be part of the mechanism of pseudepigraphy. But the affinities of 1 Peter with 1 Clement, together with its possible echoes of Romans, tip the balance in favour of a Roman provenance for this letter.

B. Purpose. The purpose of the letter is not to convey doctrinal information or specific ethical instruction, but rather to urge the recipients to hold fast to their faith in the face of hostility (so Elliott 1982; cf. Thurén 1995; Achtemeier 1996). This, indeed, is roughly what the letter itself states (5:12). It achieves this aim by the threefold strategy of reminding the recipients of the enormous value of what they have already received as Christians (e.g. 1:3, 10–12, 18–21; 2:9–10), by assuring them of their future vindication and reward (e.g. 1:4–5, 13; 4:13; 5:4, 6, 10), and by emphasizing the example of the blameless suffering of Christ (e.g. 2:21–3; 3:18; 4:13). If Peter was known to the recipients to have been martyred for his faith, this may have provided a further reason for writing in his name. However, the sufferings envisaged in the letter appear to be not martyrdom arising from state persecution but verbal and physical abuse from hostile neighbours (e.g. 2:12, 15, 19–20; 3:9, 16; 4:4, 14). The hard-pressed believers are urged to give no needless cause for offence, even under provocation, but to excel in good conduct motivated by their loyalty and obedience to God.

COMMENTARY

Greeting (1:1–2)

(1:1) On the attribution of the letter to the apostle Peter see 1 PEF A. The term 'exiles' does not refer to the Christians' earthly sojourning prior to arriving at their heavenly home, nor is it likely to mean that most of those addressed had the official status of resident aliens prior to their conversion (so Elliott 1981). It may reflect the social experience of the addressees following their conversion, though the language is probably drawn from the story of Israel's progenitor Abraham (Gen 23:4). The exiles are said to be located in the 'Dispersion', which may suggest that they are diaspora Jews. Other indications in the letter, however, suggest that the recipients were formerly pagans (e.g. 1:18; 2:10). The specific region referred to (Pontus, Galatia, etc.) would cover most of Asia Minor north and west of the Taurus mountains. Pliny's letters to Trajan (c.112 CE) indicate that by his day Christianity was well established in Bithynia-Pontus, not only among the towns but also in the countryside.

(1:2) That the recipients are said to have been 'chosen and destined by God the Father' relates their destiny to Christ's (1:20). Just as Christ suffered and was raised to glory (1:11, 21), so too will the Christians suffering abuse receive eschatological vindication provided they stand firm. One should probably translate v. 2 as 'for obedience [to God rather than Jesus] and sprinkling with the blood of Jesus Christ'. Sprinkling with the 'blood of Jesus Christ' recalls the covenant ceremony of Ex 24:3–8, and suggests that the author sees the church as the people of God constituted by Christ's sacrifice (1:19). It may also suggest that God's people are to share in Christ's sufferings. Grace and peace are common enough in Christian greetings, but may have a special poignancy here, where those wished grace and peace are suffering opposition and abuse (cf. 5:14).

Prooemium (1:3–12)

This section is in the form of a blessing (cf. Eph 1:3; 2 Cor 1:3), though here our author does not merely praise God but sets out the main themes that are to follow. These are that the addressees are greatly privileged as believers, both in what they have received already and in what they can expect in the future. Therefore, they should stand firm despite opposition, regarding their suffering as an opportunity to prove their faith and as a sign that deliverance is at hand.

(1:3–9) In v. 3 the author lays the groundwork of his appeal to the recipients; they have been begotten again (see 1 PEF 1:22–2:3) and as believers they already enjoy great benefits. These are not to be abandoned lightly, even under pressure, for this would also be to forfeit the future benefits promised at v. 4. At v. 5 the author continues to assure his audience of their fundamental security and their ultimate vindication. The salvation mentioned here is probably both from their current troubles and from an adverse judgement by God at the eschaton, whereas 'faith' will include faithfulness to their calling as Christians. The first two words of v. 6 may be translated either 'in whom' (i.e. God) or 'in which', i.e. the entire sentiment expressed in v. 5; NRSV opts for the latter. The addressees can rejoice in the hopes expressed in v. 5 even if they are currently suffering. Here we note two features of the author's rhetorical strategy: (1) The author presumably does not know that his addressees actually are rejoicing; he probably suspects the reverse (hence the letter!); but by asserting that they are already doing what he wants he encourages his addressees to accept his view. (2) The author introduces his first explicit reference to suffering with great tact ('even if... for a little while...'); later on the sufferings appear more painful; here they are made to appear insignificant compared with the privileges enjoyed. The reference to 'various trials' may indicate a further cause for rejoicing: such trials were expected to beset the faithful at the end-time, so their occurrence can be taken as a sign that the end is near. The trials also allow the suffering recipients to prove their faith (v. 7), that is to demonstrate its worth in adversity just as precious metal is proved and separated from dross in the heat of the refining process. Faith thus proved will result in the suffering faithful receiving (from God) the very things that their unbelieving neighbours are currently denying them (praise, glory, and honour). This will occur 'when Jesus Christ is revealed', i.e. when he appears from heaven at the Parousia, which the author believes to be close at hand (4:7). At vv. 8–9 the author again employs indicatives to describe the attitudes he wants his audience to adopt, love of and belief in Christ and joy in their salvation, which is described as being realized even now.

(1:10–12) The prooemium concludes with a section that emphasizes just how privileged the addressees are. It is they who are the recipients of the great promises the prophets enquired into (vv. 11–12), and they who have received the good news of things into which even angels long to peer (v. 12). Yet what the prophets testified in advance bears directly on our author's theme, for they foresaw that Christ would first suffer and then receive glory, the pattern that the addressees are also expected to follow, as will become increasingly apparent.

Body of Letter, Part 1: Living as God's People (1:13–2:10)

(1:13–21) Redemption into the Christ Group The start of the new section is marked by the word 'therefore' and the shift into the imperative mood (v. 13). Despite NRSV, however, the first word in the imperative is the command to 'hope', the previous two verbs are participles ('discipline yourselves' is more literally, 'being perfectly sober'). Many commentators take the participles here and elsewhere in 1 Peter as having imperatival force, but this is not necessarily the case (see Achtemeier 1996). The author could be describing his addressees as those who have girded the loins of their minds (the imagery is that of fastening one's outer garment around the waist so that it does not impede one's movements, hence NRSV's 'prepare your minds for action') and are perfectly sober, or he may be saying that this is the manner in which they should hope. The object of that hope is eschatological, since it is linked to the Parousia, but the Greek participle (rendered by NRSV as the future 'will bring you') suggests that the promised grace can already begin to be experienced now or in the near future.

The author next contrasts his addressees' former way of life (v. 14) with the holiness to which they are now called (v. 15). Holiness contains the idea of separateness; the addressees are to be a people set apart for God from the surrounding culture. The notion that this holiness is to express itself in conduct (v. 15) is one of the pervading themes of the letter. It is repeated already at v. 17 (NRSV's 'live' is more literally 'conduct yourselves'), where it is related to the final judgement of God. At first sight the sentiment of this verse is strongly at odds with the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith, but compare, e.g., Rom 2:6–11. In any case Paul and 'Peter' would have agreed that being right with God necessitated being part of the people of God now constituted through Jesus Christ, and that this must express itself in conduct (cf. Gal 5:13–26). Our author is concerned with helping his audience cope with the sense of alienation this brings (on 'exiles' see 1 PET 1:1), and so immediately upon urging them to appropriate conduct he reminds them once more of their privileged position (vv. 18–19), this time in terms of the cost of their redemption, and the futility of the life from which they have been redeemed.

Christ is here described in terms of a sacrificial victim (cf. e.g. Lev 1:3, 10; 3:1, 6, etc.). It is not said how his sacrifice achieves redemption, but the thought may be that Christ's death deals with sin, enables righteous behaviour (2:24), and allows access to God (2:4) to those who were formerly not his people (2:10). The fledgling Christian church offers a new reference group by which its members measure their conduct, and this enables them to live with a fresh orientation. Our author does not express himself in this sociological language, but he is nevertheless keen to promote the kind of group cohesion and separateness needed. This group is oriented on Christ not only as its redeemer but as its exemplar. Christ, like them (1:2), was foreknown or 'destined' by God (v. 20). Likethem, he suffered (2:21), but since God raised him from the dead and gave him glory, those who pattern themselves on him can hope for the same (v. 21).

The contrast between 'destined' and 'revealed' (v. 20) is not so much intended to teach predestination (see also 1 PET 2:8) as once again to emphasize the privileged status of the believers. What was foreknown from before the creation of the world has only now been made known in the last times (note the eschatological emphasis) and for their sake.

(1:22–2:3) Rebirth through the Word Patterning on Christ must include Christ-like conduct, or 'obedience to the truth' (which is also obedience to God the Father), but can only be sustained in contrast to the world with the aid of a mutually supportive group (1:22), membership of which is a mark of rebirth (see below).

The quotation in 1:24–5a from Isa 40:6–8 is the first of many allusions to Isaiah in this letter. The 'word' is here equated with the good news that has been preached to the addressees, and this perhaps illustrates prophets testifying in advance (1:10). The main point of the quotation, however, is to contrast the transitoriness of natural life with the permanence of the life that springs from God's word. Natural birth is birth into the worldly community. Rebirth by the word comes about through entering the new community that is the redeemed people of God constituted by the word. The worldly community is transitory not only because of normal human mortality, but because it is about to fall under God's judgement (4:17); the alternative community of the word is guaranteed permanence, provided it stands firm, since it is rooted in God, and will be vindicated by him at the last judgement.

Those who have undergone rebirth may be metaphorically described as 'newborn infants' (2:2). Babies are no doubt best fed on pure milk, but there is a play on words in the Greek, since the word translated 'pure' can also mean 'guileless', the quality that would result from obeying the injunctions of 2:1. It is not clear whether the author has primarily in mind his audience's dealings with one another (as the immediate context might suggest) or towards outsiders (as 2:12 indicates). He may well have intended both. Slander is one of the things they seem to have been particularly suffering from outsiders, and they will later be commanded not to revile in turn (3:9). For now the author wishes to remind his audience that rebirth is not enough by itself, it must be followed by growth towards the desired goal (2:2b). The doubt implied by 'if' in 2:3 is a rhetorical device. The recipients will not want to deny that they have tasted God's goodness, and so they will be led into accepting what the author has just said.

(2:4–10) God's Chosen People The recurrence of the word 'stone' throughout this section suggests the thought of a building, in particular the temple (the 'spiritual house' of v. 5), not in the literal sense of the Jerusalem temple, but in the metaphorical sense of God's people (the use of 'temple' to denote one's own elect community is also found in the Qumran literature). The people of God constitutes the other controlling theme in this section, in which language formerly applied to Israel is now applied to the addressees (vv. 5, 9). The purpose is to persuade them of their worth as God's chosen people in the face of a hostile environment.

The living stone (Christ) at v. 4 is said to have been rejected, not by the Jews, but by humankind in general; there is little anti-Judaism in this epistle, even though its addressees (unlike Paul's Gentile addressees) are regarded as having taken over the role of Israel without remainder (so Achtemeier 1996). The addressees are also to become living stones (v. 5), and thus to share the fate of Christ their exemplar. Just as he was rejected by humans but was chosen and honoured (rather than NRSV's 'precious') with God, so too those who are experiencing rejection on account of their faith have been chosen and will be honoured by God. Honour, a pivotal value in Mediterranean society (Malina 1983), is precisely what these Christians lack in the eyes of their unbelieving neighbours. The phrase 'chosen and honoured' thus reassures the audience of their true status, as well as preparing for the quotation from Isa 28:16 that is to follow (v. 6; cf. Rom 9:33). Believers are also promised honour at v. 7 (which should be translated 'so to you who believe is the honour'), in contrast to the stumbling that is the fate of the unbeliever (vv. 7b–8). The function of v. 8 is not to teach that some individuals were foreordained to stumble, but rather to reassure the addressees that their persecutors are heading for a fall, and that this is all within God's plan.

Although the language of priesthood and sacrifice (vv. 5, 9) is cultic, this probably derives from the use of the temple as a metaphor for God's elect people (rather than referring to Christian worship). It may be, however, that the 'spiritual sacrifice' the author intends is that of costly obedience to God in the face of abuse, since he later goes on to stress the passion of Christ as the pattern of uncomplaining suffering for the believer (2:21–4; 3:17–19; 4:13–14).

v. 10 (like 1:18) suggests that the author is addressing converts from paganism rather than Jews (this verse is an allusion to Hos 2:23; cf. Paul's use of Hos 1:10 at Rom 9:25–6). He concludes this section by again reminding them of their privileges. The implication is that they would be foolish to give up such a glorious state and revert to their former paganism, for that would be to give up light, mercy, and belonging for darkness, no mercy, and non-belonging.

Body of Letter, Part 2: Good Conduct in the Face of Suffering (2:11–4:11)

The word 'beloved' (2:11) marks the start of a major new division both here and at 4:12. The first section lays down general principles of conduct, which are then exemplified in the 'household code' of 2:18–3:7. This is followed by further general advice on how the beleaguered believers should respond to the sufferings inflicted on them by hostile neighbours.

(2:11–17) Principles of Conduct in Human Society The author is anxious to preserve the distinctness of the communities he is addressing vis-à-vis their cultural context, but he does not do so in a straightforwardly counter-cultural way, any more than he is straightforwardly conformist. On the one hand Christians are to abstain from fleshly desires (v. 11), which the author regards as characteristic of the pagan society from which they are now alienated (cf. 4:3). On the other their conduct in that society is to be good and seen to be good, even by pagan standards (vv. 11–12; although the NRSV translates 'honourably' in v. 11 and 'honourable deeds' in v. 12, the underlying Greek word kalos means 'good' or 'beautiful'). To be sure, their conduct must also be good by God's standards, and will then receive divine vindication at the final judgement. The evildoing of which these Christians may have been suspected could include the suspicion of 'atheism', that is refusing to honour the traditional gods, so risking their displeasure. It may also have included political disloyalty, not simply through refusal to take part in the emperor cult, but through forming an unauthorized grouping (or collegium) which could appear political in nature to the Roman authorities.

It may be for this reason that the author urges due submission to the political authorities (vv. 13–14; cf. Rom 13:1–5). Believers are not to court persecution, but rather to silence the 'ignorance of idiots' by right conduct. The 'idiots' may be those who make trouble for Christians by reporting their alleged misconduct to the authorities; the Christians' good conduct is to give the lie to such slanders. Being urged to live as servants (lit. slaves) of God (v. 16) is double-edged: it entails obedience to God, but it also implies security and status. In so far as God is superior to the emperor, so God's servants are superior to Caesar's. In any case, the apparently conformist advice is given a firm counter-cultural ground, since it is to be motivated by ultimate loyalty to God's will (vv. 13, 15) rather than to any human institution.

This nuanced exhortation to counter-cultural conformity is summed up at v. 17 (cf. Mk 12:17). At the extremities of this verse, honour (the pivotal value of the culture) is to be paid to all outsiders, and to the emperor in particular (cf. Rom 13:7). At its core, however, the Christian fellowship is to be loved and God is to be 'feared', that is, revered. How this works out in detail is exemplified in the discussion that follows.

(2:18–3:22) The Principles in Practice At first sight, this section resembles the household codes found, for example, at Col 3:18–4:1 and Eph 5:21–6:9 (on household codes in the NT see EPH 5:21–6:9 and Balch 1981). This section may indeed derive from such material, but this is not its primary purpose here. A household code would normally give advice on the duties of parents and children, slaves and masters, and husbands and wives. Here no advice is given to parents, children, or masters, and that given to husbands is perfunctory. By focusing on slaves and wives, the author concentrates on two specially vulnerable groups. He thus both directly gives advice to these two groups and indirectly employs them as examples of proper submission for all Christians.

NRSV translates the Greek participles of 2:18 and 3:1 as imperatives ('accept the authority'), but it may be that they should be understood as participles expanding on 2:17 ('Honour all men... by accepting') (so Achtemeier 1996). Slaves and women thus provide paradigms for the injunctions of 2:17.

Slaves should follow the example of Christ (2:18–25): The 'slaves' of 2:18 are literally 'household servants' (oiketai). In a non-Christian household they might find themselves under pressure to conform to their master's religion. Although household slaves in the Roman empire were by no means universally mistreated, they were always liable to punishment or abuse from those they served. The advice given is outwardly conformist, namely to submit to the master's authority, but they are not to submit to the extent of renouncing their faith or their place in the Christian community, and if they suffer for this alone (rather than for any actual misdemeanour), they will have God's approval even if they do not enjoy that of their master (vv. 19–20). This limited conformity informed by a counter-cultural loyalty is very similar to the attitude of the early church to the Roman state, and thus serves as a suitable illustration of 2:11–17.

The greater part of this advice to slaves is taken up with expounding the example of the innocent suffering of Christ (vv. 21–5), who, as we have already seen, is the pattern for all believers (v. 21). The description of Christ's behaviour in vv. 22–3 is thus the ideal to which suffering slaves, and indeed any suffering Christians, should aspire, even if they could not expect to be totally without sin. The language in which Christ's suffering is described here reflects the servant poem in Isa 53. The precise notion of atonement in v. 24 is hard to discern. The language might almost suggest that he took our sins into his body and made a sacrificial offering of them upon the cross, but such a thought would have no parallel in the NT, not least because the notions of offering sins as a sacrifice would be very odd. Given the other allusions to Isa 53 one might do better to see this verse as an adaptation of Isa 53:4–5 to fit Christ's death on the cross, without any clearly worked out theory of atonement behind it: the notion of vicarious punishment is not stated, although the notion that innocent suffering vicariously deals with others' sins may be presupposed. Apogomenoi (v. 24, NRSV, 'free') could be rendered 'having been made to have no part in' but could also mean 'dead'. Here one should probably translate 'having died to sin', contrasted with 'live for righteousness'. What should have died for the addressees is the former identity that let itself be defined by the surrounding pagan culture (4:3).

Wives should follow the example of Sarah (3:1–6): Much of the advice given to wives is outwardly conformist. That wives should accept their husband's authority and not answer back (v. 1) would be a commonplace, and there are both pagan and Jewish parallels (Isa 3:18–24; Prov 11:22; 31:10–30) to preferring inward beauty to outward adornment (vv. 3–4). The author gives his advice a religious slant by appealing to examples from the biblical past, appealing especially to Sarah who, as Abraham's wife, might be the natural type of the faithful female as Abraham was of the faithful male (Beare 1970). The advice becomes counter-cultural in two places. First, the wives' silent submission is to be part of a strategy for winning the unbelieving husband to the faith (vv. 1–2), rather than the total surrender that would entail adopting the husband's faith, as the surrounding culture would expect (Balch 1981). Secondly, the wives are not to fear intimidation (NRSV 'never let fears alarm you', v. 6), which may again mean they are to stand their ground on the issue of their faith.

Husbands must honour their wives (3:7): The brief advice to husbands further undermines a conventional reading of the female submission urged in 3:1–6. In Mediterranean society, honour was primarily a pivotal value to be sought by men, but here men are urged to ascribe it to their wives. The reason for paying them honour is directly counter-cultural and characteristically Christian, namely that they are the weaker sex (literally 'vessel'). Here, 'weaker' means merely physically weaker; women are certainly not to be regarded as less valuable, but rather as co-heirs. The way husbands live with their wives should reflect this; it should be done 'according to knowledge'. This could mean 'show[ing] consideration' (as NRSV), but might equally refer to the knowledge that women are co-heirs and thus equally valued by God (Selwyn 1958). Failure to recognize this may result in a breakdown of one's prayer-life, perhaps through a false conception of God.

All must love one another and bear suffering righteously (3:8–17): The word 'finally' suggests that what follows rounds off the section; having advised specific groups the author now describes how the commands of 2:17 are to be realized by all believers. Here, the author seems to be thinking of how Christians should behave towards one another, and in so doing again urges attitudes that aid group cohesion.

v. 9 again begins with a participle ('not repaying'), indicating that the author is still expanding on 2:17. The advice is similar to Rom 12:14 or Mt 5:44, and so the author is plausibly reminding the addressees of teaching they have already received when he tells them that they have been called to this task. The quotation from Ps 34:12–15 (vv. 10–12) makes the point that the Lord favours those who do and speak good things, and opposes those who do the opposite. v. 9 thus most probably means that the believers' calling is to bless at all times, not only when reviled. They will then be blessed in turn, whereas the punishment of their persecutors can be left to God.

Nonetheless, it is the audience's behaviour in the face of abuse that is the author's prime concern, and he is anxious that the beleaguered communities addressed should make the best possible impression on outsiders, both to avoid provoking unnecessary persecution (v. 13) and to attract further converts (v. 15). Aggressive evangelizing is discouraged, however (vv. 15–16). Believers should explain their hope when asked, but do so respectfully. Ideally, their conduct will bear out the genuineness of their faith (v. 16b). It is not clear precisely how those who revile Christians for their good conduct will be 'put to shame'. This could mean that they will be seen as malicious slanderers by more fair-minded non-believers, thereby winning sympathy for believers, but the phrase could also suggest an unfavourable verdict at the last judgement. Perhaps this ambiguity is deliberate. In any case, the author sees innocent suffering nobly borne as valuable in itself (vv. 14, 17). The idea that it is better to suffer wrong than to do wrong (v. 17) was not uncommon in the ancient world, but here it is given a distinctive theological underpinning, and so neatly sums up the author's main message. At v. 17 it is related to God's will (NRSV correctly brings out the Greek optative by translating 'if suffering should be God's will'; the author tactfully allows that it may not necessarily be); at vv. 14–15 the language recalls that of Isa 8:12b–13.

Since the suffering Christ has conquered evil (3:18–22): The word 'For' with which v. 18 opens grammatically connects this section with what has immediately preceded, but since the theme of unmerited suffering has formed a continuous thread throughout the exhortations following 2:17, this concluding section gives the Christological ground for all that has gone before. Rhetorically, these verses serve to reassure the addressees that their suffering, if borne rightly, really will lead to blessing, since the suffering Christ (their pattern) has overcome all evil powers.

The immediate connection between the suffering believer in 3:17 and the suffering Christ in v. 18 reminds the addressees that Christ is their pattern. Whether one reads 'you' or 'us' at v. 18, the point remains the same: Christ's righteous suffering has freed the believers from their former sins and given them access to God. They are accordingly reminded of their baptism, by which they appropriated the benefits of Christ's death. This baptism takes its effectiveness not from the cleansing power of the water, but from Christ's resurrection (v. 21). v. 18b is unlikely to mean that Christ was put to death as a physical being but raised as a spiritual one. It is also unlikely to mean that Christ was put to death by humans (cf. the meaning of 'flesh' at 1:24) but raised by the Spirit, although this would be grammatically possible (so Achtemeier 1996). It is most likely to mean that Christ was put to death in the human, worldly sphere but raised to life in the spiritual sphere (Best 1971). This is not a denial of bodily resurrection. Instead it underlines the fact that Christ's risen life is no mere continuation of natural, earthly existence but is rather an anticipation of the age to come, 'spiritual' because lived directly in the presence of God (cf. 1 Cor 15:35–57). It was in the spiritual sphere that Christ made a proclamation to the imprisoned spirits (vv. 19–20). Traditionally these puzzling verses have been interpreted as Christ's preaching the good news to the pre-Christian dead in the underworld. This is probably not what the author meant, however. First, there is nothing in the text to suggest a descent. Secondly, the Greek word for 'made a proclamation' (ekēruxen) need not imply preaching good news; here it probably means that Christ proclaimed his victory. Thirdly, the description of these imprisoned spirits at vv. 19–20 suggests that they are the angelic beings of Gen 6:1–6 whose disobedience ultimately led to the Flood (cf. Jub. 7:21; 1 Enoch 6–10; 18:12–19:2). It would, in any case, be strange if Christ's preaching to the spirits of deceased humans were restricted to the disobedient contemporaries of Noah, even if 'spirits' most naturally referred to dead humans, which it does not. The point is then that at his resurrection Christ proclaimed his victory to the archetypally wicked spirits that had troubled humanity; as a consequence of his resurrection Christ now reigns with God and all spiritual powers have been made subject to him (v. 22). This is intended to reassure those who pattern themselves on Christ that the powers to which they are temporarily subject, including potentially hostile political authorities and abusive neighbours, have already been defeated in their spiritual backers. The Flood story provides a further link with their own experience by relating the waters through which Noah's family was brought safely to the saving water of baptism (vv. 20–1). A further implication may be that the ark is a type of the believing community, and that now is not a good time to jump ship (the Flood being a type of the coming judgement).

(4:1–11) Living a Christian Life The author now urges his addressees to behave in a manner that will preserve their distinctiveness as Christian communities, first by refraining from their former pagan excesses and so maintaining their boundary with the world (vv. 1–6), and secondly by acting in ways that promote the cohesion of their believing communities (vv. 7–11).

In relation to outsiders (4:1–6): The author again refers to Christ's suffering, but this time as the basis not so much for suffering as for conduct that is distinctive from that of the surrounding culture. Many pagan moralists would also have condemned most of the pursuits listed at v. 3, but the believers are to be distinctive in actually avoiding them, and doing so as an expression of God's will (v. 2). This will alienate (a possible meaning of the word translated 'surprised' at v. 4) their former companions, but this is the price that must be paid for standing firm in the redeemed community of God's people. By warning that those who persist in this stream of dissipation will have to face judgement (v. 5) the author not only comforts his audience with the thought that these outsiders will get their requital, but also warns them not to lapse from their faith and so rejoin the community of the condemned.

The preaching of the gospel to the dead (v. 6) has been variously interpreted in relation to the imprisoned spirits of 3:19, or to the pre-Christian dead (so Best 1971), or to the spiritually dead. Another option is to see this verse as a reference to Christians who have died (taking 'proclaimed even to the dead' to mean 'proclaimed to those who have since died'), rejected by the world (judged in the realm of the flesh) but alive in the spirit according to God's standards (so Achtemeier 1996). The function of the verse is then to reassure the addressees that those of their number who have died did not believe in vain. None of these interpretations is without its problems, however, and although the last one perhaps fits the context best, it is not the most obvious way of construing the text.

In relation to other believers (4:7–11): The author proceeds to urge his hearers towards conduct that will strengthen their pressurized communities: they are to practise mutual love (v. 8) and uncomplaining hospitality (v. 9), and to use their several gifts in the service of the community (vv. 10–11). Hospitality would be necessary for Christians travelling, either for missionary work or to escape persecution elsewhere or even on their own business. Within a settled community it would also be necessary for those with larger houses to offer hospitality for the congregation to meet.

This is set against a background of eschatological urgency (v. 7), which serves a dual function. On the one hand it reassures the hearers that they do not have long to wait for relief and vindication; on the other it warns them that they will not have much time left if they fall away now. They are accordingly urged to be serious and sober, in contrast to the drunken debauchery of their pagan peers.

The doxology at v. 11 is brief; it concludes a major division of the letter, but not the letter itself (cf. 5:11). Grammatically 'To him' would most naturally refer back to Jesus Christ, but it is more likely meant to refer back to God, for whom glory is desired in the immediately preceding sentence (cf. 2:12; 5:11).

Body of Letter: Conclusion (4:12–5:11)

(4:12–19) Submit to Suffering The start of the final major division of the letter is marked by the opening word 'Beloved' (v. 12; cf. 2:11). Although the reference to a 'fiery ordeal' (v. 12) might suggest that the situation has grown graver, it still seems to be primarily verbal abuse that the author has in mind (v. 14). More severe forms of suffering are not excluded, and it may be that there was a constant danger of sporadic local agitation against Christians leading to Roman magistrates applying the death penalty. However, it is by no means necessary that the reference to suffering 'as a Christian' (v. 16) has this kind of semi-official persecution in view. The point is not that Christians may have to suffer 'for the name' because Christianity has become a proscribed religion, but rather that if Christians do find themselves suffering, they are blessed if and only if it is purely their faith, and not any criminal or antisocial behaviour, that has provoked opposition against them (vv. 15–16).

The word rendered by NRSV as 'mischief maker' in v. 15 is allotriepiskopos, which, though rare in Greek literature, occurs elsewhere in the sense 'busybody'. It may seem strange to put busybodies in the same category as murderers and thieves, but the sense intended may be 'meddlers in the affairs of outsiders' (the Greek word literally means 'overseer of others'). The point may then be that members of the Christian community are not to attract unfavourable attention by interfering in other people's business.

If the prospect of suffering now seems more intense, this is partly because the author gives it a clear eschatological interpretation. The 'fiery ordeal' (v. 12) is to be understood, not as a heating up of official opposition to Christianity, but as the sufferings associated with the end-time; which is why the addressees should not be surprised. It is the first stage of the last judgement (v. 17), which begins with the 'house of God' (AV), i.e. the temple taken as a metaphor for God's people (cf. Isa 10:11–12; Jer 25:29; Ezek 9:6; Mal 3:1–6). If things seem bad for the believers, they will turn out much worse for outsiders (vv. 17b–18), so despite what they are suffering now, the addressees had far better endure (and not lapse). Indeed, since their present sufferings are a sign of their imminent vindication, they should rejoice (v. 13) and entrust themselves to God (v. 19).

(5:1–5) Submit to One Another Having again addressed the external pressures on the scattered Christian communities of Asia Minor, the author turns once more to their internal group cohesion. This time he is primarily concerned with relations between elders and those who are younger (vv. 2–3). Although this could refer to relative biological age, it is more likely to refer to the length of time people have spent in the faith. Whether the author envisages a distinct order of 'elder' (presbuteros) or 'presbyter' is unclear; the word may simply be borrowed from contemporary Jewish practice rather than denoting the later order of Christian ministry. But these elders clearly have some duty of pastoral oversight (v. 2), which they are to exercise in a godly rather than worldly fashion (v. 3; cf. Mk 10:42–5). In particular they are to be examples (or 'types') for their flock; elsewhere Christ is held up as an example for the believer, particularly in respect of his innocent suffering, so it may be that this is the type of example the elders are to set (as they are also to be sharers in Christ's glory: vv. 1b, 4). That the author describes himself as a witness of Christ's sufferings (v. 1) cannot be used to prove Petrine authorship. The word translated 'witness' (martus) means one who testifies rather than one who sees at first hand; compare the prophets who testified in advance to Christ's sufferings (1:11). There may nevertheless be an allusion to the fact that the Apostle Peter testified to Christ's sufferings by his martyrdom. The self-designation of the author as a 'fellow-elder' at v. 1 appears modest if the author is meant to be the Apostle Peter, but if Peter was known to have been martyred this would strengthen the appeal to the elders to suffer likewise.

This appeal to the elders does not necessarily mean that the author believes them to be defective; the point is rather that they have a vital role to play in keeping the beleaguered communities together. But this also requires that their leadership be respected (v. 5). Nevertheless, the author wants not so much hierarchical subordination as mutual submission (v. 5), of which slaves and wives were earlier the exemplars (2:18–3:7). The quotation from Prov 3:34 then serves at least three functions: it provides a scriptural warrant for the exhortation to mutual submission; it hints that any proud oppressors troubling the community are opposed by God; and it leads into the next section.

(5:6–11) Submit to God Since the addressees' present trials are the start of God's final judgement on the world (4:17), the proper attitude is to submit to them as God's will; one will then receive ultimate vindication (v. 6; cf. Mt 23:12/Lk 14:11; Jas 4:10). The command to be sober (v. 8) recalls 4:7; there the context was eschatological urgency, also implied here by the command to be watchful (cf. Mk 13:34–7). The immediate context here, though, is that of their spiritual foe. The idea is that a sheep detached from the fold (cf. 2:25; 5:2) is more likely to fall victim to a predatory lion. The members of the community are thus exhorted to stand firm within the community, and it is by this means that they will resist the devil (v. 9; cf. Jas 4:7). In the author's view divine judgement is a blessing in disguise since it shows that the end-time deliverance is near and enables believers to prove the value of their faith. Failure to stand firm would turn this disguised blessing into a diabolical snare, since those who fall away fail the test, forfeit their salvation, and revert to the community of the lost; the addressees are thereby warned that falling away from faith to escape persecution is worse than useless. In any case, the suffering is only to be 'for a little while', after which God himself will relieve them, for they are destined for glory in Christ (v. 10; cf. 1:5–6). In the meantime they are only having to undergo what Christians everywhere are suffering (v. 9b). This can hardly refer to an empire-wide official persecution of the church, since there is no evidence that this occurred before 250 CE under Emperor Decius. It must refer rather to the type of verbal abuse, harassment, and social pressure already referred to in the letter, perhaps coupled with the sporadic but ever-present threat of more violent local persecution fomented by hostile pagan neighbours.

The brief doxology at v. 11 (cf. 4:11) concludes this final division of the body of the letter, which has itself summarized the main argument of the letter.

Epistolary Closing (5:12–14)

v. 12 succinctly states the purpose of the letter. Grace (charis) has a number of meanings for this author; here it may mean both eschatological salvation and that which is pleasing to God. The phrase 'through Silvanus' would not normally mean that Silvanus is the amanuensis through whom 'Peter' has written; it would more naturally mean that Silvanus is the bearer of the letter. If so, then there is no reason for supposing that he is the same Silas/Silvanus mentioned by Paul and Acts, who was in any case an associate of Paul rather than Peter. Rather than being a pseudepigraphal device he may be a real person, commended by the author as the bearer (and interpreter?) of the letter, but otherwise unknown to us. NRSV is probably correct in interpreting the co-elect female of v. 13 as a church (in Greek feminine ekklesiā). 'Babylon' is almost certainly a code-name for Rome, the destroyer of Jerusalem in 70 CE as ancient Babylon (apparently an uninhabited ruin by the first century) had been in 587 BCE. It is unclear whether 'my son Mark' is a reference to the John Mark mentioned in Acts. This Mark was associated with Paul and Barnabas rather than Peter, though it may be that the author knew the tradition that Mark acted as Peter's interpreter. But since Mark was a very common name in the Roman empire it is conceivable that 'my son Mark' is an oblique self-reference to the Petrine disciple who was the actual author of the letter.

The kiss of love (v. 14) was a mark of early Christian communities, and here our author takes one last opportunity to urge his audience towards group-reinforcing behaviour. Again, 'peace' is a conventional element in a concluding formula, but here it possesses an added poignancy as that which the recipients feel they do not enjoy from their hostile neighbours. 'In Christ' is basically a way of saying 'Christian', but it also expresses where the author hopes his addressees will remain, rooted in Christ as their pattern and the true source of their peace despite the hostility of an uncomprehending world.

REFERENCES

- Achtemeier, P. J. (1996), 1 Peter (Minneapolis: Fortress).
 Balch, D. L. (1981), Let Wives Be Submissive: The Domestic Code in 1 Peter, SBLMS 26 (Chico, Calif.: Scholars Press).
 Beare, F. W. (1970), The First Epistle of Peter, 3rd edn. (Oxford: Basil Blackwell).
 Best, E. (1971), 1 Peter, NCB (London: Marshall, Morgan & Scott).
 Elliott, J. H. (1982), A Home for the Homeless (London: SCM).
 Malina, B. J. (1983), The New Testament World (London: SCM).
 Michaels, J. R. (1988), 1 Peter, WBC 49 (Waco, Tex.: Word).
 Selwyn, E. G. (1958), The First Epistle of St. Peter (London: Macmillan).
 Thurén, L. (1995), Argument and Theology in 1 Peter: The Origins of Christian Paraenesis (Sheffield: Academic Press).

78. 2 Peter

JEREMY DUFF

INTRODUCTION

The Second Letter of Peter is often an unwelcome guest at the table of NT scholarship: its focus on the coming judgement finds little favour in the modern age, and the long-running dispute over the letter's origins have left commentators unsure how to approach the text. Because of this, significant space is given here to the question of the letter's origins, though in the process many features of the text are highlighted.

A. Literary Relationships. 1. 2 Peter and Jude. 2 Peter 2:1–3:3 is closely related to Jude 4–13: the attack on the false teachers is very similar in both substance and order (except that 2:12, 13, 15 = Jude 10, 12, 11). Common authorship, however, founders on the difference in style and outlook and on the discordant use of the same metaphors (e.g. 2:11–15, cf. Jude 9–13). Two explanations are feasible: one used the other, or both used a common source. If direct dependence is assumed, Jude is demonstrably prior. For example, Jude 12–13 describes the false teachers successively as clouds, trees, waves, and stars for whom the darkness has been reserved (for wandering stars = angels consigned to darkness cf. 1 Enoch, 10:1–6; 83:1–11, a text used elsewhere in Jude). 2 Pet 2:17 however, leaps from clouds to the darkness—bizarre but explicable as an abridgement of Jude (see also 2:11, cf. Jude 9). Furthermore, it would be difficult to explain the abandoning of much of 2 Peter's argument to produce the brief Jude, while the reverse seems more reasonable. However, the paucity of close verbal agreements means that a common source (similar to Jude 4–13) is quite feasible. 2 Peter's dependency on Jude would have the virtue of simplicity, but this is insufficient to prove the case.

The approach taken here is that 2 Peter depended on a text similar to Jude 4–13.

2. 2 Peter and 1 Peter. 2 Peter differs from 1 Peter in style, as recognized both by modern critics and by earlier commentators (e.g. Jerome, Epistles, 120.11; Calvin, Commentary on 2 Peter, Preface): while 1 Peter is elegantly simple, 2 Peter is grandiose and elaborate (affected by the emerging Asiatic style of Greek rhetoric). Similarly, the two letters differ in terminology: for example 2 Peter refers to Jesus' return as parousia (coming: 1:16; 3.4; cf. 3:12), 1 Peter as apokalupsis (revelation: 1:7, 13; 4:13). 2 Peter appears more Hellenistic with its stress on knowledge (1:2, 3, 8; 2:20) and the 'partaking in the divine nature' (1:4, contrast 1 Pet 1:9). Only three features connect the letters. First, both are ascribed to Peter and contain very similar salutations, but 2 Peter differs in using Simeon as the preferred name for Peter (1:1–2; 1 Pet 1:1–2). Secondly, 2:5 uses the example of Noah, absent from the Jude parallel (5–7) but present in 1 Pet 3:20. However, the usage is different and the flood is a common image for judgement (e.g. Mt 24:38–9). Thirdly, 3:1 declares itself to be a second letter: apparently a reference to 1 Peter, although a lost letter is possible. Overall, there is no conscious attempt to imitate 1 Peter.

3. 2 Peter and Other Texts. Although 2 Peter explicitly refers to Paul's letters (3:15–16), it is not dependent on them: the only connections, e.g. the Lord's return like a thief (3:10, cf. 1 Thess 5:2, 4), are part of the wider Christian tradition (cf. Mt 24:42–4; Rev 3:3; 16:15). 2 Peter's description of the transfiguration (1:16–18, cf. Mk 9:2–8 and par.) and prediction of Peter's death (1:14, cf. Jn 13:36; 21:18–19) show no clear dependence on any written gospel. Many of the later Petrine writings, such as the Apocalypse of Peter and Acts of Peter depend on 2 Peter. 1–2 Clement and the Shepherd of Hermas show some connection with 2 Peter (e.g. 1 Clem. 23.3 || 2 Clem. 11.2, cf. 3.4).

B. Dating. Three different strategies can be used to date 2 Peter. First, its relationships with other texts: it must post-date several of Paul's letters (therefore after 60 CE), and 1 Peter and the Jude-like source (whose dates are disputed), but pre-date the Apocalypse of Peter (thus before 130 CE). The second strategy, locating it within a model of the development of Christianity, suggests closer to 60 than 130 CE: Hellenistic expressions (e.g. 1.4, 13–14) can be paralleled in first-century Jewish texts, there is no promotion of church order, 'your apostles' (3:2) suggests a time before 'apostle' was used only for the twelve founders of the church universal (cf. 1 Cor 9:2; 2 Cor 8:23; Phil 2:25; Didache, 11.3–6), and the opponents are more similar to those in Corinth in the 50s than to second-century Gnostics. The third strategy focuses on two particular passages: 3:4 and 3:15–16. In 3:4 the scoffers claim that the promise of 'his coming' has failed: 'the fathers' (NRSV, 'our ancestors') have died yet life continues as before. This points to bewilderment among Christians as the founding generation of the church died prior to the Lord's expected return (alluded to, perhaps, in e.g. Mk 9:1; 13:30). By, say, 120 CE this would be an outdated issue. However, concern over the death of 'the fathers' would have grown from the 50s onwards (cf. 1 Thess 4:13–18; Jn 21:23, and the redaction of Mk 9:1 in Mt 16:28 || Lk 9:27). Nevertheless, if 'since the fathers died' means that all the generation had died, after 80 CE seems most likely. 3:15–16 refer to Paul's letters being twisted as are 'the other scriptures'. This bracketing of Paul's letters with 'the scriptures' implies that they were seen as divinely inspired (3:15, 'wisdom given to him'), but not necessarily 'canonical'. Since Paul referred to his own words as (conveying) the inspired words of God (1 Thess 2:13; 1 Cor 2:13; 14:37–8; cf. 1 Pet 4:11) and ordered that they be read in the churches (Col 4:16; 1 Thess 5:27, cf. reading of the Jewish Scriptures), 3:15–16 would be feasible during Paul's lifetime, though it is suggestive of a later period. However, the reference to Paul merely as a 'dear brother' is in marked contrast to the exalted epithets he received in 1 Clem. 47.1 and later texts. Overall, these approaches point towards the period 60–130 CE, with some reason to favour 80–90 CE.

C. Genre. 2 Peter has a letter format and, despite the generality of the address (1:1), the specificity of the questions dealt with (esp. 1:16–21 and 3:4–13, not paralleled in Jude) suggests that a particular audience was in mind. The letter can be broken down into the standard features of Greek rhetoric: 1:3–15—exordium (announcement of the topic and request for a hearing); 1:16–3:13—probatio (presentation of the case); 3:14–18—peroratio (recapitulation and final appeal). It has been suggested that 2 Peter is generically a 'Testament'—a contemporary Jewish genre in which dying heroes give ethical admonitions and prophecies (e.g. Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs). 2 Peter does indeed have testamental features: the occasion of the writing is Peter's impending death (1:12–15), it includes prophecies (2:1–3; 3:3–4) and ethical instruction (esp. 1:3–11). Nevertheless it cannot be seen as a Testament: crucially Jewish Testaments alert their readers immediately to the fact that they are Testaments (e.g. Test. Levi, 1:1–2; cf. Rev 1:1); in contrast 1:12–15 is too late, by then readers would have concluded that it was a letter-essay. Furthermore, in comparison with Testaments, 2 Peter contains far more explicit argument, far less prediction (only 2:1–3; 3:3–4), is Hellenistic in outlook, and claims to have actually been written by the hero. Overall, therefore, 2 Peter is a letter-essay with testamental features, but not a Testament.

D. Authorship. 1. Analysis of Authorship. Three different explanations of 2 Peter's authorship must be distinguished—(1) Peter wrote the letter; (2) during Peter's lifetime someone else wrote it under Peter's authority; (3) someone else wrote it after Peter's death (the majority position)—though (1) gradually merges into (2) as the scribe Peter used is given more autonomy. The arguments about authorship divide into four. First, language and style: 2 Peter's Hellenistic Jewish thought expressed in Greek Asiatic rhetoric cannot be attributed to the author of 1 Peter, nor to Jesus' Palestinian disciple. Thus explanation (1) must be discounted. Secondly, dating: Peter died in 64–8 CE making his involvement in 2 Peter (1 and 2) feasible (dates from 60 CE were possible), but unlikely (80–90 CE was preferred). Thirdly, genre: because Jewish Testaments were pseudonymous, some suggest that 2 Peter's testamental nature implies that it is pseudonymous. However, arguing from genre to pseudonymity can be flawed: Revelation is explicitly an apocalypse but unlike other apocalypses it is not pseudonymous. Furthermore, it was observed above that 2 Peter is not a Testament: its testamental features may have been drawn from works not seen as pseudonymous (e.g. the farewell speeches in Deut 33 and Mk 13), and hence would not have been connected with pseudonymity. Fourthly, content: is the text implausible in Peter's mouth? Aside from the features examined in relation to dating, the suggestions are weak: Peter would not need to bolster his authority by the story of the transfiguration (1:16–18)—but this account is part of his defence of the parousia; Peter would not have used the Jude-like source—but were apostles always original? Thus, explanations (2) and (3) are feasible, though dating favours (3). However (3) would mean that the text was pseudonymous—falsely claiming Peter as its author (1:1, 16, 18; 3:1). Early Christian pseudonymity is not well understood, but there is a natural distinction between pseudonymity which was (intended to be) deceptive, and that which was not (transparent fictions). The lack of imitation of 1 Peter would be surprising if 2 Peter was aiming deceptively to assert Petrine authorship. Deceptive pseudonymity also presents hermeneutical difficulties: should one suspend disbelief—read it as if it were by Peter—or ignore the story and structure of the text and excavate from it the thoughts of a later generation? It is also unclear how it would function as part of the Christian canon. Non-deceptive pseudonymity relies heavily on genre—readers need to understand what is going on in order not to be deceived. The Jewish Testament is the only real suggestion for a non-deceptive genre for 2 Peter, but it does not fit well (above), nor is it certain that Testaments were seen as non-deceptive.

2. Approaches to 2 Peter. Thus, it is not clear how to approach 2 Peter. It could be by Peter, though the dating makes this difficult. If it is not, it would be convenient if it were non-deceptive pseudonymity—to be read as ‘what Peter would have said’—but since evidence for this is lacking, this is perhaps wishful thinking. If deceptive, different readers will wish to read it in very different ways. Recent methods of biblical interpretation sidestep this issue—a literary approach simply takes the text on its own terms (a letter by Peter)—a canonical approach is similar because that is its status within the canon. The approach taken here is to read 2 Peter as a letter written by Peter. Furthermore, because of its dependency on a Jude-like source, Jude will be used to illuminate the obscure parts of ch. 2.

E. Structure.

Salutation and Exordium (1:1–15)

Probatio Part 1 (1:16–21)

Probatio Part 2 (2:1–22)

Probatio Part 3 (3:1–13)

Peroratio (3:14–18)

COMMENTARY

Salutation and Exordium (1:1–15)

2 Peter begins in a manner typical of contemporary letters: X to Y plus salutation (1:1–2). The use of Simeon (transliteration of the Heb. name, elsewhere used of Peter only in Acts 15:14) rather than Simon (the standard Gk. equivalent) adds a ring of authenticity to the letter, though this could be a deliberate ploy. This divergence from 1 Peter shows that there is no attempt at imitation, despite the similar use of ‘abundance’ in the salutation (paralleled in many Jewish letters, though only at Jude 1 in the NT). The addressees are not specified but are assured that their standing is equal to that of Peter’s. The description of Jesus as ‘God’ is noteworthy (attempts to construe the phrase differently are forced), although it has parallels (some of which are also disputed) elsewhere in the NT (1 Jn 1:1; 20:28; Heb 1:8; Titus 2:13; 1 Jn 5:20; Rom 9:5).

vv. 3–15 form the exordium—the theme of the letter is introduced and the reason for listening to it is highlighted. God has given the addressees the knowledge of God necessary for them to escape from the immoral world surrounding them and enter the eternal kingdom of Jesus Christ. However, the time for such an escape has not yet come. In the meantime, two paths are open to those with this knowledge: if they live a righteous life the divine calling will be confirmed; if they do not, they will become forgetful and the knowledge ineffectual, and when the time comes they will not enter the kingdom. The readers should listen carefully because pursuing the correct path is vital, so vital in fact that Peter has put his exhortation in writing so that it will continue to be heard even after his impending death. Crucial to this exhortation is the maintenance of the distinction between the past (v. 3—the ‘divine power has given . . . everything needed’; v. 4—‘has given’ the promises), the present (vv. 5–7—‘you must make every effort’; v. 8—‘keep you from being ineffective’; v. 9—‘is near-sighted and blind, and . . . forgetful’; v. 10—‘be . . . eager to confirm your call’), and the future (v. 4—‘you may escape from the corruption . . . become participants in the divine nature’; v. 10—‘you will never stumble’; v. 11—entry into the . . . kingdom will be . . . provided’: emphases added). Others were doubting that this future component would ever happen (3:3–13), but its importance is reaffirmed here in Peter’s articulation of the Christian message. Ch. 2 will describe and oppose those who despite possessing the knowledge are following the path to destruction (hinted at in v. 9). Overall, the exordium provides a positive message, while the body of the letter expands on this by dealing with those who are, in Peter’s view, stumbling.

2 Peter distinguishes between two different word groups when dealing with ‘knowledge’ (the distinction is not as clear elsewhere in the NT): one coming from the root gnos—general understanding (1:5, 6, 16, 20; 3:3, 18); and the other from epignos—knowledge of God gained in conversion (1:2, 3, 8; 2:20). The idea that knowledge is central to religion has extensive Jewish roots (e.g. Prov 2:5; Jer 31:34; Hos 4:1): it does not represent a later development in Christianity. ‘Participants in the divine nature’ (v. 4) is striking, but this Hellenistic terminology had already been absorbed into the Jewish tradition (cf. Wis 2:23; 4 Macc 18:4; Philo, Quaes. Ex. 2.29) signifying not ‘becoming part of God’ but ‘the achievement of immortality and incorruptibility’ (precisely the context here); its pairing with escape from the corruption of the world shows that it is a future reference.

Probatio Part 1 (1:16–21)

The probatio (presentation of the case) has three sections: 1:16–21 forms the first. Peter gives two proofs that the message that Jesus will return (v. 16—his ‘power and coming’) is trustworthy. In doing so Peter cuts to the heart of the dispute because, as we have seen, this future event was central to Peter’s understanding of the divine economy, but others denied that Jesus would return (v. 16—‘cleverly devised myths’; 3:4), and that judgement would come (2:4–10; 3:5–13). Indeed Peter takes Jesus’ coming as synonymous with the eschatological judgement. The first proof is that Peter was an eyewitness to the transfiguration (vv. 16–18). This is relevant, in general because it demonstrates that the Christian message is about real events not myths, and in particular because the transfiguration revealed that God does break into the flow of the world (cf. 3:4–7) and that Jesus was God’s majestic Son/Agent. Furthermore, the divine proclamation of his Son on a mountain points to Ps 2:6–7—which goes on to speak of that Son/Agent’s role in judgement (cf. Rev 2:26–8; Ps. Sol. 17.22–4). The connection of the transfiguration to Jesus’ coming in judgement is also made in the Synoptic Gospels (esp. Mk 8:38–9:8—although analysis, e.g. by Bauckham (1983), suggests that 2 Peter is independent of the Synoptics).

The second proof is the ‘prophetic message’ (i.e. OT) which also speaks of an eschatological denouement (1:19 can be translated as either ‘the prophetic message more confirmed’ (i.e. the prophecies are confirmed by the transfiguration) or ‘the very reliable prophetic message’ (i.e. they are independent confirmation)). Furthermore, these prophecies were truly from God and not man’s invention (vv. 20–1). The light (i.e. revelation) provided by the prophetic message is vital but only partial—‘a lamp . . . in a dark place’. Eventually, however, ‘the day dawns and the morning star rises’ (cf. Test. Levi, 18.3–4; Num 24:17; Rev 22:16)—the eschatological age will arrive, and bring complete light (‘in your hearts’, because knowledge of God is in view; cf. 1 Cor 13:12). ‘[N]o prophecy of scripture is a matter of one’s own interpretation’ (v. 20) appears to focus on the interpretation of prophecy not its origin (cf. 3:16). However, v. 21 clearly deals with the origin of prophecy, and if Peter's opponents rejected prophecy's divine origin they would not be engaged in its interpretation. Coherence is best achieved by taking v. 20 as referring to the way that the prophetic writings themselves are interpretations of the revelations the prophets received. Hence both verses are about the origin of the prophetic writings, both in general (v. 21) and in particular the interpretation given by the prophets of the revelations they received (v. 20). The reference to prophetic interpretation of revelations fits the context of Peter's interpretation of the transfiguration event.

Probatio Part 2 (2:1–22)

Thus, in the first part of the probatio Peter defends the teaching that Jesus will come in judgement, and as part of this defends prophecy. In the second part (ch. 2) he turns to attack those he calls 'false teachers' (likening them to the 'false prophets' of old) asserting that they will be condemned when the judgement comes. Although vv. 1–3 assert that their teaching is false ('false teaching', 'destructive opinions', 'deceptive words') here, and particularly throughout the rest of the chapter, it is their actions that are attacked. Indeed other than that they 'deny the Master' (v. 1, cf. Jude 4) and 'promise...freedom' (v. 19) we remain ignorant of their teachings (except for Peter's assertion that it was 'bombastic nonsense', v. 18). What is clear from vv. 20–2, however, is that Peter judges that they once knew 'the way of righteousness' but that they have become 'again entangled' and have 'turn[ed] back from the holy commandment' (and indeed, v. 18, are ensnaring others who have 'just escaped' from error).

Two themes dominate the attack. They are immoral: vv. 2, 18, 'licentious'; vv. 3, 14, 'greed'; vv. 3, 14, 15, 18, 'deceptive words' 'entice'; v. 10, 'depraved lust' (cf. Jude 7–8); v. 13, 'revel' (at Christian community meals? cf. Jude 12, 1 Cor 11:17–34); vv. 13, 15, 'doing wrong'; v. 14, 'adultery'. Furthermore, despite their 'ignorance' (vv. 12, 16, 22, like animals, even a donkey knows better, cf. the theme of Peter's addressees' knowledge) they are arrogant: v. 10, 'despis[ing] authority' (of God); vv. 10–11, 'slander[ing] the glorious ones' (spiritual powers, cf. Jude 8, 10, 1QH 10:8—here clearly opposed to the angels); v. 13—'revell[ing] in the daytime'. The language used is colourful, often drawing upon the Jude-like source (particularly in vv. 4–18) although re-editing it. For example, Jude 8–10 argues that since Archangel Michael did not slander the devil (alluding to a contemporary Jewish tradition) the opponents certainly should not. vv. 10–12 carry the same argument but have had the particular reference to Michael and the devil removed, obscuring the logic in the process. While the accusations of immorality could simply be part of an overheated polemic, the notion of slandering spiritual powers is unusual enough to suggest that particular practices are in view. vv. 19–20 give the clue—they have been mastered, 'entangled', and 'overpowered' by 'corruption' and are now its 'slaves'—their turning back from righteousness to error (vv. 20–2) appears not to have been intentional (cf. 1:8–9—'ineffective and unfruitful', 'forgetful of the cleansing of past sins'). Putting together the threads, it appears that underestimating the power of evil ('slander[ing] the glorious ones'), they arrogantly claimed a freedom (v. 19) from moral restraints (presumably on the basis of Christ's work, cf. 1 Corinthians) and hence indulged in immoral practices. In fact, however, evil is stronger than they supposed, and they have now become enslaved to it—indeed, they are now in a worse state than before (v. 20, cf. Mt 12:43–5 || Lk 11:24–6). In their arrogance they have obeyed evil in their lifestyles and so are now slaves of evil (cf. Rom 6:16).

The certainty of judgement (linked to the Jesus' coming) is the dominant theme throughout 2 Peter. The attack in ch. 2 suggests that the immorality of Peter's opponents was based on their belief that judgement would not come, hence Peter's insistent response that it surely will. In fact their views may have been more nuanced, for example that the physical world (and hence sexual immorality etc.) did not matter. Whatever the reason that the false teachers believed that their actions would not be judged Peter's response is simple—they are 'bringing swift destruction on themselves' (v. 1). The word 'swift' here points out the problem with which Peter must deal—no such judgement has actually happened. v. 3 expands this—is their 'condemnation...idle, and their destruction...asleep'? Hence vv. 4–6: a carefully crafted set of three examples that demonstrate that God did, and therefore will, bring judgement. The casting down of the angels (alluded to again in v. 17) and the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah can be found in Jude 6–7, while the example of Noah is Peter's own addition (though a common image of judgement, e.g. Mt 24:38–9).

Probatio Part 3 (3:1–13)

2 Peter 3:1–2 forms an introduction to the third part of the probatio, reminding the addressees who is writing to them in order to re-emphasize the letter's authority before the central issue of 2 Peter is explicitly addressed in vv. 3–13: the apparent failure of the promise of Jesus' coming. Many commentators see the use of the future in v. 3 ('scoffers will come') but the present in vv. 5–13 as a sign of the letter's pseudonymous origins—the false teachers were in the future for Peter, but in the present for the real author. The switching is then either sloppiness, or the real author's attempt to communicate to his readers that the letter was not actually by Peter. However, it is plausible that Peter himself would have switched between the future and the present. For in v. 2 the OT and Jesus are in view—it is reasonable for Peter to refer to their predictions as 'scoffers will come' (cf. Jude 18), but to use the present tense when discussing the fulfilment of those predictions in his day. Ch. 2 is similar. If pseudonymous, the future in 2:1–3 is from Peter's point of view and the present in 2:10–22 from the real author's. If by Peter, he used the future to call to mind the prophecies that this would happen, and the present when discussing their fulfilment.

v. 4 states clearly the claim whose refutation underlies the whole letter: Jesus' coming will not happen. 'Ever since the fathers fell asleep' (RSV; sleep = death, cf. 1 Thess 4:13) shows that the problem was linked to the idea that Jesus would return before the death of the first generation of the church (cf. Mk 9:1; 13:30)—they have now died but Jesus has not come. The importance of this is clear: if the fathers have died and Jesus has not come, then he will never come, and therefore nor will judgement (this immediate connection to judgement fits the context of ch. 2, and the focus on judgement, not Jesus' coming, in vv. 5–10). Peter defends the idea that judgement will come in two ways. First (vv. 5–7), he points out that the assertion that everything has remained the same since Creation (v. 4) is simply false—God brought destruction on the world in the Flood (cf. 2:5 where the Flood is Peter's addition to the Jude-like source) and he will do it again. Second (vv. 8–9), he gives two explanations of the apparent delay. 'With the Lord one day is like a thousand years' (v. 8 cf. Ps 90:4) shows that God's perspective on time is very different from ours (cf. Jubilees 4:30; Sir 18:9–11; 2 Apoc. Bar. 48.12–13; Ps.-Philo, Bib. Ant. 19.13); and the 'delay' is the result of God's mercy in giving time for repentance—a common answer (cf. Rom 2:4; 2 Esd 7:33; Plut. Mor. 549b; perhaps Mk 13:10) to an old problem (cf. Hab 2:3).

The future destruction will be by fire (vv. 7, 10, 12) in contrast to the Flood (cf. 1 Enoch, 83:3–5, for the Flood having destroyed the whole world). Judgement through fire was an old Jewish idea (e.g. Mal 4:1) which had developed into a widespread expectation of a universal conflagration (cf. Zeph 1:18; 1 QH 3:19–36; Jos. Ant. 1.70). Here, despite the reference to universal destruction, judgement is still clearly the focus (v. 7, 'day of judgement . . . destruction of the godless'; v. 10, 'everything . . . will be disclosed'; v. 11, 'lives of holiness and godliness'). Stoicism spoke of a world conflagration in which everything returned to its constituent elements (e.g. Cic. Nat. D. 2.118), seemingly a close parallel to vv. 10, 12. However, the influence of Stoicism should not be exaggerated: here history is pictured as linear, while Stoicism had an endless cycle of destruction and renewal; and the references to 'the elements' should probably be seen as to heavenly bodies / powers (cf. Isa 34:4 LXX; Gal 4:3; Col 2:8, 20; Apoc. Pet. 5; Justin, 2 Apol. 5.2; 2 Clem. 16.3) rather than constituent elements. The reference to the word of God in v. 7 bolsters the assertion that the judgement will come: Creation and the Flood both came by God's word (vv. 5, 6); thus undoubtedly the future judgement decreed by his word (i.e. the prophetic scriptures, cf. 1:19–21) will also come. 'The day . . . will come like a thief' (v. 10) is a common NT motif (cf. Mt 24:43; Lk 12:39; 1 Thess 5:2; Rev 3:3; 16:15) pointing to Jesus' return being unexpected.

Peroratio (3:14–18)

The final five verses form the peroratio: its beginning marked by 'Therefore, beloved' (v. 14; repeated in v. 17 after the 'digression' about Paul), although perhaps 3:11–13 should be included since vv. 11 and 13 are exhortatory. The tone is similar to that of the exordium (1:3–15)—positive encouragement with the hint of warning (v. 17, cf. 1:8–9) as compared with the three stages of the probatio which focused on rebutting the idea that the judgement would not come. The reference to Paul is important for scholars wishing to date the book (see above) and to understand the development of authority in the early church. However, its importance for 2 Peter can be exaggerated: if Peter knew his opponents' beliefs were based on Pauline material he would have developed this argument about Paul far earlier and in more detail. This reference is more of a final flourish—'in addition Paul agrees with all of this, if his words are not twisted'. Exactly which Pauline material is being referred to is not clear, if indeed particular writings are in mind: patience out of mercy suggests Rom 2:4 and 9:22; the opponents' immorality an antinomian reading of Pauline teaching (cf. Rom 3:8; Jas 2:14–26); and the disbelief in the coming judgement an over-realized version of Pauline eschatology similar to that opposed in 1 Corinthians. The letter's close (v. 18) echoes its opening (1:1–2)—grace, knowledge, and Jesus as Saviour; the final words ('day of eternity') give one last reminder of the theme of the letter: the judgement day will come.

REFERENCE

Bauckham, R. J. (1983), Jude, 2 Peter, WBC (Waco, Tex.: Word Books).

79. 1 John, 2 John, 3 John

JUDITH LIEU

INTRODUCTION

A. Authorship and Setting. 1. Although 'the Johannine Epistles' are traditionally linked together, only 2 and 3 John name and claim a common authorship, by 'the Elder'; 2 John shares much of its language and ideas with the anonymous 1 John, but whether this indicates shared authorship or imitation is disputed. Attempts to deny the common authorship of the minor epistles and to see one or other, usually 2 John, as pseudonymous (e.g. Bultmann 1973) have won little assent. From an early date 1 John was associated with the fourth gospel and both were assigned to John the Apostle (see JN), although there was initially more uncertainty over the two minor epistles (Lieu 1986: 10–18). In recent scholarship the common authorship of the gospel and first epistle has become far less certain, particularly after Dodd (1937), as too has that of the three epistles. While the gospel and the three epistles clearly stem from the same school, the question of authorship remains an open one.

2. The majority position which sees the gospel as prior to the three epistles, which follow in their canonical order, has also come under attack; some even reverse the sequence with 2 and 3 John first (Strecker 1989). This debate is inseparable from the—often speculative—reconstruction of the events behind the documents (see Brown 1979). In the absence of external evidence to solve these issues the starting point for interpretation must be the language and thought of the letters themselves.

3. Supposed settings for 1 John have focused on references to schism (2:18–19) and to those holding false beliefs (4:2–3). Earlier, more confident, identifications of 'the heretics' with known groups within the early church are not supported by the text itself; undoubtedly there is conflict over the understanding of Jesus although the precise nuance is obscure (see further JN 4:1–6).

B. Genre. While 2 and 3 John follow the standard length and some of the conventions of contemporary letters, 1 John is more idiosyncratic. It is self-consciously a written document (2:1, 7, 12–14, 26; 4:13), but has often been likened to a homily. Although there is an overall argument there is no clear structure, and themes and ideas often reappear in new combinations and contexts. Authoritative address to an audience still called ‘children’, is mixed with a more co-operative recognition of them as ‘brothers and sisters’ who ‘have knowledge’; there is also a combination of exhortation and statements of assurance. A ‘paraenetic letter’ is probably the most accurate description of 1 John.

COMMENTARY

1 John

(1:1–4) The Prologue The ‘we’ (v. 1) who have heard, seen, and touched are never further identified, and elsewhere the author writes as an individual (2:1, 12–14; 5:13). Seeing, hearing, and witnessing is the foundation of his argument, but the epistle and the debate about authorship do not suggest that he was an eyewitness of the ministry of Jesus or even associated with others who were; all believers can make a similar claim (4:14–16), and the ‘we’ which here contrasts with ‘you’, the readers, elsewhere includes them.

The object of this perception was not the word incarnate as in John (Jn 1:14), but the neuter ‘what was from the beginning’; in 2:7, 24; 3:11 ‘from the beginning’ appeals to the earliest preaching these readers heard, and this, rather than an absolute beginning (contrast Jn 1:1), may be the force here. Although it is ‘concerning the word of life’, word is defined objectively by what can be proclaimed, while ‘life’ brings together the past—it ‘was revealed’—and the present experience of true believers which is the final purpose of the letter (5:11–13). In contrast to the gospel’s prologue, the focus is on the shared experience of believers, in which the certainty of what ‘was revealed’ in the past, and the sense of a communion which encompasses the divine as well as the human are integral parts (v. 3).

A common tradition of language and ideas best explains the ‘similar but different’ relationship with Jn 1:1–18; there are also OT roots, particularly in Deutero-Isaiah (e.g. Isa 43:8–10).

(1:5–2:11) Walking in the Light Although disputes about right belief concerning Jesus apparently prompted the letter (2:18–22; 4:1–3), the starting-point is the understanding of God (1:5). The argument quickly moves to an internal debate over true and false religious claims and behaviour.

The identification of God with light has Hellenistic parallels, but these do not exclude a Jewish background (Ps 27:1). The complete incompatibility of light and darkness reflects a dualist perspective which developed within Judaism in the intertestamental period and was not unique to the original (‘from the beginning’) Christian message. In 2:8, 11 ‘darkness’ is virtually an independent but negative, opposing force; although 2:11 echoes Isa 6:10, blindness is induced not by God or through preaching but by darkness (contrast Jn 12:40). In 1 John the interest is not the doctrine of God, but the moral consequence that authentic fellowship with God demands a life equally belonging to ‘light’.

The debating style, ‘if we say...’, ‘whoever says...’, and ‘whoever...’, is not aimed against actual groups who took the positions which are criticized; the negatives (1:6, 8, 10; 2:4, 9, 11) are foils to reinforce the positive affirmations (1:7, 9; 2:5, 6, 10), which establish an essential pattern of belief and life. This is combined with, and illustrates, the ‘testing’ style: ‘by this we know...’ followed by the ‘proof’. A similar structure reappears in 3:4–10 and 4:8, 20.

In 1:6–7 walking or remaining in the light/darkness is a metaphor for right behaviour; in 2:9–11 it indicates a sphere of living in relation to God and, as a claim implying participation in salvation, requires verification. The terminology is ‘Johannine’, but unlike Jn 12:35; 8:12 there is no Christological emphasis. In 2:6 ‘walk’ is a biblical term for ‘live/ behave’ (Gen 17:1; Ps 1, etc.); the choice between two ways also has Jewish and Jewish-Christian parallels (Mt 7:13–14; Did. 1. 1–2; 4:14–5.1). In this paragraph, ‘knowing’ God, ‘being in him’, and ‘abiding in him’ are distinctive Johannine expressions of religious experience (cf. Jn 17:3, 21–6; 6:56; 15:5–6); there are partial OT (Jer 31:33–4) parallels, and closer ones in intertestamental literature (1QH 11:9). Later parallels in gnostic literature are part of the same religious trend and do not make 1 John ‘gnostic’. ‘To know’ in Johannine, as in Jewish, thought points more to a relationship than to intellectual apprehension. Although these terms are apparently individualistic, 1 John always sets them in a corporate context (cf. 2:9–11), and, as here, binds them to obedience.

The dualist pattern of light v. darkness, which reappears in 3:4–10, raises the problem of sin (v. 6); does the incompatibility of light with sin mean that those who sin have no possibility of a share in the light, or that those who belong to the light can claim not to sin? Here the solution is the assurance of forgiveness for those who confess their sins. Different images are used to explain forgiveness: that of the blood of Jesus in 1:7 implies a general sacrificial metaphor; in 2:1 Jesus, present with God, is an ‘advocate’ or intercessor, the word used in Jn 15:26 etc. of the Spirit (paraklētos); in 2:2 he is, again present, a hilasmos (cf. 4:10), probably not an ‘atoning sacrifice’ as in the NRSV, but less technically ‘a means of forgiveness’ or reconciliation. ‘Of the whole world’ is an exception to the attitude to the world elsewhere, see 1 Jn 2:15–17. In 1:9 God forgives because ‘he is faithful and just’, an echo of Ex 34:6; Neh 9:17, etc.

‘His commandments’ (2:3), identical with ‘his word’ (v. 5) and with ‘the old/new commandment’ (vv. 7–8), or with ‘the message’ (3:11), is the command to love one another (3:11; 4:21). ‘New’ echoes Jesus’ institution of this command in Jn 13:34–5 but here is defined eschatologically by the inbreaking of the ‘new age’; ‘old’ refers not to the roots of the command in the OT (Lev 19:18) but to ‘the beginning’ (cf. 1:1; 2:24), probably not in Jesus’ ministry but in their reception of the message (cf. 2 Jn 5). ‘One another’ or ‘a brother’ includes only fellow members of the community (NRSV adds an inclusive ‘or sister’, and in 2:11 interprets ‘brother’ by ‘believer’). At 2:4 the dualism of light v. darkness (1 Jn 1:5–7) is repeated in truth v. lying (as at 1:6, 10—not ‘truthfulness’ but an absolute) and love v. hating (2:9–11); this is not just an ethical dualism of opposing moral possibilities but is rooted in the nature of God (see 3:10–15; 4:7–8); in 2:5 ‘love of God’ may be ‘for God’

(objective) or 'from God' (subjective). The dualism is also eschatological: darkness belongs to that which is coming to an end, light to the future, which in 1 John's realized eschatology is already dawning. The dualism is developed in 3:4–15; 4:2–6 where it is used to define those who belong to the community against those who do not.

Jesus is important in this section as a means of forgiveness (1 JN 2:2) and as a model of 'walking' (2:6); 1 John's use of 'he, him' is ambiguous: Jesus or God may be the object of knowledge (2:3–4), locus of abiding (2:5–6), and source of the commandment or word (2:3, 5).

(2:12–17) Separation from the World This section forms an interlude of affirmation and reinforcement of the readers' separation from 'the world'. The variation between 'I am writing' and 'I write' (= I have written) is stylistic. It is not clear whether 'children', 'fathers', 'young people' refers to three different groups, two groups who together can be addressed as 'little children' (cf. 2:28; 5:21), or the whole community viewed in a conventional threefold division from different perspectives. The latter is most probable as in 1 John the descriptions ('because...') are true of all believers. There is no hierarchical structure of the church here. 'Sins are forgiven', cf. 1:7–9. 'Know him who is from the beginning', cf. 2:3; 4:7; 5:20, either God (= the Father, 2:14) or Jesus: the beginning may be 'of time' or as defined by the preaching, cf. 1:1. 'Have conquered/overcome [the same word in Greek] the evil one', cf. 5:4–5: this is a realized eschatology which affirms for the present what properly belongs to God's final triumph over evil. 'Word of God abides', cf. 2:24, 27.

'The world' (vv. 15–17) represents all that is opposed to God and to those who belong to God, cf. 3:1, 13; 4:4–5; 5:4–5, 19. This is not a gnostic or ascetic anti-materialism but part of the dualistic structure of Johannine thought: the dualism is not absolute since the world is also eschatologically delimited (cf. 2:8); there are hints of a more optimistic view of the world in 2:2; 4:14, although these may be largely conventional formulae. The gospel shares the same predominantly negative view with more marked exceptions (7:7; 15:18–19; 17:9, 14–18, 25; 3:16; 4:42; 8:12). The Johannine community's experience of hostility both from the Jewish community (see Gospel of John) and more generally, together with an initial dualist mindset, has generated this attitude.

The conventionally tripartite 'desire... desire... pride' (v. 16) cannot be precisely defined. An echo of the Gen 3 story is possible, but 'desire' can have more general negative connotations (Num 11:4; Ps 106:14; Gal 5:16; Eph 2:3); 'flesh', 'eyes', and 'riches' (lit. 'life', translated 'goods' in 3:17) are not inherently negative in 1 John (1:1; 4:2). 1 John may be using a traditional formula to reinforce the desired separation between the readers and 'the world'.

(2:18–27) Reassurance despite Schism This section introduces what has often been seen as the primary purpose of the letter, the recent experience of schism within the community. However, the emphasis is not on those 'who went out' but on maintaining the confidence of the readers, particularly necessary if those who left were in the majority or more obviously successful (4:5). In contrast to the preceding sections the main emphasis is on right belief, and is picked up in 4:1–6.

The schism is interpreted through a conventional eschatological scheme familiar to the readers. 'Antichrist', 'opponent of' or 'an alternative' Christ (v. 18), is a Johannine coinage (cf. 2 Jn 7) but the idea of a figure personifying the final opposition to God has Jewish roots and is found in other Christian writings (2 Thess 2:3–4). By applying this eschatological scheme to the schism 1 John excludes the possibility of debate with those who left, justifies the trauma it may have caused, and makes the decision to remain within the community inescapable and certain of imminent vindication (cf. 2:17). In keeping with the whole letter and its dualism, the passage articulates a strong sense of the 'election' (a word not used) of the community: because, contrary to appearance, the schismatics had never 'belonged to us', this confidence need not be undermined. Different images express this 'election': (1) They 'know' (cf. also 1 JN 2:3): in 2:21 the object is 'truth', not just about the present disagreement but absolutely (cf. 2:4). In 2:20 there are textual variants: either 'you all know' (χ B; NRSV) or 'you know all things' (A; C; RV); the absence of an object would be unusual but is well-attested and would have invited alteration. Like the gospel, 1 John only uses the verb, and not the noun 'knowledge', gnōsis (contrast NRSV). (2) 'The anointing', a noun in vv. 20 (contrast NRSV) and 27, probably refers to what has been used or received rather than to the process, and is metaphorical rather than a literal rite (baptism or unction). The reference need not be to baptism, not mentioned in 1 John, nor to the Spirit: in v. 20 'the Holy One' may be God or Jesus (cf. Jn 6:69); it is the source of teaching (v. 27) and parallel to 'what you heard' (v. 24). The emphasis is more on received tradition or teaching than on spiritual gifts or on a mystical or ritual 'illumination', and the resemblance to 'gnostic' ideas is only superficial. The term may be a Johannine coinage (chrisma cf. antichristos) in the context of a debate about 'the Christ' (v. 22). (3) 'What you have heard from the beginning' (v. 24): cf. 2:7. Faithfulness to the past proclamation which was probably part of the foundation of the community is more than loyalty to tradition or conservatism. The same language of mutual abiding or indwelling is used of it as of the relationship with 'the Son and the Father' so that it and an intimate relationship with God (and Jesus) are interdependent. Thus the last line of v. 27 is ambiguous: either 'it' (the anointing) or 'he' taught, and the command—probably, although it could be 'you do abide'—is to abide in 'it' or in 'him' (cf. v. 28).

The schism was over the status of Jesus but the issue is obscure, although cf. 4:2. The denial that 'Jesus is the Christ' (v. 22) could be a denial of his messiahship: the formula is used of early preaching of Jesus as Messiah (Acts 18:5, 28). This view is less likely, not, as often argued, because 1 John does not imply a Jewish setting, but because the dispute was between those who had been members of the community, not outsiders or apostates. The alternative formulation, 'denying the Son' or 'the Father and the Son', is not the schismatics' but the author's interpretation and acts as a definition of 'Christ'. There is no link with the earlier debate over moral issues, although there may be an implicit association in 'liar' (v. 22 cf. 1:10; 2:4) and 'those who would [or 'do'] deceive' (v. 26 cf. 1:8).

(2:28–3:3) Present Confidence and Future Hope The combination of affirmation and exhortation is repeated in terms of present and future eschatology. There is no connection with the reinterpretation of eschatology in 2:18, and here it takes a distinctive Johannine shape. Conformity now is the guarantee and the condition of future conformity, but whether with God or Jesus is not clear.

The continuity from 2:27 and 3:1, 'the world... did not know him', suggests that 'he' in this section is mostly Jesus whose coming (parousia, 2:28), as elsewhere in early Christian tradition, is expected; if so, v. 29a anticipates 3:7 where Jesus ('that one') is again said to be righteous. However, in 2:29 'born of him' must be 'born of God' (cf. 3:9; 4:7; 5:1; see below) suggesting that at the beginning of the verse 'he is righteous' also refers to God (so 1:9); in this case, since no change is indicated, God may also be the one who is to be revealed and come in v. 28. In 3:2 the translation 'he is revealed' (NRSV) in context also refers to God: being children of God is the precondition of the greater conformity which will come from 'seeing God' (cf. Mt 5:8). This difficulty in determining whether 'he' refers to God or to Jesus is characteristic of 1 John's thought. In 3:3 'he is pure' more clearly refers to Jesus: the emphatic 'he' (ekeinos) occurs in brief sayings appealing to the example of Jesus (2:6; 3:3*, 5*, 7*, 16; 4:17*); those marked with an asterisk use the present 'is'—Jesus has present significance, either with God (cf. 2:1–2) or within the teaching of the community. 'Confidence' or boldness (2:28) is the assured status of believers in 3:19–22 ('before God'), 4:17–18 ('on the day of judgement') and 5:14; in these passages themes traditionally associated with future judgement serve the present needs of believers in exhortation and assurance.

(3:4–10) Sin and Righteousness In one of the most dualist passages in the letter, sin is contrasted with righteousness, love with its failure (or later, hate, 3:13), and the children of God with the children of the devil. The main purpose of these absolute alternatives is to define the community and encourage faithfulness.

Four contrasting couplets built around the pattern 'Every-one who...' may be one of the sources of this section (as first isolated by von Dobschütz 1907): 2:29b + 3:4a; 3:6; 3:7b + 8a; 3:9a + 10b. If so, the dualism of the source has been intensified both by the development of origin from God or the devil in 10a, and by the perfectionism of 9b (see below), and has been modified by the insertion of 8c: there is no longer a timeless opposition between sin and righteousness because of the victory won when 'the Son of God was revealed'.

Sin is viewed differently from 1:6–2:2; here it belongs to the negative side and is impossible for anyone 'who abides in him' (v. 6) or who is among those who 'have been born of God' (v. 9). In 5:16–18 the same apparent contradiction is found, first suggesting that believers may sin and that forgiveness for some sins is possible, then repeating the affirmation that 'those who are born of God do not sin' (1 Jn 5:18). The contrast is not simply between fact and ideal, between believers as sinners before God but sinless 'in Christ', or between individual sins they may commit (1:9) and their removal from the realm of sin. When 1 John is considering the pastoral needs of the community the need to deal with all that mars that life is paramount; when seeking to affirm and preserve their separation from other values and systems the certainty of the radical change they have experienced becomes overwhelming (Lieu 1991: 58–65). Freedom from sin belongs in Jewish and Christian thought to the age to come when the realm of God finally excludes all that opposes it, as too does victory over evil (2:13–14) and over death (3:14); in 1 John these are so real that they are part of the present and sharing in them equally excludes any part in that opposition. In v. 4 'lawlessness' is not disobedience to the law but the opposition to God in the final age (cf. 2 Thess 2:3, 'the man of lawlessness'). Other early Christian writers also had to struggle with the tension between the certainty of God's victory over sin in Jesus and the continuing reality of sin in Christians' lives (cf. Heb 6:4–8).

Jesus ('he'), as the righteous one without sin, is not just a model (but note 'he' in vv. 5, 7, ekeinos, cf. 1 Jn 3:3), but also belongs to the realm of God's victory. He was 'revealed' in the past (cf. 1:2 of the 'life'), but the verb is used equally of when 'he' will be 'revealed' (2:28, see above); 'to destroy the works of the devil', presumably through his ministry or death although how is not stated, is an eschatological event, traditionally part of God's final victory, but now already effected. 'The devil' (v. 8), mentioned here for the first time, is presumably identical with 'the evil one' in 2:13, 14. In Jn 8:44 the Jews have the devil as their father; 1 John shares the same tradition of imagery but with a sharper dualism, 'the children of God' v. 'the children of the devil', which is used not in polemical rhetoric as in John but to distinguish two exclusive groups. It is likely that the tradition of Cain in contemporary Jewish thought as the child of the devil lies behind both Jn 8:44 where the devil was a murderer from the beginning, and the more general words of 1 Jn 3:8 that he 'has been sinning from the beginning'; Cain is explicitly one who murdered in 3:12.

Believers as 'children of God' (3:1, 10; 5:2) and as 'born of God' (2:29; 3:9; 4:7; 5:1, 4, 18) is characteristic of the second half of the letter (Lieu 1991: 33–8); there is a dualist contrast only in 3:10 with 'children of the devil' (never 'born of the devil'). There is no specific moment of birth (e.g. conversion, baptism): the stress is on the inalienable relationship with God but is more precise than the broader 'of God' (also 'of the devil, world' etc.). The origins of the idea are not clear; it is found briefly in John (1:12–13 [11:52]; contrast 'birth from above/anew' in Jn 3). OT parallels are weak (Ex 4:22; Deut 32:5–6); Hellenistic ideas of divine begetting or rebirth are later and not dualist; in 1QS 3:19–4:26 'children' imagery in a dualist setting is found, but not divine begetting.

In 3:9 'God's seed' may be God's offspring who remain 'in him', i.e. God (cf. NRSV fn.), but it is more likely that God's seed remains in 'him', i.e. 'the one who has been born of God': in turning the phrase into the plural, 'those who... in them', the NRSV obscures the ambiguity. It has been suggested that 'seed', perhaps like 'anointing' in 2:20, 27 (cf. 1 Jn 2:20, 27), reflects a gnostic understanding of divine enlightenment and/or was a term used by 'those who went out' (2:19). Nothing explicitly supports this, and while 'seed' could be a reference to God's word (cf. the parable of the sower)—a reference to the spirit seems unlikely—it may continue the allusion to the Genesis story (cf. Gen 3:17; 4:25): God's choice continues not in Cain and those of his ilk but in those who truly carry God's seed which makes them God's children. 'Of God', vv. 9–10 (cf. 'of the truth', 3:19) also points to divine origin; the negative is 'of the devil' or 'of the world' (4:6). The gospel has a wider range of 'origins' formulae (Jn 8:23; 3:31, etc.).

3:10b forms a climax to the section, expanding the introductory v. 4a in the language used in the intervening verses, and adding a further definition which makes it directly applicable to the situation and concerns of the letter. 1 John has no other explicit definition of sin than the failure to 'love one's brother' or fellow believer: the NRSV's 'brothers and sisters' is justifiably inclusive but obscures 1 John's use of the singular 'brother' (2:10–11; 3:15, 17; 4:20–1; the only exception is 3:14). This definition gives some support to the argument that it was the schism, clear evidence of a failure in love, that shaped 1 John's thought even about sin.

(3:11–17) Community within Love The previous passage is now given a more practical exposition in the attitudes believers experience from others and hold towards each other. Again the primary thrust is to explain and reinforce the community's separation from outsiders and their internal cohesion. In v. 11, love of brother is now replaced with love of one another, as also in 3:23; 4:7, 11, 12, in each case in exhortation or with reference to the command; this is the distinctive formula of the Johannine tradition (Jn 13:34; 15:12, 17). For 1 John it is the epitome of the proclamation heard from the beginning (cf. 1:5; 2:7; 1 JN 2:3). The appeal to Cain as the model of a failure in reciprocal love is the only explicit OT reference in the letter, but the range of OT allusions (cf. 2:11) and concepts refute denials of any Jewish background. Here the story of Cain probably lies in the background since 3:8 (cf. 1 JN 3:8) and continues until 3:15, since Cain was the archetypal murderer (cf. Jn 8:44), or even 3:20 (cf. Gen 4:9–10). Cain is not just one of a number of possible negative examples, neither is the failure to love an unfortunate weakness or lapse: both are expressions of the absolute contrast between God and the devil and between life and death. Cain was of 'the evil one' and so were his deeds evil: the same formula is used in Jn 3:19, suggesting common patterns of exegesis and language lie behind both the gospel and letter. Gen 4 gives no clear explanation of God's preference for Abel's sacrifice and only implies it led to Cain's murderous act; 1 John is like other later readers, Jewish and Christian, who sought to remedy this difficulty (cf. Jos. Ant. 1.2.1; Heb 11:4).

The analogy set within its dualist scheme explains the hostility the community has been experiencing; what form this 'hate' takes is not described and there is no explicit mention of persecution (contrast Jn 15:18–20). The world is that which opposes God (cf. 2:15; 1 JN 2:15); in 4:3–5 it is the realm of the antichrist and it responds to those who have left the community. The explanation would be reassuring if the community was in a minority and those who had split from it appeared rather more successful. However, the main use of the analogy is to reinforce the demand for love within the community. Such love proves and is the condition for their not belonging to the Cain/murderer/evil-one side of the division. In the light of 3:10 (cf. 1 JN 3:10b) it might seem that the best expression of love was not to join the schism, but the 'Johannine' appeal to the example of Jesus' ('he' = ekeinos) self-sacrifice (cf. Jn 15:13), makes it broader. Yet literal self-sacrifice may not be meant, for the only application is the readiness to share one's 'goods' or life (cf. 1 JN 2:16) with a fellow believer in need. This is the only hint that differences of class or wealth may have contributed to the schism.

The passage has concentrated on love among believers; in 3:17 'God's love' may be the love which comes from God and is the source of believers' love, but it might equally mean 'love for God' (cf. 2:5); the only certain evidence of love for God is the more visible love for a fellow believer.

(3:18–24) Condemnation and Confidence in God The NRSV paragraphing takes v. 18 with the following verses. Thus practical love is the guarantee of being 'from [= of] the truth' and a source of reassurance before God, even in the face of self-doubt; God's knowledge, superior to such doubt, is a further source of hope. The contrast offered by v. 21 is then only a subjective one: boldness comes from a lack of sense of self-condemnation and not from any real difference in relation to God. An alternative possibility is that God's greater knowledge can only reinforce and add to the condemnation dimly anticipated; this demands not that we 'will reassure our hearts' but 'sternly exhort our hearts' (cf. NEB fn.). The sequence from v. 19a becomes clumsy but v. 21 then provides a clear contrast of the happier state of no self-condemnation where boldness is justified and answered. However, v. 18 may be the conclusion to the previous section, so v. 19 starts a new but related issue of the confidence before God (cf. RSV). The introductory 'by this' then anticipates what follows, a pattern found in 2:3, 5 (?); 3:10, 24; 4:13, 17 (?): that 'God is greater...' is the source of 'our' knowledge and self-reassurance. The negative alternative would not be possible. As elsewhere (1 JN 2:28) condemnation and boldness before God, which properly belong to the future judgement or vindication, are already experienced in the present. Response to prayer, a common theme in NT and Johannine literature (cf. Mt 7:7; Jn 14:13; 15:16; 16:23, 26), is picked up in 5:14–15 as a mark of 'boldness'.

The commandments are God's; the alternation between the plural and the singular in vv. 22–4 is characteristic (cf. 2:3–4, 7) but here mutual love (for the formula cf. 1 JN 3:11) is combined with belief, recalling 2:18–23 and anticipating the move to 4:1–3 where such belief has to be properly articulated. Abiding (v. 24) is in and by God, as most commonly in 1 John (contrast Jn 6:56; 15:1–7, but NB 1 JN 2:24), and is inseparable from obedience (cf. 1 JN 1:6–7). The spirit is mentioned for the first time (cf. 1 JN 2:20, 27; 3:9); despite the NRSV's capital S, 1 John has a much simpler idea of the spirit than John; in 4:13 it is God's spirit but is not further related to the divine life. These two references bracket the exhortation to 'test the spirits' in 4:1 where the NRSV uses 's'.

(4:1–6) True and False Confession This passage links with 2:18–19 (cf. 'antichrist') and has often been seen as the key to the letter: former members of the community rejected right confession of Jesus and left, perhaps achieving missionary success (v. 5) and provoking a threat to the confidence and stability of the community. Their identity has been much debated. The schism is interpreted in the light of eschatological tradition as in 2:18; 'false prophets' also reflects this (cf. Mt 24:11, 24) and does not mean they were 'charismatics'. 'Testing the spirits' belongs to eschatological decision and is not discernment of spiritual gifts (1 Cor 12:10; 14); the more general 'spirits' in the introduction to the passage is reduced by its end to the alternatives, spirit of truth or of error. A conflict between the spirit of truth and the spirit of error, both as cosmic forces and as forces within people, is also found at Qumran (1QS 3:13–4:26) without any ‘charismatic’ setting; John’s non-dualistic ‘spirit of truth’ is different (Jn 14:7; 15:26; 16:13). The contrast belongs to 1 John’s dualism and emphasis on ‘truth’, but ‘error’ is also an eschatological theme (Mk 13:22). The conflict is also between the community and ‘the world’, between God and ‘the world’ (cf. 1 Jn 2:15), from whom each has its origin (‘from’, cf. 1 Jn 3:9), and also between those who respond to either side: there is no neutral third party. 1 John’s thought is deterministic: response does not merely result in being ‘of God’ or ‘of the world’ but is generated by it as a pre-existing state. This determinism is complementary to the realized eschatology: their victory is already complete. The greater one who is in them is God, the one in the world might either be the antichrist as in v. 3 or an allusion to the devil.

Confession of Jesus is the hallmark of the spirits. Those/the spirit who fail/s to confess Jesus (v. 3) cannot be unbelievers since these were never within the community (contrast 2:19), but erstwhile members. The alternative reading, ‘does away with’ or ‘deprives of power/significance’ (Vulgate and some patristic evidence including Irenaeus) may have originated as an attempt to clarify their error; if original its ambiguity led to the simpler alternative. The positive confession is not ‘that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh’ (so NRSV, emphasis added), which would require a different grammatical construction; this makes improbable earlier interpretations which saw the schism as a denial of Jesus’ true humanity (docetism, cf. IDB i. 860), or as a theory that the union between the divine Christ and human Jesus was temporary and did not include his death (often associated with Cerinthus, the traditional opponent of John, cf. ABD i. 885). It is a confession of ‘Jesus Christ (as) the one who has come in the flesh’ (my tr.), although the nuance intended by this is not clear. ‘Flesh’ is not a major concern in this letter (cf. only 2:16); in the Johannine tradition it can be both ambivalent (Jn 3:6; 8:15) and central (Jn 1:14; 6:51–6). 1 John’s broader interest in Jesus does not help interpretation; he is model, victor over the devil, a means of dealing with sin in past and present, son of, and inseparable from, the Father; 1 Jn 5:6 adds further precision but is even more obscure (1 Jn 5:6). Jesus Christ’s having come in flesh is partly an antithesis to the false prophets having come out into the world; it is no less real but of directly opposing significance. The schismatics did not invest Jesus with the significance the author does, but the latter’s love of contrast and concern to avoid real debate with alternative ideas exclude any certain recovery of their views.

(4:7–21) Abiding in Love The thought returns to the life of the community, interlacing assurance with exhortation, centred on the theme of love which moves inseparably both between God and believers and amongst believers themselves. However, the need for right belief is part of this web: the past sending of the Son is both the evidence of God’s love and the continuing norm of right belief and union. Love for one another (cf. 1 Jn 3:11) is rooted only at the end of the passage (v. 21) in ‘the command’, here closer to the ‘synoptic’ combination of love of God and love of fellow (Lk 10:27).

The focus is on the primacy of God’s love (i.e. ‘love of God’, 4:9, 12); although grammatically this could mean love for God or love from God (cf. 2:5), the primary emphasis is on love from God which even if expressed in the past act was for us. Yet ‘his love’ in v. 12 may by extension be the love which originates from God but is expressed by believers towards others; it is unlikely that ‘love from God’ would be dependent for its full reception on believers’ reciprocal love. However, believers may also have love for God, although not as the primary expression of love (v. 10), nor as a claim to be made independently of love for ‘a brother or sister’ (vv. 20–1).

That God ‘sent his Son’ (vv. 9, 10, 14) is the traditional terminology of the Johannine tradition, as also is the epithet ‘only’ (Jn 3:16; 1:14, 18); while it may imply pre-existence, ‘sending’ can merely stress authority and representation, an important distinction for the gospel but not the main issue for 1 John with its lack of theological reflection. ‘Saviour of the world’ is also a Johannine epithet (Jn 4:42), and does little to soften the largely negative attitude to the world in the letter (cf. 1 Jn 2:15–17). The world is only the arena of the sending and not the recipient of God’s love and the offer of life (v. 9, contrast Jn 3:16); it is ‘for our sins’ that he was a means of dealing with sin (better than ‘atoning sacrifice’), perhaps also a traditional formula (cf. 1 Jn 2:2).

‘We have seen...do testify...have known and believe’ (vv. 14–16) is also characteristically Johannine (Jn 1:14; 3:11; 6:69; 20:29) and includes all believers even though not original eyewitnesses (cf. 1 Jn 1:1–3). The apparent objectivity is balanced by the more ‘subjective’ reciprocal abiding by/in God which is made evident by the gift of his spirit (cf. 1 Jn 3:24). Both are bounded by the conditions of love for one another (v. 12) and of right confession (v. 15). ‘Jesus is the Son of God’ is the right confession for the first time here (cf. 5:5), but has been anticipated by ‘confessing/denying the son’ in 2:22–3; there is no difference from ‘Jesus is the Christ’ (2:22; 5:1; cf. 4:2). ‘Son of God’ is not a messianic title for 1 John but indicates the inseparable relationship between Father and Son; although God is the focus of much of 1 John’s thought, God has been and is known only through his action in the Son: although God cannot be seen, that as Father he sent the Son can be (vv. 12, 14).

That ‘God is love’ (vv. 9, 16) is not a statement about the ‘divinity’ of love or an abstract definition of God: it is God as experienced. Equally, ‘abiding in love’ is not a mystical experience but combines faithfulness to the manifestation of God’s love in the Son and showing love to a fellow believer. v. 7 does not mean that anyone who loves is born of God (cf. 1 Jn 3:9) but that love is their necessary characteristic. ‘The day of judgement’ (v. 17) recalls a more traditional eschatology (cf. Mt 10:15; 11:22, 24) where ‘boldness’ (cf. 1 Jn 2:28; 3:21) and fear belong; here it is only the ultimate context of believers’ conformity to Jesus (= he, cf. 1 Jn 3:3) in the present and the purpose or full expression—the relation between ‘in this’ and ‘that’ is obscure—of the present total flowering of love.

(5:1–5) Victory through Faith This section acts as a bridge between the preceding focus on love and the emphasis on the total certainty centred on right belief in 5:6–13. Right belief in Jesus as the Christ (cf. 1 Jn 2:22), like love, is the mark of the one born of God (5:1 || 4:7, cf. 1 Jn 3:9). Here this just defines the one to be loved as only the one who holds the right faith: love of the begetter (God) entails love of the one begotten: NRSV 'parent/child' obscures the symmetry. This does imply that love of God has some primacy; contrary to 4:19–21, v. 2 suggests that the proof of love for fellow believers is love and obedience to God, which in practice are identical. The commandments (pl.) means nothing more than the commandment (sing.) (4:21, cf. 1 JN 2:3); love of God is love for God ('objective genitive'; contrast 4:9 cf. 2:5, 4:21).

The neuter 'whatever' (v. 4) rather than 'whoever' is odd but has Johannine parallels (Jn 6:37, 39; 17:24 (not NRSV)) and looks at them as a totality. Victory over the world is an eschatological reality already present in the realized imagery of birth from God (cf. 4:4). This could suggest a passive determinism, and to avoid this 4b defines the source of victory as 'faith'; only here in 1 John, 'faith' must mean not the subjective emotion but right faith as immediately defined. v. 5 defines that faith in terms of the individual who professes the faith that Jesus is the Son of God (cf. 1 JN 4:15); the verse forms an inclusio with the parallel confession in v. 1 but also leads into the following section.

(5:6–12) The Witnesses to the Son The confession of Jesus as Son of God is now further elaborated and given a secure foundation with God as guarantor, and therefore is the sine qua non of any true relationship with God. Although the passage is often treated as polemical alongside 2:18–23 and 4:1–6, here there is no reference to opponents, to the anti-christ, or to right and wrong confession or denial. 'Believing' and 'witness' in 1 John are always used of the community and its identity. Thus the passage should not be used to identify the schismatics. Belief in Jesus as Son of God is that he 'came' both by water and the blood: the stress is on both, but chiefly on 'blood', and does not mean that some believed that he came by 'the water only'. It is unlikely that the change from 'by' to 'with' is significant, and both prepositions are ambiguous with the verb 'to come'. The meaning of the assertion has been widely debated with no final consensus; there are various possibilities: (1) According to ancient ideas the combination may refer to real human conception; it is not certain that this would have been self-evident and the double stress would be unusual. (2) Most commonly 'water' has been seen as a reference to baptism; that Jesus' divine sonship effectively started with his baptism was held by some early Christians but seems unlikely within the Johannine tradition. 'Blood' as a parallel event would then have to be the crucifixion, certainly an essential moment in his mission. However, 'came by' and 'blood' would be obscure ways of expressing this. (3) Because water and blood become witnesses in the present and not just the past in vv. 7–8, some have seen a reference to baptism and eucharist, founded in the events of Jesus' ministry and continuing vehicles of his presence. A eucharistic reference seems unlikely in blood on its own (cf. Jn 6:53–6), and is out of character with the letter's lack of sacramental or liturgical references. (4) In 1:7 'blood' indicates the sacrificial nature of Jesus' death in dealing with sins in the present; although not otherwise used in the letter, water is also a symbol of cleansing, and is an important image in the Gospel of spiritual renewal. This would fit the letter's concern for Jesus' present efficacy, particularly in relation to sin. 'Came' need not denote a specific moment but views his sending as a completed whole. (5) Some cross-reference to Jn 19:34 is possible, although the order is reversed, but the obscurity of that passage does not clarify this. The formula may have been more familiar to Johannine Christians.

The spirit both has some priority over the other two terms as the witness, and is joined with them as equal terms in a single witness. It would be wrong to limit the witness of the spirit to a single moment in the life of Jesus or of the church defined by 'water' or 'blood'. Elsewhere in 1 John the spirit is part of individual or corporate experience (3:23; 4:1, 13), but there is not a single 'doctrine' of the spirit. The three witnesses who are a unity led to a trinitarian reference ('the Johannine comma') being inserted in the text, which was accepted by the translators of the AV (cf. NRSV fn.); it is not part of the original text of 1 John. 'Human testimony' is not identified with that of spirit, water, and blood, or with any specific witness (such as John the Baptist, cf. Jn 5:32–5), but is only mentioned to emphasize the contrast with the testimony of God. God's testimony does not refer to a particular event or moment but reasserts the absolute certainty that God has acted in Jesus and thus established Jesus as son. It might be expected that eternal life would be the consequence of the testimony or of accepting it; 1 John's thought is so tightly intermeshed that life instead becomes the content of the testimony; equally, believing or not believing, i.e. accepting or rejecting the testimony, is the condition of experiencing life.

Thus life, which was a key to the opening of the letter (1:2), is also the key as it reaches a preliminary climax. Life is by definition 'eternal' life, not a quantitative longevity but a quality. 'Objectively' manifested as the inspiration of the letter, its assured possession is also the letter's purpose. Yet this is not missionary but pastoral, for those who believe.

(5:13–21) Exhortation to Sinlessness Although 5:13 could be read as a conclusion, it is not. 5:14–21 have often been seen as an appendix, perhaps added later, by a different author, possibly after the model of the appendix to John, ch. 21, with which, however, it shares little in common. There is no convincing linguistic or textual evidence for this view, and these verses should be seen as the true conclusion of the letter. v. 13 acts as a transition, closing the earlier passage, and forming a basis for what follows.

'Boldness' (cf. 2:28; 3:21; 4:17) here has present and not eschatological reference (see 1 JN 2:28); as in 3:21 it is expressed in confidence in prayer, which is sure both of being heard and of being answered. The issue is given specific reference in intercessory prayer. Intercession (v. 16) is not general but specifically for a fellow believer who is found sinning. 1 John has treated sin both as a present reality (1:7–2:2) and as an impossibility (3:4–10) for believers (cf. 1 JN 3:6, 9, 14). This passage introduces a contrast between sins whose end is death and those not so defined, although this contrast cannot necessarily be used to explain the earlier contradiction. Intercession for 'non-terminal' sin is proper and will be answered. The NRSV's 'God will give life' is supplying a subject to the ambiguous 's/he will give life'; equally possible is that the one praying, by winning forgiveness, gives life to the erstwhile sinner.

The identity of the sin whose end is death has been much debated. Not relevant is the OT's distinction between witting and unwitting sins (Num 15:22–31), nor probably Mark's sin against the Holy Spirit (Mk 3:29). Other early Christian writers have difficulty in understanding sin among believers, particularly where a strongly realized eschatology makes the blessings of the kingdom, which must include sinlessness, present realities (cf. 1 Jn 3:4–10). 1 John's solution reflects this dilemma and probably means that 'terminal sin' is the wilful self-exclusion from those blessings, i.e. separation from the community and rejection of the faith that leads to life (5:12).

The dilemma is underlined (v. 18) by the immediate repetition of the perfectionism of ch. 3, that sin, unqualified, is not possible for the one born of God. This time the source of assurance is the protection of the one who was born of God; this is Jesus, only here so described, and not a reference to the believer who protects him/herself: the tense of the verb 'was born' is different (contrast 'are born'). Thus the dualism is maintained of the evil one v. Jesus.

This dualist framework is repeated, setting the world and the evil one on one side, God and 'we' as God's children on the other. The transforming agent of this dualism is the Son of God (cf. 3:8–10); here the focus of his activity is not the evil one/devil but the revelation of the true one.

vv. 18–20 are carefully constructed with three affirmations 'we know that'; the first two are dualist, the third expands beyond the 'objective' assertion to a personal affirmation, 'and we are...'. In all this God is only mentioned derivatively ('of God') or indirectly ('the true one'). The final assertion 'This one is...', better than NRSV's unemphatic 'He', forms a climax on its own, but its antecedent is unclear. (1) '[God] = the true one... is the true God' has a loose parallel in Jn 17:3, but is tautologous and a poor climax. (2) 'his Son Jesus Christ... is the true God' is grammatically more natural, but Jesus is nowhere else in 1 John identified with or as God, although cf. Jn 20:28 (but NB 'my') and 1:18. 1 Jn 1:2 does make a close connection between Jesus and eternal life as manifested and experienced: as a climax to 1 John's argument this would be dramatic but would it be too startling? In practice the final climax is v. 21, but there is little agreement what it means or why it is the last word. Some have attempted to interpret 'idols' metaphorically of false beliefs, of those who held such ideas, of deceptive conceptions of God or Jesus, or of sin. Although there are some parallels to this in Qumran, most ancient usage indicates that unless context or modification suggests otherwise, 'idols' are meant literally. The term was a Jewish one for the pagan gods, both for their representations and for the gods themselves without clear distinction. Nothing in the letter supports the idea that the Johannine Christians were under pressure to acknowledge pagan gods during persecution. Turning from idols was a popular way of describing conversion to both Judaism and Christianity (1 Thess 1:9), a conceptual context which would fit other aspects of 1 John. This may be a final reminder of a conversion call, which the author hopes the readers will reinterpret in their new setting.

2 John

(1–3, 12–13) Epistolary Framework The brevity of the letter and its epistolary formulae are reminiscent of letters of the period surviving on papyrus. An opening third person greeting ('A' to 'B'), an initial expression of joy (v. 4a), hopes of a personal visit, more highly valued than written communication, and a closing exchange of greetings are all conventional. The opening greeting has been considerably expanded in characteristic Johannine language, with a heavy emphasis on 'truth', which is almost objectified, but also becomes a formulaic 'in truth': 'truth' is used eleven times in the two letters, possibly because it was under threat but perhaps because it had become a conventional normative term. 'Love', 'truth', 'abides' are all Johannine terms, as is 'joy... be completed' in v. 13 (1 Jn 15:11; 1 Jn 1:4). The greeting is not the conventional Greek one (Jas 1:1), but a development of the Pauline 'grace and peace to you'; here 'mercy' is added (cf. 1 Tim 1:2), giving a more Judaic tone, and the implied wish of the Pauline form has become a confident assertion, 'will be'. Unusually, neither the author nor the recipient are given personal names. The identity of 'the elder' has been debated since the early circulation of the letters: some early traditions refer to an 'elder John' at Ephesus, whether or not identical with the Apostle being disputed (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.39.4). As a technical epithet it is unlikely to refer to an elder in a local church since this was a collegiate office; evidence of 'elders' as a group with a wider-ranging authority based on links with early Jesus traditions or charisma is disputed. It may have been a significant term within the Johannine circle. (See further Lieu 1986: 52–64.) 'The elect lady' is now usually seen as a reference to a local church in the OT and NT tradition of referring to Jerusalem as a woman (Isa 54; Bar 4–5; Gal 4:21–7; Rev 21:1; cf. 1 Pet 5:13); in v. 13 her 'elect sister' will be another congregation, while 'the children' are members of the community. There is no evidence that secrecy because of persecution demanded such allusiveness, which is consistent with the more abstract tone of the whole letter. Although earlier views that individual women were intended have lost favour, that these churches were headed and met in the household (cf. 'house' in v. 10) of a woman leader is possible.

(4–6) Obedience to the Tradition An initial expression of joy is conventional in contemporary letters. By implication it introduces the theme of potential dissent which dominates the letters, although 'some' need not mean there were others less obedient. 'Walking in [the] is not expressed in 2 Jn 4; 3 Jn 2] truth' is peculiar to the two minor letters (2 Jn 4, cf. 6; 3 Jn 3, 4): it differs from the metaphorical 'walking in the light' of 1 John (1 Jn 1:6–7), and could mean 'walking' = '(behaving) sincerely', but more probably belongs to the formulaic use of 'truth' in these letters (2 Jn 1–3, 12–13 above).

The appeal to the command and its form of mutual love is a Johannine norm (1 Jn 2:3; 3:11): the NRSV's 'let us love' may rather be a definition 'that we love'. Here it explicitly originates from 'the Father', in contrast to the ambiguous 1 John 'him' (1 Jn 2:4; 3:23) and to John where Jesus gives the command (13:34; 15:12); whereas in John the command is new, and in 1 John both new and old (1 Jn 2:7–8), here it is not new but one had 'from the beginning'. As in 1 John (1 Jn 2:3) this refers to their original hearing of the message. There is certainly a tradition link and possibly a literary link between the three descriptions, but the sequence is debated; the priority of the gospel formulation is often assumed but need not be the case.

The almost tautologous identification of love and the command, so that the content of one is the other (cf. 1 Jn 5:2–3, 1 Jn 5:1–2), leads to the ambiguity of v. 6; the closing ‘that you are to walk in it’ (the NRSV’s ‘you must...’) is clever but grammatically unconvincing) could refer either to the command or to love.

(7–11) Warnings The appeal to tradition in formulaic Johannine language in vv. 4–6 is a foundation for the central section and its harsh directives. The language gives a sense of extreme urgency with a combination of warnings and sharp imperatives. A relationship with 1 John, especially 2:18–23; 4:1–6 is obvious, but the temporal sequence of the two letters is disputed: a minority see 2 John as an immediate response, while 1 John is more reflective, while others see the language of 2 John as derivative from 1 John, with its harsh measures as evidence of a hardening of attitudes.

The language of deceiver(s) and antichrist is shared with 1 John and sets the crisis in an eschatological framework (see 1 Jn 2:18–27); 2 John does not call them ‘false prophets’. Although the formula echoes 1 Jn 4:1, they are not said to have left the community (contrast 1 Jn 2:19) but ‘are abroad in the world’. In contrast to 1 Jn 4:2–3 only the negative confession is articulated, and it is directly attributed to the ‘deceiver and antichrist’. The confession is distinguished from the positive form in 1 Jn 4:2 by the position of ‘in flesh’ following and not preceding the verb, and more importantly because the verb is not in the past (perfect) but in the present: ‘Jesus Christ coming in flesh’ (contrast NRSV). Technically this could mean that a future coming in flesh by Jesus is being denied (so Strecker 1989); although there are parallels to this belief in early Christianity, it does not fit well in a Johannine context. A theological nuance of the abiding significance of Jesus’ coming would not be expressed in this way. It would be wrong to dismiss the form as grammatical carelessness. A likely explanation is that the formulation, taken from 1 Jn 4:2, has been modified by the gospel’s description of Jesus as ‘the one coming [who is to come] into the world’ (Jn 6:14): the author is more interested in the negation of traditional Johannine teaching than in its precise articulation. Particular individuals or groups rejecting this confession therefore cannot be identified.

The admonition of v. 8 reinforces the eschatological framework being used to interpret the present situation. ‘Lose’ (cf. Jn 17:12) and ‘reward’ are not temporal but eternal possibilities. ‘We’, better than the alternative reading ‘you’ (χ; A; latt, etc.), probably does not include the readers but refers to the elder and others similar who have established the community. The definitive ‘having’ or ‘not having’ the Father and Son is shared with 1 Jn 2:23; 5:12, although ‘having God’ comes only in 2 John; here the condition is not right or wrong confession but relationship with ‘the teaching’, a term not found in 1 John. ‘Of Christ’ might be ‘from Christ’ (e.g. the command) or ‘about Christ’ (i.e. v. 7): the latter is more likely and reflects a distinctive emphasis on objective, right belief. Although ‘(not) abiding’ is familiar from 1 John, with reference both to Jesus or God and to ‘what you have heard’ (1 Jn 2:24), the contrasting ‘goes beyond’ of v. 9 emphasizes the conservative element; ‘goes beyond’ need not refer to those who claimed advanced enlightenment as has been suggested, but it may convey the idea of ‘leading forward’.

The prohibition in vv. 10–11 provides the focus of the letter; what precedes gives a context and is not intended to be over-precise. The warning is against any who presumably claim to be Christians but fail to conform to the Johannine norm. Appropriate treatment of visiting believers, particularly ‘missionaries’, was a significant concern for the early church where hospitality was a virtue (Heb 13:2), and the teaching and leadership they brought could be either vital or threatening for small, scattered communities (see Rev 2:2; Did. 11–13). 2 John’s harsh refusal both of hospitality and of any acknowledgement has echoes in Ignatius’ attitude towards those he views as heretics of the most poisonous kind (Ign. Eph. 7.1). Older and contemporary parallels to such avoidance are found in ‘sects’ who have a strong sense of their own election and of their separation from ‘the world’, which they seek to maintain. This mentality also explains the equation of one offering a greeting with those s/he greets. This prohibition was later appealed to in the early church not only for the correct response to ‘heretics’ but also in the debate over rebaptism of schismatics, a situation alien to its original one. In fact it remains a matter of dispute whether there was an original specific situation, similar and perhaps anticipatory to that which inspired 1 John (see 2 Jn 4–6), or whether the letter is using Johannine language and traditions in a formulaic way in order to establish a clear self-identity, perhaps in a beleaguered or minority situation.

3 John

(1–2, 13–15) Epistolary Framework Like 2 John, 3 John uses some of the epistolary conventions of its age, particularly in the closing: this includes greetings to and from ‘friends’ ‘by name’ and means the epithet was not particularly ‘Johannine’, nor that they were few in number. The prayer for the health of the recipient is also conventional, and the initial ‘concerning all things’ (my tr.) is similar but not identical to the opening formulae used from the end of the first century CE. However, it lacks any form of greeting, an absence most typical of official letters, but has at the end a Semitic conventional ‘peace to you’. The links with 2 John, including the formula ‘whom I love in truth’, point to the elder’s style, if they are not evidence of imitation by one or the other (so Bultmann 1973). While the author remains anonymous, ‘the elder’ (cf. 2 Jn 1:1), the recipient is ‘Gaius’, a Roman and probably Gentile name; despite attempts in the early church to identify him with others of the same name, nothing is known of him except what is implied by the letter. The same is true of the other named figures, Diotrophes and Demetrius. However, these indicate a very specific occasion for the letter and have invited equally specific interpretations of the events now lost to us.

(2–8) Encouragement The initial expression of joy, similar to that of 2 John (2 Jn 4–6), here rests not on personal encounter but on the testimony of ‘brothers’, not the same as ‘friends’ (NRSV) in v. 15; present participles suggest their witness was given on repeated visits (‘come and testify’, contrast NRSV). vv. 5–7 suggest that these were people, not known personally to Gaius, who relied on the hospitality of the fellow believers they visited; unlike the travelling Cynic philosophers of the day they refused to beg from the 'non-believers', literally 'Gentiles', which no longer just means non-Jews. Their travels were 'for the sake of the name'; NRSV interprets 'Christ' but 3 John is using a conventional formula (Acts 5:41), and a reference to God is not impossible: although this could refer to flight from persecution, most probably they were preaching to those 'unbelievers'. Although it is often assumed they were emissaries of the elder, who therefore headed a 'missionary organization', this is not stated. In v. 6 their testimony was given before 'the church' or perhaps 'assembly' (cf. vv. 9, 10), a word not otherwise found in the Johannine literature. Neither the elder's status in this 'assembly' nor its relation to that to which he wrote (v. 9) is stated.

The careful language of v. 5, 'you do faithfully whatever you do' is probably an attempt to combine commendation for past support and encouragement for its future repetition. This is explicit in v. 6 where 'you will do well' is a common formula for 'please'; to 'send on' usually implies provision of what would be necessary for the next stage of the journey. That support for such indicates participation, probably '[with them] in the truth' (contrast NRSV), reverses the warning of 2 Jn 11, although the vocabulary is different. The section combines Johannine and non-Johannine features. An explicit concern for missionary activity is not characteristic of the Johannine literature, and much of the related vocabulary in these verses is not otherwise found in it, including 'church', 'Gentiles', 'send... on', 'strangers', 'worthily of God', the latter not the normal measure of right action in John or 1 John. Johannine features include the emphasis on truth, which as in 2 John appears both to have independent identity (v. 8), and yet to be used in a formulaic way: 'in/with (the) truth' (i.e. dative), is used five times in vv. 1-8; 'love', used only once (v. 6) is a shorthand for Gaius' generosity; 'testimony' is also an important Johannine theme but here has a more conventional context.

(9-12) Taking Sides The letter has been inspired by the opposition the elder has received from Diotrephes. Although denounced by the elder for his ambitions, Diotrephes was clearly in a position to carry out his intentions; whether he held office in the church, opposed by the elder either in principle or only because of his tenure of it, has been the subject of much speculation. The elder's earlier letter, unlikely to be 2 John as sometimes suggested, is lost; it may be implied that Diotrephes had refused it a hearing. More specifically 'he does not receive us'; NRSV gives one possible interpretation, 'does not acknowledge our authority', but this hides the fact that the same verb is reasonably translated in v. 10 'refuses to welcome', and need not imply any question of authority. The plural 'us' does not indicate authority, but may evoke the Johannine plural 'we' (1 Jn 1:1-3) or include with the elder those like him. The elder's threat that he will expose Diotrephes' slanders does indicate he claimed the right to, and perhaps expected to be able to ('if I come'), exercise some admonitory authority; it also suggests that Diotrephes' action had some grounds, dismissed by the elder as 'false charges'. Inevitably this has prompted debate whether the conflict was personal, over models or styles of ministry, or, despite any explicit hint, doctrinal: if the latter, the elder's silence could only mean that Diotrephes was not under suspicion, but perhaps the elder was.

Diotrephes' refusal of welcome to the brethren, and exclusion of those who demurred, echoes the prohibition of 2 Jn 10-11 with its implicit extension to those who do offer a greeting, although the linguistic echoes are weaker than suggested by the NRSV's common use of 'welcome'. If doctrine is there subordinate to the separate self-identity of the community, the same may have been true for Diotrephes. While the brevity of the letter makes all reconstruction tentative, there does seem to be a mutual hardening of attitudes and preference for uncompromising refusal of dialogue.

Demetrius, the subject of the next paragraph, is not otherwise identified but it is often suggested that he was the bearer of the letter and perhaps one of the brethren whom Gaius is urged to support: thus 3 John would be a letter of recommendation, a common genre in the ancient world where patronage and support were essential. However, the terminology is not the conventional language of recommendations, which usually go on to request a specific favour. Instead the language of universal testimony belongs to appeals to models of the past and to characters of established good reputation; it combines secular convention with the Johannine emphasis on witness. Witness by 'the truth' could also be read as 'Johannine' with 'truth' as almost objectified, or as a conventional affirmation, while the final confirmatory 'we also... and you know', is thoroughly Johannine (Jn 19:35; 21:24). Thus Demetrius is set up as a foil to Diotrephes; he is a model for imitation for Gaius, who also already has received some testimony, whereas Diotrephes is by implication the model of evil to be avoided. 'Doing good/evil' are not Johannine categories but familiar in Christian moral discussion; to be from God, however, is Johannine (cf. 1 Jn 3:10). The contrasting 'has not seen God' is more ambiguous; Jn 1:18; 1 Jn 4:12 denies that as a possibility, although the claim 'to have seen' is important (1 Jn 1:1-3; 4:14), and that the object should be God fits this letter's surprising failure to mention Jesus, Christ, or the Son.

The combination of specific reference and allusiveness, of Johannine terminology and non-Johannine secular conventions, makes 3 John particularly intriguing, prompting its interpretation as a key to the development of the Johannine tradition or community. It has also been seen as significant evidence in the development of patterns of ministry in the early church, although with little agreement. Thus in historical and sociological analysis it has acquired a prominence contrasting sharply with the lack of theological interest through much of the history of NT interpretation.

REFERENCES

- Brown, R. (1979), The Community of the Beloved Disciple (London: Geoffrey Chapman).
- Bultmann, R. (1973), The Johannine Epistles, ET R. P. O'Hara et al., Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Dobschütz, E. von (1907), 'Johanneische Studien I', ZNW 8: 1-8.
- Dodd, C. H. (1937), 'The First Epistle of John and the Fourth Gospel', BJRL 21: 129-56.
- Lieu, J. (1986), The Second and Third Epistles of John, Studies of the NT and its World (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- (1991), The Theology of the Johannine Epistles, NT Theology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Strecker, G. (1989), Die Johannesbriefe, Meyers (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht).

80. Jude

C. ROWLAND

INTRODUCTION

This short book tends to be ignored, and was regarded with contempt (along with Revelation and James) by Luther. Yet for four reasons it deserves attention: its use of non-canonical scripture; the fact that it has very ancient textual testimony in the form of the Bodmer papyri with complex textual problems (evident from the marginal notes in most modern translations); its fiery rhetoric replete with rich metaphors; and the way in which readers and hearers are drawn into a view of reality for which the Bible offers a language with which to interpret and inform.

A. Authorship. Little is known of the author other than what can be discerned from the introduction and earlier patristic references that must be treated with caution (though we may note the slight doubt expressed by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.25.1). The writer describes himself simply as ‘a servant of Jesus Christ’, paralleling descriptions in Jas 1:1 and Rom 1:1. The link with James gives support to attempts to link him with Jude the brother of Jesus and is a reminder of the importance of James within early Christianity before the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE (Acts 12:17; 15:13; Gal 2:9, 12). A case has been made for apostolic authorship of the letter which helps to explain why the letter was given authority within the early church, where apostolic authorship or authorization was clearly a crucial factor in determining the authority of a book. The emphasis in v. 3 on a common salvation has seemed to many commentators to be an indication of a period after the apostolic age when a common faith was being promoted (cf. Eph 4:4–5). Doubts about authorship by a relative of Jesus and the attribution of the text to a pseudonymous writer have to face the vexed question of the extent of pseudography in early Christianity, a subject that has often received rather superficial treatment in recent study. Even if one doubts a link with Jude, the brother of Jesus, there can be little doubt that the theological ideas contained in the letter, whatever date they were written down, reflect the ideas of Second Temple Judaism. There is clearly a close relationship with 2 Peter. The fact that explicit references to what later were deemed as non-canonical texts are toned down in 2 Peter suggests that the latter is dependent on Jude. Jude would then appear to be a text that was deemed authoritative enough to be the inspiration of a later text and to warrant some limited correction.

B. Setting. Although various hints in the letter have been taken to be indicative of particular forms of deviant teaching and practice with affinities to an emerging Gnostic religion, they are equally compatible with a Jewish antinomianism rooted in apocalyptic tradition that could have been current in the apostolic age. The occasion for writing is set out in v. 4a. The opponents, in Jude’s estimation, seem to be guilty of debauchery (v. 4) and despising the flesh (v. 8). They deny ‘our . . . Lord Jesus Christ’ just as the opponents referred to in 1 Jn 2:22, cf. 1 Cor 12:3). They are compared to wandering stars (linked with angels in Dan 12:3; Phil 2:15). Those referred to in the letter so disparagingly appear to have been visionaries (v. 8), like the charismatics of the new age referred to in Acts 2:17 (quoting Joel 3:1) and the dreamer of dreams of Deut 13:1–5 who leads Israel astray. Unlike the Colossian visionaries (Col 2:18), these are guilty of corrupting the community and are ‘grumblers’ (v. 16 cf. 1 Cor 10:10).

C. Jude’s Use of Scripture. Scripture usage is typological. That is, it includes the juxtaposition of two different sets of persons (in this case the contemporaries of Jude and certain OT figures). Typological exegesis is distinguished from the related but slightly different form of interpretation in which Scriptures are juxtaposed with contemporary people and events, for example, in the peshier exegesis found in some of the Dead Sea scrolls, such as the Habakkuk Commentary. What distinguishes the latter from the form of interpretation we find in Jude is that the meaning of scriptural passages, particularly enigmatic prophetic oracles, is offered by an authoritative interpreter who is able to discern their truth in the light of recent experience (the kind of interpretation found in the Gospel of Matthew, for example, in Mt 1:23). Jude’s biblical exegesis is different. His is a form of interpretation in which Scripture acts as a lens through which the present can be viewed aright. There is no suggestion that the text has its meaning only in the events of his day, and that the true identity of Cain or Balaam has been discerned. Scriptural types remain ‘open’ for future use, in which the possibility of their excess of meaning can be further used rather than being closed off by application to a particular person or event (as was often the case with Christological exegesis of the OT). The scriptural type serves to illuminate the significance of figures much as in 1 Cor 10 Paul recalled scriptural passages to admonish those who had a special importance in salvation history (a technique evident in v. 5 just as it is in 1 Cor 10:11). This use of typology (the situation where the present is illuminated by past words and events: ‘this is that . . .’) means that the particular identity of the people and events referred to in the text of Jude are lost behind the biblical imagery. In a sense exactly what they were actually doing is less important than the way in which the writer treats them. They cannot be viewed normally as people with the names they were given conventionally. Like Simon after his confession, who is described by Jesus as Peter, ‘Rock’, and then almost immediately called ‘Satan’ (Mt 16:17–23), the opponents of Jude are identified differently as the result of his writing. Their characters cannot properly be comprehended without the perspective of scriptural narrative. In Jude (just as in Revelation) the individuality of the contemporary person is lost in the reading of people and events in the light of Scripture. They are Cain, or Balaam. For Jude, proper understanding of their identity is impossible merely as contemporary flesh-and-blood persons, without the lens of scriptural typology which enables identity and action to be viewed in a completely different light. One consequence of this is that the contextual person of Jude's day is given a character that transcends his or her particular situation, now indeed lost in the mists of history, by being reread in the light of more familiar scriptural stories and characters.

D. Theological Characteristics. There is in this epistle the use of a hortatory technique found elsewhere in the early Christian literature whereby the situation confronting readers is seen as a sign of the catastrophe that is expected at the end of time (v. 18, cf. 1 Tim 4:1; 2 Tim 3:1; 1 Jn 2:18, cf. Mt 24:23). Within the NT there is an outlook that invests present people and events with a decisive role in the fulfilment of the Last Things. The present, therefore, becomes a moment of eschatological opportunity (and threat) when history and eschatology become inextricably intertwined. Readers are equipped by the apostolic writings with insight hidden to others. They are privileged to enjoy a role in history denied even to the greatest figures of the past, not to mention the angels. In 1 Pet 1:11–12 the writer emphasizes the privilege of the writer's time, and Christians in Corinth are told that passages in the Bible which seemed to be about Israel of old were in fact addressed directly to them, who were fortunate to be alive when the decisive moment in history came about (1 Cor 10:11). The present had become a time of fulfilment (2 Cor 6:2) and ultimate significance in which the readers are privileged to share. As well as the eschatological dimension, the behaviour of angels is regarded as both a warning (v. 6) and an example (v. 9). Readers are shown that their behaviour can match that of heaven, either they can follow the way of the angels who forsook their position of privilege or the example of Michael, guardian of the people of God (Dan. 12:1). The Dead Sea scrolls have reminded us of the close affinity between the righteous community of earthly saints and the 'holy ones' or angels, and the consequent obligation of those who have fellowship with the angels to maintain that blameless style of life (v. 24).

COMMENTARY

Jude describes himself as a 'servant' and as a brother of James. Any authority to write, therefore, is based not on apostolic office but on blood relationship. It is addressed to those 'who are called' (cf. Rom 8:30; 1 Cor 1:2) 'who are beloved in God the Father and kept safe for Jesus Christ'.

(vv. 2–7) Jude sets out to remind readers about 'the salvation we share' (v. 3). It is under threat from certain people 'who have stolen in' (echoes here of Gal 2:4). The understanding of them is determined by what was written long ago, probably here a reference to the condemnation written about in 1 Enoch, 14–16. They are those angels who have forsaken their heavenly position (v. 6), an allusion to the ancient story of the fall of the Watchers told at length in 1 Enoch, 6–10. They turn grace into licence (a common criticism of the effects of the Pauline gospel: Rom 6:1, cf. 3:31). The reference to the denial of Jesus Christ may suggest a Christological slant to the false teaching: Jesus was not part of their scheme of salvation, something which has often been missed in discussing the false teaching of the opponents in 1 John 2:22). Such a denial of Jesus is comprehensible within a situation of Jewish influence, though how that relates to the charges of licence is not clear.

As in 1 Cor 10:5 the threat to an emerging church and their group identity is illuminated by an allusion to the temptation of emerging Israel in the wilderness. There is a summons to return to former ways rather than be on the receiving end of God's wrath (v. 5). In v. 5 and 1 Cor 10 the writers are communicating with readers who consider themselves 'fully informed' and who need to be reminded of the fate of an earlier generation of God's people who thought themselves privileged. One interesting feature of this passage is the range of variant readings in v. 5, some of which suggest that the Lord who 'once... saved [his] people' is a reference to the pre-existent Christ (Codex Vaticanus reads 'Jesus').

The story of the angels (v. 6) who did not recognize their position in the divine order but sought something better, only to end up in judgement (1 Enoch, 10:6; 12:4), is a potent warning to a group that teeters on the brink of going the same way. So community identity is illuminated by salvation history, by Israel and the angels, and by the judgement on Sodom and Gomorrah (v. 7) who committed fornication (probably to be taken in a metaphorical sense of idolatry, and total involvement in the culture that involved idolatry, as in Rev 2:17; 17:2; 18:9). We have here a situation where a people with the privilege of the divine grace of election, who, in the words of Heb 6:4, have 'tasted of the heavenly gift', now face the loss of their 'first love' (cf. Rev 2:4). They risked forfeiting their privilege, as did the angels and the people of the Exodus.

(vv. 8–13) A major sin is blasphemy (v. 8). The rejection of authority and 'slanders' of 'the glorious ones' (cf. reference to Moses in Sir 45:2 and the glorious ones of 2 Enoch, 22:8–10; Wis 10:14) is a reminder of the concern about the risk of profanity in the speculative Jewish theology of the early Christian centuries, occasionally alluded to in traditions about rabbis roughly contemporary with Jude. Even the great Rabbi Akiba (who died in the Bar Kochba revolt in c.135) was reproached by a contemporary for 'profaning God' in daring to suggest that King David might sit alongside God on one of the thrones mentioned in Dan 7:9 (see b. Hag. 14a, where there is also reference to Elisha ben Abuyah, a rabbi who lived at the beginning of the second century CE who was vilified by his contemporaries for his antinomianism and his blasphemy against the divine power).

A contrast is made between the opponents and the archangel Michael who, in his words to the Devil, resists taking God's name in vain. The charge of blasphemy is to be left to God (v. 9, cf. Rom 12:19). There is a particular danger of humans exceeding their place in the divine economy and 'slandering the glorious ones' (v. 8). In behaving thus the opponents do not have the Spirit (v. 19, cf. Lk 12:10). Even if robust polemic against opponents is allowable (the language of v. 12 offers an excellent example), this must stop short of blasphemy, which is unforgivable (Lev 24:16). It reflects the same kind of presumption that characterized the angels of 1 Enoch who left their heavenly abode and had intercourse with human women and revealed heavenly wisdom which should have remained with them (1 Enoch, 7:1, 'they taught them charms and spells'; 8:1, 'they taught men to make swords, daggers, and shields and breastplates... and the art of making up the eyes and beautifying the eyelids ...'). The result was that, as the author puts it, 'the world was changed' (1 Enoch, 8:2). In Jude 6 and 9 the behaviour of angels is called to mind. The recollection of the behaviour of the angels of old is a way of challenging those whose life in Christ offered them the privilege of standing with the angels in the divine presence (v. 24), and, like the members of the Qumran community, sharing the lot of the angels by participating in the Christian community (1 QH 3:19; Col 1:12f–13). As with the fallen angels, to return to the life of a pagan world was not only to lose something of infinite worth but also to compromise the divine salvation in which they had participated (cf. Heb 6:4).

The words of blasphemy are uttered in ignorance (v. 10), but lack of knowledge is not the lot of the Christians: 'enlightenment' (Heb 6:4) means awareness of the limits of what is acceptable in the sight of God. For the ancients words mattered, perhaps in ways that have largely passed us by except when Western civilization comes face to face with another culture. The effect of words, both psychologically and socially, is something of which we remain largely unaware.

Jude's frequent contrasts between 'you' and 'these' (vv. 10, 12, 16, 17, 19), in a way parallel to the two ways tradition (cf. Barnabas, Didache, Mt 7:13), enable the reader to be aware, at least in general terms, of the path to avoid, even if the characteristics of the way of righteousness are left more vague. In v. 6 the fall of the angels suggests a warning of assimilation into pagan culture. There is a repeated refrain of drawing the readers back to the faith that was handed down (v. 3) and reminding them of what they already know (v. 5, 17).

In addition to the myth of the fallen angels, Cain, Balaam, and Korah are alluded to and used as lenses through which to view the community's present predicament (v. 11). They will perish like Korah (Num 16:19–33). Their activities are compared to Balaam's 'deceit' (cf. Rev 2:14, where it is linked to false prophecy, cf. Deut 13:5), and 'the way of Cain', which, if 1 Jn 3:12 is anything to go by, is manifested in a style of life that involves 'hatred' of the brethren and the delights of life (1 Jn 2:16, cf. Jude 16): the one who hates a brother is a murderer (1 Jn 3:15, cf. Jn 8:44), and the reason why Cain slew his brother is 'because his deeds were evil and his brother's were righteous'. In Haggadah, contemporary with the NT found in Josephus' version of the Cain and Abel story (Ant. 1.60), Cain had become the type of one who loved 'the desire of the flesh, the desire of the eyes, the pride in riches' (1 Jn 2:16). This is a theme taken up in Augustine's exploration of the contrasting identities of the citizens of the earthly and heavenly cities, Cain being the exemplar of the former (City of God, 15.17).

The striking use of metaphor in v. 12 captures the self-centred and evanescent nature of the way of life of the opponents. They shepherd themselves (cf. Jn 10; Rev 7:17; Ezek 34); they are 'waterless clouds' and 'twice dead'. The latter metaphor renders them both useless and without substance. Whether or not the author intended the metaphor thus, the notion of a cloud being without water is to make it disappear. The abhorrence of their behaviour means that, just as the tree that does not bear fruit is not only useless but has lost any real substance, they disappear, vanishing into the mores of contemporary culture, thereby losing that distinctiveness based on the teaching of the apostles. Jude wants his readers to avoid a similar path. The simile of trees ripped up and twice dead speaks of apostates, and is thus doubly threatening, because they had been in the community, 'but went out from us' (1 Jn 2:19, cf. Heb 6:4). They 'deny our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ' (v. 4, cf. 1 Cor 12:3). Their return to the values of the prevailing culture made them a real threat to the distinctiveness of the identity of the 'beloved' whom Jude addresses. Their role as 'deceivers' (v. 13) puts them in the tradition of false prophets (Deut 13) who lead the community astray (cf. Mt 24:24).

(vv. 14–16) The Letter of Jude is the only NT text (although Mt 25:31–46; 1 Pet 3:19; Rev 8:8 are other possible allusions) that explicitly quotes the book of Enoch. Affinities with the Greek of 1 Enoch may be found in v. 1, cf. 1 Enoch, 12:5–6; 16:3; v. 6, cf. 1 Enoch, 16:1; v. 6, cf. 1 Enoch, 15:3, 7; 17:2; v. 8, cf. 1 Enoch, 15:4; v. 12, cf. 1 Enoch, 15:11; v. 18, cf. 1 Enoch, 15:4; and v. 25, cf. 1 Enoch, 12:3; 14:20. There are several verbal allusions to other parts of the Enoch corpus in these verses: e.g. wandering stars (1 Enoch, 18:13ff; 86:1ff); and angels as shepherds (1 Enoch, 89:59ff, cf. Ezek 34; we have seen that there is also an allusion to the condemnation of the fallen angels in Jude 6). Enoch is hailed as one who 'prophesied' (Jude 14) and whose words to the fallen angels apply directly to those who the writer thinks have gone off the rails in his own day. This relates to the coming of the Lord (here identified with Christ) in a way similar to that in which OT passages about God came to be linked with the pre-existent Christ, e.g. in Heb 1:10–12 and John 12:41. 1 Enoch, 10 relates how the Watchers were consigned to judgement beneath the earth, despite the intercession of Enoch on their behalf (1 Enoch, 12–15). The allusions to the Enoch corpus are woven into a remarkable tapestry of typological use of Scripture in which the present circumstances are viewed and understood through the lens of these scriptural types.

The reference to 1 Enoch as authoritative prophecy demands of readers an awareness of the perspective of extra-canonical literature in their reading. Jude underlines the importance of that perspective and the necessity of a hermeneutic which makes comparison with contemporary extra-canonical (particularly Jewish) literature a necessary part of the interpretative enterprise. Our Western canon of Scripture (though we should remember that texts such as 1 Enoch and Jubilees form part of the canon of Scripture of the Ethiopic Coptic church) is incomplete without attention to 1 Enoch, a rambling text it is true, but one that opens up to readers, in the manner of an apocalypse, that it is the perversion of human culture by an alien wisdom and the manifold ways in which that culture stands under judgement (1 Enoch, 6–15).

The coming of the Lord is not a threat that is past (NRSV fn. points out that the Gk. has an aorist), or merely future. Coming in judgement is a present fact, much as it is in John's gospel (5:24; 12:31) and even in the synoptic tradition (Mk 8:38; Mt 25:31). Parousia is not merely far off, for the community lives at the end of time (v. 17), and, like the seven churches of the Apocalypse, needs to be reminded that the Lord has come and stands in judgement in the midst of humanity (cf. Rev 1:9).

(vv. 17–23) v. 17 begins a two-part address of admonition (vv. 17–19) followed by an affirmation of the reason for confidence that the writer believes exists (vv. 20–3). The two parts both begin with the same phrase, 'you, beloved'. Both admonition and affirmation have a retrospective air. In the former there is an appeal to the 'predictions of the apostles'. This is a phrase more comprehensible as a reference to an apostolic text although it could merely echo the words of warning in such passages as Mk 13 and par. which had become part of apostolic tradition. The appeal to tradition (as earlier in v. 3), often seen as an indication of a later generation looking back to the founding ancestors of the faith, is comprehensible in a situation where there is a claim to new insight or revelation (v. 8). The comparison with Balaam (v. 11), who is a type of the false prophecy, requires the stability of tradition. The appeal to tradition, therefore, is to be expected at any time when there is the risk of disruption from the claim to new religious insight and may be paralleled in the appeal to authoritative tradition in the face of the harmful use of the apocalyptic and the mystical in contemporary Jewish circles (see b. Hag. 12a). What is unusual in v. 18 is the phrase 'in the last time' (even more unusual is the variant reading, 'at the end of time' in the Gk. cf. Rev 10:6), a reference to the end of time which is without parallel in the NT. Other parallel references in 2 Pet 3:3; 1 Tim 4:1; 2 Tim 3:1 suggest the eschatological times which, in both ancient Jewish and Christian tradition, would be a threatening time of tribulation preceding the hope of earthly blessing. In Jude 18 we have repeated the word 'desire' which has already made its appearance in v. 16 in a related description of the rhetorical bombast of the opponents. In v. 20 the phrase 'most holy faith' has the key early Christian disposition used as a reference to a body of doctrine that is the foundation, together with prayer in the Holy Spirit, for keeping oneself 'in the love of God'. The coming of the Lord will not be tribulation and judgement for those who follow the author's advice but 'mercy' (v. 21). Meanwhile in a situation of uncertainty and difficulty the readers are exhorted to support those going through particular trials.

This verse is one with a complex textual tradition with considerable variation in order in the oldest MSS. Whatever the exact reading, the implication is clear: a congregation under pressure from various religious factions is urged to build on the faith handed down, and from the safety of that position seek to support the waverers and save those who would abandon it.

(v. 24) The final doxology pictures the hope of the author that the readers will stand in the presence of the divine glory 'blameless'. This recalls the multitude who have come out of the great tribulation (Rev 7:14), or the 144,000 standing with the Lamb on Mount Zion, who are without defilement (Rev 14:1–5) and possess the Lamb's name and the name of God on their foreheads (another link with Revelation is found in v. 23 in the words 'hating even the tunic defiled by their bodies' (cf. Rev 3:4; 6:11; 14:4; 16:15). They are blameless (cf. Isa 53:9; 1 Pet 2:22), as is the group in Jude 24. Jude fears that his readers might soil their robes (v. 23). It is worth noting that inappropriate sexual activity is a particular issue in the myth of the fallen angels according to 1 Enoch, 7:1. So, being 'without blemish' characterizes those who are found worthy to come close to the throne of glory (Eph 1:4; Col 1:22). As in Col 1:12 there is a close link between angels and humans here. In v. 3 the 'saints' are humans, whereas in v. 14 they are probably angels (NRSV 'holy ones'). It is the preservation of the readers' angelic status (unlike the opponents who are criticized in the letter for following the path of the evil angels of 1 Enoch, 6:11 in forsaking the holy community of which they had been a part), that the epistle seeks to achieve, just as Paul urged the Christians at Philippi to avoid murmuring (cf. Jude 16) and be 'blameless and innocent, children of God without blemish in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, in which you shine like stars in the world' (Phil 2:15 cf. 'wandering stars' in v. 13).

81. Revelation

RICHARD BAUCKHAM

INTRODUCTION

A. Reading Revelation. 1. Revelation is a book of profound theology, intense prophetic insight and dazzling literary accomplishment. But most modern readers find it baffling and impenetrable. They do not know how to read it. Nothing in the rest of the New Testament—or in modern writing—prepares them for the kind of literature it is. Moreover, they are often not sure it is worth attempting to understand, since they most readily associate it with eccentric and even dangerous sects addicted to millenarian fantasy. Yet this is a book that in all centuries has inspired the martyrs, nourished the imagination of visionaries, artists, and hymn-writers, resourced prophetic critiques of oppression and corruption in state and church, sustained hope and resistance in the most hopeless situations. Both the Christian mainstream and the prophetic minorities who have so often reminded the church of its forgotten vocation owe a great deal to Revelation. Reading Revelation is demanding but rewarding, like the life of uncompromising Christian witness to which it calls its readers.

2. Revelation (or the Apocalypse, an alternative rendering of its title) belongs to a genre of ancient Jewish and Christian literature—the apocalypses—of which the book of Daniel is the only other example within the Christian canon of Scripture. Revelation shares important features with many of the apocalypses, such as the idea of a heavenly disclosure of truth made to a seer, a concern with the contradiction between God's rule over his creation and the apparently unchecked dominance of evil in the world, the hope of an impending final resolution of history in which God will bring eternal good out of all the evils of this world and renew his creation, the use of symbolic visions and more or less fantastic imagery to fund alternative perceptions of the world, its history, and future.

3. The apocalypses are a literature which deploys the theological imagination to draw its readers into different ways of seeing things, and the most important sense in which Revelation resembles them is in its aim to 'reveal' or 'unveil' the truth of things as seen from God's heavenly perspective. It speaks to a world whose imaginative view of the world is controlled by the power and propaganda of the dominant political and economic system. By envisioning the same world from the perspective of God's kingdom—which means both from the perspective of heaven, as God sees it, and from the perspective of the final future, as God's purposes intend, the final coming of God's kingdom in all creation—Revelation liberates its readers from the dominant world-view. It exposes the idolatry that from top to bottom infuses and inspires the political, economic, and social realities in which its readers live, and calls them to uncompromising Christian witness to the true God who despite earthly appearances is sovereign. By seeing the world differently, readers are enabled to live and to die differently, as followers of Jesus' way of faithful witness to God even to the point of death. They are empowered to live their allegiance to a different way of being in the world, the kingdom of God, and to live in hope of the coming of God's kingdom as the ultimate truth of the world which must prevail over all that presently opposes God's rule. Revelation's purpose is to enable its readers to continue to pray and to live Jesus' prayer: 'Your kingdom come.'

4. While Revelation bears a generic resemblance to the ancient apocalypses, it is also, without contradiction, a prophecy. Indeed, it clearly understands itself to be the culmination of the whole biblical prophetic tradition. Its text is a closely woven fabric of allusions to the OT, and is largely unintelligible without awareness of this essentially intertextual character. Readers cannot hope to appreciate Revelation in the least adequately without acquainting themselves with the book's OT sources and the way in which they are taken up into the message of Revelation. The author, the prophet John, sees the unity of OT prophecy in its hope for the coming of God's universal kingdom on earth, and so he gathers up all those strands of OT expectation which point to the eschatological future, focusing them in a fresh vision of the way they are to be fulfilled. As a Christian prophet, he reads OT prophecy in the light of the beginning of its fulfilment in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus, but he also interprets Jesus and his church by means of OT prophecy. It is through Jesus' way of cross and resurrection that God's kingdom will come.

5. However, Revelation does not just gather up previous prophecy; it claims a new prophetic revelation as to the way in which God's kingdom is to come: that the church is called to participate in Jesus' victory over evil by following his path of witness even to the point of death. This will be the great conflict between God's kingdom and the worldly powers that oppose God. The conflict is for the allegiance of the nations, and John's new revelation is full of hope that by this means of victory over evil, witness to the truth in the face of the illusions and delusions of idolatry, and even at the price of life, the nations may be converted to the worship of the true God.

6. Among prophecies and apocalypses, Revelation is distinctive in that it is also a circular letter written to seven specific churches in the Roman province of Asia (1:4, 11). This means that we must take the first-century historical context of its first readers seriously in reading the whole book, but it also means that the various contexts of the first readers, as seen with John's prophetic insight, are sketched for us in Revelation itself, in the seven messages to the churches (chs. 2–3). We are shown Christian communities living in various degrees of conflict and compromise with Roman power and the Roman political religion, the business and social life of the cities with its inextricable associations with idolatrous religion, and the local Jewish synagogues. We find that the readers are by no means all poor, oppressed, and persecuted; many are complacent, compromising, and close to apostasy, when judged by the demands of faithful witness to God's kingdom as Revelation understands these. To these diverse readers in their various contexts, Revelation points the way of faithful witness, the great conflict with the idolatrous world system which will ensue, and the eschatological goal to which God's purposes are assuredly leading.

7. The messages to the seven churches, as well as other key features of Revelation, remind us that, like biblical prophecy in general, it addresses its contemporaries and is intended to be intelligible and relevant to them. We cannot read Revelation adequately without some recognition of its original historical context, to which it itself makes explicit allusions. Like all biblical prophecy, Revelation is prophetic as much in its discernment of God's purposes in the realities of its contemporary world, and in its call to appropriate response by its readers, as it is in predicting what must ultimately come to pass in God's purpose for establishing his kingdom. But, like all biblical prophecy, Revelation also transcends its original context and speaks to later ages, not by literalistic prediction of historical events, but by its power to illuminate the truth of new situations in the light of God's kingdom and to continue to point to the eschatological future. John brings the ultimate future into direct relation to his own present. In this way his prophecy confronts the world and the church as they are with God's final purpose for what must be in the end, that the truth of the present can be discerned and the way from there to the future pointed.

B. Author and Date. The author of Revelation was a Christian prophet named John (1:1, 4; 22:8), of whom we know only that he was familiar with the Christian communities in the Roman province of Asia and at the time of writing was exiled on the island of Patmos. John was one of the most common of Jewish names in the period, and there is no reason to identify him with the apostle John, though this identification was made from the end of the second century onwards. Also from that time onwards he has been thought to have written his work late in the reign of the Roman emperor Domitian (81–96 CE), and this is still the most commonly proposed date, though some scholars would date it earlier. If the interpretation of the allusions to the emperor Nero in chs. 13 and 17, proposed below in the commentary, is correct, Revelation could not have been written before the reign of Vespasian (69–79 CE). The precise date is not important for interpretation, especially since the common view that Revelation reflects a time of widespread and serious persecution of Christianity is not correct. The seven messages show that persecution was sporadic and dependent on local conditions. Revelation anticipates very serious persecution to come because it sees an escalating conflict resulting from faithful Christian witness with its necessary refusal to compromise with idolatry in any area of life.

C. Outline.

Prologue (1:1–8)

Title and Beatitude (1:1–3)

Epistolary Opening (1:4–5a)

Doxology (1:5b–6)
 A Scriptural Testimony (1:7)
 A Prophetic Oracle (1:8)
Inaugural Vision of Jesus Christ among the Churches and his Messages to the Seven Churches (1:9–3:22)
 John's Vision and Commission (1:9–20)
 The Message to Ephesus (2:1–7)
 The Message to Smyrna (2:8–11)
 The Message to Pergamum (2:12–17)
 The Message to Thyatira (2:18–29)
 The Message to Sardis (3:1–6)
 The Message to Philadelphia (3:7–13)
 The Message to Laodicea (3:14–22)
Inaugural Vision of Heaven (4:1–5:14)
 God on the Throne (4:1–11)
 The Lamb on the Throne (5:1–14)
The Seven Seals (6:1–8:5)
 The First Four Seals (6:1–8)
 The Fifth Seal (6:9–11)
 The Sixth Seal (6:12–17)
 Interlude: The Sealing of the Elect (7:1–17)
 The Seventh Seal (8:1–5)
The Seven Trumpets (8:6–11:19)
 The First Four Trumpets (8:6–12)
 The Fifth Trumpet (8:13–9:11)
 The Sixth Trumpet (9:12–21)
 Interlude: (a) The Scroll Given to John (10:1–11)
 Interlude: (b) The Content of the Scroll (11:1–13)
 The Seventh Trumpet (11:14–19)
The Story of God's People in Conflict with Evil (12:1–15:4)
 The Woman, the Dragon and the Child (12:1–6)
 Michael and the Dragon (12:7–12)
 The Dragon and the Woman (12:13–17)
 The Monster from the Sea (12:18–13:10)
 The Monster from the Land (13:11–18)
 The Lamb and the 144,000 (14:1–5)
 Three Angelic Messages and a Voice from Heaven (14:6–13)
 The Harvest of the Earth and the Vintage of the Earth (14:14–20)
 The Song of the Conquerors (15:1–4)
The Seven Bowls (15:5–16:21)
 Introduction (15:5–16:1)
 The First Five Bowls (16:2–11)
 The Sixth Bowl (16:12–16)
 The Seventh Bowl (16:17–21)
Babylon the Harlot (17:1–19:10)
 The Harlot: (a) The Vision (17:1–6a)
 The Harlot: (b) The Interpretation (17:6b–18)
 The Fall of Babylon: (a) The Voice of an Angel (18:1–3)
 The Fall of Babylon: (b) A Voice from Heaven (18:4–20)
 The Fall of Babylon: (c) The Voice of Another Angel (18:21–4)
 The Fall of Babylon: (d) Voices from Heaven (19:1–8)
 John and the Angel (19:9–10)
Transition from Babylon to the New Jerusalem (19:11–21:8)
 The Rider from Heaven and his Victory (19:11–21)
 The Millennium (20:1–10)
 The Judgment of the Dead (20:11–15)
 The New Heaven and the New Earth (21:1–4)
 God Speaks (21:5–8)

The New Jerusalem the Bride (21:9–22:9)
 General View of the City (21:9–14)
 The Walls and the Gates of the City (21:15–21)
 The Glory of God in the Temple-City (21:22–7)
 The Throne of God in the City (22:1–5)
 John and the Angel (22:6–9)
Epilogue (22:10–21)
 The Angel's Instructions (22:10–11)
 A Prophetic Oracle (22:12–13)
 Beatitude (22:14–15)
 A Scriptural Testimony (22:16)
 Invitation to Come to the Water of Life (22:17)
 Warning to Preserve the Book's Integrity (22:18–19)
 A Prophetic Oracle and Response (22:20)

COMMENTARY

Prologue (1:1–8)

(1:1–3) Title and Beatitude v. 1, the word 'revelation' (apokalypsis) can also be translated 'apocalypse', a term biblical scholars use for a literary genre: apocalypses are works in which heavenly secrets are disclosed in visionary manner. Daniel, Revelation, and many non-canonical Jewish and Christian works are apocalypses in this sense. It is unlikely that the word had this technical sense when John wrote, but his work does have strong literary affinities with the other apocalypses. But whereas modern scholars often distinguish prophecy from apocalyptic literature, John considers his work to be prophecy (1:3; 10:11; 22:6–7, 10, 18–19), indeed, to be the culmination of the biblical tradition of prophecy, revealing how the words of the OT prophets are going to be finally fulfilled in the coming of God's kingdom (see 10:7). The most important sense in which John's prophecy is also 'apocalyptic' is that it communicates a disclosure of a transcendent perspective on the world, a revelation from God which enables readers to see their world in a different way from that of the society in which they live. It reveals the world as it appears from the perspective of God's purpose to establish his kingdom in the world, a purpose which has begun to be fulfilled through Jesus Christ and will be completed by Jesus Christ. Hence the chain of revelation: God—Christ—angel—John—servants of God. The angel appears in 10:1–11 (also 22:8–9, 16), because the revelation proper is the content of the scroll this angel gives to John in ch. 10 (earlier chapters are preparatory for this revelation).

v. 2, 'witness' (or testimony) is a key word in Revelation, referring first to the witness to God that Jesus bore in his earthly life (cf. 1:5) and then to the witness his followers bear (1:9). The content of John's prophecy, as intended to serve this witness, is attested by Jesus himself (1:2; 22:20), his angel (22:16), and John (1:2).

v. 3 is the first of seven beatitudes scattered through the book (cf. 14:13; 16:15; 19:9; 20:6; 22:7, 14). The number seven indicates completeness, and so the seven beatitudes indicate the fullness of God's blessing for those who respond faithfully and fully to what the prophecy demands of them. The 'one who reads' is the Christian who reads the book aloud to the assembled church. Revelation was intended for oral performance in the context of Christian worship (just as Christian prophets present would give their own prophecies orally during worship), though certainly also for study, since it is packed with meaning that cannot be grasped at first reading. But obedience to the prophecy is urgent, since John sees a crisis looming ('the time is near') which will lead to the eschatological completion of God's purposes for the world.

(1:4–5a) Epistolary Opening Following the standard literary form for the opening of a letter, writer and addressees are named, and a salutation invokes a blessing in the way usual in Christian letters (cf. the openings of all the Pauline letters). John's prophecy is sent as a circular letter to the seven churches (named in 1:11 in the order in which a messenger would visit them); each is given an individual message in chs. 2–3, and the rest of the book is addressed to them all. This is important for interpretation, since it makes it clear that the whole book (not only chs. 2–3) was written with relevance immediately to these first recipients. Unlike other letter openings in the NT, the blessing here is trinitarian. Revelation has one of the most fully trinitarian understandings of God in the NT. The one 'who is and who was and who is to come', one of Revelation's unique designations for God (cf. 1:8; 4:8; 11:17; 16:5), is an interpretation of the divine name YHWH (cf. Ex 3:14), which Jews sometimes understood as referring to the three tenses of the divine eternity. In Revelation's form God's future is not just his own, but his eschatological coming to the world, which will find its own future in God's coming to it. The seven Spirits (also in 3:1; 4:5; 5:6; cf. Isa 11:2) are seven because they represent the Spirit of God as the fullness of the divine power. (Some think they are the seven archangels, but these are differently described in 8:2.) The three phrases describing Jesus refer respectively to his life up to death, his resurrection, and his future coming. While the word martus (witness) does not yet mean, as in Christian usage it soon came to mean, 'martyr', in Revelation there is a strong presumption that faithful witness can lead to death. 'Firstborn' (cf. Ps 89:27) indicates his pre-eminence as the pioneer of the new creation in his resurrection. The third phrase introduces the issue of sovereignty which is central in Revelation. The 'kings of the earth' (also 6:15; 17:2, 18; 18:3, 9) ally themselves with the forces opposed to God's rule either until at his coming Jesus 'the King of kings' (17:14; 19:16) defeats them (19:19–21) or until they are converted (21:24).

(1:5b–6) Doxology In Jewish usage doxologies express the honour due exclusively to the one God. It is consistent with Revelation's high Christology that this one (the first of many in the book) addresses Jesus. His redemptive work is understood in terms of the theme of the new exodus which is prominent throughout Revelation. He is the passover lamb whose sacrifice enables the exodus. The people he freed are described as Israel as in Ex 19:6 (cf. Rev 5:9–10).

(1:7) A Scriptural Testimony This evocation of the parousia is a conflated quotation of Dan 7:13 and Zech 12:10, 12, but the phrase 'all the tribes of the earth' also alludes to Gen 12:3, God's promise to Abraham that all the nations will be blessed. The mourning of the nations is therefore not remorse, but repentance, leading to salvation at the parousia. This scriptural testimony is so placed in the prologue as to introduce the hope that the nations are to be converted. The novel element in John's prophecy will be to show how this conversion may come about.

(1:8) A Prophetic Oracle God speaks directly only here and in 21:5–6, where there is a similar divine self-declaration. Here the solemn declaration makes clear God's identity as the absolutely sovereign one whose purpose the rest of the book sees accomplished. 'The Alpha and the Omega' (the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet; also in 21:6; 22:13) is equivalent to 'the first and the last' (1:17; 2:8) and 'the beginning and the end' (21:6; 22:13). It is based on Isaiah 44:6; 48:12, where it evokes YHWH's uniqueness as the Creator who precedes all things and the Lord who will bring all things to their fulfilment. Significantly the title is applied to Christ (1:17; 2:8; 22:13) as well as to God. 'The Lord God the Almighty' (also in 4:8; 11:17; 15:3; 16:7; 19:6; 21:22; cf. 16:14; 19:15) translates the OT phrase 'YHWH the God of hosts', and stresses God's supremacy over history.

Inaugural Vision of Jesus Christ among the Churches and his Messages to the Seven Churches (1:9–3:22)

(1:9–20) John's Vision and Commission v. 9, John establishes connection with his readers by pointing out what they have in common. The reference to 'persecution' does not mean that there was systematic and widespread persecution. Chs. 2–3 show that as yet there has been only occasional persecution, though it is a constant risk. Part of Revelation's message is that, in the context of the seven churches, faithful witness (bearing 'the testimony of Jesus') will lead to persecution and require 'endurance'; but this is the way in which Christians share in the rule ('kingdom'; cf. 1:5–6) of Christ whose faithful witness incurred death. In John's case persecution has led to his exile (either banishment or flight) on the island of Patmos. v. 10, since it was in Christian meetings on 'the Lord's day' (Sunday) that the book would be read, the date continues to link John's situation with that of his readers. The phrase 'in the Spirit' (also 4:2; 17:3; 21:10) refers to the altered state of consciousness, given by the Spirit of God, in which John can receive visionary revelation. v. 11, these seven churches in the Roman province of Asia are the actual first recipients of the book, but the number seven suggests they are also chosen as representative of all the churches. Their various different characteristics and situations are typical of any other churches to which the book may circulate. v. 12, the seven lampstands, representing the seven churches, recall the seven-branched lampstand that stood in the temple (Ex 25:31–40; Zech 4:2) and its heavenly prototype: the seven lamps before the throne of God, representing the seven spirits (Rev 4:5; cf. 1:4). Probably the implication is that the churches are the lampstands which bear the light of the Spirit in their witness to the world (cf. 11:3–4 for this significance of lampstands). v. 13, whereas in the gospels the phrase 'the Son of Man' is used of Jesus, only Revelation (1:13; 14:14) uses the exact phrase from Dan 7:13: Heb. 'one like a son of man'. It designates Jesus as the one to whom God has given universal sovereignty (Dan 7:14), and although here it is the churches he addresses, this, as the rest of the book shows, has the coming of the kingdom in the world in view. vv. 13–16, some of the terms of the description come from Dan 10:5–6; others resemble standard Jewish descriptions of celestial beings (God, angels, exalted humans), whose heavenly brightness is often evoked by gold, whiteness, and fire (cf. Rev 10:1; 15:6). Despite the coincidence with Dan 7:9, white hair is not peculiar to God (see Jos. Asen. 22:7; 1 Enoch, 106:2; Herm. Vis. 4.2). The clothing (v. 13) is not sufficiently distinctive of priests to indicate that Christ is portrayed in a priestly role. Most of the description probably indicates nothing more specific than the exalted Christ's heavenly glory, but some items with more specific significance recur later (1:20; 2:1, 12, 16, 18; 3:1; 19:12, 15). vv. 17–18, Christ shares in the eternal life of God through dying and triumphing over death. (This is important for Revelation's call to its readers to follow Jesus in witness even to death.) Death and Hades (the place of the dead) appear as a pair also in 6:8; 20:13–14. That Christ now holds the key to their realm means he can liberate the dead from them. v. 19, the precise meaning is debatable, but probably 'write what you see' (this tr. is preferable to NRSV's) reiterates the command of v. 11 and refers to the whole book; 'what is' and 'what is to take place after this' (cf. 1:1; 4:1) may refer to chs. 2–3 and 4–22 respectively. v. 20, the angels are probably the heavenly representatives and guardians of the churches.

The Seven Messages to the Churches (general comments): These are prophetic oracles (not letters), given by the Spirit (2:7 etc.) and as the words of Christ. Each forms a kind of introduction to the rest of the book for that particular church, highlighting and evaluating the particular situation (as Christ discerns it) in which the believers in that church are urged to 'overcome' or 'conquer.' The rest of the book will show them how, by conquering, they can get from their situation in the present (chs. 2–3) to the New Jerusalem (chs. 21–2). It is important to notice the variety of contexts to which the rest of the book is thereby addressed. The messages have a common pattern: (1) command to write and self-description by Christ; (2) section beginning 'I know', containing commendation, accusation, exhortation to repent, encouragement, all with reference to Christ's imminent coming; (3) exhortation to discern ('Let anyone who has an ear...'); (4) promise to the one who conquers, often referring to elements of the vision in 21:1–22:5. After the third message, (3) and (4) are reversed. The elements of the descriptions in (1) are mostly drawn from 1:13–18, and are chosen for their special appropriateness to the message to each church.

(2:1–7) The Message to Ephesus v. 1, Ephesus, largest of the cities and in a key position on major trade routes, was probably the most prominent of the seven churches, well known from Acts and the Pauline letters. The description of Christ indicates his lordship over the churches and his presence in them, grounding his intimate knowledge of their condition and his authority to issue a threat of judgement such as that in v. 5. v. 2, the false 'apostles' may have claimed to be apostles in the strict sense (people commissioned by the risen Christ) or the looser sense of itinerant preachers. v. 3, what are commended here are key characteristics needed for the testing time ahead. v. 5, many take 'I will come' and similar threats or promises in the other messages as referring to 'comings' of Jesus specifically to the church in question, prior to the parousia, but Revelation's general sense of the imminence of the parousia (22:7, 12, 20) makes it more plausible that Christ refers to the way he will deal with each church at his final coming. v. 6, it is not clear whether the Nicolaitans are (or include) the false apostles of v. 2. For their teaching see comment on 2:14–15. v. 7, the formula 'Let anyone who has an ear...' (also in 13:9), echoing the gospels (Mk 4:9 etc.) and perhaps recalling Isa 6:9–10, stresses the need to listen to prophetic messages with spiritual discernment, since it is possible to hear without heeding. What it means to 'conquer', a keyword in Revelation, will become clear only later in the book (cf. 12:11; 15:2; 21:7). The 'paradise [garden] of God' (cf. Ezek 28:13) is Eden, containing the tree of life, from which Adam and Eve would have gained eternal life had they stayed in Paradise (Gen 3:22–4). It is now an eschatological promise, to be fulfilled in 22:2.

(2:8–11) The Message to Smyrna v. 8, the description of Christ (from 1:17–18) is appropriate to the message (cf. vv. 10b, 11b). v. 9, the material poverty—contrasted with spiritual wealth (cf. Jas 2:5)—may be the result of refusal to participate in the business life of the city because of the idolatry entailed, including the worship of the emperor and the state gods of Rome, or of action taken against them (cf. Heb 10:34). The reference to 'those who say they are Jews but are not' probably turns back onto non-Christian Jews what they were saying about Christian Jews. The latter were exempt from participation in the imperial cult while they were considered members of the synagogue community. When the synagogue leaders declared to the authorities that they were not properly Jews, they became liable to persecution. This 'slandering' (blasphēmia) of Christians in effect allies them with Satan (the term means 'accuser', by implication 'false accuser'; cf. 12:10) and with the 'blasphemy' (blasphēmia) of the beast (13:5–6). The polemical term 'synagogue of Satan' is not demonization of Judaism, but a judgement that these synagogue leaders by their action have sided with the idolatry of Roman political religion against those who are resisting it. v. 10, 'ten days' alludes to Dan 1:12–15; like Daniel and his friends, these Christians will be 'tested' for their refusal to take part in idolatry, though unlike Daniel and his friends they may have to die for their faith before receiving the crown of victory over death. v. 11, the second death is final and eternal punishment (cf. 20:6, 14; 21:8).

(2:12–17) The Message to Pergamum v. 12, the sword (cf. 1:16; 2:16; 19:15, 21), derived from Isa 11:4; 49:2, is Christ's word of truth which condemns those who deny truth. The war (v. 16) in Revelation is a battle for the truth in which words are the effective weapons. v. 13, Pergamum was the seat of Roman government for the province and the centre of the imperial cult. The throne is Satan's, given to the beast (13:2; 16:10), but the beast is not introduced into Revelation's imagery until 11:7. Satan's throne is the antithesis, in the great contest of sovereignty, to the heavenly throne of God, one of the key images of Revelation (4:2 etc.). The reference to Antipas, a faithful witness like Christ (1:5; 3:14), shows there had been only isolated outbreaks of persecution so far. vv. 14–15, the prophet Balaam advised King Balak of Moab to lure Israel into apostasy by enticing them with Moabite women to share pagan sacrificial meals (Num 25:1–3; 31:16). Balaam's name means 'he destroys the people'; the name Nicolaus means 'he conquers the people'. No doubt this equivalence made the parallel between Balaam and the Nicolaitans (followers of Nicolaus) especially appropriate. Nothing reliable is known about the Nicolaitans besides what is said here. They taught that Christians could participate in the pagan cult meals (an important part of the commercial and social life of the cities). 'Fornication' (literal in the story of Balaam) may, applied to the church in Smyrna, refer metaphorically to idolatry, as in 2:21–2, though sexual immorality could also be a corollary of Christian involvement in pagan society (cf. 22:15). v. 17, manna, as food at God's eschatological banquet, contrasts with the food of pagan cult meals (v. 14). The manna of Ex 16:4–36 was heavenly food (Neh 9:15; Ps 105:40). The idea that it will be restored in the eschatological age (a Jewish expectation: 2 Apoc. Bar. 29:8) is part of the image of the new exodus, to which the reference to Balaam and Balak also belongs. The 'white stone' may be the ticket of admission to the eschatological banquet, with the invitee's 'new' (in the sense of 'eschatologically new'; cf. 3:12; 21:5) name on it.

(2:18–29) The Message to Thyatira v. 18, Thyatira was known for its trade guilds, membership of which would involve idolatry. This explains the appeal of 'Jezebel's' teaching (v. 20). The description of Christ (from 1:14–15; and cf. 19:12) relates to his role as judge in v. 23, while 'Son of God' (cf. Ps 2:7) prepares for vv. 26–8 (Ps 2:8–9). v. 20, the false prophet is nicknamed Jezebel with reference to the OT queen accused of 'whoredoms' in 2 Kings 9:22 because she seduced Israel into worshipping Baal. Her teaching is the same as the Nicolaitans' (2:14–15); perhaps she was their leader. v. 24, the significance of 'the deep things of Satan' may be that Jezebel taught that Christians could participate in idolatrous practices, experiencing evil with impunity. vv. 26–7, Ps 2 is a fundamental text for Revelation (cf. 11:15, 18; 12:5; 14:1; 19:15), since it recounts the victory of God and his Messiah over the rebellious nations. Here the conquerors are promised that they will take part in the victory. The star, alluding to Num 24:17 (cf. comment on Rev 22:16), symbolizes the messianic rule in which the conquerors will share.

(3:1–6) The Message to Sardis v. 1, the reference to the seven spirits (not in 1:16, 20; 2:1, which refer to the seven stars) may suggest the divine source of the life that is available to the church if it admits its spiritual deadness and repents. Christ's relation to the Spirit of God is portrayed in a parallel image in 5:6. v. 2, the thief is an allusion to Jesus' parable (Mt 24:42–4; Lk 12:39–40), also echoed in 1 Thess 5:2; 2 Pet 3:10, and refers to the parousia, as in 16:15. vv. 4–5, the soiling of clothes may well indicate, not evil deeds in general, but the contamination of involvement in idolatrous practices. The white clothes may represent both uncompromising innocence and heavenly victory (cf. 3:18; 7:9, 13–14). For the book of life, see 13:8; 17:8; 20:12, 15; 21:27. This reference shows that the predestination implied is not absolute. Christ can delete names because it is his register (13:8; 21:27) of those with whom he shares his eternal life. The last clause alludes to the saying in Mt 24:32; Lk 12:8. The four occurrences of 'name' in this message (in v. 4, 'people' is lit. 'names') suggests the contrast between reputation (v. 1) and reality.

(3:7–13) The Message to Philadelphia v. 7, the use of proper names central to the Jewish messianic hope, here (David) and in v. 12 (Jerusalem), is appropriate to the Jewish theme in v. 9. Though the self-description partly resembles 1:18, the keys are different. Here (in allusion to Isa 22:22) the door gives entrance to the messianic kingdom, which Christ holds open for the Philadelphian Christians (v. 8). No doubt controversy with non-Christian Jews about messianic expectations is reflected in vv. 7–9, 12. v. 10, Isa 45:14, where the nations acknowledge Israel as the people of the only true God, is reversed. Non-Christian Jews are in the position of Gentiles in relation to (Jewish?) Christians who are the true Israel. The Christians' faithfulness to the true Messiah will be vindicated, and the Jews will be converted. v. 12, for Christians as parts of the building of the eschatological temple, cf. Gal 2:9; Eph 2:19–22; 1 Pet 2:5. Here the temple belongs to the new Jerusalem of ch. 21, where there is no temple (21:22)! This flexibility of imagery reminds us that none of Revelation's images are to be read literally. Writing the three names on Christians indicates ownership and belonging. All the images of this verse assure the Philadelphian Christians of their secure place in the fulfilment of Jewish messianic hopes which the synagogue was denying them.

(3:14–22) The Message to Laodicea v. 14, Laodicea was a wealthy city, known for its banks, its textile industry, its medical school with its ophthalmology, and the local eye-salve. Clearly vv. 17–18 play on these local features, suggesting that the church, participating too readily in pagan society, shares the complacency of this prosperous city. It is the only church of which nothing good is said. The title 'Amen' reflects Isa 65:16 (NRSV: 'the God of faithfulness') and is the Semitic equivalent of 'faithful and true'. 'Origin of creation' describes Christ not as pre-existent but in his resurrection, the beginning of the new creation. The whole description is an expanded form of 1:5a. vv. 15–16, unlike the neighbouring cities of Hierapolis, which had hot springs, and Colossae, which had healthy cold water, Laodicea's water, piped into the city, was tepid and nauseous to drink. v. 17, these Christians are materially wealthy because of their willingness to compromise with idolatry in order to share in the city's prosperity. v. 18, the various images all suggest that this apparently self-sufficient church actually needs to turn to Christ to meet its dire spiritual need. v. 20 supplies the reference to the parousia which all the other messages have. The picture is that of Lk 12:35–9; Mk 13:34–5: the returning master of the house expects his servants to be ready to open the door to him. The parousia is so imminent that Christ can be portrayed already knocking on the door (cf. Jas 5:9). v. 21, this promise is placed so as to anticipate the enthronement of Christ in heaven in ch. 5.

Inaugural Vision of Heaven (4:1–5:14)

(4:1–11) God on the Throne Visions of the throne of God are found both in the OT prophetic tradition (cf. 1 Kings 22:19–23) and in several Jewish apocalypses. This chapter especially echoes Isa 6 and Ezek 1. The throne symbolizes God's sovereignty over all things and recurs as a key image throughout Revelation. In this chapter God's sovereignty is seen as it is already fully acknowledged in heaven, and therefore as the true reality which must in the end prevail on earth. John is taken up into heaven so that he can see that God's throne is the ultimate reality behind all earthly appearances. In the following chapters he will see how it comes to be acknowledged on earth. v. 1, the voice is that of the exalted Christ (1:10–12), though what John first sees (ch. 4) is heaven as it has been since before Christ's exaltation. v. 2, 'in the spirit' (see 1:10) marks the second beginning of John's visions. The 'one seated on the throne' is a frequent designation of God from this point on. v. 3, reference to precious stones was a traditional way of evoking the splendour of a heavenly being, and the rainbow has a similar function (Ezek 1:28), with probably also an allusion to Gen 9:12–17. More is said about God in the account of what happens around him than in the direct description. v. 4, God's throne-room is both a temple where God is worshipped, the archetype of the earthly temple, and the centre from which he rules the cosmos. The twenty-four elders are a political image: the angels who compose the divine council (cf. Isa 24:23; Dan 7:9). They rule the heavenly realm, but by their continuous obeisance (vv. 10–11) acknowledge that their authority is entirely derived from God and properly exercised only in being continuously given back to him. In this they contrast with earthly rulers who usurp divine sovereignty, a major theme later in Revelation. v. 5a, the storm phenomena accompany a divine appearance (cf. Ex 19:16–19): the formula used here recurs later in association with judgements, indicating that these emanate from God's holy presence. The formula is progressively expanded, suggesting increasing severity of judgement (8:5; 11:19; 16:18–21). v. 6a, the sea is probably 'the waters above the firmament', i.e. the sky seen from above. vv. 6b–8, the living creatures (combining features of the cherubim of Ezek 1 and the seraphim of Isa 6:2–3) are the priests of the heavenly temple, the central worshippers in creation, representatives of the whole animate creation. Their song is adapted from Isa 6:3, incorporating two of the key designations of God in Revelation (see 1:4, 8). v. 11, God's sovereignty is depicted first as that of the Creator of all things, then in ch. 5 as the Redeemer, in process of restoring his universal sovereignty on earth. Because he is Creator, God can be expected to renew his whole creation in the end (21:5).

(5:1–14) The Lamb on the Throne v. 1, the scroll contains God's secret plan for the coming of his kingdom on earth, which cannot be revealed until someone authorized to break the seals does so. Only Christ proves worthy to open the scroll, because his witness and death have made the coming of God's kingdom possible. v. 5, two traditional titles for the Davidic Messiah, from Isa 11:10 and Gen 49:9, both suggest the militant Messiah who would conquer his enemies. Note that 'conquer' is here used absolutely, as in the promises to the conquerors in the seven messages. v. 6, John has heard of a lion, but sees a lamb looking as if it had been slaughtered. The titles of v. 5 are thus reinterpreted: Jesus is the victor over evil, but the way he achieves victory is through sacrificial death. The Lamb—from this point on Revelation's major Christological image—is the passover lamb, belonging to the new exodus imagery (cf. 1:5b with 5:9–10), with probable allusion also to Isa 53:7. His relationship to the divine throne is not clear, but 7:17 (cf. 3:21) shows that he must be on the throne, sharing the divine sovereignty, which his death has made him worthy to exercise. Both his seven horns and his seven eyes symbolize the seven Spirits of God (i.e. the Holy Spirit). The horns are a standard image of power (cf. the horns of the dragon and the beasts: 12:3; 13:1, 11; 17:12–13), while the seven eyes of God (Zech 4:10) symbolize not only God's ability to see what happens everywhere, but also his power to act wherever he chooses (2 Chr 16:7–9; Zech 4:6). Thus they are here the power of God's Spirit, now the Spirit of Christ sent out into all the world to make the Lamb's victory effective everywhere. v. 9, a 'new song' celebrates a fresh divine act of redemption (cf. 14:3; Ps 98:1; Isa 42:10). For the exodus imagery, cf. 1:5–6. The fourfold formula for all the nations ('every tribe and language and people and nation') occurs seven times (four is the number of the earth, seven of completeness) in varying forms (7:9; 10:11; 11:9; 13:7; 14:6; 17:15) and reflects Gen 10:20, 31; Dan 7:13. It is of key importance in Revelation's hope for the conversion of all the nations. The church is drawn from all the nations (5:9; 7:9) in order to bear suffering witness to all the nations (11:9; 14:6) who are subject to the rule of the beast (13:7) and Babylon (17:15). v. 10, some MSS have 'they reign' for 'they will reign'; the latter accords with 20:4–6; 22:5. vv. 11–13, the circle of worshippers expands from v. 8 to v. 11 and encompasses the whole creation in v. 13, anticipating the final implementation of the Lamb's victory in God's universal reign (cf. Phil 2:8–11, a close thematic parallel to the whole chapter). The worship of the Lamb in v. 12 is parallel to that of God in 4:11, while in v. 13 worship is offered to both together, ensuring that the Lamb is not seen as an alternative object of worship (another god) but recipient with God of the honour due to God. This heavenly worship before the throne is an unequivocal indication of the inclusion of Christ in the identity of the one God who, for Jewish and Christian faith, is alone entitled to worship. It is one of several kinds of expression of very high Christology in Revelation (see comments on 1:5b–6, 8).

The Seven Seals (6:1–8:5)

(6:1–8) The First Four Seals v. 1, the events which accompany the opening of the seals are not the content of the scroll, which cannot be read until all the seals are opened. They prepare for it. The first four seals recall 'the beginning of the birth pangs' in Mk 13:7–8. v. 2, that the rider represents Christ (cf. 19:11) or the preaching of the gospel is unlikely because the four riders of the first four seals form a group. The repetition of the key word 'conquer' and its absolute use here are suggestive: it resembles the Lamb's victory (5:5–6) and prepares us for the beast's victory (11:7; 13:7). The figure may represent the evil of imperial conquest, with the 'bow' a reminder of the Parthian empire, Rome's eastern rival. vv. 5–6, this rider represents famine, which the information given by the voice characterizes as severe but not extreme. The judgements are limited compared with what will come later. v. 7, the fatal effects of pestilence are limited to a quarter of the earth: the escalation of judgements is indicated by proportions: cf. 9:7–12 (a third). All the evils listed at the end of this verse (cf. Ezek 14:21), summarizing the second, third, and fourth seals, could be understood as the effects of war, initiated by the rider of the first seal.

(6:9–11) The Fifth Seal v. 9, the earthly temple had two altars: one for burnt-offerings in the outer court, where blood sacrifices were offered, and one for incense, in the holy place. Revelation knows of an altar of incense in the heavenly temple (8:3, 5; 9:13; 14:18), but does not explicitly refer to an altar of burnt-offering (but cf. 16:17). But if the altar of incense is in view here, the location of the souls of the martyrs under it is incomprehensible. The blood of sacrifices on the altar of burnt-offering was poured out under the altar (e.g. Lev 4:7), and so it seems probable that those who have died for bearing the witness of Jesus are here seen as having been sacrificed. v. 10, their cry is that of the murdered for justice. The prayer, 'how long?'—prompted by the disappointingly moderate nature of the judgements of the first four seals—expresses a sense of eschatological delay in God's giving justice to his people (cf. Dan 12:13; Zech 1:12; Ps 79:5). v. 11, the traditional Jewish idea of a predetermined number of the elect (4 Ezra 4:35–7; 2 Apoc. Bar. 23:4–5; 1 Enoch, 47:4) is here integrated into the theme of Christian witness as far as death, which will be explored further in subsequent passages, beginning with ch. 7. Later we shall learn why more martyrs must die; for the time being those already martyred are assured of their victory, despite appearances, by the white robes (cf. 7:9).

(6:12–17) The Sixth Seal This passage uses language calculated to evoke the impression that now the final coming of God to judge the world is occurring (for v. 12, cf. Ezek 38:19–23; Hag 2:6; Isa 13:10; Joel 2:10, 31; Zeph 1:15; Mk 13:24; for v. 13, cf. Isa 34:4; Mk 13:25; Jer 4:24; for vv. 15–16, cf. Isa 2:10, 19, 21; Hos 10:8; Lk 23:30; for v. 17, cf. Joel 2:11; Nah 1:6; Mal 3:2). The events of vv. 12–13 are not themselves judgements so much as heralds of God's coming as Judge. The 'wrath of the Lamb' (v. 16) suggests the consequence of not responding to God's sacrificial love. In v. 17 the variant reading 'his wrath' should be preferred to 'their wrath' since Revelation always avoids referring to God and Christ as a plurality, with plural verbs or pronouns (cf. 11:15; 22:3–4).

(7:1–17) Interlude: The Sealing of the Elect This passage is an intercalation in the numbered series of seven; an even longer intercalation will intervene between the sixth and seventh trumpet blasts (10:1–11:13). These passages express the experience of eschatological delay—and constantly disappointed hope—before the end, and their contents explore the meaning of the delay. Here the expectations raised by the martyrs' cry of 'how long?' (6:10) and by the impression of reaching the very brink of the end (6:17) is deliberately dashed by an image of judgement held back (7:1). vv. 2–3, the sealing indicates ownership (as of slaves) and protection (cf. Ezek 9:4–6); they are protected in order to serve God as the messianic army. vv. 4–8, in the OT a census is always a reckoning of Israel's military strength. The 144,000 are the messianic army of the twelve tribes of Israel expected to fight the war against God's enemies in the last days. Judah, the tribe of the Messiah (5:5), is numbered first. v. 9, the juxtaposition of vv. 4–8 and v. 9 resembles that of 5:5, 6, with the same distinction between what John hears and what he sees. Just as the militant Messiah is shown to win his victory by sacrificial death, so his army is now seen to win their victory by following him in martyrdom. They are also redefined as not just Israelites, but from all nations, and not numbered but innumerable (thus fulfilling the promise to Abraham: Gen 13:6; 15:5; 17:4–6). The white robes and palm branches indicate the victory celebration of the martyrs in heaven, though the credit and the glory are God's and Christ's (vv. 10, 12). v. 14, for the great ordeal, cf. 3:10. The washing of robes in the Lamb's blood (cf. 22:14) is not indicative of their forgiveness or redemption (for which 1:5 uses a different metaphor), since it is something they, not the Lamb, have done. It alludes to Dan 11:35; 12:10, and refers to their death due to faithful following of Jesus on his way to the cross. The value of their death is derivative from his. Revelation is written as though all faithful Christians are to suffer death. This can be understood, not as a literal expectation, but as an imaginative way of suggesting that in the situation envisaged Christians who avoid idolatry must be prepared to die. By now it should be becoming clear that the 'conquering' to which the seven messages called the churches is victory through faithful witness to the point of death. vv. 15–17, the images anticipate the New Jerusalem (cf. 21:3–4, 6; 22:3), and allude to Isa 49:10; 25:8. That God 'will shelter them' (v. 15) evokes the tabernacled presence of God with his people in the wilderness. Note that in v. 17 the divine roles of shepherding (Isa 40:11) and leading to the water (Isa 49:10) are ascribed to the Lamb. These are all new exodus images.

(8:1–5) The Seventh Seal Revelation uses a literary interlocking device especially here and in 15:1–4. The account of the seventh seal is in vv. 1, 3–5, while v. 2 is the beginning of the sequence of seven trumpet-blasts which follows. The impression is that the seven trumpet-blasts are included in the seventh-seal opening. vv. 1, 3, the silence is part of the liturgy of the heavenly temple. According to Jewish tradition, at the time of the incense-offering (v. 2) the heavenly worshippers fall silent so that the prayers of people on earth can be heard in heaven. The heavenly incense assists the prayers of the saints to reach God, as the incense from the earthly temple was thought to do. v. 5, the prayers are for the coming of the end, and so the response is judgement on earth (fire, seen again in 8:7). The storm phenomena indicate the eschatological theophany of God the Judge (cf. 4:5) and the correspondence with 11:19 shows that 8:5 already includes proleptically all the judgements of the seven trumpet-blasts (concluding in 11:19).

The Seven Trumpets (8:6–11:19)

(8:6–12) The First Four Trumpets Trumpets were used in holy war against Israel's and God's enemies, herald divine judgement (e.g. Joel 2:1), and feature especially in the story of the fall of Jericho (Josh 6), which makes them appropriate in Revelation, although we do not yet know that these judgements will lead to the fall of another great city (16:19). Like the first four seals, the first four trumpet-blasts form a quartet. They affect the four regions of God's creation: earth, sea, fresh water, heavens (cf. 14:7), and each affects a third part only of its region (note the emphatic repetition of 'third' throughout). This represents an intensification of judgement after the seals (cf. 5:8), but these are still limited judgements, aimed at repentance (cf. 9:20–1). To those who worship parts of the creation as idols, they demonstrate that the true God is the Creator who has power over his creation (cf. 14:7). They are also modelled on the plagues of Egypt, making them the judgements that prepare for the new exodus.

(8:13–9:11) The Fifth Trumpet v. 13, the message of the eagle designates the last three trumpet-blasts as a group of three woes. This and the other markers indicating the sequence of the woes (9:12; 11:14) keep the reader strongly aware of the (slow) progress through these terrifying plagues towards the end. v. 1, whereas the first four trumpet-blasts attacked, not humans directly, but their sources of life, the fifth and sixth attack humans directly. v. 2, the image of the fallen star suggests an evil angel, allowed, like other evil agents in the various judgements in Revelation, to wreak evil as a form of divine judgement. The abyss ('bottomless pit') in Revelation is not the place of the dead (Hades) or the place of the final punishment of the wicked (the lake of fire), but the abode and source of supernatural evil (11:7; 17:8; 20:1-3). v. 3, the locusts are a demonized version of the army of locusts in Joel (2:1-11). v. 5, the period and the prohibition of killing show that this is again a limited judgement, whose purpose is to bring about repentance. v. 11, Abaddon is an OT term for the underworld, sometimes personified (Job 28:22). It means 'destruction', but John translates in a personal form: Apollyon ('destroyer'), with perhaps an allusion to the Greek god Apollo, and the emperor Nero's claim to be a manifestation of Apollo. Cf. also 'the destroyer' responsible for the last plague of Egypt (Ex 12:23).

(9:12-21) The Sixth Trumpet v. 13, the reference to the altar of incense in heaven links this judgement again to the prayers of the saints (8:3-5). v. 14, this picture of judgement plays on the Roman empire's fear of invasion from the east (cf. 16:12). The angels are evil angels released from previous restraint. v. 17, an army of demonic cavalry is described. v. 20, even this deadly judgement has been aimed at the repentance of the rest of humanity, but unsuccessfully. v. 21, cf. 21:8; 22:15; this emphatic statement of the failure of even the most severe judgements to bring humanity to repentance prepares for the revelation, in ch. 11, of a different divine strategy to that end.

(10:1-11) Interlude: (a) The Scroll Given to John As between the sixth and seventh seals, so between the sixth and seventh trumpet-blasts, an interlude addresses the reason for the delay of the final judgement. v. 1, this most awe-inspiring of the angels in Revelation ('another' in relation to the angel of 5:2) is the most important because he is the one who transmits to John the revelation he has received from Christ (1:1; 22:16). v. 2, though most commentators think otherwise, there are good reasons for thinking that this is the scroll of 5:1-9. The content of that scroll, available only when its seven seals have been opened (8:1), has not yet been revealed. The scroll in ch. 10 is already open (v. 2): its contents can be known only when it has been ingested by John (10:8-11). The process of transmission—from God to Christ (5:7) and from the angel to John (10:8-10)—corresponds to that described in 1:1. Moreover, John's use of an OT model for his account of the scroll (Ezek 2:8-3:3) begins in 5:1 (cf. Ezek 2:9-10) and continues in 10:8-10 (cf. Ezek 3:1-3). The reason most commentators have not regarded the scroll of ch. 10 as the same as that in ch. 5 is that the former is called a 'little scroll' (biblaridion) in 10:2, 9-10, while the latter is a 'scroll' (biblion). But it is clear that John makes no absolute distinction between the two terms, since the scroll of ch. 10 is also called a biblion in v. 8. The words could be used interchangeably. The reason biblaridion is predominately used in ch. 10 is probably that the scroll has now to be portrayed as small enough for John to eat (vv. 9-10). v. 3, for the lion's roar, cf. Am 3:8. The seven thunders (echoing Ps 29, where the thunder of God's voice is mentioned seven times) must be another series of warning judgements, more severe than the seals and the trumpet-blasts. With the seven bowls (15:5-16:21), there would then have been four series of seven judgements each, indicating complete judgement (seven for completeness) on the earth (symbolized by four). v. 4, they are revoked (cf. Mk 13:20: God will 'cut short' the days of eschatological tribulation), and are not to be the content of John's prophecy. Instead of more warning judgements, there is to be something else: the content of the scroll. vv. 5-7, the angel's solemn declaration, alluding to Am 3:8 and Dan 12:6-7, implicitly responds to the question 'How long?' which has been in readers' minds since 6:10. The final period of history, revealed to Daniel as 'a time, times and half a time' (i.e. three and a half years: Dan 12:7; cf. Rev 11:2, 3) is now to begin at once, and for the first time the true nature of the events of this period, the way they will contribute to the final coming of God's kingdom, will be revealed by the scroll. v. 10, like Ezekiel's scroll (3:3), John's is sweet to taste, but, unlike Ezekiel's, bitter when swallowed—probably because it concerns the suffering of God's people. v. 11, previously John had prophesied to and about the churches (1:11-3:22); now he is to prophesy about the nations, and perhaps to the nations in the sense that his prophecy now describes the church's prophetic witness to the nations (11:3-13). The fourfold description of the nations (see comment on 5:9) indicates that the fulfilment of Dan 7:9 is the subject.

(11:1-13) Interlude: (b) The Content of the Scroll This section contains the content of the scroll in nuce. Later chapters will greatly expand on it, but the essential message of the scroll is given here, in two parts (vv. 1-2 and 3-13) linked by their respective versions of Daniel's reckoning of the final period of history as three and a half years (vv. 2, 3). vv. 1-2, this difficult passage derives from interpretation of Dan 12:6-7; 8:11-14; Zech 12:3. The temple proper (the holy of holies and the holy place, containing the altar of incense), with the priests who alone worship in it, is to be measured, but the outer court, where the people worship, and the city in which they live are left to be trampled by the nations. The meaning of this imagery, taken from Daniel, becomes clear as Revelation proceeds. The temple and city represent the church. The inner, hidden reality of the church as a kingdom of priests (1:6; 5:10) who worship God in his presence is distinguished from the outward experience of the church exposed to persecution by the kingdom of the nations. In the coming great persecution, the church will be kept safe in its inner reality (cf. already 7:1-8, where the counting parallels the measuring here), while outwardly destroyed (cf. 12:13-17). vv. 3-13 give a second symbolic narrative of the events of the final period of history, parallel to vv. 1-2 but going further into the distinctive revelation given by the scroll. v. 3-4, like the seven lampstands of chs. 2-3, the two lampstands (also called olive trees, following Zech 4:1-14) here represent the church. They are two because adequate witness requires two witnesses (Deut 19:15); and so their number shows not that they are only part of the whole church, but that they represent the whole church in its role of prophetic witness to the world. This is the role that the seven churches of chs. 2-3 will fulfil—the task to which they are called in the coming of God's kingdom—if they heed Christ's advice and 'conquer'. vv. 5-6, the two prophets are modelled on Moses and Elijah (both on both, not one on each; cf. 2 Kings 1:10-12; 1 Kings 17:1; Ex 7:14-24), the two great OT prophets who confronted pagan idolatry, Moses at the Exodus, Elijah in the time of Jezebel (cf. 2:20). The judgements they command (v. 6) recall those of chs. 6, 8–9, and are no more effective in producing repentance. v. 7, the beast appears for the first time, anticipating his full introduction in ch. 13, along with his characteristic activity of conquering the saints (13:7). v. 8, the witnesses follow Jesus in his faithful witness as far as death. The city recalls Jerusalem (cf. Isa 1:10), Egypt, and Babylon (cf. 17:18): it is every city in which the church bears suffering witness. v. 9, the three days of the story of Jesus are modified to make the apocalyptic number three and a half (cf. 12:14). The fourfold formula makes clear the universality of the prophets' witness to all nations. v. 10, a reversal of Esth 9:19, 22: there the people of God rejoice over the slaughter of their enemies, here the opposite leads paradoxically to their victory and conversion of their enemies. vv. 11–12, as they followed Jesus in his death, so they share in his triumph over death. This is their public vindication. The truth of their witness, thought to have been refuted by their death, is now seen to have been evidenced by their faithfulness to death and vindicated by God in their triumph over death. v. 13, the reaction of 'the rest' corresponds with 14:6–7 and contrasts with 9:20–1 (cf. 16:9–11): it is therefore genuine repentance and acknowledgement of the one true God. The arithmetic is symbolic: in judgements announced by OT prophets 'the remnant' ('the rest') spared are only a tenth part (Isa 6:13; Am 5:3) or seven thousand (1 Kings 19:18). Here the reverse occurs: seven thousand killed and nine-tenths spared. The novelty of the witness of the two, by comparison with their OT predecessors, is thus dramatized: not so much judgement as conversion is the effect. Where the preaching of repentance, with judgements alone as evidence, had failed (v. 6), when fulfilled in witness to the point of death, participating in Jesus' witness and victory through and over death, the prophetic ministry of the church will effect the conversion of the nations to God. This is the heart of the revelation contained in the scroll, the heart of Revelation's message: that the church redeemed from all nations is called to suffering witness which, by virtue of its participation in Jesus' sacrificial witness, can bring the nations to repentance of idolatry and conversion to the true God. In this way—as Jesus' witness is extended universally in the life and death, as well as the preaching, of the church—God's kingdom can come to the nations as salvation, rather than judgement. This message will be portrayed at greater length in chs. 12–15.

(11:14–19) The Seventh Trumpet In this section the end itself, the coming of God's kingdom, is finally reached, though the description of it is provisional and will be expanded later. v. 15, the words of the voices allude to Ps 2. 17. For 'who are and who were', cf. 1:4, 8; 4:8; since it is God's eschatological coming which is here being celebrated, 'who is to come' is omitted (also in 16:5). v. 18, the opening words again echo Ps 2:1–3. The events here celebrated run forward as far as ch. 20. The 'destroyers of the earth' are later revealed as the dragon, the beast, and the harlot of Babylon (cf. 19:2), who are ruining God's creation with their violence, oppression, and idolatrous religion. Their destruction is an example of the eschatological lex talionis, which matches punishment to crime by describing both in the same words. The Greek diaphtheirō means both 'destroy' (cause to perish) and 'ruin' (corrupt with evil); its use here parallels the same double meaning in Hebrew in Gen 6:11–13, 17. As at the Flood, God's faithfulness to his creation requires that he destroy its destroyers in order to preserve it. v. 19, from the heavenly presence of God come the phenomena of theophany and judgement, in the formula first used in 4:5, expanded in 8:5 (seventh seal), again here (seventh trumpet), and yet again in 16:17–21 (seventh bowl).

The Story of God's People in Conflict with Evil (12:1–15:4)

(12:1–6) The Woman, the Dragon and the Child Unlike other beginnings of sections there is no literary link back into what precedes. A new start is made, with a partly new cast of characters, but from this different starting-point a fuller version of the message of 11:3–13 will be told and will converge again on the end already reached at the end of ch. 11. v. 1, a fresh OT background is evoked here: the age-long conflict between 'the ancient serpent' (v. 9) or dragon and the woman and her offspring, and the promise of eventual victory for the offspring, not without suffering violence from the serpent (Gen 3:15). The serpent of Eden is identified as also the sea-monster or dragon Leviathan, destined for eschatological defeat by the sword of God (Isa 27:1). In extra-biblical tradition (cf. Ps 74:14) he had seven heads (cf. v. 3). By fusing the two figures of the Genesis serpent and the eschatological Leviathan, Revelation has created a new image of ultimate evil. For many of the first readers, pagan mythological themes and stories would also be evoked by 12:1–6, especially the story of Apollo and the Python, a dragon who threatened Apollo's mother at the time of his birth and was later slain by him. From both OT and pagan precedents, the passage would raise the readers' expectation that the divine child will eventually destroy the dragon. Jesus' mother Mary is scarcely in view in the symbolic, not historical, account of his birth and immediate rapture to heaven (v. 5); rather, as her crown of twelve stars shows, the woman in the sky is the people of God (both Israel and the church). v. 3, not Mary's pregnancy so much as the sufferings of Israel from which the Messiah came (and which he bore) (cf. Mic 5:3). v. 4, the dragon's heads and horns are the model for the beast's (13:1) and challenge the Lamb's seven horns (5:6). The seven crowns represent the fullness of rule, suggesting the dragon is the power behind all idolatrous human rule. Cf. Dan 8:10. The stars, as in 1:20, may be angelic representatives of the people of God, so that the dragon's action against them represents inflicting suffering on Israel on earth. v. 5, cf. Ps 2:8–9. v. 6, this anticipates v. 14. The same time period is given in days (11:3 and here), months (11:2; 13:5), and 'times' (i.e. years: 12:14). Derived from Daniel (7:25; 12:7, 11, 12), it is the period of the final great conflict of God's people and God's enemies, the church and the beast. The ambiguity of this period (who are the real victors?) is reflected in the usage of temporal terms: as 42 months it is the beast's period, for trampling and rule (11:2; 13:5); as 1,260 days it is the church's period, for prophesying and protection (11:3; 12:6).

(12:7–12) Michael and the Dragon v. 7, the archangel Michael is the heavenly representative of the people of God (Dan 10:13, 21; 12:1), and so his defeat of the dragon in heaven corresponds to the victory of the martyrs on earth (v. 11). Here the heavenly victory is depicted in military terms, the earthly in forensic terms (vv. 10–11: ‘accuser’, ‘testimony’). Revelation frequently alternates or mixes the two fields of imagery. v. 9, from here onwards the deceit practised by the powers of evil is prominent (cf. 13:14; 16:13; 18:23; 19:20; 20:3, 8; 21:27; 22:15; cf. 3:9). It is by exposing this deceit that the witness of the martyrs constitutes victory over evil. v. 10, cf. 11:15. The devil’s original role was as prosecuting counsel in the heavenly court (Zech 3:1; Job 2), but often, as here, acting maliciously and deceptively. v. 11, for the first time, the ‘conquering’ by the martyrs has an object; cf. 15:2. The relationship of martyrdom to the cross is clear here (cf. 7:14): by maintaining their witness even to the point of death the Christian martyrs follow Jesus to death and so win a victory dependent on his. v. 12, the devil’s rage is not a sign of his power, but of the fact that he is already defeated. Heaven, earth, and sea are prominent in chs. 12–13: thrown out of heaven, the dragon empowers one beast from the sea and another from the earth.

(12:13–17) The Dragon and the Woman The narrative depicts, like 11:1–2, the spiritual protection of the church (the woman in the wilderness) during the period of conflict with the beast, even while outwardly the church suffers persecution (the dragon makes war on the woman’s children). v. 14, the eagle’s wings (Ex 19:4; Deut 32:11; Isa 40:31) and the wilderness are exodus motifs. v. 17, the ‘testimony of Jesus’ (also 1:9; 19:10) seems to be, not witness to Jesus, but the witness Jesus bore.

(12:18–13:10) The Monster from the Sea v. 18, this statement connects the dragon with the appearance of the beast, to whom he now delegates what power he has. 13:1–2, the sea is here the sphere of primeval chaos, the source of evil, an alternative image to the abyss (cf. 11:7). It is the appropriate source for the beast whose dominant characteristic is violence. The scene is modelled on Daniel’s vision of four beasts representing the four great world empires (Dan 7:1–8). The fourth, the most terrifying, is the last empire, whose rule is replaced by the kingdom of the Son of Man and his people. Revelation’s beast also fills this role but is described in terms drawn from all four of Daniel’s beasts. It is the empire which sums up and surpasses all the violent and oppressive empires of history. As will become clear it is the Roman empire of John’s time, but portrayed with the eschatological hyperbole that creates a symbol of idolatrous political power available for reapplication whenever and wherever it suits. The seven heads are the sum of all the heads of Daniel’s beasts, but they also indicate totality. They represent, as later explained (17:9), the complete series of Roman emperors in whom the beast’s power is invested. The ten horns derive from Daniel’s fourth beast, but Revelation gives them crowns to identify them as kings (cf. 17:16). The blasphemous names are the divine titles, such as ‘Son of God’ and ‘Lord and God’, assumed by the Roman emperors. 13:3, the account of the beast, as well as continuing to draw on Dan 7, has two other major features: it provides a theological interpretation of the recent history of the empire, and it depicts the beast as an idolatrous parody of Jesus Christ. When one of the beast’s heads is said to be ‘as if slaughtered’, precisely the same phrase is used as in 5:6, where it indicates the sacrificial death of the Lamb. The beast’s mortal wound and its healing are a satanic parody of the death and resurrection of Christ. They also refer to Nero, the Roman emperor in whom the anti-Christian character of the empire had been most apparent so far, since he was the first emperor to persecute the church (only within the city of Rome, but including the martyrdoms of Peter and Paul). The reference to a mortal wound to one of the beast’s heads, inflicted with a sword (v. 14), probably alludes to Nero’s suicide with a dagger, while also suggesting a judgement inflicted by the sword of God. But whereas it is a head (an emperor) which receives the wound, it is the beast itself that recovers (‘its [i.e. the beast’s] mortal wound was healed’). The historical reference is to the death-blow which the imperial power received from Nero’s death, since it precipitated the period of civil war and chaos (‘the year of the four emperors’) in which the very survival of the empire was at risk. The healing of the beast’s wound alludes to the establishment by Vespasian of the Flavian dynasty which restored the imperial power all the more securely in the later part of the first century, to the ‘amazement of the whole earth’. 13:4, it is the apparent invincibility of the empire, all the more impressive after its recovery, to which the people of the empire spontaneously respond with worship offered to the emperors (the beast) and to the gods of Rome who grant them success (here equated with the dragon). In the Greek east of the empire, the imperial cult was not imposed from above, but organized by the local authorities, as an appropriate response to Rome’s godlike power and the benefits of its rule. Revelation’s prophetic purpose here is to expose the idolatry involved in this deification of brutal political and military power. The question asserting the incomparability of the beast is a satanic parody of OT expressions of the uniqueness of God (e.g. Ex 15:11; Isa 40:25).

13:5–6, the language reflects Dan 7:6, 8, 25. The beast’s power, though given by the dragon (v. 2), can only be exercised by God’s permission (v. 5); cf. 6:2, 4, 8; 9:5; 13:7, 15. 13:7a, the language was anticipated in 11:7. The paradox of martyrdom appears in the contrast between this statement and 15:2. From the earthly perspective it appears that the beast has won; from the heavenly perspective it is seen that the martyrs have won. The contrast is between victory by brute force and victory by witness to the truth, even at the cost of life. 13:7b–8, with reference to the Roman empire such universal language is hyperbolic (cf. Dan 4:1), but the imperial propaganda itself used such language, ignoring the Parthian empire to the east. Such hyperbole also allows the images to transcend their immediate reference to the world contemporary with Revelation. The phrase ‘from the foundation of the world’, which older translations relate to ‘slaughtered’, should almost certainly, as 17:8 shows, be related to ‘written’. 13:9, as in 2:7 (etc.) an appeal for discerning attention by the readers is made. 13:10a, there are variant readings; probably best is: ‘If anyone is to be taken into captivity, into captivity he or she must go; if anyone is to be killed by the sword, by the sword he or she must be killed’ (cf. Jer 15:2; 43:11). In other words, Christians who remain faithful in the circumstances just described must expect to suffer. 13:10b, cf. 14:12: endurance and faithfulness are what are required for ‘conquering’ the beast. The temptation to worship the beast and to see its power as irresistible (v. 4) was one to which many of Revelation’s first readers were in danger of succumbing (cf. chs. 2–3).

(13:11–18) The Monster from the Land v. 11, this second beast, also called the false prophet (16:13; 19:20; 20:10), represents the priesthood of the imperial cult, which included prominent members of the élite of the cities. The imagery suggests that outwardly its power appears innocent, but its seductive speech reveals its inner reality as demonic. If the first beast is a parody of Christ, the second is a parody of the Spirit-inspired prophetic witness of the church (11:3–6). v. 13, the signs parody those of 11:5–6, and (like v. 15a) refer to the apparent miracles engineered in the temples. v. 14, the image no doubt refers to statues of the emperor and the Roman gods. Most of these were erected on the initiative of the local authorities, not by Roman governors. vv. 15–17, the universal enforcement of worship of the beast goes beyond the historical reality at the time of Revelation (when there could certainly be considerable social pressure to participate in the imperial cult), but indicates where the logic of imperial idolatry would lead as the conflict between God and his demonic opponents comes to a head. The mark of the beast is a parody of God's seal of ownership on the foreheads of faithful Christians (7:3; 14:1). The reference to buying and selling reflects the fact that it was particularly in order to participate in the business life of the cities that Christians were tempted to compromise with idolatry. v. 18, since Greek or Hebrew letters also functioned as numbers, it was possible to add up the numerical value of a word—a practice known as gematria. This verse says that 'the number of the beast' is also 'the number of a person' and that both are 666. The Greek word used for beast (thērion), transliterated into Hebrew letters, has the value 666, as does the name Nero(n) Caesar, written in Hebrew script. The implication is that Nero's very name reveals his true nature to the discerning. The verbal link with 17:9 suggests there is even more to the significance of the number. The number 666 has the unusual characteristic of being not only what the ancients called a triangular number (it is the sum of all the numbers up to 36), but also a doubly triangular number (36 is the sum of all the numbers up to 8). It is the eighth such number (in the series 1, 6, 21, 55, 120, 231, 406, 666). So for those familiar with ancient numerology, Nero is also revealed to be 'the eighth', with a significance ch. 17 will develop.

(14:1–5) The Lamb and the 144,000 v. 1, this is the army (see REV 7:2–3) of the Lamb ready for battle with the beast. 'Mount Zion' alludes to Ps 2:6. For the names (indicating ownership), cf. 3:12. v. 3, for the new song, cf. 5:9. v. 4, they are not literally all adult celibate males. The image is part of the imagery of holy war, for which soldiers had to keep themselves free of the ritual defilement incurred by sex (1 Sam 21:5–6). This is used as an image of the moral probity (cf. v. 5) required of Christians (female as well as male) who follow the Lamb in his path of faithful witness to death. The first fruits are the first part of the harvest dedicated to God in sacrifice (Lev 23:9–14). The image implies that the rest of the harvest—the nations converted to God by the martyrs' witness—will follow, as depicted in 14:14–16. v. 5, there is probably allusion to both Isa 53:9 and Zeph 3:13 (the verbal correspondence of the two texts shows that the Messiah's people resemble him in his total lack of deceit), as well as contrast with the guile of the forces of evil (12:9; 13:14; 6:13). 'Blameless' really means 'without physical defect': the requirement for sacrificial animals or for soldiers in the holy war, used metaphorically here.

(14:6–13) Three Angelic Messages and a Voice from Heaven vv. 6–11, the angels symbolize the effect on the nations of the confrontation of the forces of the beast and the Lamb. By contrast with the eagle (8:13), their messages are positive. vv. 1–2, the invitation to all nations to repent and worship God (cf. 11:13) alludes to Ps 96. v. 3, the good news of Babylon's fall anticipates the account of Babylon in 16:19–18:24, just as the initial reference to the beast (11:7) anticipated his introduction in ch. 13. Cf. Isa 21:9; Jer 25:15–16; 51:7–8; Dan 4:30. In the OT Babylon is the greatest of the world powers who subjugated and exiled the people of God, and is closely associated with the imagery of new exodus in Isa 40–55. In Revelation she stands for, not the political and military power of Rome (the beast), but the city of Rome (see chs. 17–18), with its economic, cultural, and religious influence on the empire. For 'the wine of the passion' [thumos can also mean wrath, as in v. 10] of her fornication' (lit. tr.) cf. 17:2; 18:3; the reference is to the promise of economic prosperity whereby she entices the nations into association with her, a promise which intoxicates, so that her clients are oblivious of the risk of divine judgement incurred. v. 10, the first image of punishment is an example of eschatological lex talionis (see comment on 11:18): those who drank the wine of Babylon's passion (thumos) will drink the wine of God's wrath (thumos). 'Fire and sulphur' allude to the paradigmatic judgement on Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19:24; and cf. Isa 34:9). The torment consists in remorseful recognition of truth and holiness. v. 11, the image is from Isa 34:9–10, the judgement on Edom, enemy of OT Israel who, though never named in Revelation, serves implicitly as a precedent for Rome. Revelation's use of such imagery (cf. 19:3, 20; 20:10, 15) resists translation into prosaic literal terms. The 'no rest day or night' (from torment) corresponds verbally with the ceaseless praise of the living creatures (4:8), as well as contrasting with the 'rest' promised to the saints in v. 13. v. 12, cf. 13:10. The threat of vv. 9–10 is a warning not least to Christians, who need 'endurance' if they are to avoid worshipping the beast. v. 13, the Spirit's words are a prophetic oracle given to John in response to the heavenly voice (cf. 2:7 etc.).

(14:14–20) The Harvest of the Earth and the Vintage of the Earth The messages of the angels have given the nations the opportunity to respond to the witness of the martyrs in repentance (14:7) or to face the judgement of God (vv. 9–11). To these two possibilities correspond the two images of the end that now follow, two different forms (taken from Joel 3:13) of the traditional eschatological image of harvest: the grain harvest (vv. 14–16) and the vintage (vv. 17–20). The first, which takes up the harvest image from 14:4, is a positive image of the gathering of the nations into the messianic kingdom, while the second, taking up the image of wine from 14:8, 10, is a negative image of the judgement of the unrepentant nations. Thus the response of the nations to the proclamations of the angels is left open to two final possibilities: salvation or judgement. This passage is an important corrective to the tendency of commentators to allow only one of these possibilities as the message of Revelation. v. 14, there is a precise allusion to Dan 7:13–14, depicting Christ (cf. 11:3) coming on the clouds to God, not as judge, but to receive his dominion over all nations (hence the golden crown). vv. 15–16, the harvest here consists in the single action of reaping, not the following acts of threshing and winnowing. Whereas the latter are commonly images of eschatological judgement (e.g. Jer 51:33; Mt 3:12), reaping alone is not a natural image of judgement and is never so used in the Bible, whereas it does occur as a positive image of the gathering of people into the kingdom (Mk 4:29; Jn 4:35–8). v. 18, the altar and the fire (cf. 8:5) already suggest that this image is of judgement. vv. 19–20, unlike the single action of reaping the grain harvest, two actions are specified for the vintage: gathering the grapes into the winepress and treading the winepress (for the latter as image of judgement, cf. Lam 1:15; Isa 63:3). The exposition of these images is left until 16:12–14 (the gathering of the grapes) and 19:15 (the identity of the treader of the grapes).

(15:1–4) The Song of the Conquerors v. 1, while vv. 2–4 are the concluding section of the account of the conflict of the forces of evil and the forces of God in chs. 12–15, v. 1 already introduces the angels whose actions are then narrated in 15:5–16:21. This is another example of the interlocking device already used in 8:1–5. v. 2, the heavenly sea of glass (4:6), now mingled with the fire of judgement, is the Red Sea through which the martyrs have come in the new exodus. They stand beside it, praising God for the victory, as Moses and Israel did (Ex 15:1–18). v. 3, since they have conquered by the blood of the Lamb (12:11), their song is the Lamb's as well as Moses'. vv. 3–4, the song is an interpretation of the song of Moses (Ex 15:1–8), reflecting the themes of that OT passage, but using the words of other OT passages with verbal links to Ex 15:11; Jer 10:6–7; Ps 86:8–10. The effect is to stress the theme that God's act of judgement and salvation, the Exodus, demonstrates his deity to the nations (Ex 15:11–16), and to interpret this in terms of the most universalistic hope of the OT: that all the nations will come to worship the true God. In the context of Rev 15, this is the result of the victory won by the martyrs through their faithful witness as far as death. However, just as the positive outcome (the grain harvest) is followed by the negative outcome (the vintage) in ch. 14, so this vision of the nations converted to the worship of God through the witness of the martyrs (15:2–4) is now followed by a picture of final judgement on the nations (15:5–16:21) in consequence of their rejection of the witness of the martyrs (cf. 16:4–6). The future is portrayed in alternative images—conversion of the nations, judgement of the nations—which Revelation never reconciles. Since it deals in genuine images, not literalistic descriptions, it need not do so.

The Seven Bowls (15:5–16:21)

(15:5–16:1) Introduction The anticipatory vision of 15:1—which declared these seven plagues to be the last ones—is now continued. 15:5 echoes 11:19, indicating that this series of seven is related to the seventh trumpet-blast just as the seven trumpet-blasts were to the seventh seal. 15:7, the golden bowls reflect Isa 51:17, 22–3 (God's wrath punishing his people's enemies as they had afflicted his people; cf. Rev 16:4–5). They are also liturgical vessels described like those of 5:8, which contain incense representing the prayers of the saints. They therefore make the same point as the related but alternative image in 8:3–5. 15:8, cf. Isa 6:1, 4; Ezek 10:2–4. That no one can enter the temple until these plagues are ended stresses their finality and also contrasts with 7:9–17. Unlike the series of seals and the series of trumpet-blasts, which both had interludes between the fifth and sixth judgement, expressing and interpreting the delay of final judgement, this series has no such interlude.

(16:2–11) The First Five Bowls v. 2, like the first four trumpet-blasts (8:7–12), the first four bowls fall on the four regions of creation: earth, sea, rivers and springs, heavens. But whereas the trumpet-blasts were limited, these are total. Again there are echoes of the plagues of Egypt (Ex 7–10). v. 5, in Jewish angelology, various angels were in charge of the functioning of various parts of creation (cf. 14:18). v. 6, an example of eschatological lex talionis (see comment on 11:18). v. 7, this is the altar of 6:9, on which the martyrs were sacrificed. v. 9, the response of these hardened sinners (also in v. 11) is the opposite of 11:13 and 14:7. v. 10, the first judgement to attack the power of the beast directly.

(16:12–16) The Sixth Bowl v. 12, this does not look like a judgement at all, until we realize that it prepares for the forces of evil to inflict judgement on themselves (cf. Rev 17:12, 16). The references to the Euphrates and kings from the east again evoke the contemporary fear or hope of invasion from the east (cf. 9:14–19), as well as prophecies of the fall of Babylon (Jer 50:2, 41; 51:11, 28, 36). There may be a parodic element again, suggesting the drying up of the Red Sea or the Euphrates (Isa 11:15) for God's people to pass. v. 13, frogs were unclean animals (Lev 11:9–12, 41–7). v. 14, this gathering for battle is resumed in 19:19. For 'the great day' cf. Joel 2:11, 31; Zeph 1:14; Rev 6:17. v. 15, this interruption of the narrative by Christ addressing the readers, as in chs. 2–3, and a beatitude directs the readers' attention to the urgent relevance to themselves. They too are susceptible to the deceptions of the beast and the false prophet, who have their agents in the churches (cf. 2:14, 20). The simile (cf. 3:3) suggests the unexpectedness of the parousia, such that the readers must be at all times ready. Otherwise they will be like someone who removes his clothes for sleep and when surprised is found naked to his shame. v. 16, Harmagedon means 'mountain of Megiddo(n)', but is problematic since, although Megiddo is a town mentioned often in the OT, there is no 'mountain of Megiddo'. Probably the name derives from Zech 12:11 ('the plain of Megiddon'), since Rev 1:7 alludes to Zech 12:10, 12 with reference to the parousia and Zech 12:9 speaks of God's destruction of the nations who come against Jerusalem. Conflation of this passage with Ezek 38:17 (to which Rev 19:17 alludes) has produced a mountain of Megiddo. In view of the interpretation of Zech 12:10–12 in Rev 1:7, it seems that, even at this last moment of the eleventh hour, immediately before the very last judgement (16:17–21), John hints at the possibility of the nations greeting the returning Christ with repentance.

(16:17–21) The Seventh Bowl v. 17, the voice declares the completion of God's judgement (cf. 15:1); the same words in 21:6 refer to the completion of the renewal that follows judgement. vv. 18–21, this is the final and fullest expansion of the formula of theophany and judgement (cf. 4:5; 8:5; 11:19). With 16:5 it shows that the whole series of last plagues is included in 11:19. The earthquake and the plague of hail echo Ezek 38:19–22 (and cf. Josh 10:11). Earthquakes were frequent in the province of Asia in this period and ruined several cities, including Laodicea. The expression 'such as had not occurred . . . is an apocalyptic formula deriving from Dan 12:1 (cf. Mt 24:21; Mk 13:19), though it might also recall the plagues of Egypt (Ex 9:18, 24; 10:6; 11:6). The judgement affects not only Babylon and the other cities (v. 19), but the whole earth (v. 20; cf. 6:14). The description ends, not with the death of the still unrepentant sinners, which must be implied, but with their cursing of God, making a striking contrast with 11:13, which is an alternative version of the same eschatological earthquake and its effects. The description of the fall of Babylon here (vv. 18–19) is good evidence for not taking Revelation's images literally, since the fall of Babylon is differently described in 17:16, as the work of the beast and the ten kings, and in 18:8.

Babylon the Harlot (17:1–19:10)

(17:1–6a) The Harlot: (a) the Vision Until now Babylon has appeared only briefly in 14:8; 16:19; now she is given full attention. v. 1, this angel is a characteristic literary link with the preceding section, while the reference to the 'judgement' of the harlot shows that the vision will expand on what was briefly mentioned in 16:19. The 'many waters' apply literally to ancient Babylon (Jer 51:13), hardly to contemporary Rome, but this is why they are later given an allegorical interpretation (17:15). vv. 1–2, harlotry or adultery is an image applied by OT prophets to Israel, indicating her unfaithfulness to her husband YHWH and her devotion to other gods (cf. 2:22). But this sense of religious apostasy is only appropriate if the image is applied to the people of God. The image has another significance in Isa 23:15–18, where it is applied to Tyre, and Nah 3:4–6, where it is applied to Nineveh. Since the account of Babylon in ch. 18 alludes not only to OT prophecies about Babylon but also to those about Tyre (Isa 23; Ezek 26–8), Isa 23 is probably the main source of the image. In both Isa 23 and in Revelation it is not with gods that the harlot commits fornication but with 'all the kingdoms of the world' (Isa 23:17; cf. Ezek 27:33) or 'the kings of the earth' (Rev 17:2; 18:3, 9). In Isa 23 prostitution is an image of Tyre's trading relationships with the nations; in Revelation harlotry is similarly an image of Rome's economic relationships with client kingdoms and others. The basic idea is that those who associate with a prostitute pay her for the privilege. Babylon, 'the great whore' (v. 1), is a rich courtesan, whose expensive clothes and jewellery (v. 4) indicate the lifestyle she leads at her clients' expense. This is an image of Rome's economic exploitation of her empire (as becomes especially clear in ch. 18). To those who associate with her she offers the supposed benefits of the Pax Romana (the conditions for economic prosperity), much lauded in Roman propaganda of the period, but these benefits are not what they seem. While the local élites may benefit from Rome's rule, many of Rome's subjects do not, but, dazzled by her glory and persuaded by her propaganda, they fail to realize they are being exploited. Hence 'the kings of the earth' (the local élites) enjoy her sexual favours, but 'the inhabitants of the earth' are intoxicated by her wine (v. 2; cf. the same distinction in 18:2). v. 3, for John's transportation in the spirit (i.e. by the agency of God's Spirit), cf. 21:10; Ezek 3:12, 14. The 'wilderness' (cf. Isa 21:1) already anticipates Babylon's destruction (18:2). It is also one of the many parallels and contrasts between Babylon and the new Jerusalem, which John will see on a high mountain

(21:10). The beast is easily identifiable as that of ch. 13, though its colour is a new feature, suggesting royal power or bloody oppression (cf. 12:3). Rome's economic power (the harlot) rides on the back of her military and political power (the beast). v. 4, the golden cup (cf. Jer 51:7), the outward attractiveness of Roman propaganda, contains the abominations of the Roman political religion. v. 5, the name Babylon is a mystery because it points to the true reality and fate of Rome which the vision reveals. Babylon as 'the mother of whores' is the metropolis to which other urban centres—such as the cities in which the seven churches are located—are subject (cf. 16:19). v. 6, the two descriptions of Christians seem to refer to the same people, not to two groups. It is probably not implied that their blood is in the golden cup (v. 4). The harlot's drunkenness has an even more sinister source. Probably Nero's persecution of Christians in the city of Rome is in mind, but those whom Rome will put to death in the great persecution which Revelation sees coming may be included.

(17:6b–18) The Harlot: (b) The Interpretation v. 6, John is perplexed by the vision. v. 7, the interpretation turns out to be as much about the beast as about the harlot, since her fate is closely related to the career of the beast. v. 8, in this chapter, unlike ch. 13, Revelation takes up the popular expectation that the emperor Nero, thought not to be dead but to have fled secretly east to the Parthian empire, would return, with allies from the east, to wreak vengeance on Rome. This expectation, kept alive by a series of pretenders claiming to be the returning Nero, was a matter of eager hope for many in the eastern part of the Roman empire, who saw it as the resurgence of the power of the east against the west. The expected returning Nero was thus a kind of messianic figure. By alluding to this myth, Rev 17 can take in a different direction the Christological parody which was a feature of the portrayal of the beast in ch. 13. Whereas there the healing of the wound the Roman power suffered at the death of Nero parodies the resurrection of Jesus, here the return of Nero parodies the parousia of Jesus. Thus in v. 8 the beast is twice described in terms which echo one of Revelation's key designations for God: 'the one who was and who is and who is to come' (1:4, 8). The description of the beast differs in that the middle term is negative: 'is not'. Unlike God, the beast is not eternal. He has perished once already and so his future coming, unlike the parousia of Jesus, is unlikely to establish his eternal rule. Whereas Jesus will descend from heaven, he will ascend from the abyss and go to destruction (v. 8a). He is already doomed and his parousia will prove a fraud. v. 9, the interpretation of the seven heads as mountains makes the identification with Rome, famous for its seven hills, unequivocal. v. 10, attempts to use this passage to discover which Roman emperor was ruling when Revelation was written fail because it is impossible to know from which emperor the counting should begin or whether all emperors should be counted. It is better to recognize seven as the number of completeness. The series represents the complete sequence of emperors, and the counting functions to put the readers near, but not yet quite at the end ('a little while' is the conventional period of eschatological imminence, cf. 6:11; Heb 10:37). There is still one short reign to come. v. 11, Nero is the one who belongs to the seven (as a past emperor) but is also an eighth (when he returns). This head of the beast is identified with the beast itself (here and in v. 8) because Nero most vividly represents the antichristian evil of the imperial power. If seven is the complete sequence of emperors, the eighth is a supernumerary, in whom completeness is surpassed in a final excess of evil, which brings final destruction to the imperial power. v. 12, the ten are probably 'the kings of the east' (16:12) who accompany the returning Nero on his return. Their 'one hour' of co-rule with the beast is clear proof that none of Revelation's time periods should be understood literally. v. 14, this anticipates the account of the parousia in 19:11–21. As the beast has his allies, so Christ is accompanied by his saints (cf. 19:14). v. 16, Revelation here exploits the contradiction between the two pagan Roman expectations: the admiring belief in Rome's self-promotion as 'the eternal city', and the rebellious hope of a conqueror from the east who would destroy Rome. Since the latter is the returning emperor Nero, the beast's own last attempt to establish his universal dominion itself destroys the eternal city. v. 17, evil itself enacts the judgement of God on evil. v. 18, this anticipates the appearance of the kings of the earth, mourning Babylon's fall, in 18:9.

(18:1–3) The Fall of Babylon: (a) The Voice of an Angel Ch. 18 draws on all the OT prophetic oracles against Babylon (Isa 13:1–14:23; 21:1–10; 47; Jer 25:12–38; 50–51) and against Tyre (Isa 23; Ezek 26–8). John's oracle gathers up all that his prophetic predecessors had said against these two cities, in order to portray Rome as the culmination of all the evil empires of history and therefore subject like them to judgement. (Compare the way the beast (13:1–2) combines the features of all four beasts in Daniel's vision (Dan 7:3–8).) OT Babylon prefigures Rome's political supremacy and oppression, but OT Tyre prefigures Rome's economic power and oppression. Hence the importance of Ezek 26–8 as a model for John's oracle against Babylon (vv. 9–20). At the same time, prophetic precedents are selected and adapted to fit the realities of contemporary Rome. v. 2, the cry of the angel in 14:8 is taken up and expanded. Demons and unclean animals haunt deserted ruins in OT oracles of destruction (Jer 51:37; Isa 13:21–2; 34:11–15). v. 3, to the nations and the kings, already in ch. 17's account of Babylon's harlotry, the merchants, another group who, like the local ruling élites, profited from Rome's domination of her empire, are now added.

(18:4–20) The Fall of Babylon: (b) A Voice from Heaven This whole section is spoken by the voice to which v. 4 refers. v. 4, cf. Isa 48:20; Jer 50:8; 51:6. Addressed to Revelation's first readers, who did not live in Rome, this is a summons not to physical movement out of Babylon, but to dissociation from her evils. It is especially relevant to those Christians who belonged or wished to belong to the groups who mourn for Babylon in vv. 9–19, who profited themselves from the economic system by which Rome exploited her empire and in which the political religion of Rome was inextricably involved. v. 5, for 'heaped high as heaven', cf. Jer 51:9; the phrase is suggestive of the tower of Babel (Gen 11), implying that what God prevented humanity completing then is now accomplished in Babylon's summation of the human desire to rival God. For 'God remembered', cf. 16:19; Jer 14:10; Hos 7:2; 8:13; the expression responds to the complaint that God has forgotten, made by those who suffer injustice and wait for God's intervention. vv. 6–7b, this formulates the principle that the punishment fits the crime (see comment on 11:18). 'Double' (as in Jer 16:18; Isa 40:2) really means 'fully equivalent'. The third command takes up the notion that the cup of Babylon's passion is also the cup of God's wrath (cf. 14:8, 10; Jer 51:7). v. 7b is Rome's proud—virtually self-deifying—claim to eternal reign (cf. Isa 47:7–8).

v. 9, the three groups of mourners (vv. 9–19) bewail the loss of the source of their own power or profit. v. 10, the lament of the kings appropriately refers to Babylon as powerful, whereas the others refer to her wealth. v. 11, though not of high social status, many merchants were among the richest men of their time, and wielded much economic power. vv. 12–13, the list of cargoes has 28 (7 × 4) items, indicating all the produce of the whole earth (seven for completeness, four for the earth). The model for such a list is Ezek 27:12–24, but the form and contents of the list are quite different. It is a remarkably accurate list of the main imports to the city of Rome at the time, especially the most expensive luxuries which the extravagant tastes of the Roman rich demanded, but also some items (wine, oil, wheat) on which the life of the whole city depended. Many of the luxuries are those mentioned by Roman moralists criticizing the decadence of the Roman aristocracy. While those who mourn for Rome profited from this trade, on the whole Rome's luxuries and even her more basic imports were bought with the wealth gained from conquest, plunder, and taxation of the provinces, or drew resources to Rome that were needed in the provinces, or exploited local labour. The list is not an admiring view of Rome's civilization, but a precise indictment of her economic exploitation and oppression. The end of the list makes this clear: 'slaves, that is, human lives' (probably better than: 'slaves and human lives'). Not only does this indicate that slaves, traded as property, are human beings, but as the end of the list it suggests the contempt for human life on which all Rome's prosperity and luxury rested. v. 14, this is addressed to Babylon by the heavenly voice, as a comment on the list of cargoes: it evokes Rome's addiction to consumption and ostentatious display of wealth. v. 16, the description is very close to 7:4, demonstrating that Rome's luxury imports are the courtesan's extravagant profits from her rich clients. v. 17, the third group are those employed in the maritime transport industry. v. 20, this is not part of the mariners' lament, but the heavenly voice (v. 4) speaking for itself. Whereas Babylon's clients mourn, the saints should rejoice, for Babylon's fall is God's justice in their favour against their oppressor. It is a test for Revelation's Christian readers to realize with which perspective they sympathize—that of the earth (vv. 9, 11) and the sea (v. 17), or that of heaven (v. 20).

(18:21–4) The Fall of Babylon: (c) The Voice of Another Angel v. 21, a prophetic symbol of Babylon's fall, modelled on Jeremiah's (51:63–4). vv. 22–3, cf. Jer 25:10; and for 'your sorcery', cf. Nah 4:3; Isa 47:12. Babylon is guilty of all the crimes which, according to 22:15, exclude people from the new Jerusalem. v. 24, this depicts Babylon as the culmination of all evil empires, held guilty of all their crimes: the kind of eschatological hyperbole which enables the image to transcend its original reference to Rome. It is not only for the martyrdom of Christians, but for all the victims of her oppression that Babylon is judged. John's prophetic critique of Rome (the most thoroughgoing in ancient literature) exposes the oppressive nature of Roman power, inherent in its deification of its power. The martyrdom of Christians serves as a peculiarly illuminating instance of this.

(19:1–8) The Fall of Babylon: (d) Voices from Heaven vv. 1–5, the full range of voices in heaven praise God for his judgement of Babylon and exhort God's servants on earth to do so. v. 3 once again mocks Rome's claim to eternity. vv. 6–8, the second voice of a great multitude—more majestically described than that in v. 1 (cf. 14:2)—celebrates the positive consequences of Babylon's judgement. God reigns (contrast 17:18; 18:7), and the Lamb's marriage to his chaste bride the church (contrast 18:23) takes the place of Babylon's venal promiscuity. These themes look forward to ch. 21. They remind us at this point that the negative side of God's eschatological action—the fall of Babylon—takes place only for the sake of the positive. The end of the passage also makes the present challenge to Christians clear: the positive corollary of coming out of Babylon (18:4) is to be ready for the Lamb as his bride. For the image of the church as the bride of Christ, see Eph 5:25–7; 2 Cor 11:2. The bride's clothing (v. 8) has a different meaning from that of the harlot (17:4; 18:16).

(19:9–10) John and the Angel v. 9, the common image of the eschatological banquet (e.g. Mt 8:11) is here specified as a marriage supper (cf. Mt 25:10). v. 10, John mistakes the agent of revelation, a servant of God like himself, for the divine source of God's true words (v. 9). The incident is significant primarily because it dramatizes the issue of true worship which is at stake throughout Revelation. Not the pretenders to divine status, like the beast, not even God's heavenly servants the angels may be worshipped, but only God. This is the Jewish criterion of monotheism: only God may be worshipped. Given this passage, it is the more remarkable that 5:9–14 and 22:3 include Jesus in the worship due to God alone. The difficult final statement of v. 10 must mean that when the Spirit inspires prophecy (such as John's) its content is the witness Jesus bore and bears (cf. 1:2).

Transition from Babylon to the New Jerusalem (19:11–21:8)

(19:11–21) The Rider from Heaven and his Victory v. 11, the open heaven signals a novel stage in the visionary narrative. Hitherto John's visions have revealed the heavenly perspective on the earthly situation. They have shown the beast's power to be deceit and the witness of the martyrs the truth. But while the beast still contests God's rule, earthly appearances still hide the truth from those unwilling to see it. With the opening of heaven, truth prevails openly and irresistibly on earth. All illusions and delusions must perish, and those who have propagated and still cling to them must perish with them. The truth, the heavenly reality of things, comes to earth in the person of Jesus, the one who has supremely witnessed to the truth of God in his life and death and who is the Word of God in person (v. 13). His victory is pictured in two interwoven strands of imagery: as military victory and as judicial sentence. He comes as the Divine Warrior, riding to victory over his enemies (v. 19), and as the Judge whose truthful verdict condemns the wicked. He is called 'faithful and true' (v. 11), words which in 3:14 (cf. 1:5) describe him as witness. He is no longer witness, but judge. But it is the same truth to which he witnessed that now condemns. Witness is double-edged, like his sword (11:16, but no longer in 19:15): it wins people from lies and illusions to the truth, but when they reject it it becomes evidence against those who love lies and cling to illusions in the face of the truth (cf. Jn 12:46–9). So the truth to which Jesus was the faithful witness is the same truth by which he now judges. The end of v. 11 echoes Isaiah's prophecy of the Messiah as righteous judge on behalf of the oppressed (11:4). v. 12, cf. 11:14; 2:18, 23: eyes which see the truth of minds and hearts. The significance of the unknown name is debatable: perhaps the mystery of his divine identity. v. 13, although the image derives from Isa 63:1–3 (cf. Gen 49:9–11), the blood must be his own (1:5; 5:9; 7:14; 12:11), since the slaughter of his enemies is yet to come (vv. 11–16 describe exclusively his qualifications for victory in the battle that follows). It is the blood of his faithful witness to the word of God which qualifies him to be the Word of God in person. v. 14, the martyrs appear as his army (cf. 17:14): their robes have been washed white in his blood (7:14). Their victory in death is vindicated through participation in his final victory, but it is unclear whether they are active in the destruction of the enemy (cf. v. 21; and v. 15 with 2:26–7). v. 15, his weapon is his word: cf. Isa 11:4, and v. 21. This verse takes up the narratives left hanging in 12:5 and 14:19–20, along with their OT sources (Ps 2:8–11; Isa 63:1–6). v. 16, this name, publicly visible, proclaims him the one who exercises the absolute divine sovereignty over all and comes to establish it against the kings who contest his lordship. vv. 17–18, the invitation to the birds, based on Ezek 39:17–20, is a gruesome parody of the eschatological banquet, the marriage supper of the Lamb (cf. 19:7–9). The birds form a literary inclusio round the account of the battle (cf. v. 21). v. 19, as well as echoing Ps 2:1–3, this verse takes up the unfinished narrative of 16:14. The whole passage, by means of its literary links with earlier parts of the book, portrays the parousia's comprehensive finality. v. 20, the final punishment represented by the lake of fire (which is the same as 'the second death': 20:14) is the immediate fate of two of the Satanic trinity, but not of the devil himself until 20:10, and not of humans until they have appeared before the divine tribunal (20:15). The beast and the false prophet, it should be remembered, are not human individuals but systems of power and influence. It is these primarily which are destroyed. Humans perish by the truth of God's judgement (v. 21) only because they have thrown in their lot with these systems.

(20:1–10) The Millennium This passage has been the subject of interpretative debate for centuries, and the basis for a very diverse tradition of Christian 'millenarianism'. It is important to focus here on the role which the period of a thousand years plays in Revelation's visionary narrative. Some Jewish writings contemporary with Revelation portrayed a temporary period of messianic rule on earth at the end of history and prior to the eschatological renewal of creation (2 Apoc. Bar. 40:4; 4 Ezra 7:28–9). But John characteristically adapts this tradition for his own theological and literary purposes. vv. 1–3, just as the dragon appeared in the narrative before the two beasts (chs. 12–13), so his story continues after they have gone to their doom. He is the ultimate principle of evil, they are no more than his historical minions. In ch. 12 he was thrown from heaven to earth, where he deceived the nations; now he is imprisoned in the abyss (cf. 9:1), prevented from deceiving the nations for an extremely long time (the significance of a thousand years; cf. Ps 90:4). vv. 4–6, this is all Revelation says about the meaning of the millennium. It is a consequence of the victory of truth over the devil's and the beast's deceit. So that truth may prevail the situation under the beast's rule is reversed: the beast must be seen to be defeated (19:20) and the martyrs, his victims, must be seen to be the true victors. As the kings of the earth who shared the beast's usurped rule are deprived of their kingdom, so the martyrs now reign with Christ (cf. 1:6; 5:10, though the final fulfilment of these promises comes in 22:3–5). The kingdom has been taken from the beast and his allies and given to the martyrs. Whereas his universal rule lasted three and a half years, they rule the earth for a thousand years. Whereas the beast, who killed the martyrs, has perished finally in the second death (19:20), they come to life and the second death has no power over them (vv. 4–6). Rule and life—the two issues on which the contest between the beast and the martyrs has hinged—are the sole theme of this account of the millennium. It is not necessary to understand Revelation's story of the millennium as literal prediction of a period of time following the parousia. Rather, it is a symbol of the vindication of the martyrs which the parousia must entail. vv. 7–10, this passage depends on the story of Gog in Ezek 38–9 (where the nations from the remotest parts of the earth (38:2–6) gather to attack Israel at the centre of the earth (38:12) and are destroyed by fire from heaven (38:22)). As a narrative demonstration that the triumph of the martyrs in Christ's kingdom is not one which evil can again reverse, the story gives Satan another chance to deceive the nations and to defeat the saints. This time the citadel of the saints remains impregnable, and the devil goes to his final fate (cf. comment on 14:11).

(20:11–15) The Judgement of the Dead This judgement differs from that in 19:17–21 in that it determines the eternal destiny of every human individual throughout history. Not until this passage is the judgement of the dead which 11:18 included in the coming of God's kingdom actually narrated. v. 11, God's judgement seat (white is one of the dazzling colours of heaven) is presumably a different throne from the one from which he rules the universe (4:2). The cosmic quake is the reaction to the theophany, as in 6:12–14, but may also anticipate 21:1b. v. 12, for the books, cf. Dan 7:10; 12:1–2. They represent the exposure of the truth of each person's life so that judgement may be passed on it. Judgement 'according to their deeds' is a formula used throughout the Bible (Ps 62:12; Prov 24:12; Job 34:11; Jer 17:10; Mt 16:27; Rom 2:6; 1 Pet 1:17; Rev 22:12). It implies not a legalistic notion of retributive justice, but an assessment of the fundamental alignment of a person's life (either to God and the good, or to evil) as evidenced by their deeds. It is not inconsistent with God's mercy, implied by the book of life which, for those whose names are still written in it (cf. 3:5), has the last word. v. 13, this image of resurrection, found more fully in other ancient Jewish works (e.g. 2 Esd 7:32), envisages the places of the dead as having been entrusted with them for safekeeping until God requires them to return them. The 'sea' seems to be the 'waters under the earth', the primeval chaos (cf. 13:1), mentioned here to prepare the way for 21:1. v. 14, Death and Hades appeared in the narrative before the Satanic trinity (1:18; 6:8) and survive longer before finally joining them in the lake of fire; cf. 1 Cor 15:26.

(21:1–4) The New Heaven and the New Earth v. 1, the expectation of a new cosmos here echoes Isa 65:17. 'New' carries its eschatological sense of radically different, but implies a radical renewal of the old creation rather than creation from nothing (cf. Paul's use of 'new creation' in 2 Cor 5:17). Absence of sea, if this means the primordial chaos from which the beast arises (13:1), implies that the creation is established eternally, beyond any threat of reverting to chaos. v. 2, the new Jerusalem will be described at length later in the chapter. It comes from heaven as the dwelling place of redeemed humanity with God—the union of heaven and earth, or of the bride with her husband Christ (cf. 19:7–8). v. 3, the words echo God's OT promises to dwell with his own people Israel as their God (Ezek 37:27–8; Zech 8:8) and also that many nations will be his people with whom he will dwell (Zech 2:10–11; cf. Isa 19:25; 56:7; Am 9:12). The best text has 'his peoples' (rather than 'people'), using in the plural the word commonly used of God's own people (laoi) rather than the more usual word for the other nations or Gentiles (ethnē). Now that the covenant people (Israel and the church) have fulfilled their mission of witness to the nations, all nations will share in the privileges and promises of the covenant people. From this point two strands run through the account of the new Jerusalem that follows, one referring to the covenant people, the other to the nations. v. 4, cf. Isa 25:7–8. In God's immediate presence on earth all sorrow, suffering, and death are banished for ever: this above all is what makes the new cosmos new.

(21:5–8) God Speaks This is the first time since 1:8 that God speaks directly (as distinct from 'a voice from the throne', a phrase which preserves a reverent indirectness). v. 5, 'making all things new' implies renewal from the creative resources of God: the old creation is not replaced by another, but nor can the potential of the old creation itself produce its renewal. The renewal must come from the Creator. v. 6, cf. comment on 16:17. In both his first (1:8) and his last words, God declares himself the Alpha and the Omega. Here, as he becomes the realized goal of his creation, the phrase is stressed by reiteration in other terms (and in 22:13, where Christ also claims the title, it is reiterated yet again). The water (cf. 7:17; 22:1; Isa 49:10) is the eternal life of the new creation, beyond the reach of death, life lived continuously from its source in God. v. 7, this is the eighth promise to the conquerors, summing up those which end each of the messages to the churches (chs. 2–3) and indicating their fulfilment from this point in the narrative onwards. It is another form of the OT covenant formula (cf. v. 3). v. 8 is mainly a warning to those in the churches who could be conquerors, but succumb to the idolatrous and sinful influences of the society with which they are tempted to compromise. To avoid the second death (cf. 2:11) is to come out of Babylon (18:4) in which all these sins flourish.

The New Jerusalem the Bride (21:9–22:9)

(21:9–14) General View of the City The beginning of this section (vv. 9–10) parallels 17:1–3, just as 22:6–9 parallels

19:8–10, marking out these two passages about Babylon and the new Jerusalem as a pair, and the intervening passage (19:11–21:8) as the transition from the destruction of one to the arrival of the other. v. 10, the mountain derives most obviously from Ezek 40:2, but also evokes the myth of the cosmic mountain at the centre of the earth, where God and humanity meet, where Paradise was (Ezek 28:14) and will be restored (Isa 11:9; 65:25), with which mount Zion was symbolically identified (Ps 48:2), and where the temple to which all nations will be drawn at the end stands (Isa 2:2). Whereas the builders of ancient Babylon (Gen 11:1–9) sought to join earth to heaven in the self-deifying pride John saw repeated in contemporary Rome, the new Jerusalem which comes from God will truly join heaven to earth. v. 11, the whole city shines with the reflected glory of God (cf. 4:3, 6; 21:23). vv. 12–13, twelve, the number of the people of God, recurs throughout the description of the city (vv. 12–14, 16, 19–22; cf. 22:2). The names of the tribes on the gates come from Ezek 48:30–4. v. 14, cf. Eph 2:20.

(21:15–21) The Walls and the Gates of the City v. 15, cf. Ezek 40:3. v. 16, initially the city is described as a square, 12,000 stadia in each direction. The beast has the triangular number 666, but the people of God have the square number 144 (12 × 12) (7:4–8; 14:1; 21:17). Then the city is shown not only to have a square ground plan, but to be a perfect cube, like no city ever imagined, but like the holy of holies in the temple (1 Kings 6:20). We learn later that it needs no temple (v. 22): the whole city is the holiest place of God's presence. v. 17, as well as echoing Ezek 40:5, this verse ('144 cubits by the measure of a human being, that is, of an angel', my tr.) resembles 13:18 ('the number of the beast, for it is the number of a human being: its number is 666', my tr.). Just as Nero Caesar, written in Hebrew characters, has the numerical value 666, a triangular number, so the Greek word 'angel' (aggelos), written in Hebrew characters, has the numerical value 144, a square number. Humanity debased to the level of the beast is contrasted with humanity raised to the level of the angels. vv. 18–21, the city is built out of the jewels and metals of Paradise: cf. Gen 2:11–12; Ezek 28:13. The twelve precious stones (vv. 19–20) are those of the high priest's breastplate (Ex 28:17–20); and the same twelve occur in Ezek 28:13 (LXX Gk. version; in the MT the first nine) described as 'every precious stone', and in Eden. Thus the list of twelve in Revelation represents all precious stones, all to be found in Paradise. Jewish traditions claimed that the jewels of the high priest's breastplate in Solomon's temple came from Paradise, along with other precious materials used in the temple, and were also the precious stones of which, according to Isa 54:11–12, the new Jerusalem is to be built (cf. 4QpIsa^a 1:4–9; LAB 26:13–15). Thus the jewels and the gold characterize the new Jerusalem as a temple-city adorned with all the fabulously radiant precious materials of Paradise. The glory of God is reflected in the jewels and the translucent gold of the city. These are not to be understood merely as allegories for attributes of redeemed people, but as the beauty of the new creation, Paradise restored, and a home for glorified humanity. The city's relation to Paradise here and in 22:1–2 points to the harmony of nature and human culture in the new creation.

(21:22–7) The Glory of God in the Temple-City v. 22, while in many ways the description of the city follows OT and Apocryphal models (Isa 52:1; 54:11–12; 60; Ezek 40:2–5; 47:1–12; 48:30–4; Zech 14:6–21; Tob 13:16–17), its most novel feature is the absence of a temple. Ezekiel called the new Jerusalem 'The Lord is There' (48:35) and Zechariah declared the whole city as holy as the temple (14:20–1; cf. Isa 52:1), thus envisaging the whole city as the place of God's holy presence. But Revelation alone claims that the city needs no special place of God's presence, a temple, because it is wholly filled with God's immediate presence. Hence the city has no temple, but is a temple (v. 16b) or (putting the same point differently) God and the Lamb are its temple (v. 22). v. 23, cf. Isa 60:19–20. vv. 24–6, the city is both the light of the world by which the nations walk (cf. Isa 60:3), and the centre to which the nations and their kings come on pilgrimage (cf. Isa 2:2–3; 60:4–17; Zech 14:16). ('The kings of the earth', who until this point have been depicted throughout Revelation as hostile to God, are now shown acknowledging that their rule comes from God.) But whereas in Isa 60:5–17, it is the material wealth of the nations that is brought in tribute to Jerusalem, in Revelation the kings bring 'their glory' (v. 24) and the people 'the glory and honour of the nations' (v. 26). This contrasts with Babylon's self-indulgent exploitation of the wealth of her empire (18:11–14), but also continues the theme of glory that runs through the whole description from v. 11 onwards. The nations offer their own glory to God's glory, not thereby losing it, but acknowledging its source in the God to whom all glory and honour belong (cf. the doxologies: 4:11; 5:12, 13; 7:12). The most important single feature of the new Jerusalem is that it is creation enjoying the glory of God, glorified itself in reflecting God's glory, and glorifying God in returning glory to God. v. 27, since the whole city is a temple, full of the holy presence of God, everything unclean must be excluded (Isa 52:1): ritual uncleanness is no doubt here figurative for moral defilement. Idolatry and falsehood, also excluded from the temple (Ps 24:3–4), are the dominant evils of the beast and the dominant temptation of Christians in the beast's dominion.

(22:1–5) The Throne of God in the City v. 1, in another variation on the temple theme, the river of the water of life, which in Ezek 47:1 flows from the temple (cf. Zech 14:8), flows from the throne of God and the Lamb. The eternal life of the new creation has its source in God. v. 2, as in Ezek 47:12, the river nourishes constantly fruitful trees: Revelation identifies them with the paradisaical tree of life (Gen 2:9; 3:24). In the tree which bears twelve fruits (not specified in Ezekiel) and whose leaves heal the nations (not specified in Ezekiel) are combined the two strands of reference to the covenant people and to the nations. v. 3a, this sentence should be translated: 'there shall no longer be any ban of destruction', a quotation from Zech 14:11. The reference is not to what is cursed (and so is not repetitive of 21:27) but to the curse itself, the sacred ban which in the OT God places on enemies of his rule, requiring their utter destruction. This links with the end of v. 2: the nations who inhabit the new Jerusalem, healed of their idolatry and other sins by the leaves of the tree of life, will never again be subject to the destruction God decrees for those who oppose his rule. vv. 3b–5, the climax of the whole description of the city focuses on the central image of the whole book: the divine throne. In the earthly temple, the high priest, once a year, wore the sacred name of God on his forehead and entered God's immediate presence in the holy of holies. In the city which as a whole is God's eternal holy of holies, all will enjoy this immediacy without interruption. Especially they will see the face of God, which no one in this life could see and survive (Ex 33:20–3; Judg 6:22–3), but to see which is the deepest human religious aspiration, to be realized only beyond this mortal life (Ps 17:15; 1 Cor 13:12; cf. 2 Esd 7:98). Since the face expresses who someone is, to see God's face will be to know who God is in his personal being. In their access to God's presence the servants of God will be priests, but they will also be kings in that they will reign with him (cf. 1:6; 5:10; 2:21). God's kingdom turns out to be quite different from the beast's, finding its fulfilment not in the subjection of God's 'servants', but in their reigning with him. The point is not that they reign over others (who are not mentioned), but that God's rule over them is for them a participation in God's rule. The image of God's rule, thus finally stripped of all the associations of human rule, expresses the eschatological reconciliation of divine rule and human freedom.

(22:6–9) John and the Angel The close resemblances between this passage and 19:9–10 indicate that it concludes the account of the new Jerusalem, just as 19:9–10 concludes the account of Babylon. But the passage also contains strong echoes of 1:1–3, suggesting that it is the beginning of the epilogue to the book. In fact, it is designed for both functions. It is another example of John's literary practice of interweaving and overlapping the sections of his work. v. 6, whereas in 19:9b the corresponding words ('these are the true words of God') probably refer only to the beatitude in 19:9a, here they refer to the whole prophecy (God's revelation of 'what must soon take place', as in 1:1), and the angel (21:9) is revealed to be the angel of 1:1, who mediates the whole revelation to John. v. 7, Jesus' interjection announcing his imminent coming (cf. 2:16; 3:11; 22:12, 20) underlines the relevance and urgency of the whole revelation. The beatitude repeats that of 1:3. vv. 8–9, cf. 19:10.

Epilogue (22:10–21)

(22:10–11) The Angel's Instructions The epilogue, like the prologue, consists in a series of formally diverse units, of which the first (22:6–9) also serves as the conclusion of the preceding section. v. 10, the command contrasts with Dan 12:4, where Daniel, writing centuries before the last days of which he writes, is told to keep his prophecies secret until the time of the end. The contents of John's prophecy were once hidden in the sealed scroll (5:1) but they have now been revealed and written for immediate reading and relevance, since the time of their fulfilment is near. v. 11, this exhortation is problematic because Revelation has repeatedly called people to repentance, and probably still implies the possibility of repentance in vv. 14–15. While also echoing Dan 12:10, the verse is best understood by comparison with Ezek 3:27: 'let those who will hear, hear; and let those who refuse to hear, refuse'. Only as a figure of speech are those unwilling to hear commanded to refuse to hear; the point is that prophecy has a dual effect depending on people's response. Those unwilling to heed it are hardened in their adherence to evil. In a sense this is the punishment their sin itself produces (cf. Ezek 3:18– 19). The contrast of the two opposite cases—the already righteous who by heeding the prophecy remain righteous, and the already wicked who by refusing to heed increase their evil—makes an epigrammatic point, but does not exclude the two different cases of change from one category to the other (see Ezek 3:20; 33:12–16).

(22:12–13) A Prophetic Oracle At several points in the epilogue Jesus addresses the readers directly, speaking through the prophet, as he does in chs. 2–3 and 16:15. v. 12, the second clause echoes Isa 40:10, an announcement of YHWH's coming to judgement. For the principle of judgement according to deeds, see comment on 20:12. v. 13, see comments on 1:8; 21:6.

(22:14–15) Beatitude The last of the book's seven beatitudes appropriately takes up the imagery of the new Jerusalem, and specifies witness to the point of death (in the light of 7:14, this must be the meaning of 'wash their robes') as the condition of access to the city and its eternal blessings. Revelation writes as if all faithful Christians will suffer death for their witness, but this is its way of vividly dramatizing the situation of crisis that lies in the near future and in which no Christians can count on escaping death if they witness faithfully and refuse to participate in idolatry. The choice is potential martyrdom or remaining outside the new Jerusalem (v. 15). Cf. 21:8, 27. 'Dogs' (regarded as unclean animals with disgusting habits; cf. Prov 26:11; Isa 66:3; Mt 7:6; 2 Pet 2:22) are equivalent to the 'unclean' in 21:27.

(22:16) A Scriptural Testimony Jesus' self-description in the language of OT prophecy constitutes a scriptural testimony equivalent to 1:7 in the prologue to the book. Like the latter, the point is to cite prophetic expectations that the Messiah would bring the nations into God's kingdom. As in 5:5, the 'root of David' refers not to Isa 11:1 but to Isa 11:10: 'the root from Jesse shall stand as a signal to the peoples; the nations shall inquire of [or, seek] him'. (Revelation adds 'descendant' to make clear that the root is not that from which the Messiah comes (Isa 11:1) but the Messiah descended from David.) 'The bright morning star' alludes, like 2:28, to Num 24:17, but also and especially (as 'bright' indicates) to Isa 60:3: 'Nations shall come to your light, and kings to the brightness of your dawn' (whereas Isa 60:1–2 refers to the rising sun, this verse can easily be read as referring to the brightest of stars, the morning star that accompanies the sun's rising). Thus both the messianic titles allude to OT prophecies of the nations being drawn to the Messiah. In both the prologue and the epilogue of Revelation readers are reminded, by citation of prophecies with which the first readers would already be familiar as messianic texts applied by the church to Jesus, of this OT hope for the nations. The hope itself is not a new revelation, but the revelation given to John reveals, for the first time clearly, how it is to be fulfilled: through the church's witness to the nations to the point of death, following the way of the faithful witness, Jesus.

(22:17) Invitation to Come to the Water of Life It may be that the first two invitations to 'come' are addressed to Jesus (responding to v. 12 as v. 20b does to v. 20a) and the third to people, but perhaps more likely the threefold 'come' of Isa 55:1 is echoed and the three invitations to 'come' are all addressed to people, exhorting them to come to drink the water of life. The Spirit is probably here (as in 2:7, 11, 17, 29; 3:6, 13, 22; 14:13) speaking through Christian prophets (John and his colleagues), while the Bride is the church in her eschatological purity, ready for the coming of her husband the Lamb (cf. 19:7–8; 21:2). What the Spirit says is also the voice of the church as the church should be. Individual Christians who hear what the Spirit says (cf. the formula in the seven messages to the churches: ‘Let anyone who has an ear hear...’) repeat the invitation, thus identifying themselves with the Bride. The content of the invitation is then spelt out as an invitation to anyone and everyone who thirsts to take the water of life as a gift (echoing God’s words in 21:6b). The invitation combines the two levels of concern in Revelation: that Christians should be faithful witnesses and ‘conquer’, and that through their faithful witness the nations should turn to God. Here the water of life is offered to Christians, and also Christians are themselves exhorted to offer the water of life to everyone who thirsts. Whether this means that the eschatological gift of the water of life is available already in the present is hard to tell; such a usage would not be characteristic of Revelation (contrast Jn 4:10–15; 7:37–9) but cannot be ruled out.

(22:18–19) Warning to Preserve the Book’s Integrity Ancient books were often subject to revision, abbreviation, and expansion by scribes and editors, and the textual history of non-canonical Jewish and Christian apocalypses shows that such works were especially liable to be modified in such ways. But these verses also allude to Deut 4:1–2; 12:32, where the danger is of false prophets who maintain that idolatry is acceptable, thus both adding to God’s law a permission it does not give and at the same time effectively removing the law’s prohibitions of idolatry. It is clear from the seven messages to the churches both that compromise with idolatry is one of the dangers John’s prophecy aims to counter, and that there are false prophets and their followers in the churches with whom John’s prophecy would be highly unpopular for this reason. It is at this level of seriousness that we can understand the severe warnings against tampering with the integrity of the book (22:6). In their use of ‘add’ and ‘take away’ for both crime and punishment, they are examples of eschatological lex talionis (see comment on 11:18).

(22:20) A Prophetic Oracle and Response ‘These things’ must be the whole content of the book, alluding to 1:2. This is the last of the seven times in Revelation that Jesus says ‘I am coming’ (erchomai: cf. 2:5, 16; 3:11; 16:15; 22:7, 12). John responds with a solemn acceptance of Jesus’ word (‘Amen’) and prayer for his coming. The latter takes up in Greek the Aramaic prayer Maranatha (‘Our Lord, come!’: 1 Cor 16:22; Did. 10:6), which must have been in use from the earliest days of the church.

(22:21) Epistolary Ending This resembles the conclusion of most Pauline letters and corresponds to Revelation’s epistolary opening in 1:4–5a.

For further reading see Bibliographical Guide.

82. Extra-canonical early Christian literature

J. K. ELLIOTT

A. 1. The twenty-seven books that were eventually accepted as the foundation documents of Christianity were not the only early Christian texts to have been composed in the first or second century. There are clues within the NT itself to other early writings. Luke’s preface indicates that ‘many’ had attempted to compose gospel-type books; Col. 4:16 refers to a letter which Paul claims to have written to the Laodiceans; 1 Cor 5:9 and 2 Cor 7:8 probably refer to correspondence Paul had had with the church in Corinth in addition to the two surviving letters known to us as 1 and 2 Corinthians. All these texts have been lost. That some early Christian writings did not survive need not surprise us.

2. The amazing thing is that so much has survived, given the fact that early Christian writings, including those which were eventually to form the NT, were not composed as scripture and that many of these documents were addressed to a particular locality with a limited readership. The ecclesiastical authorities, east and west, who eventually (and certainly by the 4th cent.) agreed upon a list of authoritative writings (the canon) acceptable to the worldwide church, did so for a variety of reasons. But it seems certain that among the motives was the multiplicity of writings confronting Christians, particularly in the second to third centuries.

3. Gnosticism alone spawned a large number of writings in this period. The term is relatively recent and describes certain religious teachings which in their Christian guise were prominent in the second century. Its origin seems to have been in pagan circles but it spread rapidly throughout Christian centres. A major feature of the various Gnostic systems was that initiates could aspire, through secret revealed knowledge (gnosis), to the redemption of their divine character. Christian gnosis gave a central role to Jesus as an emissary of the supreme God. Some of these Gnostic texts are familiar to us nowadays, thanks to the discovery in 1945–6 of the Gnostic library at Nag Hammadi. Among that library is a collection of sayings (most of them attributed to Jesus) in the Gospel of Thomas. We return to that text at J.11–19.

4. Writings by Gnostics and other groups had a great influence on the beliefs of many early Christians. Orthodox authorities such as Irenaeus were concerned to remove the threat by restricting the circulation or acceptability of their literature. The decision to create a canon of Christian writings was due less to a desire to define an exclusive collection of early, apostolic, and universally approved books and more to a requirement to avoid dangerous texts which were new and heretical in the eyes of those who were later to be seen as the orthodox defenders of the faith.

5. Not all the texts that were excluded were in fact heretical or unorthodox. The writings that have conventionally been labelled as the ‘Apostolic Fathers’ (e.g. 1 and 2 Clement, the Didache, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Shepherd of Hermas) do not fall into this category. Nor should the bulk of the writings commonly collected together under the (less than ideal) title 'The Apocryphal New Testament' be dismissed en bloc as heretical.

6. 'Apocryphal' literally means 'hidden'. Few of the so-called apocryphal books merit this designation, although the Gospel of Thomas and the Acts of Andrew do claim to contain secret words or hidden truths. Books assembled into the category 'New Testament Apocrypha' usually include those texts which were written in imitation of the writings that were later accepted into the NT canon, i.e. gospels, epistles, acts, and apocalypses, although some 'apocryphal' texts are not paralleled in the NT itself. In any case, it is clearly anachronistic to use 'canonical' and 'apocryphal' or 'non-canonical' of texts written in the first two Christian centuries. It is also inappropriate to apply judgements about heresy and orthodoxy to the teaching in these 'apocryphal' texts. To do so is to use the language of the fourth-century Christian establishment with reference to literature that for the most part had been written and was circulating 200 years prior to the crystallizing of such attitudes.

7. Many of the apocryphal books originated in the second century. In several cases such texts are obviously secondary to, and influenced by, earlier works. However, as will be seen below, some of the texts that are now published as NT apocryphal writings may have been composed as early as the first century and therefore be contemporaneous with the NT writings proper. Indeed, some scholars argue for the independence of some of the so-called apocryphal texts (the Gospel of Peter, the Gospel of Thomas, Egerton Papyrus 2). In other words, some of these early writings may merit study as primary sources alongside those texts which were accepted into the canon.

8. But even if we disagree, and instead argue for a date later than the first century for all the extra-canonical writings, none the less material found in some of these texts could conceivably have had a long history. Possibly some of the stories and sayings about Jesus could have survived in the oral tradition over several generations, and have earthed themselves only in a second- to third-century writing; some stories and sayings may have been preserved in writing within texts that have subsequently disappeared but their past inclusion in a literary form may have helped to popularize them. It could be that that material then influenced later, currently extant documents. To argue along those lines means that one could be dealing with some Jesus material found in non-canonical sources, which is as old, as authentic, and as historically viable as that found within our NT. This applies especially to sayings and some deeds of Jesus in the apocryphal gospels.

9. When we turn to the apocryphal Acts a less controversial demarcation line is usually clear—they are second- to third-century novels merely using an apostle as their eponymous hero. The stories themselves, although bearing some relation to the genre of literature which we know from the Acts of the Apostles with its breathless sequence of stories, journeys, conversions, plots, and speeches, are in effect Christianized counterparts to the popular reading-matter of predominantly literate Roman believers. Parallels to these Christian novels are to be found in erotic pagan literature. We shall turn to the apocryphal Acts below, but, at the moment, it is sufficient to anticipate the conclusion set out in that section: namely that no scholar accepts their contents as a true record of the historical circumstances behind the first-century events which they purport to relate. But with the apocryphal gospels we must reckon with the possibility that some of the material—especially that to be seen in the fragmented texts—is either an alternative account of a story known elsewhere from the canonical gospels or a new story that could in theory have fitted comfortably within a canonical gospel. 'Apocryphal' in its popular definition as 'secondary' or 'spurious' does not necessarily apply in such cases. It may well be decided that some of these stories are as authentic and as historical as the canonical accounts.

10. The writings themselves, even if they are accepted as historically plausible, cannot, of course, be canonical—the canon was an entity firmly fixed historically from the fourth century and applied to the twenty-seven books of the NT. Literature falling outside those twenty-seven cannot by definition be canonical, however authentic or original to the Jesus story it may be considered. Conversely all the stories and sayings that occur in a NT MS would have been accepted as canonical even when modern textual critics decide that a saying or story found in only part of the MS tradition did not belong to the original author's published text. For example, Codex Bezae adds after Lk 6:4: 'The same day, seeing a certain man working on the sabbath, he said to him, "Man, if indeed you know what you are doing, happy are you; but if not, you are accursed and a transgressor of the law."' The pericope of the Adulteress, found in some MSS in John's and in Luke's gospel, would have been accepted as canonical by the original readers of those MSS, but the story is absent from other MSS. Users of these shorter MSS would be unaware of this pericope as part of the canonical texts they read. Similarly, the verses at the end of Mark beyond Mk 16:8 are disputed in the MS tradition. Readers of NT MSS, which contain the additional verses, would accept these as part of the canonical Gospel of Mark. If such secondary material is found in a perfectly orthodox copy of the scriptures then for those who owned, used, and read that MS its entire contents were, by definition, canonical. Ancient commentators who pronounced on the canonical status of the NT books did not concern themselves with the differences—sometimes quite significant differences—that existed between MSS. The Gospel according to Mark was commended without it being specified if 'Mark' was to be understood as containing 16:9–20 or not. Even Origen and Jerome, who were alert to textual variation, did not comment on such matters in the context of commending or rejecting certain Christian books.

11. Most of the differences that are readily observed when one compares the NT in the AV (KJV) and the RV (or most modern English versions) obviously concern English style, language, and usage, but there are a significant number of other changes which are due to the differences in the Greek NT used by the translators. And those textual differences are due to differences in the underlying Greek MSS used by the editors of the printed testament.

12. By contrast, paradoxically, material that we may now wish to pronounce as authentic in an apocryphal source can never be canonical. This issue is acute when we turn to the Gospel of Thomas (1.11–19), which is probably the best-known of the apocryphal texts in modern times.

13. There is a considerable body of sayings of Jesus that may be collected from patristic writings, biblical MSS, and from apocryphal sources which are not paralleled in the NT. Such sayings are commonly called 'agrapha', that is, sayings 'not written' in the NT itself. As well as the saying in Codex Bezae found after Lk 6:4 (quoted in A.10 above), some other famous agrapha are: 'Be competent money-changers' (in Clement of Alexandria, Stromateis, 1.28.177), and 'Ask for the great things, and God will add to you what is small' (ibid. 1.24.158). Agrapha illustrate the growth of tradition and the accretion of legend. Some may represent early tradition, which may be authentic; some result from false attribution (e.g. 1 Cor 2:9 appears as a saying of Jesus in the Gospel of Thomas, 17); some, embedded in apocryphal works, may have been composed ad hoc for the work concerned (and would have no claim to authenticity).

14. But, for the most part, all the extra-canonical sayings and the apocryphal literature that has survived are later than, derivative from, and secondary to the twenty-seven writings that were to form the NT canon of scripture.

In this section we divide the texts into two categories: the early Christian extra-canonical writings, known as the Apostolic Fathers, and the writings of the so-called NT apocrypha.

THE APOSTOLIC FATHERS

B. 1. Under this title are normally included: 1 Clement, 2 Clement, Epistles of Ignatius, Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians, Didache (Epistle of) Barnabas, Shepherd of Hermas, and Fragments of Papias. (At one time the Epistle to Diognetus used to be included.)

2. The term 'Apostolic Fathers', which was not used in antiquity of these writings, implies that the author was an acquaintance of the apostles but did not belong to their number. Clement and Hermas are said to have been disciples of Paul. Polycarp is said to have been a disciple of John. The Didache claims to reflect the teaching of the twelve apostles.

3. The texts discussed first are the Didache and Barnabas (Barn.). The former contains some first-century material, and has significant parallels with the New Testament; the latter is an example of a Christian text from a period slightly later than the NT. We shall refer later to three other texts, 1 and 2 Clement and the Shepherd of Hermas, because they seem to have been considered worthy contenders for inclusion in the canon in the fourth century. Mention will also be made of the letters by Ignatius.

4. Unlike the texts included in the apocryphal NT, in which the characters of the NT proper reappear, typically in scenes that fill in gaps in the traditional stories, the Apostolic Fathers are concerned not with events set in the time of the NT narratives but with issues of common pastoral concern at their time of composition, such as morality and church order.

5. Several writings among the Apostolic Fathers (by Clement, Barnabas, Polycarp, and Ignatius) are letters. This form of writing is relatively rare in the apocryphal NT. (See Q.1–6.)

The Didache

C. 1. Among the Apostolic Fathers is the Didache (or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, and the Teaching of the Lord through the Twelve Apostles to the Gentiles). It is a short manual of church discipline prefaced by a section on morals. The only complete extant Greek MS is from the eleventh century, and this was rediscovered only in 1873. Its publication in 1883 by P. Bryennios generated great interest. Since then a fourth-century Greek fragment (P. Oxy. 1782 containing Did. 1:3b–4; 2:7b–3:2a) has come to light and this helps prove that the Didache was known in Egypt by that time. The Greek Apostolic Constitutions, which shows knowledge of the Didache, also comes from fourth-century Egypt. Knowledge of it by Irenaeus (c.130–c.200 CE) is not proven. A Latin version also exists. Material in the Didache, especially the section known as the Two Ways (Did. 1–6) is also found in Barnabas (see below). Mutual dependence of these two texts is unlikely; at the very least this material in common proves only that that section antedates the composition of both works.

2. Date and Provenance. The general scholarly consensus is that the Didache, which is a composite work, was compiled in the form we now have in the Bryennios MS in the first half of the second century from several sources, some of which are likely to go back to the first century. Its provenance is unknown but the consensus is that it was composed in Syria, perhaps in or near Antioch, given the strong links between the Didache and the Matthean tradition. The community which preserved and used the Didache seems to have been strongly Jewish—the passage about the Two Ways, the food regulations, the fasts, and the table prayers are all suggestive of such a background. Some hold that it is the product of a branch of the early church antagonistic to the liberal, Pauline, pro-Gentile approach to Christianity.

3. Influence. The Didache seems to have been very influential, as may be seen by its use not only in the Didascalia Apostolorum and the Apostolic Constitutions, where it forms the basis of Book 7, but also in the Ecclesiastical Canons of the Apostles or the Apostolic Church Order traditions in Ethiopic. The traditions embedded in the Didache are also seen in the Latin Doctrina (Apostolorum) from the ninth century and in Coptic and in Georgian. Various patristic writers, such as Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.25.4, and Athanasius, Festal Letter, 39.11, knew of it, as does the seventh-century Catalogue of the Sixty Books. This latter and the fourth-century list behind the Stichometry of Nicephorus refer to a writing called the Teaching (or Teachings) of the Apostles, but it is not clear if the Didache is meant. The teaching known to Nicephorus is only 200 stichoi in length, which makes that writing shorter than the present Didache.

4. The Didache and the Bible. OT citations in the Didache (Mal 1:11, 14 in Did. 14.3, and Zech 14:5 in Did. 16.7, and possibly Sir 7:22; 12:1 in Did. 1.6) are introduced by special formulae. Did. 1.6, 'as has been said'; 14.3, 'For this is what the Lord [= God] was referring to'; 16.7, 'As was said'. In the case of the passages in the Didache which parallel a NT passage no such introductory formula is found. Did. 1.3, 'Here is the teaching'; 2.1, 'The second commandment of the teaching is'. The word 'gospel' occurs in Did. 8.2; 11.3; 15.3 but is unlikely to refer to a written source. There are no citations at those points; the reference is to teaching by Jesus.

5. However, the following are noteworthy: Did. 9.5, 'For the Lord [presumably Jesus] also spoke concerning this: "Do not give what is holy to dogs."' This echoes Mt 7:6. Did. 8.1–2, 'Let your fasts not [coincide] with those of the hypocrites. They fast on Monday and Thursday; you, though, should fast on Wednesday and Friday. And do not pray as the hypocrites [do].’ This links teaching found embedded in Mt 6:5 and 6:16, but the Didache’s use of the teaching differs from that in Matthew’s gospel. The Didache is concerned with the establishment of distinctively Christian fasts. There is early evidence that Christians did fast on Wednesdays and Fridays. This was to contrast with Pharisaic fasts on Mondays and Thursdays. Mt 6:5 gives details of how hypocrites pray and how Jesus’ followers are to pray. Mt 6:16 is concerned with the manner in which hypocrites fast, and not with the days on which they fast.

6. Other links between the Didache and the NT are disputed. Some scholars argue that the author of the Didache knew and used the canonical gospels. Mt 5:39–47 is said to be behind the interpolated section Did. 1.3b–2.1, but some of the verses parallel the Lucan version (Lk 6:27–33)—see DID. 1.3b–2.1—and it may well be that the parallels are not due to direct literary dependence but to the oral tradition, or even to a harmonized form of the canonical writings.

7. There are further links elsewhere which show tenuous parallels with the NT, for example Did. 3.7 (Mt. 5:5); 11:7 (Mk 3:28–9); 14:2 (Mt 5:23–4). These are not strongly suggestive of direct literary dependence. As far as the Matthean parallels are concerned, the link is probably with the material Matthew found in his own source—in other words is from the Matthean additions to his framework (e.g. 3.7, ‘On the contrary, be mild tempered, since those who are mild tempered will inherit the land’). This has encouraged some to look for links with the source Q itself rather than with Q in Matthew or in Luke.

8. Commentary.

1:1–6:3 contains the passage generally known as the Two Ways. In it are described the Way of Life and the Way of Death. This has interesting parallels to a similar section in Barn 18–20.1, although the Didache adds the saying in 1.3b–2.1 and also 3.1–6 in which certain attitudes and activities are prohibited in order to facilitate the keeping of the law, and also to the Doctrina Apostolorum, the Apostolic Constitutions, and the Epitome of the Canons of the Holy Apostles, although in Barnabas and the Doctrina a dualistic eschatological framework is in evidence. This whole moral section, whatever its origin (and many see the whole Two Ways tradition as originally Jewish because there are parallels in Qumran), is set here in Did. 7.1 in the context of pre-baptismal instruction and thus it may well give a clear idea about second- and maybe even first-century practice. (Possibly ch. 7 refers to an annual baptismal rite, during which the familiar Two Ways passage was recited. Such a rite would have taken place at the paschal festival.)

(1.3b–2.1) We now turn to the interpolated section:

3b. Bless those who curse you and pray for your enemies, fast for those who persecute you. What kind of favour is it when you love those who love you? Do not even the gentiles do that? Love those who hate you and you will not have any enemy. 4. Avoid the fleshly and bodily passions. If someone strikes you on your right cheek, turn your other one to him too, and you will be perfect. If someone presses you into one mile of service go along with him for two. If someone takes your cloak, give him your tunic as well. If someone takes away from you what is yours, do not demand it back since you cannot do so anyway. 5. Give to everyone what he asks of you, and do not ask for it back, for the Father wants people to share with everyone the gifts that have been freely granted to them. Blessed is the person who gives according to the commandment, for he is guiltless. Alas for the person who takes. If someone takes something because he is in need, he is guiltless, but if he is not in need, he shall have to defend his reason for taking it and the use for which he intends it: if he is imprisoned, he shall be interrogated about what he has done, and he shall not go free until he has paid back the last penny. 6. But it has also been said about this sort of thing, ‘Let your charitable gift sweat in your hands until you know to whom you are giving it.’ [‘The second commandment of the teaching’ (in 2:1) then introduces the list of commandments taken from the traditional Two Ways material.]

The NT apocryphon P. Oxy. 1224 also seems to know the tradition found in Did. 1.3b referring to prayer for enemies. This fragment, dating from the fourth century, could have come from an unknown apocryphal gospel. The appearance of this saying in these two sources implies a wide tradition for preserving aphorisms attributed to Jesus, although the Didache does not cite the words as coming from Jesus or even from the NT.

Did. 1.3b–2.1 is not found in parallels to the Two Ways tradition (in Barnabas or elsewhere). The verses interrupt the section 1.2–2.2 and are likely to be an interpolation by the Didachist from his sources. The material is more likely to be from an earlier independent tradition rather than to have come directly from the canonical parallels. The wording and sequence are not precisely those in Matthew or Luke, and may best be seen as an oral retelling of the instructions preserved in these or, more probably, due to the independent continuation of the earlier oral material. Did. 1.5 has a different context from Mt 5:26: in Matthew the saying is concerned with repaying debts; in the Didache the reverse is true—no debts should be incurred, unless they cannot be avoided.

(Chs. 7–15) The whole of the Didache seems to have been influenced by liturgical practice. Chs. 7–15 give instruction on baptism (ideally by total immersion but also by affusion), fasting (on Wednesdays and Fridays), prayer, and eucharist. For the community responsible for the Didache baptism seems to have been eschatological rather than specifically Christological, although the baptism involves a trinitarian formula reminiscent of Mt 28:19 when the risen Jesus enjoins his disciples to make disciples by baptizing them into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. First- and second-century practice seems not to have been uniform. Compared with those examples of the use of a trinitarian formula, one notes that Thecla’s auto-baptism (itself a unique act) is in Christ’s name only (Acts of Paul, 34). In the Acts of the Apostles baptism is likewise into the name of Jesus.

8.2–3 contains a version of the Lord’s Prayer, introduced with the words: ‘Let us pray as the Lord [i.e. Jesus] commanded in his gospel.’ This version is closer to the longer Matthean version rather than the apocoped Lucan form, but the wording in the Didache is not identical with Matthew’s text:

2. Our Father in heaven, May your name be acclaimed as holy, May your kingdom come, May your will come to pass on earth as it does in heaven. Give us today our bread for the morrow, And cancel for us our debt As we cancel [debts] for those who are indebted to us, And do not bring us into temptation, But preserve us from evil [or, from the evil one]. For power and glory are yours forever.

3. Pray this way three times a day.

In any case, the Matthean form—and indeed the Lukan—are subject to a complex series of text-critical variants, in which MSS of Matthew may be seen to be assimilating the text to that in Luke, and MSS of Luke to that in Matthew (e.g. the tense of the verb in ‘as we forgive [cancel]’ in Mt 6:12/Lk 11:4 and cf. Did. 8.2). Other variants, not of a harmonizing character, may also be seen within the complex textual witnesses to the Lord’s Prayer. This activity reveals the volatility of the tradition and its susceptibility to liturgical influences and perhaps also to the influence of Marcion. Certainly, in the form of the Lord’s Prayer as transmitted in the Bryennios MS of the Didache the prayer is close to, but not identical with, the longer forms of the prayer in Mt. 6:9–13; e.g. in the concluding doxology the Didache has only ‘power’ and ‘glory’ and omits ‘kingdom’: these three nouns are found in the MSS reading the longer ending in Mt 6:13. Among other differences, note ‘debt’ in the Didache rather than Matthew’s ‘debts’. Both versions seem to have been influenced by the liturgy.

(Chs. 9–10) Two eucharistic prayers are significant, one in ch. 9, the other in ch. 10, and are important to our understanding of early Christian practice. Ch. 9:

1. As for thanksgiving, give thanks this way. 2. First, with regard to the cup: We thank you, our Father, for the holy vine of David your servant which you made known to us through Jesus your servant. To you be glory forever. 3. And with regard to the loaf: We thank you, our Father, for the life and knowledge, which you made known to us through Jesus your servant. To you be glory forever. 4. As this loaf lay scattered upon the mountains and became a single fragment when it had been gathered, may your church be gathered into your kingdom from the ends of the earth. For glory and power are yours, through Jesus Christ, forever. 5. But let no one eat or drink from your Eucharist except those who are baptized in the Lord’s name. For the Lord also has spoken concerning this: ‘Do not give what is holy to dogs’ [Mt 7:6].

Ch. 10:

1. When you have had your fill, give thanks this way: 2. We thank you, holy Father, for your holy name, which you made dwell in our hearts, and for the knowledge and faith and immortality, which you made known to us through Jesus your servant. To you be glory forever. 3. You, almighty Lord, created all things for the sake of your name, and you gave food and drink to human beings for enjoyment, so that they would thank you. But you graced us with spiritual food and drink and eternal life through Jesus, your servant. 4. Above all, we thank you, Lord, because you are powerful. To you be glory forever. 5. Be mindful, Lord, of your church, to preserve it from all evil, and to perfect it in your love. And, once it is sanctified, gather it from the four winds into the kingdom which you have prepared for it. For power and glory are yours forever. 6. May grace come, and may this world pass by. Hosanna to the God of David! If anyone is holy, let him come. If anyone is not, let him repent. Our Lord, come! Amen. 7. But permit the prophets to give thanks as they see fit. 8. And concerning the ointment, give thanks as follows: 9. We thank you, Father, for the fragrant ointment which you have made known to us through Jesus your servant. Glory to you forever. Amen.

Among noteworthy features is the order of the wine before the bread (cf. the shorter text in Lk 22:17–19a). The eucharist seems to be a freestanding rite; in some early Christian gatherings, such as Paul describes in the Corinthian correspondence, the eucharist was celebrated at the conclusion of a communal meal.

Did. 9.2 presumably tries to connect Jesus with his Davidic, Messianic, origins, the strange image of the vine here being suggested by the context. The significance of the gathering of the grain to make the loaf in 9:4 also comes from a eucharistic context and perhaps echoes Jn 6:12 or, more generally, the unifying of the church implicit in the conclusion to the stories of the miraculous feedings. 9:5 clearly refers to a eucharist, making it less likely that chs. 9–10 refer to an agape (several scholars have suggested it does, encouraged, perhaps, by the absence of references here to body and blood). The eucharistic interpretation is encouraged by the argument that the context of chs. 9–10 (and 1–10 as a whole) is that of the annual baptism-eucharist ceremony.

The thanksgiving prayer in ch. 10 addresses God as ‘holy Father’, which may be compared with Jn 17:11 (itself from the liturgical section, Jn 15–17, which takes place in the upper room and begins with the True Vine discourse). Links with the Johannine tradition are not, however, a prominent feature of the Didache.

10.2–9 can be seen as antiphonal. To emphasize the participatory nature of the prayer the Coptic tradition here adds ‘Amen’ three times. Also in these verses can be seen echoes of the Lord’s Prayer. This suggests either a direct borrowing by the originators of this prayer or that the Didachist and Jesus merely share the same understanding of topics to be put on the agenda for prayer, which is perhaps all that the Paternoster itself is. Comparable echoes are to be found in the Gethsemane story in the NT.

The prayer over oil (or incense) in 10.8 is found only in the Coptic; it is not in the Greek. The use of incense or oil is well established in varying religious traditions. In the NT, of course, its use is primarily connected with the anointing of Jesus in the Bethany episode (which was, perhaps, a coronation, or at least a Messiah-making event), or with the burial of Jesus. Anointing of the sick with oil is found in Jas 5:14, and oil was used in the mysterious rite known as ‘sealing’, which is referred to on several occasions in the second-century apocryphal Acts (e.g. Acts of Andrew, 10; Acts of Paul, 25; Acts of Thomas, 27).

(Chs. 11–15) In the later parts of the Didache there are also instructions about travelling prophets, bishops, and deacons. References to itinerant preachers (chs. 13–14) as well as to a settled ministry (ch. 15), and the relation of these preachers to the bishops and deacons are obviously of supreme importance to church historians interested in tracing the growth of church discipline and organization. This section in the Didache encourages biblical scholars to make comparisons with passages such as 1 Tim. 3:2–13; Titus 1:5–9; and Phil 1:1. Particularly noteworthy is Did. 13:

1. And every true prophet who wishes to settle among you deserves his food. 2. Similarly, a true teacher also deserves, like the labourer, his food [cf. Mt 10:10b]. 3. So when you [sing.] take any firstfruits of what is produced by the wine press and the threshing floor, by cows and by sheep, you [sing.] shall give the firstfruits to the prophets, for they are your [pl.] high priests. 4. If, however you [pl.] have no prophet, give [them] to the poor. 5. If you [sing. in vv. 5–7] make bread, take the firstfruits and give them according to the commandment. 6. Likewise, when you open a jar of wine or oil, take the firstfruits and give them to the prophets. 7. Take the firstfruits of money and clothing and whatever else you own as you think best and give them according to the commandment.

Prophets and teachers in the Didache are the real successors to the apostles—it is they who receive the firstfruits. Teachers are worthy of their hire, just as the apostles are in Mt 10:10. The historic and hierarchical order, apostles–prophets–teachers, is reminiscent of 1 Cor 12:28 (cf. also Eph 4:11).

Ch. 15 is likely to be one of the most recently composed sections of the work because we have here instructions for a settled ministry of bishops and deacons (presbyters are not mentioned). The precise social context in which such issues would have been relevant for the church are not self-evident.

(Ch. 16) is an eschatological appendix with teaching about the Antichrist (in v. 4) and the second coming (in vv. 7–8, assuming ‘the Lord’ there to be Jesus). There are links with Mt 24 (and parallels) but there are differences in both content and language. There are also other links with the eschatological passages in 1 Thess 4:12–5:13 and elsewhere in the NT, suggesting a common Jewish-Christian background. The apocryphal Apocalypse of Peter in Ethiopic begins with an eschatological passage that also has close parallels with Did. 16, including the sign-working deceiver, the cross preceding the Lord as he comes, the regal procession, and judgement.

1. Keep vigil over your life. Let your lamps not go out and let your loins not be ungirded but be ready for you do not know the hour at which our Lord is coming. 2. You shall assemble frequently, seeking what pertains to your souls, for the whole time of your belief will be of no profit to you unless you are perfected at the final hour. 3. For in the final days false prophets and corruptors will be multiplied, and the sheep will turn into wolves, and love will turn into hate. 4. As lawlessness increases, they will hate and persecute and betray one another, and at that time the one who leads the world astray will appear as a son of God and will work signs and wonders, and the earth will be given into his hands and he will do godless things which have never been done since the beginning of time. 5. Then human creation will pass into the testing fire and many will fall away and perish but those who persevere in their belief will be saved by the curse itself. 6. and then the signs of truth will appear, first, the sign spread out in heaven, next, the signal of the trumpet call, and third, resurrection of the dead—7. not of all the dead but, as it has been said, ‘The Lord will come and all the holy ones with him.’ 8. Then the world will see the Lord coming upon the clouds of heaven.

Bibliography: Wengst (1984); Niederwimmer (1993); Rordorf and Tuilier (1978); Tuckett (1989); Draper (1996); the Greek text of the Didache with an ET is found in Lake (1912–13: i. 308–33). A full bibliography of works on the Didache from about 1900 to 90 is found in Jefford (1995).

The Epistle of Barnabas

D. 1. The Didache and Barnabas have much in common. Both were written about the same time, both are found in the Bryennios MS, and, most significantly, both contain the passage about the Two Ways, which naturally raises the questions whether the Didache copied it from Barnabas or whether Barnabas found it in the Didache. (The common solution to the interrelationship of these passages is to say that the section containing the Two Ways came to both authors independently.) Both works are examples of an evolved literature, preserving and transmitting traditions. But whereas the Didache is a catechetical work aimed at initiates, Barnabas is aimed at reclaiming Jewish Christians, who were in danger of returning to Judaism.

2. Summary of contents:

Ch. 1: Introduction

2.1–16.10: The correct interpretation of the (Jewish) scriptures.

chs. 2–3: The Lord does not require sacrifice and fasting; these have been superseded by the sacrifice of Jesus.

ch. 4: Warnings about the coming judgement.

chs. 5–6: Why the Lord suffered in the flesh.

chs. 7–8: The Lord’s suffering paralleled in the scapegoat and the red heifer.

chs. 9–10: Circumcision explained.

chs. 11–12: The OT tells us about baptism, the cross, the crucifixion, and Jesus.

chs. 13–14: Covenant explained.

ch. 15: Sabbath explained.

ch. 16: The temple explained as the presence of God in believers.

17.1–18.1a: Transitional passage.

18.1b–20: The Two Ways passage.

ch. 21: Conclusion.

3. Author. The work is anonymous—the author is unknown, but early tradition attributed it to Barnabas. He is likely to have been a Gentile Christian if the reference in 16.7 to a time ‘before we believed in God’ is allowed its plain meaning. Others see him as a Jewish Christian: there are several Jewish elements in the writing, and he is familiar with Jewish law, ritual, and sacrifices. The Two Ways passage was probably originally Jewish. The author was certainly familiar with various methods of Jewish interpretation such as haggadah, midrash, and Halakah. Even if the author was not a Jewish Christian, he was obviously aware of, and had access to, Jewish traditions.

4. The author compiled his letter from several previously existing traditions. The epistle is an evolved piece of literature, but that does not mean that the tradition is more important than the redactor. There is a certain lack of coherence and consistency in the letter, but it is not as lacking in overall direction as a first reading might suggest. The author is more than a mere compiler—he has an overall theological plan, in which his main Tendenz is an anti-Jewish slant imposed by him on his sources.

5. Early Recognition. Clement of Alexandria quotes Barnabas as ‘scripture’. There are seven citations in Clement of Alexandria’s Stromateis 2 and 5 from Barnabas. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 6.14.1, says Clement, Hypotyposeis (now lost), included commentary on Barnabas (and Jude with the other Catholic epistles and the Apocalypse of Peter). Origen refers to Barnabas as a Catholic epistle (c. Cels. 1.63 citing Barn. 5.9). Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 6.13.6–14.1 places Barnabas among the ‘disputed’ writings; 3.25.4 has it among the ‘spurious’ writings.

Jerome, De Vir. Ill. 6, refers to the Didache and Barnabas as ‘apocryphal’. He cites Barn. 8.2 in In Ezek. 43.19; Barn. 5.9 is quoted (as in Origen) in Adv. Pel. 3.2, although Origen misattributed it to Ignatius. The canonical list in Codex Claromontanus refers to the Epistle of Barnabas but possibly the Epistle to the Hebrews, lacking in that catalogue, is meant. The Catalogue of the Sixty Books calls Barnabas ‘apocryphal’, and the Stichometry of Nicephorus labels it ‘disputed’.

6. Text. The letter survives in Greek and Latin. The Greek MSS containing it are the biblical Codex Sinaiticus of the fourth century and Codex Hierosolymitanus (or Constantino-politanus), the eleventh-century MS discovered by Bryennios and published by him in 1883. Bryennios' MS, already referred to above in connection with the Didache, contains, in addition to the Didache and Barnabas, 1 and 2 Clement, Chrysostom's Synopsis of the OT and NT (incomplete), and the long recension of Ignatius' letters (see 1.1–2).

Its appearance in Codex Sinaiticus shows that in the fourth century its canonical status was considered a possibility. Barnabas occurs immediately after Revelation without a break—it is not in a separate appendix. The fact that Barnabas is found (together with the Shepherd of Hermas) in this biblical MS suggests the scribe copied it (and the Shepherd) as if they were of equal status with the preceding books. In addition there is a family of Greek MSS, the oldest being eleventh century, in which Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians, 9.2, is followed directly by Barnabas 5.7. In an ancestor of this family, a scribe obviously carelessly omitted the end of Polycarp and the beginning of Barnabas and thereby accidentally combined the two works in this way. The epistle is also found in a ninth- to tenth-century Latin MS (Codex Corbeiensis), now in St Petersburg. This MS ends at ch. 17, and thus omits the passage about the Two Ways, raising the questions whether the Latin omitted that section from an earlier, longer version or whether the Greek tradition interpolated the section from another source into a form of Barnabas comparable to that now known to us only in the Latin version.

7. Provenance. Barnabas was probably intended for a community in which Jewish Christians were in contact with Jews, although the precise locality in which it was written, or to which it was addressed, is not clear. Alexandria is a strong possibility, but, because the Two Ways passage has parallels with the Manual of Discipline from Qumran (1QS 3:13–4:28), some seek a place of composition east of Alexandria itself.

8. Date. The question of the date of Barnabas hinges on two passages, 4.4–5 and 16.3–4.

4.4–5:

And the prophet speaks thus: Ten kingdoms will reign on the earth. And afterward there will arise a little king, who will humiliate three of the kingdoms simultaneously. Similarly, Daniel says concerning the same one: And I saw the fourth beast, wicked and powerful and more dangerous than all the beasts of the sea; and ten horns sprouted from him, and from them budded a little offshoot of a horn; and it humiliated three of the great horns simultaneously.

There is a wide diversity of views on the interpretation of these verses. It has sometimes been concluded that the ten kings seem to lead up to Trajan, with Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian as the three humbled emperors; the 'little horn' is then seen here as Nero Redivivus, who will be subdued by the returning Jesus. Thus a date in Hadrian's reign (117–138 CE) is required for this interpretation.

16.3–4:

Furthermore, he says again: Behold, those who tore down this Temple will themselves build it. It is happening. Because of their fighting it was torn down by the enemies. And now the very servants of the enemies will themselves rebuild it.

If the reference is to a literal temple (and that is by no means certain) then we need a date prior to 132, when Hadrian built a Roman temple on the site of the Jerusalem temple.

The outer limits for the date of composition thus seem to be 117 CE and 132 CE. But if Nerva (96–8 CE) is to be identified as the little horn, this could mean that the letter was composed in his short but benign reign. His favourable attitude to Judaism could well have been responsible for the rumour that the temple would be rebuilt.

In so far as Barnabas is a composite work, there is the possibility that some of the material is of varying dates, hence it would be unwise to date it by any one piece of evidence; moreover its use of stock apocalyptic imagery makes it unreliable to pinpoint precise historical events.

9. Teaching. Whatever date is agreed upon, it is clear that the motivation for the writing of Barnabas was a resurgence of confidence in Judaism, perhaps fuelled by or even responsible for a belief that the Jerusalem temple would be rebuilt. This confidence was felt by the author of Barnabas to be destabilizing the Christian community. There was a temptation that some Christians (presumably of Jewish origin) would relapse into Judaism, and they needed reminding about the relationship of Judaism and Christianity, the role and purpose of the Jewish law, and the place of Christian ethics.

10. Gnosis. is a key term throughout the letter, but this is not a Gnostic work as commonly understood. The gnosis here refers to special insights; it is not an unorthodox, speculative Gnosticism. It may be divided into exegetical and ethical gnosis. Exegetical gnosis, especially of OT events, gives the 'correct' understanding of salvation history—the interpretation of scripture is the central focus of the writing. Chs. 2.1–16.10 give a spiritualized understanding of the OT. Ethical gnosis means right conduct (in the Two Ways passage), that is, the correct understanding of the Lord's requirements for ethical behaviour.

11. Barnabas makes a significant contribution to our understanding of Christianity at the end of the first and, probably, the beginning of the second centuries. Carleton Paget (1994: 264) writes: 'The survival of the Epistle of Barnabas is fortuitous, for it serves to remind all students of Early Christianity of the incomplete and fragmentary nature of what we know about this subject, and can, along with other extra-canonical texts, have the salutary effect of subverting glib reconstructions of Christian origins.'

12. The message of Barnabas is that Christians need to reassert their independence—it is they who are the true people of the Covenant. This reflects concerns similar to those of Paul several decades previously. For Paul the church was in the new age of the Spirit, Judaism had had a place in the history of salvation but, since the coming of Christ, the period of the law now belonged only to the old dispensation. For Barnabas the relevance of the God-given law is differently interpreted: it had always been incorrectly understood by Jews. Using his particular exegetical gnosis the author shows how, in particular, circumcision, covenant, sabbath observance, and the temple should have been interpreted, and using allegorical and other interpretative methods gives several examples of right understanding.

13. A good example of this is ch. 9, on circumcision. Its symbolic significance is emphasized; true circumcision is obedience. Little in this chapter is distinctively Christian until we reach the closing section. The symbolic significance of numbers (gematria) is important in much Jewish writing. Here it is applied to the name of Jesus and to the cross:

Learn, then, abundantly concerning everything, children of love, for when Abraham first gave circumcision, he circumcised while looking forward in the spirit to Jesus, and he received the teachings of the three letters. For it says: And Abraham circumcised the men of his household [Gen. 17:23], 18 and 300 in number [Gen. 14:14]. What, then, is the gnosis which was given him? Learn! For a distinction is made in that the 18 comes first, then it says 300. Now the (number) 18 (is represented by two letters), J = 10 and E = 8—thus you have “JE,” the abbreviation for “Jesus.” And because the cross, represented by the letter T (= 300), was destined to convey special significance it also says 300. He makes clear, then, that Jesus is symbolized by the two letters (JE 18), while in the one letter (T 300) is symbolized the cross. He who placed the implanted gift of his teaching in us knows! No one has learned from me a more trustworthy lesson! But I know that you are worthy.

In the second century the pagan Lucian mentions (in Judicum Vocalium, 12) that the cross is constructed in the form of a T and ‘is so named by men’.

14. Throughout, Barnabas teaches that the New Israel is Christianity and that the OT had always been a Christian book. The Jews had got their own traditions wrong. The Jewish literal interpretation of the law was due to the devices of an evil angel, who had deceived Jews. This unusual approach demonstrates the distinctiveness of this letter, and probably ensured its preservation, success, and popularity. It survived in the MS tradition over several centuries, and was quoted (particularly by Egyptian fathers), respected, and venerated as one new way of looking at a perennial problem in early Christianity—the relationship of Christianity and Judaism. Other approaches differed. Marcion, for example, simply jettisoned the OT. The canonical Hebrews speaks of two covenants, and of the supremacy of the new over the old—the old dispensation was only temporary, whereas Christ’s atoning sacrifice is eternal.

15. There are thirteen references to suffering in the epistol which have led some to suggest that Barnabas could have been a document (like 1 Peter, or Melito’s Paschal Homily) written for and read at a paschal feast, when the whole redemptive work attributed to Christ (his death, resurrection, ascension, and parousia) would have been recalled and recited. Barnabas is closer to being a paschal homily than a baptismal liturgy. The explicit references to baptism at 6.11, 14; 11.1–11; 16.8 would have been particularly appropriate, especially as the theme of death and resurrection is often associated with baptism, for instance as in Rom 6:1–14. Like the Didache, Barnabas probably originated at the annual baptismal-eucharistic paschal feast.

16. Among other main themes are that the day of judgement is close, that salvation lies in the future and that Christ, who had been pre-existent, suffered and died in the flesh to purify a once sinful people. Only he makes possible a correct interpretation of the Scriptures. All of this is justified by an appeal to Scripture (i.e. the OT) not to Jesus’ sayings. Christ is expected as the judge at the end-time.

17. Barnabas and the NT. Barn. 4.14 knows the words found in Mt 22:14: ‘When you note that great signs and wonders were performed in Israel but that [the Jews] have been abandoned, let us take heed lest we be found to be, as it is written,

“many called but few chosen”.’ However, there is little support for the idea that the author had the written, canonical gospel in mind. It is more likely that he was familiar with the saying from the oral tradition. Similarly the references to Jesus’ imbibing gall and vinegar on the cross (Barn. 7.3, 5) are also likely to have reached him from oral tradition. Barn. 5.9 (the verse known to Origen and Jerome) parallels Mk 2.17, calling sinners to repentance; 6.6 perhaps knows the passage about the casting of lots for Jesus’ garments; 5.12 quotes the passage about the smiting of the sheep, recalling, perhaps, Mt 26:31 and Mk 14:27, although it may have come to him from Zech 13:7. The following (6.13; 7.9; 12.10–11) are also paralleled in biblical passages:

And the Lord says: Behold, I make the last things like the first. (cf. Rev 21:5)

Because they will see him then, on that day, wearing the scarlet robe around his flesh and they will say: Is not this he whom we once crucified, despising and piercing and spitting on him? Surely this was the one who then said he was God’s Son. (cf. Mk 14:39 and par.)

10. Since then, they were going to say that Messiah is David’s Son, David himself—fearing and perceiving the error of the sinners—prophesies: The Lord said to my Lord, ‘Sit at my right hand until I make your enemies a footstool for your feet’ [Ps 110:1]. 11. And again, Isaiah says as follows: The Lord said to my Messiah, the Lord, whose right hand I held, that nations would become obedient to him, and ‘I will demolish the strength of kings’ [Isa 45:1]. Notice how David says he is ‘Lord’, and does not say ‘Son’. (cf. Mk 12:36 and par.)

None of these parallels requires a literary dependence of Barnabas on the NT texts.

18. Barnabas and the OT. All the extensive allusions, references, and quotations from the OT Scriptures are loose and are likely to have reached the author from previously existing (oral) testimonies. Over twenty come from the LXX of Isaiah. Several are from the LXX Psalter. There are loose citations also from the Pentateuch. 6.2–4 combines loose and exact citation from the LXX of Isaiah and the Psalms:

2. And again, since he was established as a mighty Stone which crushes, the prophet says of him: Behold, I will insert into the foundations of Zion a Stone which is precious, chosen, a cornerstone, prized [Isa 28:16a]. Then what does he say? And whoever trusts in him will live forever. Is our hope, then, on a stone? Not in the least! But he speaks in such a way since the Lord has established his flesh in strength. For he says: And he established me as a solid Rock [see Isa 50:7b]. And again the prophet says: The very Stone which the builders rejected has become the cornerstone [Ps. 118:22]! And again he says: This is the great and awesome Day which the Lord made [Ps. 118:24a; see 118:23].

Barn. 2.4–10 and 13.1–7 are also particularly noteworthy for the way in which LXX citations are employed and for the author’s linking of quotations from different books.

Bibliography: Windisch (1920); Kraft (1965); Prigent and Kraft (1971); Wengst (1984); Carleton Paget (1994); Hlavik (1996). The Greek text of Barnabas with an Eng. trans. is found in Lake (1912–13: i. 340–409).

E. Among other Apostolic Fathers to be considered, albeit briefly, are the pseudo-Clementine letters and the Shepherd of Hermas, all of which are found attached to fourth-century biblical MSS. 1 and 2 Clement appear at the end of Codex Alexandrinus, the Shepherd is found at the end of Codex Sinaiticus. We shall then turn briefly to the Epistles by Ignatius.

The Pseudo-Clementine Letters: 1 Clement

F. 1. This anonymous letter to the church in Corinth is claimed in later tradition to have been written by Clement, the third or fourth bishop of Rome. The letter, likely to have been written at the end of the first century, is concerned with church order and ministry. Roman authority and jurisdiction over the church in Corinth seem to have been taken for granted by its composer.

2. The letter is in the Bryennios MS. As well as being in the Codex Alexandrinus, 1 Clement is found alongside the NT text in one of the two extant Coptic papyri, and in a twelfth-century Syriac NT (now in Cambridge). This suggests that 1 Clement teetered on the edge of the NT canon in several areas of Christianity over many centuries. Eusebius knew that it was read in churches. The epistle was used by Polycarp, and praised by Irenaeus, who quotes from it, as does Clement of Alexandria. There are a few links with the canonical 1 Corinthians and Hebrews. Links with the canonical gospels are more tenuous. Its doxologies, prayers, and trinitarian formulae are instructive for our understanding of late first-century liturgy.

3. The author preaches forgiveness and harmony to a church riven with discord and schism. Christians are urged to perform good deeds as a consequence of their faith. 1 Clement sees the OT as a model for Christian practice (e.g. the Jewish priesthood is analogous to the Christian ministry). But a secular example, the phoenix, is taken in 1 Clem. 25 as a parallel to resurrection and is set out as a proof for faith in a future resurrection of the faithful dead:

Let us consider the strange sign which takes place in the East, that is in the districts near Arabia. There is a bird which is called the Phoenix. This is the only one of its kind, and lives 500 years and when the time of its dissolution in death is at hand, it makes itself a sepulchre of frankincense and myrrh and other spices, and when the time is fulfilled it enters into it and dies. Now, from the corruption of its flesh there springs a worm, which is nourished by the juices of the dead bird, and puts forth wings. Then, when it has become strong, it takes up that sepulchre, in which are the bones of its predecessor, and carries them from the country of Arabia as far as Egypt until it reaches the city called Heliopolis, and in the daylight in the sight of all it flies to the altar of the Sun, places them there, and then starts back to its former home. Then the priests inspect the registers of dates, and they find that it has come at the fulfilment of the 500th year.

The same story (with variations) occurs in Herodotus and in Pliny.

4. Among words of Jesus, two that occur in the letter (13.2; 46. 7b–8) are:

For he spoke thus: 'Be merciful, that you may obtain mercy. Forgive, that you may be forgiven. As you do, so shall it be done to you. As you give, so shall it be given unto you. As you judge, so shall you be judged. As you are kind, so shall kindness be shown you. With what measure you mete, it shall be measured to you.'

Remember the words of the Lord Jesus; for he said, 'Woe to that man: it were good for him if he had not been born, than that he should offend one of my elect: it were better for him that a millstone be hung on him, and he be cast into the sea, than that he should turn aside one of my elect.'

The former has links with verses in the Sermon on the Mount in the NT. The latter parallels Mt 26:24 || Mk 14:21 || Lk 22:22 and Mt 18:6 || Mk 9:42 || Lk 17:2, but it is unlikely that the author of 1 Clement was familiar with our written gospels: his sources are more probably oral traditions.

2 Clement

G. 2 Clement, like 1 Clement, is found in the Bryennios MS, in Codex Alexandrinus, and in the twelfth-century Cambridge Syriac NT, but not in Latin or Coptic. It is a homily on self-control and repentance; it is not a letter and has a different authorship from 1 Clement. The date and provenance are unclear. Possibly it comes from Rome in the mid-second century. Its main value is as an example of early, unsophisticated, Jewish-Christian thought from that period.

Bibliography: An appendix given over to Greek, Roman, and other stories concerning the figure of the phoenix is to be found in Linnemann (1992). This book gives a detailed commentary on both 1 and 2 Clement. Other works on these letters are:

Wengst (1984); Grant and Graham (1965); Welbourn, ABD i. 1055–60.

The Greek text of 1 and 2 Clement with an ET is found in Lake (1912–13: i. 8–163).

The Shepherd of Hermas

H. 1. Several MS copies of this text have survived, including the Codex Sinaiticus, where about a quarter of the Shepherd follows Barnabas. The Shepherd is cited by Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Athanasius, and Tertullian, usually as scripture. The Muratorian Canon allows it to be read privately.

2. Hermas is the unknown author and it is he who is the hero of the story. The Shepherd is divided into three parts: five Visions after which come twelve Mandates (or Precepts) and ten Similitudes (or Parables). It has been suggested by several scholars that these sections may have come from different sources. The composition is likely to have developed in the mid-second century. Its aim is to inculcate a need for repentance. There are some links with material known to us in the NT, but there is no convincing evidence of direct copying. Vision 10 (the Good Shepherd) suggests parallels with Jn 10.

Bibliography: Commentaries on the text are:

Dibelius (1923); Joly (1968); Whittaker (1967); Kirkland (1990); Osiek (1999). See also Hahneman (1992), esp. ch. 2. The Greek and Latin text of the Shepherd with an Eng. trans. is in Lake (1912–13: ii. 6–305).

The Letters of Ignatius

I. 1. Ignatius of Antioch en route to his martyrdom in Rome, an event which probably took place c.107 CE, wrote letters to the churches in Ephesus, Magnesia, Tralles, Rome, Smyrna, and Philadelphia, and to Polycarp. These letters were circulated and gathered together, and were quoted by Eusebius and Theodoret, among others. The original seven were interpolated, and spurious letters were added to the corpus.

2. The originals, known to Eusebius, survive in Greek, Latin, Syriac, and in other languages. (The long recension, containing interpolations to the genuine seven letters together with six additional letters, survives in Greek and Latin.)

The Epistle to the Romans had a different textual history as it was subsequently incorporated into a martyrology—witnesses to this epistle are extensive but of variable quality.

3. Ignatius' friend Polycarp in his letter to the Philippians refers in ch. 13 to a collection of the martyr's letters, which he was forwarding to Philippi.

4. The main emphasis of Ignatius' seven letters is to defend an authoritarian episcopacy. The letters also contain warnings against a Judaizing heresy with docetic overtones. Whether this was one heresy or two—Judaco-Gnosticism or Judaism and Docetism—is debated. Jesus' divinity is stressed—he is called 'God' at least twelve times in these letters—but the corporeality and reality of his birth and death are taught. The life of Christ is said to be continued in the eucharist.

5. Ignatius was aware of a collection of Paul's letters. He quotes or alludes to 1 Corinthians nearly fifty times, although often in a free and paraphrastic way. There are allusions to most of Paul's other letters too. His letter to the Ephesians, 17.2–18.1, is a good example of his use of Paul:

Why are we not all wise [cf. 1 Cor 4:10], since we have received the knowledge of God, namely Jesus Christ [Col 2:2]? Why are we foolishly perishing [1 Cor 1:18], ignoring the gift which the Lord has truly sent? My spirit is devoted to the cross, which is a stumbling block to unbelievers but salvation and eternal life to us [1 Cor 1:18, 23–4]. 'Where is the wise man? Where is the debater? Where is the boasting of the so-called intelligent [1 Cor 1:20]?'

6. In his letter to Polycarp, 2.1–2, Ignatius perhaps betrays a knowledge of the canonical gospels:

If you love good disciples, it is no credit to you [Lk 6:32]; instead, bring the more troublesome into subjection by gentleness. 'Not all wounds are healed by the same plaster.' 'Relieve convulsions by moist applications.' 'Be prudent as the serpent' in every matter and 'sincere as the dove' [Mt 10:16] always.

7. Ignatius' Romans 7.3 with its reference to a future eucharist associated with the resurrection of believers has also been pointed to as example of Ignatius' knowledge of John's gospel, esp. 6:33, 51–8: 'I take no pleasure in the food of corruption or in the pleasures of this life. I desire the bread of God [Jn 6:33], which is the flesh of Jesus Christ (who was of the seed of David), and for drink I desire his blood, which is imperishable love.' But perhaps Ignatius' memory of this material came from the oral tradition rather than his reading of the gospels.

Bibliography: Grant (1966); the Greek text of the Epistles of Ignatius with an ET is found in Lake (1912–13; i. 172–277).

General Bibliography: On the Apostolic Fathers see Grant, (1964); Barnard (1966); Tugwell (1989). The whole question of the links between Jesus material and the Apostolic Fathers is investigated in the influential monograph by Köster (1957).

THE NEW TESTAMENT APOCRYPHA

J. General Introduction. 1. Many of these texts tell of the deeds and pronouncements of characters who figure in the NT proper—Jesus of course, but also his parents, Joseph and Mary, Pilate, Paul, Peter, and other apostles. There is also a tendency in this literature to base stories around the many fringe characters of the NT narratives, the woman with the issue of blood, the good and bad thieves, Zachariah, and apostles who in the NT do not occur prominently in their own right—Andrew or John, for example. The main link between the 'apocryphal' and 'canonical' texts (to use those terms anachronistically when referring predominantly to first-third-century compositions) is not so much the genres of literature but the attempts in the apocryphal literature to amplify events and details about the dramatis personae found in the earlier canonical books and in some cases to fill perceived gaps in the canonical accounts.

2. We are assuming for the moment that the apocryphal literature is in each case later than the books which were incorporated into the NT. If we assume the secondary nature of the apocryphal books and a date for their composition in and subsequent to the second century, we can see that one of the main motives behind the composition of these books was to satisfy the curiosity of the faithful about characters and events not always fully developed in the NT itself.

3. We now turn to look at the different genres of literature within the apocryphal NT in more detail. These are categorized as gospels, acts, epistles, and apocalypses.

4. Lost Gospels. Some gospels are known now only by their titles found in patristic and other sources, while extracts from some others are known from attributed citations in patristic works. Among the latter are Jewish-Christian gospels (e.g. the Gospel according to the Hebrews, known from quotations in Origen and Jerome), the Gospel of the Egyptians, parts of which are quoted in the work of Clement of Alexandria, and the Preaching of Peter, parts of which are known from Clement of Alexandria and Origen.

5. Extant Gospels. Some of these have survived complete or relatively so, others are fragmentary. The main apocryphal gospel texts are the Protevangelium of James, the Infancy Gospel of Thomas, the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew, the Arabic Infancy Gospel, the Gospel of Thomas, the Gospel of Peter, and the Gospel of Nicodemus.

6. Certainly it is true to say that although we have passion gospels and birth/infancy gospels, there is nothing now extant comparable to the canonical gospels. What have survived are texts that tell stories which could belong to the period of Jesus' ministry. Some are only small fragments containing sometimes only one episode, sometimes three or four stories. Again, we have no means of knowing the original scope or scale of the texts from which these fragments have chanced to survive.

7. The existence of additional stories and 'secret sayings' (to use this conventional, but erroneous, description) need not surprise us. The NT authors themselves did not claim to give a complete record of everything that Jesus did and said. The gospel writers made a selection of the material available to them in the oral tradition or in earlier written accounts (see for instance Jn 20:30–1). Some sayings of Jesus are known to us outside the gospels in Acts 20:35, or in Paul's letters (e.g. 1 Cor 7:10; 9:14; 1 Thess 4:15–17). It may well be that some of the sayings or stories of Jesus known to us from later accounts—the writings of a church father or, as here, in the apocryphal texts—are as authentic and as historic as those in the NT itself. Some modern scholars are even prepared to argue for a first-century origin of some of the following apocryphal stories and sayings.

8. The most famous of these fragments of apocryphal gospels is the second-century Egerton Papyrus in the British Library. This contains four stories on the front and reverse of two fragments. The MS has recently been supplemented by an additional fragment known as P.Köln 255 (inv. 608), which enables the text in the London fragments to be extended slightly. These stories have biblical parallels, in particular the healing of a leper (cf. Mt 8:2–4 and par.), paying tribute to Caesar (Mt 22:15–22 and par.) and the prophecy of Isaiah (cf. Mt 15:7–8 and par.); an episode with echoes of Jn 5:39, 45–6; 9:29.

And behold, a leper approached him and said, 'Teacher Jesus, while journeying with lepers and eating with them in the inn, I myself also became a leper. If, therefore, you are willing, I am cleansed.' The Lord said to him, 'I am willing: be cleansed.' And immediately the leprosy departed from him, and the Lord said, 'Go, show yourself to the priests and make an offering for your cleansing as Moses commanded, and sin no more...'

...came to him to tempt him, saying, 'Teacher Jesus, we know that you have come from God, for the things which you do bear witness beyond all the prophets. Tell us then: Is it lawful to render to kings what pertains to their rule? Shall we render it to them or not?' But Jesus, knowing their mind, said to them in indignation, 'Why do you call me teacher with your mouth, when you do not do what I say? Isaiah prophesied correctly when he said about you: This people honours me with its lips, but their heart is far from me; in vain do they worship me, [teaching as doctrines merely human] commandments.'

Jesus said] to the lawyers, '[Punish] every wrong-doer and transgressor, and not me...what he does as he does it.' Then, turning to the rulers of the people, he spoke this word, 'Search the scriptures, in which you think you have life; it is they which bear witness to me. Do not think that I have come to accuse you to my Father; your accuser is Moses, on whom you have set your hope.' When they said, 'We know well that God spoke to Moses; but as for you, we do not know where you come from,' Jesus said in reply, 'Now your unbelief is accused to the ones who were witnessed to by him. If you had believed [in Moses] you would have believed me, because he wrote to your fathers about me.'

9. Among other fragments are the Oxyrhynchus Papyrus 840 (P.Oxy. 840) of the fourth century and the Fayyum fragment of the third century, although the text they contain is likely to be considerably older. P.Oxy. 840 in its entirety contains the following story:

[B]efore he does wrong he makes all kinds of ingenious excuses. 'But take care lest you also suffer the same things as they did, for those who do evil not only receive their chastisement from men but they await punishment and great torment.' Then he took them with him and brought them into the place of purification itself, and was walking in the temple. A Pharisee, a chief priest named Levi, met them and said to the Saviour, 'Who gave you permission to walk in this place of purification and look upon these holy vessels when you have not bathed and your disciples have not washed their feet? But you have walked in this temple in a state of defilement, whereas no one else comes in or dares to view these holy vessels without having bathed and changed his clothes.' Thereupon the Saviour stood with his disciples and answered him. 'Are you then clean, here in the temple as you are?' He said, 'I am clean, for I have bathed in the pool of David and have gone down by one staircase and come up by the other, and I have put on clean white clothes. Then I came and viewed the holy vessels.' 'Alas,' said the Saviour, 'you blind men who cannot see! You have washed in this running water, in which dogs and pigs have wallowed night and day, and you have washed and scrubbed your outer skin, which harlots and flute-girls also anoint and wash and scrub, beautifying themselves for the lusts of men while inwardly they are filled with scorpions and unrighteousness of every kind. But my disciples and I, whom you charge with not having bathed, have bathed ourselves in the living water which comes down from heaven. But woe to those who...' (cf. Mt 15:1–20 and par.)

The Fayyum fragment parallels Mt 26:31/Mk 14:27:

[After supper as was the custom, he said],
 'All] in this night will be offended as] it is written: I will smite the [shepherd and the] sheep will be scattered.'
 When] Peter [said], 'Even if all, [not I', Jesus said], 'Before the cock crows twice three times today will you] deny me.'

10. Once more the question arises about the relationship, literary or otherwise, between the apocryphal stories and their canonical counterparts. Some answers to such a question inevitably have the effect of blurring the strict line of demarcation that is often drawn between the canonical and apocryphal texts. The work of Helmut Köester and his followers in particular has sought to emphasize the independence of such texts as the Gospel of Peter, P.Egerton 2, and the Gospel of Thomas from the canonical gospels and even to give a date for the original composition of the sayings and stories in some of the apocryphal gospels earlier than the synoptic parallels. Such conclusions have not met with broad support. Frans Neirynck has been active in arguing against these theories by demonstrating that Mark and the other synoptic writings were the sources for works like P.Egerton 2 and the Gospel of Peter. The debate has guaranteed that the apocryphal texts are now examined alongside the canonical counterparts, especially in synopses, with the result that the later development of the synoptists' stories and sayings can be plotted and recognized.

11. The Gospel of Thomas in its entirety was discovered at Nag Hammadi in 1945. The copy, written in Coptic, has been dated to c.350 CE. It contains 114 sayings, nearly all of them attributed to Jesus. As such, it may be comparable with the hypothetical canonical gospel source known as Q, usually said to have been a gospel containing sayings of Jesus, without narrative.

12. The concluding words of Thomas state that it is 'a gospel', but its opening words speak merely of 'sayings'. Its original language was Greek: three fragments of Thomas in Greek have survived, and were discovered in Oxyrhynchus at the end of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth century (P.Oxy. 1, P.Oxy. 654, P.Oxy. 655). One fragment has been given a date of around 200 CE; the other two are third century. Until the Coptic text was unearthed, the relationship of the Greek fragments to one another and to a larger work gave rise to half a century of learned debate and speculation. The discovery of Thomas at Nag Hammadi answered many of the earlier questions and laid to rest much speculation, although the exact relationship between the Coptic and the surviving Greek fragments is still not entirely clear—the Coptic, for instance, is not an exact translation of the Greek and it seems as if Thomas passed through several recensions. Although the precise history of the text is disputed, it does seem as if the gospel was popular, being copied regularly over several centuries, and with a widespread distribution. It was translated, possibly more than once, into Coptic.

13. It is not clear if early patristic testimony to a gospel of Thomas is to this Gospel of Thomas or another, but there are parallels to some of its sayings in the writings of the third-century father Hippolytus and in other patristic sources. It is, however, not certain if the parallels are due to direct dependence of the fathers on Thomas, or to a shared common heritage of oral sayings.

14. The date of its composition seems to have been prior to 200 CE but whether it goes back to the first century or is even contemporaneous with the canonical gospels is uncertain. Most scholars accept that Thomas was written later than the NT gospels, but the degree of dependence, or relationship, between the apocryphal text and the biblical is debated. Modern synopses often show parallels to Thomas. An analysis shows that most of its logia are linked to NT sources, especially the gospels. Some links are mere allusions; others are deviant versions of the same saying; a few are almost exactly parallel. All of this opens intriguing questions about the history, origins, and significance of the sayings in Thomas.

15. It is easy to speculate: one could argue that the circle responsible for fostering the logia included in Thomas possessed, or at least knew, the canonical material in its present form or some of its sources (e.g. in the form of a document such as Q), or a digest of sayings previously abstracted from the NT gospels. One could even say that the author of Thomas (either an individual or a group) was familiar with sayings that were circulated only in an oral—and therefore in a changing and developing—context. That latter suggestion would explain the variety and range of sayings, including some which appear in the NT with virtually identical wording.

16. Among sayings of Thomas that closely parallel the NT are: logion 20: 'The disciples said to Jesus, "Tell us, what is the Kingdom of God like?" He said to them, "It is like a grain of mustard seed, smaller than all seeds. But when it falls on cultivated ground it puts forth a large branch and provides a shelter for the birds of heaven."' The main difference from the synoptic versions (Mt 13:31–2; Mk 4:30–2; Lk 13:18–19) is the 'cultivated ground'.

Logion 26: 'Jesus said, "The splinter that is in your brother's eye you see but the plank in your own eye you do not see. When you have taken the plank out of your own eye, then you will see to remove the splinter from your brother's eye."' The saying is briefer than the form in Lk 6:42 or Mt 7:5 and it reduces the two questions there to a single statement.

Logion 31: 'Jesus said, "No prophet is acceptable in his own village; a physician does not heal those who know him."' The second half of this saying looks like an expansion of Lk 4:23–4 but the structural parallelism in Thomas suggests that this longer form is the original.

Logion 41: 'Jesus said, "He who has something in his hand, will receive more; and he who has nothing, even the little he has shall be taken away from him"', cf. Mt. 13:12/Mk 4:25 = Lk 8:18, where the saying refers to the reaction to teaching in parables. At Mt 25:29; Lk 19:26 it concludes a parable. It is perhaps a piece of floating material which Thomas anchors to its preceding logion (40): 'Jesus said, "A vine was planted without the Father, but because it did not become strong it will be uprooted and it will rot.'" Here the vine 'planted without the Father' is equivalent to the person in logion 41 'who has nothing'.

Logion 46a: 'Jesus said, "From Adam to John the Baptist among those born of women no one is greater than John the Baptist.'" It could be argued that this logion is independent of Mt 11:11 and possibly more authentic than the synoptic version (cf. logion 15: 'Jesus said, "When you see him who was not born of woman, prostrate yourselves on your faces and worship him: that one is your father."').

Logion 54: 'Jesus said, "Blessed are the poor for yours is the kingdom of heaven.'" Cf. Lk 6:20 and Mt 5:3. Thomas differs from both, and may represent an independent and even a more authentic version of the beatitude.

Logion 55: 'Jesus said, "He who does not hate his father and his mother cannot be my disciple and he who does not hate his brothers and his sisters and does not take up his cross as I have will not be worthy of me.'" Thomas is closer to Lk 14:26–7 than to Mt. 10:37–8. There is no reference in Thomas to the wife and children mentioned by Luke or to the son and daughter of Matthew. The versions in Matthew and Luke are not identical: these two Q versions therefore stand alongside the form in Thomas and all have equal claims to independence.

Logion 86: 'Jesus said, "[The foxes have] their earths and the birds have their nests but the Son of Man has nowhere to lay his head and rest.'" This is the only Son of Man saying in Thomas (cf. Mt 8:20 or Lk 9:58). Thomas adds 'and rest', which can possibly be seen as a Gnostic addition, implying that the 'repose' is not on earth but within, which is a theme found in Thomas elsewhere (in logia 50, 51, 90).

Logion 96: 'Jesus [said,] "The kingdom of the Father is like a woman who took a little leaven, [hid] it in dough and made it into large loaves. He who has ears let him hear"', cf. Mt 13:33; Lk 13:20–1. Thomas emphasizes the contrast between the small amount of leaven and the large size of the loaves.

17. As far as other links with the NT are concerned, the parables found in Thomas have interesting parallels: logion 9 (parable of the sower): 'Jesus said, "Behold, the sower went out; he filled his hand, he sowed. Some seeds fell on the road. The birds came and gathered them up. Others fell on the rock and did not take root in the earth and did not produce ears up to heaven. Others fell among thorns. They choked the seed and the worm ate them. But others fell on good ground and it brought forth good fruit to heaven. These yielded six per measure and one hundred and twenty measures.'" Among the differences in Thomas compared with the parable in Mt 13:3–8; Mk 4:3–8; Lk 8:5–8 are that the sower fills his hand, that the seeds sown on the rock do not put ears up to heaven, and the reference to the worm.

Logion 57 (parable of the wheat and the tares): 'Jesus said, "The kingdom of the Father is like a man who had good seed. His enemy came by night; he sowed weeds among the good seed. The man did not let them pull up the weed. He said to them, "Do not do so, lest when you go to pull up the weed you pull up the wheat along with it." For on the day of the harvest the weeds will be conspicuous; they will be pulled up and burned.'" This parable is shorter than Mt 13:24–30. It could therefore be a summary of that version or be an independent writing-up from the oral tradition of only the essentials. The same judgement can be made of logion 63 (the parable of the rich fool): 'Jesus said, "There was a rich man who had considerable wealth. He said, 'I will use my money to sow and reap and plant and fill my warehouses with fruit so that I will lack nothing.' Such were his intentions. But in that night he died. He who has ears, let him hear"' (cf. Lk 12:16–20).

Logion 64 (parable of the wedding guests): 'Jesus said, "A man had the habit of receiving visitors and when he had prepared the banquet he sent his servant to invite the guests. He went to the first and said to him, 'My master invites you.' He replied, 'Money is owed me by some merchants. They will come to me this evening; I must go and give them orders. I beg to be excused from the dinner.' He went to another and said to him, 'My master has invited you.' He said to him, 'I have just bought a house and am needed for a day. I have no time.' He went to another and said to him, 'My master invites you.' He said to him, 'My friend is about to be married and I have to prepare a wedding feast; I shall not be able to come. I beg to be excused from the dinner.' He went to another and said to him, 'My master invites you.' He said to him, 'I have bought a village and am on my way to collect the rent. I shall not be able to come. I beg to be excused from the dinner.' The servant returned and said to his master, 'Those whom you invited asked to be excused from the dinner.' The master said to his servant, 'Go out into the streets and bring in those whom you find so that they may dine.' Buyers and merchants will not enter the places of my Father.'" This is probably a Hellenistic rewriting of the synoptic account (Lk 14:16–24, cf. Mt 22:1–10) with a different structure, in which there are four instead of three guests, and with several other differing details.

Logion 65 (parable of the wicked husbandmen): 'He said, "A good man had a vineyard. He leased it to some farmers so that they would cultivate it and he would receive the fruit from them. He sent his servant so that the tenants would give him the fruit of the vineyard. They seized his servant, beat him and almost killed him. The servant returned and told his master. His master said, 'Perhaps they did not recognize him.' He sent another servant. The tenants beat him also. Then the master sent his son. He said, 'Perhaps they will respect my son.' Those tenants knowing he was the heir of the vineyard seized him and killed him. He who has ears, let him hear.'" As in Lk 20:9–16, Thomas has no allusion to the preparation of the vineyard in Isa 5:1–2, a detail found in Mt 21:33–41 and Mk 12:1–9. The question is, have Thomas and Luke deleted earlier material or is the reference to Isaiah a later addition to the primitive form preserved in Thomas (and Luke)? The synoptists' account may itself have been expanded from an earlier version in which the servants are to be understood as the prophets. The synoptists' conclusion, especially in Matthew, looks like a later attempt to clarify the meaning. As that conclusion is absent from Thomas, does that therefore mean that it is the more primitive?

18. It will have been seen that some logia, although close to the synoptic parallels, none the less veer off at a tangent. On the other hand, there are sayings such as the following that have no obvious NT parallel. However, these could represent authentic, i.e. independent, Jesus tradition comparable to that found in the NT.

Logion 28: 'Jesus said, "I stood in the midst of the world, and I appeared to them in the flesh. I found all of them drunk;

I did not find any of them thirsting. And my soul was pained for the sons of men because they are blind in their heart, and they do not see that they came empty into the world; they seek to go empty out of the world. Now they are drunk. When they have shaken off their wine, then they will repent.'" Jesus' manifestation in the flesh is as in 1 Tim 3:16. The lament may be compared with that in Mk 9:19.

Logion 77b (cf. P.Oxy. 1, logion 30b): 'Split the wood and I am there; lift up the stone and you will find me there.'

Logion 82: 'Jesus said, "He who is near me is near fire but he who is far from me is far from the kingdom.'" Origen, in Jer. 3:3 and Didymus, Exp. in Ps. 88.8, also know this saying. Its antithetical parallelism and Semitic structure speak highly in favour of its originality.

Logion 97: 'Jesus said, "The kingdom of the [Father] is like a woman who was carrying a jar which was full of meal. While she was walking on a long road the handle of the jar broke; the meal spilled out behind her on to the road. She did not notice it; she was unaware of the accident. When she came to her house she put the jar down and found it was empty.'" The precise meaning is unclear, possibly because the original context is now absent. It could refer to the imperceptible loss of the kingdom or to its coming unnoticed.

Logion 98: 'Jesus said, "The kingdom of the Father is like a man who wanted to kill a powerful man. He drew the sword in his own house and he thrust it into the wall so that he would know if his hand would be strong enough. Then he killed the powerful one.'" Jesus is represented as teaching the need for a thorough preparation for action, as in the parable of the king preparing for war in Lk 14:28–32. Jesus in both uses a popular proverb.

19. The interpretation of some of these logia has sometimes been made to apply to or spring from Gnostic thought and teaching (see A3–4 above). Some other sayings are less ambiguous and seem to require a Gnostic provenance or interpretation. These include: logion 1: 'And he said, "He who finds the interpretation of these sayings will not taste death.'" This seems to be an adaptation of Jn 8:52 applied to the acquisition of knowledge.

Logion 23: 'Jesus said, "I shall choose you, one from a thousand, and two from ten thousand, and they shall stand as a single one.'" The Gnostic leader Basilides was familiar with the sentiment expressed here to reflect the infinitesimal number of the elect. In Thomas men and women will become one, hence the final clause.

Logion 67: 'Jesus said, "He who knows the All but fails to know himself lacks everything.'" Self-knowledge is an important element in Gnostic systems, hence this saying, whatever its origin, would be compatible with Gnosticism.

Logion 114: 'Simon Peter said to them, "Let Mary leave us, because women are not worthy of life." Jesus said, "Look, I shall lead her so that I will make her male in order that she also may become a living spirit, resembling you males. For every woman who makes herself male will enter the kingdom of heaven.'" This is another saying proclaiming that men and women must become one. It is stated here that the female must become male. Possibly the intention is that the creation of Adam alone will be re-established at the end of time with a return to the conditions before the Fall.

20. Because of sayings like these, the term 'Gnostic', usually intended as a pejorative term synonymous with 'heretical', has been applied to Thomas as a whole. In other words, a common judgement is that the community responsible for preserving and circulating Thomas in the form in which was eventually written out was a Christian group sympathetic to or influenced by Gnosticism. However, Gnosticism in varying forms flourished in the early Christian centuries and in many ways some of the teaching of Thomas was merely characteristic of second-century syncretism. This would mean that it did not originate in a fully-fledged Gnostic movement nor is it to be dismissed as unorthodox in its entirety. Often the mere fact that Thomas was found in the Nag Hammadi library is sufficient for some commentators to brand it, because of guilt by association, as a Gnostic work when all that may be deduced is that the Nag Hammadi library found it a congenial work to possess.

Bibliography: There is a vast secondary literature on the Gospel of Thomas. The fullest bibliography is Scholer (1971), regularly updated in Novum Testamentum.

K. 1. We now turn to stories of Jesus' birth, childhood, passion, and descent to the underworld, as well as to stories from the Pilate cycle.

2. Birth stories. Three extracts from apocryphal nativity gospels are given. The first example (from the 2nd-cent. Protevangelium of James, 18:1–2) elaborates the account of the journey to Bethlehem. This seems to be the earliest reference to Jesus' birth in a cave. The narrative continues with a famous monologue by Joseph, who describes the wonders that accompanied Jesus' birth—in particular, the cessation of natural phenomena. The apocryphal writer obviously believed that the arrival on earth of the universal Saviour demanded cosmic recognition. The moving star in the biblical account was not sufficient: for this developed tradition the catalepsy of nature was introduced as an appropriate accompaniment to the birth. In this, of course, parallels can be drawn with the cosmic events that accompanied Jesus' departure from earth, notably the eclipse and the earthquake at the time of his crucifixion (Mt 23:51–2; Mk 15:33). The paralysis of natural phenomena may be compared with the silence in heaven at the opening of the seventh seal in Rev. 8:1.

3. A variation of the stories in the Protevangelium is to be seen in the later Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew, which in its present form may date from the eighth century, although it drew on much earlier material. Here Jesus' birth is acknowledged not only by the shepherds and the wise men, but also by animals. In the second extract below, from Ps.-Matt. 14, will be seen the episode in which the ox and the ass adore Jesus. This well-known scene is due to the influence of the OT, in particular Isa 1:3 and Hab 3:2. This represents an ongoing tradition in which various biblical passages were read as Messianic prophecies that were then said to have been fulfilled in the life of Jesus. Ps.-Matt.'s use of OT citations continues a Christian tradition as old as the NT itself. The third extract is from the medieval Latin nativity story known as Arundel MS 404. The cessation of nature at Jesus' birth is found here too. But the extract from Arundel 404 ch. 73 is given below for the description of the actual birth, which is the most Docetic in character in any of these apocryphal gospels and appears to reflect second-century interests. Here in the birth story Jesus only seems to be human. His physical appearance on earth is described in the Arundel text as only a manifestation of divine light.

And [Joseph] found a cave and brought [Mary] into it, and left her in the care of his sons and went out to seek for a Hebrew midwife in the region of Bethlehem. Now I, Joseph, was walking, and yet I did not walk, and I looked up to the air and saw the air in amazement. And I looked up at the vault of heaven, and saw it standing still and the birds of the heaven motionless. And I looked down at the earth, and saw a dish placed there and workmen reclining, and their hands were in the dish. But those who chewed did not chew, and those who lifted up did not lift, and those who put something to their mouth put nothing to their mouth, but everybody looked upwards. And behold, sheep were being driven and they did not come forward but stood still; and the shepherd raised his hand to strike them with his staff but his hand remained upright. And I looked at the flow of the river, and saw the mouths of the kids over it and they did not drink. And then suddenly everything went on its course.

And on the third day after the birth of our Lord Jesus Christ, Mary went out of the cave and, entering a stable, placed the child in the manger, and an ox and ass adored him. Then was fulfilled that which was said by Isaiah the prophet, 'The ox knows his owner, and the ass his master's crib.' Therefore, the animals, the ox and the ass, with him in their midst, incessantly adored him. Then was fulfilled that which was said by Habakkuk the prophet, saying, 'Between two animals you are made manifest.' Joseph remained in the same place with Mary for three days.

As the time drew near, the power of God showed itself openly. The maiden stood looking into heaven; she became like a vine. For now the end of the events of salvation was at hand. When the light had come forth, Mary worshipped him whom she saw she had given birth to. The child himself, like the sun, shone brightly, beautiful and most delightful to see, because he alone appeared as peace, bringing peace everywhere. In that hour when he was born the voice of many invisible beings proclaimed in unison, 'Amen.' And that light, which was born, was multiplied and it obscured the light of the sun itself by its shining rays. The cave was filled with the bright light and with a most sweet smell. The light was born just as the dew descends from heaven to the earth. For its perfume is fragrant beyond all the smell of ointments.

L. Jesus' Childhood. 1. In the apocryphal gospels events relating to the time of Jesus' ministry are virtually ignored; that period is well covered in the canonical gospels. Gaps in the story of his career were perceived to be located in his parents' background, his birth, and his early years. Several apocryphal gospels relate incidents about Jesus as an infant and a young boy. The biblical precedent for such stories is likely to be the account in Luke's gospel of Jesus in the temple at the age of 12. That story is to be found in a modified form in the Infancy Gospel of Thomas—a second-century composition, which, together with the Protevangelium of James, seems to have had an enormous influence on Christian tradition thanks partly to their having been re-edited in other, later books such as the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew.

2. In Infancy Thomas the story of Jesus at the age of 12 is as follows:

And when he was twelve years old his parents went according to the custom to Jerusalem to the feast of the passover with their companions and after the feast of the passover they returned to their house. And while they were returning, the child Jesus went back to Jerusalem. But his parents supposed that he was in the company.

And when they had gone a day's journey, they sought him among their kinsfolk, and when they did not find him, they were troubled, and returned again to the city seeking him. And after the third day they found him in the temple sitting among the teachers, listening and asking them questions. And all paid attention to him and marvelled how he, a child, put to silence the elders and teachers of the people, elucidating the chapters of the law and the parables of the prophets. And his mother Mary came near and said to him, 'Why have you done this to us, child? Behold, we have sought you sorrowing.' Jesus said to them, 'Why do you seek me? Do you not know that I must be about my father's affairs?' But the scribes and Pharisees said, 'Are you the mother of this child?' And she said, 'I am.' And they said to her, 'Blessed are you among women, because God has blessed the fruit of your womb. For such glory and such excellence and wisdom we have never seen nor heard.' And Jesus arose and followed his mother and was subject to his parents; but his mother stored up all that had taken place. And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature and grace. To him be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Some synopses such as Aland (1985) and Greeven (Huck 1981) print that story alongside the Lukan version. The relation between the two seems to show the secondary nature of the account in Infancy Thomas (e.g. in the elaboration of the references to Mary), but we need not see this as the result of direct copying by the author of Infancy Thomas. That author was a creative writer and not a scribe of Luke's gospel. Thus the version here is not a MS witness to the Gospel of Luke at this point. Possibly the author of Infancy Thomas knew Luke's story from the oral retelling of it in his own Christian community. Possibly he had read Luke. Either way his own retelling is a fresh, independent, albeit secondary account.

3. Except for the episode of Jesus in the temple at the age of 12 in Lk 2:41–50, the NT writings leave a tantalizing gap in the life of Jesus between his birth and his baptism at the beginning of the public ministry. Inevitably, the developing literary tradition, taking its cue from the childhood story in Luke, created a series of incidents that tell of events in Jesus' boyhood. Their main theme is to show Jesus' precocious awareness of his supernatural origin and his power over life, death, and nature.

4. The belief in Jesus' divinity is clearly orthodox in Christian doctrine, but the often sensational manifestations of his supernatural abilities displayed in the numerous childhood stories in apocryphal gospels tend to distort that belief. Extracts below from the second–third-century Infancy Gospel of Thomas have the effect of portraying the child Jesus as an enfant terrible. Modern readers are struck less by the piety underlying the stories than by the destructiveness of many of Jesus' actions. Such a negative theme may be paralleled in the NT story of Jesus' blasting the fig-tree (Mk 11:12–14, 20–4), but the recurrence of this theme makes it the dominant feature of Infancy Thomas, and other apocryphal texts, such as the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew.

5. Two of the stories in Infancy Thomas are:

After this he again went through the village, and a child ran and knocked against his shoulder. Jesus was angered and said to him, 'You shall not go further on your way', and immediately he fell down and died. But some, who saw what took place, said, 'From where was this child born, since his every word is an accomplished deed?' And the parents of the dead child came to Joseph and blamed him and said, 'Since you have such a child, you cannot dwell with us in the village; teach him to bless and not to curse. For he is killing our children.' (Infancy Gospel of Thomas, 4)

Now a certain teacher, Zacchaeus by name, who was standing in a certain place, heard Jesus saying these things to his father, and marvelled greatly that, being a child, he voiced such things. And after a few days he came near to Joseph and said to him, 'You have a clever child, and he has understanding. Come, hand him over to me that he may learn letters, and I will teach him with the letters all knowledge, and how to address all the older people and to honour them as forefathers and fathers, and to love those of his own age.' And he told him all the letters from Alpha to Omega distinctly, and with much questioning. But he looked at Zacchaeus the teacher and said to him, 'How do you, who do not know the Alpha according to its nature, teach others the Beta? Hypocrite, first if you know it, teach the Alpha, and then we shall believe you concerning the Beta.' Then he began to question the teacher about the first letter, and he was unable to answer him. And in the hearing of many the child said to Zacchaeus, 'Hear, teacher, the arrangement of the first letter, and pay heed to this, how it has lines and a middle stroke which goes through the pair of lines which you see, (how these lines) converge, rise, turn in the dance, three signs of the same kind, subject to and supporting one another, of equal proportions; here you have the lines of the Alpha.' (ibid. 6)

6. The episode of the schoolteacher was a particularly popular theme that recurs in different places. It would seem that the childhood story in Luke, where the 12-year-old Jesus confounds the teachers of the Jewish law, was the inspiration behind the apocryphal versions. However, the mystical interpretation of the shape of the letters in the Greek alphabet is obscure in the account in Infancy Thomas and obviously does not derive from Luke's story. Clearly, for believers in earlier centuries, these stories struck a favourable chord and were not seen as alien to their Christological teachings.

7. The Arabic Infancy Gospel tells stories of the baby Jesus performing miracles during the Holy Family's exile in Egypt. The extract following contains the robbers who thirty years later are to be crucified alongside Jesus. These characters reappear, differently named, in other apocryphal texts.

And departing from this place, they came to a desert; and hearing that it was infested by robbers, Joseph and the Lady Mary decided to cross this region by night. But on their way, behold, they saw two robbers lying in wait on the road, and with them a great number of robbers, who were their associates, sleeping. Now those two robbers into whose hands they had fallen were Titus and Dumachus. Titus then said to Dumachus, 'I beseech you to let these persons go free, so that our comrades do not see them.' And as Dumachus refused, Titus said to him again, 'Take forty drachmas from me, and have them as a pledge.' At the same time he held out to him the belt which he had had about his waist, that he should not open his mouth or speak. And the Lady Mary seeing that the robber had done them a kindness, said to him, 'The Lord God will sustain you with his right hand, and will grant you remission of your sins.' And the Lord Jesus answered, and said to his mother, 'Thirty years hence, O my mother, the Jews will crucify me at Jerusalem, and these two robbers will be raised upon the cross along with me, Titus on my right hand and Dumachus on my left; and after that day Titus shall go before me into Paradise.' And she said, 'God keep this from you, my son.' And they went from there towards a city of idols, which, as they came near it was transformed into sand-hills. (Arabic Infancy Gospel, 23)

M. Passion Gospels. 1. The account of Jesus' trial and crucifixion was obviously of central and paramount importance to Christians. Paul's theology is centred on the significance of Jesus' death and crucifixion. A third of Mark's gospel is devoted to the last week in Jesus' life, and the preceding two-thirds, with its controversy stories and passion predictions, may be seen as a preparation for the events in Jerusalem. The other canonical gospels similarly devote much of their space to building on that Markan framework. So it is not surprising that the rewriting and reassessment of Jesus' death were maintained even beyond the first-century gospels.

2. The main accounts of Jesus' death in apocryphal texts occur in the Gospel of Peter and in the Gospel of Nicodemus. The Gospel of Peter is likely to have been composed in the second century. Although it was known in antiquity, this gospel seemed to disappear without trace. Unlike many of the other apocryphal texts which have been preserved, often in multiple copies, no MSS of Peter were known until recently, when, at the end of the nineteenth century a partial copy was discovered during an archaeological excavation in Egypt. Since then one or possibly two tiny fragments have also come to light. A reading of the main text shows that its passion narrative parallels very closely the story in the four canonical gospels, and it seems clear that the writer of Peter has drawn on these NT accounts for his version of Jesus' passion.

3. A motive for Peter may have been the desire to rewrite the four canonical accounts as one, although continuing curiosity about Pilate has resulted in a greater emphasis on Jesus' appearance before him than is the case with the canonical accounts. The Diatessaron, itself of second-century origin, is one such attempt to retell the separated stories about Jesus as one continuous composition, probably with the intention of replacing the four individual and differing versions. Much in Peter repeats material in the canonical stories and modern printed synopses often include parallels from Peter alongside the canonical passages.

4. There are, however, some significant differences from the NT to look for in the extracts below. One is the cry of Jesus from the cross ('My power, O power, you have forsaken me!'), which some commentators would interpret as an indication that Peter has been contaminated by unorthodox influences. A stronger heretical indication may be seen in the sentence, 'He held his peace as he felt no pain', which might imply that Jesus was incapable of suffering pain. If that is the correct translation, then it would indeed suggest possible Docetic influence. Nevertheless, our overall assessment of Peter is that the author was not self-consciously following unorthodox teaching, but that he was a typical unsophisticated and uncritical product of the second-century syncretism (fusing of different systems of religious belief) which characterized much of the Christian world. The Easter account describes the resurrection of Jesus in a dramatic and symbolic way. In contrast to the narratives in the canonical gospels, we now have an account of Jesus literally leaving his tomb.

And they brought two malefactors and crucified the Lord between them. But he held his peace as he felt no pain. And when they had set up the cross they wrote: 'This is the King of Israel.' And having laid down his garments before him they divided them among themselves and cast lots for them. But one of the malefactors rebuked them saying, 'We are suffering for the deeds which we have committed, but this man, who has become the saviour of men, what wrong has he done you?' And they were angry with him and commanded that his legs should not be broken, so that he might die in torment.

Now it was midday and darkness covered all Judaea. And they became anxious and distressed lest the sun had already set since he was still alive. It stands written for them: 'The sun should not set on one that has been murdered.' And one of them said, 'Give him to drink gall with vinegar.' And having mixed it they gave it to him to drink. And they fulfilled all things and accumulated their sins on their head. And many went about with lamps [and] as they supposed that it was night, they stumbled. And the Lord called out and cried, 'My power, O power, you have forsaken me!' And having said this, he was taken up. And at the same hour the veil of the temple in Jerusalem was torn in two. (Gos. Pet. 4.10–5.20)

When those soldiers saw this, they awakened the centurion and the elders, for they also were there to mount guard. And while they were narrating what they had seen, they saw three men come out from the sepulchre, two of them supporting the other and a cross following them and the heads of the two reaching to heaven, but that of him who was being led reached beyond the heavens. And they heard a voice out of the heavens crying, 'Have you preached to those who sleep?', and from the cross there was heard the answer, 'Yes.' (Gos. Pet. 10.38–42)

5. One particular post-biblical characteristic found in Peter is the dominant anti-Jewish sentiment. Here Jewish malevolence is the motive for the intention not to break Jesus' legs; and the blame for the death of Jesus is laid firmly at the door of the Jews.

6. The general consensus of scholarly opinion is that Peter is secondary to and later than the canonical passion accounts. Occasionally though, voices are heard giving the opinion that it is early, even first century, and is independent of the biblical gospels. In other words, that Peter's passion story is a fifth account of the events; but, in general, such arguments have not found favour (cf. J.10).

7. As the complete text of Peter has not survived, we have no means of knowing if the original composition was a fully-fledged gospel like the canonical four, containing stories from Jesus' ministry prior to the arrest.

8. One extract from the other main passion gospel, the Gospel of Nicodemus, is included below. The first half of that gospel, which is probably fifth to sixth century, is known as the Acts of Pilate and tells of Jesus' trial, death, and resurrection. The book is concerned with Pilate's role in the sentencing of Jesus. This extract tells of Jesus' first meeting with Pilate. In it we note that Jesus' power is shown to exceed that of the Roman state. The superiority of Christianity over earthly rule is one of the most dominant and, understandably, the most important themes throughout the whole range of apocryphal literature: it is perhaps the single most significant unifying element of teaching in a body of literature that is otherwise amorphous, heterogeneous, and widespread geographically and chronologically.

Now, when Jesus entered, and the ensigns were holding the standards, the images on the standards bowed down and worshipped Jesus. And when the Jews saw the behaviour of the standards, how they bowed down and worshipped Jesus, they cried out loudly against the ensigns. But Pilate said to them, 'Do you not marvel how the images bowed and worshipped Jesus?' The Jews said to Pilate, 'We saw how the ensigns lowered them and worshipped him.' And the governor summoned the ensigns and asked them, 'Why did you do this?' They answered, 'We are Greeks and servers of temples: how could we worship him? We held the images; but they bowed down of their own accord and worshipped him.' (Gosp. Nic. 1.5)

N. The Descent to the Underworld. 1. It is interesting to note that the apocryphal tradition did not seek to elaborate stories of Jesus' post-resurrection appearances. To a certain extent, one can see a development in the Easter stories in the NT from the comparatively simple account in Mark through the more detailed version in Matthew to the developed traditions in Luke and John. Comparable developments seem then to have ceased. Further elaboration is, surprisingly perhaps, not part of the apocryphal books. The apocryphal Acts do tell of several reappearances of Jesus, sometimes in different guises, to various characters, but these are not on a par with the biblical post-resurrection appearances, the main purpose of which is to convince the original followers that the crucified Jesus had left his tomb and been raised from the dead. What seem to replace stories of the risen Jesus in the NT apocryphal tradition are accounts in which the ascended Jesus communicates orally with believers: several apocryphal books containing discussions with the ascended Christ are recognized as a new genre, and are now sometimes classified as Dialogues of the Redeemer.

2. The Christian affirmation of belief in Jesus' descent to Hades is in the Apostles' Creed and in the Athanasian Creed. The biblical origin for this belief, which became a major and normative part of Christian tradition, seems to be based on a particular interpretation of 1 Pet 3:19 ('in the spirit he (Christ) went and preached to the imprisoned spirits', my tr.). That statement encouraged later generations of Christians to elaborate on what was meant by Jesus' appearance before imprisoned spirits. The apocryphal stories of Jesus' descent to the underworld reflect those elaborations. The main text describing these events is the fifth- to sixth-century Descensus ad Inferos (Descent of Jesus to Hades), found in several MSS as the second half of the Gospel of Nicodemus, the first half being the Acts of Pilate.

In this tradition Jesus' arrival in Hades after his crucifixion spells the end of death as a permanent state. Hades, by transference, is the domain of Hades, known elsewhere in mythology as Pluto. He rules over the world of departed spirits, a realm comparable to the Hebrew Sheol. The age-old cycle of death and decay inaugurated by Adam's sin is now said to have been reversed by Christ's inability to be bound by death. This orthodox belief strongly present in the NT gospels and in Paul's writings is in effect dramatized in the Descensus. Another orthodox belief portrayed in this apocryphon is that the faithful will be raised from death because Christ is the first fruits of those raised. This belief is graphically illustrated by Christ leading Adam and the faithful dead out of Hades and into Paradise. Among those appearing in this gospel is a favourite character in the apocryphal writings, the repentant thief crucified alongside Jesus: he is on his way to Paradise direct, just as Jesus had promised, when he encounters the newly raised procession. This scene with Christ releasing the faithful from Hades (often called the Harrowing of Hell) was a popular episode in the Middle Ages. The text begins with the two characters, Satan (that supreme embodiment of evil, the devil, the adversary of God) and Hades, aware of Jesus' imminent arrival in their midst. They are powerless to stop his descent. This extract tells of Jesus' arrival and his triumph over Satan; the faithful are then released.

While Hades was thus speaking with Satan, the King of Glory stretched out his right hand, and took hold of our forefather Adam and raised him up. Then he turned to the rest and said, 'Come with me, all you who have died through the tree which this man touched. For behold, I raise you all up again through the tree of the cross.' With that he sent them all out. And our forefather Adam was seen to be full of joy and said, 'I give thanks to your majesty, O Lord, because you have brought me up from the lowest Hades.' Likewise all the prophets and the saints said, 'We give you thanks, O Christ, Saviour of the world, because you have brought up our life from destruction.' When they had said this, the Saviour blessed Adam with the sign of the cross on his forehead. And he did this also to the patriarchs and prophets and martyrs and forefathers, and he took them and sprang up out of Hades. And as he went the holy fathers sang praises, following him and saying, 'Blessed be he who comes in the name of the Lord. Alleluia. To him be the glory of all the saints.' (8.24)

3. Another text, which partly parallels the Descensus, is the Questions of Bartholomew, dated perhaps as early as the second century. In that book Bartholomew confronts Jesus in the period before his ascension. Among many questions and answers is one concerning Jesus' whereabouts after his crucifixion (when he is said to have vanished from the cross). Jesus' reply is remarkably consistent with the story in the Descensus.

O. Pilate. 1. Several apocryphal texts relate the end of Pilate. For many early Christians the role and fate of Pilate were enigmatic. Was he a just but weak ruler swayed by the Jewish mob, or a wicked, doomed man, guilty of deicide? What begins in the canonical tradition as an ambivalent attitude towards Pilate becomes fixed: Pilate is a puppet in the hands of the Jewish mob. This way of resolving the Pilate problem by the NT authors did not, however, finally settle the issue. The later, apocryphal, tradition reflects a continuing dilemma in judging his character. Possibly the change in attitude, especially in Western European sources, may be explained by the fact that the earlier goodwill of the Roman authorities had turned to officially inspired persecution. The ambiguous ways of treating Pilate are at their most apparent only when the apocryphal legends reach the death of Pilate. When a document such as the Acts of Pilate is treating the events of Jesus' passion we can still see the influence of the canonical traditions: the picture of Pilate in these Acts is close to the NT's portrayal. The version in the Acts of Pilate is an elaboration of the gospels' trial narrative. We again see that the apologetic tendency of the account in the Acts of Pilate is to show how Pilate tried to free himself from all responsibility for the death of Jesus by blaming it on Herod and the Jews.

2. But as far as Pilate's later story is concerned, where a judgement on his career is expected, he is treated variously as a saint or as an outcast. In the eastern church, particularly in the Coptic and Ethiopic tradition, he was portrayed favourably. Those churches eventually canonized him. An apocryphal tale, usually known as the Paradosis Pilati (that is, the handing over of Pilate for chastising), shows how one eastern legend treated Pilate and his wife, named here as Procla: although Caesar has Pilate beheaded, Pilate's destiny is a triumph. The western church judged Pilate harshly: that tradition is represented by the extract below. It comes from the text called the Mors Pilati (the Death of Pilate). This text explains how Mount Pilatus on Lake Lucerne (Losania in the text) was so named. In that context another place name is explained: Vienne is said to be derived from the words Via Gehenna (Hell Road). That made it an appropriate, albeit temporary, resting place for the man who condemned Jesus to death.

When Caesar knew of the death of Pilate, he said, 'He has justly died a most disgraceful death, seeing that his own hand has not spared him.' He was therefore bound to a great block of stone, and sunk in the river Tiber. However, malignant and filthy spirits, rejoicing in his malignant and filthy body, kept moving in the waters, and in a terrible manner caused lightning and tempests, thunder and hail, so that everyone was in constant fear. Therefore the Romans pulled him out of the river Tiber and carried him off in derision to Vienne, and sunk him in the river Rhone. Vienne means the Way of Gehenna, because it became a place of cursing. But evil spirits were at work and did the same things there too, so the people, unwilling to endure a plague of demons, removed that vessel of malediction and sent him to be buried in the territory of Losania. The inhabitants there were also troubled by the same visitations, so they removed him and sunk him in a lake, surrounded by mountains, where to this day, according to the tales of some, sundry diabolical machinations occur.

P. Apocryphal Acts. 1. Just as the apocryphal gospels amplify events relating to Jesus' birth, childhood, and death, so the apocryphal Acts tell us about the founding fathers of the church. There are many apocryphal Acts that have survived, but the most important and influential are the oldest: the Acts of Andrew, the Acts of John, the Acts of Paul, the Acts of Peter, and the Acts of Thomas. These were written in the second century.

2. The inspiration for these Acts was the Acts of the Apostles. The five second-century apocryphal Acts themselves spawned further imitators and many derivative versions. Eventually this type of literature gave rise to Lives of the Saints and hagiographies. But as far as the second-century Acts and their immediate successors are concerned, the emphasis is on an individual apostle's miracles, prayers, and preaching.

3. Only the Acts of Thomas has survived intact. The other early Acts are very fragmentary, especially in their early chapters. The ecclesiastical authorities who denounced these second-century Acts, labelling them as 'apocryphal', none the less seemed to allow their concluding chapters to survive. It is in those chapters where in most cases an account of the eponymous hero's martyrdom is to be found. Such accounts were presumably exemplary and of hortatory value to the faithful, even though the stories preceding the martyrdom were rejected by the authorities as uninstructional, secondary, or even unorthodox. Later, expurgated or catholicized rewritings of the originals were encouraged. But sufficient of the earlier, original Acts can be reconstructed from surviving MSS and other sources.

4. Within the Acts of John are to be found some details relevant to our understanding of the figure of Christ in the second century. In particular, the belief that he was able to appear in differing guises, sometimes simultaneously to different people, had taken hold. This polymorphic picture of the risen Jesus may have developed from those Easter narratives in Luke's and John's gospels, in which Jesus is not readily identified (for example, Mary thinks Jesus is a gardener (Jn 20:15), the men going to Emmaus do not recognize their travelling companion as Jesus (Lk 24:37), the disciples think he is a ghost (Lk 24:16), see also Jn 21:4). Also in these Easter stories Jesus can come and go at will (Lk 24:31, 36), and can even pass through closed doors (Jn 20:19, 26); he is spirited out of his binding cloths (Jn 20:7) and out of the sealed tomb (Mt 28:2-6).

5. But, as so often in the apocryphal tradition, those ideas are developed and, some would argue, distorted. For the writers of the apocryphal Acts it was even the incarnate Jesus who could adopt different guises (although, perhaps, it is the Transfiguration accounts in the NT—if these were originally referring to the Jesus of the ministry period—which gave the inspiration for the later apocryphal stories). One example from the Acts of John is when the hero relates his experience of the earthly Jesus:

For when he had chosen Peter and Andrew, who were brothers, he came to me and to my brother James, saying, 'I have need of you, come unto me.' And my brother said, 'John, this child on the shore who called to us, what does he want?' And I said, 'What child?' He replied, 'The one who is beckoning to us.' And I answered, 'Because of our long watch that we kept at sea you are not seeing straight, brother James: but do you not see the man who stands there, fair and comely and of a cheerful countenance?' But he said to me, 'Him I do not see, brother; but let us go and we shall see what it means.' And so when we had landed the ship, we saw him helping us to beach the ship.

And when we left the place, wishing to follow him again, he again appeared to me, bald-headed but with a thick and flowing beard; but to James he appeared as a youth whose beard was just starting. We were perplexed, both of us, as to the meaning of what we had seen. But when we followed him, we both became gradually more perplexed as we thought on the matter. Yet to me there appeared a still more wonderful sight; for I tried to see him as he was, and I never at any time saw his eyes closing but only open. And sometimes he appeared to me as a small man and unattractive, and then again as one reaching to heaven. Also there was in him another marvel; when I sat at table he would take me upon his breast and I held him; and sometimes his breast felt to me to be smooth and tender, and sometimes hard, like stone, so that I was perplexed in myself and said, 'What does this mean?'

Another glory I will tell you, brethren. Sometimes when I meant to touch him, I met a material and solid body; and at other times again when I felt him, the substance was immaterial and bodiless and as if it were not existing at all. (88-9, 93)

6. Acts of John relates the Transfiguration:

At another time he took me and James and Peter to the mountain, where he used to pray, and we beheld such a light on him that it is not possible for a man who uses mortal speech to describe what it was like. Again in a similar way he led us three up to the mountain saying, 'Come with me.' And we went again and saw him at a distance praying. Now I, because he loved me, went to him quietly as though he should not see, and stood looking upon his back. And I saw that he was not dressed in garments, but was seen by us as naked and not at all like a man; his feet were whiter than snow, so that the ground there was lit up by his feet, and his head reached to heaven; so that I was afraid and cried out, and he turned and appeared as a man of small stature, and took hold of my beard and pulled it and said to me, 'John, be not unbelieving, but believing, and not inquisitive.' And I said to him, 'What have I done, Lord?' And I tell you brethren, I suffered such pain forty days at the place where he took hold of my beard, that I said unto him, 'Lord, if your playful tug has given me so much pain, what if you had given me a beating?' And he said to me, 'Let it be your concern from henceforth not to tempt him who is not to be tempted' (90; cf. Mt 17:1-9 and par.)

7. In other apocryphal Acts the risen Jesus is variously experienced as a boy, as a youth, and as an old man in the Acts of Peter, as a child in the Acts of Andrew, and as a youth in the Acts of Paul. These often strange descriptions none the less reveal an orthodox belief in the omnipresence of Jesus.

8. A related phenomenon are those stories within the apocryphal Acts which describe the apostle and Jesus as interchangeable. Thomas is Judas Thomas or Didymus, the twin of Christ, and is identified as Jesus in Acts of Thomas 11 and 39. Jesus and Andrew are interchangeable in Acts of Andrew, 28. This belief in the apostle as the alter ego of his master (again, quite orthodox in itself) is thus expressed in dramatic and literal form.

9. However, the majority of the stories in the apocryphal Acts are concerned with the deeds of the eponymous hero—these are the ‘acts’ themselves.

10. The contents have had their influence on Christian tradition. The description of Paul (from the Acts of Paul and Thecla, 3) is well known: ‘And he saw Paul coming, a man small in size, bald-headed, bandy-legged, of noble mien, with eyebrows meeting, rather hook-nosed, full of grace. Sometimes he seemed like a man and sometimes had the face of an angel.’ The description of Peter’s inverse crucifixion and its significance relating to Adam’s birth occurs in the Acts of Peter. The tradition that India was evangelized by Thomas is found in the Acts of Thomas. The Quo Vadis? scene in which Jesus sees the impending death of the apostle as a repetition of his own crucifixion comes from the Acts of Peter; and a comparable scene also occurs in the Acts of Paul. In these self-conscious feminist days the story of Thecla in the Acts of Paul has had a fresh lease of life: this story is about a virgin named Thecla who hears Paul preach and decides to follow his teaching. She abandons her fiancé and subsequently rejects the importuning of a wealthy Syrian, a spurning that results in her being thrown to wild animals. She escapes unharmed. Her vow of celibacy causes her mother to have her burned but the pyre is miraculously extinguished. She performs an auto-baptism and becomes a preacher in her own right. The trials of a character who is not an apostle are rare in this type of literature but the tale was a popular one and ensured Thecla’s fame.

11. These stories obviously reveal that we are dealing with material significantly different from the canonical NT. The theological intensity and inspiration of the latter seem to have evaporated at the end of the first century. Much of the second-century literature analogous to the NT genres is conspicuously of a different character. It is not difficult, even with a casual dipping into the apocryphal Acts, to find a range of bizarre tales and strange miracles.

12. From the Acts of Andrew we read of Maximilla who forsakes her husband after she converts to Christianity and allows her servant, Euclia, to impersonate her in her husband’s bed so as to preserve her self-imposed abstinence. From the Acts of John we read of a parricide who later castrates himself: he is rebuked by John for so doing but is then converted. In the same book we have an odd tale where John rebukes bedbugs who disturb his sleep. We also have the long story of Drusiana and Callimachus that contains a case of attempted necrophiliac rape, but which results in most (but, unusually in this sort of story, not all) of the participants being converted. From the Acts of Paul comes the baptism of a lion—and Paul’s subsequent preservation when thrown to the self-same lion. In the Acts of Peter we see the story of an adulteress who becomes paralysed when she tries to receive the eucharist. Also we find a story in which Peter revives a dead fish. In the Acts of Thomas, which is a pilgrim’s progress of some 170 chapters, there is a long string of episodes including that of a man killed by a snake which identifies itself with the primeval serpent, and also the story of a speaking colt, which identifies itself as Balaam’s ass and the ass that bore Mary and later Jesus. In the Acts of Thomas we are also granted a lurid description of the otherworld by a woman who is brought back to life. (This is a rare theme in the Acts but tours of heaven and, particularly, of hell are regularly found in the apocryphal apocalypses, for example the Vision of Paul. See R.2–4.)

13. Confronted by such stories as these, many may contemptuously move to literature on a higher spiritual plane. But it would be a mistake if those seeking a picture of second-century Christianity were to reject these apocrypha as if they contained mainly heretical, unorthodox, or Gnostic material. Those adjectives may accurately describe some details in the apocryphal Acts but not the highest percentage of their contents.

14. The apocryphal Acts have a historic value. Their most obvious use is that they give an unparalleled insight into the popular folk religion of their times. But even more important, they reveal aspects of early Christian preaching, teaching, and worship. Most of these Acts are orthodox and catholic and stem from those second- to third-century Christians who in writing these stories of the apostles projected their own faith. In our day we may well reject the stories as bizarre and turn away from their longwindedness, but behind their undoubted exaggeration and distortion lies a faith that shares much with the NT in general and the Acts of the Apostles in particular. The stories are merely vehicles for a faith that has many characteristics in common with biblical Christianity. Despite alleged links between the apocryphal Acts and Polybius, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Tacitus, and Josephus, the main inspiration behind the apocryphal Acts was the canonical Acts.

15. The above sampling of some of the more sensational contents of the apocrypha could reinforce the commonly held view of this material. A more profitable reading of the texts looks for the motives behind these stories. And there are often positive theological points to be seen.

16. A brief survey of the canonical Acts will allow comparisons to be made. In Acts the church, somewhat idealized (2:43–7; 4:32–4), successfully spreads its message in increasingly concentric circles, beginning in Jerusalem, through the efforts of apostles (6:7; 9:31; 12:24; 16:5; 19:20). These men are up against a corrupt world that has destroyed Jesus but through divine protection, the Holy Spirit, and their own self-sacrifice and abstinence they overcome conflicts with the world’s authorities. They are arrested on several occasions (4:3; 5:18–19 with a miraculous release from goal; 12:4 with its mention of four squads of soldiers needed for the arrest and v. 7 with another miraculous release; 24:23). Stylistic speeches are placed on the lips of the various apostles, principally Peter and Paul, and these serve to justify the rationale of the Christian hope against Jewish expectations or pagan beliefs, to stress the invincibility of their message, and to defend their actions as apostles. Sacraments, baptism, the laying-on of hands, and the eucharist are described. Prayers are reported. Various healings, raisings from the dead, and other miracles are described. The apostles even display a mastery over natural powers—Paul's impending shipwreck is averted through his command of the situation. Numerous conversions occur including the eunuch and the proconsul of Paphos. Paul's own conversion is described three times. All these events take place within a restless travelogue: new scenes, new characters, new conflicts come and go in a profusion of anecdotes and episodes. Christ appears in various forms (18:9–10; 23:11). Wicked rulers (including Herod, 12:1–6, 19) and Jewish persecutors (13:45; 14:5, 19; 17:5; 20:3; 21:27; 23:12) are recurrent opponents. Many of these themes are the stock-in-trade of the apocryphal Acts too, which is not surprising if the canonical Acts was the inspiration behind them.

17. Despite the obvious differences between the canonical and apocryphal Acts, what is worth noting (once an initial repugnance to the apocryphal stories has been overcome) are the many similarities. It is appropriate to look at some of these in greater depth. First and foremost in all the Acts the triumph of God, of Jesus, and of his followers over evil and temporal powers is a common denominator. Secondly, each apostle is a peripatetic teacher. As such they emulate the Twelve and the Seventy (Seventy-two) sent out by Jesus. The Christian message with its universalism requires itinerant preachers. Several of the apocryphal Acts include a scene in which the individual apostles are allocated by lot their portion of the world for evangelization. Thus Thomas in the Acts of Thomas is sent to India. But the apostles are more than evangelists. During his ministry Jesus, according to Lk 10:19 and elsewhere, prepares his disciples to follow his example. After Pentecost these followers are empowered by the Spirit to be imitators of Jesus not only as travelling preachers but as healers and miracle-workers. The parallel between the life, miracles, and death of Jesus and that of the apostles is carefully drawn in the canonical Acts and that parallelism is also clear in the later traditions.

18. The apostles' deaths, usually martyrdoms, may be compared to that of Jesus: Peter and Andrew are crucified. Paul is decapitated and milk spurts from his severed neck onto his slaughterer. Thomas is slain by four soldiers. In the Acts of the Apostles, Stephen's and James's deaths are included, and Paul's, although not described, is none the less anticipated (20:24; 21:13; 28:30). Those responsible for these deaths may vary. In canonical Acts the protagonists are frequently Jews. In the apocryphal tradition the Christian (personified by the eponymous hero) is persecuted by Romans, Nero in the case of Paul in the Acts of Paul. This change is understandable in documents written a century or more after canonical Acts. The question of Israel's relationship to Jesus and his church became increasingly irrelevant to later Christian generations whose preoccupations were with Gentile authorities. None the less the important common link is that the apostles, as imitators of Christ, have to be arraigned before governors and kings, as Jesus himself was and as he predicted for his followers (Mk 13:9–13 and par.). This prediction can be dismissed as a prophecy after the event (or the trials of Jesus and the apostles in the NT seen as mere dramatic reconstructions invented by the church that in its own day was experiencing such ordeals when it spread into the pagan world) but those ordeals were real enough, and it is the belief that the trials were to be endured because Jesus himself had suffered which provides the motive behind these stories of persecution, arrest, trial, and death in all types of early Christian literature. In addition—particularly in the apocrypha—the various trial scenes serve as convenient contexts for the authors to have their hero preach a sermon before large, and generally sympathetic, crowds. A courtroom scene is a useful device for allowing the apostle to deliver a major apologia pro vita sua. It is important to read these defences as they are likely to represent the rationale of those Christians who identify with the apostle in order to withstand their own tribulations. They are moral stories encouraging fearless faith. And that is as true in the apocrypha as in the NT.

19. The apostles in the apocryphal Acts are imitators of Jesus even after death. Just as Jesus fails to be bound by death, so too the apostles' deaths are in fact triumphs: Thomas reappears after death; the dust from his empty tomb is used to effect the conversion of his killer, King Misdaeus. Nero sees a vision (presumably of Peter) after Peter's death and he subsequently ceases persecuting Christians. In the Acts of Paul Nero hears of Paul's reappearance; Longus, a proconsul, and Cestus, a centurion, see Titus and Luke praying with Paul after the latter's death.

20. Among the speeches the farewell address of the apostle, from Stephen onwards, is another valuable vehicle in which the author can give a defence of Christianity. Jesus' three-chapter farewell discourse in the fourth gospel doubtless provided a precedent for the long farewell in, among other places, the Acts of Andrew, where, like a grand-opera singer expiring after a lengthy death bed aria, Andrew gives a final sermon that lasts over three days.

21. It is worth noting that in the Acts of Andrew and the Acts of Peter the hero apostrophizes the cross on which he is to die. These are presented as private meditations. The speech in the Acts of John occurs in the MS that provides chs. 87–105; it is highly mystical and has probably been influenced by Gnostic ideas. For documents that took root in the somewhat syncretistic environment of the second century we should not be surprised to find in several of the apocryphal Acts the influence of Gnosticism. The Gnostic and heretical tinges were primarily responsible for the judgement that the documents as a whole were secondary, heretical, spurious—in other words 'apocryphal' in the conventional understanding of that word. Jerome rejected the orthodoxy of the Acts of Paul, Eusebius in his History denounced the Acts of Andrew, the Acts of John, the Acts of Paul, and the Acts of Peter as heretical, Epiphanius claimed that the Encratites used the Acts of Andrew, of John, and of Thomas. The Gelasian Decree (early 6th cent.) lists the Acts of Andrew, Peter, Paul, and Thomas as 'apocryphal', Augustine and Filaster of Brescia say that the Manicheans and Priscillianists used Andrew, Thomas, and Peter. The Manicheans substituted the five great apocryphal Acts for the canonical Acts. All of this succeeded in condemning these and allied apocryphal Acts. It was not so much that their contents were at fault, it was that they had been contaminated by having been associated with groups deemed heretical by the orthodox. But, as we have tried to show, the animus behind the composition, their speeches, theology, and miracles are not as unorthodox as one thinks. Even a passage such as the Acts Pet. 29 in which we read that Peter was venerated like a god and that the sick were laid at his feet for him to heal them is no more exaggerated or superstitious than Acts 5:12–16 where Peter's shadow is sufficient to cause miraculous healings, or 19:11–12, where it is said that handkerchiefs and scarves were touched by Paul to effect cures. As for the godlike nature of the apostle, again the canonical Acts sets a precedent in 14:13–18 when sacrifices were about to be made to Paul and Barnabas, or 28:6 where Paul is taken to be a god by the Maltese.

22. Another common denominator is that of sea journeys. They form a necessary part of many travel narratives, but they often have a supernatural side to them. Possibly this form of transport was particularly prone to disaster, and the traveller by sea was dependent on divine protection. Certainly Paul's journey to Italy in Acts 27–8 was beset with disasters. His labours were seen as a test of his faith. Similarly in the second-century Acts not only is such a theme repeated but the boat itself almost seems to symbolize the church. In the Acts of Peter the steersman is named, significantly, Theon: en route Peter and Theon are granted a Christophany. In the Acts of Paul Paul's journey by boat (a story independent of that in Acts) is captained by a believer, and, again a Christophany occurs; the apostle is strengthened in his faith. The Acts of Andrew and Matthias, considered by some to have prefaced the Acts of Andrew, has a similar episode in which Jesus is portrayed as the master-helmsman.

23. Among other links between the two categories of Acts is that the sacraments of baptism and eucharist are well represented. The apocryphal Acts include a new sacrament, that of sealing. There are several occurrences of this rite: usually it seems to be a way of symbolically branding ownership, especially on new converts. In both the canonical and the apocryphal Acts Christianity is seen to triumph over paganism, represented by sorcerers. The episode of the silversmiths at Ephesus in Acts 19:23–41 serves that purpose, as does the strange tale of the sons of Sceva in Acts 19:13–20. Both Philip and Paul overcome sorcerers (Acts 8:9–13; 13:6–12). In the apocrypha we may point to the story of the destruction of the temple of Artemis and the conversion of its priests in Acts Jn 32–45. The story of the destruction of the statue of Caesar and its subsequent restoration in Acts Pet. 11 serves the same purpose of showing symbolically the Christian's control or supremacy over pagan rulers. Peter's contact with Simon Magus inspired the lengthy contests between the two in Acts of Peter: the 15 verses of the account in Acts are now inflated to several chapters in which not only do Peter and Simon deliver lengthy speeches but so also do a dog and an infant! The trial of strength obviously goes in Peter's favour as he is the personification of Good against Evil. Nothing could be more orthodox than this, and the apocryphal tales are in the same mould as medieval mystery plays. The underlying faith of these apocryphal tales may be recognized as undeniably Christian even when their modes of expression are harnessed to storytelling conventions that are, to modern sophisticated minds, inappropriate, ludicrous, or counterproductive.

24. A fair judgement that can legitimately be made about the apocryphal Acts is that they exaggerate or overemphasize, and thereby distort, an element that is often present in the canonical writings. The roundness and multifaceted nature of the canonical writings, especially the epistles and the gospels with their paradoxes concerning the person and message of Christ, are diluted in the second-century Acts.

25. Nevertheless, however anodyne, prolix, and repetitive much of the teaching in the apocryphal Acts may be, the speeches are worthy of attention. It is rewarding to read the prayers, such as that found in Acts Thom. 50 during the eucharist, for example, to gain an insight into the preoccupations and practice of the second-century church:

Come, perfect compassion; Come, fellowship with the male; Come, you who know the mysteries of the Chosen One; Come, you who have partaken in all the combats of the noble combatant; Come, rest, that reveals the great deeds of the whole greatness; Come, you who disclose secrets and make manifest the mysteries; Come, holy dove, Who bears the twin young; Come, secret mother; Come, you who are manifest in your deeds; Come, giver of joy and of rest to those who are united to you; Come and commune with us in this eucharist, which we celebrate in your name, And in the agape, in which we are united at your calling.

26. Few would find fault with the message in Acts Pet. 26:

While the young men were saying this, the prefect in the forum looked at Peter and said, 'What do you say, Peter? Behold, the lad is dead; the emperor liked him, and I spared him not. I had indeed many other young men; but I trusted in you and in your Lord whom you proclaim, if indeed you are sure and truthful: therefore I allowed him to die.' And Peter said, 'God is neither tempted nor weighed in the balance. But he is to be worshipped with the whole heart by those whom he loves and he will hear those who are worthy. Since, however, my God and Lord Jesus Christ is now tempted among you, he is doing many signs and miracles through me to turn you from your sins. In your power, revive now through my voice, O Lord, in the presence of all, him whom Simon killed by his touch.' And Peter said to the master of the lad, 'Come, take hold of him by the right hand and you shall have him alive and walking with you.' And the prefect Agrippa ran and came to the lad, took his hand, and restored him to life. And when the multitude saw this they cried, 'There is only one God, the God of Peter.'

27. Nor would orthodox believers quibble with the teaching on the incarnation in Acts Thom. 79–80; 143, in which the corporeal reality of Christ's earthly body shows that this apocryphon is not Gnostic or Docetist in its proclivities. Acts of Thomas's teaching on redemption through suffering in ch. 72 is also standard:

Having said this, they alighted from the wagon. And the apostle began to say, 'Jesus Christ, whose knowledge is despised in this country; Jesus Christ, of whom nothing has been heard in this country; Jesus, [you] who receive all apostles in every country and every city, and by whom all worthy of you are glorified; Jesus, [you] who have taken a form and become like a man and appeared to all of us in order not to separate us from your love; Lord, you are he who has given himself for us and has bought us with a price by his blood, as a precious possession. But what have we, Lord, to offer in exchange for your life which you have given for us? For what we have is your gift. We entreat you and thereby have life.' (ch. 72)

28. We can see that in the circles that produced and used this literature wealth was abhorrent. (Peter, for instance, has several tirades against the earthly values of Eubula in ch. 17 and against Chryse in 30–1; John rails against beauty and possessions in Acts Jn. 43.) The theme of celibacy is a recurring one. See, for instance, Acts Jn. 113, where John recalls he was glad he was prevented from marriage and prays to God:

You who have preserved me also till the present hour pure to yourself, and free from intercourse with a woman; who, when I inclined in my youth to marry, appeared to me and said, 'I am in need of you, John'; who prepared for me beforehand my bodily weakness; who, on the third occasion when I wished to marry, prevented me immediately, and said to me at the third hour on the sea, 'John, if you were not mine, I would let you marry'; who for two years blinded me, letting me mourn and be dependent on you; who in the third year opened up the spiritual eyes, and gave me back my visible eyes; who, when I regained my sight, disclosed to me the repugnance of gazing upon a woman; who delivered me from temporary show, and guided me to eternal life; who separated me from the foul madness of the flesh; who snatched me from bitter death, and presented me only to you; who silenced the secret disease of the soul, and cut off its open deed; who afflicted and banished him who rebelled in me; who established a spotless friendship to you; who prepared a safe way to you; who gave me undoubting faith in you; who have traced out for me pure thoughts towards you; who have given the due reward to every deed; who have set it in my soul to have no other possession than you alone—for what can be more precious than you? Now, since I have accomplished your stewardship with which I was entrusted, make me worthy, O Lord, of your repose, and give me my end in you, which is the unspeakable and ineffable salvation.

29. In the Acts of Thomas the apostle urges celibacy on a bridal couple and both accept. In the Acts of Peter Xanthippe leaves her husband: as he is a friend of the emperor, Peter's death is consequently arranged. A similar situation occurs when leading women in the Acts of Thomas accept celibacy in marriage. There may even be a touch of humour in the way the hapless pagan husbands persistently importune and entreat their determined wives who subject them to the treatment meted out by Lysistrata (see Acts Andr. 14; 37).

30. A comparable theme is that the apostles are consistently described as ascetics: they practise a rigorous self-denial, their abstinence and otherworldliness are exemplary. The reputation of Thomas (Acts Thom. 20) is typical: continually he fasts and prays, and eats only bread with salt. His drink is water, and he wears only one garment whatever the weather. He takes nothing from anyone, and what he has he gives to others. One can understand why Encratite groups found these Acts congenial, but the teaching in itself is compatible with and closely paralleled in NT teaching, even though unworldliness and chastity as Christian virtues are pushed to the extremes, as for example in the uncompromisingly negative teaching about marriage and procreation in Acts Thom. 12:

Remember my children, what my brother said to you, and to whom he commended you; and know that if you refrain from this filthy intercourse you become temples holy and pure, being released from afflictions and troubles, known and unknown, and you will not be involved in the cares of life and of children, whose end is destruction. But if you get many children, for their sakes you become grasping and avaricious, plundering orphans and deceiving widows, and by doing this you subject yourselves to most grievous punishments. For most children become unprofitable, being possessed by demons, some openly and some secretly. For they become either lunatics or half withered or crippled or deaf or dumb or paralysed or idiots. And even though they be healthy, they will be again good-for-nothing, doing unprofitable and abominable works. For they will be detected either in adultery or in murder or in theft or in unchastity, and by all these you will be afflicted. But if you obey and preserve your souls pure to God, there will be born to you living children, untouched by these hurtful things, and you will be without care, spending an untroubled life, free from grief and care, looking forward to receive that incorruptible and true marriage, and you will enter as groomsmen into that bridal chamber full of immortality and light.

But such teaching did not originate in the apocrypha. The Christian tradition since the beginning elevated poverty, obedience, and chastity as ideals, and the NT itself extols the unique value of fellowship with God as the only basis for true family relationship (in, for instance, Mk 3:33–5; Lk 14:26).

31. Two particular passages within the apocryphal Acts are worthy of our attention, not only because of their distinctiveness from much of their contexts but also because of the beauty and poignancy of their poetry. These are the Hymn of Christ in Acts Jn 94–5, a poem since set to music by Gustav Holst, and the Hymn of the Soul or Hymn of the Pearl in the Acts of Thomas. Both poems are likely to have been insertions into their respective narratives; they may have had an independent existence previously. The former concerns Christ and the disciples who exchange verses and responses within the context of a dance. The latter is a charming oriental tale of a youth who sets out to recover a pearl of great price, and when he ultimately succeeds in his mission he is rewarded with a heavenly garment. The allegory may be one of the incarnation, or (to those who see Gnostic ideas at work) the soul in search of its heavenly origins. Both these hymns merit careful reading. The Hymn of Christ is narrated by John:

He then began to sing a hymn, and to say: 'Glory be to you, Father! And we circling him said, 'Amen.' 'Glory be to you, Word! Glory be to you, Grace!' 'Amen.' 'Glory be to you, Spirit! Glory be to you, Holy One! Glory be to the glory!' 'Amen.' 'We praise you, O Father. We give thanks to you, light, in whom darkness does not abide.' 'Amen.' 'Now we give thanks, I say: I will be saved, and I will save.' 'Amen.' 'I will be loosed, and I will loose.' 'Amen.' 'I will be pierced, and I will pierce.' 'Amen.' 'I will be born, and I will bear.' 'Amen.' 'I will eat, and I will be eaten.' 'Amen.' 'I will hear, and I will be heard.' 'Amen.' 'I will be understood, being wholly understanding.' 'Amen.' 'I will be washed, and I will wash.' 'Amen.'

Grace is dancing. 'I will pipe, dance all of you!' 'Amen.' 'I will mourn, lament all of you!' 'Amen.' 'An Ogdoad is singing with us.' 'Amen.' 'The Twelfth number is dancing above.' 'Amen.' 'The whole universe takes part in the dancing.' 'Amen.' 'He who does not dance, does not know what is being done.' 'Amen.' 'I will flee and I will stay.' 'Amen.' 'I will adorn, and I will be adorned.' 'Amen.' 'I will be united, and I will unite.' 'Amen.' 'I have no house, and I have houses.' 'I have no place, and I have places.' 'Amen.' 'I have no temple, and I have temples.' 'Amen.' 'I am a lamp to you who see me.' 'Amen.' 'I am a mirror to you who perceive.' 'Amen.' 'I am a door to you who knock on me.' 'Amen.' 'I am a way to you, wayfarer.' 'Amen.'

32. The theology and the character of the canonical Acts may itself have been responsible for any change of direction from the character of the gospels and epistles. Once the traditional sources and rich material of Luke's gospel gave way to the picaresque contents of his second volume we leave the world of Hellenistic Judaism and embark on material that shows the influence of secular romances and pagan historiography. This influence permeates the second-century Acts. The characteristically Pauline theology of his letters is conspicuous by its absence not only in the apocryphal Acts of Paul and the Acts of Peter but in the canonical Acts as well. The theological teaching of Acts may be said to be less significant than that in the NT gospels or epistles, even though its principal aim of showing the growth of Christianity as a universal religion is admirably achieved. The real hero of Acts is the gospel which spreads through the Spirit's guidance from the centre of the old dispensation, Jerusalem, to Rome, the capital of the empire, within thirty years of Jesus' death. (Peter, even Paul, are not elevated to centre stage: Peter merely goes off elsewhere in Acts 12:17; Paul's death is left unrecorded.) As it stands, Acts may legitimately qualify as the first history book of the church. Its success set the ball rolling, and the popular religious fervour of the next century carried on in that tradition by retailing comparable stories about the spread of Christianity, but now with one apostle as gospel-bearer completely in the spotlight.

33. It is instructive to return to the canonical Acts after having had a diet of reading the apocrypha. One finds that it is the similarities rather than the differences between the two that are striking. Because the second-century Acts are derivative and owe their inspiration to the Acts of the Apostles this is perhaps not so unexpected. The miraculous disappearance of Philip (8:39), the supernatural deaths of Ananias and Sapphira, the lengthy story about the conversion of Cornelius, Saul's blindness, Elymas's blindness, Peter's vision of food, and the stirring sea yarns would all sit comfortably in one of the apocryphal Acts. Modern Christians are accustomed to accept—or rationalize—these stories without ridicule just as they are prepared to accept the miracles of Jesus—especially nature miracles like his walking on the water, or the blasting of the fig-tree—or the story of the transfiguration in the gospels. The apocryphal writings do not have the monopoly of incredible legends.

34. However, the apocryphal Acts seldom match the drive or spirituality of the canonical Acts and instead are almost entirely moralistic with accounts of their eponymous hero's exploits. The entertainment value of the tales was obviously paramount in the apocryphal tradition, but these Acts are witnesses to the religious ideas of a great part of Christendom—even if such teaching did not match the intellectual debates and theological ideals of the patristic writers and ecclesiastical hierarchy when they attempted to proclaim or standardize Christian doctrine and literature. These Acts were the popular reading-matter of Christians in many parts of the Mediterranean, Syria, North Africa, and Asia over several centuries at precisely the same time as the great patristic thinkers were formulating creeds, doctrines, and canons of belief and practice. The apocrypha show us that early Christianity was not preoccupied only with high theological debate, with niceties of definition, or with ethics and philosophy. The apocryphal Acts may be crudely sensational, may promote an unthinking superstition at worst, a simple faith at best, but their creation, enduring existence, and undoubted popularity show us that Christianity was vibrant, popular, and above all successful throughout the dark ages of the second century and beyond.

Q. Apocryphal Letters. 1. Given Paul's reputation as a letter-writer, it is not surprising that several apocryphal letters claim to be from his pen. A letter from the Corinthian church to Paul and his reply, known as 3 Corinthians, are found in the Acts of Paul. A portion of that reply reads:

Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ, to the brethren at Corinth, greeting! Being in many afflictions, I marvel not that the teachings of the evil one had such rapid success. For my Lord Jesus Christ will quickly come, since he is rejected by those who falsify his teaching. For I delivered to you first of all what I received from the apostles before me who were always with Jesus Christ, that our Lord Jesus Christ was born of Mary of the seed of David, the Father having sent the spirit from heaven into her that he might come into this world and save all flesh by his own flesh and that he might raise us in the flesh from the dead as he has presented himself to us as our example. And since man is created by his Father, for this reason was he sought by him when he was lost, to become alive by adoption. For the almighty God, maker of heaven and earth, sent the prophets first to the Jews to deliver them from their sins, for he wished to save the house of Israel; therefore he took from the spirit of Christ and poured it out upon the prophets who proclaimed the true worship of God for a long period of time. For the wicked prince who wished to be God himself laid his hands on them and killed them and bound all flesh of man to his pleasure. But the almighty God, being just, and not wishing to repudiate his creation had mercy and sent his Spirit into Mary the Galilean, that the evil one might be conquered by the same flesh by which he held sway, and be convinced that he is not God. For by his own body Jesus Christ saved all flesh, presenting in his own body a temple of righteousness through which we are saved.

2. The most famous of the other invented letters, allegedly written by Paul, is the Epistle to the Laodiceans. As is usual in the traditions of this apocryphal literature, the original impetus to concoct a writing was because of a perceived gap in the NT. Col 4:16 refers to a letter Paul wrote to the church in Laodicea. That letter did not survive. The apocryphal letter was created, perhaps as early as the second century, out of phrases found in the authentic Pauline corpus, particularly Philipians and Galatians, in order to compose an epistle intended to be accepted as that referred to in Colossians. That it succeeded in its purpose is shown by its appearance in several Latin MSS of the NT, including the famous codices Fuldensis, Cavensis, and Ardmachanus. It even appears as an appendix at the conclusion of modern printed editions of the Latin Vulgate, such as the Stuttgart edition, Biblia Sacra (†1994). A portion (vv. 6–16) reads:

And now my bonds are manifest, which I suffer in Christ, on account of which I am glad and rejoice. This to me leads to eternal salvation, which itself is brought about through your prayers and by the help of the Holy Spirit, whether it be through life or through death. For my life is in Christ and to die is joy. And his mercy will work in you, that you may have the same love and be of one mind. Therefore, beloved, as you have heard in my presence, so hold fast and work in the fear of God, and eternal life will be yours. For it is God who works in you. And do without hesitation what you do. And for the rest, beloved, rejoice in Christ and beware of those who are out for sordid gain. May all your requests be manifest before God, and be steadfast in the mind of Christ. And do what is pure, true, proper, just and lovely. And what you have heard and received, hold in your heart, and peace will be with you.

3. Other apocryphal epistles include a set of fourteen letters, most of which are likely to have been composed in the fourth century, purporting to be correspondence between Paul and Seneca.

4. There is even a letter allegedly from Christ to Abgar. This occurs in a version of a legend related by Eusebius. Abgar, who was king of Edessa from 4 BCE to 7 CE and again from 13–50 CE, sent a letter to Jesus asking him to come to Edessa to heal his malady. Jesus did not accede to the request, but sent a letter instead. This is that letter:

You are blessed; you believe in me, and you have not seen me. It is written concerning me, 'Those who have seen me will not believe in me', and 'Those who have not seen me will believe and will be saved.' Regarding what you wrote to me that I should come to you, I have to complete here everything I was sent to do and, after I have accomplished it, to be taken up to him who sent me. After I have been taken up I will send to you one of my disciples to heal your suffering and to provide life for you and those with you.

After Jesus' death Thomas sent Thaddeus (or Addai in the Syriac) to visit the king. Thaddeus healed the king and Edessa was converted to Christianity. According to the fourth-century treatise, the Pilgrimage of Etheria, a letter of Christ's, possibly this one, was preserved and copied, and miraculous powers were attached to it.

5. Other texts have conventionally been classified as letters. The Epistula Apostolorum, for example, is, however, not really epistolary in form or content: it starts as a letter but soon turns into an apocalypse. (Perhaps the book of Revelation provides a loose parallel.) Similarly, the Epistle of Pseudo-Titus was never an example of real, personal correspondence. It is a homily on the theme of celibacy. That letter is used to assist in the recovery of some missing portions of the apocryphal Acts of John, of Peter, and of Andrew.

6. The Gnostic library found at Nag Hammadi used letters as a form of communication. The Letter (or Apocryphon) of James, like the Epistula Apostolorum, is another example of an apocalyptic book, and is a dialogue of the risen Saviour with those on earth.

R. Apocryphal Apocalypses. 1. Christian writers, biblical and post-biblical, concerned themselves, just as their Jewish predecessors had done, with apocalyptic themes and teaching. The word 'apocalypse' means a revelation of things normally hidden. In general, apocalypses speak of the signs and portents presaging the end of this world, and of the nature of the other world. In the apocryphal literature we may separate these two features. There are those passages which describe what heaven and hell hold in store for the faithful and the unbeliever. The language of these apocalypses is dualistic and speaks of two opposing realms: hell, the abode only of the sinner, and heaven, the home of the believer. Post-biblical writers used this genre of literature with its tours of the other world with great imagination. It could well be that biblical texts such as Rev 21:1–8 provided the starting-point for the richly developed imaginative constructions we find in the apocryphal books. The writings may have been relegated as 'spurious' or 'secondary', in other words as 'apocryphal' in the common understanding of that term, but they were obviously regularly read by Christians even after their use was condemned by the ecclesiastical authorities.

2. Curiosity about the character of heaven and hell fascinated Christian writers from the earliest times. Two of the most influential texts were the Apocalypse of Peter, dating probably from the mid-second century, and the Apocalypse of Paul, probably written in the fourth century. Once again, one finds the names Peter and Paul in use as the supposed authors of apocryphal works. That an apocalypse was written in Paul's name is not surprising given the statement by Paul in 2 Cor 12 that he had been 'caught up as far as the third heaven'. In the authentic Pauline literature this baffling statement is not explained. It was an obvious gap that was left to the imagination of a later writer to fill. The Apocalypse of Paul tells what happened to Paul on his otherworldly visits. This apocalypse proved to be the most popular of the western church's apocryphal apocalypses, and it led to the generally held beliefs about heaven and hell that fuelled the medieval imagination. Much of the art and sculpture in the Middle Ages depicting the afterlife was inspired by this work. Dante's Inferno was also influenced by the Apocalypse of Paul and even quotes it.

3. The extracts below are taken from the Coptic Apoc. Pet. 26, 27, 31. If a modern reader feels that some of the imagery is commonplace, this familiarity is due to the pervading influence apocalyptic texts such as this one have had on subsequent literature.

And near that place I saw another gorge wherein the discharge and excrement of those who were in torment ran down, and became like a lake there. And women sat there up to their necks in that filth, and over against them many children born out of due time sat crying; and from them went forth rays of fire and smote the women in the eyes; and these were those who conceived out of wedlock and caused abortion.

And other men and women were being burned up to their middle and were cast down in a dark place and were scourged by evil spirits, having their entrails devoured by worms that never rested. And these were the ones who had persecuted the righteous and delivered them up.

And in another great lake full of foul pus and blood and boiling mire stood men and women up to their knees. And these were the ones who lent money and demanded usury upon usury.

4. Two extracts now follow from the Vision (or Apocalypse) of Paul. The first of these, from ch. 20, describes Paul's arrival in Paradise; the second, taken from ch. 31, comes from the much fuller descriptions of his visit to hell—there he encounters many sufferers.

And when I had entered within the gate of Paradise, there came out to meet me an old man whose countenance shone as the sun; and when he had embraced me he said, 'Hail, Paul, beloved of God.' And he kissed me with a cheerful countenance. He wept, and I said to him, 'Brother, why do you weep?' And again sighing and lamenting he said, 'We are hurt by men, and they grieve us greatly; for many are the good things which the Lord has prepared, and great is his promise, but many do not perceive them.' And I asked the angel and said, 'Sir, who is this?' And he said to me, 'This is Enoch, the scribe of righteousness.' And I entered into that place, and immediately I saw Elijah, and he came and greeted me, laughing and rejoicing. And when he had seen me, he turned away and wept, and said to me, 'Paul, would that you should receive the rewards of your labours which you have done for the human race. As for me, I have seen great and many good things which God has prepared for the just, and the promises of God are great, but many do not perceive them; but even after many labours scarcely one or two enter into these places.'

And I saw there a river boiling with fire, and in it a multitude of men and women immersed up to the knees, and other men up to the navel, others even up to the lips, others up to the hair. And I asked the angel and said, 'Sir, who are those in the fiery river?' And the angel answered and said to me, 'They are neither hot nor cold, because they were found neither in the number of the just nor in the number of the godless. For those spent the time of their life on earth passing some days in prayer, but others in sins and fornications, until their death.' And I asked him and said, 'Who are these, sir, immersed up to their knees in fire?' He answered and said to me, 'These are they who when they have gone out of church occupy themselves with idle disputes. Those who are immersed up to the navel are those who, when they have taken the body and blood of Christ, go and fornicate and do not cease from their sins till they die. Those who are immersed up to the lips are those who slander each other when they assemble in the church of God; those up to the eyebrows are those who nod to each other and plot spite against their neighbour.'

5. Whereas the apocalypses of Peter and of Paul are concerned with the current state of affairs in heaven and hell, the Apocalypse of Thomas contains predictions about the ending of the present world. It is thus 'apocalyptic' in its sense of foretelling the future. From the NT onwards Christians were made aware that they were already living in the end time. For them Christ was believed to have inaugurated the last age. Christians were not sure how imminent that final day, increasingly thought of as the day of judgement, would be; many hazarded a guess. Nor did the Christians know what warnings would announce or precede the coming of the End. Again, attempts were made to list which events were to be disregarded and which were portentous. Apocalyptic passages in the NT gospels and of course the book of Revelation are concerned with these warnings and the signs of the times. Such speculation has never ceased. The writer of the Apocalypse of Thomas, dating perhaps from the fifth century, gave a countdown, and describes the events of the final six days before the end of the world. One part of this text is given here: it concerns the events on the fourth day before the End.

And on the fourth day, at the first hour, from the land of the east the abyss shall melt and roar. Then shall all the earth be shaken by the might of an earthquake. In that day shall the ornaments of the heathen fall, and all the buildings of the earth, before the might of the earthquake. These are the signs of the fourth day.

REFERENCES

- Aland, K. (ed.) (1985), Synopsis Quattuor Evangeliorum, 13th edn. (Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft).
- Barnard, L. W. (1966), Studies in the Apostolic Fathers and their Background (Oxford: Blackwell).
- Carleton Paget, J. (1994), The Epistle of Barnabas: Outlook and Background, WUNT 2/64 (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck]).
- Dibelius, M. (1923), Die Apostolischen Väter, iv. Der Hirt des Hermas, HNT Ergänzungsband (Tübingen: Mohr).
- Draper, J. A. (1996) (ed.), The Didache in Modern Research, AGJU 37 (Leiden: Brill).
- Elliott, J. K. (ed.) (1993), The Apocryphal New Testament (Oxford: Clarendon).
- Grant, R. M. (1964), The Apostolic Fathers: An Introduction, Apostolic Fathers, 1 (New York: Nelson).
- (1966), Ignatius of Antioch, Apostolic Fathers, 4 (Camden: Nelson).
- and Graham, H. H. (1965), First and Second Clement, Apostolic Fathers, 2 (New York: Nelson).
- Hahneman, G. M. (1992), The Muratorian Fragment and the Development of the Canon (Oxford: Clarendon), esp. ch. 2.
- Hlavik, R. (1996), The Struggle for Scripture and Covenant, WUNT 2/82 (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck]).
- Huck, A. (1981), Synopse der drei ersten Evangelien, 13th edn., rev. H. Greeven (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck]).
- Jefford, C. N. (ed.) (1995), The Didache in Context, NovTSup 77 (Leiden: Brill).
- (1996), Reading the Apostolic Fathers (Peabody, NJ: Hendrickson).
- Joly, R. (1968), Le Pasteur: Introduction, texte critique, traduction, notes, SC 53, 2nd edn. (Paris: Cerf).
- Kirkland, A. (1990), The Shepherd of Hermas: Some Aspects of its Composition and Transmission, unpublished Ph.D. thesis, University of Cape Town.
- Koester, H. (1990), Ancient Christian Gospels (London: SCM).
- (1957), Synoptische Überlieferung bei den Apostolischen Vätern, TU 65 (Berlin: Akademie).
- Kraft, R. A. (1965), Barnabas and the Didache, Apostolic Fathers, 3 (New York: Nelson).
- Lake, K. (1912–13), The Apostolic Fathers, LCL (2 vols.; London: Heinemann).
- Lightfoot, J. B., and Harmer, J. R. (1989), The Apostolic Fathers, rev. M. W. Holmes (Grand Rapids: Baker Book House).
- Linnemann, A. (1992), Die Apostolischen Väter, i. Die Clemensbriefe (Tübingen: Mohr [Siebeck]).
- Neirynck, F. (1991), 'The Apocryphal Gospels and the Gospel of Mark', in F. Van Segbroeck (ed.), Evangelica, ii. 1982–1991: Collected Essays by Frans Neirynck, BETL 99 (Leuven: Leuven University Press), 715–72.
- Niederwimmer, K. (1993), Die Didache, Kommentar zu den apostolischen Vätern, 1 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht). E. T. 1998 (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Osiek, C. (1999), The Shepherd of Hermas (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Prigent, P., and Kraft, R. A. (1971), Épître de Barnabé, SC 172 (Paris: Cerf).
- Rordorf, W., and Tuilier, A. (1978), La Doctrine des douze apôtres (Didache), SC 248 (Paris: Cerf).
- Schneemelcher, W. (ed.) (1991–2), New Testament Apocrypha, ET R. McL. Wilson (Cambridge: Clarke), i, ii.
- Scholer, D. M. (1971), Nag Hammadi Bibliography 1948–1969, NHS 3 (Leiden: Brill).
- Tuckett, C. M. (1989), 'Synoptic Tradition in the Didache', in J.-M. Sevrin (ed.), The New Testament in Early Christianity, BETL 86 (Leuven: Leuven University Press), 197–230.
- Tugwell, S. (1989), The Apostolic Fathers (London: Chapman).
- Wengst, K. (1984), Schriften des Urchristentums, ii. Didache (Apostel-lehre), Barnabasbrief, Zweiter Klemensbrief, Schrift an Diognet (Munich: Köselverlag; Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Bibelgesellschaft).
- Whittaker, M. (1967), Die Apostolischen Väter, i. Hermas, Der Hirt des Hermas, GCS 48/2, 2nd edn. (Berlin: Akademie).
- Windisch, H. (1920), Die Apostolischen Väter, iii. Der Barnabasbrief, HNT Ergänzungsband (Tübingen: Mohr).

83. Bibliographical Guide to Biblical Studies

History and Theology, Old Testament

- Barr, J. (1999), The Concept of Biblical Theology: An Old Testament Perspective (London: SCM).
- Bright, J. (1981), A History of Israel, 3rd edn. (London: SCM).
- Brueggemann, W. (1997), Theology of the Old Testament: Testimony, Dispute, Advocacy (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Clements, R. E. (1978), Old Testament Theology: A Fresh Approach (London: Marshall, Morgan, and Scott).
- Eichrodt, W. (1961–7), Theology of the Old Testament (2 vols.; London: SCM).
- Hayes, J. H., and Miller, J. M. (1990), Israelite and Judaeon History (London: SCM).
- Herrmann, S. (1981), A History of Israel in Old Testament Times (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Jagersma, H. (1982), A History of Israel in the Old Testament Period (London: SCM).
- (1985), A History of Israel from Alexander the Great to Bar Kochba (London: SCM).
- Noth, M. (1960), The History of Israel, 2nd edn. (London: A. & C. Black).
- von Rad, G. (1975), Old Testament Theology (2 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Brueggemann, W., and Wolff, H. W. (1975), The Vitality of OT Traditions (Atlanta: John Knox).
- Clements, R. E. (1976), A Century of OT Study (Guildford: Lutterworth).
- Clines, D. J. A. (1978), The Theme of the Pentateuch (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Lohfink, N. (1994), Theology of the Pentateuch: Themes of the Priestly Narrative and Deuteronomy (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Nicholson, E. W. (1997), The Pentateuch in the Twentieth Century (Oxford: Oxford University Press).
- Noth, M. (1972), A History of Pentateuchal Traditions, ET (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall); from German original, überlieferungs-geschichte des Pentateuch, 1948.
- Patrick, D. (1986), Old Testament Law (London: SCM).
- Pritchard, J. B. (ed.) (1969), Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, 3rd edn. (Princeton: Princeton University Press).
- von Rad, G. (1962), OT Theology, ET (Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd).
- Wellhausen, J. (1885), Prolegomena to the History of Israel, ET (Edinburgh: A. & C. Black); from German original, Geschichte Israels I, 1878.
- Whybray, R. N. (1987), The Making of the Pentateuch: A Methodological Study (Sheffield: JSOT).

2. Introduction to the Old Testament

- Barton, J. (1991), What is the Bible? (London: SPCK).
- (1997), Making the Christian Bible (London: Darton, Longman & Todd).
- Blenkinsopp, J. (1984), A History of Prophecy in Israel from the Settlement in the Land to the Hellenistic Period (London: SPCK).
- Childs, B. S. (1979), Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (London: SCM).
- Crenshaw, J. L. (1981), Old Testament Wisdom: An Introduction (Atlanta: John Knox).
- Davies, P. R. (1998), Scribes and Schools: The Canonization of the Hebrew Scriptures (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox).
- Hayes, J. H. (1982), An Introduction to Old Testament Study (London: SCM).
- Kaiser, O. (1975), Introduction to the Old Testament: A Presentation of its Results and Problems (Oxford: Blackwell).
- Laffey, A. (1988), An Introduction to the Old Testament: A Feminist Perspective (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Noth, M. (1966), 'The Laws in the Pentateuch: Their Assumptions and Meaning', in his The Laws in the Pentateuch and Other Essays (Edinburgh and London), 1–107.
- Soggin, J. A. (1989), Introduction to the Old Testament: From its Origins to the Closing of the Alexandrian Canon (London: SCM).
- Theissen, G. (1984), Biblical Faith: An Evolutionary Perspective (London: SCM).
- Blenkinsopp, J. (1992), The Pentateuch. An Introduction to the First Five Books of the Bible (London: SCM).
- Gunkel, H. (1964), The Legends of Genesis (New York: Schocken).
- McKane, W. (1979), Studies in the Pentateuchal Narratives (Edinburgh: Handsel).
- Noth, M. (1972), A History of Pentateuchal Traditions (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall).
- Redford, D. B. (1970), A Study of the Biblical Story of Joseph (Genesis 37–50), VTSup 20 (Leiden: Brill).
- Rogerson, J. W. (1974), Myth in Old Testament Interpretation, BZAW 134 (Berlin: de Gruyter).
- Thompson, T. L. (1974), The Historicity of the Patriarchal Narratives, BZAW 133 (Berlin: de Gruyter).
- Van Seters, J. (1975), Abraham in History and Tradition (New Haven and London: Yale University Press).
- von Rad, G. (1966), 'The Joseph Narrative and Ancient Wisdom', in The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Essays (Edinburgh and London: Oliver & Boyd), 292–300.
- (1972), Genesis, OTL, 2nd edn. (London: SCM).
- Westermann, C. (1974), Creation (London: SPCK; Philadelphia: Fortress).
- (1980), The Promises to the Patriarchs. Studies on the Patriarchal Narratives (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Genesis (3 vols.; London: SPCK, 1984, 1985, 1987).
- Genesis (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987; London: SPCK, 1988).
- Whybray, R. N. (1987), The Making of the Pentateuch. A Methodological Study, JSOTSup 53 (Sheffield: JSOT).

3. Introduction to the Pentateuch

- Alberty, R. (1994), A History of Israelite Religion in the OT Period, ET (2 vols.; London: SCM).
- Alt, A. (1966), 'The Origins of Israelite Law', in Essays on Old Testament History and Religion, ET (Oxford: Blackwell), 87–132. First published 1934.
- Blenkinsopp, J. (1992), The Pentateuch: An Introduction to the First Five Books of the Bible (London: SCM).

4. Genesis

- Blenkinsopp, J. (1992), The Pentateuch. An Introduction to the First Five Books of the Bible (London: SCM).
- Gunkel, H. (1964), The Legends of Genesis (New York: Schocken).
- McKane, W. (1979), Studies in the Pentateuchal Narratives (Edinburgh: Handsel).
- Noth, M. (1972), A History of Pentateuchal Traditions (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall).
- Redford, D. B. (1970), A Study of the Biblical Story of Joseph (Genesis 37–50), VTSup 20 (Leiden: Brill).
- Rogerson, J. W. (1974), Myth in Old Testament Interpretation, BZAW 134 (Berlin: de Gruyter).
- Thompson, T. L. (1974), The Historicity of the Patriarchal Narratives, BZAW 133 (Berlin: de Gruyter).
- Van Seters, J. (1975), Abraham in History and Tradition (New Haven and London: Yale University Press).
- von Rad, G. (1966), 'The Joseph Narrative and Ancient Wisdom', in The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Essays (Edinburgh and London: Oliver & Boyd), 292–300.
- (1972), Genesis, OTL, 2nd edn. (London: SCM).
- Westermann, C. (1974), Creation (London: SPCK; Philadelphia: Fortress).
- (1980), The Promises to the Patriarchs. Studies on the Patriarchal Narratives (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Genesis (3 vols.; London: SPCK, 1984, 1985, 1987).
- Genesis (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987; London: SPCK, 1988).
- Whybray, R. N. (1987), The Making of the Pentateuch. A Methodological Study, JSOTSup 53 (Sheffield: JSOT).

5. Exodus

- Brueggemann, W. (1994), 'Exodus', in The New Interpreter's Bible (vol. 1; Nashville: Abingdon).
- Cassuto, U. (1967), A Commentary on Exodus (Jerusalem: Magnes).
- Childs, B. S. (1974), Exodus: a Commentary (London: SCM).
- Croatto, J. S. (1981), Exodus: a Hermeneutics of Freedom (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books).

- Durham, J. I. (1987), Exodus, WBC (Waco, Tex.: Word).
- Fretheim, T. E. (1991), Exodus (Interpretation) (Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox).
- Gowan, D. E. (1994), Theology in Exodus: Biblical Theology in the Form of a Commentary (Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox).
- Gunn, D. M. (1982), 'The Hardening of Pharaoh's Heart', in D. J. A. Clines, D. M. Gunn, and A. J. Hauser (eds), Art and Meaning: Rhetoric in Biblical Literature, JSOTSup 19 (Sheffield: JSOT), 72–96.
- Haran, M. (1985), Temples and Temple Service in Ancient Israel, 2nd edn. (Winona Lake, Ind.: Eisenbrauns).
- Houtman, C. (1993–), Exodus, Historical Commentary on the Old Testament (3 vols.; Kampen: Kok).
- Johnstone, W. (1990), Exodus, Old Testament Guides (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Moberly, R., and Walter, L. (1983), At the Mountain of God: Story and Theology in Exodus 32–34, JSOTSup 22 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Nicholson, E. W. (1986), God and his People: Covenant and Theology in the Old Testament (Oxford: Clarendon).
- Patrick, D. (1986), Old Testament Law (London: SCM).
- Van Seters, J. (1994), The Life of Moses: the Yahwist as Historian in Exodus-Numbers (Kampen: Kok Pharos).

6. Leviticus

- Anderson, G. A. (1987), Sacrifices and Offerings in Ancient Israel: Studies in their Social and Political Importance, HSM 41 (Atlanta: Scholars Press).
- and Olyan, S. M. (eds.) (1991), Priesthood and Cult in Ancient Israel, JSOTSup 125 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Blenkinsopp, J. (1976), 'The Structure of P', CBQ 38: 275–92.
- Cassuto, U. (1961), The Documentary Hypothesis and the Composition of the Pentateuch (Jerusalem: Magnes).
- Cross, F. M. (1973), Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press).
- Grabbe, L. L. (1991), 'Maccabean Chronology: 167–164 or 168–165 BCE?', JBL 110: 59–74.
- Kaufmann, Y. (1961), The Religion of Israel From its Beginnings to the Babylonian Exile (tr. and abr. M. Greenberg) (London: George Allen & Unwin).
- Levine, B. A. (1989), Leviticus, JPS Torah Commentary (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society).
- McKeating, H. (1979), 'Sanctions against Adultery in Ancient Israelite Society, with Some Reflections on Methodology in the Study of Old Testament Ethics', JSOT 11: 57–72.
- Noth, M. (1972), A History of Pentateuchal Traditions (Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall).
- Polzin, R. (1976), Late Biblical Hebrew: Toward an Historical Typology of Biblical Hebrew Prose, HSM 12 (Missoula: Scholars Press).
- Rentdorff, R. H. (1990), The Problem of the Process of Transmission in the Pentateuch, JSOTSup 89 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press); German original, Das überlieferungsgeschichtliche Problem des Pentateuch (1977).
- (1993), 'Two Kinds of P? Some Reflections on the Occasion of the Publishing of Jacob Milgrom's Commentary on Leviticus 1–16', JSOT 60: 75–81.
- Van Seters, J. (1983), In Search of History: Historiography in the Ancient World and the Origins of Biblical History (New Haven/London: Yale University Press).
- Vink, J. G. (1969), 'The Date and Origin of the Priestly Code in the Old Testament', OTS 15: 1–144.
- Weinfeld, M. (1972), Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomistic School (Oxford: Clarendon).
- (1992), Deuteronomy 1–11, AB5 (Garden City, NY: Doubleday).
- Wellhausen, J. (1885), Prolegomena to the History of Israel (Edinburgh: A. & C. Black).

7. Numbers

- Ashley, T. R. (1993), The Book of Numbers, The New International Commentary on the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Budd, P. J. (1984), Numbers, Word Biblical Commentary, 5 (Waco, Tex.: Word).
- Douglas, M. (1993), In the Wilderness: The Doctrine of Defilement in the Book of Numbers (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Fretheim, T. E. (1996), The Pentateuch, Interpreting Biblical Texts (Nashville: Abingdon).
- Gorman, F. H., Jr. (1990), The Ideology of Ritual: Space, Time and Status in the Priestly Theology, JSOTSup 91 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Gray, G. B. (1903), A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Numbers, International Critical Commentary (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Levine, B. (1993), Numbers 1–20: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday).
- Milgrom, J. (1990), Numbers, JPS Torah Commentary (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America).
- Moore, M. (1990), The Balaam Traditions: Their Character and Development, SBLDS, 113 (Atlanta: Scholars Press).
- Nelson, R. D. (1993), Raising Up a Faithful Priest: Community and Priesthood in Biblical Theology (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox).
- Noth, M. (1968), Numbers: A Commentary, Old Testament Library (Philadelphia: Westminster); tr. J. D. Martin.
- Olson, D. (1985), The Death of the Old and the Birth of the New: The Framework of the Book of Numbers and the Pentateuch, Brown Judaic Studies, 71 (Chico, Calif.: Scholars Press).
- (1996), Numbers, Interpretation: A Bible Commentary for Teaching and Preaching (Louisville: John Knox).
- Sakenfeld, K. D. (1995), Journeying with God: A Commentary on the Book of Numbers, An International Theological Commentary on the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Wenham, G. J. (1981), Numbers: An Introduction and Commentary, Tyndale Old Testament Commentary (Downer's Grove, Ill.: Inter-Varsity).

8. Deuteronomy

- Christensen, D. L. (ed.) (1993), A Song of Power and the Power of Song. Essays on the Book of Deuteronomy (Winona Lake, Ind.: Eisenbrauns).
- Crüsemann, F. (1996), The Torah (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Driver, S. R. (1986), A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Deuteronomy (ICC), 1895, 3rd edn. 1901 (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Levinson, B. M. (1997), Deuteronomy and the Hermeneutics of Legal Innovation (New York, Oxford: Oxford University Press) (includes bibliography).
- Miller, P. D. (1990), Deuteronomy (Interpretation) (Louisville, Ky.: John Knox).
- Rofé, A. (1988), Introduction to Deuteronomy, Part I and further chapters [Hebrew] (Jerusalem: Akademon Publishing House).
- Tigay, J. H. (1996), Deuteronomy (The JPS Torah Commentary) (Philadelphia/Jerusalem: The Jewish Publication Society).
- Weinfeld, M. (1972), Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomistic School, reprinted (Winona Lake, Ind.: Eisenbrauns).

9. Joshua

- Aharoni, Y. (1967), The Land of the Bible (London: Burns and Oates).
- Auld, A. G. (1980), Joshua, Moses and the Land: Tetrateuch, Pentateuch, Hexateuch in a Generation since 1938 (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Baltzer, K. (1971), The Covenant Formulary in Old Testament, Jewish and early Christian Writings (Oxford) (= Das Bundesformular: sein Ursprung und seine Verwendung im alten Testament [WMANT 4] (Neukirchen: Neukirchener Verlag, 1960)).

- Ben-Tor, A. (ed.), The Archaeology of Ancient Israel (New Haven/London: Yale University Press/Open University of Israel).
- Boling, R., and Wright, G. E. (1982), Joshua (AB) (New York: Doubleday).
- Bright, J. (1981), A History of Israel, 3rd edn. (London: SCM).
- Butler, T. C. (1983), Joshua, WBC (Waco, Tex.: Word).
- Curtis, A. H. W. (1994), Joshua, OT Guides (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Finkelstein, I. (1988), The Archaeology of the Israelite Settlement (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society).
- Gibson, J. C. L. (1971), Textbook of Syrian Semitic Inscriptions I: Hebrew and Moabite Inscriptions (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- Gottwald, N. K. (1979), The Tribes of Yahweh: a Sociology of the Religion of Liberated Israel, 1250–1050 BCE (London: SCM).
- Gray, J. (1986), Joshua, Judges and Ruth (NCB) (London: Marshall, Morgan and Scott).
- Haran, M. (1978), Temples and Temple Service in Ancient Israel (Oxford: Clarendon).
- Kenyon, K. (1979), Archaeology in the Holy Land, 4th edn. (London: Ernest Benn).
- Mazar, A. (1990), Archaeology of the Land of the Bible 10,000–586 BCE (New York: Doubleday).
- McCarthy, D. J. (1978), Treaty and Covenant, AnBib 21A, 2nd edn. (Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute).
- Mendenhall, G. E. (1955) Law and Covenant in the Ancient Near East (Pittsburgh (repr from BA 17 [1954] 26–46, 50–76)).
- Niditch, S. (1993), War in the Hebrew Bible (New York/Oxford: Oxford University Press).
- Noth, M. (1960), The History of Israel (London: A. & C. Black).
- (1981), The Deuteronomistic History, JSOTSup (Sheffield: JSOT) (ET of Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Studien: die sammelnden und bearbeitenden Geschichtswerke im Alten Testament, Halle, 1943, 2nd edn. Tübingen, 1957).
- Polzin, R. (1980), Moses and the Deuteronomist (New York: Seabury).
- Porter, J. R. (1970), 'The Succession of Joshua', in J. I. Durham and J. R. Porter (eds), Proclamation and Presence (FS G. H. Davies) (London: SCM), 102–132.
- Soggin, J. A. (1972), Joshua, OTL (London: SCM).
- Thompson, T. L. (1992), The Early History of the Israelite People: from the Written and Archaeological Sources (Leiden: Brill).
- ## 10. Judges
- Alter, R. (1981), The Art of Biblical Poetry (New York: Basic).
- (1985), The Art of Biblical Narrative (New York: Basic).
- Gottwald, N. (1979), The Tribes of Yahweh. A Religion of Liberated Israel 1250–1050 BC (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis).
- Meyers, C. (1988), Discovering Eve. Ancient Israelite Women in Context (New York/Oxford: Oxford University Press).
- Niditch, S. (1997), Ancient Israelite Religion (New York/Oxford: Oxford University Press).
- (1996), Oral World and Written Word (Louisville: John Knox/Westminster).
- Younger, K. L. (1990), Ancient Conquest Accounts: A Study in Ancient Near Eastern and Biblical History Writing, JSOT 98 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- ## 11. Ruth
- Brenner, A. (ed.) (1993), A Feminist Companion to Ruth, The Feminist Companion to the Bible 3 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- LaCocque, A. (1990), The Feminine Unconventional: Four Subversive Figures in Israel's Tradition, Overtures to Biblical Theology (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Larkin, K. (1995), Ruth and Esther, Old Testament Guides (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Leggett, D. A. (1974), The Levirate and Goel Institutions in the Old Testament with Special Attention to the Book of Ruth (Cherry Hill, NJ: Mack).
- Phillips, A. (1986), 'The Book of Ruth: Deception and Shame', JJS 37: 1–17.
- Trible, P. (1978), God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality, Overtures to Biblical Theology (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- ## 12. I & 2 Samuel
- Birch, B. C. (1976), The Rise of the Israelite Monarchy: The Growth and Development of 1 Samuel 7–15, SBLDS 27 (Missoula: Scholars Press).
- Campbell, A. F. (1975), The Ark Narrative (1 Sam 4–6, 2 Sam 6). Form-Critical and Tradition-Historical Study, SBLDS 16 (Missoula: Scholars Press).
- Carlson, R. A. (1964), David, the Chosen King. A Tradition-Historical Approach to the Second Book of Samuel (Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiskell).
- Conroy, C. C. (1978), Absalom Absalom! Narrative and Language in 2 Sam 13–20, Analecta Biblica 81 (Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute).
- Edelman, D. V. (1991), King Saul in the Historiography of Judah, JSOTSup 121 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Gunn, D. M. (1978), The Story of King David. Genre and Interpretation, JSOTSup 6 (Sheffield: Sheffield JSOT).
- (1980), The Fate of King Saul, JSOTSup 14 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Ishida, T. (1977), The Royal Dynasties in Ancient Israel. A Study on the Formation and Development of Royal-Dynastic Ideology, BZAW 142 (Berlin: de Gruyter).
- Jones, G. H. (1990), The Nathan Narratives, JSOTSup 80 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Long, V. P. (1989), The Reign and Rejection of King Saul. A Case for Literary and Theological Coherence, SBLDS 118 (Atlanta: Scholars Press).
- Mayes, A. D. H. (1977), 'The Reign of Saul', in J. H. Hayes and J. M. Miller (eds.), Israelite and Judaeon History, OTL (London: SCM), 322–31.
- Mettinger, T. N. D. (1976), King and Messiah. The Civil and Sacral Legitimation of the Israelite Kings, Coniectanea Biblica, OT Series 8 (Lund: C. W. K. Gleerup).
- Miller, P. D., and Roberts, J. (1977), The Hand of the Lord: A Reassessment of the 'Ark Narrative' of 1 Samuel (Baltimore/London: John Hopkins University Press).
- Nelson, R. D. (1981), The Double Redaction of the Deuteronomistic History, JSOTSup 18 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Noth, M. (1943), Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Studien I (Tübingen: Max Niemeyer); (1981), ET The Deuteronomistic History, JSOTSup 15 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Rost, L. (1926), Die Überlieferung von der Thronnachfolge Davids, BWANT 3/6 (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer); (1982), ET The Succession to the Throne of David (Sheffield: Almond).
- Soggin, J. A. (1977), 'The Davidic-Solomonic Kingdom', in J. H. Hayes and J. M. Miller (eds), Israelite and Judaeon History, OTL (London: SCM), 332–80.
- Weinfeld, M. (1970), Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomist School (Oxford: Clarendon).
- Whybray, R. N. (1968), The Succession Narrative. A Study of II Sam 9–20 and I Kings 1 and 2, SBTh 9 (London: SCM).
- ## 13. I & 2 Kings
- Cross, F. M. (1973), 'The Themes of the Book of Kings and the Structure of the Deuteronomistic History', in id., Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press), 274–89.
- Gray, J. (1977), I and II Kings, OTL 3rd edn. (Philadelphia: Westminster).

- McKay, J. W. (1973), Religion in Judah under the Assyrians 732–609 B.C., SBTh 2:26 (London: SCM).
- Nelson, R. (1981), The Double Redaction of the Deuteronomistic History, JSOTSup 18 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Noth, M. (1991), The Deuteronomistic History, JSOTSup 15 (Sheffield: JSOT).

14. 1 & 2 Chronicles

- Ackroyd, P. R. (1973), 1 and 2 Chronicles, Torch Bible Commentary (London: SCM).
- Coggins, R. J. (1976), The First and Second Books of Chronicles, CBC (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Myers, J. M. (1965), 1 Chronicles and 2 Chronicles, Anchor Bible (2 vols.; Garden City, NY: Doubleday).
- Williamson, H. G. M. (1977), Israel in the Books of Chronicles (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Williamson, H. G. M. (1982), 1 and 2 Chronicles, NCB (London: Marshall, Morgan, and Scott).

15. Ezra–Nehemiah

- Berquist, J. (1995), Judaism in Persia's Shadow: A Social and Historical Approach (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Bickerman, E. (1976), 'The Edict of Cyrus in Ezra I', in Studies in Jewish and Christian History, 1 (Leiden: Brill).
- Blenkinsopp, J. (1988), Ezra–Nehemiah, OTL (London: SCM).
- Clines, D. (1984), Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, NCB (Basingstoke: Marshall, Morgan, and Scott).
- Fensham, F. C. (1982), The Books of Ezra and Nehemiah (Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans).
- Williamson, H. G. M. (1985), Ezra, Nehemiah, WBC (Waco, Tex.: Word).

16. Esther

- Berg, S. B. (1979), The Book of Esther: Motifs, Themes, and Structures, SBLDS 44 (Missoula: Scholars Press).
- Clines, D. J. A. (1984), The Esther Scroll: The Story of the Story, JSOTSup 30 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- (1988), 'Esther', in Harper's Bible Commentary (San Francisco: Harper & Row), 387–94.
- Fox, M. V. (1991), Character and Ideology in the Book of Esther, Studies in Biblical Personalities (Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press).
- Moore, C. A. (1971), Esther: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary, Anchor Bible 7B (Garden City, NY: Doubleday).
- (1982), Studies in the Book of Esther (New York: Ktav).
- (1992), 'Esther, Book of', ABD II: 633–43.
- White, S. A. (1989), 'Esther: A Feminine Model for the Jewish Diaspora', in P. L. Day (ed.), Gender and Difference (Philadelphia: Fortress), 161–77.
- (1992), 'Esther', in C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe (eds.), The Woman's Bible Commentary (Knoxville: Westminster/John Knox), 124–9.

17. Job

- Beuken, W. A. M. (ed.) (1994), The Book of Job (BETL CXIV) (Leuven: Leuven University Press, Peeters).
- Clines, D. J. A. (1989), Job (Dallas: Word Books), 1–20.
- Crenshaw, J. L. (1992), 'Job, Book of', ABD 3 (New York: Doubleday), 858–68.
- Glatzer, N. N. (ed.) (1969), The Dimensions of Job (New York: Doubleday).
- Good, E. M. (1990), In Turns of Tempest (Stanford: Stanford University Press).

- Gordis, R. (1978), The Book of Job (New York: Jewish Theological Seminary of America).
- Habel, N. C. (1985), The Book of Job (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Hoffman, Y. A. (1996), Blemished Perfection (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Janzen, J. G. (1985), Job (Atlanta: John Knox).
- Newsom, C. (1996), 'Job', NIB IV (Nashville: Abingdon), 319–637.
- Perdue, L. G. (1972), Wisdom in Revolt (Nashville: Abingdon).
- Pope, M. E. (1973), Job (Garden City, NY: Doubleday).
- Zuckerman, B. (1991), Job the Silent: A Study in Historical Counterpoint (New York: Oxford University Press).

18. Psalms

- Anderson, A. A. (1972), Psalms 1–72, Psalms 73–150, NCB (London: Marshall, Morgan and Scott).
- Dahood, M. J. (1966–70), Psalms, Anchor Bible (3 vols.; Garden City, NY: Doubleday).
- Day, J. (1990), Psalms, Old Testament Guides (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Gillingham, S. E. (1994), The Poems and Psalms of the Hebrew Bible, Oxford Bible Series (Oxford: Oxford University Press).
- Kirkpatrick, A. F. (1901), The Book of Psalms, Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges (33 vols.; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Mowinckel, S. (1962), The Psalms in Israel's Worship (2 vols.; Oxford: Basil Blackwell).

19. Proverbs

- Bryce, G. E. (1979), A Legacy of Wisdom: The Egyptian Contribution to the Wisdom of Israel (Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell University Press).
- Camp, C. V. (1985), Wisdom and the Feminine in the Book of Proverbs (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Crenshaw, J. L. (1995), Urgent Advice and Probing Questions: Collected Writings in Old Testament Wisdom (Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press).
- Lang, B. (1986), Wisdom and the Book of Proverbs: A Hebrew Goddess Redefined (New York: Pilgrim).
- McKane, W. (1970), Proverbs, AB (New York: Doubleday).
- Murphy, R. E. (1981), Wisdom Literature, FOTL 13 (Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans).
- (1998), Proverbs, WBC (Nashville: Thomas Nelson).
- Scott, R. B. Y. (1965), Proverbs, AB (New York: Doubleday).
- Skehan, P. W. (1972), Studies in Israelite Poetry and Wisdom, CBQMS 1 (Washington: Catholic Biblical Association).
- von Rad, G. (1972), Wisdom in Israel (London: SCM); German original, 1970.
- Westermann, C. (1995), Roots of Wisdom: The Oldest Proverbs of Israel and Other Peoples (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark); German original, 1990.
- Whybray, R. N. (1994), Proverbs, NCB (London: Marshall Pickering).
- (1995), The Book of Proverbs: A Survey of Modern Study, HBIS 1 (Leiden: Brill).
- Williams, J. G. (1981), Those Who Ponder Proverbs: Aphoristic Thinking and Biblical Literature (Sheffield: Almond).

20. Ecclesiastes

- Crenshaw, J. L. (1988), Ecclesiastes (London: SCM).
- Fox, M. V. (1989), Qohelet and his Contradictions (Sheffield: Almond).
- Gordis, R. (1968), Koheleth—The Man and his World, 3rd edn. (New York: Schocken Books).
- Ogden, G. (1987), Qoheleth (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Whybray, R. N. (1981), 'The Identification and Use of Quotations in Ecclesiastes', VTS 32: 435–51.
- (1989), Ecclesiastes (London: Marshall, Morgan & Scott).
- (1989), Ecclesiastes, OT Guides (Sheffield: JSOT).

21. Song of Solomon

- Brenner, A. (ed.) (1993), A Feminist Companion to the Song of Songs (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Ginsburg, C. D. (1970), The Song of Songs and Qoheleth, 2nd edn. (New York: Ktav).
- Gordis, R. (1974), The Song of Songs and Lamentations, 2nd edn. (New York: Ktav).
- Goulder, M. (1986), The Song of Fourteen Songs, JSOTSup 35 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Tourney, R. J. (1988), Word of God, Song of Love: A Commentary on the Song of Songs, tr. J. E. Crowley (New York: Paulist).
- Weems, R. J. (1992), 'The Song of Songs', in C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe (eds.), The Women's Bible Commentary (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox), 156–60.

22. Isaiah

- Barton, J. (1995), Isaiah 1–39, Old Testament Guides (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Emmerson, G. I. (1992), Isaiah 56–66, Old Testament Guides (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Sawyer, J. F. A. (1996), The Fifth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Vermeulen, J. (1989), The Book of Isaiah (Leuven: Peeters).
- Whybray, R. N. (1983), The Second Isaiah, Old Testament Guides (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Williamson, H. G. M. (1994), The Book called Isaiah (Oxford: Clarendon).

23. Jeremiah

- Achtemeier, E. (1987), Jeremiah, Knox Preaching Guides (Atlanta: John Knox).
- Boadt, L. (1982), Jeremiah 1–25, Old Testament Message 9 (Wilming-ton, Del.: Michael Glazier).
- (1982), Jeremiah 26–52, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Nahum (Wilming-ton, Del.: Michael Glazier).
- Brueggemann, W. (1998), A Commentary on Jeremiah: Exile and Home-coming (Grand Rapids and Cambridge: Eerdmans).
- Carroll, R. P. (1986), Jeremiah, OTL (Philadelphia: Westminster).
- (1989), Jeremiah, Old Testament Guides (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Clements, R. E. (1988), Jeremiah, Interpretation (Atlanta: John Knox).
- Craigie, P. C., Kelly, P., and Drinkard, J. F. (1991), Jeremiah 1–25, WBC 26 (Dallas: Word).
- Holladay, W. L. (1974), Jeremiah: Spokesman Out of Time (Philadelphia: Pilgrim).
- (1986), Jeremiah, Hermeneia (2 vols.; Philadelphia and Min-neapolis: Fortress), 89.
- (1990), Jeremiah: A Fresh Reading (New York: Pilgrim).
- Keown, G. L., Scalise, P. J., and Smothers, T. G. (1995), Jeremiah 26–52, WBC 27 (Dallas: Word).
- McKane, W. (1986, 1996), Jeremiah, ICC (2 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Nicholson, E. W. (1973, 1975), Jeremiah, CBC (2 vols.; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- O'Connor, K. (1988), The Confessions of Jeremiah: Their Interpretation and Role in Chapters 1–25, SBLDS 94 (Atlanta: Scholars Press).
- (1992), 'Jeremiah', in C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe (eds.), The Women's Bible Commentary (Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox), 169–77.
- Thompson, J. A. (1980), The Book of Jeremiah, NICOT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).

24. Lamentations

- Albrektson, B. (1963), Studies in the Text and Theology of the Book of Lamentations, Studia Theologica Lundensia 21 (Lund: C.W.K.

Gleerup).

- Cohen, M. E. (1988), The Canonical Lamentations of Ancient Mesopota-mia (2 vols.; Potomac, Md: Capital Decisions Limited).
- Gordis, R. (1974), The Song of Songs and Lamentations, 3rd edn. (New York: Ktav).
- Gottwald, N. K. (1962) Studies in the Book of Lamentations, SBT 14, 2nd edn. (London: SCM).
- (1988), 'Lamentations', in J. L. Mays (ed.), Harper's Bible Com-mentary (San Francisco: Harper).
- Gwaltney, W. C., Jr. (1983), 'The Biblical Book of Lamentations in the Context of Near Eastern Lament Literature', in W. W. Hallo, J. C. Moyer, and L. G. Perdue (eds.), Scripture in Context II: More Essays on the Comparative Method (Winona Lake, Ind.: Eisenbrauns), 191–211.
- Hillers, D. R. (1992), Lamentations, AB 7a, 2nd edn. (Garden City, NY: Doubleday).
- Mintz, A. (1984), Hurban: Responses to Catastrophe in Hebrew Literature (New York: Columbia University Press).
- O'Connor, K. M. (1992), 'Lamentations', in C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe (eds.), The Women's Bible Commentary (Louisville, Ky.: West-minster/John Knox), 178–82.
- Provan, I. W. (1991), Lamentations, NCB (London: Marshall Pickering/Grand Rapids, Mich: Eerdmans).
- Salters, R. B. (1994), Jonah and Lamentations, Old Testament Guide (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Westermann, C. (1994), Lamentations: Issues and Interpretation (Edin-burgh: T. & T. Clark).

25. Ezekiel

- Ackerman, S. (1992), Under Every Green Tree: Popular Religion in Sixth Century Judah, HSM 46 (Atlanta: Scholars Press).
- Allen, L. (1990), Ezekiel 20–48, WBC 29 (Dallas, Tex.: Word).
- (1994), Ezekiel 1–19, WBC 28 (Dallas, Tex.: Word).
- Carley, K. W. (1975), Ezekiel among the Prophets (Naperville, Ill.: Alec R. Allenson).
- Clifford, R. J. (1972), The Cosmic Mountain in Canaan and the Old Testament, HSM 4 (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press).
- Davis, E. F. (1989), Swallowing the Scroll: Textuality and the Dynamics of Discourse in Ezekiel's Prophecy (Sheffield: Almond).
- Eichrodt, W. (1970), Ezekiel, OTL (Philadelphia: Westminster); tr. C. Quinn.
- Galambush, J. (1992), Jerusalem in the Book of Ezekiel: The City as Yahweh's Wife, SBLDS 130 (Atlanta: Scholars Press).
- (1999), 'Ezekiel, Book of', in J. H. Hayes (ed.), Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation (Nashville, Tenn.: Abingdon).
- Greenberg, M. (1983), Ezekiel 1–20: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary, AB 22 (Garden City, NY: Doubleday).
- (1997), Ezekiel 21–37: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary, AB 22A (Garden City, NY: Doubleday).
- Halperin, D. J. (1993), Seeking Ezekiel: Text and Psychology (University Park, Pa.: The Pennsylvania State University Press).
- Joyce, P. (1989), Divine Initiative and Human Response in Ezekiel, JSOTSup 51 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Levenson, J. D. (1976), Theology of the Program of Restoration of Ezekiel 40–48, HSM 10 (Missoula: Scholars Press).
- Lust, J. (1986), Ezekiel and His Book: Textual and Literary Criticism and Their Interrelation, BETL 74 (Leuven: University of Leuven Press).
- Zimmerli, W. (1979, 1983), Ezekiel, Hermeneia (2 vols.; Philadelphia: Fortress), tr. R. E. Clements [vol. 1] and J. D. Martin [vol. 2].

26. Daniel

- Collins, J. J. (1993), Daniel, Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Davies, P. R. (1985), Daniel, OTG (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Goldingay, J. (1989), Daniel, WBC (Dallas: Word).

Hartman, L., and DiLella, A. A. (1978), The Book of Daniel, Anchor Bible (Garden City: Doubleday).

27. Hosea

- Brenner, A. (ed.) (1995), A Feminist Companion to the Latter Prophets, A Feminist Companion to the Bible, 8 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press), 40–241.
- Davies, G. I. (1992), Hosea, NCB (London: Marshall Pickering; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Davies, G. I. (1993), Hosea, OTG (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Emmerson, G. I. (1984), Hosea: an Israelite Prophet in Judean Perspective, JSOTSup 28 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Macintosh, A. A. (1997), Hosea, ICC (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Mays, J. L. (1969), Hosea, OTL (London: SCM).
- Wolff, H. W. (1974), Hosea, ET, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).

28. Joel

- Allen, L. C. (1976), The Books of Joel, Obadiah, Jonah and Micah, NICOT 13/2 (Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans).
- Crenshaw, J. L. (1995), Joel: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary, Anchor Bible (Garden City, NY: Doubleday).
- Mason, R. A. (1994), Zephaniah, Habakkuk, Joel, OTG (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Watts, J. D. W. (1975), The Books of Joel, Obadiah, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah, CBC (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Wolff, H.-W. (1977), Joel and Amos, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).

29. Amos

- Andersen, F. I., and Freedman, D. N. (1989), Amos, Anchor Bible 24A (New York, London: Doubleday).
- Auld, A. G. (1986), Amos, OTG (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Carroll, R. P. (1990), 'Amos', in R. Coggins and L. Houlden (eds.), A Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation (London: SCM), 19–21.
- King, P. J. (1988), Amos, Hosea, Micah—An Archaeological Commentary (Philadelphia: Westminster).
- Soggin, J. A. (1987), The Prophet Amos: A Translation and Commentary (London: SCM).
- Ward, J. M. (1976), 'Amos', in K. Crim (ed.), The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, Supplementary Volume (Nashville: Abingdon), 21–23.
- Wolff, H.-W. (1977), Joel and Amos, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress), 89–392.

30. Obadiah

- Allen, L. C. (1976), The Books of Joel, Obadiah, Jonah and Micah, NICOT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Ben Zvi, E. (1996), A Historical-Critical Study of the Book of Obadiah, BZAW 242 (Berlin: de Gruyter).
- Coggins, R. J. (1985), 'Judgement Between Brothers: A Commentary on the Book of Obadiah', in R. J. Coggins and S. P. Re'em (eds.), Israel among the Nations: a Commentary on the Books of Nahum, Obadiah, Esther, ITC (Grand Rapids and Handsel, Edinburgh: Eerdmans), 65–100.

31. Jonah

- Allen, L. C. (1976), The Books of Joel, Obadiah, Jonah and Micah, NICOT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Bickerman, E. J. (1967), Four Strange Books of the Bible (New York: Schocken).

Fretheim, T. (1977), The Message of Jonah: A Theological Commentary (Minneapolis: Augsburg).

32. Micah

- Allen, L. C. (1976), The Books of Joel, Obadiah, Jonah and Micah, NICOT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Hillers, D. R. (1984), Micah, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Mason, R. (1991), Micah, Nahum, Obadiah, OTG (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Mays, J. L. (1976), Micah. A Commentary, OTL (London: SCM).
- Wal, A. van der (1990), Micah. A Classified Bibliography (Amsterdam: Free University Press).
- Wolff, H.-W. (1990), Micah. A Commentary (Minneapolis: Augsburg); German original, 1982.

33. Nahum

- Roberts, J. J. M. (1991), Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah: A Commentary, OTL (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox).
- Mason R. (1991), Micah, Nahum, Obadiah, OTG (Sheffield: JSOT), 56–84.

34. Habakkuk

- Achtemeier, E. (1986), Nahum-Malachi, Interpretation Commentaries (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox).
- Gowan, D. E. (1976), The Triumph of Faith in Habakkuk (Atlanta: John Knox).
- Hiebert, T. (1996), 'Habakkuk', in The New Interpreter's Bible (Vol. 7; Nashville: Abingdon).
- Robertson, O. P. (1990), The Books of Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah, NICOT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Roberts, J. J. M. (1991), Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah: A Commentary, OTL (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox).
- Szeles, M. E. (1988), Wrath and Mercy: Habakkuk and Zephaniah, International Theological Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).

35. Zephaniah

- Ben Zvi, E. (1991), A Historical-Critical Study of the Book of Zephaniah, BZAW 198 (Berlin, New York: de Gruyter).
- Roberts, J. J. M. (1991), Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah, OTL (Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox).
- Robertson, O. P. (1990), The Books of Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah, NICOT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).

36. Haggai

- Ackroyd, P. (1968), Exile and Restoration: A Study of Hebrew Thought in the Sixth Century B.C., OTL (Philadelphia: Westminster).
- Blenkinsopp, J. (1991), 'Temple and Society in Achaemenid Judah', in P. Davies (ed.), Second Temple Studies, Vol. 1: Persian Period, JSOTSup 117 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press), 22–53.
- Coggins, R. (1987), Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, OTG (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Cook, J. (1983), The Persian Empire (New York: Schocken).
- Hoglund, K. (1992), Achaemenid Imperial Administration in Syria-Palestine and the Missions of Ezra and Nehemiah, SBLDS 125 (Atlanta: Scholars Press).

37. Zechariah

- Baldwin, J. (1972), Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi (London: Tyndale Press).
- Coggins, R. J. (1987), Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Mason, R. A. (1977), The Books of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).

- Meyers, C. L., and Meyers E. M. (1987), Haggai, Zechariah 1–8, AB Vol. 25B (New York: Doubleday).
 — (1993), Zechariah 9–14, AB Vol. 25C (New York: Doubleday).
 Petersen, D. L. (1984), Haggai and Zechariah 1–8 (London: SCM).
 Smith, R. L. (1984), Micah–Malachi (Waco: Word Books).
 Stuhlmüller, C. (1988), Rebuilding with Hope: a Commentary on the Books of Haggai and Zechariah (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).

38. Malachi

- Coggins, R. J. (1987), Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, OTG (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
 Hill, A. E. (1992), 'Malachi, Book of', in Anchor Bible Dictionary 4 (New York: Doubleday).
 Mason, R. (1977), The Books of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, CBC (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
 O'Brien, J. M. (1995), 'Malachi in Recent Research', in Currents in Research 3 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press), 81–94.
 Petersen, D. L. (1995), Zechariah 9–14 and Malachi, OTL (Philadelphia: Westminster).
 Smith, R. (1984), Micah–Malachi, WBC 32 (Waco, Tex.: Word Books).

39. Introduction to the Apocrypha

- Charles, R. H. (ed.) (1912), Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of The Old Testament (2 vols.; Oxford: Clarendon).
 Collins, J. J. (1983), Between Athens and Jerusalem: Jewish Identity in the Hellenistic Diaspora (New York: Crossroad).
 De Lange, N. R. M. (1978), Apocrypha: Jewish Literature of the Hellenistic Age (New York: Viking).
 Fritsch, C. T. (1962), 'Apocrypha', in The Dictionary of the Bible (Nashville, Tenn.: Abingdon).
 Goodspeed, E. J. (1939), The Story of the Apocrypha (Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press).
 Harrington, S. J. (1999), Invitation to the Apocrypha (Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans).
 Metzger, B. M. (1957), An Introduction to the Apocrypha (New York: Oxford University Press).
 Nickelsburg, G. W. (1981), Jewish Literature between the Bible and the Mishnah (London: SCM).
 Oesterley, W. O. E. (1935), An Introduction to the Books of the Apocrypha (London: SPCK).
 Pfeiffer, R. H. (1949), History of NT Times with an Introduction to the Apocrypha (London: A. & C. Black).
 Rost, L. (1976), Judaism outside the Hebrew Canon: An Introduction to the Documents (Nashville, Tenn.: Parthenon).
 Schürer, E. (1986–7), in G. Vermes, F. Millar, and M. Goodman (eds.), The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ, Vol. 3, (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
 Stone, M. E. (ed.) (1984), Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period (Assen/Philadelphia: Van Gorcum/Fortress).

40. Tobit

- Flusser, D. (1984), 'Prayers in the Book of Tobit', in M. Stone (ed.), Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period, CRINT 2/2 (Philadelphia, Pa.: Fortress; Assen: Van Gorcum), 555–56.
 Moore, C. A. (1989), 'Scholarly Issues in the Book of Tobit before Qumran and After: An Assessment', JSP 5: 65–81.
 Nowell, I. (1983), The Book of Tobit: Narrative Technique and Theology, Dissertation (Washington, DC: Catholic University of America).
 — (1990), 'Tobit', NJBC, 568–71.
 Soll, W. (1989), 'Misfortune and Exile in Tobit: The Juncture of a Fairy Tale Source and Deuteronomistic Theology', CBQ 51: 209–31.

- Zimmermann, F. (1958), The Book of Tobit: An English Translation with Introduction and Commentary, Dropsie College Edition, Jewish Apocryphal Literature (New York: Harper & Bros.).

41. Judith

- Craven, T. (1983), Artistry and Faith in the Book of Judith, SBLDS 70 (Chico, Calif.: Scholars Press).
 Moore, C. A. (1985), Judith. A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary, AB 40 (Garden City, NY: Doubleday).
 Wills, L. (1995), The Jewish Novel in the Ancient World (Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press).

42. Esther (Greek)

- Clines, D. J. A. (1984), The Esther Scroll: The Story of the Story (Sheffield: JSOT).
 Day, L. (1995), Three Faces of a Queen: Characterization in the Books of Esther, JSOTSup 186 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
 Fox, M. V. (1991), The Redaction of the Books of Esther: On Reading Composite Texts, SBLMS 40 (Atlanta: Scholars Press).
 Moore, C. A. (1977), Daniel, Esther and Jeremiah: The Additions, Anchor Bible Vol. 44 (New York: Doubleday).
 — (ed.) (1982), Studies in the Book of Esther (New York: Ktav).
 Wills, L. (1995), The Jewish Novel in the Ancient World (Ithaca: Cornell University Press).

43. Wisdom of Solomon

- Barclay, J. M. G. (1996), Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
 Chester, A. (1988), 'Citing the Old Testament', in D. A. Carson and H. G. M. Williamson (eds.), It is Written: Scripture Citing Scripture: Essays in Honour of Barnabas Lindars, SSF (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press), 141–69.
 Clarke, E. G. (1973), The Wisdom of Solomon (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
 Emerton, J. A. (1965), 'Commentaries on the Wisdom of Solomon', Theology 68, 376–80.
 Gilbert, M. (1984), 'Wisdom Literature', in M. E. Stone (ed.), Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period (Philadelphia: van Gorcum, Assen: Fortress), 283–324.
 Grabbe, L. L. (1997), Wisdom of Solomon, Guides to Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
 Kloppenborg, J. S. (1982), 'Isis and Sophia in the Book of Wisdom', HTR 75, 57–84.
 Smalley, B. (1986), in R. E. Murphy (ed.), Medieval Exegesis of Wisdom Literature (Atlanta: SBL).
 Sweet, J. P. M. (1965), 'The Theory of Miracles in the Wisdom of Solomon', in C. F. D. Moule (ed.), Miracles (London: Mowbray), 115–26.
 Walbank, F. W. (1984), 'Monarchies and Monarchic Ideas', in F. W. Walbank, A. E. Astin, M. W. Frederiksen, and R. M. Ogilvie (eds.), The Cambridge Ancient History vii. 1, The Hellenistic World (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press), 62–100.
 Williams, M. H. (1998), The Jews among the Greeks and Romans: A Diasporan Sourcebook (London: Duckworth).
 Winston, D. (1979), The Wisdom of Solomon (Garden City: Doubleday).
 — (1992), 'Solomon, Wisdom of', in Anchor Bible Dictionary, vi, 120–27.
 Ziegler, J. (1962), Sapientia Salomonis, Septuaginta. Vetus Testamentum Graecum Auctoritate Academia Scientiarum Göttingensis Editum, xii.1 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht), reprinted 1980.

44. Wisdom of Jesus Son of Sirach

- Box, G. H., and Oesterley, W. O. E. (1913), 'Sirach', in R. H. Charles (ed.), The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament, Vol. 1 (Oxford: Clarendon), 268–517.
- Crenshaw, J. L. (1975), 'The Problem of Theodicy in Sirach: On Human Bondage', JBL 94: 47–64.
- (1981), Old Testament Wisdom. An Introduction (Atlanta: Knox), 149–73.
- DiLella, A. A. (1966), The Hebrew Text of Sirach. A Text-Critical and Historical Study (The Hague: Mouton).
- Hengel, M. (1974), Judaism and Hellenism (2 vols.; Philadelphia: Fortress), i. 131–52.
- Sanders, J. T. (1983), Ben Sira and Demotic Wisdom (Chico: Scholars Press).
- Sheppard, G. T. (1980), Wisdom as a Hermeneutical Construct (Berlin: de Gruyter).
- Skehan, P. W., and DiLella, A. A. (1987), The Wisdom of Ben Sira, AB 39 (New York: Doubleday).
- Trenchard, W. C. (1982), Ben Sira's View of Women. A Literary Analysis (Chico: Scholars Press).
- von Rad, G. (1972), Wisdom in Israel (Nashville: Abingdon), 240–62.
- Yadin, Y. (1965), The Ben Sira Scroll from Masada (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society).

45. Baruch

- Bohak, G. (1997), 'Baruch, Books of', in R. J. Zwi Werblowsky and G. Wigoder (eds.), Oxford Dictionary of the Jewish Religion (New York: Oxford University Press), 101–2.
- Coogan, M. D. (1993), 'Baruch', in B. M. Metzger and M. D. Coogan (eds.), Oxford Companion to the Bible (New York: Oxford University Press), 75.
- Dentan, R. C. (1993), 'Baruch, book of', in B. M. Metzger and M. D. Coogan (eds.), OCB (New York: Oxford University Press), 75–6.
- Mendels, D. (1992), 'Baruch, Book of', in Anchor Bible Dictionary I. 618–20.
- Moore, C. A. (1977), Daniel, Esther, and Jeremiah: the Additions, AB 44 (Garden City, NY: Doubleday), 215–316.
- Muilenberg, J. (1970), 'Baruch the scribe', in J. I. Durham and J. R. Porter (eds.), Proclamation and Presence: Old Testament Essays in Honour of Gwynne Henton Davies (London: SCM), 215–38.
- Rost, L. (1976), Judaism outside the Hebrew Canon. An Introduction to the Documents (Nashville, Tenn.: Parthenon), 69–75.

46. Additions to Daniel

- Collins, J. J. (1993), Daniel, Hermeneia (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Glancy, J. A. (1995), 'The Accused: Susanna and her Readers', in A. Brenner (ed.), A Feminist Companion to Esther, Judith and Susanna, Feminist Companion to the Bible 7 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press), 288–302.
- Moore, C. A. (1977), Daniel, Esther, and Jeremiah: The Additions, AB 44 (Garden City: Doubleday).
- Steussy, M. J. (1993), Gardens in Babylon: Narrative and Faith in the Greek Legends of Daniel, SBLDS 141 (Atlanta: Scholars Press).

47. I Maccabees

- Osterley, W. O. E. (1913), 'I Maccabees', in R. H. Charles (ed.), The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the OT (Oxford: Clarendon), 59–124.
- Tedesche, S., and Zeitlin, S. (1950), The First Book of Maccabees (New York: Harper).

48. 2 Maccabees

- Bar-Kochva, B. (1988), Judas Maccabeus (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Bickerman, E. (1979), The God of the Maccabees. Studies on the Meaning and Origin of the Maccabean Revolt, SJLA 32 (Leiden: Brill).
- Doran, R. (1981), Temple Propaganda. The Purpose and Character of 2 Maccabees (Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association).
- Geller, M. J. (1991), 'New Information on Antiochus IV from Babylonian Astronomical Diaries', BOA 54: 1–4.
- Goldstein, J. A. (1983), 2 Maccabees, Anchor Bible 41a (Garden City, NY: Doubleday).
- Grabbe, L. L. (1992), Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian (2 vols.; Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Gruen, E. S. (1984), The Hellenistic World and the Coming of Rome (Berkeley: University of California Press).
- Habicht, C. (1976), 'Royal Documents in Maccabees II', HSCP 80: 1–18.
- Habicht, C. (1976), 2 Makkabäerbuch, JSHRZ 1/3 (Gütersloh: G. John).
- Harrington, D. J. (1988), The Maccabean Revolt: Anatomy of a Biblical Revolution (Wilmington, Del.: Michael Glazier).
- Momigliano, A. (1975), 'The Second Book of Maccabees', in Classical Philology 70, 81–88.
- Schürer, E. (1973–87), The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.–A.D. 135). Revised by G. Vermes, F. Millar, and M. Goodman (3 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Sievers, J. (1991), The Hasmoneans and their Supporters: From Mattathias to the Death of John Hyrcanus (Atlanta: Scholars Press).
- Tcherikover, V. (1961), Hellenistic Civilization and the Jews (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society).

49. I Esdras

- Cook, S. A. (1913), 'I Esdras', in R. H. Charles (ed.), The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament, I (Oxford: Clarendon), 1–58.
- Eskenazi, T. C. (1986), 'The Chronicler and the Composition of I Esdras', CBQ 48: 39–66.
- Japhet, S. (1982), 'Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel against the background of the Historical and Religious Tendencies of Ezra Nehemiah', ZAW 94: 66–98; (1983) 95: 218–29.
- (1994), 'Composition and Chronology in the Book of Ezra-Nehemiah', in T. C. Eskenazi and K. H. Richards (eds.), Second Temple Studies 2, JSOTSup 175 (Sheffield: JSOT), 189–216.
- Myers, J. M. (1974), I and II Esdras, AB (New York: Doubleday).
- Williamson, H. G. M. (1996), 'The Problem with First Esdras', in J. Barton and J. Reimer (eds.), After the Exile: Essays in Honour of Rex Mason (Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press), 201–16.

50. Prayer of Manasseh

- Charlesworth, J. H. (1983–1985), 'Prayer of Manasseh', in J. H. Charlesworth (ed.), The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha (2 vols.; Garden City: Doubleday), ii. 625–33.
- Ryle, H. E. (1912), 'Prayer of Manasses', in R. H. Charles (ed.), The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament (2 vols.; Oxford: Clarendon), i. 612–24.
- Schuller, E. M. (1986), Non-Canonical Psalms from Qumran: A Pseudepigraphic Collection, HSS 28 (Atlanta: Scholars Press).

51. Psalm 151

- Charlesworth, J. H., and Sanders, J. A. (1985), 'Psalm 151', in J. H. Charlesworth (ed.), The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha II (Garden City, NY: Doubleday), 612–15.

- Harrington, D. J. (1988), 'Psalm 151', in J. L. Mays (ed.), Harper's Bible Commentary (San Francisco: Harper & Row), 935–6.
- Sanders, J. A. (1965), The Psalms Scroll of Qumran Cave 11, 11QPs (Oxford: Clarendon Press).
- (1967), The Dead Sea Psalms Scroll (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press).

52. 3 Maccabees

- Anderson, H. (1985), '3 Maccabees', in J. Charlesworth (ed.), The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha (Garden City, NY: Doubleday), ii, 509–30.
- Barclay, J. (1996), Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark), 192–203.
- Collins, J. J. (1983), Between Athens and Jerusalem: Jewish Identity in the Hellenistic Diaspora (New York: Crossroad), 104–11.
- Hadas, M. (1953), The Third and Fourth Books of Maccabees (New York: Harper).
- Schürer, E. (1987), in G. Vermes et al. (eds.), (rev.) The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ, (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark), Vol. III. 1, 537–42.
- Tcherikover, V. (1961), 'The Third Book of Maccabees as a Historical Source of Augustus' Time', in Scripta Hierosolymitana (Jerusalem: Magnes) VII, 1–26.

53. 2 Esdras

- Bergren, T. A. (1990), Fifth Ezra: The Text, Origin and Early History, Septuagint and Cognate Studies 25 (Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press).
- Box, G. H. (1912), The Ezra Apocalypse (London: Isaac Pitman & Sons).
- Coggins, R. J., and Knibb, M. A. (1979), The First and Second Books of Esdras, The Cambridge Bible Commentary on the NEB (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Grabbe, L. L. (1989), 'The Social Setting of Early Jewish Apocalypticism', JSP 4: 27–47.
- Longenecker, B. W. (1995), 2 Esdras (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Myers, J. M. (1974), I and II Esdras, AB 42 (New York: Doubleday).
- Stanton, G. N. (1977), '5 Ezra and Matthean Christianity in the Second Century', JTS 28: 67–83.
- Stone, M. E. (1976), 'List of Revealed Things in the Apocalyptic Literature', in F. M. Cross et al. (eds.), Magnalia Dei (G. E. Wright Memorial) (New York: Doubleday), 414–54. Also in Stone (1991: 370–418).
- (1983), 'Coherence and Inconsistency in the Apocalypses: The Case of "The End" in 4 Ezra', JBL 102: 229–43. Also in Stone (1991: 333–47).
- (1990), Fourth Ezra, Hermeneia—A Critical and Historical Commentary on the Bible (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- (1991), Selected Studies in Pseudepigrapha and Apocrypha, SVTP (Leiden: Brill).
- Thompson, A. L. (1977), Responsibility for Evil in the Theodicy of IV Ezra, SBL DS 29 (Missoula, Mont.: Scholars Press).

54. 4 Maccabees

- DeSilva, D. A. (1999), 4 Maccabees (Sheffield: Sheffield University Press).
- Hadas, M. (1954), The Third and Fourth Books of Maccabees (New York: Harper).
- Rehman, R. (1972), 'The Greek Philosophic Background of Fourth Maccabees', Rheinisches Museum 115: 223–38.
- Seeley, D. S. (1990), The Noble Death (Sheffield: Sheffield University Press).

55. Essay with Commentary on Post-Biblical Jewish Literature

- Charles, R. H. (ed.) (1913), The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament (2 vols.; Oxford: Clarendon).
- Charlesworth, J. H., (ed.) (1983–5), The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha (2 vols.; New York: Doubleday).
- Colson, F. H., and Whitaker, G. H. (1971), Philo (12 vols; Cambridge, Mass./London: Yale University Press).
- Garcia-Martinez, F. (1996), The Dead Sea Scrolls Translated, 2nd edn. (Leiden: Brill).
- and Tigchelaar, E. J. C. (1997), The Dead Sea Scrolls Study Edition (2 vols.; Leiden: Brill).
- Sparks, H. F. D. (ed.) (1984), The Apocryphal Old Testament (Oxford: Clarendon).
- Stemberger, G. (1996), Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash, 2nd edn. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Thackeray, St. H., Marcus, R., Wikgren, A., and Feldman, L. H. (1965), Josephus (9 vols.; Cambridge, Mass./London: Loeb Classical Library).
- Vermes, G. (1997), The Complete Dead Sea Scrolls in English (London: Allen Lane/Penguin).
- (1999), An Introduction to the Dead Sea Scrolls (London: Penguin).
- Yonge, C. D. (1993), The Works of Philo: Complete and Unabridged, new updated edn. (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson).

History and Theology, New Testament

a) Introductions to the NT

- Brown, R. E. (1997), An Introduction to the New Testament (New York: Doubleday).
- Johnson, L. T. (1999), The Writings of the New Testament, rev. edn. (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Koester, H., Introduction to the New Testament (2 vols.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982; vol. 1, 2nd edn.; New York: de Gruyter, 1995).
- Kümmel, W. G. (1986), Introduction to the New Testament, rev. enlarged edn. (Nashville: Abingdon).

b) Background to the NT

- Barrett, C. K. (1987), The New Testament Background, rev. edn. (New York: Harper Collins).
- Evans, C. A., and Porter, S. E. (2000), Dictionary of New Testament Background (Downers Grove: Inter Varsity Press).
- Ferguson, E. (1993), Background of Early Christianity, 2nd edn. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Hengel, M. (1974), Judaism and Hellenism (London: SCM).
- Schürer, E. (1973–87), in F. Millar, G. Vermès and M. Goodman (eds.), The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ, rev. edn. (4 vols; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).

c) The Historical Jesus

- Allison, D. C. (1998), Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Becker, J. (1998), Jesus of Nazareth (trans. J. E. Couch, New York: de Gruyter).
- Crossan, J. D. (1991), The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Horsley, R. A. (1994), Sociology and the Jesus Movement, 2nd edn. (New York: Continuum).
- Meier, J. P. (1991, 1994), A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus (2 vols.; New York: Doubleday).
- Schweitzer, A. (2000), The Quest of the Historical Jesus (first complete English edition from 1913 German edition; London: SCM).
- Theissen, G., and Merz, A. (1998), The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide (trans. J. Bowden, London: SCM).

d) NT Christology

- Brown, R. E. (1994), An Introduction to New Testament Christology (London: Geoffrey Chapman).
- Cullmann, O. (1963), The Christology of the New Testament, 2nd edn. (London: SCM).
- Dunn, J. D. G. (1996), Christology in the Making, 2nd edn. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Loader, W. R. G. (1989), The Christology of the Fourth Gospel, BET 23 (Frankfurt: Peter Lang).
- Marshall, I. H. (1990), The Origins of New Testament Christology, updated edn. (Leicester: Apollos).
- Moule, C. F. D. (1977), The Origin of Christology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Tuckett, C. M., and Horrell, D. G. (eds.) (2000), Christology, Controversy and Community: New Testament Essays in Honour of David R. Catchpole, NovTSup 99 (Leiden: Brill).

e) Theology of the NT

- Bultmann, R. (1952, 1955) Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; London: SCM).
- Caird, G. B. (1994), in L. D. Hurst (ed.), New Testament Theology (Oxford: Clarendon).
- Conzelmann, H. (1969), An Outline of the Theology of the New Testament (London: SCM).
- Jeremias, J. (1971), New Testament Theology: The Proclamation of Jesus (London: SCM).
- Kümmel, W. G. (1973), The Theology of the New Testament: according to its Major Witnesses, Jesus, Paul and John (London: SCM).
- Schmithals, W. (1997), The Theology of the First Christians (Philadelphia: Westminster/John Knox).
- Strecker, G. (2000), Theology of the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster/John Knox).

f) Dictionaries of the NT

- Balz, H., and Schneider, G. (eds.) (1990–3), Exegetical Dictionary of the New Testament (3 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Freedman, D. N. (ed.), (1992), Anchor Bible Dictionary (6 vols.; New York: Doubleday).
- Green, J. B., et al. (eds.) (1992), Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels (Downers Grove: Inter Varsity Press).
- Hawthorne, G. F., et al. (eds.) (1993), Dictionary of Paul and His Letters (Downers Grove: Inter Varsity Press).
- Kittel, G. (ed.) (1965–76), Theological Dictionary of the New Testament (10 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Martin, R. P., and Davids, P. H. (eds.) (1997), Dictionary of the Later New Testament and its Developments (Downers Grove: Inter Varsity Press).

56. Introduction to the New Testament

- Beker, J. C. (1994), The New Testament. A Thematic Introduction (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Conzelmann, H., and Lindemann, A. (1988), Interpreting the New Testament (Peabody: Hendrickson, from the 8th German edn.).
- Davies, W. D. (1993), Invitation to the New Testament (Sheffield: JSOT, reprint).
- Houlden, J. L. (1977), Patterns of Faith: a Study of the Relationship between the New Testament and Christian Doctrine (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Moule, C. F. D. (1981), The Birth of the New Testament, 3rd edn. (London: A. & C. Black).
- Perrin, N., and Duling, D. C. (1994), The New Testament: An Introduction, 3rd edn. (Fort Worth: Harcourt Brace).

Stott, J. R. W. (1995), Men with a Message: An Introduction to the New Testament, rev. edn. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).

57. Matthew

- Allison, D. C. (1993), The New Moses: A Matthean Typology (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Balch, D. L. (ed.) (1991), Social History of the Matthean Community (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Bornkamm, G., et al. (1963), Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew (London: SCM).
- Davies, W. D., and Allison, D. C. (1988, 1991, 1998), The Gospel according to St. Matthew, ICC (3 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Gundry, R. H. (1994), Matthew: A Commentary on his Handbook for a Mixed Church under Persecution, 2nd edn. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Hagner, D. A. (1993, 1995), Matthew, WBC (2 vols.; Dallas: Word).
- Harrington, D. J. (1991), The Gospel of Matthew, Sacra Pagina (Collegeville: Liturgical).
- Luz, U. (1995), The Theology of the Gospel of Matthew (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- (1991, 2000) Matthew 1–7; 8–20 (2 vols.; Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Meier, J. P. (1976), Law and History in Matthew's Gospel, AnBib 71 (Rome: PBI).
- Overman, J. A. (1990), Matthew's Gospel and Formative Judaism (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Saldarini, A. J. (1994), Matthew's Christian-Jewish Community (Chicago: University of Chicago Press).
- Stanton, G. N. (1992), A Gospel for a New People: Studies in Matthew (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Wainwright, E. M. (1991), Towards a Feminist Critical Reading of the Gospel According to Matthew, BZNW 60 (Berlin: de Gruyter).

58. Mark

- Best, E. (1983), Mark: The Gospel as Story (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Guelich, R. A. (1989), Mark 1–8: 26, WBC (Waco: Word).
- Gundry, R. H. (1992), Mark: A Commentary on His Apology for the Cross (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Hooker, M. D. (1991), The Gospel according to St. Mark (London: A. & C. Black).
- Lane, W. L. (1974), The Gospel of Mark, NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Marcus, J. (1999), Mark 1–8, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday).
- Martin, R. P. (1972), Mark—Evangelist and Theologian (Exeter: Paternoster).
- Marxsen, W. (1969), Mark the Evangelist (Nashville: Abingdon).
- Myers, C. (1988), Binding the Strong Man: A Political Reading of Mark's Story of Jesus (Maryknoll: Orbis).
- Räsänen, H. (1990), The 'Messianic Secret' in Mark's Gospel (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Rhoads, D., and Michie, D. (1982), Mark as Story (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Telford, W. R. (1999), The Theology of the Gospel of Mark (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Tuckett, C. M. (ed.), (1983), The Messianic Secret (London: SPCK).
- Weeden, T. J. (1971), Mark—Traditions in Conflict (Philadelphia: Fortress).

59. Luke

- Conzelmann, H. (1960), The Theology of St. Luke (New York: Harper).
- Evans, C. F. (1990), Saint Luke, TPI NT Commentaries (London: SCM).

- Fitzmyer, J. A. (1981, 1985), The Gospel according to Luke, Anchor Bible (2 vols.; New York: Doubleday).
- Franklin, E. (1975), Christ the Lord: A Study in the Purpose and Theology of Luke-Acts (Philadelphia: Westminster).
- Green, J. B. (1997), The Gospel of Luke (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- (1997), The Theology of the Gospel of Luke (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Johnson, L. T. (1991), The Gospel of Luke, Sacra Pagina (Collegeville: Liturgical).
- Maddox, R. (1982), The Purpose of Luke-Acts (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Marshall, I. H. (1978), The Gospel of Luke: a Commentary on the Greek text (Exeter: Paternoster).
- Neyrey, J. H. (1991), The Social-World of Luke-Acts (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson).
- Nolland, J. (1989–93), Luke, WBC, (3 vols.; Dallas: Word).
- Tuckett, C. M. (1996), Luke, Sheffield NT Guides (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).

60. John

- Ashton, J. (1991), Understanding the Fourth Gospel (Oxford: Clarendon).
- (ed.) (1986), The Interpretation of John (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Beasley-Murray, G. R. (1999), John, WBC, 2nd edn. (Dallas: Word).
- Brown, R. E. (1996, 1970) The Gospel according to John, Anchor Bible (2 vols.; New York: Doubleday).
- (1979), The Community of the Beloved Disciple (New York: Paulist).
- Bultmann, R. (1971), The Gospel of John (Oxford: Blackwell).
- Culpepper, R. A. (1983), Anatomy of the Fourth Gospel. A Study in Literary Design (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Dodd, C. H. (1953), The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- (1963), Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Kieffer, R. (1987–8), Johannesevangeliet (2 vols.; Uppsala: EFS).
- Maloney, F. J. (1998), The Gospel of John, Sacra Pagina (Collegeville: Liturgical).
- Martyn, J. L. (1979), History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel, 2nd. edn. (Nashville: Abingdon).
- Painter, J. (1993), The Quest for the Messiah: The History, Literature and Theology of the Johannine Community, 2nd edn. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Schnackenburg, R. (1968, 1980, 1982), The Gospel according to St John (3 vols.; New York: Herder & Herder/Crossroad).
- Smith, D. M. (1984), Johannine Christianity: Essays on Its Setting, Sources and Theology (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press).
- Stibbe, M. W. G. (1993), John, Sheffield NT Guides (Sheffield: JSOT).

61. Four Gospels in Synopsis

- Catchpole, D. R. (1993), The Quest for Q (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Goulder, M. D. (1974), Midrash and Lektion in Matthew (London: SPCK).
- (1989), Luke—A New Paradigm (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Farmer, W. R. (1976), The Synoptic Problem, 2nd edn. (Dillsboro: Western North Carolina).
- Kloppenborg, J. S. (1987), The Formation of Q (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Kloppenborg-Verbin, J. S. (2000), Excavating Q: The History and the Setting of the Saying Source (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Sanders, E. P., and Davies, M. D. (1989), Studying the Synoptic Gospels (London: SCM).
- Streeter, B. H. (1924), The Four Gospels (London: Macmillan).
- Robinson, J. M., et al. (eds.) (2000), Critical Edition of Q, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).

- Tuckett, C. M. (1982), The Revival of the Griesbach Hypothesis, SNTSMS 44 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- (1996), Q and the History of Early Christianity (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).

62. Acts

- Barrett, C. K. (1994, 1998) Acts of the Apostles, ICC (2 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Bruce, F. F. (1990), The Book of Acts, rev. edn., NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Cadbury, H. J. (1955), The Book of Acts in History (New York: Harper).
- Conzelmann, H. (1987), Acts of the Apostles, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Fitzmyer, J. A. (1998), Acts of the Apostles, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday).
- Foakes Jackson, F. J., and Lake, K. (eds.) (1920–33), The Beginnings of Christianity: The Acts of the Apostles (5 vols.; London: Macmillan).
- Haenchen, E. (1971), The Acts of the Apostles (Oxford: Blackwell).
- Hemmer, C. (1989), The Book of Acts in the Setting of Hellenistic History, WUNT 49 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck).
- Hengel, M. (1979), Acts and the History of Earliest Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Johnson, L. T. (1992), Acts of the Apostles, Sacra Pagina (Collegeville: Liturgical).
- Lentz, J. C. Jr. (1993), Luke's Portrait of Paul, SNTSMS 77 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Lüdemann, G. (1989), Early Christianity according to the Traditions in Acts (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Winter, B. W. et al. (eds.) (1993–7), The Book of Acts in its First Century Setting (6 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).

63. Introduction to the Pauline Corpus

- Ashton, J. (2000), The Religion of Paul the Apostle (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Beker, C. (1980), Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Bruce, F. F. (1977), Paul: Apostle of the Heart Set Free (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Donaldson, T. L. (1997), Paul and the Gentiles: Remapping the Apostle's Convictional World (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Dunn, J. D. G. (1998), The Theology of Paul the Apostle (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Engberg-Pedersen, T. (2000), Paul and the Stoics (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Hengel, M. (1991), The pre-Christian Paul (London: SCM).
- Lüdemann, G. (1984), Paul Apostle to the Gentiles: Studies in Chronology (London: SCM).
- Murphy-O'Connor, J. (1996), Paul: A Critical Life (Oxford: Clarendon).
- Riesner, R. (1998), Paul's Early Period: Chronology, Mission, Strategy, Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Sanders, E. P. (1977), Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Schweitzer, A. (1931), The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle (London: A. & C. Black).
- Segal, A. F. (1990), Paul the Convert: The Apostolate and Apostasy of Saul the Pharisee (New Haven: Yale University Press).

64. Romans

- Barrett, C. K. (1957), A Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, BNTC (London: A. & C. Black).
- Barth, K. (1933), The Epistle to the Romans (London: Oxford University Press).
- Byrne, B. (1996), Romans, Sacra Pagina (Collegeville: Liturgical).

- Cranfield, C. E. B. (1975, 1979), Romans, ICC (2 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- (1998), On Romans and Other New Testament Essays (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Donfried, K. P. (ed.) (1991), The Romans Debate, rev. edn. (Peabody: Hendrickson).
- Dunn, J. D. G. (1988), Romans, WBC (2 vols.; Dallas: Word).
- Fitzmyer, J. A. (1993), Romans, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday).
- Hay, D. M., and Johnson, E. E., (eds.), (1995), Pauline Theology, vol. 3 Romans (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Moo, D. J. (1996), The Epistle to the Romans, NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Sanday, W., and Headlam, A. C. (1902), Romans, ICC (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Stowers, S. K. (1994), A Rereading of Romans (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Wedderburn, A. J. M. (1988), The Reason for Romans, SNTW (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).

65. 1 Corinthians

- Barrett, C. K. (1971), A Commentary on the First Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC (London: A. & C. Black).
- Chow, J. K. (1992), Patronage and Power: A Study of Social Networks in Corinth, JSNTSup 75 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Clark, A. D. (1993), Secular and Christian Leadership in Corinth: A Socio-Historical and Exegetical Study of 1 Corinthians 1–6 (Leiden: Brill).
- Collins, R. F. (1999), First Corinthians, Sacra Pagina (Collegeville: Liturgical).
- Conzelmann, H. (1987), 1 Corinthians, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Fee, G. D. (1987), The First Epistle to the Corinthians, NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Hurd, J. C. (1983), The Origin of 1 Corinthians, 2nd edn. (Macon, Ga.: Mercer).
- Martin, D. B. (1995), The Corinthian Body (New Haven, Yale University Press).
- Meggitt, J. J. (1998), Paul, Poverty and Survival (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Mitchell, M. M. (1991), Paul and the Rhetoric of Reconciliation (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck).
- Theissen, G. (1982), The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity: Essays on Corinth (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Thiselton, A. C. (2000), The First Epistle to the Corinthians, NIGTC (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Wire, A. (1990), The Corinthian Women Prophets (Minneapolis: Fortress).

66. 2 Corinthians

- Barnett, P. (1997), The Second Epistle to the Corinthians, NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Barrett, C. K. (1973), A Commentary on the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC (London: A. & C. Black).
- Betz, H. D. (1985), 2 Corinthians 8 and 9: A Commentary on Two Administrative Letters of the Apostle Paul, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Crafton, J. A. (1991), The Agency of the Apostle: A Dramatistic Analysis of Paul's Response to Conflict in 2 Corinthians, JSNTSup 51 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Furnish, V. P. (1988), II Corinthians, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday).
- Georgi, D. (1986), The Opponents of Paul in Second Corinthians (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).

- Lambrecht, J. (1999), Second Corinthians, Sacra Pagina (Collegeville: Liturgical).
- McCart, W. W. (1999), 2 Corinthians (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Martin, R. P. (1986), 2 Corinthians, WBC (Dallas: Word).
- Murphy-O'Connor, J. (1991), The Theology of the Second Letter to the Corinthians (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Sumney, J. L. (1991), Identifying Paul's Opponents: The Question of Method in 2 Corinthians, JSNTSup 40 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Thrall, M. E. (1994, 2000), The Second Epistle to the Corinthians, ICC (2 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).

67. Galatians

- Barclay, J. M. G. (1988), Obedying the Truth: A Study of Paul's Ethics in Galatians (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Betz, H. D. (1979), Galatians: A Commentary on Paul's Letter to the Churches in Galatia, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Bruce, F. F. (1982), The Epistle to the Galatians, NIGTC (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Dunn, J. D. G. (1993), The Epistle to the Galatians (London: A. & C. Black).
- (1993), The Theology of Paul's Letter to the Galatians (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Hansen, G. (1989), Abraham in Galatians—Epistolary and Rhetorical Contexts, JSNTSup 29 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Hays, R. B. (1983), The Faith of Jesus Christ: An Investigation of the Narrative Substructure of Galatians 3: 1–4: 11, SBLDS 56 (Chico, Calif.: Scholars Press).
- Kern, P. H. (1998), Rhetoric and Galatians, SNTSMS 101 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Longenecker, B. W. (1998), The Triumph of Abraham's God. The Transformation of Identity in Galatians (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Longenecker, R. N. (1990), Galatians, WBC (Dallas: Word).
- Lührmann, D. (1992), Galatians: A Continental Commentary (Minneapolis: Fortress).
- Martyn, J. L. (1997), Galatians, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday).
- Matera, F. J. (1992), Galatians, Sacra Pagina (Collegeville: Liturgical).

68. Ephesians

- Barth, M. (1974), Ephesians, Anchor Bible (2 vols; New York: Doubleday).
- Best, E. (1998), Ephesians, ICC (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Goodspeed, E. J. (1933), The Meaning of Ephesians (Chicago: University of Chicago Press).
- Kirby, J. C. (1968), Ephesians, Baptism and Pentecost (Montreal: McGill University Press).
- Koester, H. (ed.) (1995), Ephesos—Metropolis of Asia (Valley Forge, Pa.: TPI).
- Lincoln, A. T. (1990), Ephesians, WBC (Dallas: Word).
- and Wedderburn, A. J. M. (1993), The Theology of the Later Pauline Letters (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Mitton, C. L. (1951), The Epistle to the Ephesians (Oxford: Clarendon).
- Muddiman, J. (2001), The Epistle to the Ephesians, CNTC (London & New York: Continuum).
- O'Brien, P. T. (1999), The Letter to the Ephesians, PNTC (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Schnackenberg, R. (1991), The Epistle to the Ephesians (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- van Roon, A. (1974), The Authenticity of Ephesians, NovTSup 39 (Leiden: Brill).

69. Philippians

- Beare, F. W. (1973), The Epistle to the Philippians, 3rd edn. (London: A. & C. Black).
- Bockmuehl, M. (1998), The Epistle to the Philippians (London: A. & C. Black).
- Boomquist, L. G. (1993), The Function of Suffering in Philippians, JSNTSup 78 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Fee, G. D. (1995), The Epistle of Paul to the Philippians, NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Hawthorne, G. F. (1983), Philippians, WBC (Dallas: Word).
- Martin, R. P. (1983), Carmen Christi: Philippians 2:5–11 in Recent Interpretation and in the Setting of Early Christian Worship, 2nd edn. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- and Dodd, B. J. (eds.) (1998), Where Christology Began: Essays on Philippians 2 (Philadelphia: Westminster/John Knox).
- O'Brien, P. T. (1991), Philippians, NIGTC (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Peterlin, D. (1995), Paul's Letter to the Philippians in the Light of Disunity in the Church, NovTSup 79 (Leiden: Brill).

70. Colossians

- Arnold, C. E. (1996), The Colossian Syncretism (Grand Rapids: Baker).
- Barth, M., and Blanke, H. (1994), Colossians, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday).
- DeMaris, R. E. (1994), The Colossian Controversy, JSNTSup 96 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- Dunn, J. D. G. (1996), The Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, NIGTC (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Francis, F. O., and Meeks, W. A. (eds.) (1995), Conflict at Colossae, SBLBS 4 (Missoula: Scholar's Press).
- Lohse, E. (1971), Colossians and Philemon, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- MacDonald, M. Y. (2000), Colossians and Ephesians, Sacra Pagina (Collegeville: Liturgical).
- Martin, T. W. (1996), By Philosophy and Empty Deceit. Colossians as Response to a Cynic Critique, JSNTSup 118 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
- O'Brien, P. T. (1982), Colossians and Philemon, WBC (Dallas: Word).
- Porkorný, P. (1991), Colossians. A Commentary (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson).

71. 1 Thessalonians

- Best, E. (1972), The First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians (London: A. & C. Black).
- Bruce, F. F. (1982), 1 and 2 Thessalonians, WBC (Dallas: Word).
- Collins, R. F. (1984), Studies on the First Letter to the Thessalonians, BETL 66 (Leuven: Peeters).
- (1990), The Thessalonian Correspondence (Leuven: Leuven University Press).
- Donfried, K. P., and Beutler, J. (2000), The Thessalonians Debate: Methodological Discord or Methodological Synthesis? (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Jewett, R. (1986), The Thessalonian Correspondence: Pauline Rhetoric and Millenarian Piety (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Malherbe, A. J. (1987), Paul and the Thessalonians: The Philosophic Tradition of Pastoral Care (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- (2000), The Letters to the Thessalonians, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday).
- Richards, E. J. (1995), First and Second Thessalonians, Sacra Pagina (Collegeville: Liturgical).
- Smith, A. (1995), Comfort One Another: Reconstructing the Rhetoric and Audience of 1 Thessalonians (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox).
- Wanamaker, C. A. (1990), The Epistles to the Thessalonians, NIGTC (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).

72. 2 Thessalonians

- Giblin, C. H. (1967), The Threat to the Faith. An Exegetical and Theological Re-Examination of 2 Thessalonians, AnBib 31 (Rome: PBI).
- Holland, G. S. (1988), The Tradition that You Received from Us: 2 Thessalonians in the Pauline Tradition, HUT (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck).
- Hughes, F. W. (1989), Early Christian Rhetoric and 2 Thessalonians, JSNTSup 30 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Meade, D. G. (1986), Pseudonymity and Canon: An Investigation into the Relationship of Authorship and Authority in Jewish and Early Christian Tradition, WUNT 39. (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck)

73. Pastoral Epistles

- Dibelius, M., and Conzelmann, H. (1972), The Pastoral Epistles, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Donelson, L. R. (1986), Pseudepigraphy and Ethical Argument in the Pastoral Epistles (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck).
- Harrison, P. N. (1921), The Problem of the Pastoral Epistle (Oxford: Oxford University Press).
- Kelly, J. N. D. (1960), The Pastoral Epistles (London: A. & C. Black).
- MacDonald, D. R. (1983), The Legend of the Apostle: The Battle for Paul in Story and Canon (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Marshall, I. H. (1998), The Pastoral Epistles, ICC (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Miller, J. D. (1997), The Pastoral Letters as Composite Documents (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Mounce, W. D. (1999), The Pastoral Epistles, WBC (Dallas: Word).
- Quinn, J. D. (1990), Titus, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday).
- and Wacker, W. C. (2000), The First and Second Letters to Timothy, Eerdmans Critical Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Young, F. (1994), The Theology of the Pastoral Letters (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).

74. Philemon

- Barth, M., and Blanke, H. (2000), The Letter to Philemon, Eerdmans Critical Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Burthchaell, J. T. (1973), Philemon's Problem (Chicago: ACTA Foundation).
- Fitzmyer, J. A. (2001), The Letter to Philemon, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday).
- Martin, D. B. (1990), Slavery as Salvation: The Metaphor of Slavery in Pauline Christianity (New Haven: Yale University Press).
- Petersen, N. R. (1985), Rediscovering Paul: Philemon and the Sociology of Paul's Narrative World (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Sampley, J. P. (1980), Pauline Partnership in Christ: Christian Community and Commitment in Light of Roman Law (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Wansink, C. S. (1996), 'Chained in Christ': The Experience and Rhetoric of Paul's Imprisonments, JSNTSup 130 (Sheffield: JSOT).

75. Hebrews

- Attridge, H. W. (1989), Hebrews, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Ellingworth, P. (1993), Hebrews, NIGTC (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Dunnill, J. (1992), Covenant and Sacrifice in the Letter to the Hebrews, SNTSMS 71 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Hurst, D. (1990), The Epistle to the Hebrews: Its Background of Thought, SNTSMS 65 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
- Isaacs, M. E. (1992), Sacred Space: An Approach to the Theology of the Epistle to the Hebrews, JSNTSup 73 (Sheffield: JSOT).
- Kistemaker, S. J. (1961), The Psalm Citations in the Epistle to the Hebrews (Amsterdam: Soest).
- Lane, W. L. (1991), Hebrews, WBC (2 vols.; Dallas: Word).

- Lindars, B. (1991), The Theology of the Letter to the Hebrews (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
 Moffatt, J. (1924), Hebrews, ICC (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
 Montefiore, H. W. (1964), Hebrews (London: A. & C. Black).
 Peterson, D. (1982), Hebrews and Perfection, SNTSMS 47 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).

76. James

- Adamson, J. B. (1976), The Epistle of James, NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
 — (1989), James: The Man and His Message (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
 Baker, W. R. (1995), Personal Speech-Ethics in the Epistle of James, WUNT 2.68 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck).
 Bauckham, R. J. (1999), James: Wisdom of James, Disciple of Jesus the Sage, NTR (London: Routledge).
 Chester, A., and Martin, R. P. (1994), The Theology of the Letters of James, Peter and Jude (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
 Davids, P. H. (1982), The Epistle of James, NIGTC (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
 Edgar, D. (2001), Has God Not Chosen the Poor? The Social Setting of the Epistle of James, JSNTSup 206 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
 Johnson, L. T. (1995), The Letter of James, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday).
 Laws, S. (1980), The Epistle of James (London: A. & C. Black).
 Martin, R. P. (1988), James, WBC (Dallas: Word).
 Painter, J. (1997), Just James. The Brother of Jesus in History and Tradition (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press).
 Penner, T. C. (1996), The Epistle of James and Eschatology, JSNTSup 121 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).

77. 1 Peter

- Achtemeier, P. J. (1996), 1 Peter, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
 Balch, D. L. (1981), Let Wives Be Submissive: The Domestic Code in 1 Peter, SBLMS 26 (Chico: Scholars Press).
 Elliott, J. H. (1982), A Home for the Homeless (London: SCM).
 — (2001), 1 Peter, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday).
 Goppelt, L. (1993), A Commentary on 1 Peter (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
 Kelly, J. N. D. (1969), The Epistles of Peter and Jude (London: A. & C. Black).
 Michaels, J. R. (1988), 1 Peter, WBC (Dallas: Word).
 Selwyn, E. G. (1947), The First Epistle of Peter, 2nd edn. (London: Macmillan).
 Talbert, C. H. Perspectives on First Peter (Macon: Mercer University Press).
 Thurén, L. (1995), Argument and Theology in 1 Peter: The Origins of Christian Paraenesis, JSNTSup 117 (Sheffield: JSOT).

78. 2 Peter

- Charles, J. D. (1997), Virtue amidst Vice: The Catalog of Virtues in 2 Peter 1, JSNTSup 150 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
 Fornberg, T. (1977), An Early Church in a Pluralistic Society: A Study of 2 Peter, CBNTS 9 (Lund: Gleerup).
 Knight, J. M. (1995), 2 Peter and Jude, Sheffield NT Guides (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
 Neyrey, J. H. (1993), 2 Peter, Jude, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday).
 Robson, E. I. (1915), Studies in the Second Epistle of St. Peter (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
 Watson, D. F. (1988), Invention, Arrangement and Style: Rhetorical Criticism of Jude and 2 Peter, SBLDS 104 (Atlanta: Scholars Press).

79. 1 John, 2 John, 3 John

- Bogart, J. (1977), Orthodox and Heretical Perfectionism in the Johannine Community as Evident in the First Epistle of John, SBLDS 33 (Missoula: Scholars Press).
 Brown, R. E. (1979), The Community of the Beloved Disciple (New York: Paulist).
 — (1982), The Epistles of John, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday).
 Bultmann, R. (1973), The Johannine Epistles, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
 Edwards, R. B. (1996), The Johannine Epistles, Sheffield NT Guides (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
 Lieu, J. (1986), The Second and Third Epistles of John (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
 — (1991), The Theology of the Johannine Epistles (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
 Loader, W. R. G. (1992), The Johannine Epistles, (London: Epworth).
 Marshall, I. H. (1978), The Epistles of John, NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
 Neufeld, D. (1994), Reconceiving Texts as Speech-Acts. An Analysis of 1 John (Leiden: Brill).
 Schnackenburg, R. (1992), The Johannine Epistles (New York: Crossroad).
 Smalley, S. S. (1984), 1, 2, 3 John, WBC (Dallas: Word).
 Strecker, G. (1996), The Johannine Letters, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).

80. Jude

- Bauckham, R. J. (1983), Jude, 2 Peter, WBC (Dallas: Word).
 — (1990), Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
 Charles, J. D. (1993), Literary Strategy in the Epistle of Jude (Scranton: Scranton University Press).
 Landon, C. (1996), A Text-Critical Study of the Epistle of Jude, JSNTSup 135 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).

81. Revelation

- Aune, D. E. (1997, 1998), Revelation, WBC (3 vols.; Dallas: Word).
 Bauckham, R. J. (1993), The Theology of the Book of Revelation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press).
 — (1998), The Climax of Prophecy: Studies on the Book of Revelation (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
 Beale, G. K. (1998), Revelation, NIGTC (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
 — (1999), John's Use of the Old Testament in Revelation, JSNTSup 166 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press).
 Caird, G. B. (1966), The Revelation of St. John (London: A. & C. Black).
 Carey, G. (1999), Elusive Apocalypse: Reading Authority in the Revelation to John (Macon, Ga.: Mercer).
 Charles, R. H., (1920), The Revelation of St. John, ICC (2 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
 Faley, R. J. (1999), Apocalypse Then and Now: A Companion to the Book of Revelation (New York: Paulist).
 Fiorenza, E. J. (1998), The Book of Revelation: Justice and Judgment (Minneapolis: Fortress).
 Harrington, W. J. (1993), Revelation, Sacra Pagina (Collegeville: Liturgical).
 Hemer, C. J. (1987), The Letters to the Seven Churches in Asia in their Local Setting, JSNTSup 11 (Sheffield: JSOT).
 Malina, B. J. (1995), On the Genre and Message of Revelation: Star Visions and Sky Journeys (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson).
 Roloff, J. (1993), The Revelation of John (Minneapolis: Fortress).
 Rowland, C. C. (1993), Revelation (London: Epworth).

- (1998), "Revelation", in The New Interpreters' Bible, vol. 12 (Nashville: Abingdon).
- Smalley, S. S. (1994), Thunder and Love: John's Revelation and John's Community (Milton Keynes: Word).
- Sweet, J. P. M. (1979), Revelation (London: SCM).
- Yarboro Collins, A. (1976), The Combat Myth in the Book of Revelation (Missoula: Scholars Press).

82. Extra-canonical early Christian literature

- Barnard, L. W. (1966), Studies in the Apostolic Fathers and their Background (Oxford: Blackwell).
- Carleton, P. J. (1994), The Epistle of Barnabas: Outlook and Background, WUNT 2/64 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck).
- Crossan, J. D. (1988), The Cross that Spoke (San Francisco: Harper & Row).
- Elliott, J. K. (ed.) (1993), The Apocryphal New Testament: A Collection of Apocryphal Christian Literature in an English Translation (Oxford: Clarendon).
- Jefford, C. N. (1996), Reading the Apostolic Fathers (Peabody: Hendrickson).
- Koester, H. (1990), Ancient Christian Gospels: Their History and Development (London: SCM).
- Lake, K. (1992), The Apostolic Fathers, LCL (2 vols.; London: Heinemann).
- Niederwimmer, K. (1998), The Didache, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Osiek, C., (1999) The Shepherd of Hermas, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Patterson, S. J. (1993), The Gospel of Thomas and Jesus (Sonoma, Calif.: Polebridge Press).
- Roberts, A., and Donaldson, J. (1985–7), Ante-Nicene Fathers (10 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans).
- Schaff, P., and Roberts, A. The Early Church Fathers (38 vols.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Schneemelcher, W. (ed.) (1991, 1992), The New Testament Apocrypha (2 vols.; Philadelphia: Westminster/John Knox).
- Schoedel, W. R. (1986), Ignatius of Antioch, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress).
- Uro, R. (1998), Thomas at the Crossroads: Essays on the Gospel of Thomas (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark).
- Valantasis, R. (1997), The Gospel of Thomas, NTR (London: Routledge).

This page intentionally left blank

Index

- Aaron benediction 116–17
 blossoming rod 123 challenge to leadership by Levites 122–3
 death of 125
 disobedience at Kadesh 124–5
 genealogy 72–3
 golden calf episode 88–9 house of 398 initiation into priesthood 99 Moses' spokesman 72 priesthood 86–7, 112, 397
 Psalms 393, 401
 questioning Moses' leadership 119, 1241
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 670, 694–5
 Wisdom of Solomon 666
- Aaronides
 dating of P 18, 31
 establishment of perpetual priesthood 129 priestly responsibilities 123
- Aaronites, 1 Chronicles 271, 282
- Aasgaard, R. 1208
- Abaddon 344, 345, 414, 1295
- Abba (Father) 917, 1025, 1161
- Abednego 706
- Abel 44–5, 810–11, 1251
- Abel of Beth-maacah 223, 227
- Abel-mizraim 66
- Abgar (king of Edessa) 1329
- Abiathar 202, 211
 Absalom's rebellion 224, 225
 Adonijah 235
 David 214, 220, 226
 exile of 235
 Solomon 236
- Abigail 198, 212, 215
- Abihu 99, 101
- Abijah (king of Judah) 289–90
- Abijam (king of Judah) 243
- Abimelech (Philistine kings) 53, 55–6, 377
- Abimelech (son of Gideon) 183–4
- Abinadab 203, 214
- Abinoam 215
- Abishag 235
- Abishai 212–13, 216, 225–9, 278
- Abner 198, 212–13, 216–17
'Abot de Rabbi Nathan 805, 825–6
- Abraham 48–55, 185
 ancestor of Jews and Gentiles 1036, 1093, 1240
 burial of Sarah 54
 children chosen by God 1100
 1 Chronicles 269
 dating accounts of 42
 death of 55
 divine visitation 336
 Egypt 49–50
 as example 1252, 1259–60
 Ezekiel (book) 548
 4 Ezra 779
 faith in God 1093, 1159
 genealogy 48
 Genar 53
 God's promises to 40, 49, 50–2, 1159, 1245, 1252, 1290
 Hagar 51, 53
- Isaiah (book) 475, 483
 Jesus' relationship to 977–8 Machpelah's cave 278 marriage of Isaac 54–5 Melchizedek 1246
 sacrifice of Isaac 53–4, 810
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 694
 sources of accounts of 39, 48–9 vision 50–1
 wisdom 661
- Abshalom (son of David) 220, 221, 222–6, 243, 368, 384
- Acaean war 723
- Acco see Ptolemais
- Account of the Chariot 799
- Account of Creation 799
- Achaia 1203
- Achar (Achan) 164–5, 269
- Achior the Ammonite 633, 634, 636–7, 640
- Achish 210, 213, 214, 377
- Achor, Valley of 164, 573
- Achsah 178
- Ackerman, S. 243
- acrostics
 Lamentations 528–9, 531
 Psalms 361–2, 370, 375, 377, 398, 403–4
- Acts of the Alexandrian Martyrs* 806
- Acts of Andrew* 1307, 1323
- Acts of the Apostles 1028–61
 apocryphal 1307, 1323–9
 historical reliability 1072 inspiration for Lives of the Saints 1323 life of Paul 1063, 1064–5, 1071–3
- Acts of John* 1323
- Acts of Paul* 1323
- Acts of Paul and Thecla* 1220, 1324
- Acts of Peter* 1323
- Acts of Pilate* 1321, 1322–3
- Acts of Thomas* 1323
- Adad-idri (Hadadezer) (king of Aram) 247
- Adadniriai III (king of Assyria) 257
- Adam 43–4
 in apocryphal tradition 1322 archetypal human, Romans (book) 1094, 1097
 Cain and Abel 810
 1 Chronicles 269
 first ancestor, Isaiah (book) 469 genealogy of 45
 Pastoral Epistles 1224 pride in Philippians 1184–5 salvation, Wisdom of Solomon 661
 sin
 4 Ezra 778–9, 782, 784
 Sirach 679, 684–5
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 696
 Son of God, Luke's gospel 931
 2 Thessalonians 1218
- Adasa 722, 750
- Additions to Daniel 704–10
 didactic stories 626
 historical background 625
 influence on patristic writings 619 relationship to 3 Maccabees 774
 status in Jewish canon 620
- Additions to Esther see Esther (Greek)
- Admonitions of Ipuwer* 332
- Adonai 346
- Adoni-bezek 178
- Adonijah (son of David) 220, 235
- Adoniram (Adoram) 220, 227, 236
- adoption by God 1098, 1100
- Adora (Adoraim) 730
- Adoram see Adoniram
- Adrammelech 628
- Adria, sea of 1059–60
- Adullam 210, 218, 403
- adultery
 Decalogue commandment 141
 Jeremiah (book) 492
 Jesus' teaching 854, 868, 906–7
 law of God 1095
 Proverbs (book) 410–11
 punishment for 346, 546
 Sirach 682, 684, 685
 Susanna (story) 708–9
 suspicions of 115–16
 Ten Commandments 82
 1 Thessalonians 1207
- Adversary 334, 351
- Aeneas 1040
- aetiology, Genesis 41, 44, 45, 47, 48
- afflictions
 Job (book) 332
 physical suffering 1136, 1142, 1149
- afterlife
see also life after death; resurrection
 1 Corinthians 1130–2
 1 Maccabees 711
 Sirach 679
 Wisdom of Solomon 650, 651, 653
- Agag 327, 329
- age, Ecclesiastes 428
- agriculture boundary laws in Deuteronomy 149 land rights in Israel 247
 sabbath years 107
 success linked with humanitarian behaviour 147
- Agrippa I see Herod Agrippa
- Agrippa II 1058–9
- Agur 340, 421–2
- Ahab (false prophet) 510, 512
- Ahab (king of Israel) 245, 293, 294
 death 247–8
 Elijah 245–6 marriage to Jezebel 380 murder of Naboth 254 war against Aram 294
- Ahasuerus (Xerxes) 325, 326–8, 374, 757
see also Artaxerxes
- Ahaz (king of Judah) 259, 300–1, 443, 444, 445, 450
- Ahaziah (king of Israel) 248, 295–6
- Ahaziah (king of Judah) 253, 254, 255, 296–7
- Ahijah of Shiloh 240–1, 242–3, 288
- Ahikam 510, 520
- Ahimaaz 226
- Ahimelech 210, 211, 280
- Ahio 218
- Ahiqar 318, 628–9, 631, 632
- Ahithophel 224, 225, 883

- Ahura-Mazda 311
 Ai 164, 165
 Akhenaten 394
 Akiba, Rabbi 674, 685
 Akrabattene 718
 Alamothe 370, 380
 Alcimus (Yakim) 622, 721–2, 724–5, 748–50
 Aldebaran 352
 Alexander (and Hymenaeus) 1223
 Alexander Epiphanes (Balas) 725, 726–8
 Alexander the Great of Macedon conquests 452, 454, 621
 Daniel (book) 569
 1 Maccabees 713
 Alexander Jannaeus 622, 653, 711
 Alexandra Jannaea Salome 622
 Alexandria 773
allegorēsis, Philo 793 allegory
 apocalyptic literature 798
 Hagar and Sarah 1162
 Luke's Gospel 951–2, 953
 Mark's Gospel 892, 894
 Matthew's Gospel 872, 873, 878
 parousia 878, 951–2
 post-Biblical Jewish literature 793
 Psalms 357
 Song of Solomon 429, 432
 Allegory of the Cedar 546
 Almighty 65
 alms see charity
 Alpha and Omega 1290
 Alt, A. 29 altars
 centralization of sacrificial worship 144 challenge to sanctuary of Shiloh 173
 cultic sites 148
 David's altar at Jerusalem 230
 Ezekiel (book) 561
 Levitical law regarding slaughter 102 sanctuary 86, 87
 Amalek 79
 Amalekites 151, 207, 213, 214, 215
 Amariah 294
 Amasa 224, 225, 227
 Amaziah (false prophet) 587–8
 Amaziah (king of Judah) 257, 299
 Amidah 803, 804, 821
 Amittai 593
 Ammon
 Amos (book) 583
 oracles in Ezekiel (book) 552 war with Judas Maccabeus 718 Ammonites
 Achior in Judith 636–7, 640 destruction predicted in Ezekiel (book) 550 exclusion from local assemblies 150
 Israelite conquest 184
 Israel's territorial claims 138
 Jabesh-gilead 205
 Jephthah 184
 Jeremiah's Oracles Against the Nations 523
 Lot 50, 53
 mixed marriage in post-exilic Jerusalem 317, 767
 Nehemiah 322
 Rabbah 139
 war with David 220–1, 277–8 war with Judah 295, 300
 Ammon (son of David) 220, 222–3
 Amon (king of Judah) 263, 305 Amorites 51, 545
 see also Canaanites exemplary war against 139 Israelite conquest 126, 132, 178
 mixed marriage in post-exilic Jerusalem 317 original inhabitants of Canaan 583, 589
 Amos (book) 581–90
 callous carousing 586 canonical context 581
 Damascus 582–3
 Day of YHWH 585, 586, 588 death and life 585–6 doxology 589
 epilogue 589
 exodus revisited 589 futile success 586–7 interpretation method 581 Israel indicted 584
 judgement 582, 588
 locusts 585, 587
 national restoration 589
 Oracles Against the Nations 582, 584
 paradisaal promise 589 prophets, reinforced role of 584 punishment, selective 589 visions 587–8 wealthy women's fate 584–5 words of judgement 587–9
 Amos (prophet) 257–8, 337 Amaziah 587–8 announces day of YHWH 540 banquets, Sirach 688 divine calling 352
 Hosea's judgement on Israel comparison 571
 Jeroboam I of Israel 242
 listens to YHWH 341
 Menahem (king of Israel) 258 quoted by Stephen during trial 1037
 Anakim 138, 143, 168
 Ananias (and Sapphira) 1035, 1044
 Ananias (of Damascus) 1039, 1055–6
 Anat 346
 Anath 180 Anatolia 559 ancestors cult of 188 sins of 532
 Ancient of Days 814–15
Andrew, Acts of 1307, 1323 Andronicus 739
 angels
 see also Gabriel; Jeremiel; Lucifer; Michael; Raphael; Raziel; Remiel; Sariel; Uriel; Vrevoil Additions to Daniel 707
 annunciation 927
 apocalyptic literature 799 appearance to Joshua 163 Balaam's donkey 127 casting down of 1273 delivery of Torah 1239
 Enoch's ascent to heaven 813–14 fall of the 678, 685, 808–9, 1285–6, 1287 fiery furnace 565
 Gethsemane 955
 Hagar 51
 Jacob 56
 Jesus' tomb 958, 997
 Peter's escape from prison 1043 promulgating the law 1160
 Revelation 1298, 1301, 1305
 Seven Angels of the Presence 631 shepherds 929
 Sodom 52–3
 sons of God 46
 superiority of Son to 1238 translation of psalms 370 as warning and example in Jude 1285–6 anger
 of God 509, 1176
 Sermon on the Mount 854
 animal sacrifice
 Genesis 47, 51
 temple services 616 animals ark 46–7 blameless victims 477 clean and unclean 47, 99–100, 1041 creation of 42, 43
 God speaks to Jonah's great fish 594
 Job (book) 352–3
 Joel (book) 580–1
 naming of 44
 psalms 364
 YHWH's covenant with 573
 Anna (wife of Tobit) 628, 629, 630, 631
 Annals of the Kings of Judah 243, 262 Annas 993–4
 annunciation 926–7
 Anot 241 anthologies, post-Biblical Jewish literature 795 anthropology
 James (book) 1255
 purity and pollution systems 94 sexual relationships 102–3 anthropomorphism 140 anti-syncretism, paraenesis 137, 145–6 antichrist 781, 1276, 1279, 1282, 1311 Antigonos 622
 antinomianism 1284, 1285
 Antioch 1198, 1230
 authorship of 4 Maccabees 790–1 church at 1042, 1153, 1156 commissioning of Barnabas and Saul (Paul) 1044 controversy over Jewish and Gentile believers 1047
 martyr literature 806
 Paul 1045–6, 1071, 1157–8
 Antioch-in-Jerusalem 713, 720, 721, 724, 739
 Antiochus Hierax 743
 Antiochus II (king of Syria) 569
 Antiochus III (the Great) (king of Syria) 621 history of Colossae 1191
 Jewish soldiers 743
 1 Maccabees 713
 Magnesia, battle of 722
 Raphia, battle of 774 sacrificial animals in Jerusalem 741 Simon the high priest 696 treaty with Rome 720 welcomed by Jews 690
 Antiochus IV Epiphanes (king of Syria) 622
 Alexander Epiphanes 725
 Antichrist 781
 death 569–70, 719–20, 734, 736, 743–4, 745 desecration of temple 376, 387, 738 destroyer of Jerusalem 564, 566, 568 fourth beast in Daniel's vision 567 invasion of Egypt 713, 739–40
 Jason 738–9
 Maccabean revolt 569
 1 Maccabees 713–14, 716, 717, 721
 2 Maccabees 737, 745, 746
 4 Maccabees 790, 791
 as Nebuchadnezzar 633, 635, 637, 701
 Prayer of Azariah 706, 707 religious persecution in Judea 740–2
 Sirach 674, 686, 690
 2 Thessalonians 1217
 Antiochus V Eupator (king of Syria) 701, 716
 Maccabean revolt 720–1, 744–5, 746, 747–8
 Antiochus VI (king of Syria) 728, 729

- Antiochus VII Sidetes (king of Syria) 731–2, 733 Antipas 1291
 Antipater son of Jafson (envoy to Sparta for Jonathan) 729
Antiquities of the Jews see Josephus Apamea, Treaty of 737, 738, 739, 745
 Aphek 202, 213
 Apis 315, 522
 2 Apocalypse of Baruch
 apocalyptic literature 798, 799
 eschatology 783
 God's punishment for sins 778 laments 804, 823–4
 Messiah 783
 messianic woes 816 resurrection body 817 Apocalypse of John see Revelation
 Apocalypse of Paul 1329
 Apocalypse of Peter 1311, 1329
 Apocalypse of Thomas 1330
 apocalyptic literature 813–17
 apocryphal 1324, 1329–30
 day of judgement 1330
 day of the Lord 449–50, 454–5 descriptions of hell 1329–30
 2 Esdras 626, 775, 776, 779–81, 786–8, 789
 as foretelling of future 1330 genre of Jewish and Christian literature 1287 influence on subsequent literature 1329
 Joel (book) 579
 language of 1172
 Luke's Gospel 953–4
 Mark's Gospel 912–14
 Old Testament 9
 post-Biblical Jewish literature 797–800 punishment of Edom 461–2
 Revelation 1289
 Second Temple period 624
 Wisdom of Solomon 652
 Zechariah (book) 611, 614–15
 Apocrypha
 see also individual books
 Acts of the Apostles 1307, 1323–9 apocalypses 1324, 1329–30
 Esther (book) 325
 Gnosticism 1318, 1324
 introduction to 617–26
 Isaiah (book) 434
 letters 1328–9
 New Testament 1307, 1315–29
 Protestant 5 relationship to biblical texts 625–6
 use of term 617–18
Apocryphon (or Letter) of James 1329 apodictic law 29, 137
 Apollo 1296
 Apollonius 714, 716, 727, 739, 745, 791–2
 Apollos 1051–2, 1111, 1233
 Apollyon 1295
 apologetics
 Acts as 1030
 Josephus 795
 Apologists, Wisdom of Solomon 651 apostasy breach of the covenant 148
 incitement to 146
 Israel described by Stephen 1037
 proverbs 407
 2 Thessalonians 1216–17
 warnings 153, 1237, 1245, 1253, 1286
 apostles
 see also disciples; individual names apocryphal texts 1325, 1326
 appointment of seven deacons 1036 ascetics 1327
 Christ as 1241 effectiveness 1191 election of replacement for Judas 1031 false 1291
 miracles 1326
 mission in Galilee 938 names in Luke's gospel 935 role in church order 1038 on trial 1034, 1035 as witnesses of Jesus 1033 Apostles' Creed 1322 apostolic authority 1089, 1106, 1109, 1115–16, 1122, 1134, 1137–9, 1145–50
 Apostolic Church Order 1308
Apostolic Constitutions 770, 771, 772, 776, 823
 Apostolic Council 1046–7, 1156, 1157
 Apostolic Fathers 1306, 1308
Apostrophe to Zion 690
 Apphia 1234
 Apries 534, 554
 Aqedah (Binding) of Isaac 1252
 Aqhat 346
 Aqiba, Rabbi 429
 Aquila (and Priscilla) 1050, 1052, 1191, 1231
 Aquila (commentator) 380, 387, 423
 Aquiva, Rabbi 827–8
 Arabia, Paul 1070–1, 1155
Arabic Infancy Gospel 1315, 1320
 Arabs, Maccabean revolt 718, 719, 724, 727, 729, 746–7
 Arad 125
 Aram
 David 220–1
 enemy of Israel 582, 583, 587
 Israel (kingdom) 247, 251–3, 255, 256–7
 Judah 256, 293
 Solomon 240
 Syro-Ephraimite War 259
 Aram Beth-rehob 277
 Aram-naharaim 54, 56, 277
 Aramaic
 Apocrypha written in 621
 early Christian church 837
 Ezra (book) 313
 New Testament 833
 Old Testament 7
 Tobit (book) 626, 627
 translation of biblical texts into 795 used in Bible 463
 Aramaisms
 Elihu answers Job 347
 psalms 397
 Arameans
 Abraham 54
 David 220–1, 277–8
 genealogy of 47
 Israel (people) 56, 57–8
 Jacob 57–8
 'perishing Aramean' confession 151
 Ararat 47, 628
 Araunah (Oman) 230, 278
 Arbatta 718
 Arbela 723
 archaeology Jericho 159, 163
 origin of Israel 68
 Archedonassar see Esar-haddon Archelaus 622
 Archippus 1192, 1198, 1234
 Areius II (king of Sparta) 729
 Areopagus 1050
 aretology 682–3
 Aretas, king of Arabia 1040, 1070–1, 1072
 Ariarathes V (king of Cappadocia) 732
 Aristarchus 1198, 1235
 Aristobulus (king of Judea) 622
 Aristobulus (philosopher) 651, 658, 736
 Aristobulus (son of Alexandra Jannaea Salome) 622 Arius 729, 731 ark (Noah) 46, 664
 ark (of the covenant) brought to Jerusalem 230, 374, 401 building of the temple 285–6
 David 218–19, 274–7
 Israel's journey to Moab 118 move to the temple of Solomon 238–9 narratives 197, 202–3 passing through Jordan 161–2 post-exilic return to temple 313, 362 role in tabernacle worship 117 temple singers 271
 Armageddon 787–8
 armour of God 1177–8
 army of God 579, 580–1
 Arphaxad (king of Media) 632, 635
 Arsaces 730, 732
 Artaxerxes (I Esdras) 756, 757–8, 760, 763, 764, 765
 Artaxerxes (Greek Esther) 643–4, 645–9
 Artaxerxes I 309–10, 315–16, 318
 Artaxerxes II Arsakes 310
 Artaxerxes III Ochus 633
 Artemas 1233
 Arndel MS 404 1319
 Asa (king of Israel) 691
 Asa (king of Judah) 243–4, 290–3
 Asahel 216
 Asaph 271, 276, 280–1, 358, 359 ascension 958, 959, 1031
 asceticism
 Colossians 1193, 1196
 1 Corinthians 1118
 Pastoral Epistles 1231–2
 Aseneth 806, 826–7
 Ashdod 203, 323
 see also Azotus
 Asher (country) 237
 Asher (son of Jacob) 57, 272
 Asher (tribe) 65, 171, 272, 282
 Asherah
 cultic sites 148
 Hosea 578
 idol in temple 541 worship in Israel (kingdom) 245, 257 worship of in Judah (kingdom) 243, 262, 263 Ashkelon 186
 Ashtaroah Camaim 719
 Ashurbanipal 305
 Askalon 727, 728
 Asmodeus 627, 629, 630
 asses see donkeys Assurbanipal 136
 Assyria 550
 Ezekiel (book) 554
 fall to Babylonian empire 632
 God's instrument of punishment 450, 476, 602
 Israel (kingdom) 255, 257, 258, 259–60, 271, 447, 463
 Jews in exile in Tobit (book) 628
 Judah (kingdom) 136, 260–1, 262–3, 304–5
 Judea 632, 634, 635, 636–41 kings as good shepherds 595, 601 Nineveh 593, 594
 overthrow by Medes 450 political alliances 146, 152, 532 prophecy against 600
 Shalmaneser V 571

- Assyria (cont.)
 siege of Jerusalem 289, 303–4
 siege of Samaria 571
 Syro-Ephraimite War 259, 301 term for general world powers 598
 Tiglath-pileser III 571, 574, 577 warriors compared to women 601
- Astarte 273
- astral cults 139–40, 496, 605
- Astyarges (king of Media) 709
- Aswan 474
- Aten 394
- Athaliah (queen of Judah) 234, 253, 255–6, 297
- Athanasian Creed 1322
- Athanasius 392, 651, 1308, 1314
- Athens 744, 1050, 1206
- atonement
 4 Maccabees 791–2
 meaning 96
 Paul's theology 1079
 for pride 566 sacrifices for 121
 Sirach 672, 673, 680
- Atonement, Day of 95, 102, 106, 807
- Attalids 727
- Attharathes 769
- Augustine 333, 619, 651, 662, 1325
- Augustus 786, 791
- Aune, David E. 1075
- authority Christianity 1034
 divine 426
 human versus religious 442–3
 Jesus 890, 891, 894, 910, 952–3
 Peter 1031, 1035
 post-exilic society in Judah 312 priests 148
 wisdom 676
- avenger of blood 134, 172
- Avvim 138
- Azariah (chief priest under Hezekiah) 303
- Azariah (companion of Daniel) 564, 706–7
- Azariah (leader of Maccabean revolt) 718, 719
- Azariah (prophet in 2 Chronicles) 291–2
- Azariah (Raphael in Tobit) 630–1
- Azariah (son of Zadok) 236
- Azariah (Uzziah) (king of Judah) 258, 269
- Azazel 101–2
- Azekah (city) 516
- Azotus (Ashdod) 719, 727
- Azotus, Mount 724
- Baal 129, 179, 182
 competition between the gods on Mount Carmel 245–6 cosmic mountain 344, 787–8
 Ezekiel (book) 538, 553
 foppish priests of 605 Hosea 571, 573–7
 hymn 376
 Israel (kingdom) 242, 245, 248
 Judah (kingdom) 256, 262, 263
 name of realm of Mot (death) 577 name of YHWH 573 Philistines 203
 prophets 508
 rider on the clouds 386, 787
 Samaria 254–5
 Ugaritic title 162
- ba'al* (master) 437
- Baal Shamem 741
- Baal-meon 552
- Baal-peor 576
- Baalalah 275
- Ba'alat 397
- Baale-judah 218
- Baalperazim 218
- Baanah 217
- Baasha (king of Israel) 244, 292
- Babatha 685
- Babylon
 see also Babylonian exile as agent of YHWH 506
 Baruch (book) 699–701
 Bel and the Dragon 710 deities 472 destruction of 508, 524
 Egypt 487
 enemies of YHWH 402
 Ezekiel (book) 534, 552
 Ezra in 315–16 fall of Assyrian empire to 632 fate 525 fate of Gomorrah 450 foe from the north 504 as great enemy 449
 Isaiah (book) 433
 Jeremiah's Oracles Against the Nations 524
 Judah (kingdom) 264–5, 304–5, 591
 King List 45
 Manasseh 304–5
 Marduk-apla-iddina 262
 Nabonidus 564, 565, 566
 Nebuchadnezzar 563, 564
 Nehemiah in 318
 Revelation 1298, 1300–2
 Rome as 1263, 1270
 Syria-Palestine 522 temple destruction 387, 541
 Tower of Babel 48
- Babylonian exile 264–5, 374
 Additions to Daniel 704
 Amos (book) 586
 Apocrypha 625
 burial of Sarah in Canaan 54
 1 Chronicles 272–3
 2 Chronicles 307–8
 devastation of 445 divine assurance of return 516
 1 Esdras 756–7
 Esther (Greek) 644–5, 646, 647
 exilic life 487
 Ezekiel (book) 534, 542–3, 545
 4 Ezra 778, 779, 786
 Genesis 40
 given hope 509
 Haggai (book) 608–9
 Hosea (book) 576
 instruction for survival 526
 Jeremiah (book) 498, 501
 Jeremiah's letters 511–12, 703 miraculous fire 736 monarchy during 269, 270 proverbs used 546–7
 psalms 395
 as punishment for disobedience 108 restoration 449, 473, 513, 753–4, 756–62
 result of wrongdoing 444 sin and 41 story of yokes 511
 Susanna 708–9
 symbolized by Ephraim 513
 theodicy 10
- Babylonian Talmud 529, 797, 800, 818, 827–8
- Babylonian Theodicy* 343
- Bacchides (1 Maccabees) 721–2, 723–5
- Bacchides (2 Maccabees) 743, 749, 750
- Baeon 718
- Bagoas 633, 639–40
- Balaam 126–8, 131–2, 335, 1286, 1287, 1291
- Balak 126–8, 185, 1291
- ban 159, 164–5, 247, 250, 318
- banquets
 see also messianic banquet
 Isaiah (book) 455
 Luke's gospel 945, 946
 Sirach 687–8
- baptism
 1st–2nd century 1309
 apocryphal texts 1326
 auto-baptism 1309, 1324 on behalf of the dead 1131
 Colossians 1193
 Day of Pentecost 1032
 dying with Christ 1105
 Ethiopian eunuch 1039
 Gentile believers 1042 gift of the Spirit 1038 idealistic origin 834
 Jesus 888, 931
 John's disciples at Ephesus 1052
 Matthew's Gospel 851 into Moses 1124
 Paul 1071
 significance of 1055, 1160
 water 976, 1280
 Wisdom of Solomon 657
- baptismal-eucharistic 1310, 1313
- Bar Kochba revolt 776
- Bar-Kochva, B. 723–4, 746
- Barabbas 919, 957, 992
- Barachel 347
- Barak 180–1, 206, 390
- Barnabas 1231
 cousin of Mark 1198 meeting with Jerusalem leaders 1157
 Paul and 1044, 1048, 1071, 1156
 persecution by Jews 1230 sent to Antioch 1042 use of wealth in early church 1034
- Barnabas see Epistle of Barnabas*
- Bartimaeus 908
- Baruch 515
 exile in Egypt 521
 Jeremiah (book) 488, 509, 517, 518–22
- Baruch (book) 625, 699–704, 777
- Barzillai of Gilead 225, 226, 235
- Bashan 553
- Basilides 1318
- Bathsheba 221–2, 235, 270
- Battle Hymn of the Republic 482
- Baur, F. C. 1085
- beasts, Revelation 1297–8, 1302–3
- Beatitudes 852–7, 935, 1016–18
- Becher (son of Benjamin) 272
- Bedouin 282, 300
- Beelzebul 861, 894, 943–4, 1020–2
- Beeroth 217
- Beersheba 53, 63, 204
- Behemoth 332, 351, 353, 782
- Bel 524
- Bel and the Dragon 626, 705, 706, 709–10
- Bel-marduk 710
- Bela (son of Benjamin) 272
- Belial 600, 822
- belief in God 1092
 in Jesus Christ 1067 resurrection of Christ 1130–2
- believers
 as children of God 1277 free from the law of sin 1097 law of the Spirit 1097–9 power not to sin 1095
- Belshazzar 564, 566, 701

- Belteshazzar 565
 Ben Sira (book) see Wisdom of Jesus son of Sirach
 Ben Sira (person) see Jesus ben Sira
 Ben-hadad (king of Aram) (son of Hazael) 257, 292 Benaiah 220, 227, 229, 235–6
 benediction
 Aaronic 116–17
 Hebrews (book) 1254
 for Jerusalem and Judah 581
 Romans (book) 1107
 Benhadad (king of Aram) 247, 252
 Benjamin (son of Jacob) 60, 62–3, 272, 514
 Benjamin (tribe)
 Absalom's rebellion 224
 army 291
 Blessing of Jacob 65–6
 1 Chronicles 269, 272, 278, 282
 David 274, 278
 defeat in civil war 190
 Ehud 179
 hospitality to Levite 189 Jabesh-gilead 191
 marriage with 190 province under Solomon 237
 Saul 206
 Sheba's rebellion 227
 territory allocation 171
 Berea, 1 Maccabees 723
 Bergren, T. A. 776–7
 Bernard of Clairvaux 429
 Bernice 1058–9
 Beroea 1050, 1206
 Berossos 267
 Berquist, J. 310
 Beth-arbel 576
 Beth-aven (Bethel) 574
 Beth-horon 318–19, 716, 722
 Beth-jeshimoth 552
 Beth-maacah 223
 Beth-rehob 221, 277
 Beth-shan 214, 273, 719
 Beth-shemesh 203
 Beth-zatha 969–70
 Beth-zachariah 720
 Beth-zur 717, 718, 720, 725, 728, 745, 748
 Bethany 879, 915, 981–2, 983
 Bethbasi 725
 Bethel 255, 585
 Abraham 49
 Baasha 244
 Beth-aven 574
 Jacob 56–7, 63–4
 Jeroboam I of Israel 242, 288, 628
 Josiah 263
 legitimacy as sacrificial site 278 sanctuary at final judgement 588 site of Ai 165
 YHWH's destruction of 584
 Bethlehem 189, 193, 401, 929
 Bethsaida 902
 Bethuel (father of Rebekah) 55
 Bethulia 633, 634, 636, 637–40
 Betz, Hans Dieter 1077
 Beyond the River 721 Bezalel 87, 90
 biblion 1295–6
 Bickerman, E. J. 642, 643
 Bildad 335, 337–8, 342, 344
 Bildad Job (book) 331
 Bilhah 57, 270, 818
 Bill of Divorce 811
 Binding see Aqedah biography
 Acts as 1029, 1030
 gospels as 847–8, 1001–2
 post-Biblical Jewish literature 805–7 birds burnt offerings 96, 98
 clean and unclean 100 of prey 472 quail 119 birth 185, 400, 468
 Bishlam 757 bishops 1224
 Black Sea 1200 blacksmiths 612
 blasphemy
 Jesus accused of 891, 919, 978, 980
 Jude (book) 1285–6
 Leviticus 106
 Sirach 682
 Blenkinsopp, J. 319 blessedness 375, 392 blessing
 Aaronic benediction 116–17
 Balaam and Israel 128 consequence of obedience 152
 divine 385, 409, 412
 Ephesians (book) 1167–8
 link with humanitarian behaviour 147 for obedience 107–8
 Sermon on the Mount 853, 935
 Song of the Three Jews 707–8 theme of psalm 401 trinitarian 1290
 Blessing of Jacob 59–60, 64–6
 Blessing of Moses 64
 blind and deaf imagery 469, 473 blindness, healing of 902, 978–9 blood avenger of 134, 172
 Christ 879–80, 916, 973, 1249
 Levitical law 102 menstruation 94
 ordination ritual 87
 Passover 75
 place in sacrificial cult 96 red heifer ritual 123–4 taboo 145
 as witness to the Son 1280 boasting 1094, 1123, 1136, 1143, 1144, 1146 boats, symbols of the church 1326
 Boaz 192, 193–5
 body Christian identity 1117 as cosmos metaphor 1127–8 imagery 1140
 Last Supper 879, 916, 955
 physical suffering 1142, 1149
 resurrection 817, 1130–2
 as temple of the Holy Spirit 1114, 1118
 Boismard, M.-E. 1005
 Boling, Robert G. 178
 Book of the Acts of Solomon 233, 236, 237, 241
 Book of Common Prayer 480
 Book of the Covenant 29, 30, 82–4, 137
 Book of the Heavenly Luminaries 794, 801
 The Book of Instruction see Wisdom of Jesus son of Sirach Book of Jasher 215
 Book of Jubilees 624
 apocalyptic literature 798
 1 Enoch 794
 jubilee cycles 107 origin of sin 569
 Solomon's prayer for wisdom 658 sons of Noah 809
 Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah 272
 Book of the Law 136, 263, 305–6, 769
 Book of Mysteries 802, 820
 Book of Origins 13–15
 Book of the Watchers 566, 794, 1285–6
 Book of Zerubbabel 799
 Books of the Annals of the Kings of Israel/Judah 233 Booths, Feast of see Feast of Booths boundaries
 Judah's territories 169–70
 law in Deuteronomy 149
 bowls, seven in Revelation 1299
 Box, G. H. 775
 Bozrah 719
 Branch Davidian Sect 471 bread breaking of 1033, 1053 disciples' need 901–2 feeding the five thousand 899 of heaven 972–3
 Last Supper 916, 955
 Lord's Prayer 943 statute regarding 121 in temple 106 bribes, proverbs 415 bridegroom allegory 892
 Brownlee, W. H. 648
 Bruce, F. F. 1072–3
 Bryennios MS 1308, 1310, 1311, 1314
 Bull El (El) 576
 burial
 Ecclesiastes 427 food offerings on graves 629–30, 687 importance 450
 Jesus' 992–6
 kindness to the dead 675 burning bush 71
 burnt offerings 96
 Buzi 537
 Byblos 384
 Cabirus 1200, 1207
 Caesar 787, 911, 953, 1057–8, 1322
 Caesarea 1041–2, 1054, 1056–9
 Caesarea Philippi 865, 902
 Caiaphas 982, 993–4
 Cain 44–5
 1 John 1277–8
 Jude 1286
 Targum Pseudo-Jonathan 810–11
 Wisdom of Solomon 661
 Cairo Geniza 667, 668, 697
 Caleb 170, 178, 179 inheritance 169, 172
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 695 spy mission 120
 calendars
 Book of Jubilees 794
 1 Enoch 801, 820
 Passover 75–6
 Seleucid empire 712
 Sirach 694
 calf, golden see golden calves Caligula 623, 652, 664, 773, 791, 1217
 Callisthenes 743
 Calvin, John 333
 Cambyases (king of Persia) 315, 757, 763 Cana 965
 see also Capernaum Canaan (land)
 Abraham in 53
 Amorites (original inhabitants) 583, 589 boundaries 133
 burial of Sarah 54
 covenant 51–2

- Canaan (land) (cont.)
 Genesis 40
 and Israel (kingdom) 242
 Israelite conquest of 133, 138–9, 176–7, 178–82
 patriarchs 48
 Canaan (son of Ham) 47, 809
 Canaanites
 Asherah 577, 578
 Baal 571, 573–7
 conquest of Jerusalem by David 217, 662–3
 divine warrior 560
 El (Bull El) (supreme god) 576
 genealogy of 47
 and Isaac 55–6
 Israelite conquest 125, 178–82
 mixed marriage in post-exilic Jerusalem 317, 767 sexual relationships 102–3
 Shechemites 59–60 woman in Matthew's gospel 804, 864 cannibalism 475
 canon 3–4
 apocryphal Acts of the Apostles 1324–5, 1328
 biblical criticism 3 gospels 1316, 1317
 James (book) 1257
 letters of Paul 1083
 Old Testament 5–6
 psalms 358
 theology 1327
Cantemus Cuncti 404
 Capernaum 890, 933, 1018–20
 Capharsalama 722
 Carchemish 138, 306, 487, 522
 Carlson, R. A. 199
 Carmel, Mount 245–6, 352
 Carmonians 789
 Carnaim 719, 747 Carneades 692
carpe diem 424, 427
 Carpus 1220
 Carroll, R. P. 443
 Casiphia 316, 766
 Cassander 1200
 Castor and Pollux 1208 casuistic law 29, 30, 82
 catalepsy of nature 1319 Catalogue of the Sixty Books 1311 cattle, red heifer ritual 123–4 caution, Sirach 675, 679 celibacy
 apocryphal texts 1326–7, 1329
 of Jeremiah 503
 Matthew's Gospel 868–9
 Paul 1118–19
 Celts, Galatians 743
 Cencreae 1051
 Cendebeus 732
 census
 David 229–30, 278, 282
 Levites 114–15
 Numbers 111, 113–14, 129–30
 Romans in Judea 623, 928–9
 Cephas see Peter cereal offering 96–7, 98
 Chabris 637
 Chaldeans 520 agents of God's justice 602 invasion of Jerusalem 515
 Job 334
 The Letter of Jeremiah 704
 use of term 40, 42, 48, 565
 chaos, sea as symbol of 787, 857, 896, 938 Chapters of the Fathers 800, 817–18 charis (grace) 1269–70 charisma, Paul 1145–6, 1149 charity 672–3, 686, 689, 855–6 Charmis 637
 Chaspo 747
 Chebar 537
 Cheleoudites 632
 Chemosh 193, 249–50, 384, 523
 Cherethites 220, 224, 227, 235, 552 cherubim 44
 Ezekiel (book) 542
 on mercy seat 117 in sanctuary 86
 Solomon's temple 238, 283, 285
 childbirth 94, 100 children in authority 441 cult of the departed child 664 discipline 687
 folly 681
 of God 962–3 household rules in Ephesians 1177 humility 905 impious 678–9 killing by Pharaoh 69–70 kingdom of God 950–1
 Mark's Gospel 905, 907
 Matthew's Gospel 867, 868, 869
 Paul 1120
 preference for male to female 681 of promise 1100 receiving of 907 sacrifice of 103, 146, 149, 548
 Sirach 675, 678–9, 681, 687
 social relations 675
 Childs, B. S. 32, 358
 China 474
 Christ see Jesus; Messiah
 Christ Group, redemption into 1265
 Christ hymn 1106
 Christian–Jewish Gospels 1315
 Christianity
 see also church allegories rooted in politics 432
 anthologies 795
 apocalyptic literature 783, 798, 799
 Apocrypha 618, 619, 1327 authority of the emperor 1223
 baptism 986
 clergy in early church 1310
 commentary 793
 contrasted with Judaism 1155 Cretan 1231 divine revelation 514 early texts 1199
 eschatology 783, 1117
 2 Esdras 775, 776, 777, 783
 exhortations by Paul 1173
 fasting customs 1309
 Gentile converts 1188
 Gentiles included in message of Gospel 1041–2, 1046–7 growth and development 1074 household rules 1176–7
 Isaiah 437
 Jewish 1182, 1231 laws 1087
 liturgy 803 living the life 1268
 Lord's supper 1126
 4 Maccabees 790–1
 martyrdom 714
 model for conduct in Ephesians 1175 new humanity in Ephesians 1170
 origins, Paul 1062
 persecution 895, 1038, 1069–70, 1148
 Revelation 1288, 1290
 phoenix in early literature 1314
 Prayer of Manasseh 771 priesthood of all believers 482
 psalms 357
 Rome 1288, 1322
 Septuagint 618
 Servant Songs 476 slaves 1197
 strength of early church 1328 superiority over earthly rule 1321 symbolism and idolatry 466, 470 syncretism 1325
 true people of covenant 1312 unity 1104, 1105, 1173 universal salvation 471 virginity 445
 water of life 1306
 wisdom literature 800
 Wisdom of Solomon 651–2, 653
 worship 1129–30
 Christianity–Judaism 1311, 1312, 1313, 1314, 1315
 Christmas 380, 391, 437
 Christology
 Christ as Son and High Priest 1244
 Colossians 1191
 Hebrews (book) 1238, 1240
 incarnation and suffering of the Son 1239
 James (book) 1255, 1259
 Johannine 961, 963, 972, 991, 1012–13
 John's Gospel 1012–13
 king of peace 613
 Lamb 1293
 Luke's Gospel 931
 Mark's Gospel 887
 Matthew's Gospel 846, 1009
 Messiahship of Jesus 1155
 non-Jewish influences 1186
 Philippians 1180, 1185
 Psalms 1034, 1045
 Revelation 1290
 Song of Solomon 429
 2 Thessalonians 1218
 Wisdom of Solomon 651–2
Chronicles of Jerahmeel 705, 706, 708
 1 Chronicles 267–83
 dating of P 18
 relationship to 2 Esdras 625, 751–2, 753
 relationship to Ezra and Nehemiah (books) 309, 311
 2 Chronicles 267–8, 283–308
 dating of P 18
 last kings of Judah 755–6
 Passover under king Josiah 754–5
 relationship to 2 Esdras 625, 751–2, 753
 relationship to Ezra and Nehemiah (books) 309, 311
 relationship to Prayer of Manasseh 625, 770–1
 Chrysippus 688, 692
 Chrysostom 1184, 1204 church
 Antioch 1042
 apostolic talent 1147 belongs to God 1115
 birth of 862–7
 body of Christ 1174 characteristics 836 common life 1034–5
 Corinthian 836–7, 1109, 1115, 1135–6, 1150, 1231 early developments 837–8, 1314
 Ephesians 1166, 1169, 1173
 Galatia 1072

- groupings 837 growth 1033, 1040 itinerant-settled shift 838
 Jesus' instructions 867–8
 Jesus' prayer for the future 992 Jewish origins 836, 839
 leadership 1114–15
 location of early churches 1314
 Mark's Gospel 922
 Matthew's Gospel 862–7
 messages to churches in Revelation 1288, 1291–2 obscurity 839 organization in Pastoral Epistles 1220–1, 1223–7 prayer 1034
 role in Revelation 1295 rural setting 837 scattering 1038 symbolised by boats 1326 time span 837 urban setting 838 Cicero 664, 1199
 circumcision
 Abraham's covenant 52
 Christianity 1047, 1054–5 conversion of Achior 633, 634, 640
 Ephesians 1170
 Galatians 1156, 1157, 1163, 1164–5
 for Gentile proselytes 1069, 1072
 Jesus' teaching 975
 Jewish identity 1119
 Luke's Gospel 928
 Maccabean revolt 713, 715, 741 march on Jericho 162–3 participation in covenant 1086–7
 Philippians 1188
 as spiritual commitment 493 of Timothy 1048 Zipporah 72 cities conquered by Israel 168 destruction of 455
 levitical 172–3 refuge 133–4, 140, 149, 172 civil authority, Romans (book) 1104 civil disobedience, by apostles 1035 civil law 103, 150
 1 Clement 619, 633, 651, 652
 Clement (of Alexandria) 659, 1308, 1311, 1314
 Clement (of Rome) 1182
 Cleopatra I 727
 Cleopatra II 774 clergy, in early Christian Church 1310
 Clines, David 13, 32
 Code of Hammurabi 8, 29–30, 82, 106, 108, 147, 150
 Codex Alexandrinus 626, 633, 773, 1313–14
 Codex Ambrosianus 776
 Codex Ardmachanus 1328
 Codex Basiliano-Vaticanus 633
 Codex Bezae 1307, 1308
 Codex Cavensis 1328
 Codex Claromontanus 1311
 Codex Corbeiensis 1312
 Codex Fuldensis 1328
 Codex Hierosolymitanus 1312
 Codex Sangermanensis 784
 Codex Sinaiticus 1311, 1312
 Baruch (book) 699, 700
 Judith (book) 633
 as source of Shepherd of Hermas 1314
 Tobit (book) 626, 629
 Codex Vaticanus 626–7, 633
 Codex Venetus 626–7, 773 codices, post-Biblical Jewish literature 795 Colenso, John 14–15
 collection for the saints commitment of Corinth 1143–5
 Paul 1132, 1134, 1149–50
 Paul's visit to Jerusalem 1071
 Colossae 1191, 1292
 Colossians (book) 1073, 1078, 1165, 1191–9
 comforters of Job 341 commandments
 see also Ten Commandments
 Mark's Gospel 911–12
 new 1275
 wisdom, Sirach 671
 commentary critical 1, 2
 post-Biblical Jewish literature 793–4, 807–11
 reasons for using 1 use of The Oxford Bible Commentary 4–5 community benefits from prophecy 1129 ethic 1105
 honour 1144, 1150
 instructions in Pastoral Epistles 1232 Community Rule see Rule of the Community compensation 83, 106, 859 complementary opposites, Sirach 668, 669, 676, 688, 693
 comprehension, human 424, 426, 427
 confession
 Ezra and the mixed marriages 321, 767–8 and forgiveness of sins 1278
 Jeremiah (book) 498, 501
 Mark's Gospel 902
 Matthew's Gospel 859, 881
 Prayer of Manasseh 770
 proverbs 421
 Psalms (book) 366, 375
 of sin by Zion 599
 triadic structure 1173 true and false 1278–9 Coniah 507 conquest model of history of Israel 176–7 consecration firstborn 75, 76
 Levites 108–9, 117
 nazirites 116
 of tabernacle 117 consolation
 Paul 1142
 speech of before Jesus' departure 989 Consolation, Little Book of 512 consolation-affliction antithesis 1136 conversion
 apocryphal texts 1324
 attained through prophecy 1129
 Colossians 1193
 Cornelius 1041–2
 to Judaism 634, 640
 non-believers 1119, 1142
 Philippian jailor 1049
 Saul (Paul) on road to Damascus 1039–40,
 1055–6, 1058, 1155
 Coote, Robert 177
 Coptic Church 3, 1310, 1314, 1322
 Corinth 836
 church 836–7, 1109, 1135–6, 1150, 1200, 1231
 Paul 1050–1, 1077, 1213
 1 Corinthians 1073, 1108–33
 authorship 1108
 2 Corinthians 1073, 1134–51
 authenticity 1134, 1141–2 collection for the Saints 1134, 1143–5, 1149–50
 Cornelius 1041
 cornfields 892, 934
 cosmic mountain 787–8 cosmic realm 612 cosmogony, Israelite 352 cosmology anger of YHWH 155
 apocalyptic literature 798
 creation 42–3
 Council of Trent 619, 751 countenance of God 116–17
 covenant see also ark abandoned by monarchy 507
 Abraham 40, 49, 50–2, 70, 1159, 1290
 apostasy as breach of 148
 Asa king of Judah 291–2 broken by Israel 88 circumcision as mark of 162 collapse through disloyalty 499 cosmic 455
 David 200, 235, 259, 277
 with death 654 endurance 515 ethical decrees of YHWH 392
 Exodus 68
 faithfulness 179 with Gibeon 166 golden calf 89–90
 Isaiah 439
 Jeremiah (book) 498–506
 Judaism 1065–6
 justice and righteousness 337
 Lord's Supper 1127
 membership of community 479, 480 Moab 153
 monarchy 206, 383
 at Mount Horeb 140
 Nehemiah 321–2
 new 514–15, 986–7, 1138, 1247–8, 1249–50
 Noah 46–7
 and oath 153 obedience to 499
 Paul and the Corinthians 1138
 Pentateuch 13
 Prayer of Manasseh 771–2
 Qumran community 822 renewal 395
 restoration 439
 at Shechem 174–5
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 694–5
 Ten Commandments 80–2
 transferred from Israel to Christians 777 virtues 376
 YHWH and animal world 573
 YHWH and Israel at Sinai 84 covenant, ark of the see ark Covenant, Book of the see Book of the Covenant covetousness 82, 141, 1096
 creation 41, 42–4
 being saved through Christ 1098, 1099 chaos 787
 Christ's role 1237–8, 1239
 death 784–5 described by YHWH 351
 the Flood 47
 function of Word in 962 goodness of 692
 imperfection of 782
 Isaiah (book) 449
 J source 26
 Jeremiah's vision of destruction 493
 Mesopotamian myth 337
 new 1165
 number and measure 662 out of nothing 742
 Philo 807–8

- creation (cont.)
 praise of 693–4
 pre-existence of matter 662
 Proverbs (book) 408
 sea monster 782 source criticism 16–17
 wisdom 679, 683
 Wisdom of Solomon 651, 662
- Creator
 bestows life 339
 Prayer of Manasseh 771
 questions by Elihu 350
 'Creator of Light' 823
- creeds
 Christian 1130–1
 Exodus 142
 Hexateuch 12, 22–3
- Crescens 1231
- Crete 552, 1059, 1220, 1231
- criticism 1–3
see also source criticism
 Pentateuch 15–25
- Crocus 1234
- cross climax of Jesus' ministry 957 message of the 1112, 1128, 1139 suffering and sacrifice 1094
- cross-bearing disciples 903, 939, 947
 Simon of Cyrene 919
- crucifixion
 attitudes towards 1112
 John's Gospel 993, 995–6
 Luke's Gospel 923, 957–8
 Mark's Gospel 903, 919–20
 Matthew's Gospel 884
 Pastoral Epistles 1233
- Ctesias 310
- cult prostitutes 574, 703–4, 741
- cults 93–5, 460 astral 139–40
 Eleusis 1218
 imperial 1188
 Israelite 93–5, 144–6, 263, 460
 Jerusalem 368
 kingdom of Israel 260
 psalms 404
 ruler-cult 664 supplanted by new covenant 1250
 Tammuz 541–2
 Thessalonica 1200, 1203, 1207
- cup
 Last Supper 916, 955
 sorrow, Matthew's gospel 871, 880 suffering, Mark's gospel 908
- curds and honey 445
- curse
 Balak and Israel 126–8 consequences of disobedience 152–3 Deuteronomic 512 for disobedience 107–8
 Jeremiah (book) 498–9, 506
 proverbs 420
- Cush (Benjaminite) 369
- Cushan (Cushanrathaim) 603
- Cushites 290–1
- Cyaxares (king) 632
- Cynics 1120, 1204
- Cyprus 553
- Cyrus (king of Persia) 433
 Bel and the Dragon 709 destruction of Jerusalem 759 edict 272, 307, 308, 311, 314–15, 753, 756–7, 763–4 friend of Israel 465, 470–1
- instrument of YHWH 471, 472
 restoration of temple 754, 762–3
 Zoroastrianism 472
- Dagon 188, 203, 273, 727
- Damascus
 Ahab of Israel 247
 Amos (book) 582–3
 Aramean kingdom 451 conversion of Saul (Paul) 1039–40
 David's conquest of 220
 Elisha 252–3
 Jeremiah 524
 Paul 1065, 1070, 1155
 Syro-Ephraimite War 259
 Tiglath-pileser III 571
 war between Antiochus VI and Demetrius II 728
Damascus Document 678, 797, 804, 812–13, 824–5
- Dan (shrine) 242, 255, 288, 628
- Dan (son of Jacob) 57
- Dan (tribe) 65, 172, 188–9, 269, 272
- Dandamaev, M. 310, 314–15, 318
- Dan'el 335, 544–5
- Daniel
 Bel and the Dragon 706, 709–10
 Ezekiel (book) 544
 lions den 566–7, 706, 710
 Revelation 1297, 1305
 Susanna 709
 Daniel (book) 415, 563–71
see also Additions to Daniel
 apocalyptic literature 798, 1287
 den of lions 566–7 and 4 Ezra 786, 788 great sea 787, 788 historical context 563–4 history of world as heavenly conflict 568–9 Jeremiah's prophecy 568
 language of 563
 law of the God of 567
 predetermination 570
 Dante Alighieri 397, 1329
- Darius (king of Persia) 310, 320, 342, 607, 752–4, 758–60, 762–4
- Darius III (king of Persia) 713
- Darius the Mede 450, 566, 568
- darkness
 crucifixion 919–20, 957
 opposed to light in Johannine dualism 1275
- Dathema 718
- Datis 738
- daughters confined to the home 685 metaphor for fallen city 472
 shame 693
 Zion 435, 438, 529
- David (king) and Absalom 223–6 administration of kingdom 282
 Amnon and Tamar 222–3
 ark of the covenant 218–19, 274–7, 393, 401
 Bathsheba 221–2
 Blessing of Jacob 65 capture of Jerusalem 217–18, 396
 census 278, 282
 chosen by YHWH 610
 Chronicles 267, 269–70, 273–83
 covenant 200, 391, 478
 Ecclesiastes 423
 faith in YHWH 368
 Goliath 208–9, 210, 228
 History of David's Rise 198, 207–18
- last words 229
 love of God for 243 Messiah's descent from 787 mighty warrior 184
 Nob 210–11
 Philistine 213–14 plague 229–30
 psalms 227, 357, 358, 359, 373, 377, 393, 403, 773
 Ruth (book) 192
 Samuel (books) 197
 Saul 207–15, 370, 384
 sin 381
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 695
 Solomon 235
 Song of Thanksgiving 228–9 sons of 269–70 succession narrative 198–9, 219, 220–7
 temple 219, 237, 278–9, 282–3
 David (son of Jesse) 360
- Davidic line
see also Son of David
 1 Chronicles 269
 Ezekiel (book) 547–8, 558
 Luke's Gospel 927
 Matthew's Gospel 848, 849, 865
 Messiah 448, 787, 912, 1045
 Day of Atonement 95, 102, 106, 807
 day of judgement 605, 784, 785, 1270–4, 1330
- Day, L. 643
- Day of YHWH
 Amos (book) 586, 588
 apocalyptic 449–50
 cultic origins 586
 Haggai (book) 609
 Isaiah (book) 440, 441, 445
 Joel (book) 579, 580, 581
 Malachi (book) 617
 Micah (book) 598
 Obadiah (book) 592
 vengeance on disobedient 598
 Zechariah (book) 614–15
 Zephaniah (book) 605
- deacons 1225
- dead
 baptism on behalf of the 1131 kindness to the 675 mourning for 691 preaching to 1268
 Sheol 450
- Dead Sea scrolls
see also names of individual scrolls; Qumran anthologies 795
 apocalyptic literature 799
 Apocrypha 620
 authors of 624
Book of Jubilees 794
 divorce 674
 1 Enoch 794
 Esther (book) 325
 Ezekiel scroll 536
 Ezra 308
 Hebrew Scriptures 7
 Isaiah 434
 Jeremiah (book) 489
 Jerusalem 444
 Jewish groups in Egypt 474
 liturgy 803, 822
 magic 802
 Nahum pesher 600
 physiognomy 802, 820–1
 Prayer of Manasseh 771
 prayers 802, 821–2
 Psalm 151, 773

- rules 804
 Samuel (books) 196
 Sirach 668, 670
 Song of Moses 155–6
 Song of Solomon 430
 Tobit (book) 621, 626, 627, 632
 Wicked Priest 726
 wisdom literature 800–1, 818–19
 deaf/mute, healing 901
 death see also afterlife; burial; dead; life after death
 adultery 411
 Amos (book) 585–6
 bringing back to life 250, 981–2
 Canaanite mythology 456
 Colossians 1195
 degeneration 428 divine mercy 679
 Elijah 245, 248–9
 God's power over 1132 as hunter 414
 immortality 655–6
 Jesus' 981–2, 983, 992–6
 Job 341
 Lazarus 981–2 liberation from fear of 1240
 mourning 426, 497
 as natural end 692–3 premature 656–7
 psalms 403
 punishment after 656, 671, 679, 684–5
 Revelation 1291
 ritual purity 102, 123–4
 sin 778–9, 1094
 sometimes a good thing 687, 693 valley of darkness 374
 Wisdom of Solomon 654–5
 Deborah (grandmother of Tobit) 628 Deborah (prophetess) 64, 177, 180–1, 386, 390, 461 debt, remission of 147
 Decalogue 29, 139, 140–1
 Deissmann, Adolf 1075 deities, Greek and Roman 1121 Delilah 187 deliverance from Egypt 393 from enemies 383 of faithful servant 477
 judgement 443
 from oppression 461
 psalms 356, 367–8, 371, 396
 thankfulness for 375 through obedience to God 446
 Demas 1198, 1231, 1235
 Demetrius (character in 3 John) 1283
 Demetrius I (king of Syria) 716, 721, 723, 725, 726, 748
 Demetrius II (king of Syria) 727–8, 729, 730, 731, 735
 Demetrius (the silversmith) 1052–3 demons
 see also exorcism believers' relationships with 1124 medicine 802
 Denzili 1191
Descensus ad Inferos 1322 destruction awaiting oppressive nations 450 inevitability 440, 447, 455 metaphor in Jeremiah (book) 505 ritual 142
 determinism 688, 819
 Deutero-Isaiah 434, 435, 476
 Deutero-Zechariah 611, 614
 Deuteronomic theory 159–60
 Deuteronomic history
 David's prayer 219
 David's Song of Thanksgiving 228–9
 Deuteronomy (book) 135, 136, 137, 138, 145 fall of Israel (kingdom) 260
 Genesis 39
 Hebrew scriptures 6
 Isaiah 436
 Jehoiachin 265
 Jeremiah (book) 488
 Jeroboam I 240–1
 Jeroboam II 258
 Judges (book) 177–8, 179
 Kings (books) 233–4
 Samuel (books) 199–200, 204, 205, 216–17, 227
 temple of Solomon 239
 Deuteronomy (book) 135–58
 D source 27–8
 Daniel's prayer compared 568
 dating of P 18
 found by Josiah 263, 305–6 inclusion in Pentateuch 39 introductory overview 135–7 law of the king 811 origin of Pentateuch 37 slaves 689
 source 18
 Tetrateuch 13 devil
 see also Beelzebul; Satan
 Cain 811
 children of the 1277 covenant with 654
 4 Ezra 780
 Jesus' temptation 851, 1240
 use of term 655
 diakonos 1225
 diaspora 395
 attitude towards pagan world 1050
 Baruch (book) 699–700, 701–2
 Day of Pentecost 1032
 Deutero-Isaiah 476
 Egypt 452
 Esther (book) 325–6, 330
 Esther (Greek) 643, 647, 649
 gospel addressed to 1045
 Greek language 833
 Jewish communities 1068–9 languages 795
 The Letter of Jeremiah 703
 Rome 1084
 Second Temple period 623
 Septuagint 618
 Stephen 1036
 Diatessaron 1321 diatribe 1091
 Diblaim 572
 Dibon 523
Didache 839, 852, 855, 1306, 1308–11
 didactic literature 626, 627, 652
Didascalia Apostolorum (Teaching of the Apostles) 770, 771, 772, 1308 Dietrich, W. 200
dikaiois 957
 Dinah (daughter of Jacob) 57, 59–60, 635, 638–9
 Dinah (wife of Job) 335
 Diocles see Zabdiel
 Diodotus see Trypho
 Dionysius of Halicarnassus 1324
 Dionysus 1207
 Dioscuri 1208
 Diotrophes 1283 disaster, Isaiah (book) 438, 440, 441, 443, 447–8 disciples see also apostles Bartimaeus 908
 call 1014–16
 Luke's gospel 933, 934–5
 Mark's gospel 889–90, 893, 903
 Matthew's gospel 852, 857, 860, 869, 870
 call to rich man 907
 as children of God 962–3
 Christ as model 1184–6 conflicts between John's and Jesus' 967 cost of discipleship 903, 946–7
 Elisha 251
 failure 1007–8, 1025 first encounter with Jesus 964–5
 Holy Spirit 987–8, 990
 Isaiah (book) 434
 Jesus' prayer for 991–2 at Jesus' tomb 997 message from Jesus 921 mission 859–60, 898, 938–9, 941–2 names 893, 934
 persecution 950, 954
 Philippians 1183–6, 1187–9 resurrection appearance 958–9, 997–8 sanctified 992 self-sacrifice 906 seventy 939, 941 teaching in Luke 1012 trial 955 trust and obedience 940 washing feet of 985–6 words and deeds 858–9 discrimination 1041–2, 1047 disease 100–1 dishonest steward parable 948 disobedience
 2 Corinthians 1150
 curses resulting from 152 of Israel 1242–3
 of Moses and Aaron 124–5
 Old Testament theme 10 punishment of Exodus generation 138 Dives parable 949
 divination
 Ezekiel (book) 549
 law in Deuteronomy 149
 Romans 1044
 story of Balaam 126–8 divine authority 426 divine blessing 409, 412 divine consolation 1142 divine justice 414
 divine plan 351–3
 divine retribution, Wisdom of Solomon 661–2 divine titles, Isaiah (book) 439, 443, 447 Divine Warrior 181, 690, 736, 787–8
 divorce
 adultery 682
 Bill of Divorce 811
 Jesus' teaching 854, 868, 906–7
 law in Deuteronomy 150
 Paul 1118–19
 Second Temple period 674
 Sirach 684, 685
 Docetism 1315, 1319, 1321, 1326
Doctrina Apostolorum 1308, 1309
 Documentary Hypothesis 13–15, 16, 19
 Abraham 50–1
 Genesis 39, 42
 Leviticus 92
 opposition to 19–20, 30–7, 92
 worship of YHWH 45

- Doeg 382
 Doeg the Edomite 210–11 dogs, Ecclesiastes 427 Domitian 786–7, 1288
 donkeys 127
 Dor 732
 Dorcas see Tabitha Dositheus 643, 747 doubletalk 1260
 Douglas, Mary 94 dove 851, 931 doxology
 Amos (book) 585, 589
 Jude 1287
 1 Peter 1268
 psalms 405
 Revelation 1290 dragon, Revelation 1296–7 dreamers, psalms 399 dreams
 Daniel (book) 564–5
 Isaiah (book) 458
 2 Maccabees 749–50
 Nebuchadnezzar's 566
 Sirach on 689 drought 501, 608 drunkenness 427, 457, 501, 688 dualism
 Instruction on the Two Spirits 801, 819
 Johannine Epistles 1275–6, 1277–8, 1281
 Johannine Gospel 977
 Qumran 688
 Duhm, B. 488
 Dunn, James D.G. 1063
- E see Elohist eagles 786–7
 Easter, psalms 397
 Ebal, Mount 165
 Ebed-melech 519
 Ebenezer 197, 202
 Ecbatana 627, 629, 630, 632, 635, 743
 Ecclesiastes 423–9
 theodicy 10
 Ecclesiastical Canons of the Apostles 1308 Ecclesiasticus see Wisdom of Jesus son of Sirach ecstatic experiences 1149
 Eden 42, 44, 553, 562, 1218
 Edna (Raguel's wife) 630, 631
 Edom 335
 compared to Sodom and Gomorrah 524
 David's conquest of 220
 Esau 56, 59, 591
 and Israel (kingdom) 257, 384, 396, 402
 Jeremiah's Oracles Against the Nations 523
 Judah (kingdom) 253, 259, 269, 299 judgement on, Amos (book) 582, 583
 Lamentations 532
 Maccabean revolt 716
 oracles in Ezekiel (book) 552, 555, 557
 psalms 388
 punishment of 461, 482 refusal to allow Israel to pass 125
 Revelation 1298
 and Solomon 240
 Temon's name used for 592
 Edomites
 admission to local assemblies 150 allies of Assyria in Judith 637 descent from Esau 55, 56, 60, 523
 destruction of Jerusalem 759–60
 Israel's territorial claims 138
 Judah 291, 296
 mixed marriage in post-exilic Jerusalem 317, 767
 Syro-Ephraimite War 301
 Edron 203
 education Hellenism 738, 739
 Paul 1069
 religious schools 805 of sons, Sirach 687
 Egerton Papyrus 1307, 1316
 Eglon 177, 179–80
 Egypt
 Abraham 49–50
 alliance with Jonathan 726–7
 Antiochus II 569
 Antiochus IV 713, 739, 740
 Assyrian invasion of Judah 261
 Chaldean empire 487 destruction of army 76–7 Exodus from 75–6, 389, 476, 513, 661–2 female metaphors 522 futility of seeking help from 459, 460 history in Jeremiah (book) 522 idolatry, Wisdom of Solomon 664–5 Jacob's family 48
 Jehoahaz 547
 Jeremiah's Oracles Against the Nations 522–3
 Jews in 264–5, 735–6, 773–5
 Job (book) 332
 Joseph 60–3
 Judah as vassal of 264, 621, 773–5
 Nebuchadnezzar 554
 Necho's campaign 755 oppression of Israel 69–70, 72
 oracles in Ezekiel (book) 553, 555 overthrow linked to Exodus theme 476 plagues 73–5, 663, 664–6
 political alliances 532 prediction of Israel's return to 576 as remote land 469
 sexual relationships 102–3
 Shishak's campaign against Judah 243, 289
 Solomon 236
 Syro-Ephraimite War 259
 worship of YHWH 452
 Egyptians
 Gospel 1315
 local assemblies 150
 mixed marriage in post-exilic Jerusalem 317, 767
 Ehud 177, 179–80
 Eighteen Benedictions 803, 821
 Eissfeldt, O. 197
 Ekron, Jonathan 727
 El abode in Canaanite myth 345 addressed by Elihu 347 conquers Rahab 338
 Daniel (book) 567
 heavenly court 389
 Jeroboam I of Israel 242
 Job (book) 331
 psalms 373
 supreme Canaanite god 576
 El Elyon 50
 El Olam, Sirach 690
 El Shaddai 51, 331
 Elah (king of Israel) 244
 Elam 524, 555
 Elath 259, 301
 elders addressed at Ephesus by Paul 1053–4 as church officials 1046 idolatrous 544
 instructions in Pastoral Epistles 1226–7
 Johannine Epistles 1281, 1283
 pastoral role 1269
 prayer for the sick 1261–2
 Eleazar (brother of Judas Maccabeus) 720, 743
 Eleazar (hero of David) 229, 274
 Eleazar (martyred scribe) 741, 790, 791
 Eleazar (son of Aaron) 203, 218 commissioning of Joshua 130
 death of 175
 oversight of tabernacle 115 priesthood as descended from 280
 red heifer ritual 124
 succession to high priesthood 125
 Eleazar (son of Abinadab) 203, 218
 'elect lady' 1281 election 26, 142–3, 144, 782–3 God's chosen children 1100–1 of Johannine community 1276
 Matthias 1031
 Elephantine 674, 682
 Eleusis 1218
 Elhanan 208, 228, 278
 Eli 188, 197, 201–2, 203
 Eliab 208
 Eliakim see Jehoikim
 Eliashib 317–18, 319
 Elihu 331, 347–8, 349–51
 Elijah 233, 245–9, 336
 Ahab 247
 Ahaziah 248
 Ascension 248–9, 387
 coming of in Malachi (book) 617
 Ezekiel (book) 535, 538
 in the Gospels 963 and Jehoram 296 reappearance, Mark's gospel 904
 Revelation 1295
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 695–6 transfiguration 866, 904, 940
 Elimelech 192, 193
 Eliphaz 335–7, 343
 Eliphelet 270
 Elisha 233, 249–53
 death of 257
 Elijah 246–7
 Ezekiel (book) 535, 538
 Jehu's coup 253
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 696
 support of Jehu 572
 Elizabeth (mother of John the Baptist) 927–8
 Elizaphan 276, 301
 Elkanah 201
 Elnathan 316
 Eloah 331, 336, 342, 348
 ʾēlōhikā ('your God') 589
 Elohim
 Exodus 70, 71, 79
 Pentateuchal study 13, 17
 recognized wisdom 345 substituted for YHWH 382 ʾēlōhēm the Flood 46
 translation in psalms 370 use of 42
 Elohist (E) source 14, 20, 25, 27
 Elymais 719
 Elymas 1044
 Elyōn 565, 566
 Emim 138
 Emmaus 716–17, 958–9
 Emoteles 729
 Emzara (Noah's wife) 629
 En-gedi 403 end of the world 781–2 see also eschatology
 Apocalypse of Thomas 1330
 Daniel (book) 564, 570

- Mark's gospel 913, 914
 2 Thessalonians 1216–17
 Endor 213 endurance, Hebrews (book) 1250–3 enemies Israelite culture 362–3
 psalms 365
 enemy from the north, Jeremiah 524 Engendi 211–12
 enjoyment
 Ecclesiastes 424, 427, 428
 Sirach 677
 Enkidu 353
 Enoch ascend to heaven 381, 387, 813–14
 as example of faith in Hebrews (book) 1251
 God's celestial palace in 814 righteous who die young 656–7
 science 801
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 694, 696 walked with God 337
 1 Enoch
 apocalyptic literature 780, 798, 814–15
 calendars 801, 820
 death 655
 decree of the watchers 566
 Fall of the Angels 808–9
 God's celestial palace 814 hell 815
 in Jude 1286
 Last Judgement 784
 motion of the sun in the heavens 819–20 origin of sin 569, 678 pattern of history 815 Rewritten Bible 794
 science 801
 Son of Man 814–15
 wisdom literature 801, 819–20
 2 Enoch 798, 813–14
 enthronement
 psalms 361, 392–3
 of YHWH in Ezekiel (book) 560–1
Enuma Elish 42, 337, 706, 787
 Epaphras 1179, 1192, 1193, 1198, 1235
 Epaphroditus 1187, 1189, 1193, 1234
 Ephesians (book) 1165–79
 authorship 1166
 exhortation 1173–8 great prayer and meditation 1167–73 relationship to Colossians 1165
 Ephesus 1165, 1182, 1231
 Demetrius the silversmith 1052–3 disciples of John 1052
 history of Colossae 1191 message to church in Revelation 1291 Pauls 1180
 Timothy 1222, 1228
 ephod 183, 188, 210, 211, 218, 573
 Ephoros of Kyme 268
 Ephraim (country) name for Israel (kingdom) 513–14, 637
 province under Solomon 237
 Syro-Ephraimite War 258, 259, 300, 444, 445, 451
 Ephraim (son of Joseph) 55, 63–4, 65, 272
 Ephraim (tribe) 183, 384, 514, 562
 1 Chronicles 272
 fall of Israel 273
 Gideon 183
 hopes of 613 Jephthah 185
 return to Zion 513
 territory allocation 170–1
 Ephraim, Bethlehem 401
 Ephron 54, 719
 Epic of Aqhat 544
Epic of Gilgamesh 46, 47, 353, 425, 427
 Epictetus 1221
 Epicureanism
 Philippians 1183
 providence 664
 Sirach 668
 1 Thessalonians 1208
 Wisdom of Solomon 650, 654–5
 Epicurus 693
epignos (knowledge) 1272
 epileptic child, miracle 905
 Epimanes, Antiochus Epiphanes 387
 Epiphanes see Antiochus IV epiphanies, 2 Maccabees 737, 738, 745, 749 Epirus 1233
episkopos (bishop) 839, 1224–5, 1231
Epistle of Aristeas 676, 677, 688
Epistle of Barnabas 619, 1306, 1308, 1311–13
Epistle of Baruch see Baruch (book)
Epistle of Enoch 677, 678
Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians 1308, 1312 Epistle of Pseudo-Titus 1329
Epistle to Diognetus 1308
Epistle to the Romans 1315
Epistles of Ignatius 1308 epistolography 1199
Epistula Apostolorum 1329
 Epitome of the Canons of the Holy Apostles 1309
 epochs, Daniel (book) 568 equality, Jew and Gentile 1085–6 Er 269
 Erastus 1109–10, 1231
 Erishkigal 342
 Esar-haddon 136, 146, 152, 313, 628
 Esau 55, 523, 591
 genealogy 60
 and Jacob 56, 58–9
 Malachi (book) 616
 warning against apostasy in Hebrews (book) 1253
 eschatology
 apocalyptic literature 798, 816
 Colossians 1191, 1195
 Didache 1309, 1311
 Ephesians 1166
 4 Ezra 780–4, 785, 786–9
 5 Ezra 778
 Gentile inclusion 1103 history as content for 613
 James (book) 1255
 Johannine Epistles 1276, 1277, 1282
 John's Gospel 1013
 Jude 1285, 1287
 judgement 1272
 kingdom of God 904
 Luke's Gospel 939–40, 941, 943, 945, 949–50, 1031
 4 Maccabees 791–2
 Mark's Gospel 889, 903, 913, 914, 916–17, 1031
 marriage 1120
 Matthew's Gospel 853, 859, 877–8
 Messiah 1067, 1080–1
 Micah (book) 597
 realized 1087
 resurrection 1130–2
 Revelation 1294
 Romans (book) 1095, 1104, 1105
 scope of destruction 448, 454
 Son of Man 903
 spiritual body 1140
 1 Thessalonians 1209
 2 Thessalonians 1213
 Zechariah (book) 611
 1 Esdras 308, 309, 751–69
 dating 620, 753
 Golah List 312
 inclusion in Apocrypha 618, 619
 relationship to Ezra 625
 status in Jewish canon 620
 2 Esdras 775–89
 as apocalyptic literature 626 authorship of 621
 date of composition 620
 historical background 625
 inclusion in Apocrypha 618, 619
 influence on patristic writings 619
 4 Esdras see 4 Ezra Eshbaal 272
 Eskenazi, T. 309
 Essenes
 see also Dead Sea scrolls; Qumran emergence of 624
 Maccabean revolt 715
 pre-existent soul 660 retribution after death 671
 Esther (book) 324–30
 see also Esther (Greek) law of Medes and Persians 567
 relationship to 1 Esdras 753 relationship to Greek Esther 625
 Esther (Greek) 325, 642–9
 date of composition 620 relation to Esther (book) 325, 625
 status in Jewish canon 620
 Esther (queen) 324–5, 327–30, 373–4, 415, 642, 643–9
 Ethan (temple musician) 271, 280 ethics 178
 Old Testament theme 10
 Pastoral Epistles 1221 personal responsibility 570 of speech 1256, 1258–9, 1260 theology of E source 27
 wisdom literature 800
 Ethiopia 451, 469
 Ethiopians 606, 1039
 Ethiopic church attitude to Pilate 1322 Old Testament canon 3 ethnic identity, Genesis 41 eucharist
 see also Last Supper apocryphal and canonical texts 1326
 early Christian practice 1310
 Jesus' statement on 973
 John's Gospel 988
 Euergetes 667, 670
 Euhemerus 664
 eunuchs 479, 1039
 Euodia 1189
 Euphrates 501, 526, 1191, 1299
 Eupolemus 723, 736
 Eusebius 736, 790
 Eusebius of Caesarea 1308, 1311 Eutychus 1053
 evangelism aggressive 1267
 Ephesians 1174
 Luke's Gospel 924–5
 Paul 1075, 1106
 Philip in Samaria 1038
 Eve 43–4
 Cain and Abel 810–11
 deception by the serpent 1147 origin of sin, Sirach 679, 684–5
 Pastoral Epistles 1224
 Susanna as 705, 708

- Eve (cont.)
 2 Thessalonians 1218
- evil conquered by Christ's suffering 1267–8 human inclination for 778, 779, 782–3, 801
 Last Battle 787–8
 origins of 678
 Proverbs (book) 407
 Revelation 1296
 spirit of 800–1, 818–19
- evil heart 778, 779, 780, 783
- the evil one see devil
- Exagoge* (Ezekiel the Tragedian) 805–6, 826
- exaltation 1111, 1238
- exclusion from synagogues 978
 kingdom of God 1117
- excommunication, at Corinth 1116
- exegesis
 Exodus (book) 69
 Hebrews (book) as 1237
 Jude 1284–5
 Leviticus 93
 Old Testament 32
 post-Biblical Jewish literature 793–4
 prophecy 611
- Exile see Babylonian exile
- existence the flesh and the spirit 1098 limited nature of 1139 pagan idols 1121
- Exodus (book) 67–91
 historicity 67–8
 as literature 67
 Philipians 1186
 redaction criticism 33
 relationship to 1 Enoch 794
 sources 18, 68
 theology 68–9
 typology 1241
 Wisdom of Solomon 661–2, 663, 664–6
- Exodus (event)
 Abraham 51
 Amos (book) 589
 Chronicles 267, 268
 Daniel's prayer 568
 Ezekiel (book) 542, 548
 Isaiah (book) 448, 452, 465, 469, 475
 Passover 75–6
 psalms 388, 397
 Revelation 1299
- exorcism
 Beelzebul controversy 1020–2
 Luke's Gospel 933, 938, 943–4
 Mark's Gospel 890, 893, 897, 905
 Matthew's Gospel 857, 860, 866
 at Philippi 1049
- exordia, Hebrews (book) 1237–8
- expiation atonement 96 history of sacrifice 93–4 for unresolved murder 149
- expulsion, Roman Jews 1084, 1085, 1109
- external appearances, judging by 1140
- extra-canonical early Christian literature 1286, 1306–30
- eye-shadow 809
- Ezekiel (book) 533–62
 authorship 534
 dating of P 18–19
 historical background 534
 hope for the future 551–62
 Oracles Against the Nations 551–5
 Oracles of Destruction against Judah 537–51
- parallels with early prophets 535
- themes 536–7
- Ezekiel (prophet)
 Allegory of the Cedar 546 condemns false prophets 543–4 distrust of monarch 562 dumbness 539, 551
 exile in Babylon 534
 Israel's initial election 548
 Jehoiachin 265
 new Jerusalem 1304
 physical translocation 541 rage 539 sentinel for Israel 539, 555
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 696 speaks for YHWH 538 status 535 symbolic actions 535 visions 538, 558, 567
 wife's death 551 witnesses new temple 560
- Ezekiel the Tragedian 805, 826
- Ezion-geber 287, 295
- Ezra
 authorship of Ezra and Nehemiah 309 confessional prayer 321 dating Ezra and Nehemiah (books) 310
 2 Esdras 626, 775, 778–89
 mixed marriage 316–18, 321, 766–9 reading the Torah 320–1 restoration of the law 788–9 return to Jerusalem 315–16, 764–9
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 696
- Ezra (book) 308–18
 apocalypse 751
 and Chronicles 267
 and to 1 Esdras 625, 751–4
- 4 Ezra (book) 775–6, 778–89, 798, 799
 historical background 625
 origins of sin 678
- 5 Ezra (book) 775, 776–8
- 6 Ezra (book) 775, 776, 777, 789
- fairness 84, 149, 150–1
- faith in Christianity 1080–1 definition in Hebrews (book) 1251
 Ephesians 1166, 1178, 1179
 faithfulness and 602 healing 891, 898, 900, 905
 James (book) 1259
 Jesus as object of 841
 Jesus on 984
 in Judaism 1067 nature of 1089–90
 needs of poor 1259
 no faith without works 1259
 revelation of 1160
 1 Thessalonians 1202–3, 1206
 2 Thessalonians 1218 victory over the world 1279–80 working through love 1163
- faithfulness 408
 exemplified by Jesus 1240–1
- faith and 602
 Israel called to 129 of kings 368 of the Lord 1218
 proverbs 417
 psalms 375, 382
 to religion of Torah 366
- Fall 43–4, 779, 782, 784
- false accusation 82
- false believers 1156, 1157
- false messengers 444
- false worship by Israel (people) 451, 484 goddess Asherah 451
 Isaiah (book) 438, 439, 440, 448
- family in Decalogue commandments 141 incitement to apostasy 146
 law in Deuteronomy 149–50
 Sirach 670
- famine 540, 1042–3, 1072
- fasting
 association with unacceptable behaviour 480
 Christianity 1309
 Esther 327–8
 fifth month 612 fourth month 613
 Luke's Gospel 950
 Mark's Gospel 892
 Matthew's Gospel 858
 psalms 394
 tenth month 613
 theme in apocryphal texts 1327
- fate, predestined by God 1099
- Father
 Ephesians 1172
 Jesus 984, 991–2
 revealed by the Word become flesh 963
 Sirach 673, 681, 697
 and the Son 967, 970
 2 Thessalonians 1215
 Wisdom of Solomon 655
- fathers household rules in Ephesians 1177 imagery of psalms 364–5 instruct sons 407
 'Faults of Women' 685
- Fayyum (fragmentary MS) 1316
- fear of God
 Ecclesiastes 425, 426–7
 Sirach 671, 680, 684, 688
 as true disposition for obedience 141
- Feast of Booths (Tabernacles) 183, 286–7, 398, 736 Deuteronomy 148
 hymn of praise 385
 Jesus at 974–8, 989
 Leviticus 106
 2 Maccabees 736
 Numbers 131
 Zechariah (book) 614–15
- Feast of Weeks 105, 131, 292
- feeding the five thousand 863, 898–9, 939, 971–2
- feeding the four thousand 864, 901
- Felix 1056, 1057
- fellowship between Jewish and Gentile believers 1047 life in early church 1033
 psalms 372
- feminism
 Esther (book) 325
 female imagery for YHWH, Hosea (book) 577
 Hosea (book) 572
 post-critical biblical study 2–3
 Ruth (book) 192
 sexual violence in Nahum (book) 600, 601
 Song of Solomon 431, 433
- Fensham, F. C. 315
- fertility 462, 481
- festal worship, Hosea (book) 576
- Festival of Booths see Feast of Booths
- Festival of Dedication 980
- festivals
see also Feast of Booths
 Book of the Covenant 84
 calendar 130–1

- Day of Atonement 102
 Levitical listing 104–6
 Mark's Gospel 915
 Unleavened Bread 75, 105
 Festus 1057–8
 fig tree 872, 909–10, 914, 945 filial obligations, Mark's gospel 900 final judgement
 Amos (book) 588
 4 Ezra 781, 783
 God's energy outpoured 579, 580–1
 Joel (book) 579, 580–1
 nakedness metaphor 1140 vision of four beasts 567 finances converts at Corinth 1117 wisdom literature, Sirach 686–7 financial support, Paul 1074, 1122–3, 1138, 1149 fire eschatological 1245 fiery ordeal 1268, 1269 future destruction by 1274 purification by 906 scriptural associations 1031–2, 1238 tongue as 1260 vision of, Amos (book) 587
 First Fruits, Festival of see Feast of Weeks first and last 905
 firstborn consecration of 75, 76 Levitical laws 108–9 numbering of Israel 115 fish feeding the five thousand 899
 Tobias and 627, 630 fishermen, disciples 889
 The Five Scrolls 429 flesh contrasted with Spirit 1163–4 weakness of the mortal body 1096
 'flies of death' 428 Flood 17, 45, 46–7, 478, 809 flour, offerings 96, 98, 105 flying scroll, Zechariah's vision 612 folktales
 Esther (book) as 326 mother and her seven sons 741–2 Sarah and Asmodeus 629
 folly contrast with wisdom 680–1
 Ecclesiastes 425, 426, 427 personification as woman 411 food 564 see also banquets
 Book of the Covenant 84
 clean and unclean animals 99–100 corruption of the body 1118 kosher 484, 634, 639 laws 1085, 1105
 laws in Deuteronomy 146
 Lord's Supper 1127
 meal offerings 96, 98
 purity 900
 sacrificial 1108, 1110, 1120–2, 1125 fools, proverbs 414, 419–20
 Fool's Speech 1146–9
 footwashing 936–7, 983, 985–6
 foreign nations
 see also Oracles Against the Nations judgement of, Isaiah 440, 457 members of covenant community 479 priests and Levites 484 salvation of 481–2 foreigners antagonism towards, Sirach 690 mixed marriage in post-exilic
 Jerusalem 316–18, 766–9
 post-exilic Jews fear of 313, 314, 323 redeemed but subordinate 481 forgetfulness
 Ecclesiastes 427
 of God towards his people 474 forgiveness confession of sins 772, 1275
 Ephesians 1175
 Paul's synagogue speech 1045
 prayer for 375 proclaimed by Peter on Day of Pentecost 1032
 psalm 390
 of sins 377
 Luke's Gospel 934, 936–7, 943, 957
 Matthew's Gospel 845, 867–8
 Paul 1080
 Sirach 680, 686
 under new covenant 1248 form criticism 2, 21–2 founding churches, Paul 1073, 1107 four beasts, Daniel's vision of 567 four horsemen vision, Zechariah (book) 612 Fourth Philosophy 624
 Fox, M. V. 642
 Fragmentary Hypothesis 16
Fragments of Papias 1308 fragrance, presence of God 1137 Francis, St. 479 frankincense and gold 481
 free will conflict with God's foreknowledge 782
 Fall 784
 omnipotence of God 1101 punishment of wicked 785
 sin 678, 1095
 Sirach 669–70, 678
 freedom, Christian liberty 1117–18 Friends of God 659 friendship
 proverbs 415
 Sirach 673, 675, 676–7, 681, 690–1
 frustration, Ecclesiastes 423 Funk, R. 1205–6
 future see also apocalypse; eschatology
 2 Corinthians 1140
 Ecclesiastes 428
 4 Ezra 780, 781, 782, 786
 foretold by apocalypse texts 1330
 Gabael 631
 Gabriel (angel) 563, 568, 631, 927
 Gad (country) 237, 529
 Gad (prophet) 210, 229–30, 278
 Gad (son of Jacob) 57
 Gad (tribe)
 Blessing of Jacob 65
 1 Chronicles 270, 282
 and David 274
 land settlement 132, 161
 Gaius 1282–3
 Galatia
 churches, relationship with Paul 1161 comparison with Colossae 1192
 Paul's first missionary journey 1044
 Galatians (book) 1052–165 church characteristics 837 introduction and overview 1152–3 justification by faith 1080 letters from Paul 1153
 Paul's visits to Jerusalem 1069, 1072 position in chronology 1072, 1073
 style of content 1076
 Galatians (people) 722, 743
 Galilee 574
 Hasmonean rule 730
 Jesus in 930–40, 996
 Maccabean revolt 718, 723
 war between Antiochus VI and Demetrius II 728
 Galling, K. 267, 312
 Gallio 1051, 1072
 Gamaliel 1035, 1069
 gatekeepers 273, 280, 281, 303
 Gath 203, 210, 213, 383 gathering of the nations, Isaiah (book) 481 Gavena, Beverly 1107 Gaza 583, 728
 Gazara 730, 732, 745
 Geba 206
 Gebalites 237
 Gedaliah 264–5, 487, 519–20, 523, 534
 Ge'ez 794
 Gehazi 250, 251, 252
 Gehenna 1322
 Gelasian Decree 1325 gematria 1312–13 gender see also women hierarchy 1126
 Judith 634–5, 638, 639
 Song of Solomon 431, 432
 genealogy
 Aaron and Moses 72–3
 Abraham 48, 55
 Cain 45
 Chronicles 268, 269, 270, 271–2
 Genesis 39, 40, 47–8
 Jesus 848–9, 931
 Judith 637–8
 Rebekah 54
 Seth 45
 table of the nations 47–8
 Genesis 38–66
 1 Chronicles 269
 dating of 39–40, 41–2
 the fall 1094
 Pentateuch 38–9
 Philo 807–8
 relationship to 1 Enoch 794 righteousness by faith 1090
 Sirach 679
 source 17
 Genesis Apocryphon 675, 794
 Gentiles
 acceptance into Judaism 1068, 1069, 1106, 1156 Apostolic Council deliberations 1046–7 children of Abraham 1093
 circumcision 1087
 compelled to live like Jews 1157–8 equal membership 1062
 evangelism 1103
 Godfearers 1041
 God's concern with 593
 God's justification of 1159
 Hasmoneans and 711
 idolatry 1090
 inclusion in message of Gospel 1041–2, 1046–7
 Jesus' contact with 1012
 Jewish perspective in Ephesians 1174–5 and Jews eating together 1157
 Judas Maccabeus 718–19
 justification by faith 1080
 new humanity in Ephesians 1170–1 offering of 1106
 Paul 1073, 1155, 1224

Gentiles (cont.)

- Philippians 1179, 1188
- post-exilic Jews 762–3, 766–9
- propitiation of 791–2
- as sinners 1158
- 1 Thessalonians 1200
- Titus 1156
- Gerar 49, 53, 55–6
- Gerasenes 897, 938
- Gerizim, Mount 165–6, 183, 285, 633, 696
- Geron the Athenian 740
- Gerranians 748
- Gershom 271, 276
- Gershonites 115, 279–80, 281
- Gerstenberger, E. S. 102, 103, 104
- Geshem the Arab 319
- Geshur 215–16
- Geshurites 213
- Gethsemane 880, 917, 984, 993, 1024–6
- Gezer 239
- gezera shewa* 1242
- giants
 - Baruch (book) 702
 - fall of the angels 808–9
 - fought by David 228
 - Rephaim 138–9
- Gibeaz 272
- Gibeah 189–90, 205, 206
- Gibeon
 - 1 Chronicles 272
 - David 276, 277
 - sacrificial site 278
 - Solomon 236, 239, 284
- Gibeonites 166, 220, 227–8, 272
- Gideon 177, 182–4, 390, 447, 603
- Gihon 380, 386, 562
- Gilboa, Mount 214, 215
- Gilead
 - Jephthah 185
 - Laban and Jacob 58
 - Maccabean revolt 718–19, 746–7
 - Pekah's rebellion 571, 575, 577
- Gilgal 585
 - aetiology of name 163
 - Hosea's rejection of 574, 576, 577
 - memorial stones 162
 - role relative to Shiloh 171
 - setting for psalm 385
- Gilgamesh* see Epic of Gilgamesh
- Gilgamesh, enjoyment 677
- Girzites 213
- Gittih 359
- Gittite 359
- glorification
 - of Christ's followers 1239–40
 - Jesus 984, 985–99
 - of the Son 1239
- glory
 - for believers 1113
 - earthly body 1132
 - future 589
 - God 1172
 - Pastoral Epistles 1229
 - suffering 1098
 - 1 Thessalonians 1204
- glory, king of 374
- glossolalia 1032
- gnos* (knowledge) 1272
- Gnosticism 1227, 1306
 - apocryphal texts 1318, 1324, 1326
 - influence on Christianity 1325
 - library at Nag Hammadi 1329
 - Pastoral Epistles 1229
 - Philippians 1188
 - 2 Thessalonians 1214

goats 97–8, 101–2

God

- see also El Elyon; El Shaddai; YHWH
- accusations against 379, 474
- anger of 443, 469, 476, 509, 1176
- army of 579, 580–1
- character of 68–9, 337
- children of 962–3, 1277
- countenance of 116–17
- covenants of 50–2, 55, 376, 1093, 1159
- creation 42–4, 373, 692, 693–4, 771, 778–9, 1050
- discipline of 336
- faithfulness of 390, 599
- the Father 655, 673, 681, 697, 963, 967, 970, 984, 991–2, 1172, 1215
- fear of 141, 425, 426–7, 671, 680, 684, 688
- hiddenness of 154, 155
- holiness of 79–80, 437
- impartiality of 1041–2, 1091
- incomprehensibility of 424–5
- inscrutability of 595
- intervention of 711, 716
- Israel 151, 241, 258, 380
- jealousy of 141, 142, 143
- judgement of 1261, 1294–5
- justice 52, 110–11, 349, 414, 500, 617, 689–90, 778
- kingdom of see Kingdom of God
- knowledge of 1131, 1181–2, 1275
- love of 580, 662, 1175, 1279
- mercy of 140, 595, 662, 672, 673, 1100–1
- monarchy 197, 198, 200, 203–6, 268
- as mother 467
- names of 13, 17, 65, 439, 443, 447, 536, 1290
- omnipotence 1101
- omnipresence 402
- omniscience 693
- patience of 597
- power of 370, 388, 504, 525, 1033, 1132, 1170
- promises of 40, 49–50, 616, 1245
- protection of 372, 379, 382, 418, 451
- punishment 343, 755, 778
- revelation of 71, 1237
- righteousness 1085, 1089–90, 1092, 1099, 1103
- salvation of 372, 475–6, 1221
- Saviour 1222
- seed of 1277
- sinners 1090, 1124
- the Son 967, 970, 1237, 1238, 1239, 1279, 1280
- sovereignty of 1034
- temple 484, 594
- temptation 1258
- throne of 1292–3, 1304–5
- time 688, 690, 1261
- transcendence of 371, 1227
- Trinity 1171
- uniqueness of 139, 141, 145, 155
- warrior imagery 181, 537, 558, 613, 690, 736, 1302
- wisdom 331, 408, 411, 669, 671, 683
- Word of 961–2, 1243
- wrath of 114, 140, 143–4
- Godfearers 1041
- godliness 1221, 1226
- gods, sons of the 45–6
- Gog 537, 558–60
- Golah List 308, 311–12, 316, 320
- gold and frankincense 481
- golden calves 88–9, 144, 574, 575–6, 577
- golden lamp vision, Zechariah (book) 612
- Golden Rule 629, 800, 818, 856
- Golgotha 995

Goliath 208–9, 210, 228, 273, 278, 403

Gomer 571–2

Gomorra 50, 52, 438, 450

Amos (book) 585

compared to false prophets 508

destruction of 1273

Revelation 1298

good, spirit of 800–1, 818–19

Good Samaritan parable 942

good shepherd 595

Goodspeed, Edgar 1082

Gordon, R. P. 207

Gorgias 716, 717, 742, 747

Goshen 63

gospel

1 Corinthians 1112

explained by Paul in pagan terms 1046 as good news 888

Paul's synagogue speech 1045–6

payment for preaching 1123 preached to Gentiles by Peter 1041–2 preaching to dead 1268 proclamation of God's good news 1154 transcends human language 1113

Gospel according to the Hebrews 1315*Gospel of the Egyptians* 1315*Gospel of John* see John (Gospel)Gospel of Luke see Luke (Gospel)Gospel of Mark see Mark (Gospel)Gospel of Matthew see Matthew (Gospel)Gospel of Nicodemus 1315, 1321*Gospel of Peter* 1307, 1315, 1316, 1321*Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew* 1315, 1319*Gospel of Thomas* 1307, 1308, 1315, 1316

gospels

see also John; Luke; Mark; Matthew apocalyptic sense 835

authorship 1078

biography 1001–2

comparative pericopes 1014–26

comparison with Acts 1028–9 finger-printing technique 1005

inadequacies 832

Jesus' death and resurrection 842

Jewish background 834

as a literary genre 1001–2

Luke–John link 1006*Luke–Matthew* agreements 1004, 1005*Mark* as earliest 886*Mark–Q* relationship 1004, 1021–2*Proto-Matthew* 1004 purpose 833

'Q' source 1003–4

relationship to Isaiah (book) 437, 465, 479 in synopsis 1001–25

gossip

James (book) 1260

Sirach 679–80, 681–2, 686

grace

dietary observances 1254

Ephesians 1166, 1169–70, 1174

to the humble 1260

1 Peter 1269–70

Philippians 1181

2 Thessalonians 1215

throne of 1243

Graeco-Roman greetings 1076

Graf, Karl Heinrich 14

Graf-Wellhausen theory 13–15

'The Grateful Dead' 631

Great Sanhedrin see Sanhedrin

greed, proverbs 422

Greek

Apocrypha 621

creation of Septuagint 618

- diaspora 833
 Hellenism in Land of Israel 623
 New Testament 830, 833
 Old Testament 8
 Greek Apostolic Constitutions 1308 Greek Daniel see Additions to Daniel Greenberg, M. 534 greetings, Graeco-Roman 1076
 Gregory the Great 333
 Gregory of Nyasa 429
 Griesbach hypothesis 1002–3, 1021 guidance of Israelites in wilderness 117–18 as theme in Numbers 112 guilt
 Paul's theology 1079
 problem of removal 614 guilt offering, Leviticus 97–8
 Gunkel, H. 20–2, 24, 39, 48, 49, 357
 Gyges (king) 558
- H see Holiness Code
 Habakkuk (book) 601–4
 righteousness by faith 1090
 Habakkuk (prophet) 262
 Bel and the Dragon 709, 710
 complaint of 602
 Hachraheus 645
 Hadad (Edomite prince) 240
 Hadad (storm god) 376
 Hadadezer 220, 221
 Hadas, M. 791
 Hadassah see Esther Hades
 see also hell; Sheol
 4 Ezra 784
 gates of 865
 Jesus' descent to 1322
 Revelation 1291
 souls of the righteous 780
 Wisdom of Solomon 654
 Hadrian 806
 haemorrhaging woman miracle 858, 897
 Hagar 51, 53, 185, 1162
 Haggai (book) 607–10
 Haggai (prophet) 270, 376, 763 hagiography 805–7, 826–8
 Hagrites 270–1
 halakah 875–6
Halakic Letter 797, 813
 Hallel, psalms 397
 Ham (son of Noah) 47, 269, 809
 Haman the Agagite 327–30, 374, 643, 645–8
 Hammurabi Code see Code of Hammurabi Hamor 59
 Hamutal 548
 Hanael (kinsman of Tobit) 628–9
 Hanamel 515
 Hanani (prophet) 292–3 Hanani (ruler of Jerusalem under Nehemiah) 320
 Hananiah (companion to Daniel) 564
 Hananiah (false prophet) 510, 511, 512 Hananiah (ruler of Jerusalem under Nehemiah) 320
 Hananiah (Song of the Three Jews) 706 hand-washing 863, 883, 899–900, 944 hands, laying on 1228
 Hanina ben Dosa, Rabbi 1019
 Hannah (Anna) (wife of Tobit) 627, 628
 Hannah (wife of Elkanah) 155, 185, 201, 202
 Hanukkah 376, 620, 626, 734 Hanun 220–1 happiness
 Matthew's Gospel 853
- Sirach 684
 Har Beth-el 723
 Haran 48, 49, 56, 57
 Haran, M. 31
 Harischandra 333
 harlotry 1300–2 Harnagedon 1299
harpagmos 1184
 Harrowing of Hell 1322 harvest festivals 147–8
 gathering the exiled 457 imagery in Revelation 1298 ownership 451 thanksgiving for 385
 Wave Sheaf Day 105
 Hasideans 715, 721, 748
 Hasmoneans 622
 authorship of 1 Maccabees 711–12
 Hellenism 623
 Judith (book) 633
 Maccabean revolt 625, 715–17, 724–5 priest-kings 636 rule of Jonathan 725–30 Simon 730–3
 Hathach 328
 Hattush 316
 Hausa 1209
 Hays, R. B. 1085, 1091
 Hazael (king of Aram) 246, 247, 251–3, 255, 256–7, 298–9
 Hazor 167–8, 239, 524, 728 head coverings 1125–6
 healing
 see also miracles of Jesus God's tears 497
 by Jesus 890–2, 893, 897, 899, 900, 1033 health, Sirach 687, 691 heaven 1329
 see also kingdom of God bread of 972–3
 Enoch 813–14
 imagery of psalms 371
 Philippians 1188–9
 queen of 496
 Revelation 1292–3
 wisdom 657, 661, 683 heavenly conflict 568–9 hebel 424–7
 Heber 180
 Hebrew Bible (HB) anthropomorphic language 140
 Apocrypha 618, 619–20
 arrangement of books 11
 Baruch 699, 700
 Christian animosity 1087
 Old Testament 5–7
 Samuel (books) 196
 Hebrew (language) alphabet 356
 Apocrypha written in 621
 language of Canaan 452
 Old Testament 7
 Hebrews (book) 1236–54
 relationship to Apocrypha 619
 Hebrews (converts in Jerusalem church) 1036
 Hebrews (people), use of term 50
 Hebron 54
 Absalom 224
 Caleb's inheritance 169, 170
 David 212, 215–16, 269–70
 Maccabean revolt 719
 Hekataios 267
 Heliodorus 737–8, 744
- Helkath-hazzurim 216
 hell
 see also Hades; Sheol apocalyptic texts 1329–30
 1 Enoch 815
 4 Ezra 783
 Hellenism
 Apocrypha 625
 banquets 687–8
 converts in Jerusalem church 1036
 education 738, 739
 Jewish Christians 1070
 Jewish diaspora 1069
 Judaism and 457, 623, 737, 1155
 Judith (book) 633
 Luke's Gospel 1009–10
 1 Maccabees 713–14, 720, 721 misogyny 685
 negative view of 670
 New Testament 833–4, 836
 opposition to 735
 Seleucid rule of Judea 621–2
 Sirach 669, 676
 universal 267, 269
 Wisdom of Solomon 651
 Helper 989, 990, 992
 Heman 271, 280–1, 358
 Hengel, M. 670, 676
 hērem see ban heresy
 apocryphal texts 1324, 1325
 early Christian 1282, 1306–8
 Judaism–Christianity 1315
 Pastoral Epistles 1229
 Hermogenes 1228, 1231
 Herod Agrippa I 623 persecution of apostles 1043 as wicked ruler 1325
 Herod Antipas
 John the Baptist 898, 939
 Pilate 901, 923, 956, 1322
 Herod the Great (king of Judea) history 622
 slaughter of infants 850
 Herodians, Pharisees and 873, 893 Herodotus 704, 710, 1314 heroes birth 185
 David 274, 278, 282
 hagiography 805–7
 of Israel's history 1251–3
 Judges (book) 176, 178, 180–1, 182
 Samson 185
 heterodoxy, Pastoral Epistles 1229
 Hexateuch 12, 13, 22, 39
 Hezekiah (king of Judah) 301–4 ideal Davidic king 444, 445, 463, 464
 Isaiah 233, 260–2
 Micah (book) 595
 Passover 306
 reform of cult 301–3 Sennacherib 303–4
 siege of Jerusalem 289, 453, 596, 827
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 696
 water tunnel 827
 Hierapolis 1191, 1198, 1292 hierarchy of heads 1126 Higgaion 369 high priesthood see also priesthood of Christ 1243–9
 higher criticism see source criticism Hilkiah (father of Susanna) 708, 709
 Hilkiah (high priest) 701
 Hillel 429, 674, 685, 797, 800, 811–12, 818

- Hippolytus 1317
 Hippolytus of Rome 619
 Hiram of Tyre 218, 237, 239, 284, 287 historical creeds, Pentateuch 22 historical criticism 1–3 historiography
 Genesis 39
 Judges (book) 178
 1 Maccabees 712
 Samuel (books) 199
 history 234
 see also Deuteronomistic History
 Acts as 1029
 apocalyptic literature 815, 1324, 1328
 controlled by God 466
 Daniel (book) 568–9
 Exodus as 67–8
 fall of Jericho 163
 of Israel recounted by Paul 1045
 Job (book) 333
 Joshua (book) 159
 psalms 395
 relationship to Biblical text 465 sacrifice 93–4
 History of David's Rise 198, 207–18
 Hittites 54, 317, 545
 Hivites 59
 Hobab 118 holiness 437 expressed in conduct 1265
 of God 79–80
 holy and profane 164–5
 Levitical laws 103
 non-believers in a marriage 1119
 priestly leadership 113
 Romans (book) 1105
 1 Thessalonians 1206
 Holiness Code (H) 92, 93, 102–8, 1207
 Holladay, W. L. 488
 Holofernes 633, 634, 635–7, 639–40
 Hölscher, G. 534
 Holy One of Israel 337, 434, 437
 Holy Spirit
 baptism and the 1038 being filled with the 1176
 blasphemy 861
 body as temple 1114 coming Caesarea 1042
 Ephesus 1052
 Pentecost 1031–2
 Samaria 1038–9
 conception of Jesus 927 contrast with 'flesh' 1163–4 disciples of John 1052 dove appearance 851, 931 fruit 1164
 Galatian churches 1158–9
 guidance 990, 1048
 Helper (paraklētos) 987–8
 John the Baptist 926
 John's Gospel 1014
 quenching 1211 source of Scripture 1241, 1248 speaking in Revelation 1306 sword of the 1178
 Thessalonian church 1203, 1208
 unity 1173
 witness to the Son 1280
 Holy War
 in ancient Near East 163
 2 Chronicles 291
 Last Battle 787–8
 Saul 204, 207
 theology 159 treaty with Gibeonites 166 Homer 573, 668, 677, 1060 homonyms, Hebrew poetry 355 homosexuality, Sodom 52–3 honesty
 Lamentations 533
 proverbs 412
 honour
 community 1144
 Sirach 672, 676, 678, 680, 682, 687, 693
 2 Thessalonians 1215
 of YHWH in Ezekiel (book) 557 hope Christ, Pastoral Epistles 1222
 Ephesians 1169
 for future restoration of Israel 153
 Isaiah (book) 459
 Israel's history 143
 Jeremiah (book) 490, 509
 Job 341–2
 Lamentations 529, 531
 Moses as symbol of 139
 Philippians 1182
 1 Thessalonians 1202–3, 1206, 1209
 Zechariah (book) 613–15
 hopelessness of human condition 424 Hophni 201
 Horeb (Mount Sinai)
 see also Sinai
 Elijah's flight to 246
 Israel's conquest of the land 138 revelation at 139, 140–1 YHWH's wrath at 143–4
 Horim 138
 Horites 60
 Hosea (book) 571–8
 Hosea (prophet) 246 children of marriage with Gomer 572
 fall of Israel 258
 God's watchman over Ephraim 576 Jehu 254 man of the spirit 576 marriage of 571–2, 573–4
 Hoshea (king of Israel) 249, 258, 260, 550 hospitality, towards visiting believers 1282 house builders parable 857 house of God, metaphor for God's people 1269 household, codes 1176–7, 1197, 1221 household gods 58 hubris 1185
 Huldah 180, 263 human beings
 see also men; women
 creation 42, 43–4, 679
 imitation of God 450 inclination for evil 778, 779, 782–3, 801 mortality of 41, 44, 46 humanity
 Ephesians 1170–1, 1175
 of Jesus 1240 universal 269
 humanly before God 1260–1
 Ephesians 1173
 Matthew's Gospel 867
 Paul 1115
 proverbs 412
 Romans (book) 1104
 Sirach 672, 674, 676
 Hupfeld, Hermann 13–15
 Hurvitz, A. 332 husbands
 Paul 1118–19
 to honour wives 1267 Hushai 224–5
 Hymenaeus 1223, 1229
 Hymn of Christ 1327
 Hymn of the Soul (Pearl) 1327 hymns
 Christian 368
 Christological 1193–4 cultic 357
 Egyptian 394
 Ephesians 1176
 Essene 1193
 Luther 400
 Old Testament 9
 Philippians 1184
 post-Biblical Jewish literature 802–4, 821–4
 psalms 358, 361
 wisdom 661
 hypocrisies 874–5, 900, 944
 Hyrcanus 622, 718, 737
 Ichabod 203
 Iconium 1046, 1230
 Iddo (prophet) 288, 290 idleness, 2 Thessalonians 1218
 idolatry
 see also false worship
 Bel and the Dragon 706, 710
 Book of the Covenant 83
 cause of rejection by God 483 and Christian symbolism 466, 470
 1 Corinthians 1123–5
 description of conversion 1281
 Ephesians 1176
 of exiles in Egypt 521
 Ezekiel (book) 540, 544, 549, 561
 folly of 470, 472
 golden calves 88–9, 144, 574, 575–6, 577
 impotence 397
 incitement to 146
 Israel (kingdom) under Jeroboam 288 Israelites on journey to Moab 128–9
 Jeremiah (book) 496, 498
 Judah (kingdom) 290, 296, 298, 301
 The Letter of Jeremiah 703–4
 Maccabean revolt 719
 Mekilta of Rabbi Ishmael 808
 Moses' warning against 139–40
 Paul 1046, 1050, 1053, 1124–5
 Prayer of Manasseh 771
 Revelation 1297, 1306
 Romans (book) 1090
 sacrificial food 1120–2, 1125 sins of Israel 184, 503 sins of non-believers 1098
 Ten Commandments 81
 1 Thessalonians 1200
 2 Thessalonians 1217
 upper classes 480
 Wisdom of Solomon 661, 663–5
 wives of Solomon 240
 Idumea 622, 718, 719, 730, 745, 747
 Ignatius of Antioch 790–1, 1155, 1220, 1225, 1234, 1314 illegitimacy, Wisdom of Solomon 656
 Imalkue the Arab 728
 Immanuel 445, 446
 Immer 312
 immortality
 Adam 779
 Wisdom of Solomon 650, 651, 654, 655–6, 658, 664, 679 incarnation
 apocryphal texts 1323, 1326
 of the Son 1239
 incense 87, 99, 122, 630

- incest 53, 102–3, 104
 India 1324
Infancy Gospel of Thomas 1315, 1319
Inferno, Dante 1329 infiltration model of history of Israel 177
 inheritance
 Caleb's 169, 170, 172
 Jacob 55
 of land given to Israel 169
 Levites' 173
 Zelophehad's daughters 130, 134, 170 injustice
 Ecclesiastes 427
 Jeremiah's sermons 496 innocence, psalms 366, 372, 375
Instruction of Amen-em-het 379
Instruction of Amen-em-ope 418, 673, 675, 677, 687, 692
Instruction of Kagemni 687, 692
Instruction of Kheti, Son of Duauf 691
Instruction of Onchsheshonqy 673
Instruction of Phibis 673, 685, 692, 693 Instruction on the Two Spirits 800–1, 818–19 integrity
 Ecclesiastes 426
 of Job 344–5
 proverbs 412
 intercession by Moses 88–9
 of Christ as high priest 1240
 Joshua 164
 Moses at Mount Horeb 143–4 for 'non-terminal' sin 1280 role of Christ 1247
 Ira the Jairite 220, 227
 Irenaeus 652, 1227, 1306, 1308
 Isaac Aqedah (Binding) 1252
 birth of 50, 51, 52, 53, 1162
 children of 55, 56, 385
 1 Chronicles 269
 in Gerar 55–6
 Jacob 385
 marriage to Rebekah 54–5 sacrifice of 51, 53–4, 285, 810
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 694
 sources of accounts of 39, 48–9
 Isaiah (book) 433–85
 attitude to humble 480
 introduction 433–6
 structure 462, 463, 464–5, 473, 478–9 Isaiah (prophet) 233, 1177 and Ahaz (king of Judah) 259
 apocalyptic literature 788
 Assyria 559
 and Hezekiah 260, 261–2, 303–4
 Job (book) 350
 Ministry of 443, 446, 452, 453, 463 Paul's misreading in Romans (book) 1091
 psalms 389
 recipient of God's word 478
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 696
 1 Thessalonians 1210
 tomb of 827 wine-drinking 688
 Isaian Servant 1185
 Ishbaal 198, 216, 217, 273
 Ishbi-benob 228, 278
 Ishbosheth 272
 Ishmael, Rabbi 793–4, 808
 Ishmael (son of Abraham) 51, 52, 53
 Ishmaelites 51, 53, 55, 61
 Ishtar 574, 601, 704
 Ishvi 272
 Isidore of Pelusium 1184
 Isis 682–3
 Israel
 Blessing of Jacob 64–6 circumcision of 162–3
 civil war 189–91
 conquest of Canaan 151, 161–2, 178–82 conquest of land east of Jordan 138–9 cosmogony 352 covenants 51–2, 88–90, 166, 179
 Ephesians 1171
 Exodus from Egypt 75–6
 Ezekiel (book) 539, 546, 548, 553, 556, 562
 genealogy of tribes 268–73
 Gospels 889, 909, 925–6, 989, 1010–11 heroes of 1251–3
 history
 Ezekiel (book) 548
 J source 26
 Judges (book) 176–7
 Judith (book) 636–7
 Noth, M. 23–4
 Paul 1045
 Psalms 361, 388–9, 395
 Stephen 1036–7
 Holiness Code 93, 102–8, 1207
 idolatry 184
 ignorance of Christ 1102
 Jude (book) 1285
 Micah (book) 597–9
 monarchy creation 203–8 origins 68
 rejection by God 777
 Romans (book) 1099–105
 sacrificial worship 93–4, 144–5 wilderness wanderings 111, 118–34, 128, 1123–4
 YHWH and 51–2, 79–80, 88–90, 142, 143, 403, 576–7, 584, 1155
 Israel (Jacob) see Jacob
 Israel (kingdom)
 Amos (book) 582, 583, 584
 Aram 251–3, 255, 256–7, 294, 582, 583, 587
 Assyria 259–60, 389, 627, 628
 Chronicles 268
 division of 241, 288
 Ecclesiastes 423
 fall of 249, 259–60, 270, 288, 447
 Isaiah 437, 447
 Jehu dynasty 254–8
 Jeroboam II 582
 monarchy 232–3
 Omri dynasty 244–8, 249, 252–4 paganism 260 provinces under Solomon 236–7
 Ramah dispute 243–4
 Syro-Ephraimite War 259, 300
 temple of Solomon 237 wars 259, 290, 292, 294, 300
 Zechariah 571
 Issachar (son of Jacob) 57
 Issachar (tribe) 65, 171, 237, 272
 Ithamar (son of Aaron) 115, 280
 Ithiel 421
 Ittai 224
 Ittoba'al III 553
 Izharites 281
 J see Yahwist
 Jaar 401
 Jaazaniah ben Shaphan 541
 Jabbok 59
 Jabesh-gilead 191, 205, 214, 215–16, 228
 Jabez 270
 Jabin 180
 Jacob (Israel) 55–66
 birth of 50
 Blessing of 59–60, 64–6
 burial 66
 change of name 59
 1 Chronicles 269
 death of 63–6
 Esau 55, 56, 58–9, 591
 Ezekiel (book) 548
 first ancestor 469, 577
 House of 584, 592
 Joseph 61, 62–3
 poems in Jeremiah (book) 512 promises of salvation for 590
 psalms 388
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 694
 sources of accounts of 39, 48–9 traditions surrounding 577 unifying patriarch of Israel 491
 wisdom 661
 Jaddua (high priest) 309
 Jael 177, 180–2, 634
 Jahaziel 295
 Jairus' daughter 897
 Jambres 1230
 James (book) 1255–63
 ethics of speech 1256, 1258–9, 1260
 James (son of Alphaeus) 1047, 1054–5
 James (son of Zebedee) 908, 1043, 1156
 James of Jerusalem 1066, 1157
 Jamnia 636, 719, 746, 747 Jannes 1230
 Japhet, S. 279, 280
 Japheth (son of Noah) 47, 269, 809
 Jason (envoy for Judas Maccabeus) 723, 729, 734
 Jason (high priest) 674, 680, 713, 735–6, 738–40
 Jason (of Cyrene) 621, 626, 734–5, 737 jealousy 420, 541, 675
 Jebusites 217, 219, 230, 317
 Jeconiah (Jehoiachin) (king of Judah) 701, 756 see also Jehoiachin Jedaiel (son of Benjamin) 272
 Jedidiah 400
 Jeduthun 280–1, 359
 Jehoahaz (king of Israel) 256–7
 Jehoahaz (king of Judah) 264, 307, 547, 755–6
 Jehoash (king of Israel) 257
 Jehohanan son of Eliashib 317–18, 768 Jehoiachin (king of Judah) 264, 265, 305, 307 see also Jeconiah
 Allegory of the Cedar 546
 attack by YHWH 507 deportation 391, 487, 508, 526, 547
 1 Esdras 755–6
 sufferings of in Lamentations 531
 Jehoiaza (high priest) 255–6, 297–8
 Jehoikim (high priest) 701
 Jehoikim (king of Judah) 264, 307, 507
 see also Joiakim
 Daniel (book) 564
 1 Esdras 755–6
 kills prophet Uriah 510
 Jehonadab ben Rechab 254
 Jehoram (king of Israel) 249
 Jehoram (king of Judah) 296
 Jehoshabeath 297
 Jehoshaphat (king of Judah) 220, 236, 243, 248, 293–6, 389
 Jehoshaphat, Valley of 220, 581
 Jehosheba 255
 Jehozer (high priest) 271
 Jehu (king of Israel) 233, 244, 249, 253–5 dynasty of 571
 and Elijah 246

- Jehu (king of Israel) (cont.) and Elisha 252 and Jehoshaphat 294
 Jehu ben Hanani (prophet) 244
 Jehudi 517
 Jephthah 177, 178, 184–5, 206
 Jeremiah (book) 487–528
 Babylonian Talmud 529
 and Baruch (book) 518–22, 625, 700
 Jehoahaz 264
 and The Letter of Jeremiah 703 and Obadiah (book) 590
 Oracles Against the Nations 522–6
 Jeremiah (prophet) see also The Letter of Jeremiah Abaitar 235
 Baruch 699
 biographical accounts 488
 Daniel (book) 563, 568
 edict of Cyrus 311
 1 Esdras 756
 Ezekiel (book) 535–6
 Jeremiah (book) 487–528
 and Lamentations 529, 531
 letters 511, 700, 701
 listens to YHWH 341
 metaphors in Ephesians 1173
 miraculous fire 736
 prophetic symbols in Revelation 1301
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 696
 Zedekiah 264, 307–8
 Jeremias, J. 681
 Jeremiel (archangel) 780
 Jericho
 archaeology 159 blind man healed, Luke's Gospel 951 building of 245
 fall of 163–4
 Rahab 161
 Syro-Ephraimite War 301
 Jeroboam I (king of Israel) and Abijah 290
 golden calves 88 and Rehoboam 288 reign of 242–3 sin of and the fall of Israel 260
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 695
 and Solomon 240–1
 succession 244
 Tobit (book) 628
 Jeroboam II (king of Israel) 257–8, 571, 572, 582, 593
 Jerome 1307
 apocrypha 618, 619
 Baruch (book) 700
 comments on Barnabas 1311
 1 Esdras 751
 Esther (book) 325
 Esther (Greek) 643
 interprets psalm 380
 Judith (book) 633
 Sirach 670
 Tobit (book) 627
 Wisdom of Solomon 651, 652
 Jerubbaal (Gideon) 206
 Jerusalem
 see also Antioch-in-Jerusalem; temple; Zion Antiochenes 739
 Antiochus IV 566, 568, 739–40
 Apostolic Council deliberations 1046–7, 1156
 Assyria 260–1
 Athaliah's rule in Judah 255–6 autumn festival 388 benediction for 581
 centralization of sacrificial worship 144–5 church in 1046–7, 1072, 1106, 1107, 1156–7 city state of 234 conquest by Israel 178, 274 cult 567, 568, 570
 Dead Sea scrolls 444
 Egypt 243, 545
 fall of
 1 and 2 Chronicles 307–8
 1 and 2 Kings 264
 1 Esdras 753, 756
 2 Esdras 775–6
 Baruch (book) 701
 Deuteronomy 142–3, 152, 153
 Ezekiel (book) 549
 Isaiah (book) 455
 Jeremiah (book) 487, 519
 Obadiah (book) 591
 Psalms 381–2, 389
 Hasmonean rule 622
 heavenly city 786, 1253–4, 1303–5
 Hellenization 713, 738
 idolatry 262, 448, 616
 Jesus and 871–2, 908–12, 922–3, 940–59
 Maccabean revolt 721–2
 Moriah 54
 Nebuchadnezzar 636
 Nehemiah 318–23
 new 1294, 1303–5
 Ophel Hill 235
 Paul 1040, 1064, 1069, 1071–3, 1084
 pilgrims 399
 post-exilic return to 309–10, 311–23, 515, 607, 611, 756–64
 Roman conquest 622, 775–6
 Salem 50
 seige 539, 543
 Seleucid rule 621–2, 713–15
 Sennacherib 289, 303–4
 Shishak 243
 temple see temple tribal territory allocation 170
 YHWH and 458, 502, 545, 551, 605, 606, 615
 Jerusalem Talmud 797
 Jeshua (high priest) 312, 313, 314, 760 see also Joshua (high priest)
 Jeshurun 155, 156
 Jesse 269, 449
 Jesus (called Justus) 1198
 Jesus Christ
 see also apostles; Christ; Christology; disciples; Messiah; miracles of Jesus; parables of Jesus adulthood 850
 anointings 879, 915, 936–7, 982–4 apocalyptic discourse 835, 842, 912–14, 953–4 apocryphal sayings 1315 arrest 880–1, 917–18, 955, 983, 993
 ascension 958, 959, 1031 authority challenged 890, 891, 894, 910, 952–3 baptism 851, 888, 931, 1105
 betrayal 879, 881, 882–3, 915–17, 955, 985–6
 birth 849, 850, 922, 928–9, 1319 blasphemy accusation 891, 919 blood of 1194, 1249 body of 1127, 1174, 1196
 burial 884–5, 920, 992–3, 996, 997 childhood 929–30, 1319–20 children and 869 church and 867–8, 992, 1127, 1174 coming of 1272, 1273–4, 1279, 1282
 commandments 911–12, 986, 988, 989 conception 849, 927
 confession 881–2, 1279
 controversies 860, 891–3, 894, 910–12, 944–5, 952–3
 creator 1237–8, 1239, 1241
 crucifixion 373, 884, 919–20, 923, 957–8, 985, 995–6, 1139, 1158, 1164
 Day of Pentecost 1032
 death acclaimed before 981–2 condemnation of sin 1097–8
 divine plan 1032, 1033
 foreshadowed by Lazarus' 981–2, 983 Gospel accounts 884, 920, 922, 957–8, 995–6
 meaning 908, 1080 parallel with Stephen's martyrdom 1038
 Paul's synagogue speech 1045 plot 893, 915 predictions of own 849, 866, 870, 880, 903, 905, 907, 984 responsibility for 993 reveals glory of his 985–99 sentence of 884 demons 890, 893, 897, 933, 938, 943–4 departure of 986–7, 990 divinity of 962, 975, 1013, 1272 exaltation of 1032, 1035, 1038, 1238 example of 1184–6, 1265 family of 861, 898, 937, 965, 974 farewell discourses 986, 988, 989–90 fasting 892
 fidelity 1240–1 fulfillment of God's purpose 391, 835, 843, 1102
 genealogy 848–9, 931
 Gentiles 1012
 glorification 985–99, 987–8, 1052
 grace of 1154
 healings see miracles of Jesus
 Holy Spirit 987–8, 1154, 1158, 1159, 1163–4 humanity 1026, 1240 identity 1008
 imagery 1196
 innocence of 993
 intercessory role 1247
 Isaiah's prophecy fulfilled 932–3
 Israel 989, 1102
 Jerusalem
 entry into 871, 909, 952 journey to 922–3, 940–52 ministry in 908–12
 Judaism 840, 841, 863–4, 874, 883–4, 910, 1066
 kingship 915, 983, 993, 994
 Lamb of God 964
 Last Supper 879, 915, 916–17, 923, 954–5, 985
 last words 376
 leadership 841, 842
 letter of 1329 as logos 660 love 990, 1105
 majesty of 992 mediator 1045, 1194, 1223, 1247, 1249 Melchizedek 1246–7
 mercy of 1243–4
 mockery of 881, 883, 884, 919, 956
 names 848, 849, 927, 929
 new covenant 1138
 New Testament and 840–3
 Passion 518, 879–86, 939, 951, 992–3, 1024–6
 Passover 879, 985
 Pharisees 860, 875, 891–3, 910–11, 944–5, 946
 prayers 931, 942–3, 990–2, 1024–6, 1218

- pre-existence of 992 predictions 594, 939, 951 priesthood of 1240, 1241, 1243–9 prophetic role 1011 reconciliation of God and humanity 1094 redemption by atonement 1092 rejection of 897–8, 922, 924, 932–3, 1091–3 resurrection 879–86, 1130–2
 1 Corinthians 1130–2
 Ephesians 1167, 1174
 Gospel accounts 842, 885–6, 920–1, 923, 958–9, 985–6
 Paul's letters 842
 Revelation 1288, 1297
 return of 945, 1206, 1272, 1273–4 Revelation to John 1288, 1297, 1305
 Sabbath law 892–3
 salvation through 969, 1034, 1045, 1210, 1232
 Sanhedrin 881, 883, 884, 918–19
 Sermon on the Mount 852–7, 934–5 servant metaphor 476 sinlessness of 1243, 1244 sinners 892, 947, 948–9, 1222
 social role 842
 Son of God 778, 998, 1158, 1160–1, 1272
 Son of Man 567, 815, 1290
 sources of knowledge 841
 suffering 1239, 1240, 1247 as atonement for others 477 conquered evil 1267–8 on the cross 1139 cup of 908 tax controversy 910–11 tax-collectors and 892, 947, 948–9 teaching 867–8, 890, 905–7, 975
 temple cleansing of 909, 952
 entry into 871–2, 929–30
 prediction of destruction 876, 877, 913, 918 temptation of 851, 889, 931–2
 Torah antithesis 1066–7, 1070, 1079, 1086, 1101
 Transfiguration 866, 904, 940, 941
 trial 881–2, 883, 884, 918–19, 923, 956, 993–5 washing feet 985–6
 wisdom 660, 661, 1124, 1237
 Word of God 961–2
 Jesus ben Sira 621, 625
 see also Wisdom of Jesus son of Sirach authorship of Wisdom of Solomon 650
 creation of Septuagint 618
 Jesus son of Sirach see Jesus ben Sira; Wisdom of Jesus son of Sirach Jethro 79, 180
 Jewett, R. 1202, 1213
 Jewish literature, post-Biblical 792–828
 Jewish Christianity 1100
 Jewish-Christian Gospels 1315
 Jewish War 775, 778
 Jews advantage over Gentiles 1100 Antioch incident 1157–8 attitudes, Romans (book) 1091 authority of the Roman emperor 1223 church in Corinth 1135 circumcision issue 1188
 Colossae 1191
 condemnation of Jesus 956–7 crucifixion 957 dispersion of 383
 in Egypt 735–6
 and Gentiles eating together 1157
 Gentiles in message of the Gospel 1042 Gentilization 1107 hostility to gospel 1046, 1050, 1055 mercenaries 726
 as minority in Persian empire 324, 325–6, 327–30
 new humanity in Ephesians 1170–1
 Paul 1050, 1060–1, 1135
 persecution by Antiochus IV 714–15, 740–1 persecution by Tiberius 791 rejection of Jesus 932–3
 1 Thessalonians 1200
 usage of term in Fourth Gospel 963, 978 widows 1226
 Jezebel (queen of Israel) 245, 246, 247, 253, 254, 380, 1292
 Jezreel (place) 215–16, 254, 572
 Jezreel (son of Hosea) 572, 573
 Joab 220, 225
 Abner 216–17
 Absalom 223–4, 226
 Adonijah 235
 Ammonite and Aramean Wars 221, 222
 Amnon and Tamar 222, 223
 census 229–30, 278, 282
 conquest of Jerusalem 274
 Rabbah 278
 Sheba's rebellion 227
 Solomon 235–6
 Joachim (husband of Susanna) 708, 709
 Joahaz (king of Judah) 270
 Joakim (high priest in Judith) 636, 640
 Joakim (son of Jeshua) 760
 Joanna 937
 Joash (father of Gideon) 182
 Joash (king of Israel) 251, 257
 Joash (king of Judah) 255–6, 297–9
 Job (book) 331–54 history of interpretations 333 near-eastern parallels 332–3 structure 332
 Sumerian parallel 341
 wisdom literature 801 Job (man) 331–54
 friends 672, 673, 676–7 paragon of virtue in Ezekiel (book) 544–5
 psalms 391
 sins 340–1
 Sirach 672, 696
 theodicy 10
 trust 1182 wife 334–5
 Joel (book) 578–81
 apocalyptic tradition 579 liturgical elements 579 Joel (prophet) exhortation to Jerusalem 578, 580 historical background 579, 581 prayer of 580
 Johah ben Amittai 258
 Johanan 520–1
 Johannine Epistles 837, 1274–83
 Johannine Gospel see John (gospel)
 John (apostle son of Zebedee)
 John's gospel 961, 998
 leader of the Jerusalem church 1157
 Sanhedrin 1182
 seats in the kingdom 908 1–3 John (Epistles) 837, 1274–83
 John (Gospel) 980–1000, 1012–14
 Christology 1012–13
 comparison with other gospels 1006, 1018–20, 1022–7
 early Christian church 836
 eschatology 1013
 geographical grouping (fourth) 981–1000
 historicity 1012
 Judaism 1014
 judgement 1013–14
 origin of beliefs 834 second book 985–1000
 Spirit's role in 1014
John, Acts of 1323
 John the Baptist
 annunciation 922, 926–7 challenge to Jesus 910, 936
 death 863, 898
 disciples 859–60, 1052
 John's Gospel 962
 ministry 850–1, 888, 930–1 naming 928 social concern 931 testimonies of 963–4, 967
 John Chrysostom 790
 John of the Cross, St 429
 John Hyrcanus 622, 696, 732–3
 1 Maccabees 711, 712, 733
 Samaria 633, 636
 John Mark 1044
 see also Mark
 John of Patmos 800, 1288, 1290–2, 1295, 1305
 Joiaim (Jehoiakim) (king of Judah) 322, 756
 Joiairib 316
 Jonadab 222, 233, 386 ancestor of Rechabites 517 interpretation of psalms 357
 Jonah (book) 593–5
 biblical criticism 2
 Jonah (prophet) 531, 594
 Jonathan ben Abiathar 235
 Jonathan (brother of Judas Maccabeus) 622, 735
 death 731
 Maccabean revolt 724–5
 Nicanor 743
 rule of Judea 725–30 siege of the Akra 720 war with the surrounding peoples 718
 Jonathan (nephew of David) 228 Jonathan (son of Saul)
 and David 209–10, 211, 220
 death of 214–15, 228
 Michmash 206–7
 Joppa 284, 593, 727, 729, 730, 746
 Joram (king of Israel) 252, 253, 254, 255
 Joram (king of Judah) 253, 294
 Jordan (river) 161–2, 385, 562
 Joseph (Jesus' father) 849, 850
 Joseph (Maccabean leader) 718, 719, 743
 Joseph (son of Jacob) 514
 birth of 57
 Blessing of Jacob 64, 65
 Christian typology 1036
 1 Chronicles 270
 death of 66
 in Egypt 60–3
 hagiography 806, 826–7 themes in Genesis 40, 415
 wisdom 661
 Joseph (son of Tobias) 675
 Joseph (tribe) 65, 170–1, 388 see also Ephraim (tribe); Manasseh (tribe)
 Joseph of Aramathia 996
Joseph and Aseneth 806, 826–7
 Josephus account of Egyptian insurrectionist 1055 Agrippa II 1058
 apocrypha 619–20, 1324
 binding of Isaac 810
 dreams 689
 1 Esdras 751, 757, 758

- Josephus (cont.)
 Esther (Greek) 642, 643
 Ezekiel (book) 534
 Felix 1057
 Greek 623
 harmony of Jewish society 624
 Herod Agrippa's death 1043 honour of parents 672
 Job 696
 Maccabean revolt 717, 725
 1 Maccabees 712
 2 Maccabees 747
 3 Maccabees 774
 Moses 805
 murder of Simon 733
 pre-existent soul 660 purification of temple in Nehemiah (book) 323
 Rewritten Bible 794–5
 Samaritans 740, 968
 Saul 206
 ten lost tribes 788
 Theudas and Judas 1035–6
 Tiberius' persecution of the Jews 791
 Wisdom of Solomon 651, 658, 659
- Josheb-basshebeth 229
- Joshua (book) 158–75
 conquest model of Israelite history 176 inclusion in Hexateuch 39
- Joshua (high priest) 608, 609, 612, 754, 762
- Joshua (Israelite leader) 718 appointment of 154 commissioning of 160
 death of 175, 179
 defeat of northern alliance 167–8 defeat of southern alliance 166–7
 Deuteronomistic History 199–200 farewell address 173–4 genealogy in 1 Chronicles 272
 leadership 139, 162
 personal inheritance 172 role as intercessor 164
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 695
 spy mission 120
 transfer of authority from Moses 130
- Josiah (king of Judah) 233, 263–4, 305–7, 396, 507
 death of 391
 defiling of high places 144
 Deuteronomistic History 177
 Deuteronomy 136
 1 Esdras 751, 754–5
- Jotham (king of Judah) 258–9, 300
- Jotham (son of Gideon) 184
- joy
 Philippians 1182, 1189
 proverbs 414
- Jubilee years 106–7, 320, 560
- Jubilees see Book of Jubilees
- Judah (kingdom)
see also Babylonian exile
 Amos (book) 582, 583
 Aram 293, 294
 Assyria 136, 259, 260–1, 262–3
 Babylon 264–5, 272–3
 Daniel (book) 563–4
 Edom 299
 Ezekiel (book) 534, 539, 545, 547, 549, 558
 fall of
 2 Chronicles 307–8
 Deuteronomy 152, 153, 307–8
 Ezekiel (book) 549
 Hosea (book) 572
 Isaiah (book) 447
 Jeremiah (book) 487, 508
- Jeremiah (book) 492, 497, 501, 508, 509, 512
- Jerusalem city-state 234
- kings of 232–3, 255–66, 752, 754–6
- Micah (book) 596–7
- northern kingdom and 248, 249–50, 260, 290, 292
- Psalms 368
- Rehoboam 288–90
- Sennacherib 303–4, 596
- Shishak 243, 289
- Syro-Ephraimite War 300
- Zechariah (book) 613, 614
- Judah (part of unified kingdom)
 Absalom 224
 David 215–16, 226–7, 270
 division from northern kingdom 241
 Solomon 235, 237
- Judah (post-exilic) see also Judea
 Alexander the Great 621
 Ezra 309–10
 Nehemiah 309–10
 Persian rule 310 return to 311–12, 756–62
 Seleucid rule 564, 569
- Judah the Prince, Rabbi 797
- Judah (son of Jacob) 57, 61, 62–3, 64, 270
- Judah (tribe)
 Blessing of Jacob 64, 65
 1 Chronicles 269, 272
 conquest of Canaan 178
 David 274
 epic of Samson 186–7
 genealogy 270
 Moses' Blessing 156
 Revelation 1294 territorial allocation 169–70
- Judaism
see also diaspora; Jews; rabbinic Judaism
 apocrypha 619–20, 623–4 ascetic practices 1196 attitude towards pagan world 1050 before Christ 1092–3 Christianity contrast 1155 conversion to 633 deliverance from exile 471 dietary laws 1121, 1157–8
 early Christian church 1182
 Gentiles, acceptance of 1068
 Godfearers and proselytes 1041
 God's salvation through Christ 1087, 1103
 Greek philosophy 651
 Hellenism 457, 570, 911–12, 1155, 1189
 Holy Scriptures 5–12 influence of Romans (book) 1083 intertestamental dualist perspective 1275
 Jesus' teaching 863–4
 law 1086, 1138
 literature 479, 624, 792–828
 Matthew's Gospel 845–6, 848, 875–6, 877
 monotheism 1186
 nationalism 1157
 New Testament 833, 834
 Paul 1054–5, 1058, 1060–1, 1065, 1073
 primary sources 1086 rejection of God's message 859–62 righteousness, Romans (book) 1101 Roman Empire as enemy of 482 sabbath 479, 860, 1158, 1161
 sacrifice 1092
 scriptural canon 529 sects 624
 Sermon on the Mount 854
 Servant Songs 476
 sinners 1091
- Song of Solomon 429, 430, 432
- unbelief in Christ 1085, 1086
- use of term 737
- Judaism-Christianity
 1 Clement 1314
 Barnabas 1311, 1312, 1313
 heresy 1315
- Judas (Iscariot)
 as antichrist 992 betrayal of Jesus 879, 881, 915, 917, 955, 985–6 a brother of Jesus 981
 death 882–3
 at entry to Jerusalem 983 fate of 1031
 proverbs 420
- Judas (Maccabeus) 622
- Judith as 633, 636
 1 Maccabees 715, 716–24
 2 Maccabees 734–5, 736, 740, 742–50
- Judas (son of Simon) 732
- Jude (Letter of) 1284–5 2 Peter relation 1270, 1272
- Judea alliance with Spartans 740
 Assyria 632, 634, 635, 636–41
 Christ's risen appearance in 996 churches 1156
 Egyptian exiles 521
 Hasmonean rule 622, 725–33
 Hellenism 623
 Jewish War 775, 778
 Maccabean revolt 714–25, 742–50
 mythical themes 567 religious syncretism 605
 Rome 622–3, 722–3
 Seleucid rule 569, 621–2, 712, 713–30, 735–50
 1 Thessalonians 1205
 war between Antiochus VI and Demetrius II 728
- judge parable, Luke's gospel 950
- judgement
see also day of judgement; final judgement after death 679, 1303
 Amos (book) 587–9
 apocalyptic texts 1330
 Barnabas 1313
 courts at Corinth 1117 and deliverance, Isaiah (book) 436, 439, 443, 460, 484
 divine 350, 424, 446, 686, 1294–5
 Ecclesiastes 423, 424, 428
 Ezekiel (book) 540
 foreign nations 440, 457
 Israel following spy mission 120–1
 John's Gospel 1013–14
 justification of 164 metaphors 407, 446
 Micah 597
 2 Peter 1273
 present fact in Jude 1286 priests and prophets 457
 Proverbs 416
 Revelation 1298–9 reversal of 572–3
 salvation 459
 Sermon on the Mount 856
 Sirach 672
 unpredictable day of the Lord 440, 441, 445 worldly standards 1141
- judgement day see day of judgement
- judgement oracles, Hosea (book) 576
- Judges (book) 176–91, 199–200
- judges 176
 2 Chronicles 291–2

- laws in Deuteronomy 148
 officers in Israel 138
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 695
 Judith 637–41, 647
 Judith (book) 632–41
 didactic story 626
 historical background 625
 original language 621
 status in Jewish canon 620, 634
 just people 494, 1261 just war 178
 justice
 Book of the Covenant 83–4 corruption of 415, 419, 439 covenant 337
 Davidic monarchy 516
 divine 52, 349, 414, 778
 see also theodicy
 God's indifference to 617
 Jeremiah (book) 500
 mercy 1100–1
 Sirach 689–90
 Ecclesiastes 424
 Egyptian goddess 408
 Jeremiah (book) 506–7
 kingship 507
 Micah (book) 597
 Old Testament ethics 10
 Proverbs 421
 Psalms 355, 383
 requirement for Israel 337
 resurrection 570
 Sodom and Gomorrah 52
 wisdom 406
 justification by faith 1045
 Abraham and Isaac 51
 Christianity 1065
 Judaism 1093
 Paul 1062, 1079–80
 justification by works
 Judaism 1065, 1079
 Moses 1102
 Paul 1091
 religious 'entry requirements' 1087
 Justin Martyr 357, 393, 662
 Justus 1198

 Kadesh 124–5, 728
 Kadesh-barnea 138
 Kaiser, O. 435
 Kaiwan (Saturn) 586
 Kapelrud, A. S. 309
kauchaomai 1183
 Kedar 398, 524
 Kedarites 319
 Kedesh Naphtali 628
 Keeper of Israel 399
 Keilah 211
 Kenites 180, 207
 Kenotic theory 1185 kindness 408–9
 King of the Jews 849, 919, 956, 994
 King Lists 45
 king-frame 232, 233
 Kingdom of God 1288
 advent 940, 949 banquet 946 children 907
 excluded persons 1117 imminence 941, 945
 John the Baptist 936
 love 1106
 Luke's Gospel 936, 940, 941, 945, 946, 947, 949
 Mark's Gospel 889, 896, 904, 907
 Matthew's Gospel 852, 853, 870
 social outcasts 947
 1 Kings 232–48
 Deuteronomistic History 199–200
 succession narrative 198
 2 Kings 232–4, 248–65
 Deuteronomistic History 199–200
 1 Esdras 755–6
 Isaiah (book) 436
 Prayer of Manasseh 770–1
 kings
 see also monarchy faithfulness 368
 representatives of God 370 shepherds of people 420 King's Pool, Jerusalem 319
 kingship
 see also monarchy dependent on God 676
 1 Esdras 758
 God 380, 392
 of Universe 352
 wisdom 676
 YHWH 361, 392
kipper see atonement Kiraith'arba 54
 Kiriath-jearim 203, 218, 275, 401
 Kiriathaim 552
 Kirman 789
 Kish 272
 Kittim 713, 816 knowledge of future 428
 gnos epignos distinction 1272
 of God 1131, 1181–2, 1275
 of pagan idols 1121 pursuit of 671 tree of 44
 without love 1128–9
 Knox, John 1072, 1075
 Kohath 271, 276
 Kohath clan 279–80
 Kohathites 115, 281
 Korah 113, 121–3, 1286
 Koresh, David 471
 Kuenen, Abraham 14–15, 19
Kurios 1185–6

 Laban 54–5, 56, 57–8
 Lachish (city) 516
 Lahmi 278
 Laishians 188–9
 Lamb, Revelation 1293, 1298, 1302
 Lamb of God 964
 Lamech 45
 Lamentations (book) 528–33
 and Baruch (book) 700
 and The Letter of Jeremiah 703 laments
 by Zion 530
 classification of psalms 360–1
 confession of sin 482–3
 Jeremiah (book) 499–503
 Job (book) 332
 for loss of society 598–9 Mesopotamian 497
 prayers 804, 823–4
 psalms 371, 778, 784, 785–6 style in Lamentations 528–9 lamp parable 896 lamps 106, 117, 1290 land settlement, Numbers 132–3 language see also Aramaic; Greek; Hebrew
 Apocrypha 621
 biblical criticism 1
 of commerce 1234
 Daniel (book) 563
 Ephesians 1168
 Isaiah (book) 441, 442, 466–7, 469, 472
 James (book) 1255
 letters of Paul 1063, 1080
 Mosaic covenant 499
 New Testament 830
 Old Testament 7–8
 parables 895
 speaking in tongues 1032
 Stoic 1180
 Laodicea 1191, 1198, 1292
 Last Battle 787–8
 Last Judgement 784
 Last Supper
 Christian rites 1126
 John's Gospel 985
 Luke's Gospel 923, 954–5
 Mark's Gospel 915, 916–17
 Matthew's Gospel 879
 Lasthenes 728
 Latin 8
 Latin culture, New Testament 833
 Latin Vulgate
 Apocrypha 619
 2 Esdras 775, 776, 789
 Ezra apocalyptic 751
 Judith (book) 633
 origin 8
 Stuttgart edition 1328
 Tobit (book) 627
 Wisdom of Jesus son of Sirach 667
 law see also Book of the Law; Torah accessibility of 154 ancient Near Eastern codes 82 Christ its fulfilment 1102 civil 103, 150
 Colossians 1195
 coming into existence 1159 curse of 1155, 1159
 D source theology 27–8 definition 28
 divine 421 economic 150
 Ephesians 1166
 excellence of 139–40 fear of the Lord, Sirach 688 function of 1160 genre 8
 of God 408
 God of Daniel 567
 Hebrew slaves 517 inability of humans to keep 785
 Jesus' teaching 975
 Jubilee 560
 monarchy 148
 Mosaic 975, 1158, 1163, 1164 offered to all nations of world at Sinai 778, 783
 Pastoral Epistles 1222
 Pentateuch 12, 29–30
 performance of 1066
 Persian empire 326
 post-Biblical Jewish literature 795–7, 811–13 promulgated by angels 1160
 Psalms (book) 366
 reforms under Jehoshaphat of Judah 293, 294 restoration after Babylonian exile 769, 788–9 sabbath 504
 sin and 1094, 1095–7 sources of Deuteronomy 137

law (cont.)

- Stephen and the Hellenists 1155
- Ten Commandments 141
- theology of 142
- wisdom 677–8, 680, 683–4, 800
- works contrasted with faith 1093–4
- 'law of life' 679
- lawsuit style of language, Isaiah (book) 441, 442, 466–7, 469, 472
- Lazarus 949, 981–2, 983
- laziness 413, 416, 425
- leadership
 - challenge of Korah 121–3
 - 1 Corinthians 1114
 - covenant community 479
 - Jerusalem 550
 - Joshua 162
 - Martha 942
 - models of 1114
 - Moses 119–20, 139
 - Numbers 112–13
 - organization of Israel 138, 148
 - Psalms 359
 - 'super apostles' 1147
 - 1 Thessalonians 1211
- Leah 57–8
- heaven 862, 864–5, 901–2, 944
- Lebanon 466, 507, 552
- Lebo Hamath 562
- left and right 428
- left-handedness 179–80
- Legend of the Ten Martyrs* 806
- legends 22, 24
- Legion 897, 938
- lemma 793–4
- Lemuel 422
- Leningrad Codex 7
- Leontopolis 735
- lepers 119–20, 857, 891, 933, 949
- leprosy 100
- lethech 573
- Letter of Aristeas* 618
- The Letter of Jeremiah 620, 625, 700, 703–4
- Letter (or Apocryphon) of James* 1329
- letters
 - Graeco-Roman 1199
 - of recommendation 1138, 1146
 - types and styles 1075
- Letters of Ignatius* 1314–15
- letters of Paul 1062–82, 1165–6, 1220
 - see also* individual books
 - biblical criticism 2
 - early Christian church 836
 - interpretation 1062–4, 1066, 1078, 1083
 - Jesus' death and resurrection 842
 - letters in Philippians 1179–80
 - literary content 1062–3
 - origin of beliefs 834
 - pattern of thought 1079
 - relationship to Wisdom of Solomon 619
 - rhetorical criticism 1077
 - style of content 1076, 1078
 - theological content 1078–81
 - used as chronology of his life 1064, 1072
- Levi (son of Jacob) 57, 59–60, 64, 271, 616
- Levi (tax-collector) 892, 934
- Levi (tribe)
 - see also* Levites
 - Blessing of Jacob 64
 - censuses 114–15
 - 1 Chronicles 269, 271, 282
 - consecration 117
 - David's census 278
 - inheritance 173
 - law in Deuteronomy 148–9

- Moses' Blessing 156
- organization and responsibilities 114–15, 123
- priestly duties 112, 113
- Leviathan 351, 456
 - description 353
 - 4 Ezra 782, 787
 - Job (book) 332
 - psalms 394
 - Revelation 1296
- Levine, B. A. 96, 97, 98
- Levites
 - see also* Levi (tribe)
 - ark brought to Jerusalem 275–6
 - comparison with Christ 1247
 - comparison with Melchizedek 1246
 - dating of P 18–19, 31
 - demoted in Ezekiel (book) 561
 - distinction from priests 615, 616
 - duties given in 1 Chronicles 279–81
 - Ezra's return to Jerusalem 316
 - installation of ark in the temple 285–6
 - and Joash 297–8
 - Josiah's Passover feast 306, 754–5
 - Micah 188
 - offer sacrifice 400
 - Passover on restoration of temple 764
 - rape in Gibeah 189
 - rights to financial support 303
 - temple servants 560
- Leviticus (book) 91–109
 - source 18
- lex talionis* 106, 149, 150
- liberation model of history of Israel 177
- liberationism 2–3, 69
- liberty, Christian ethos 1116
- life
 - 1 John 1280
 - brevity 340
 - disciplined 406
 - enjoyment 424, 428
 - fountain of 414
 - means of attaining 1095, 1102
 - metaphor 409
 - models for in Ephesians 1175
 - ordinances protecting 149
 - respect for human 141
 - tree of 408
 - water of in Revelation 1305–6
- life after death
 - Isaiah (book) 454
 - Israelite culture 363
 - Judaism 624
- light
 - ceremony of 976
 - Ephesians 1176
 - John's Gospel 962
 - metaphors 375, 1275
 - Simeon's song 930
 - 1 Thessalonians 1210
 - wisdom 658
- Lilith 462
- Lily of the Covenant 384
- lion, Messiah as 787
- lions, Daniel 566–7
- literary criticism see source criticism
- literature
 - Bible as 1, 3
 - Exodus (book) 67
 - extra-canonical 1286
 - genre of Acts 1029–30
 - influenced by apocalyptic texts 1329
 - Nehemiah's library 736
 - Pentateuchal study 32
 - post-Biblical Jewish 792–828
 - study of Leviticus 93
- travel-writing and itineraries 1048
- Little Book of Consolation 512
- The Little Genesis see* Book of Jubilees
- liturgy
 - Baruch (book) 699, 701, 702
 - Joel (book) 579
 - post-Biblical Jewish literature 802–4, 822
- Lives of the Prophets* 710, 806, 827
- Lives of the Saints* 1323
- living stone (name for Christ) 1266
- Lo-ammi 572, 573
- Lo-ruhamah 572, 573
- loafers 1218
- loans 686–7
- loaves and fishes see feeding the five thousand
- locusts 579–80, 585, 587, 601
- Logos
 - see also* Word
 - sustaining activity of 1238
 - swords as symbols of 1243
- logos
 - wisdom literature 683, 801
 - Wisdom of Solomon 660
- Lord of heaven 631
- Lord's Prayer 942–3, 1309
- Lordship, Jesus 927, 929
- lost sheep parable 867, 899, 947
- Lot 48, 49, 50, 52–3, 661
- Lotan 335
- love
 - all love one another 1267
 - among believers 1278
 - brotherly 1208
 - Colossians 1193, 1196
 - command to in James (book) 1259
 - demands of 1128–9
 - divine 580, 662, 911–12, 1175, 1279
 - of enemies 855
 - Ephesians 1174, 1179
 - erotic, Song of Solomon 429–33
 - fulfilling the law 1104–5
 - of husband and wife 1177
 - idealization of 10, 431–2
 - Jesus' commandment of 986, 988, 989
 - Jesus prayer for disciples' 992
 - kiss of 1270
 - of neighbours 856, 874, 911–12
 - obedience and 989
 - Paul 1128–9
 - psalm 375
 - as royal law 1259
 - 1 Thessalonians 1202–3, 1206
 - universal 651
- Lucerne, Lake 1322
- Lucifer 450
- Lüdemann, Gerd 1072–3
- Luke 1235
 - authorship of Acts 1028
 - Paul 1231
 - Stephen and the Hellenists 1155
 - Stoic ideas 1180
 - 1 Thessalonians 1206
 - writings of 1156
- Luke (Gospel) 922–59, 1009–12
 - agreements with Matthew 1004, 1005
 - authorship 924–5
 - Christology 931
 - comparison with other gospels 922–3, 1014–22, 1024–7
 - date and place 925, 930
 - finger-printing technique 1005
 - good news 932, 937, 938
 - historicity 923
 - infancy narratives 922, 926–30
 - Jesus' boyhood 929–30

- Jesus in Galilee 930–40
 Jesus' journey to Jerusalem 922–3, 940–52
 Jesus' ministry 932–3, 936–40
 Jesus' passion in Jerusalem 952–9
 Lord's Prayer 942–3
 Luke the Evangelist 924–5 parallels with Didache 1309–10 relationship with Paul 924–5
 Septuagint 834
 Sermon on the Mount (Beatitudes) 934–5
 social concern 931
 sources 923–4, 939, 954, 955, 1003
 lust 854
 Luther, Martin 400, 618, 619, 633, 643, 1080
 LXX see Septuagint
 Lycus (river) 1191
 Lydia (person) 1179, 1189
 Lydia (place) 558, 1049 lying, proverbs 413
 Lysias 716, 717, 718, 720–1, 743, 744–6, 747, 748
 Lysimachus 643, 739
 Lystra 1046, 1230

 Maacah (Maachah, queen mother of Judah) 243, 289, 292
 Maacah (place) 221
 Maacah (wife of David) 215, 222
 Ma'at 408
 macarism 336
 Maccabean revolt 621–2
 Hellenism 623
 Judith (book) 633
 1 Maccabees 714–25
 2 Maccabees 734, 742–50
 market dispute 686
 martyr literature 790–1, 806
 Prayer of Azariah 707
 resistance to Antiochus IV 564, 569
 1 Maccabees 711–33
 dating of 620, 711
 historical background 625
 original language 621
 relationship to biblical texts 626
 status in Jewish canon 620
 2 Maccabees 734–50
 authorship 621, 626
 date of composition 620
 historical background 625 and 4 Maccabees 790
 original language 621
 resurrection 656
 status in Jewish canon 620
 3 Maccabees 618, 773–5
 4 Maccabees 790–2
 immortality 656
 inclusion in Apocrypha 618
 martyr literature 806, 827
 Macedonia 1200, 1203, 1220, 1231
 collection for the Saints 1144
 Paul's third missionary journey 1053
 Philippians 1179
 Machir 225
 Machpelah 66, 278
 McKane, W. 488 magi 849
 magic 802, 820, 1038, 1052, 1230 Magnesia, battle of 720, 722–3
 Magog 558
 Mahalath 382
 Mahalath (wife of Rehoboam) 289
 Mahanaim 58–9, 221 make-up 685, 809
 Malachi (book) 615–17
 Malchishua 214

 Malina, B. J. 1214
 Malta 1060 mammon 856, 948
 Man from the Sea 787–8
 Man and his God 332
 Manasseh (husband of Judith) 638 Manasseh (king of Judah) 262–3, 304–5 see also Prayer of Manasseh
 Babylonian exile 547
 Chronicles 268
 Jeremiah (book) 502
 Prayer of Manasseh 770–2
 Manasseh (son of Joseph) 55, 63–4, 272
 Manasseh (tribe) 384, 562 asylum in Judah after fall of Israel 273
 1 Chronicles 270, 272
 and David 274
 genealogy in 1 Chronicles 272 inheritance issues 134
 land settlement 132–3, 161
 territory allocation 170–1 Manetho 267
 manna 78, 665, 972–3 mantic practices 9, 565, 566 manual labour, Paul 1122
 Maon, wilderness of 211, 212
 Marantha 1306
 Marcion 1078–9, 1226, 1310
 Marduk 389, 559, 787
 Marduk-apla-iddina 262
 Mareshah 291
 Mariology 429
 Marisa 719
 Mark 1198, 1270
 see also John Mark
 Mark (Gospel) 886–922, 1007–8 allegory 892, 894
 authorship 886
 biography 887
 comparison with other gospels 1014–16, 1020–7
 conclusion 921–2
 dating 886, 1003
 healing 890–2, 893, 897, 899, 900
 historicity 909, 918–19
 inadequacies 832
 Jesus' controversies 891–4, 910–12
 Jesus in Jerusalem 908–12
 Jesus' teaching 890, 903–8
 kingship of God 1008 manuscript controversy 921, 922 miracles of Jesus 896–7, 898–9, 900–1, 902
 parables of Jesus 894–6 passion narrative 915–21 place 886–7 secrecy motif 888, 890
 source 1005–6
 source of Luke's gospel 924, 939, 954, 955
 marriage see also adultery; husbands; wives
 apocryphal texts 1327
 contract 630
 Decalogue commandments 141
 Jesus' teaching 868, 906–7, 949
 law in Deuteronomy 149–50
 levirate 193, 194–5
 metaphor 492, 1147
 mixed marriage amongst post-exilic Jews 312, 316–18, 321, 323, 766–9
 Paul 1096, 1118–19
 proverbs 416
 reward for heroes 178
 Sirach 684–6, 690–1
 suspicion of adultery 115–16 Martha 942, 981–2

 martyrdom
 apocryphal texts 1323, 1325
 Hebrews (book) 1252–3
 immortality 656
 James (son of Zebedee) 1043
 literature 806, 827–8
 2 Maccabees 740
 4 Maccabees 790–2
 Prayer of Azariah 707
 resurrection of 735, 742
 Revelation 1296–7
 of Stephen 1037–8
 under Antiochus IV 714–15, 741–2
 Mary Magdalene 937, 981, 995, 997
 Mary (mother of Jesus) 927–8 accompanying Jesus 937–8 at crucifixion 995
 Jesus' birth 929
 John's gospel 993
 Mary (sister of Martha) 942
 Mary (wife of Clopas) 995
 Masada 668, 670, 806 māsāl 183–4, 406
 maskil 359
 Maskil (Qumran community leader) 804, 818–19, 822 maskilim (wise men) 570
 Masoretes 7, 347, 356
 Masoretic Text 471, 642
 Mattaniah see Zedekiah
 Mattathias (Maccabean leader) 280, 622, 711–12, 714–16, 724, 740
 Mattathias (son of Simon) 732
 Matthew (Gospel) 844–86, 1008–9 agreements with Luke 924, 1004, 1005
 allegory 872, 873, 878
 authorship 844–5
 Christology 1009
 comparison with other gospels 1014–26
 date and place of origin 845 and Didache 852, 855, 1309–10
 finger-printing technique 1005
 as first gospel 1002–3 genre and moral instruction 847–8 irony 881, 883
 Jewish background 834, 845, 846, 1009
 miracles of Jesus 857–8, 863–4
 parables of Jesus 861–2, 870, 872 passion and resurrection 879–86
 Proto-Matthew 1004
 relationship to 5 Ezra 776, 777
 Sermon on the Mount (Beatitudes) 846, 852–7
 Matthew (tax collector) 858
 Matthias 1031
 Medes 450, 525, 567, 632
 Media 627, 628, 629–30, 632, 635 medicine 691, 802
 Megiddo 239, 1299
 Megillat Antiochus 620
 Megillot 529
Mekilta of Rabbi Ishmael 793–4, 808
 Melchizedek 50, 396, 1238, 1244, 1246–7
 Melito 1313 memorials 359 men creation 43–4
 Paul 1119
 relationship with woman 41, 44
 ritual purity 101
 Menahem (king of Israel) 258
 Menelaus (high priest)
 death of 747–8
 Hellenizers 721 imposition of the cult 741

- Menelaus (high priest) (cont.) not named in 1 Maccabees 713–14, 719 replacement of Onias 738 rule of 739–40, 746 seeking of high office 674, 680 and Simon 737
- Menken, M. J. J. 1213
- menstruation, ritual purity 94, 101
- Mephibosheth 210, 217, 220, 224, 226, 228
- Merari 271, 279–80
- Merarites 115, 117
- mercy
 of Christ as high priest 1240, 1243–4
 confession of sin 772
 divine 140, 595, 662, 664, 672, 673, 1100–1
 Elihu view of God 350
 Last Judgement 784
 Pastoral Epistles 1222
 Sermon on the Mount 935
- Merodach 524
- Merodach-Baladan 262, 550
- Meroz 181
- Mesaloth 723
- Mesha (king of Moab) 249–50, 271, 384
- Mesha Stone 142, 156, 164
- Meshach 706
- Meshech 398, 555, 559
- Mesopotamia
 divinatory texts 445
 divine warrior 560
 Job (book) 332
 law codes 106, 108 law collections 29–30 legal codes 82, 83
 Tower of Babel 48
- Messiah
see also Christ; Jesus
 apocalyptic literature 799
 1 Chronicles 269
 companions of 782
 Davidic line 448, 787, 874, 912
 Ephesians 1174
 4 Ezra 780, 781–2, 783
 5 Ezra 778
 false 913, 914, 1217
 ideal monarchical ruler 460
 Jesus as 865, 975–6, 980, 1034, 1155
 John's Gospel 984, 998
 Luke's Gospel 956
 Mark's Gospel 902, 904, 909, 918
 Matthew's Gospel 865, 874
 Jewish expectations 1067
 Jewish tradition 841 just and righteous ruler 451 Pharisees' view 874
 pre-existence of 783, 787
 prophecies 367, 373, 380, 387, 397, 448
 psalms 367, 373, 380, 387, 397
 Revelation 1293, 1294, 1305
 Second Temple period 624
 Sirach 695, 697
 son of God 783, 788
 suffering 939, 1033
 victory over demonic forces 1240 Word as 963
 messiahship, Jesus Christ 1155 messianic banquet 799, 816–17
 Messianic Rule 799, 816–17
 messianic secret, Mark's gospel 890, 891, 902–3 messianic woes 781, 785, 789, 816
 metaphors agricultural 1114 architectural 1139–40 blessings of tribes 156 bread of life 973
 Christ and church in Ephesians 1169 for divine power 504
 Ephesians 1173, 1178
 Ezekiel (book) 534, 553, 556
 Isaiah (book) 446
 for Israel 545
 Jeremiah's prophecy 492
 John's Gospel 960, 973
 judgement 407, 446
 life 409
 light and darkness 1275 living water 973
 Philemon (book) 1234
 psalms 355, 402
 river 446
 sacrifice of Isaac 1252
 Song of Solomon 429, 430, 432
 use in Jude 1286 meteorology 352
 Metheg-ammah 220
 Meunites 295, 300
 Mica 220
 Micah (book) 595–9
 God's requirement 598
 Israel among the nations 597–8 Judah condemned 596–7 lament for loss of society 598–9
 Micah (founding of Dan) 188
 Micah (prophet) 510, 595, 596
 Micaiah 248, 294
 Michael (archangel)
 Angel of the Presence 631
 Israel's patron angel 569, 570
 Jude 1285
 prince of princes 568
 Revelation 1296–7
 Michal 209, 215, 216, 218–19, 276
 Michmash 206–7, 725
 Midian 55, 70
 Midianites 61, 118, 129, 131–2, 182–3
 Midrash 290, 299, 373, 793–4 midwives 70
 Mighty One of Jacob 65
 Miletus 1053, 1054
 Milgrom, J. 92, 96, 98 millennium
 4 Ezra 783
 Revelation 1302–3
 1 Thessalonians 1202, 1209
 2 Thessalonians 1214, 1218
 Millo 256
 miracles
 of the apostles 1033, 1326, 1328 divine endorsement of Paul's mission 1052 Elisha 250–1
 of God 1159
 syncretistic activity distinction 1052 transmutation 665
 miracles of Jesus
 blind men 858, 871, 902, 908, 951, 978 calming the storm 857, 896–7, 938 Canaanite woman 864 compared to miracles of apostles 1328 context 887 crippled woman healed 945 deaf mute man healed 858, 901 epileptic child 905 exorcism of demons 857, 860, 866 feeding the five thousand 863, 898–9, 939, 971 feeding the four thousand 864, 901
 haemorrhaging woman 858, 897, 938 healed man at Beth-zatha 969–70 healed royal official's son 969, 1020 Jairus' daughter raised 858, 897, 938 leper healed 857, 891, 933, 949 man with withered hand 860, 893, 934 paralysed man healed 858, 891, 933–4
 Peter's mother-in-law healed 890, 933
 Pharisees' demand 861, 864, 901
 Roman officer's slave healed 857, 935, 1018–20
 walking on the water 863, 899, 972, 1022–4 water turned into wine 965 widow's son raised 935–6
 Miranda, J.P. 69
 Miriam 77, 112, 119, 271, 513, 1241 mirror, God as 659
 Mishaël (royal wise man) 564
 Mishaël (Song of the Three Jews) 706
 Mishnah 624, 793
 on causing nuisance to neighbours 813
 divorce 685
 Great Sanhedrin 811
 interpretation of psalms 357
 law in Second Temple period 796, 797 prescribed prayer 567 Prosbol of Hillel 811–12
 psalms 359
 religious associations 804–5, 825
 wisdom literature 800
 work 674 missionaries in early church 1283
 Matthew's gospel 859
 Paul 1074–5, 1106
 Mithredath 311, 757
 Mithridates I (king of Parthia) 730 Mizpah 190 battle of 204
 Deuteronomistic History 200
 Ishmael 520
 Persian governor 319
 1 Samuel (book) 198, 200, 203, 204
 Tell en-Nasbeh in Benjamin 574
 Mizpah of Moab 210
 Moab covenant in the land of 153
 David 210, 220
 and Israel (kingdom of) 126–9, 249–50
 Jeremiah's Oracles Against the Nations 523 judgement on 583 oppressed by Omri 384 oracles in Ezekiel (book) 552
 Ruth 192–3
 Moabites 53
 and Assyrians in Judith 637
 Ehud 179–80
 exclusion from local assemblies 150 hostility to 456
 Israel's territorial claims 138
 and Judah 295
 Lot 50
 Mesha Stone 142, 164
 mixed marriage in post-exilic Jerusalem 317
 Nehemiah 322
 Ruth 192–3
 Samuel 206
 Modein 715, 716, 724, 726, 748
 Molech 103
 monarchy
see also kingship Abimelech (son of Gideon) 183–4
 astral cults 140
 bound to temple 495
 1 Chronicles 269–70
 Davidic 487, 507, 516
 Esther (book) 326

- failure of 506
 Gideon 183
 law in Deuteronomy 148
 local assemblies in Judah 150 misdeeds 507 post-exile return to Jerusalem 314 responsibilities 506–7
 restoration 504, 516
 rule by the grace of God 657–8
 Samuel (books) 197–8, 203–8 training 422
 wisdom 653, 657–8
 monologues, Song of Solomon 432
 monotheism
 Book of the Covenant 83
 competition between the gods on Mount Carmel 246
 Deuteronomistic confession 139, 140
 Ephesians 1168, 1173
 in Greek philosophy 1050
 Isaiah (book) 466
 Judaism 1186
 Old Testament theme 9
 origin stories 41
 Pastoral Epistles 1226
 Paul 1121
 Revelation 1302
 Shema 142
 Solomon's temple 238, 239
 Song of Moses 154–5
 Ten Commandments 81
 theme in Jeremiah (book) 498 theology of Exodus 68
 1 Thessalonians 1200
 monsters, Revelation 1297–8
 Moore, C. A. 643, 644, 645, 648, 649 morality church at Corinth 1109, 1116–17 culture of psalms 366 guardianship 410 inverted by evil men 408 knowledge of God 1090
 Old Testament 10
 Romans (book) 1106
 of Universe 343
 upheld by God 412
 Mordecai 325, 327–30, 642, 643–9
 Moreh, oak of 49
 Moreseth 596
 Moriah, Mount 54, 285, 810
Mors Pilati 1322
 Mosaic law animal slaughter 47
 Christian communities 1196
 Matthew's Gospel 846
 redefined 1164 requirements of 1158, 1163
 Moses 388, 1230
 as accuser of unbelievers 971
 apocalyptic literature 788
 authorship of Pentateuch 15, 20 birth story 70
 Blessing of 64, 156
 Book of Jubilees 794
 call 70–2
 as character in Exodus 67 comparison with Paul's ministry 1138
 death of 156
 disobedience at Kadesh 124–5 end of leadership 139
 Ephesians 1174
 as example of faith 1240–1, 1252 farewell speech 992
 genealogy 72–3
 hagiography 805–6, 826
 intercession at Mount Horeb 143–4
 Isaiah (book) 482–3
 justification by works 1102 land settlement issues 132
 leadership 119–20
 Malachi (book) 617
 Matthew's Gospel 850
 as mediator 141, 1160
 miraculous fire 736
 Mosaic law compared with Jesus' teaching 975
 as orator 138 Poem (Song) of 137, 154–6
 psalms 358, 391, 393
 Revelation 1295
 role as judge 79 shining face of 90
 at Sinai 88–90, 1100
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 694
 Song of 1299
 special relationship with God 112, 119, 141, 1241
 Stephen's speech 1037
 transfer of leadership to Joshua 130, 160 transfiguration 866, 904, 940, 941
 typology 1033
 war with Midianites 132
 wisdom literature 661, 801
 Mot 337, 342, 381, 407, 408, 577 moth and worm metaphor 475
 Mount Sinai see Sinai Mourners for Zion 804
 mourning
 Amos (book) 585, 586, 589
 Ecclesiastes 426
 priests 704
 rites 146, 530
 Mowinkel, S. 357, 488
 Multiple-Level hypothesis 1005
 Mumford, Lewis 310
 Muratorian Canon 619, 652 murder
 Cain and Abel 45
 cities of refuge 172 distinguished from unpremeditated killing 134, 172 expiation for unresolved 149
 Ten Commandments 82
 Murphy-O'Connor, Jerome 1072–3 music ark brought to Jerusalem 276
 psalms 359
 trumpets 105–6, 118, 163
 mustard seed parable 862, 896, 946 mystery, Paul and 1172, 1195 mystical theology, Paul 1113 mythology abode of El 345
 chaos-dragon 335
 Isaiah (book) 454, 456
 Judean, Daniel (book) 567
 Naamah 335
 Naaman (Aramean General) 251
 Nabal 183, 212
 Nabateans 718, 724, 728, 747
 Nabonidus (king of Babylon) 564, 565, 566, 701
 Nabopolassar (king) 632
 Naboth 247, 254
 Nachon 275
 Nadab (king of Israel) 242, 244
 Nadab (Nadin) 631, 632
 Nadab (son of Aaron) 99, 101
 Nadabath 724
 Nadin 631, 632
 Nag Hammadi 1316, 1319, 1329
 Nahash the Ammonite 205
 Nahum (book) 262, 599–601
 Naioth 209
 nakedness
 2 Corinthians 1140
 Ham and Noah 47
 shame at 41
 Namar 342
 Naomi 192–5
 Naphtali (son of Jacob) 57
 Naphtali (tribe)
 Blessing of Jacob 65
 1 Chronicles 271–2
 Solomon 237
 territory allocation 171
 Tobit 628
 Nathan (prophet) covenant with David 277 oracle of 200
 parable 221–2
 prophecy 391
 2 Samuel (book) 219
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 695
 Solomon 235, 236, 288
 Nathanael 964–5, 998 nation, Abraham 49 national identity
 Exodus (book) 68
 Genesis 39, 41
 Passover 75
 threat to Israel's 142 nationalism
 Judges (book) 177
 returned exiles in Judah 321 nationality, table of the nations 47–8 nations
 see also Oracles Against the Nations God's relation to all 578 warning to all 596–8 nativity of Jesus see Jesus Christ, birth Nazareth 922, 924, 929, 932–3
 nazirites
 Amos (book) 583–4
 Paul 1055
 Samson 177, 185
 Samuel 201
 Nazoreans 850
 Neapolis 1179
 Nebo, Mount 156
 Nebuchadnezzar I (king of Babylon) 307, 563, 564, 565–6 see also Nebuchadrezzar attack on Judea in Judith (book) 632, 634, 635–6, 639
 Baruch (book) 700, 701
 Judean gold 316 and king Joiakim 756
 Prayer of Azariah 707
 Susanna (story) 708
 vessels from the temple 311
 Nebuchadnezzar II (king of Babylon) 264 Nebuchadrezzar (king of Babylon) see also Nebuchadnezzar advance to Jerusalem 506 agent of YHWH 509
 Allegory of the Cedar 546
 Ezekiel (book) 534, 542, 549–50
 Jeremiah's exile in Egypt 521
 oracles in Ezekiel (book) 553–4, 558–9
 origin of name 472
 Nebuzaradan 519, 520
 Necho (Pharaoh) 263–4, 755
 Necho II (Pharaoh) 547

- necromancy 103–4
 Negeb 501, 549, 552
 Nehemiah
 in Babylonia 318
 1 Chronicles 270
 1 Esdras 761
 Ezra and Nehemiah (books) 309, 310
 Golah List 312
 people's covenant 321–2 Persian court 310 rebuilding of Jerusalem 470, 754 restoration of the temple 736 return to Judah 318–20, 322–3
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 696
 Nehemiah (book) 308–11, 318–23
 Chronicles 267
 1 Esdras 625, 751–4, 760–1
 Golah List 312
 Nehushtan 260, 303
 neighbours 408–9, 813
 Nephilim 46, 809
 Ner 272
 Nero 791, 1288, 1297–8, 1300 Nerva 787
 net parable 862
 Nethaneel 269
 New Jerusalem 614–15
 new and old parable 934
 New Testament
 see also gospels background 833–6
 canon 3–4
 Christian church depicted in 836–40 collation of books and letters 830, 831 corporate origin 830–3
 Greek language 830, 833
 Jewish background 833–4, 840
 links with Didache 1309 origin of writings 832 piecemeal growth 831 racial tension 840 relationship with Old Testament 832–3 role in Christian life 832, 839 themes from Numbers 113 translations 830–1 use of the Apocrypha 618–19 view of Isaiah 434
 worship forms 839
 New Testament apocrypha 1315–29 genres of literature 1315
 Gnosticism 1318
 Jesus birth stories 1319
 Jesus' childhood 1319–20 relationship to canonical New Testament 1316, 1317 Newer Documentary Hypothesis see
 Documentary Hypothesis
 Nicanor (governor of Cyprus) 742, 746
 Nicanor (Syrian officer) as Holofernes in Judith (book) 633
 1 Maccabees 716, 722
 2 Maccabees 734–5, 742–3, 744, 748–50
 Nicodemus 966–7, 983, 996, 1315, 1321
 Nicolaitans 1291–2
 Nicolaus 1291
 Nicopolis 1233
 Nile 522
 Nimrod 598
 Nineveh 593 attack on 600–1
 Jonah 594, 606
 Judith (book) 632, 635
 Nahum (book) 599
 as prostitute 601
 Tobit (book) 627, 628, 631, 632
 Noadiah 180, 320
 Noah 335, 1273
 1 Chronicles 269
 division of world among sons of 809
 as example of faith in Hebrews (book) 1252
 Flood 46–7
 Isaiah (book) 478
 origin of name 45
 paragon of virtue in Ezekiel (book) 544–5
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 694
 wisdom 661
 Nob 188, 210–11
 Nod 45
 Nogah 270
 nomadism 177 nomistic paraenesis, Deuteronomy 136–7, 144
 non-believers contact with 1141–2 marriage to 1119
 speaking in tongues 1129
 Noth, Martin 23–4, 39, 199, 200 novel genre 1029–30
 numbers
 creation 662
 significance in Revelation 1298, 1304 symbolism of (gematria) 1312–13 Numbers (book) 110–34 quoted in psalm 385–6 redaction criticism 33
 source 18
 Numenius son of Antiochus 729
 Nunc Dimittis 468
 Nympha 1198
 oaths Abraham 54
 and covenant 153 of God to Abraham 1245
 Job (book) 346–7
 misdirected 588
 New Testament 832
 Sermon on the Mount 854–5
 Sirach 681–2
 Obadiah (book) 590–3
 and Amos (book) 591 canonical context 591
 Day of YHWH 592
 and Jeremiah (book) 590 literary connections 590
 theology of 591
 Obadiah (minister to Ahab of Israel) 245
 Obadiah (prophet) 590
 Obed-edom (Levite) 281
 Obed-edom (the Gittite) 218, 275, 359 obedience divine blessing for 152 of faith 1088
 Jeremiah (book) 516–17
 and love 989
 proverbs 407
 rewards as result of 141–2 as route to deliverance 446, 475 to parents 1177
 Octavian 1179
 Oded 301
 Odenathus 789
 Odes
 Prayer of Manasseh 770 of Solomon 1186 offerings see also sacrifice descriptions 96–8 laws concerning 98–9, 104, 121, 130–1 memorial 359 on returning to cultic community 101
 OG
 Additions to Daniel 705
 Prayer of Azariah 706, 707
 Susanna (story) 708–9
 Og (king) 126, 132, 168, 174
 Oholah 550
 Oholibah 550
 Old Latin version 619 old and new allegory 892
 Old Testament
 canon 3–4, 5–6
 contents 8–9 history of law 30 origins 6–7 themes 9–11
 translations 7–8
 olive tree metaphor 1103 olive-tree people 612 Olives, Mount of 543 see also Gethsemane ascension account in Acts 1031
 David 224
 John's Gospel 993
 Luke's Gospel 952, 955
 Matthew's Gospel 880
 Olympios 740–1
 omnipotence 1101
 omnipresence 654
 omniscience 654, 693
 Omri (king of Israel) 244–5
 On the Kings of Judea 723
 Onan 61, 63, 269
 Onesimus 1082, 1192, 1197, 1233–4, 1235
 Onesiphorus 1228, 1231
 Onias (high priest)
 1 Maccabees 729
 2 Maccabees 737, 738, 740, 750
 Onias III (high priest) 674, 696
 2 Maccabees 739
 murder of 568, 569
 Onias IV 696, 735
 Ophel Hill 235 oppression
 Ecclesiastes 424–5
 Israelites in Egypt 69–70, 72 of poor 418
 2 Thessalonians 1215–16
 oppressors foreign 387 pagan 359 oracles Balaam 127–8
 David 219
 of doom 155
 Hosea (book) 576
 Micah (book) 599
 Old Testament 9 untrue 146
 Oracles Against the Nations
 Amos (book) 582, 584
 Isaiah (book) 449, 451
 Jeremiah (book) 488, 508–9, 522–6
 Nahum (book) 600
 Obadiah (book) 590
 Zechariah (book) 612, 613
 Zephaniah (book) 606
 oral tradition
 biblical criticism 2
 Pentateuchal study 21
 ordination ritual 87
 Oreb 390
 Origen 1307
 Additions to Daniel 705
 Barnabas 1311
 Baruch (book) 699

- 1 Maccabees 711
 pre-existent matter 662
 pre-existent soul 653
 Wisdom of Solomon 651
 origin stories 40–2 original sin 382, 196
 Eve 679
 evil inclination of humans 779
 Sirach 679, 684–5
 Orion (constellation) 352
 Ornan 278 orphans 439
 Orthodox canon 3 orthodoxy early Christian authorities 1306–8 as source for apocrypha 1327
 Orthosia 732
 Osorkon I (Pharaoh) 291 other-worldly journeys 1149
 Othniel 178, 179, 180
 Owen-Griesbach hypothesis 1002–3 oxen 83, 1122–3
 Oxford Annotated Bible 4
 Oxyrhynchus Papyrus 1308, 1309, 1316, 1318
 Ozem 269
- P see Priestly Work
 P. Köln 255 (fragmentary MS) 1316
 P. Oxy. see Oxyrhynchus Papyrus Paddan-aram 56, 58
 paganism
 apocryphal texts 1326
 Colossians 1191, 1196
 converts from 1266
 Israel (kingdom) 260
 literature 1307
 mythological themes 1296
 Paul's sermon at Lystra 1046 social issues 1221
 1 Thessalonians 1200
 Palestine impact of Greek culture 833
 law in Second Temple period 795–6
 post-Biblical Jewish literature 793–4 Palmyrenes 789
 pantheism 694
 Paphos 1044
 Papias (bishop of Hierapolis) 844
 Papyrus Insinger 423 Papyrus Murabba'at 811 parables
 Enoch 655
 Nathan's parable for David 221–2 as prophetic writing 442
 parables of Jesus dishonest steward 948 Dives and Lazarus 949
 fig tree 914, 945
 Good Samaritan 942 house builders 857 lamp 896 leaven 862
 lost sheep 867, 899, 947 mustard seed 862, 896, 946 net 862
 new and old 934
 New Testament apocrypha 1317
 pearl 862
 Pharisee and tax-collector 950 pounds 951–2 prodigal son 947–8 purpose in understanding 895 returning master 914 rich man 951
 salt and light 852, 853
- seed 896
 sheep and shepherds 979–80 sheepfold 988 sower 861, 894–6, 937 stone 910
 tares 862 tenants in the vineyard 872, 910, 952–3 three servants 878 treasure 862 the true vine 988–9 two debtors 936 two sons 872 unforgiving servant 867–8 vineyard 870 wedding feast 872, 945 wicked husbandmen 910 widow and judge 950 wineskins 858 wise and foolish virgins 877, 878 yeast 946
- Paradise
 Amos (book) 589
 4 Ezra 783
 Isaiah (book) 479
 as king's parks 318
 new Jerusalem 1304
 paraenesis 136–7, 144, 145–6, 1054
 paraklētos 987
 Paraleipomena 267 see also Chronicles parallelism Hebrew poetry 437 inevitability of prophecy/Israel's punishment 584
 Isaiah (book) 441, 470
 Paran, Mount 603
 paranaesis 1054 parents honour of 672, 682
 Ten Commandments 81
 parody
 2 Corinthians 1146–7
 Job 336–7
 parousia close at hand 1264, 1265
 Luke's Gospel 950, 951–2, 954
 Matthew's Gospel 871, 878
 Pastoral Epistles 1232
 Revelation 1292, 1300
 1 Thessalonians 1205, 1209
 2 Thessalonians 1213, 1216
parrhēsia 1182
 Parthia 719, 730, 731–2
 Parthians 622, 1293 particularistic religion 1065, 1068 Paschal Homily 1313 paschal lamb 993, 994
 Pashur (priest) 505
 Passion
 John's Gospel 992–6
 Luke's Gospel 939, 951
 Mark's Gospel 903, 905, 907–8, 915–21
 Matthew's Gospel 879–86
 Passion Gospel 1320 passions, Sirach 675, 679, 682
 Passover 561
 circumcision 162
 coming of the Spirit 1031 of Egypt 75–6
 Esther (Greek) 645
 festival 131 Festival of Unleavened Bread 105 at Gilgal 163
 Hezekiah 302, 306
 Jesus 879, 954, 982–3
- Josiah 306, 754–5
 lamb 76, 147, 964
 Mark's Gospel 915–16
 psalms 397
 return to Jerusalem after exile 315, 764 at Sinai 117
 yeast 1116
 Pastoral Epistles 1220–33
 authorship 1220–1
 language of Paul's letters 1228
 Timothy 1221–6, 1227–9
 Titus 1231–3
 pastoral responsibility
 Paul 1074
 Roman church 1085 patience
 Ephesians 1173
 of Job 333
 until Coming of the Lord 1261 Patmos 1290 patriarchal narratives 24 patriarchs
 see also Abraham; Isaac; Jacob promise of descendants 69 significance of descent from 459
 wisdom 660–1
 patriarchy 356, 1176–7 patronage 1144, 1146, 1149
 Paul (apostle)
 see also letters of Paul; Saul (Paul) Arabia 1155 authenticity of letters 1198, 1219
 authority
 1 Corinthians 1109, 1115–16, 1122, 1131
 2 Corinthians 1134, 1137–9, 1145–50
 Galatians (book) 1153
 Pastoral Epistles 1221
 Romans (book) 1089, 1106
 1 Thessalonians 1204
 Barnabas 1156
 boasting 1136, 1143, 1144, 1146, 1148, 1183, 1203, 1215
 brotherly love 1208
 Caesar 1057–8
 Caesarea 1054, 1056–9
 Colossians (book) 1191
 conscience questions 1122 conversion 1039–40, 1055–6, 1058, 1065–6, 1131, 1155
 Corinth 1109, 1111, 1115, 1132, 1134, 1149
 Crete 1231
 cultural adaptability 1123
 death of 1182, 1230
 Ephesus 1052–3
 as exemplar 1230 faith 602
 financial support 1122–3
 Fool's Speech 1146–9
 formative years 1068–70, 1071
 Galatian churches 1153, 1161
 Gentiles 1046, 1051, 1058, 1157, 1174–5, 1224, 1308 hymns 1193–4
 idolatry 1124–5
 illness of 1161 imprisonment 1171, 1180, 1182, 1192, 1203, 1228, 1233
 interdependence of men and women 1126
 interpretation 1062–4, 1066, 1078, 1083
 Jerusalem 1040, 1052, 1054–6
 Jesus commitment to 1235 confidence in 1182 slave of 1154 vision of 1191

- Paul (apostle) (cont.)
 Judaism 1054–5, 1058, 1060–1, 1066, 1087, 1088, 1155
 Judeans 1205 justification 785 Laodiceans 1198
 last words 1061
 laying on of hands 1228
 leadership 1114–15 literary legacy 1062–3 Lystra 1046
 missionary journeys first 1044–6 second 1048–51 third 1051–4
 Mosaic law 1196
 mystery 1171–2, 1195 opposition 1183, 1225, 1230 patronage 1144, 1146, 1149
 Pentateuch as covenant 13 persecution of church by 1155
 Peter at Antioch 1157–8
 Philemon 1234
 Philippian church 1049, 1189, 1190
 Praetorian contacts 1190
 prayers 1168–9, 1206, 1211 preaching 1074
 rhetoric 1135, 1233
 Roman citizen 1049, 1056, 1057–8
 Rome 1059–61
 sexual relations 1116, 1118–19 sinfulness 1222–3 slavery 1197
 speeches
 Agrippa and Bernice 1058–9
 Areopagus 1050
 Ephesian elders 1053–4 synagogue 1045–6
 temple 1055–6
 style of letters 1075–8
 suffering 1136, 1139, 1142, 1149, 1195
 tearful letter 1134, 1136
 theology 1063, 1078–81, 1085, 1112–13
 Thessalonica 1203–5
 tolerance 1105–6 wealth 1143
 women's speech 1130
Pax Romana 1210
 peace
 Colossians 1196
 greeting in 2 Thessalonians 1215
 Jesus 990
 1 Thessalonians 1210
 peace offering 97 pearl parable 862
 Pedaiah 269, 270
 Pekah (king of Israel) 258, 300
 Pekahiah (king of Israel) 258
 Pelatiah 542
 Pelethites 220, 224, 227, 235 penitence
 psalms 381
 Zephaniah (book) 605
 penitential prayer, Prayer of Manasseh 770
 Pentateuch
 biblical criticism 2 composite authorship 15–16 dating of sources 16, 18–20, 31, 34–5 definitions 12–13, 37–8
 Documentary Hypothesis 13–15, 19–20, 30–7
 Ezekiel (book) 548
 found by Josiah 305–6
 Genesis 38–9
 Greek parallels 35
 law 8, 12–13, 366, 796–7 literary genre 39
 preliterary origins 20–5
 psalms 395
 redaction criticism 32–3 relationship to Chronicles 268
 Samuel (book) 197
 source-criticism logic 15–16
 Supplementary Hypothesis 13–15, 33–4, 37 theology of sources 25–8 translation into Greek 618
 Pentecost 581, 1031–2
 Penuel 183, 242
 Perez 61, 195 perfection of Christ through suffering 1240, 1247 levitical priesthood 1246
 Matthew's Gospel 869–70
 Pergamum 1291–2
 peripety (reversal of fortunes) 325 Perizzites 50, 317
 perjury 413, 419
 Persepolis 743
 Perseus (king of Macedon) 722 perseverance 1245
 Persia (Parthia) 719, 730
 Persian empire
 Alexander the Great 621
 as conquerors 469
 edict of Cyrus 311
 Ezra and Nehemiah 309, 310
 Jews as minority in 324, 325–6, 327–30, 642–9
 Job (book) 332
 return to Judah of Jews 313–15, 317, 319–21, 756–64
 pesah 147
 Pesher Habakkuk 793, 807
 pesher-exegesis 793 pessimism 424
 Peter (apostle)
 see also Gospel of Peter
 Acts of Peter 1323
 Aeneas 1040
 as an apostle to the circumcised 1157 authority in church 1031, 1035, 1040 before the Sanhedrin 1034, 1182 called by Jesus 890, 893, 933 called Cephas (Rock) by Jesus 893, 999 Corinthian church 1111 and Cornelius 1041, 1047
 death of 1182
 denial of Jesus 880, 882, 917, 919, 956, 986, 993–4 eating with Gentiles 1157 healing ministry 1033, 1035, 1040–1 interprets psalm 372
 inverse crucifixion 1324
 Jesus and 921, 964, 985, 999, 1032, 1033
 leadership 114
 Messiah 865, 902–3, 904, 939
 miraculous escape from prison 1043 mother-in-law healed 857, 890, 933
 Paul and 1071, 1157, 1158
 preaching to Gentiles 1041–2 at revelation of risen Christ 999 special role, Luke's gospel 933 speech after healing of lame beggar 1033 speech before the Council 1035 speech on Day of Pentecost 1032 testimony before Apostolic Council 1047 at the tomb 997
 1 Peter 1263–70
 authorship 1263
 date 1263
 prooemium 1264
 2 Peter 1270–4
 authorship 1271–2
 canonicity 1270–1
 dating 1271
 exordium 1272
 Jude relationship 1270
 peroratio 1272–4
 1 Peter relation 1270
 probatio 1272–4
 Pethuel 579
 Phaltiel 776, 781
 Pharaoh
 see also Neco; Osorkon; Shishak
 Abraham 49–50
 destruction 76–7
 Ezekiel (book) 553, 554
 'hardening of heart' 73, 74
 Jacob 63
 Joseph 61–2
 killing of baby boys 69–70
 King Bombast 522
 parallel with Canaanite kings 168
 Solomon 236
 Pharaoh's daughter, Solomon 236, 240, 287
 Pharisees
 adultery law 709
 apocalyptic literature 799 appointment of Simon as priest and ruler 731 controversies with Jesus
 Mark's gospel 891, 892
 Matthew's gospel 860, 863, 873, 874 demand for miracle 901
 emergence of 624
 Fourth Gospel 963–4, 978
 hand-washing 899–900
 hypocrisy 863, 874–5, 944
 immortality 655–6
 Jesus' death plot 893
 Jesus' reply 948–9
 leaven 864–5, 901–2
 liturgy 803
 Maccabean revolt 715
 Matthew's gospel 845
 Nicodemus 966
 parable 950
 Paul 1069
 piety in Judith 634
 religious associations 805
 Sabbath law 946
 Sadducees and 653, 709
 Stoicism 650
 warning to Jesus 946
 Philbis 668, 672, 673, 687
 Philadelphia (brotherly love) 1208
 Philadelphian church 1292
 Philemon (book) 1233–6
 Colossians 1192
 position in chronology 1073
 writing style 1075–6
 Philetus 1223, 1229
 Philip (apostle) 964
 Philip (evangelist) 1038, 1039, 1054
 Philip (regent of Syria) 720–1, 744, 748
 Philip (the Phrygian) 714, 716
 Philip II (king of Macedon) 1179
 Philip V (king of Macedon) 722 Philippi 1203
 background in Philippians 1179
 Paul's second missionary journey 1049
 Philippians (book) 1179–90 appeal for unity 1183–4
 authorship 1180
 exhortations on discipleship 1183–6, 1187–9
 knowledge of God 1181–2

- position in chronology 1073
 Stoic language 1180
 Philistia 545
 Philistines
 Abraham 53
 ark of the covenant 202–3 culture 186
 Dagon 188
 David 208–9, 213–14, 218–20, 228, 229, 274, 275
 Ezekiel (book) 552
 Isaac 55–6
 Isaiah (book) 450
 Jeremiah's Oracles Against the Nations 523
 Nadab of Israel 244
 Samson 186–8
 Samuel 204, 206
 Saul 206–7, 211, 214, 273
 Syro-Ephraimite War 259
 use of term in Genesis 40 Philo of Alexandria 1162
 commandments 671
 God as the Architect of the Cosmos 807
 Logos 683, 1238, 1243
 Moses 694, 805, 1037
 On the Creation of the World 807–8
 Paul 1189
 Plato 793
 pre-existent soul 660 sacrifice 689
 Therapeutae 804, 825
 wisdom literature 800
 Wisdom of Solomon 650, 652
 philosophy
 Job (book) 333
 4 Maccabees 791
 Wisdom of Solomon 625, 650–1
 Phinehas (son of Eleazar) 129, 131, 670, 695, 715
 Phinehas (son of Eli) 201, 203
 Phoebe 1225
 Phoenicia
 Syro-Ephraimite War 259
 Tyre 583
 Phoenicians
 Ahab (king of Israel) 245
 Ezekiel (book) 552
 Solomon's temple 237, 238, 284
 Solomon's wealth 240 phoenix 1314
 Phrygia 1048
 Phygelus 1228 phylacteries 875 physicians 691 physiognomy 802, 820–1
 piety
 Judith (book) 633–4, 638, 641
 Pastoral Epistles 1221, 1227
 Sirach 674
 pigs 100
 Pilate
 Acts of Pilate 1321, 1322–3
 trial of Jesus 882, 883, 919, 923, 956, 994–5 Pilatus, Mount 1322 pilgrimage
 Deuteronomy 148
 psalms 361, 399
Pilgrimage of Etheria 1329
 pillar of cloud and fire 76, 117–18
 pioneer settlement model of history of Israel 177
Pirquei 'Abot (Chapter of the Fathers) 800, 817–18 Pisgah 156
 plagues
 Assyrians before Jerusalem 261
 David 229–30
 Egypt 73–5, 661–2, 663, 664–6
 Philistines 203
 Revelation 1294, 1299 plants, creation of 42, 43
 Plato
 creator 662
 Hebrews homilist 1247, 1249
 4 Maccabees 790
 pesher-exegesis 793
 pre-existent soul 660
 providence 664
 Wisdom of Solomon 650–1
 Pleiades (constellation) 352
 Pliny 1314
 Plutarch 1208, 1221, 1224 poetry
 Hebrew 355
 Jeremiah (book) 512
 Jewish wisdom poetry 652
 Moses' poem 154–6 in Pentateuch 77 problems of historical dating 479
 psalms 358
 Sumerian 400 pointed text 7 pollution see ritual purity polyandry 873
 Polybius 1324
 Polycarp influence of apocrypha 619 letters of 1220
 Philippians 1180
 use of 1 Clement 1314 Polychrome Bible 18 polygamy 684, 685, 1224 polytheism
 Antiochus IV 714
 Colossians 1194
 Song of Moses 155
 Ten Commandments 81
 Pompey 622, 1217
 poor (people) concern for 672–3 faith and needs of 1259
 God as father of 690 iniquity with rich 677
 Israelite culture 363
 James (book) 1256, 1258
 Jesus' concern for 1011 oppression of 1261
 proverbs 412
 Psalms (book) 370
 Sirach 672–3, 676, 677, 680, 690
 Porcius Festus see Festus possessions
 Mark's Gospel 907
 Matthew's Gospel 856
 post-Biblical Jewish literature 792–828 post-critical movements 2–3 Potiphar 61 potters
 idolatry 664
 Isaiah (book) 471
 Romans (book) 1101
 pounds parable 951–2 power
 Colossians 1193, 1195
 Ephesians 1169
 of God 504, 525
 1 Thessalonians 1203
 in weakness 1139, 1145, 1150 Praise of the Fathers 694–6 prayer
 of all community members 1262
 Aramaic 1306
 Baruch (book) 701–2
 confession of sin 770
 Coptic tradition 1310
 Daniel 568
 in early church 1034 of elders for the sick 1261–2
 Esther (Greek) 643, 647
 Ezra 317, 321, 785
 functions of 1256
 Jesus 856, 942–3, 990–2, 1024–6, 1244
 Judith 638–9
 for knowledge in Ephesians 1173 Mishnah 567
 for 'non-terminal' sin 1280
 Pastoral Epistles 1223
 Persian period 567
 post-Biblical Jewish literature 802–4, 821–4 Prayer of Azariah 707
 psalms 359
 Sirach 674, 681–2, 690
 Tobit (book) 629–30
 Wisdom of Solomon 651, 660
 Prayer of Azariah 626, 706–7
 Prayer of Ezra 321, 785
 Prayer of Joseph 681
 Prayer of Manasseh 619, 625, 770–2
Prayer of Nabonidus 566
Prayer of Rabbi Simeon bar Yohai 799
 pre-existent matter 662 preaching, Paul 1073, 1074
Preaching of Peter 1315 precatio summi sacerdotis 990–1 predetermination 570
 prescripts 1076, 1110–11 pride converts at Corinth 1113, 1115 overthrow of nations 676
 proverbs 412
 sinfulness of 417
 priesthood
 see also high priesthood; Levites Christ 1240, 1243–9
 1 Chronicles 271
 dating of P 18–19
 determination of adultery guilt 115–16 distinction from Levites 615, 616 divine judgement of 457
 Golah List 312
 Hasmoneans 622 honour due to 675 house of Eli 201–2
 initiation of Aaron 99
 Israel (kingdom) 290
 Jerusalem under Seleucid rule 322, 621–2
 Joash 297–8
 Jonathan as high priest 726
 law in Deuteronomy 148–9
 Levi ancestor of tribe of 616
 Levitical laws 104
 Melchizedek 1244, 1246
 mourning 704
 princes of the sanctuary 469 responsibilities 98–9, 123, 279–80, 1248 return from Babylonian exile 761 rights to financial support 303
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 694–5 skin infections 100 vestments 86–7
 Zadokite 561, 696
 Priestly Benediction 802–3
 Priestly Blessing 803
 Priestly Work (P) source creation accounts 17
 dating 18–20, 31, 95

- Priestly Work (P) source (cont.)
 Exodus (book) 68, 75
 Hupfeld, Hermann 14
 Leviticus 92–3 nature 33–4
 theology 25, 28
 primal couple 341
 Priscilla (Prisca) 1050, 1052, 1191, 1231 Procla 1322 procreation 1327 prodigal son parable 947–8 Prometheus 333 promise to Abraham see covenant prophecy
 see also prophets of the cross 393
 cultic mythology 380
 Deuteronomistic school 156 divine origins 1273 ecstatic speech identified with 1032
 exegesis 611
 first person accounts 443, 446, 452
 genre 9
 Habakkuk (book) 602
 history 200, 202
 incitement to apostasy 146
 interpretation of psalms 357, 358
 Isaiah 436, 437
 Joel (book) 580
 Messiah 481
 parables as 442
 Paul 1054, 1129
 2 Peter 1272
 Revelation 1289, 1291
 Second Temple period 623, 624
 Sirach 684, 690, 692
 Prophets (Hebrew Scripture) 6, 618
 prophets see also names of individual prophets;
 prophecy
 aexamples 1252–3, 1261
 apocalyptic literature 799
 Asa (king of Judah) 291–2
 Baasha (king of Israel) 244 condemnation by prophet Micah 597 danger from 447 Deborah 180–1
 divine judgement of 457
 Elisha 250–3
 false 507, 856–7, 877, 914, 1217
 female 180
 God's watchmen over Ephraim 576
 Isaiah 440
 Jeremiah (book) 507, 508
 Jeroboam I (king of Israel) 242 killing of 1205
 1 and 2 Kings 232, 233–4
 laws in Deuteronomy 149
 Omri dynasty of Israel 244, 245–9, 252–4 of peace 544 persecution of 1261
 physical translocation 541 role reinforced 584
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 695–6
 Solomon 288
 suffering 505 task 595
 temple musicians 281 propitiation of Gentiles 791–2 Proshul 797, 811–12 proselytism 1041, 1068, 1069 prostitution
 cult 574, 703–4, 741 house of Eli 201
 law in Deuteronomy 150
 proverbs 410
 Rahab 161
 Sirach 686
 Protarchos 745
 Protestantism
 Apocrypha 618, 619
 Romans (book) 1083, 1099
Protevangelium of James 1315, 1319
 Proto-Matthew 1004
 proto-Zechariah 610, 611, 612, 613
 Proverbs (book) 405–22
 authorship 406
 dates 406
 Egyptian texts 405–6
 First Solomonic Collection 412–18
 Instruction of Amen-em-ope 418 and Micah (book) 598–9
 Sayings of Agur 421–2
 Sayings of the Wise 418–19
 Second Solomonic Collection 419–21 and Sirach 667–8
 Solomon as author 237
 wisdom literature 9, 801
 Words of Lemuel 422
 proverbs
 Ephesians 1175, 1176
 numerical 682 used by exiles in Ezekiel (book) 546–7
 wisdom 680
 providence 664, 665
 prudence, Sirach 675, 679
 Psalm 151 618, 773
 Psalm of David 227
 Psalm of Thanksgiving 477
 Psalms (book) 9, 355–405
 classification 357, 360–2 culture 358, 362–4
 Davidic collection 359, 360, 371
 Elohistic collection 371 entrance liturgy 372
 imagery 364–5
 interpretation 355–8
 new year festival 362 numbering 366 penitential 369, 378, 381, 403 prophetic 371
 Psalm 151, 773
 Psalter 359–60, 365–6
 Second Temple period texts 802
 theology 365
 titles of psalms 358–9
 psalms
 chiastic form 389
 David and the ark 276
 David's Song of Thanksgiving 228–9
 Easter 397
 formulae used in 594
 Hannah's song 201
 Isaiah (book) 446, 448, 449, 461
 lament 599
 Lamentations 530
 metaphors 402
 royal 400–1
 Sirach 696–7
Psalms Scroll 773
Psalms of Solomon 652, 653
 Psalter
 development 359–60
 Elohistic 360 features in Lamentations 531
 Psammeticus 541, 551
 Psammeticus II 561
 Pseudepigrapha 624
 Pseudo-Clementine Letters 1314
 Pseudo-Matthew 1315, 1319 Pseudo-Phocylides 672
 pseudoeigraphy 1166
 Ptolemais 718, 719, 726, 727, 729, 741, 748
 Ptolemy II Philadelphus (king of Egypt) 618, 795
 Ptolemy IV Philopator (king of Egypt) 738, 774
 Ptolemy VI Philometor (king of Egypt) 726–7, 736, 740, 744
 Ptolemy VIII (VII) Euergetes II (Physcon) 667, 670, 732, 774
 Ptolemy Macron (governor of Coele-syria and Phoenicia) 743, 745 Ptolemy son of Dorymenes (governor of Coele-syria) 716, 739, 741, 742, 743, 745 Ptolemy son of Habbubus 733 Pul 271
 punishment see also retribution
 adultery 682
 after death
 4 Ezra 784
 Sirach 669, 671
 Wisdom of Solomon 656 appropriate to crimes committed 442 church at Corinth 1150
 curses for disobedience 108
 Ecclesiastes 427
 of Edom 461
 idolatry 663 illness as 687, 691
 Isaiah 437
 of Israel 778
 by God using foreign armies 453 of Exodus generation 138 as Godless nation 447 for golden calf episode 89
 Lamentations 532
lex talionis 106
 Mark's Gospel 906
 Micah (book) 598
 psalm 378
 selective 589
 Sermon on the Mount 854
 sin 661–2, 679
 in this life 686, 692
 Wisdom of Solomon 656
 purification after contact with corpses 123–4, 132 imagery in Ezekiel (book) 550
 red heifer ritual 123–4
 and remission of sin 444 Second Temple site 609 temple ceremony 930
 Purim 324–5, 327, 330, 642, 643, 649
 purity
 see also ritual purity
 of God 344
 2 Maccabees 737
 Mark's Gospel 899–900
 Matthew's Gospel 863–4
 religious associations 805, 825
 ritual 94
 Second Temple period 624
 1 Thessalonians 1207–8
 Q source 1003–4, 1316, 1317
 Qedushah 803, 823
 Qoheleth (the Teacher) 423–9
 quail 119
Questions of Bartholomew 1322
 Quirinius 929
 Qumran
 see also Dead Sea scrolls
 calendar 801

- community practices 1219
 Daniel (book) 704
 determinism 819
 early church 835, 837–8
 Guardian 824–5
 Habakkuk (book) 603
Halakic Letter 797
 hatred of sinners 677 honour of parents 672
 Isaiah 434
 The Letter of Jeremiah 703
 Maccabean revolt 715
 messianic banquet 817
 origins of sin 678
 Penal Code 824
 Pesharim 793
Prayer of Nabonidus 565
 prophecy 690
 Psalms 802
 religious institutions 805 rules 804, 824–5
 Ruth (book) 192
 sectarianism 624
 Susanna (story) 705
 war to end all wars 816
 Zechariah (book) 610, 613
 Qumran manuscripts see Dead Sea scrolls
- Rabbah 139, 221–2, 278, 523, 549
 Rabban Gamaliel the Elder see Gamaliel rabbinic Judaism anecdotes about teachers 806–7
 Apocrypha 620
 development 623
 and 4 Ezra 776
 fate after death 799 history of texts 624 human inclination for evil 778, 779, 801
 literature 620, 792
 martyr literature 806
 Messiah 783
 pesher-exegesis 793
 post-Biblical Jewish literature 793–4
 religious associations 804–5
 repentance 657
 souls after death 780
 Wisdom of Solomon 651
 Yabneh academy 776
 Rabshakeh 261, 303–4
 Rachel (wife of Jacob) 57–8, 185, 478, 512, 514
 Rad, Gerhard von 12, 22–4, 60
 Raddai 269
 Rages 627, 628, 630–1
 Raguel 629, 630, 631
 Rahab 338, 391
 4 Ezra 782
 James (book) 1260
 Jericho spy mission 161, 164
 Ram 269
 ram and goat vision 568
 Ramah 198, 201, 203, 243–4, 520
 Ramiel (archangel) 780
 Ramoth 253
 Ramoth-gilead 294
 Ramsay, William 1072
 Rapha 278
 Raphael (angel) 627, 629, 630–1
 Raphia 773, 774
 Raphon 719
 Rassites 632
 Raziel (angel) 802
 Razis 748, 749
re ut ruah 423, 424
 Rebekah (wife of Isaac) 54–5, 56, 185, 478 rebirth through the word 1265
 Rechab 217
 Rechabites 516–17 reconciliation
 Corinth 1137, 1141
 God's love 1094
 Jews and Gentiles 1167
 Red Sea, crossing of 76, 385, 388, 397
 redaction criticism 2, 32–3
 redemption bought by Christ 958, 1249 dedicated items 108–9 into the Christ Group (1 Peter) 1265
 Isaiah (book) 467, 470
 Job (book) 342–3
 Luke's Gospel 925–6, 958
 Old Testament theme 10
 Pastoral Epistles 1232
 Psalms (book) 373
 slaves 107
 Reformation
 Apocrypha 618, 619
 Romans (book) 1083
 refuge cities 133–4, 140, 149, 172
 Rehoboam (king of Judah) 241, 243, 288–90
 Rehun 313, 757 relationship maintenance 1088–9 religion-relationship antithesis 1101
 religious associations 804–5, 824–6 religious ecstasy 1140–1, 1148–9 religious fanatics
 Amos (book) 584–5
 Isaiah (book) 481
 religious persecution
 Antiochus IV 714–15, 740–2
 Christians 1038, 1067, 1069–70, 1290 religious phenomena, causes 1070
 religious schools 805, 825–6
 anecdotes about teachers 806–7, 828
 James (book) 1255–6
 Remiel (archangel) 631 remnant Arameans 451
 Haggai (book) 608–9
 Isaiah (book) 438, 442, 448, 472
 Micah (book) 597–8
 Nehemiah 321
 Zechariah (book) 615
 Rendtorff, R. 35–7
 repentance
 Canaanites 663
 church at Corinth 1142
 Ezekiel (book) 537, 555
 Hosea (book) 574–5, 578, 580
 Isaiah (book) 439
 Jeremiah (book) 488, 496, 504
 Job 354
 Luke's Gospel 947
 Matthew's Gospel 858
 of Nineveh 594
 Pastoral Epistles 1229
 Peter 1032, 1033, 1035
 repeated sin, Sirach 673
 salvation 785
 Wisdom of Solomon 657
 Rephaim (giants) 138–9
 Rephaim (place) 218, 229
 Repha'im (underworld deities) 408
 Rephaites 278
 Resheph 336
 rest goal of occupation narratives 161 God-given 457 promise of divine 1242–3 restoration 354
 Amos (book) 589
 Davidic monarchy 516
 Ezekiel (book) 555
 Isaiah (book) 436, 439, 440, 462
 Israel's hope of 153–4
 Jeremiah (book) 512–13
 Zechariah (book) 612
 resurrection
 apocalyptic literature 799
 body 817, 1110, 1130–2
 Daniel (book) 570
 Elijah, Sirach 695–6
 Ephesians 1167, 1170
 and immortality 656
 Isaiah (book) 456
 Israelite beliefs 364 Lazarus 981–2 martyrs 735, 742
 psalms 367, 372
 Revelation 1303
 of the righteous 781, 783–4 storehouse of souls 780
 Wisdom of Solomon 651, 656
 resurrection of Jesus
 1 Corinthians 1130–2
 denial by Sadducees 873–4, 911, 1034
 Ephesians 1174
 John's Gospel 985–6, 996–9
 Luke's Gospel 923, 958–9
 Mark's Gospel 911, 920–1
 Matthew's Gospel 873–4, 885–6
 Revelation 1288, 1297
 Romans (book) 1094
 retribution see also punishment
 Chronicles 268
 divine 661–2
 psalm 377
 Sirach 671, 686, 692, 697 returning master parable 914 Reuben (son of Jacob)
 birth of 57
 1 Chronicles 270
 Joseph sold into slavery 61
 Testament of Reuben 818
 Reuben (tribe)
 Blessing of Jacob 64
 1 Chronicles 270
 conquest of Canaan 181
 land settlement 132, 161
 rebellion 121
 Revelation (book) 1287–306
 apocalyptic literature 798, 799
 authorship 1288
 Babylon the harlot 1300–2 church grouping 837 Jewish hopes 834–5 messages to seven churches 1290–2
 New Jerusalem 1302–5
 scroll given to John 1295–6 seven bowls 1299
 seven seals 1293–4 seven trumpets 1294–6 vision of heaven 1292–3 and Zechariah (book) 612
 revelation
 apocalyptic literature 798, 799
 Colossians 1191
 of Decalogue at Mount Horeb 139, 140–1 dreams 689
 of faith 1160
 of God as the 'Son' 1237
 Jesus 885, 1154, 1237
 Numbers 112
 Paul 1149

- revelation (cont.)
 - proverbs 421
 - science 801
 - Son of Man 949–50
- rewards 141–2, 655–6, 657
- Rewritten Bible 794–5, 799–800, 810–11
- Rezin (king of Damascus) 240, 300, 301
- rhabdomancy (divination by sticks) 574
- rhetoric
 - deliberative 1143
 - Paul 1076–7, 1135, 1147
- Riblah 534
- rich man
 - call to discipleship 869–70, 907
 - parable 951
- rich people see wealth
- riddles, Samson's wedding 186
- right and left 428
- righteous (people)
 - hell, i Enoch 815
 - imagery of psalms 365
 - life 412
 - Proverbs (book) 412
 - psalms 363
 - resurrection of 783–4
 - rewards of 784, 785
 - violence against 419
- righteousness
 - believers state of 1099
 - by faith 1090
 - confession of sin 772
 - conquest of land by Israel 143
 - contrasted with sin in 1 John 1277
 - covenant 337
 - Davidic monarchy 516
 - demand for 381
 - Ecclesiastes 424
 - Ephesians 1178
 - everlasting name of 678
 - Ezekiel (book) 545, 547, 555
 - of God 378, 1099, 1103
 - Judaism 1101–2
 - Pastoral Epistles 1227
 - paths of 374
 - Paul 1079, 1188
 - premature death 656–7
 - proverbs 421
 - provided by heavenly high priest 1245
 - psalms 355–6, 387
 - requirement of kingship 507
 - Romans (book) 1089–90
 - Sermon on the Mount 935
 - Sirach 678, 687
 - synonymous with victories 472
 - 1 Thessalonians 1210
 - under the law 1102
 - wealth 412, 687
 - wisdom 406, 570, 659, 661
 - Wisdom of Solomon 653, 654, 655–6, 657, 659, 661, 664
- rites
 - Lord's supper 1126
 - to seal immortality 1124
- rites of passage 99
- ritual 438
 - determination of adultery guilt 115–16
 - mourning 146, 580
 - ordination 87
 - Passover of Egypt 75
 - red heifer 123–4, 1249
 - scapegoat 101–2
 - theology of P source 28
- ritual destruction
 - see also* ban
 - ancient Near East 142
 - for apostasy 146
 - Hazor 168
- ritual kiss 1151
- ritual purity 93–5
 - of camp in Numbers 115
 - childbirth 94
 - circumcision and Passover 162
 - Levitical laws 99–101
 - menstruation 94
 - Old Testament ethics 10
 - priests 104
- Rizpah 228
- Rock of Escape 211
- rock prediction 1114
- Roetzel, Calvin J. 1063
- Roman empire
 - Corinth 1134
 - end of, 4 Ezra 781, 783, 786–7
 - enemy of Judaism 482
 - Herod the Great 622
 - Jewish War 775, 778
 - law in Palestine 796
 - persecution of Jews in Antioch 791
 - persecution of Jews in Egypt 773–4
 - Revelation 1297
 - rule of Judea 432, 622–3
- Roman officer's servant 857, 935
- Romans (book) 1083–108
 - Abraham's covenant with God 1093–4
 - benediction 1107
 - chain of influence 1062
 - eschatological context 1105
 - ethical exhortations 1103
 - and Galatians 1085
 - justification by faith 1080
 - law of the Spirit 1097–9
 - literary style 1075, 1084
 - love 1104–5
 - missing passages 1107
 - position in chronology 1073
 - provenance 1084
 - sin and righteousness 1094–7
- Rome
 - see also* Roman empire
 - alliance with Judea 712, 728, 731, 732
 - and Antiochus IV 713, 714
 - Babylon as name for 1263, 1270
 - Christian community 1084, 1322
 - civil authority 1104
 - expulsion of the Jews 1084, 1085, 1109
 - imperial cult 1188
 - Jewish community 1084
 - and Judas Maccabeus 722–3
 - origin of Mark's Gospel 886–7
 - Paul 1059–61, 1068, 1107, 1182, 1228
 - Revelation 1300–1
 - rights of citizens 1049, 1058
- Rost, L. 197, 198, 202
- Roth, W. 669
- rûah* (God's energy) 407, 579, 580–1
- Rudolph, Wilhelm 272
- Rule of the Community*
 - dualism 688
 - hatred of sinners 677
 - humility 671
 - liturgy 803
 - origins of sin 678
 - prayer 821–2
 - retribution after death 671
 - rules 804, 824
 - sacrifice 689
 - vengeance 686
 - wisdom literature 800–1, 818–19
- rules, religious associations 804–5, 824–6
- Ruth (book) 2, 192–5, 269
- sabbath
 - Book of the Covenant 84
 - breaking of 121
 - covenant community membership 479, 480
 - creation 41, 42, 43
 - Damascus Document 812–13
 - Decalogue commandment 141
 - eating grain 860, 892–3, 934
 - fighting on the 715
 - healing 945, 946
 - holiness of Israel 87–8
 - Jeremiah (book) 504
 - Jesus and the 970
 - Levitical law 105
 - manna provision 78
 - psalms 392
 - rest 1242–3
 - Romans (book) 1105
 - saving life 893
 - Second Temple period 479, 797
 - Ten Commandments 81
 - years 106–7
- sabbath-years 568
- Sabeans 334, 471
- Sacherdonos see Esar-haddon
- sacrifice 93–4
 - Abraham 51
 - acceptability 484
 - accompanied by justice 482
 - before battle 373
 - centralization of worship 144–5
 - of children 146, 149
 - Ezekiel (book) 548
 - of Isaac 53–4, 810
 - Judah (kingdom) 259
 - to Chemosh 249–50
 - of Christ 916, 1243, 1247–8, 1249
 - 1 Chronicles 271
 - corruption of the house of Eli 201–2
 - Ezra's return to Jerusalem 766, 768
 - Jephthah's daughter 178, 185
 - Jewish 1092
 - Levites as symbol of 117
 - Levitical law 95–9, 102
 - living 1103–4
 - ordination ritual 87
 - Passover under king Josiah 754–5
 - pattern for animals 96
 - proverbs 417
 - psalms 356
 - rebuilding of Jerusalem after exile 315
 - Solomon 287
 - temple musicians 280–1
 - temple of Solomon 239, 286
 - twice-daily 568, 570
 - wisdom literature 689–90
- sacrificial food
 - guidelines for eating 1125
 - idolatry 1108, 1110, 1120–2
- Sadducees
 - adultery law 709
 - attempt to silence apostles 1033–4
 - emergence of 624
 - Epicureanism 650
 - immortality 655–6
 - leaven 864–5
 - life after death 953
 - Maccabean revolt 715
 - opposition to Jesus 873–4
 - resurrection 873–4, 911, 1034
 - Wisdom of Solomon 653
- Sagen 21–2, 24, 39, 48
- saints
 - assumed to heaven 782, 784

- collection for the 1071, 1132, 1134, 1143–5, 1149–50
 Colossians 1192
 hagiography 806, 827
 Philippians 1181
 psalm 376
 tombs of 806, 827
 Sakkuth 586
 Salathiel 775, 778
 Salem 50, 399
 Salome (aunt of Jesus) 995 salt 852, 853, 906, 947
 salvation 377
 Amos (book) 587–9
 announced by God and Joel 580 Christ as means of 1034, 1045
 2 Chronicles 286
 Ephesians 1170, 1178
 history 778–9, 780
 Isaiah (book) 449, 475–6
 Jewish law inadequate 1138 for Judah and the nations 606
 Matthew's Gospel 870
 non-believers in a marriage 1119
 oracle of 572–3
 Pastoral Epistles 1221, 1228–9, 1231, 1233
 Paul 1086, 1087
 Philippians 1186
 psalms 390
 Revelation 1298–9
 1 Thessalonians 1210
 2 Thessalonians 1217
 through Israel 481
 wisdom 660
 YHWH's commitment 469
 Samael 333
 Samaria
 ally of Judea in Judith 636
 Amos (book) 584
 Assyrian conquest 259, 260 besieged by Arameans 252
 coming of the Spirit 1038–9
 Ezekiel (book) 536, 540, 558
 fall of 584, 595
 Jehu massacres the Baal-worshippers in 254–5
 Jesus' work in 967–9
 John Hyrcanus 633
 Maccabean revolt 715, 716, 726
 Micah's prophecy against 596
 Omri dynasty 245, 254
 Philip's mission to 1038 return to Zion 513
 sister cities 546, 550
 Tobit (book) 632
 Samaritans
 and Antiochus IV 740–1
 Chronicles 268
 fall of Israel (kingdom) 260
 Jesus 941, 942
 leper 949
 parable 942 return of Jews to Jerusalem 762–3 and Seleucids 740
 Sirach 696
 Syro-Ephraimite War 300–1
 woman at well 967–8 Sammael 810–11
 Samothrace 1207
 Sampsames 732
 Samson 177, 185–8, 201, 206
 Samuel (prophet) 188 authorship of Samuel (books) 196
 birth of 57, 201
 call-vision 202
 David 207, 209
 death of 212
 dedication 201
 monarchy 204–6 named in psalm 393 prophetic history 200
 Saul 204–5, 207, 213
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 695 war with Philistines 204
 1 Samuel (book) 196–214
 2 Samuel (book) 196–201, 214–30
 Sanballat 318–19, 320, 321
 sanctuary centralization of sacrificial worship 144 construction 90 as dwelling place of divine name 145 heavenly 1248–9 prescriptions 85–8 role of heavenly high priest 1247 sandals 898, 938
 Sanders, E. P. 1066, 1086, 1091, 1101, 1138
 Sanhedrin
 Jesus' persecution 881
 Paul before 1056
 trial of Jesus 918–19
 trials of apostles 1034, 1035–6
 Sanhedrin, Great 796, 811
 Saph 228
 sapiential literature 652, 653
 Sapphira 1035, 1044
 Sappington, T. J. 1192
 Sarah (wife of Abraham) 48, 49–50, 51, 185
 burial 54
 described as barren 478 as a free woman 1162
 Hagar 53
 Isaac 52
 Sarah (wife of Tobias) 627, 629, 630–1 Sarbethsabanael 711 sarcasm 336–7, 1146–7, 1148
 Sardis 1292
 Sargon II (king of Assyria) 628
 Sarial (angel) 631
 Sasson, J. M. 193
 Satan apocryphal tradition 1322
 David's census 278
 death 655
 Job (book) 333
 Luke's Gospel 943–4, 955
 Mark's Gospel 889, 894
 origins of sin 678
 physical suffering 1149
 Revelation 1291
 Sirach 678, 681
 1 Thessalonians 1205
 Saul (king of Israel) battle of Michmash 206–7 creation of monarchy 203–5
 David 207–15, 274, 370, 384
 death of 214–15, 228
 disobedience of 206, 207 downfall of 273 election of 207–8 genealogy in 1 Chronicles 272
 Gibeonites 166, 227–8
 nazirites 201
 priesthood of Nob 210–11
 Samuel (books) 197, 198
 war with the Agagites 327, 329 Saul (Paul) see also Paul conversion 1039–40, 1055–6, 1058
 death of Stephen 1038
 Saviour, usage 1222, 1231
Sayings of Ahiqar 687
 Sayings of the Wise 418–19
 scapegoat 93–4, 95, 101–2
 Schmid, H. H. 34
 Schwartz, D. R. 721 science, wisdom literature 801–2 scribes controversy with Jesus 912
 Deuteronomistic 517
 Sirach 691–2
 wisdom literature 800
 scripture
 Hebrew 5–6
 Holy Spirit as source of 1241, 1248
 Jude (book) 1284, 1286
 letters of Paul 1082
 Pastoral Epistles 1230 self-interpretation 454–5 as testimony to Jesus 971
Scroll of Thanksgiving 803 Scythopolis 747
 see also Beth-shan Sea of Tiberias 997, 998 sea travel 1044, 1049, 1053, 1054, 1059–60 sea-serpent 553 sealing 1326
 Seals, Revelation 1293
 Seba 469
 second sight 436
 Second Torah 794 secrecy
 Jesus' birth 929
 Mark's Gospel 888, 890, 891, 895, 897, 901, 902–3
 sects see also Essenes; Pharisees; Sadducees
 liturgy 802, 803
 Maccabean revolt 715
 rules for religious associations 804–5 Second Temple period 624
 seduction
 Book of the Covenant 83
 imagery 418
 Proverbs (book) 409
 seed God's 1277
 parables 894, 896, 937
Sefer Jossipon 643
 Segal, M. H. 669
 Seir, Mount 556–7
 Sela 299
 Seleucid empire
 Colossae 1191
 Judah and 564, 569
 Rome and 722–3
 rule of Judea 621–2, 712, 713–30, 735–50
 Seleucus III (king of Syria) 743
 Seleucus IV Philopator (king of Syria) 713, 721, 734, 737, 738 self-interest 681 self-righteousness 1086 self-sufficiency
 divine 349
 Graeco-Roman tradition 1145 selfishness 412
 Semitic languages 7
 Senir 553
 Sennacherib (king of Assyria) 260–1, 545
 devastates Israel 437, 439
 Hezekiah's military preparations against 596 instrument of YHWH 471 invasion of Judah 596 mirror image of Cyrus 470–1 Nineveh 628
 siege of Jerusalem 289, 303–4, 361, 380, 388

- Sennacherib (king of Assyria) (cont.)
 Tobit (book) 628
 Septuagint (LXX)
 Additions to Daniel 704–5
 arrangement of books 11
 Baruch (book) 699, 700
 creation of the Apocrypha 618
 Ecclesiastes 423, 425, 426, 427, 428
 1 Esdras 751
 Esther (book) 325
 Esther (Greek) 642–4, 649
 Hebrew scriptures 6
 Jeroboam 241
 Judith (book) 633
 The Letter of Jeremiah 703
 1 Maccabees 711
 origin 8
 Samuel (books) 196
 translation of 477, 795
 Seraiah 312, 526, 701, 765 seraphim 443
 Sergius Paulus 1044
 Sermon on the Mount
 1 Clement 1314
 Ephesians 1176
 gospel comparisons 1016–18
 Luke's Gospel 934–5
 Matthew's Gospel 852–7
 Seron 716 serpent 44 attacking Israel in wilderness 125–6
 Bel and the Dragon 710
 Genesis 44
 Paul bitten on Malta 1060
 Revelation 1296
 Sirach 680
 Servant Songs 468, 473, 475, 476 servants
 of God 1088
 inadequate 454
 Isaiah (book) 437, 467, 468, 470, 473–4, 475, 476–8
 parable 878, 952
 Seth 45, 353
 seven, use in ancient world texts 163–4 seven deacons 1036 seven woes 875–6, 877 sex abstinence 1119 aetiology 41
 converts at Corinth 1116, 1118–19, 1150
 Ephesians 1175
 law in Deuteronomy 149–50
 Levitical law 102–3
 ritual purity 101
 as ungodly act 818 violence 600, 601 sexes, relationships between 94–5 Shaddai 336, 351 breath 348 debate with Job 340 questioned by Job 344
 Shadrach 706
 Shallum 258
 Shalmaneser III (king of Assyria) 255
 Shalmaneser V (king of Assyria) 571, 576, 628
 Shamash-shum-ukin 305
 shame
 Graeco-Roman tradition 1138–9
 nakedness metaphor 1140
 reputation of the Corinthians 1143
 Sirach 673, 676, 678, 681, 693
 women 670, 681, 693
 Shamgar 179, 180
 Shammah 229, 274
 Shammites 685
 Shaphan 306
 Shaphan (family) 511
 Shapur I (Sassanian king) 789
 Sharezer 628
 Sharon (Transjordanian region) 271
 Shatzman, I. 724
 Shealtiel 269, 270, 708, 775
 Sheba (place) 337
 queen of 240, 287
 Sheba (son of Bichri) 227
 Shebuel of Amram 281
 Shechem 49, 59–60, 64
 Abimelech 183–4
 altar built by Joshua 151 ceremony on Mts Ebal and Gerizim 166 covenant at 174–5
 Jeroboam I of Israel 242
 John Hyrcanus 633
 role relative to Shiloh 171
 Shechemites massacre of 59–60, 635, 637, 638–9 tales of Gideon 184
 sheep, parables of Jesus 979–80
 Shelah 61
 Shelomith 270
 Shem (son of Noah) 47–8, 269, 809
 Shema 142, 665, 803, 823
 Shemaiah 241, 289, 511
 death 510
 Jeremiah 512
 Nehemiah 320
 Shemellah 630
 Sheminih 369
 Shenazar 270
 Sheol 334, 341, 381
 see also Hades; hell
 Daniel (book) 570
 descent into 379, 427 descriptions of 369, 391, 815
 Ezekiel (book) 553, 555
 fate of the dead 450 gateway to 418
 Godin 594
 imagery 407, 420
 Israelite culture 363
 Jonah's great fish named as 593, 594
 Last Judgement 784
 as place of punishment 450 poetic synonym 414
 proverbs 409
 psalms 372, 397
 resurrection from 742
 Sirach 680
 storehouse of souls 780
 Tobit 629
 YHWH threat to Israel 577, 578
 Shepherd of Hermas 1306, 1308, 1314 Shepherd of Israel 389
 shepherds
 Assyrian kings as 595
 David and Goliath 209
 Ezekiel (book) 556
 imagery 507
 Jesus' birth 929 metaphor for God 374 parables of Jesus 979–80
 psalms 364
 Zechariah (book) 613–14
 Sheshach (Babylon) 509
 Sheshan 269
 Sheshbazzar 270, 311
 Shethar-bozenai 314
 Shibah 56
 shields 1178
 Shiggaion 369
 Shiloh 65, 188 central sanctuary for Israel 171 destruction 388, 495
 Eli 201–2
 Joshua (book) 160
 sanctuary role 144
 Shimeath 298–9
 Shimei 224–5, 226, 235, 236, 369
 Shimshai 757 ships
 Isaiah (book) 469
 Roman 1059–60 of Tarshish 454
 Wisdom of Solomon 664
 Shishak (Shoshenk) 243, 289
 Shittim 161, 574, 576
 Shobi the Ammonite 225 shoes 1178
 see also sandals Shua 270
 Shuah 335
 Sibbecai the Hushathite 228
 Sicarii 806
 Sidon
 Ezekiel (book) 552, 553, 555
 lament 454
 Maccabean revolt 718
 Mark's Gospel 901
 Matthew's Gospel 864
 Nebuchadnezzar in Judith (book) 633 sign-acts, Ezekiel (book) 539–40
 Sihon (king) 126, 132, 168, 174, 184
 Silas (Silvanus) 1048, 1179, 1202, 1203, 1215, 1270 silence, wisdom 680
 Siloam 262, 978
 Silvanus see Silas
 Simeon (presentation of Jesus) 930
 Simeon (son of Jacob)
 birth of 57
 genealogy 270
 massacre of the Shechemites 59–60, 635, 637, 638–9 Simeon (tribe)
 Asa king of Judah 292
 Blessing of Jacob 64
 1 Chronicles 269, 270
 conquest of Canaan 178
 Judith 638
 territory allocation 171
 similes
 psalms 394
 Song of Solomon 432
 Similitudes of Enoch 794
 Simon (brother of Menelaus) 737, 738, 739
 Simon (founder of Hasmonean dynasty) 712, 743, 745, 749 governor of the Paralia 728, 729
 Maccabean revolt 716, 718, 720, 724
 rule 730–3
 Simon II the Just (high priest) 667, 670, 675, 690, 696
 Simon (of Cyrene) 919
 Simon (Pharisee) 936–7
 Simon Magus 1038, 1044, 1052
 Simon Peter see Peter sin 340–1
 see also sinners against others 837
 anthropomorphized 1096, 1097 atonement for 415, 672 before the law was given 1093 belief in Christ 1095
 Cain and Abel 45

- cause of suffering 782
 Colossians 1195
 confession of 375 consequences of 120–1, 125–6 contrasted with righteousness in
 1 John 1277
 Daniel's confession of 568
 Ephesians 1169–70, 1175
 evil inclination of humans 778, 779, 782–3, 784 external power 1091, 1096
 Ezekiel (book) 537, 556
 as failure to love 1278 forgiveness for 377, 680, 934, 936–7, 943, 957, 1275
 free will 678 growth of 41
 Ham 47
 idolatry 663–4
 inevitability 1092
 Isaiah 436, 437
 of Israel 503
 Jeremiah (book) 502
 Lamentations 532
 national 556, 767–8
 origins of 382, 779, 1196
 Daniel (book) 569
 eating of the fruit 43–4
 Sirach 678, 679, 684–5
 of parents 546–7
 Paul's theology 1079–80 people unjustly accused 475
 proverbs 421
 psalms 366, 378
 punishment 661–2, 669–70, 679, 686 sexual 1207
 Sodom and Gomorrah 52–3 terminal and non-terminal 1280–1 transference of 95
 women 670, 684–5
 Zion's confession of 599 sin offering 97–8, 101 Sinai, Mount 1160, 1162
 see also Horeb appearance of God 381 Israelites' journey towards 78–9
 Luke's Gospel 941
 psalms 386
 theophany 80 and Zion 1253 singers 271, 761
 sinners bringing back the 1262 destruction by god 1124 fate of 342
 hated by God 677, 678
 Jesus 936–7, 947, 948–9, 1012, 1222
 Mark's Gospel 892
 psalms 394
 Sirach see Wisdom of Jesus son of Sirach Sirion 376
 Sirius 352
 Sisera 177, 180–2, 206, 390
 Sisinnus 763
 Sitis 333, 335 skin diseases 100–1 slander 415, 686 Slanderer 655 slaughter Levitical law 102
 profane 145, 146
 slavery
 Book of the Covenant 83
 Christianity 1119, 1120, 1197
 debt servitude 147
 Graeco-Roman society 1235
 household rules 1177
 Israelites in Egypt 69–70 jubilee year release 107 law for fugitives 150 law of release 517
 Pastoral Epistles 1227, 1232
 Paul 1122, 1139, 1197
 Sirach 674, 689
 to follow Christ's example 1266–7 sloth 425, 427, 681
 Smend, R. 684, 685
 Smitten, W. in der 309
 Smyrna 1291
 snake see serpent social justice associated with religious practice 480, 689
 Old Testament ethics 10
 Sirach 670, 689
 social outcasts, Mark's gospel 892 social relationships
 Romans (book) 1105
 Sirach 674–5
 social-identity theory 1201, 1205, 1209 Socrates likened to Paul 1050, 1054, 1235
 4 Maccabees 790
 martyr literature 806
 Sodom 50, 52–3, 438
 see also Gomorrah
 Amos (book) 585
 arrogance 657
 compared to false prophets 508
 destruction of 1273
 Lamentations 532
 Revelation 1298
 sister cities 546
 soil parable 894–5, 937 sojourners 144, 379
 solar charioteer 693–4
 Solomon
 accession to power 235–6 authorship of Proverbs 406 authorship of Wisdom of Solomon 650
 birth of 221, 222
 Book of the Acts of Solomon 233
 centralization of worship 145
 1 Chronicles 270
 coronation 396 dialogue with David 391 division of the kingdom 288
 Ecclesiastes 423, 424
 fall and death 239–41, 288
 History of David's Rise 207
 miraculous fire 736 monarchy in 1 Samuel (book) 204 Odes of 1186
 prayer 407
 psalm titles 358, 400 reign 283–8
 Sirach's Praise of the Fathers 695
 succession narrative 198–9, 220–7 and the temple 237–9, 279, 282–3, 284–7, 395
 wisdom 236, 237, 240, 284, 287, 288, 658–9, 801, 802
 Solomonic Collections 412–18, 419–21
 Solomon's temple see temple (first) son, prodigal see prodigal son Son of Abraham 848
 Son of David 848, 874, 908, 912
 Son of the Father 883, 942
 Son of God 843, 1243
 Adam 931
 5 Ezra 778
 John's Gospel 998
 Luke's Gospel 927, 956
 Mark's Gospel 888–9, 902, 904, 918, 920
 Matthew's Gospel 851
 Messiah 783
 Son of Man 1239
 Daniel 567
 1 Enoch 814–15
 Luke's Gospel 934, 939, 949–50, 954
 and Man from the Sea 787
 Mark's Gospel 891–2, 893, 903–4, 907, 908, 914, 918
 Matthew's Gospel 857, 861, 871, 877, 878, 881, 882
 theme in Fourth Gospel 970
 Son of the Most High God 897, 927, 938
 Song of Ascents 359, 388
 Song of the Bow 215
 Song of the Conquerors 299
 Song of Deborah 64, 181, 386, 461
 Song of Hannah 155
 Song of Moses 137, 154–6, 1299
 Song of Solomon 429–33
 Song of the Three Jews 626, 705, 706–8 songs of the conquerors 1299 Miriam's 77 victory 181, 185, 641 of Zion 361, 390
Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice 803 sons, education of 687 Sons of Darkness 816
 sons of God 45–6, 678, 809
 Sons of Light 802, 816
 sophism 1140, 1145 sorcery 83
 Sosthenes 1108
 Sostratus 739 soteriology 1255–6 soul
 see also spirit
 fate after death 655–6, 780, 784, 798, 799
 God's love for 662
 Israelite culture 364
 pre-existence of 653–4, 660, 784
 Wisdom of Solomon 651, 653–4, 655–6, 660 source criticism
 biblical criticism 2
 Leviticus 93
 Pentateuch 15–21
 Rendtorff critique 35–6 story of Balaam 126
 sovereignty, of God 348, 1034 sower parable 861, 894–6, 937
 Spain
 Paul 1075, 1084, 1192
 Rome and 722
 Spartans 728–9, 731, 740
 speaking in tongues 1032, 1042, 1110, 1127, 1129
 speech restraint in 686
 without love 1128
 Spirit see Holy Spirit spirit see also soul architectural metaphors 1139–40 dispersal on death 655
 of God 348 law of 1097–9 man of the 576
 resurrection 1132
 understanding of believers 1113
 wisdom 653–4, 660–1, 683
 of YHWH, Ezekiel (book) 558 Spirit of Truth 990

- spirits elemental 1160, 1161 of good and evil 800–1, 818–19 testing 1278–9
 Wisdom of Solomon 651
 spy missions 120, 161, 164 star of the nativity 849
 Stephanas 1111, 1133
 Stephen 1036–8
 steward metaphor 1115 Stichiometry of Nicephorus 1308, 1311
stoicheion 1195
 Stoicism 1274
 everything is created for a purpose 692
logos 683
 pantheism 694
 Philippians 1180, 1183
 providence 664
 restraint of the passions 673
 Sirach 668, 669
 teleology 693
 transmutation 665
 Wisdom of Solomon 650–1, 653, 657, 658, 659
 world-soul 654, 659
 stone 1265
 stone, living 1266
 stone parable 910
 stone tablets see tablets of stone stones, memorial 151, 161–2, 165
 storehouse of souls 780 storm, miracle 857, 896–7, 938 stormwind imagery 441
 The Story of the Three Guards 752–3
Story and Wisdom of Ahiqar 628, 629
 Strabo 1191
Stromateis 1308
 Styx 348 submission to God 597, 1269 to one another 1269 to political authorities 1266 to suffering 1268–9 subordination 1126
 succession narrative 198–9, 220–7
 Succoth see Feast of Booths
 suffering atonement for sins of others 477 bearing righteously 1267 boasting of 1094 catalogue of 1141
 of Christ 1239, 1240, 1247, 1267–8
 of Christians 1264
 divine 577
 and endurance 1253 good conduct in the face of 1266
 James (book) 1256
 Lamentations 531
 links with glory 1098
 Mark's Gospel 887, 905
 Messiah 939, 950
 physical weakness 1139, 1142, 1149 problem of 978
 Son of Man 905
 submission to 1268–9 sun 542
 Sundays 1130–2
 'super apostles' 1147
 superstition, law in Deuteronomy 149
 Supplementary Hypothesis 13–15, 16, 33–4, 37
 surrogate birth 57
 Susa 327–8, 329, 645, 646–7
 Susanna 682, 705–6, 708–9, 937
 didactic stories 626
 original language 621
 Suso, Henry 652, 658 swearing 681–2 swords 525, 1178, 1243
 Syh 705 symbolic acts 500–1 symbolic universe 1142 symbolism Israelite society 94 lamps in tabernacle 117 sacrificial systems 95
 Song 430
 Symmachus 387, 532 synagogues as diaspora institution 1036 exclusion from 978
 Matthew's Gospel 845
 Paul 1073
 prayer 803
 Synchronic interpretations 489
 syncretism 260, 605, 1325 synonyms 437
 Synoptic Gospels 2
 Syntyche 1189
 Syria 524
see also Seleucid empire
 Syro-Ephraimite War 258, 259, 300, 444, 445, 451
 Syro-Ephraimite War 258, 259, 300, 444, 445, 451
 Syro-Phoenician woman 900
 Ta'anit Scroll 430
 Tabeel 757
 tabernacle critique of Exodus description 95 definition 85 dimensions 86 duties of Levites 114 entry of glory of YHWH 90 relationship to temple 283, 284–5 role of heavenly high priest 1247
 Stephen's speech 1037
 theology of P source 28
 Tabernacles, Feast of see Feast of Booths Tabitha (Dorcas) 1040–1 tablets of stone breaking by Moses 88 differentiation between Decalogue and other laws 141 provision 85 written on by YHWH 89–90
 Tabor, Mount 386, 574
 Tacitus 1324
 Talmi (king of Geshur) 222, 223
 Talpanhes 521
 Talstra, E. 239
 Tamar (daughter of David) 222–3
 Tamar (daughter-in-law of Judah) 61, 195
 Tammuz 541
 Tannin 337
 tares parable 861–2
 Tarfon, R. 685
Targum of Job 333
Targum Onkelos 155
Targum Pseudo-Jonathan 795, 810–11
 Targumim 795
 Tarn, William Woodthorpe 269
 Tarshish 381, 553
 Tarsus 1068
 Tattenai 314 tax Caesar 953 controversy 910
 Jerusalem under the Seleucids 714, 726 in Judah under Persian empire 760
 Matthew's Gospel 866–7, 873
 tax-collectors call of Levi 934
 Jesus with 892, 947, 948–9
 Zacchaeus 951
 tax-collectors parable 950
 Tcherikover, V. 740, 741
 Teacher of Righteousness 725
Halakic Letter 797
Pesher Habakkuk 807
Thanksgiving Hymns 823
 teaching see also religious schools
 of the apostles 1326
 of Jesus compared with Moses' law 975
 life in early church 1033
 tearful letter 1134, 1137, 1145
 Tekoa 223
 Tel Abib 539
 teleology, Sirach 668, 692, 693
 Tema 337
 Teman 603, 702
 Temon 592 temple (first) see also sanctuary
 Ahaz's paganization of 259 animal sacrifices 616
 Babylon and 307–8, 387, 487, 541
 building of 279–83, 284–6 centralization of worship 145
 Chronicles 267
 contributions for 298, 303
 David 219, 230, 277, 278–83
 Deuteronomistic History 200
 Ezekiel (book) 536, 541–3, 561
 gatekeepers 273, 280, 281, 303
 Hezekiah's reform 301–3
 Joash's renovation 256
 Josiah 263, 305–6
 1 and 2 Kings 232–3
 Moriah, Mount 810
 musicians 271, 280–1, 286, 761
 priests and Levites 279–80
 reform by Hezekiah 301–3
 Second Temple compared with 609
 Solomon 237–9, 660
 temple (second) Antiochus IV 566, 713, 717–18, 740–1, 744
 cleansing by Jesus 909, 952, 965–6 conduct of cult in Jerusalem 624 contributions for 312–13, 316
 cult described in Leviticus 95 destruction of 622, 623
 exilic remnant and 608–10 literature of period 792–3 miraculous fire 736
 Nehemiah 320
 Paul's arrest in the 1055
 prediction of destruction 876, 877, 913, 918, 920, 954 presentation of Jesus at 929–30 Ptolemy IV Philopator 774 purification ceremony 929–30 rededication after Maccabean revolt 717–18 restoration after exile 311–15, 754, 762–4 return of vessels from Babylon 311, 757, 759, 760
 Rome and 622, 623
 Seleucid rule 622
 Seleucus IV Philopator 737–8
 Stephen's speech 1037
 tax 866–7
 tearing of curtain 920, 957
 Wisdom, Sirach 683

- temple (heavenly) Christian church seen as 1142 new community 918, 919
 post-Biblical Jewish literature 803
 Revelation 1295, 1304
 Temple Mount 720–1
Temple Scroll codification of law 797 king's bodyguard 730, 748 laws regarding the king 812 purity laws, 2 Maccabees 737 temporality 425, 426
 temptation
 God and 1258
 Jesus 851, 889, 931–2
 joy in 1257
 Lord's Prayer 943
 Ten Commandments 439
see also Decalogue expression of covenant demands 80–2 law 800
 revelation at Mount Horeb 139 tenants in the vineyard parable 872, 910, 952–3 Tennes the Sidonian 286 tent of meeting 85, 87, 171 Terah 48
 teraphim 58, 188, 573
 Teresa of Avila 429
 Tertullian 393, 1082, 1314
 Testament, wisdom literature 800 Testament of Job 335
Testament of Levi 800
Testament of Reuben 800, 818
Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs 800 testimonia, post-Biblical Jewish literature 795 testing
 divine 344, 1114
 James (book) 1256
 Tetragrammaton 346
see also YHWH Tetrarch 13 textual criticism 1–2
 Thackeray, H. St J. 699 thanksgiving after healing 369 before dawn 665
 classification of psalms 360
 Colossians 1192–3
 1 Corinthians 1111
 2 Corinthians 1135
 for deliverance 392
 Ephesians 1168
 Galatian congregations 1154
 Isaiah (book) 464
 Philémon 1234
 Philippians 1181
 poems in Jeremiah (book) 512–13
 Psalms 370, 376, 377, 384, 385, 388, 395, 397, 398, 402
 Romans (book) 1088–108
 1 Thessalonians 1202–3
 2 Thessalonians 1213, 1215–16
Thanksgiving Hymns 822–3
 Thebes 601
 Thecla 1224, 1230, 1309, 1324 theft 82
 theodicy 438
 Deuteronomy 143
 Ecclesiastes 424
 4 Ezra 781
 Habakkuk (book) 601
 Judith (book) 633–4
 Old Testament theme 10–11
 Sirach 669–70, 688
 Song of Moses 154–5
 suffering 1253
theodidaktos 1208
 Theodotion
 Additions to Daniel 705
 Prayer of Azariah 706, 707
 Susanna 709
 Theodotus 1036
 Theognis 668, 673, 675
 theology
 apocryphal texts 1328
 canonical texts 1327 ditheism 1121
 Holy War 159
 of law 142
 Matthew's Gospel 846
 Paul 1063, 1070, 1078–81, 1112–13
 Pentateuchal sources 25–8 of psalms 365
 Revelation 1287
 1 Thessalonians 1200–1
 theophanies
 Blessing of Moses 156
 burning bush 71
 conversion of Saul (Paul) on road to Damascus 1039
 David's Song of Thanksgiving 228
 Eliphaz 335–6
 Ezra 788
 Habakkuk (book) 603
 Jericho 163
 Joel (book) 579, 580–1
 Last Battle 787–8 manifestation of the divine presence 444
 Pentecost 1031
 pillar of cloud and fire 76, 117–18
 Revelation 1299
 Sinai 80, 393, 1031
 threshing floors 230 Theophilus 925, 926, 1028, 1030
 theosophy 798
 Therapeutae 804, 825
 1 Thessalonians 1199–212
 position in chronology 1073
 social identity approach 1201–2
 2 Thessalonians 1213–20
 authenticity 1078, 1213–14, 1219
 position in chronology 1073
 Thessalonica 1189, 1199, 1213
 early Christian community 1200
 Paul's second missionary journey 1049–50 social context 1204, 1214 thief, repentant 1322
 Thisbe 628
 Thomas (apostle) 998, 1323, 1324, 1330 see also Gospel of Thomas Thomas Aquinas 333 threshing ox 1122–3 thrones everlasting 380
 of God 538, 1238, 1292–3, 1304–5
 of grace 1243
 Thummim see Urim and Thummim
 Thyatira 1292
 Tiamat 335, 603, 787
 Tiberius 791
 Tibni 244–5
 Tiglath-pileser I (king of Assyria) 258, 259, 270–1, 301
 Tiglath-pileser III (king of Assyria) 571, 574, 577, 628
 Tigris 630 time, controlled by God 688, 690
 Timnite woman 186
 Timothy (companion to Paul) circumcision of 1048
 Philippians 1187
 recipient of letters 1222–31
 1 Thessalonians 1206
 Timothy (Seleucid officials I and II) 718, 743, 745, 746–7
 1 Timothy (book) 1078, 1220–7
 2 Timothy (book) 1078, 1220–1, 1227–31
 tin 587
 Tirshata 761 tithes laws in Deuteronomy 146–7 Levites' portion 123 livestock 109
 religious associations 805, 825 seven-year cycles 107
 temple 617
 Tobit (book) 628
 Titus (book) 1078, 1220–1, 1231–3
 Titus (fellow-worker of Paul) circumcision question 1156 and Corinthian church 1137, 1142, 1143, 1150 recipient of letter 1231–3
 Titus (Flavian emperor) 786
 Tob 221, 718
 Tobians
 Maccabean revolt 718, 721
 Nehemiah 319
 Ptolemies 737
 Tobiah 319, 320, 321, 322
 Tobias (son of Tobit) 627, 628, 629–32
 Tobiel 628
 Tobit (book) 626–32
 date of composition 620
 as didactic story 626
 historical background 625
 influence on patristic writings 619
 status in Jewish canon 620
 Tobit (person) 627, 628–32
 Toi of Hamath 220 tolerance, Romans (book) 1105–6 tombs
 Jesus 884–5, 920–1, 923, 958, 981, 997
 Lazarus 981–2
 saints 806, 827 tongues of fire 1032
 metaphors 1260
 speaking in 1032, 1042, 1110, 1127, 1129
 Torah 438, 439, 440, 469 announcement in Deuteronomy 140
Book of Jubilees 794
 Christ antithesis 1066–7, 1070, 1079, 1086, 1101
 definition 39
 delivered by angels 1239
 divorce 811
 eternal life 1095
 fall of Israel (kingdom) 260
 fear of the Lord 688
 Greek translation 8 hand-washing 899–900
 Hebrew scriptures 6
 interpretation of law 1164
 justification by works 1065–6
 Matthew's Gospel 852, 853, 860, 874
 Paul's theology 1081
 pre-eminence in Israel 148
 psalms 361, 398
 reading by Ezra 320–1
 Second Temple period 795–7
 slaves 689
 will of God 1098
 wisdom 678, 683–4, 702, 800
 as 'witness' against Israel 154
 Torrey, C. C. 753

- Tosefta 804–5, 825
 Tov, E. 642, 700
 Tower of Babel 40, 41, 48
 Townsend, John T. 1075 tradition-historical analysis 93 tradition appeal to in Jude 1287
 Jewish teaching 1146, 1148
 Johannine Epistles 1281–2
 tradition criticism 21, 23, 35–7 tradition history 68 Trajan 787
 transcendence of God 1227
 Transfiguration 866, 904, 940, 941, 1323
 transgressions see sin transience 425, 426, 466
 Transjordan
 Maccabean revolt 718, 719, 746–7 settlement of 169 tribes 160–1, 173, 270–1, 294–5 translation
 Bible 4
 New Testament 830–1
 Old Testament 7–8
 post-Biblical Jewish literature 795
 Psalms 356
 Septuagint 618
 Tobit (book) 627
 treasure parable 862 treasury of works 785 treaties ancient Near Eastern 174 political 136, 146, 152 request by Gibeonites 166 trees of knowledge and life 44 trials apostles before the Sanhedrin 1034, 1035–6
 Jeremiah 510
 Jesus 994–5
 Paul at Caesarea 1056–9
 Stephen 1036–8
 testing of faith 1257 tribes of Israel birth of Jacob's sons 57
 Blessing of Jacob 64–6 blessings 156
 1 Chronicles 269, 282
 lost 788 number of 63–4
 Revelation 1294 single confederation 177 territories 139, 168, 169–73
 Transjordan 160–1
 tricksters 179–80, 181
 Trinity 1171, 1290, 1309
 Trito-Isaiah 479
 Troas 1048–9, 1053, 1220
 Trophimus 1231
 trumpets
 Day of 105–6
 fall of Jericho 163 made by Moses 118 seven in Revelation 1294–6 trust in God 408 truth competition to find the strongest in 1 Esdras 759
 contradictory 423
 Egyptian goddess 408
 2 and 3 John 1281, 1283
 Revelation 1302
 Trypho (Diodotus) 728, 729, 730, 732
 Tubal 555, 559
 twelve apostles see apostles twelve tribes see tribes of Israel

 Two Spirits 800–1, 818–19
 Two Ways 1309, 1311
 Two-Source theory 1003–5, 1021–2
 Tychicus 1166, 1178–9, 1193, 1197
 typology
 Exodus 1241
 Joseph 1036–7
 Jude (letter) 1284–5, 1286
 Moses 1033, 1037
 Psalms 357
 Tyre
 Amos (book) 582, 583
 Ezekiel (book) 534, 552, 553
 games at 739
 Isaiah (book) 454
 Maccabean revolt 718
 Mark's Gospel 901
 Matthew's Gospel 864
 Revelation 1301
 royal weddings 380
 Solomon 239, 240
 temple construction 279, 284

 Ucal 421 unbelief 860, 862–3 unbelievers see non-believers uncircumcised, exclusion of 476 uncreation 493–4 universal gospel 1065, 1067–8 universalism 1131, 1141
 Unleavened Bread, festival of 75, 76, 105, 131, 147, 302, 315
 unpredictability 426, 427
 Ur 48
 Uriah (husband of Bathsheba) 221–2
 Uriah (prophet) 510
 Uriel (archangel) 631, 779–88
 Uriel (of Gibeah) 243
 Urim and Thummim 87 blessing of Levi 156
 post-exilic society in Judah 312
 restoration of temple 761
 Temple Scroll 748
 Urrulle 517
 Uzzah 218, 275
 Uziah (Azariah) 289, 299–300, 582
 Uziah (the Simeonite) 634, 637, 638, 639, 640
 Uzziel 276

 Van Seters, John 34–5 vanity 423, 440
 Vashiti 325, 326, 645
 Veijola, T. 200
 vengeance 155, 212–13, 657, 686, 1215–16
 Vermeulen, J. 435
 Vespasian 623, 786, 1288
 vestments 86–7
 Vetus Latina (VL) 627, 632
 Via Egnatia 1200
 vices 1175, 1229
 Vienne 1322–3 vine 545 vineyard parable 870 Violet, B. 788 virgin birth 849, 927 virgins head coverings 1126 marriage metaphor 1147 marriage of 1120
 parable 878
 Paul 1118
 significance in Christianity 445
 Sirach 693
 virtue 348, 544, 1175 visions

 Amos (book) 587–9
 Ananias 1039
 2 Corinthians 1148–9
 Cornelius 1041
 Daniel (book) 567, 568
 2 Esdras 776, 778–89
 Ezekiel 538, 558
 Isaiah theme 436
 Paul 1039–40, 1055–6, 1058
 Peter 1041
 Sinai 84
 Stephen 1038
 Zechariah (book) 611–12
 visitations
 divine 336
 Sirach 672
 Wisdom of Solomon 656 vows
 law in Deuteronomy 150
 Levitical laws 108
 limits 131
 nazirite 116, 1055
 Paul at Cenchreae 1051
 Vrevoil (archangel) 813–14
 Vulgate see Latin Vulgate walking on the water miracle 863, 899, 972, 1022–4

 War Rule 799 War Scroll 816 warfare
 see also ban attack on Jericho 163–4 battle poems 493
 1 Chronicles 271
 Holy War theology 159
 Isaiah theme 481
 Israelite conquest of Canaan 178–9, 181, 183
 Jeremiah (book) 493, 525
 law in Deuteronomy 149 metaphor for Christian life 1177 model conquest 139
 ritual destruction 142
 strategem of pretended flight 165 war-crimes 582 washing feet 936–7, 983, 985–6 hands 863, 883, 899–900, 944 Watchers 566, 794, 1285, 1286
 water see also walking on water baptism and 976
 Israelites in wilderness 78 of life in Revelation 1305–6 living 968
 rock struck by Moses 124
 witness to the Son 1280
 Wave Sheaf Day 105
 The Way 1057
 'we-passages' in Acts 1028, 1038, 1048, 1053, 1054, 1059–60 weakness body metaphor, 1 Corinthians 1128
 Christians and sacrificial food 1122
 Paul 1146
 poor Christians 1123 theology of the cross 1139 tolerance by the strong 1106 wealth
 apocryphal texts 1326
 barrier to kingdom 907 converts in Corinth 1111 dishonesty 686
 Ecclesiastes 425, 426
 insomnia 687

- James (book) 1256, 1258
 Paul 1143
 proverbs 412
 righteousness 687
 Sirach 677
 use of surplus in Acts 1034 warning of the rich 1261
 women 684
 wealth parable 948, 949 wedding feast, parable 872, 945 weddings
 Cana 965
 Ephesians 1177
 Samson 186
 weeds parable see tares parable Weeks, Feast of 105, 147
 Weiser, A. 200
 well-being offerings 96, 97, 98–9 Wellhausen, Julius 13–15, 18–19, 196 wells, Jacob's 967–8
 Welten, Peter 267
 Westermann, C. 24, 33, 51, 65
 Western Text of Acts 1030
 Whitlam, Keith W. 177 whole burnt offerings see burnt offerings Whybray, R. N. 32 wicked husbandmen parable 910 wicked (people)
 hell 815
 Proverbs 409, 412
 Psalms 367, 378
 punishment of 415, 784
 Wicked Priest 726, 807 wicked tenants parable 952–3 wickedness of the community 437, 438 conquest as punishment for 143
 Ecclesiastes 424–5
 Eliphaz accuses Job 343–4
 the Flood 46, 47
 justice of God 1101
 punishment 335, 656
 widow parable 950 widows
 celibacy and remarriage 1119, 1120
 instructions in Pastoral Epistles 1226
 Judith 638, 639
 Tabitha 1040–1
 widow's gift in the temple 912 wilderness
 Israelites in 76, 78–9, 111–12, 118–29, 133, 1037
 Mark's Gospel 888
 theme in Isaiah 469, 479
 The Wiles of the Wicked Woman 684 will, of the Father 984
 will of God 1098
 Willi, T. 287
 Williamson, H. G. M. administration of David's kingdom 282
 Ezra and Nehemiah (books) 309
 Levites 279
 rebuilding of Jerusalem 314, 315, 319 revolution against Persians 286 wind 966, 1031–2, 1238 wine competition in 1 Esdras 758 excessive drinking 688 measures of 573 miracle of turning water into 965
 Revelation 1298–9
 wineskins parable 858, 892
 wisdom acquisition of 669, 673, 674, 677–8 analogy to health 408 child of God 411 contrast with folly 680–1 converts at Corinth 1117, 1148
 creation 679
 Daniel (book) 569
 description of 658
 Ecclesiastes 424, 426, 427
 equated to righteousness 570 false claims to 459
 fear of the Lord 671, 680, 684
 of Israel in obedience 139
 Job (book) 331
 and law 677–8, 680, 683–4 meekness of 1260 nature of 340
 origins 411
 personified 407, 409
 praise of 682–4, 1257–8
 Proverbs (book) 405–9, 411
 psalms 361
 rewards of 673 rulers 676
 Sayings of Agur 422
 scribes 691–2
 Solomon 284, 287, 288, 650–1, 658–61
 spirit of 653–4
 spirituality 1113
 subverted by God 1112, 1113
 theology 1255
 tradition 442, 448, 458 tree of knowledge 44 true and false, Sirach 680
 aretalogy, Sirach 682–3 description, Wisdom of Solomon 659 spirit of God 683
 Torah as 699, 702
 Wisdom of Solomon 658
 Wisdom of Jesus son of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) 667–97
 authorship of 621
 date of composition 620
 historical background 625
 influence on patristic writings 619
 primal couple 341
 relationship to Amidah 803 status in Hebrew canon 620, 670 as wisdom literature 625 and Wisdom of Solomon 653
 wisdom literature 578
 Apocrypha 620
 1 Esdras 758–9
 Old Testament 9
 post-Biblical Jewish literature 800–2, 817–21
 Sirach (book) 625
 The Story of the Three Guards 752
 Wisdom of Jesus son of Sirach 667–8
 Wisdom of Solomon 650, 651–2
 Zechariah (book) 613
 Wisdom of Solomon (book) 650–66 canonical status 4 comparison with Job (book) 348
 historical background 625
 immortality 679
 influence on patristic writings 619
 original language 621
 philosophy 625 readership 621 witness, Revelation 1289 wives adultery 682
 good and bad 684–6, 690–1 honoured by husbands 1267
 Paul 1118–19
 Proverbs 413, 422
 Sarah 1267
 Sirach 674
 of YHWH 491 woes (seven) 875–6, 877 woman in a basket (Zechariah's vision) 612 woman caught in adultery 999 Woman, Revelation 1296–7 women see also wives
 adultery 682, 999
 in authority 441 beauty 685 character 890
 choice in marriage 690
 Christianity 1107, 1125–6, 1130
 Colossians 1197
 conditional vows 131
 creation 41, 43–4
 cult in Israel 94–5
 divorce 674
 Ecclesiastes 426
 equally valued by God 1267
 Esther as role model 325
 as evil 800, 818 false prophets in Ezekiel (book) 543–4
 folly 411
 genealogy 849
 head covering in prayer 1125–6
 Hebrew midwives 70
 Jesus 885, 1011
 Jesus' tomb 920–1, 958
 Judges (book) 189
 loose 408
 mixed marriages 316–18, 321, 766–9 negative representation by prophets 460 participation in worship 1130
 Pastoral Epistles 1224, 1230, 1232
 post-exilic return to Judah 312
 prophets 180
 rewards for heroes 178 ritual purity 100, 101
 Ruth (book) 192
 shamefulness of daughters 681
 sin 670, 936–7
 Sirach 675, 684–6, 691–2
 social position 431, 432, 433, 674, 1126, 1221, 1224 Susanna 705–6
 temple 566
 1 Thessalonians 1207
 virginity 693
 wealth 584–5, 684
 wood, idolatry 663–4 Word
 doers of, James (book) 1258 rebirth through the (1 Peter) 1265
 Word of God become flesh 963 failure in Israel 1100 identified with Jesus Christ 961–2
 power of 1243
 sustaining activity of 1238 word of truth, John's gospel 992
 work 41, 674 workers in the vineyard 870 works no faith without 1259 righteous 785 the world separation from 1276 victory of faith over 1279–80
 world-soul 659, 664
 worm and moth metaphor 475
 worship
 centralization in Israel 144–5

- worship (cont.)
 Christian 1129–30
 false, Isaiah 438, 439
 Jeremiah (book) 503 of other gods by Israel (kingdom) 260
- wrath cup of 509
 of God 114, 140, 143–4
- Wright, J. 321
- Writings (Hebrew Scriptures) 6, 324, 618
- Xenios 740–1
- Xenophon 310
- Xerxes 313
see also Ahasuerus
 Bel and the Dragon 706, 710
 Esther (book) 325
 Esther (Greek) 644
- Yadin, Y. 320
- Yahwist (J) source dating 34–5
 Exodus (book) 68, 75
 Hupfeld, Hermann 14
 theology 25, 26
 tradition criticism 35–7
- Yakim see Alcimius
- Yam 337, 603
- Yamm 335
- yeast
see also leaven
 parable 946
- Yehawmilk (king of Byblos) 384, 397
- Yehud 312
- YHWH
see also God
 anger of 586, 600
 Assyria 261, 450, 602
 Baal 179, 182, 571, 573, 576
 covenants animal world 573
 David 391, 401
 Israel 8, 9–10, 79, 88–90, 575
 creator 9, 351, 374, 471, 585
 David 208, 211, 214, 610
 Day of see Day of YHWH
 father 459, 471
 female consort of 616 female imagery for 471, 577
 foreign nations 470–1, 522, 609 husband 478, 482, 491, 545, 573
 Israel 8, 9–10, 26, 28, 79–80, 142, 143, 573–8 judge 370, 392–3, 437, 605 justice of 383 kingship of 361, 392, 393, 404, 455
 Levites 173
 lion 460, 577, 582
 love of 368, 513
 marriage with Israel 380, 491, 500, 573, 1147 midwife 484 monotheism 9, 68 mother 471
 name of 13, 17, 27, 34, 71, 473, 1186, 1290
 power of 589, 603
 presence of 89, 90, 601
 protection of 213, 363, 458
 Psalms 360, 361, 394, 399, 401
 punishment 494, 587, 601, 608
 redemption 470
 saviour 393, 480, 603
 sovereignty of 392, 558, 561 supremacy of 173, 381, 582, 585
 temple 283, 285–6, 609
 vengeance of 212–13, 598 warfare and 295, 316, 319–20, 493, 543 warrior 155, 380, 458, 465, 468, 481, 482, 603, 1177 worship of 45
- YHWH War 319–20
- Yohanan ben Zakkai 776, 825–6
- yokes 511
- Yom Kippur 561
- Yossi ben Yoezer, Rabbi 721
- youth
 Ecclesiastes 428
 righteous who die young 656–7
- Zabadeans 729
- Zabdiel 727, 728
- Zacchaeus 951
- Zadok 236
 Absalom's rebellion 224, 225
 1 Chronicles 271
 David 220, 226
 as descendant of Eleazar 280
 Eli 202
 Solomon 235, 236
- Zadokites, Ezekiel (book) 561
- Zakar 613
- Zalmunna 183, 390
- Zamzummiim 138
- Zaphon 344, 381, 787–8
- Zealot (disciple) 893, 934
- zealotry, Maccabean revolt 715
- Zebadiah 294
- Zebah 183, 390
- Zebedee 870–1
- Zebulon (son of Jacob) 57
- Zebulon (Zebulun) (tribe) 65, 171, 269, 272
- Zechariah (book) 610–15
 context 610–11
 day of the Lord 614–15
 hope amid conflict and sin 613–15 Jerusalem restoration 611–13
 new Jerusalem 1304
 Oracles Against the Nations 613 religious teaching of 611 shepherd allegory 613–14 text and language 610 vision cycle 611–12
- Zechariah (father of John the Baptist) 926–7, 928
- Zechariah (king of Israel) 258
- Zechariah (prophet) 402–4, 763
- Zechariah (son of Jehoiada) 298, 876
- Zedekiah (false prophet) 510
- Zedekiah (king of Judah) 249, 261, 264, 307–8, 487
 allegory of the cedar 546
 capture by Babylonians 532
 1 Esdras 755–6
 Ezekiel (book) 534, 543, 547
 Jeremiah (book) 506, 508, 515, 516–17, 518–19
- silver vessels for the temple 701
- Zeeb 390
- Zelophehad, daughters of 130, 134, 170
- Zenas 1233
- Zenobia 789
- Zephaniah (book) 604–7
 commentary 605–7
 indictments against Jerusalem community 606
 introduction and summary 604–5
 Oracles Against the Nations 606 penitence call 605–6
- Zephaniah (prophet) 604
 1 Thessalonians 1210
- Zerah (son of Judah) 61
- Zerah (the Ethiopian) 291
- Zereda 241
- Zeresh (wife of Haman) 328
- Zerubbabel 308
 1 Chronicles 269, 270
 competition to find the strongest 758–9 dependent on Lord's spirit 612 disappearance of 314
 Golah List 312
 as governor 314, 607, 608 Haggai's oracle to 609–10
 rebuilding of Jerusalem 759–60
 restoration of temple 313, 607–10, 754, 757, 762, 763 return to Jerusalem 760–1, 762, 763, 764
 Sheshbazzar 311
 The Story of the Three Guards 752–3
 Zechariah's vision 612
- Zeruiah 216
- Ziba 224, 226
- ziggurats 48, 56
- Ziklag 213, 214, 274
- Zilpah 57
- Zimri (king of Israel) 244, 254
- Zion 440
 comparison with Sinai 1253
 confession of sin 599
 cosmic mountain 787 daughters of 435, 438 destroyed 502 divine dwelling place 388, 450, 581 glorious restoration 478 God's destruction of 597
 heavenly city 786
 inviolability 439, 450–1, 458, 597
 Jeremiah (book) 498, 512
 Lamentations 529, 530
 as mother 702
 personification of Jerusalem 494
 psalms 380, 390, 394, 401, 530
 rape of 501
 Song of Solomon 433
 Songs of 361, 390, 402 special status 482 wife of YHWH 494, 529
- Ziph 211, 212
- Zipporah 72, 79
- Zoar 53
- Zobah, David 220, 221
- Zophar 331, 335, 339, 343
- Zoroastrianism 311, 472