(7:1–22) Conclusion of the Ceremony and God's Covenant for the Temple By a series of omissions and additions, the Chronicler changes his source material (1 Kings 8–9) to give the narrative a more flowing and logical structure. He deletes 1 Kings 8:54–61, much of which is a paraenetic warning conforming with the Chronicler's own principles. In v. 55, Solomon blesses his people, a privilege reserved for priests in post-exilic society. The main reason for the omission of this relatively long passage lies in the Chronicler's wish to report on God's positive response to the plea expressed in 6:41, most importantly his acceptance of the temple as his own. He thus describes God's descent upon the temple in the Chronicler's own material in vv. 1–3. The Chronicler subsequently returns to his source model for orientation, though he cannot resist mentioning the musical duties of the Levites in connection with the sacrifices performed (v. 6). vv. 13–15 form a third substantial addition to the source text, in which YHWH does not summarize his response (as in Kings), but actually uses some of the dedicatory prayer's language in his reply.

vv. 1–3 legitimize the sacrifices, the altar, and the temple. This section applies Lev 9:(22)23–4 to the temple. (The people's blessing as performed by Moses and Aaron in v. 23 is omitted, however.) The tabernacle and the temple are two forms of the same holy place. YHWH's glory took provisional possession of the temple in 5:13–14 and was described in similar terms. Here, there is the added element of an endorsing fire which falls from the heavens. These events are witnessed not only by the religious élite, but also by all the Israelites, since God's glory does not only fill the temple, but is also above it (cf. also Ex 40:34 for v. 2). Williamson (1987: 222) goes against the general consensus by claiming that this report does refer back to 5:13–14, and that v. 2 ought to be translated as an adverbial sentence in English: 'and during all this time the glory of YHWH still filled the temple'.

vv. 8–10, in 1 Kings 8:66, the celebration surrounding the temple's dedication and the Feast of Tabernacles, lasting seven days, seem to be simultaneous. This impression is corrected at the end of the previous verse ('seven days and seven days, even fourteen days'—there were two separate feasts) and the Chronicler removes any remaining doubt on this. According to his version the temple dedication and the Feast of Tabernacles cannot possibly take place simultaneously: the temple dedication takes place from the 8th to the 14th of the seventh month, whilst the Feast of Tabernacles lasts from the 15th until the 21st of the same month. The concluding feast (as in Lev 23:36, 39) is on the 22nd, so that Solomon can dismiss the festive community on the 23rd, as stated in v. 10. The Chronicler's Solomon adheres strictly to the festal calendar according to the Pentateuch, Moses' law. v. 11 grandly concludes the section in Chronicles, whilst the parallel text in its source model opens the following section. It is an opportunity to deliver one of the Chronicler's favourite messages: since Solomon behaves in an exemplary manner, his every undertaking succeeds.

v. 14, there are four ways in which the Israelites could move YHWH to action: humility, prayer, seeking his face, and turning from wicked ways. These become repeated themes in the following chapters. vv. 17–22, a form of theodicy: it explains the Davidic monarchy's collapse and the temple's destruction. v. 18. In an important alteration from the source model, the Chronicler turns 'a successor on the throne of Israel' (1 Kings 9:5) into 'a successor to rule over Israel'. Should this phrase (which is taken from Mic 5:1) imply messianic undertones? If it does, could it be that the Chronicler did not necessarily require the Messiah to be a king? This would mean that an exemplary high priest could have taken this position at the time of the Chronicler. v. 18 contradicts this theory, since the Chronicler deletes the phrase 'over Israel for ever' from his source. In v. 19, he omits the phrase 'or your children', thereby invoking the responsibilities of the present generation.

Various Reports on Solomon (2 Chr 8:1–18)

The source text of this passage (1 Kings 9:10–28) is not homogeneous in its content; however, the Chronicler regards the events described in it as a unity. They are placed in the period of the temple's foundation up to the project's conclusion. The successful expedition to Ezion-geber takes place at the same time (cf. vv. 16, 17). As Williamson (1987: 233) has nicely demonstrated, it represents a reward for the temple's construction. The Chronicler employs his usual methods in reworking his source material in this passage: he deletes (1 Kings 9:14–17a), he inserts (3, 4b–5, 11b, 13–16a), and he emends (v. 2).

vv. 1–6, according to Willi (1972: 76), the source model the Chronicler used was damaged, which would explain many of the discrepancies between the two texts. It is difficult to regard the Chronicler's usual editing methods as the cause of some of these. vv. 1–2, in the source text, Solomon is forced to cede twenty cities to Hiram, king of Tyre, the quality of which Hiram complains about. The Chronicler probably inverts this unwelcome information and drastically reduces its length. Another theory suggests that both versions could be applicable: Hiram and Solomon cede cities to each other (in an exchange?). Willi shows how easily the manuscript (see, amongst others, LXX) could be misinterpreted as to who gave what to whom. The source model's text does not presume that Hiram had to pay for the cities. The 120 talents of gold mentioned there do not appear in Chronicles and are more probably a gift or tribute, both of which are historically more unlikely than the cession of cities to Hiram. The idea that Solomon sent Israelites to settle there is unique and strange (cf. the Assyrian policy towards the defeated northern kingdom in 2 Kings 17:24–8).

vv. 7–10, the remaining population of other peoples were brought up as slave workers by Solomon. Israelites, who acted as guards, were exempted. v. 11, Solomon, proud at having the Pharaoh's daughter as his bride, builds her a house. This motif is unknown to the Chronicler (if he had taken it over, he would have asserted that the Pharaoh was proud to be able to marry his daughter to Solomon). He rewrites the information given in the source. Solomon's wife is not to come into close contact with holy matters, not because she is a foreigner, but because she is a woman. Thus a house is built out of necessity, rather than in a gesture of high regard.

vv. 12–16, the cult: the source model reports that Solomon made burnt-offerings and peace-offerings including incense three times a year (i.e. at pilgrim festivals) at the altar. The Chronicler greatly extends this passage. v. 13, the order of sacrifice is derived from Moses' instructions and conforms with the Pentateuch (cf. however, v. 14). The three annual festivals are named here, along with the daily sacrifices, which are sorely missed by the Chronicler in his source model. The sabbath and the new moons are also mentioned here. This systematized description aims at being complete. v. 14, the regulations regarding the temple personnel cannot be as easily derived from Moses as the Pentateuch's sacrifices, leading the Chronicler to refer them back to David. Does this signify a lesser dignity ascribed to them than the sacrificial rules?

The Queen of Sheba, Solomon's Wealth, and his Death (2 Chr 9:1–31)

(9:1–12) The Queen of Sheba's Visit The story of the Queen of Sheba's visit to Jerusalem, along with other reports regarding Solomon's wisdom, are probably among the latest pieces in the books of Kings. The Chronicler makes an almost identical copy of this story, since it fits extremely well in his political and theological plan, particularly in his striving for international recognition of Judah's rulers (cf. e.g. 1 Chr 14:17). The Chronicler makes a few stylistic changes to his source model (1 Kings 10:1–13) as well as two important theological alterations in v. 8, whilst strengthening Solomon's position in his relationship with the Queen of Sheba at certain points.

v. 8, the monarchy and the throne belong to God, as the Chronicler never tires of declaring. Thus he replaces 'set you on the throne of Israel' with 'set you on his [i.e. God's] throne'. Going beyond his source model, the Chronicler also emphasizes that God established Israel forever—a logical statement since the kingdom belongs to God.

(9:13–28) Solomon's Wealth The section contains substantial information regarding Solomon's splendour and power, following on well from the story of the Queen of Sheba's visit. Its content partly overlaps with the descriptions in 1:14–17. Solomon's power and wealth frame the description of Solomon's reign; in v. 26 the Chronicler includes 1 Kings 5:1. This insertion and other alterations distinguish the episode in Chronicles from its source model in 1 Kings 10.

v. 18, the Hebrew source model (wrongly) vocalizes 'round head' instead of 'bull head'. The Chronicler reads 'bull head', seeing it as a reference to heathen deities, unacceptable to him. Thus he replaces the phrase with 'a footstool of gold', adding more gold to the already richly decorated passage. v. 21, the expression 'ships of Tarshish' (1 Kings 10:22) roughly means 'large, seaworthy vessels'. The Chronicler misunderstands the phrase and lets the ships sail to Spain (Tarshish). Solomon and Hiram undertake a combined expedition in the source model. The Chronicler does not accept this, sending the king's ship to sea with no more than Hiram's men.

vv. 25–8, in this passage v. 25a corresponds with 1 Kings 5:6 (though the source model contains 40,000, instead of 4,000—a transcription error?), v. 25b with 1 Kings 10:26b, and vv. 27–8 with 1 Kings 10:27–8. Some of the omitted parts of 1 Kings 10 can be found in 1 Chr 14–17. It is difficult to discover the individual reasons for this complicated reorganization of the text.

(9:29–31) Solomon's Death v. 29, the Chronicler makes three changes to the source text's concluding acknowledgement of Solomon: 'from first to last' replaces 'all that he did' (1 Kings 11:41), a common correction made by the Chronicler. He also deletes Solomon's wisdom from the source model. The king is wise also in Chronicles, but this is not his most significant quality. For the same reason, the Chronicler deletes other passages referring to his wisdom. '[I]n the Book of the Acts of Solomon' (source model) is replaced by 'in the history of the prophet Nathan, and in the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite, and in the visions of the seer Iddo concerning Jeroboam son of Nebat'. Like David (1 Chr 29:29), Solomon is given three prophetic sources which the Chronicler claims to have reworked (they are of course none other than 1 Kings 1–11): Nathan was active at the beginning of Solomon's reign (1 Kings 1), whilst Ahijah appears at its end (1 Kings 11:29). Iddo is mentioned again as a source for the books of Kings in 12:15 (Rehoboam) and 13:22 (Abijah). He is not mentioned at all in 1 Kings, though the Chronicler may have recognized Iddo in the anonymous prophet of 1 Kings 13:1–10.

The History of Judah from the Division of the United Kingdom to its Collapse, and to Cyrus's Edict (2 Chr 10:1–36:23)

The Loss of the Ten Northern Tribes (2 Chr 10:1–19)

The kingdom's division presents the Chronicler with a difficult problem. According to Deuteronomistic literature, it is caused above all by Solomon's falling away from God. It is YHWH's will that the northern tribes should be ruled by Jeroboam, as his prophet Ahijah the Shilonite proclaims (1 Kings 11). The Chronicler ignores Solomon's falling away and sin, regarding the northern kingdom as illegitimate. Whilst he cannot even out all the contradictions resulting from this clash between the source model and his own ideology, the Chronicler attempts to conceal some of them: the omission of 1 Kings 11 increases Rehoboam's responsibility, even if this is immediately revoked by the reference to his tender age and the cowardly men around him at 13:7. Jeroboam appears in the same chapter, not as the upright man of 1 Kings 11, but as a rebel against Solomon rising up against the legitimate monarchy. The Chronicler's reinterpretation of 1 Kings 12 is a central theme in ch. 13 but only a side issue in ch. 10. Clearly, the Chronicler conforms with the source model's interpretation that the kingdom's division was God's will, thereby implying a reference to Ahijah's prophecy (omitted by the Chronicler) and thus to Solomon's guilt. The Chronicler's omission of Jeroboam's accession to the throne is self-explanatory.

v. 7, the Chronicler weakens the source model, by which Rehoboam should be a servant to his people, listen to them... only a friendly attitude towards the people, kindness, and good words are expected of him in Chronicles. Despite his democratic inclinations, the Chronicler cannot compromise the high position of the king.

Rehoboam (2 Chr 11:1–12:16)

(11:1–23) The Beginning of Rehoboam's Reign Rehoboam's reign clearly falls into two phases: he is rewarded for his adherence to the way of God by constructing fortresses, increasing the number of priests, Levites, and laymen from the north, and bringing up a large family. His increased power makes him arrogant, however, leading to his godless phase.

From now on, the Chronicler ignores everything that exclusively concerns the northern kingdom, concentrating on Judah (and its relations with the northern kingdom!). The Chronicler compensates for the loss of the report on Jeroboam by dealing with all important matters within the report inversely: building (1 Kings 12:25; Jeroboam's motives in building a fortress are to reunify the kingdom of Israel), religious life (1 Kings 12:26–33; the king makes two golden calves and sets them up in Bethel and Dan, and he appoints new priests; these measures are judged negatively), the family (1 Kings 14:1–18; Jeroboam loses a son). Conclusion: wherever Jeroboam acts wrongly or is unlucky, Rehoboam behaves correctly and is fortunate.

vv. 1–4, Rehoboam refrains from waging war against Jeroboam due to prophetic intervention. This is an example of the obedience for which he is rewarded. Here the Chronicler keeps closely to the source text (although he naturally omits the report on Jeroboam's coronation, since this affects the northern kingdom alone). vv. 5–12, God-fearing kings may build, and especially may erect fortresses. This is part of the Chronicler's dogma of retribution for which the enormous buildings of Alexander and the Diadochian kingdoms during the Chronicler's time must have served as an impressive example. vv. 6–10 are a list of the cities that were transformed into fortresses. Apart from Adoraim, all cities are mentioned elsewhere in the OT. They lie east, south, and west of Judah, but are not listed in any strict order, although the first four lie to the east. It is especially surprising that Arad is omitted and Hebron is mentioned last. The north is not protected by fortresses, inferring that Rehoboam did not wish to endanger the reunification they hoped for.

vv. 13–17 describe the consequences in Judah of Jeroboam's cult 'reforms'. According to the source model, Jeroboam placed two golden calves in Bethel and Dan and recruited new non-Levite priests who pledged allegiance to him. The Chronicler combines these two reports in one and adds to them (v. 15). He then states the essential consequences this had upon Judah. v. 14, 'they left their common lands and their holdings': a remark typical of the Chronicler, who was interested in possessions above all. The remark is not essential to the present context. 'Jeroboam and his sons': this expression makes a cryptic reference to the religious nature of future conflicts between the northern and southern kingdoms. v. 16, the reaction: laymen from the northern kingdom come to Jerusalem in an attempt to take part in the only legitimate sacrificial rite. Whether they are merely pilgrims or wish to settle in Judah is not entirely clear. Precisely what Jeroboam wished to avoid with his religious policy actually takes place: people pour out of the northern kingdom into Jerusalem.

vv. 18–21, according to the Chronicler, as is evident in the ‘genealogical forecourt’, a large family and numerous children are an indication of God’s blessing. The Chronicler does not report on Solomon’s large family, perhaps because it is combined with the idea of idolatry. His work contains numerous other references to large families (which do not appear in his sources—see e.g. 1 Chr 3:1–9). vv. 18–20, the statements concerning Rehoboam’s two wives cannot be made compatible with others mentioned elsewhere (or only by using extremely audacious constructions). What appears important is that (at least) the reader notices that Mahalath and Maachah are both closely related to David’s family.

(12:1–16) Rehoboam’s Established Rule and his Falling away from God The Chronicler typically reworks 1 Kings 14:21–31, using deletions and insertions, amongst other editing methods. The source text begins with a general description of Rehoboam’s rule, portraying the Judahites as terrible sinners, before continuing with Shishak’s military campaign and ending with the concluding judgement passed upon all kings in the books of Kings. In Chronicles, Rehoboam has already been active as king (11:5–23). Thus the text contains merely a programmatic reference to his kingdom’s increase in power and the king’s violation of the law, before leading directly on to Shishak’s campaign. As elsewhere in Chronicles, a prophet (Shemaiah) intervenes with words of reprimand. These have the desired effect, as Rehoboam becomes more God-fearing and therefore more powerful. From this point on, the Chronicler follows his source model more closely, with the paradoxical result of having to let Rehoboam sin once more to conform with it. The passage closes with references to the sources and a note on the king’s burial. Thus the Chronicler transforms a three-part structure in his source model (Rehoboam’s rule, Shishak’s campaign, Rehoboam’s rule) into two parts: Shishak’s campaign, Rehoboam’s rule.

The chapter is closely related to the story of the siege of Jerusalem by the Assyrian Sennacherib (ch. 32), i.e. the Chronicler creates this parallel by his restructuring of the text. In both cases a foreign ruler captures almost all of Judah, leaving Jerusalem untouched, having been saved by the correct actions of the relevant ruler (Rehoboam and Hezekiah respectively). Why is this story so important to the Chronicler that he should tell it twice, once with Rehoboam and once with Hezekiah? Because both ch. 12 and ch. 32 also shed light upon post-exilic Jewish life: Israel is punished, realizes what it is like to be ruled by a foreign kingdom (v. 8), but is not entirely destroyed (v. 12). Its life is restricted to Jerusalem, as was actually the case in post-exilic Jerusalem. These references are not immediately recognizable today, but would have been clear to the Chronicler’s contemporary reader.

vv. 1–2, at the moment of Rehoboam’s height of power—‘establishment’ becomes a central keyword in his reign—he (and his people alike) forsake God. Uziah behaves similarly in 26:16. The decline is described in rather colourless terms that are typical of the Chronicler—as in v. 2, where his favourite phrase, ‘transgressed against the LORD’, appears. The source model is more explicit in its description of Rehoboam’s crime. The Chronicler wishes to portray Rehoboam in a more positive light since he does not fail and receives an honourable burial. v. 3, going beyond the source model, the Chronicler describes the composition of the army according to the soldiers’ place of origin and weaponry. Lybians and Ethiopians: also in Nah 3:9; Dan 11:43 (perhaps taken from here); 2 Chr 16:8. The Sukkites appear only here. Does this structure perhaps indirectly mirror the Chronicler’s contemporary situation? The army is rather large, but not enormous in comparison to other armies against which Judah must fight. Those who regard this as documentation of a historic source readily assume that the 60,000 horsemen were actually 6,000.

v. 4, according to the inscription upon which Shishak describes his campaign, he seems mainly to have conquered (unfortified) settlements in the Negeb. Aijalon is the only city fortified by Rehoboam that is mentioned on the inscription. The Chronicler cannot allow the Pharaoh to conquer these cities without giving theological reasons. Thus, Rehoboam must be punished where he is strongest and where it hurts most. vv. 5–8, the prophet Shemaiah’s intervention is an example of regular interventions made by prophets at times when the king and his kingdom are in danger (cf. e.g. ch. 20). Shemaiah addresses the king and the princes of Judah. Judah is a political term while Israel is meant religiously, implying Judah’s claim to be the sole legitimate monarchy instituted by YHWH. Shemaiah’s speech is filled with theologoumena which are typical for the Chronicler, their order and the inclusion of elements found only here giving the text its unmistakable character. v. 5, ‘You abandoned me, so I have abandoned you’: the Chronicler uses such repetitions of the same (Heb.) words in his constructions. This also linguistically emphasizes the dogma of retribution expressed here.

vv. 6–8, the kings and princes act immediately and correctly as a consequence of this criticism. They humble themselves, which leads, also immediately, to God’s leniency in response: Jerusalem is not conquered, but its people must experience being ruled by foreign powers instead of the Lord. The Hebrew root of ‘servant/service’ is highlighted here and used three times. v. 12, things also went well in Judah: this either means that Judah itself behaved correctly, or that it did not suffer too much. For the Chronicler, these two sentences go together like two sides of a coin. Thus the uncertainty surrounding its correct translation is not important. vv. 13–14 describe a further phase of Rehoboam’s rule. As soon as he has recovered, Rehoboam immediately apostasizes again (cf. v. 1). Once more he is criticized only in general terms: ‘He did not set his heart to seek the LORD’ (typical terminology).

vv. 15–16, concluding remarks: by contrast to the source model text, the Chronicler clearly distinguishes between the earlier and later acts of Rehoboam. Which periods he separates thus is not, however, entirely clear. It is also unclear whether the records of Shemaiah and Iddo are a single text or two separate sources (cf. e.g. 1 Chr 29:29; 2 Chr 9:29). Cf. also 11:2 (1 Kings 12:22) (different spelling) regarding Shemaiah, and 13:22 regarding Iddo (probably identical with the one named here).

Abijah (2 Chr 13:1–23)

Both 1 Kings 15 and ch. 13 deviate from their usual descriptive practices when they turn to reporting on King Abijah. The source text contains only one piece of historical information that goes beyond the biographical notice (v. 7: ‘And there was war between Abijah and Jeroboam'). It also includes a negative judgement on Abijah's religious behaviour. Indeed, interestingly, it contains more information about David than about Abijah. The Chronicler does not use all of this information for his work; most surprisingly he deletes the negative judgement even though it was almost predetermined given that the king ruled Judah for only three years (short periods of rule were interpreted as an expression of a lack of divine blessing and thus insufficient God-fearing qualities). He offers no judgement on Abijah at all—treatment which is otherwise given only to Jehoahaz (36:1–4)! This is probably because the Chronicler did not wish to contradict his source model in Kings. There may be justification for his implied positive judgement in his reference to the state of war between the northern and southern kingdoms: the Chronicler understands the only information taken from the source text to mean that Abijah (only) once defeated Jeroboam in battle. He regards Abijah (rather than Rehoboam) as Solomon's worthy successor, as can be seen in some of his allusions. His war report is also an addition to his source material, the battle being preceded by a sermon on the mount which forms the core of the chapter, once again portraying the basic relationship between the northern and southern kingdoms.

vv. 3–20, this passage is composed of preparations for war, a lengthy speech, and the description of an actual battle. vv. 3–4, Abijah makes the initial impetus for war. His large army (400,000 men) is still only half the size of Jeroboam's (800,000—a figure originating from 2 Sam 24:9 and referring to David's census). Abijah's 'valiant warriors ... picked men', are faced by Jeroboam's 'picked mighty warriors'. Both these differences suggest that on human terms, Jeroboam/Israel should be victorious. vv. 5–12, Abijah's stylistically and rhetorically artistic speech concerns the legitimate rule of the Davidides (YHWH's rule), the legitimate office of priesthood in Jerusalem, and the legitimate (and pure) performance of ritual cult in the temple of Jerusalem. The northern kingdom has broken faith with all these principles. But Abijah's speech does not attempt to prove this fact, instead calling upon the people of the northern kingdom to return (to the Davidides and therefore to God). Mention of the legitimate priesthood (and the correct performance of rites) here clearly points to post-exilic times, perhaps even indicating a conflict with the Samaritans. vv. 6–7, 'Jeroboam, son of Nebat, a servant of Solomon son of David': naming the fathers of Jeroboam and Solomon serves to prove the illegitimacy of Jeroboam's claim to the throne. An explicit judgement on Jeroboam's errancy appears only here in Chronicles: he rose up and rebelled against Solomon; Rehoboam is partly excused by his youth and inexperience (though he was 41 years old when he acceded to the throne: 12:13). The judgement has a theological nature. Who exactly the vain men that gathered around Jeroboam were remains unclear—possibly mercenaries, though more probably the young men who advised Rehoboam poorly (10:10).

v. 9, it is important for the Chronicler that the priesthood comprises the sons of Aaron (actual priests) and the Levites. The accusation made here refers to 2 Chr 11:14. The northern kingdom appoints its own men as priests, bringing forward a young bullock and seven rams (two were prescribed by the law for the anointing of priests—this may be an exaggeration rather than an alternative interpretation of the law). Does this imply that the northern priesthood could be bribed? For the phrase, 'no gods', cf. Hos 8:6. v. 11, here the people of the northern kingdom are also indirectly accused of failing to perform the cultic rites correctly (though, of course, by definition there can be no legitimate cult in the north). The correct temple service is described at some points (cf. e.g. 8:12–15). Whilst 1 Kings 7:49 (cf. 2 Chr. 4:7) describes Solomon ordering ten lampstands, there is only one here. It may be that there was only one lampstand in the post-exilic temple, or that the Chronicler was inspired by Ex 25:31, which describes the tabernacle with only one golden lampstand.

v. 12, 'the LORD, the God of your ancestors', YHWH cannot be taken from the Israelites! God, the priests, the war trumpets and the battle sound (in that order) form the Judeans' 'arsenal' for holy war. This indeed subsequently takes place, its elements naturally appearing in a spiritual form. vv. 13–15, the battle and the way it is carried out show a mixture of elements of holy warfare—especially on the Judean side—and tactics, as pursued by the Israelites, who prepare an ambush which proves unsuccessful. Judah itself must take the initiative and cry to the Lord, who alone brings Jeroboam and all of Israel to its knees. vv. 16–17, only once YHWH has triumphed can the Judeans become active in (pursuing and) defeating the Israelites, destroying more than half its army. The Chronicler emphasizes with a note of regret that these were chosen men. v. 18, he who is God-fearing and seeks the Lord will be heard and supported—this is a central declaration of the Chronicler's theology. v. 19, the precise references (along with the place-name in v. 4) have been interpreted by some exegetes as evidence underlining the plausibility of the reported battle. More probably, however, this reflects post-exilic Judean territorial claims.

v. 20, the phrasing suggests that Rehoboam died an unnatural death (cf. 21:18; 1 Sam 25:38), though no mention of this is made elsewhere in the tradition. Contrary to the Chronicler's statement (which is perhaps meant only theologically), Jeroboam outlives Abijah by several years. It is also possible that the Chronicler inverted information he possessed to create this version of events (cf. 2 Chr 8:2). v. 21, as is so often the case, Abijah's blessing consists of increased power and a large number of wives and children. v. 22, in this passage the Chronicler mentions a different source, that is, the midrash ('story') of the prophet Iddo, from those of his own source model. 'Midrash' must be understood in the ancient sense (the term is repeated only once in the entire OT, at 24:27), rather than in the technical sense of 'interpretation'. Both 9:29 and 12:15 refer to the prophet Iddo. v. 23 (cf. 14:1), the Chronicler emends his model slightly, adding (amongst other changes) that the land had rest for ten years. This suggests that the king behaved in a God-fearing manner (cf. next section).

Asa (2 Chr 14:1–16:14)

(14:1–7) Asa's Rule until the War against the Cushites This section deals with three themes: (1) Asa's cultic reforms (vv. 1–5); (2) his building projects (vv. 6–7); and (3) his reinforcement of the army (v. 8).

v. 1, 'In his days the land had rest for ten years': this sentence has often been seen as a reference to the reign of Asa's predecessor Abijah (especially due to its position). Here the Chronicler probably uses it to highlight Asa's religious reforms. vv. 2–4, in view of such ideal rule, these reforms seem unnecessary, at least for the period reported. But the Chronicler respects his source model which reported the measures, and such reforms often characterized kings judged positively in Chronicles. He also makes some changes to his source material, which, for instance, mentions abolition of the hierodules (male prostitutes) and all edifices (1 Kings 15:12–13). The situation Asa is confronted with at the beginning of his reign in Chronicles is not as serious as in the source model, though bad enough for the Chronicler. v. 3, the abolition of the high places contradicts 1 Kings 15:14. v. 4 is a description of desired positive action using key terminology ('seek the LORD') and Deuteronomistic ideas of the law and the commandments. vv. 6–7, the information regarding Asa's building projects (which also characterize kings who are judged positively) can hardly be based upon non-biblical sources, since it is too general.

v. 8, one of the most controversial debates on Chronicles concerns its possible use of non-biblical sources to report on the structure of the Jewish (and Benjaminite) army. Junge (1937) suggests references to such sources using the argument that the information given is precise and free from any religious bias or a Chronicles-based perspective. It is based on the army levy, though the figures given portray the situation at the time of Josiah rather than Asa. Welten (1973: 100–7) also points out the probability that the difference between the heavily armed Judeans and the lightly armed Benjaminites stems from the existing Hellenistic armies at the time of the Chronicler. The same influence also results in the Chronicler's evident interest in economics, power, and the military: he is a child of his own time.

(14:9–15) Asa's War against Zerah the Ethiopian The Chronicler takes the opportunity of the newly established army to prove its—and therefore YHWH's—effectiveness. He describes a (holy) war in which human strength is nothing in comparison to divine intervention. Such portrayals are common in Chronicles, the most prominent of which can be found in ch. 20. The Chronicler probably expands both these local conflicts into all-out wars which leave Judah victorious and richly rewarded, having called upon the help of God. The report is unlikely to portray a conflict during Asa's rule, but should be regarded as a reflection of contemporary Jewish conflicts with their neighbours rather than as mere fiction.

v. 9, neither the Pharaoh Osorkon I nor Egyptian mercenaries from a settlement in Gerar can be meant by the Cushite (NRSV, Ethiopian) here. They are probably Edomite-Arab nomads (and contemporaries of the Chronicler) searching for slaves and booty. Zerah is an Edomite name in the OT, whilst Cush is connected with Midian in Hab 3:7 and does not refer exclusively to Egypt/Ethiopia. Mareshah, one of the cities that Rehoboam is said to have fortified, was a centre for Edomite (Idumean) slave trade according to the Zenon papyri (261–252 BCE). Cf. also 1 Chr 4:39–43; 5:10. vv. 11–12, are a carefully structured theological interpretation of the battle events. Asa calls upon YHWH, the only hope for the greatly outnumbered Judeans against the advancing enemy. The Lord acts, leaving the Israelites as onlookers. vv. 13–15, once the battle has ended successfully, the Judean army is permitted to go into action. The booty plundered from the enemy is a rich reward. The Chronicler emphasizes these aspects by his detailed description. v. 14, 'the fear of the LORD was on them': elements of a holy war which seem incongruous with the contextual descriptions of pillage but which suit the Chronicler's theology well. v. 14, 'the cities around Gerar': in the 9th century this area was under the influence of the Philistines. v. 15, 'tents... sheep... goats... camels': this clearly confirms that the defeated enemy was an Arab-Edomite tribe.

(15:1–19) Prophetic Words and the Renewal of the Covenant

The contents of this passage do not seem to fit into the present context, since there is no reason for a warning after a war had been won because of dependence on God, and it has therefore occasionally been attributed to a different author. According to G. von Rad (1958: 261–2), the passage is a Levite address, while other OT commentaries see its source in post-exilic synagogue ceremonies. Such theories overlook the fact that Azariah's speech forms a carefully crafted theological commentary whilst simultaneously looking to the future with a particular call not to sit around doing nothing. The Chronicler does not restrict himself to commenting on individual events in his speeches and prayers, often at least hinting at theological principles and sometimes discussing them extensively. This particularly applies to v. 2. Azariah's speech, which has a strongly anthological style, can be divided into three parts following its introduction: (1) principles; (2) a historical retrospect (without concrete historical information); (3) consequences for the future.

v. 1, Azariah is a common name in the OT, though a prophet Azariah is unknown elsewhere. Like so many other figures, he is probably the Chronicler's own invention. 'The spirit of God came upon...': as Japhet (1993: 717) demonstrates, this phrase is used in Chronicles in connection with prophets who are lesser known elsewhere in the OT. Their endowment with the Spirit is also their initiation: cf. 1 Chr 12:18; 2 Chr 20:14; 24:20. v. 2, the speech's introduction addresses a notably broad audience: Asa, Judah, and Benjamin (the Israelites from the northern kingdom cannot be mentioned here). The Chronicler states his general case three times using some of his favourite vocabulary, in keeping with his dogma of retribution: God's attitude towards his people corresponds with their attitude towards him. Only part of the vocabulary of the previous passage is used here.

vv. 3–6, his historical perspective clearly refers to the judges period (cf. e.g. Judg 2:11–14; 17:6). It is interesting as a time of political and religious unrest during which the highest priority corresponded with the Chronicler's attitude towards his own time, namely the need for (religious) order and security. v. 3 is a midrash-like reworking of Hos 3:4. But whilst the source model uses three pairs of political and cultic images to illustrate the anarchy at this stage, the Chronicler limits himself to religious/theological aspects. He probably used Hosea here due to his affinity for pithy expressions. v. 6, whilst vv. 4–5 can be understood in the context of the judges period, this cannot be applied to v. 6. Is this a reflection of the problems facing the Chronicler's own time, which he wishes to portray as solvable by inserting hidden references to the judges period into other verses? v. 7, typically for Chronicles, Azariah's speech ends with a call for courageous deeds. Here the Chronicler explicitly claims what he elsewhere indirectly hints at, clearly using Jer 31:16 as a model: 'For your work shall be rewarded'. The idea of reward was important to the contemporary period since the Jews' actual room for manoeuvre was very limited. If they did not make full use of it they might disappear. But for them it was worthwhile to use all their strength only when they were sure that their work would be rewarded.

Asa reacts immediately to Azariah's sermon, carries out cultic reforms, and subsequently initiates a great assembly (modelled on 2 Kings 23), during which the people enter into a covenant. The sacrificial ceremony is characterized by great joy and enthusiasm, two emotions close to the Chronicler's heart. The passage closes with events also described in the source model (Maacah the queen mother is removed, the high places remain, dedicated silver and gold is handed over to the temple). There are close linguistic parallels with Azariah's sermon here (especially as regards the vocabulary).

v. 8, the reform and the festival are not only characterized by generalizations, but also by concrete reform measures which are not described elsewhere. '[A]bominable idols' is an expression found only here in Chronicles, although the author came across the term several times in his source text. '[A]nd from the towns that he had taken in the hill country of Ephraim': is the Chronicler referring to Geba and Mizpah here—cities Asa built (!) after his war with Baasha? These are only roughly in the vicinity of the mountains of Ephraim (16:6). Perhaps he is referring to his father Abijah's conquest (13:19), since the reigns of both kings are regarded almost in unison. The statement could also stem from the Chronicler's assumption that the northern kingdom repeatedly lost land to Judean kings after the kingdom's division right up to the time of Josiah. '[R]epair the altar of the LORD': this seems to be a normal measure (cf. Ezra 3:2–3) which perhaps marks the resumption of ordered cultic life.

v. 9, besides Judah and Benjamin, the general assembly includes people from the northern kingdom who are understandably regarded as 'strangers' from the Chronicler's perspective. Not only do they come from Ephraim and Manasseh, but also from Simeon (cf. 34:6). This (southern!) tribe had historically disappeared much earlier. The Chronicler was perhaps thinking biblically, referring to the Simeon who settled near Shechem (Gen 34:25). It is important for the author that there were always reasonable northern people seeking reunion with the only legitimate cult and the legitimate Davidic monarchy. v. 10, 'fifteenth year': probably a round number. The war with the northern kingdom must have taken place during that year. 'Third month': the date of the Sinai theophany and the Feast of Weeks. The connection between the Sinai theophany—including the law—and the Feast of Weeks stems from an idea from the Christian era (2nd cent. CE) and probably was not thought of by him or at his time. He was probably thinking only of the Feast of Weeks, though he does not mention it specifically. v. 11, this feast, probably more ideal than real, begins rather than ends, unusually, with sacrifices. '[S]even hundred . . . and seven thousand' are rounded, ideal numbers with seven as their root, linking them with the term for the Feast of Weeks.

v. 12, are God and the people or the king and the people partners of this one-sided covenant aimed at seeking God with heart and soul? Azariah's sermon (including the Chronicler's important theologoumenon, 'If you seek him . . .') is successful (cf. v. 13). v. 13, punishment for breaking the covenant is draconian. The death penalty is used only for serious religious crimes (cf. e.g. Deut 13). It underlines that seeking YHWH is not regarded as a casual duty. The text explicitly emphasizes that this applies not only to grown men, but also to the young and the old, and to men and women. vv. 14–15, the surprising oath made during this festival has a simple reason: in Hebrew the term for 'swear' has the same consonants as 'week' and 'seven'. The Chronicler uses an almost plethoric vocabulary in describing the joy, enthusiasm, and commitment felt by the people. vv. 16–18 detail cultic (and political) measures also described in 1 Kings 15:13–15. v. 16, Asa destroys and burns his mother's idol in the Kings source. The Chronicler adds to this a third action, 'crushed it', which draws parallels between Asa and Josiah, who is shown to have acted likewise towards Asherah in 2 Kings 23:6. v. 17 contradicts 14:2, so it has occasionally been suggested that the author meant only the high places in the northern kingdom of Israel. (This place-name is not found in the source model.) Other commentaries assume that the Chronicler originally omitted the verse in the source model, but later transcripts accidentally included it.

v. 19 leads into the next, negative phase of Asa's reign.

(16:1–14) Asa's Dark Period and Death In the second brief phase of Asa's reign (the 1st–36th years were positive; up to the 41st year was negative) the king behaves badly and is accordingly punished. Whilst he proves himself in battle in the first period, he fails in war in the second. Once, he listens to Azariah, later he ignores Hanani's sermon. But since his reign is judged positively when viewed in its entirety, Asa is given an honourable, indeed exceptional, burial. Besides the seer Hanani, three other (unnamed) prophets dominate the chapter: Isaiah's proclamation (v. 7), the words of Zechariah (v. 9), and Jeremiah's suffering (v. 10).

v. 1, in his report on Baasha's war with Asa, the Chronicler keeps to his source model (1 Kings 15:16–22) aside from a few stylistic, geographical, and theological alterations. Seen in its entirety, the Chronicler shows little interest in the course of events. v. 2, this is illustrated by his omission here of Benhadad's more detailed presentation as the 'son of Tabrimmon son of Hezion'. vv. 7–9, Hanani's speech is short and strongly prophetic. v. 7, the Chronicler knew Hanani the prophet (from 1 Kings 16:1, 7) as the father of another seer, Jehu. Since he needed a 'contemporary' prophet/seer, he uses him here, cf. also 19:2. The Chronicler makes a central statement in Isaiah's message his own. In dangerous military circumstances, it is important to trust in the Lord rather than a coalition with a foreign army; cf. Isa 7:9; 10:20; 31:1. v. 8 is a reference to the first, God-fearing period of Asa's reign and his successful application of faith in battle. Chariots and horsemen do not win the war, but God does, a truth enshrined in many classic statements of the OT, cf. Isa 31:1. v. 9, the wording of 'you have done foolishly' is a reference to 1 Sam 13:13 (Saul's first rejection). The first part is a clear parallel to Zech 4:10. 'The eyes of the LORD viewing all the lands' underlines his omnipresence and his ability to help Asa should he wish to do so. '[F]rom now on you will have wars': since Asa took Azariah's sermon to heart during the positive period of his reign, the Lord granted him 'rest all around' (15:15). There is, however, no further mention of war, so does this refer to Jehoshaphat, despite its contradiction of the Chronicler's theology (cf. 2 CHR 16:11–14)? v. 10, Hanani suffers a similar fate as Jeremiah (Jer 20:2–3) at the hands of an angry Asa. The people Asa is said to have repressed are perhaps followers of Hanani.

vv. 11–14, the concluding acknowledgement of Asa's reign is much more extensive than the source model. The unusual placing of words of appreciation before the description of his burial is perhaps due to the fact that his son Jehoshaphat had already taken on the business of government since Asa's illness rendered him unable to rule. v. 12, Asa becomes ill due to his shameful behaviour towards the seer Hanani. The Chronicler may have chosen sickness as punishment since the king's name can be interpreted as 'YHWH heals'. An alternative theory is suggested in the comment on v. 14. It is impossible to say whether Asa died of gout, dropsy, gangrene, venereal disease ('feet' being a euphemism for sexual organs), or another disease. v. 14, the extensive and positive description of Asa's burial clearly shows that on the whole he was judged favourably (though the king had already prepared for his own burial). There is hardly any reliable historical evidence on this matter. The Chronicler takes the reference to the funeral pyre from Jer 34:5 (cf. also 2 Chr 21:19), whilst the incense and the delicate spices probably accord with contemporary practices. Asa's name is occasionally interpreted as stemming from the Aramaic word for 'myrrh'. The Chronicler consequently allowed Asa to be buried in a way that accorded with his name (see comment on v. 12 for an alternative interpretation).

Jehoshaphat (2 Chr 17:1–20:37)

This reign is reported with relative brevity in 1 Kings 22:41–51, though everything portrayed is positive with the exception of the still-remaining high places, where sacrifices and incense offerings continue to take place. v. 46 refers to successes and wars fought by the king as documented in the 'Book of the Annals of the Kings of Judah'. The Chronicler frames his description of events with this material (vv. 41, 42–51) adding to them his description of the war against Aram which was fought together with Ahab (1 Kings 22:1–38). He also inserts a large amount of information: a general description of the king's reign (ch. 17), a report on judicial reform (ch. 19), and finally the story of his successful military campaign against a coalition of Transjordanian peoples (ch. 20). The Chronicler probably did not find this original material in any sources, but inferred it from 1 Kings 22:46 and the king's unusually long period of reign, as well as the positive judgement on him. There is a simple reason why the source model does not praise the king so extensively. Ahab is the dominant figure in the text and is particularly interesting due to his confrontations with prophets faithful to YHWH.

(17:1–18:1) Jehoshaphat's Peaceful Period This chapter divides into three parts: two general judgements on Jehoshaphat's rule (17:1–6, 10–19), the first concerning itself more with domestic politics and religion, the second dealing with foreign and military policy. The third part reports on teaching the law to the people (17:7–9).

17:1–7, the language and subject of these verses are typical of Chronicles. v. 1, 'strengthened himself over Israel' (i.e. the southern kingdom) is a more probable translation than 'strengthened himself against Israel' (i.e. the northern kingdom), in view of the content and context of 1:1. At the time of Jehoshaphat/Ahab there were no conflicts between the two kingdoms. The Chronicler perhaps phrased this sentence in a manner similar to 11 in order to draw a parallel between Jehoshaphat and Solomon. v. 5, Judah gives presents to Jehoshaphat, i.e. pays tribute to him—something which was usually reserved for those who have forced subservience upon others (but cf. 1 Sam 10:27): such is the reward for God-fearing behaviour, making Jehoshaphat a very wealthy man. The term usually translated as 'honour' should here be translated as 'wealth'. v. 6, despite his wealth, Jehoshaphat remains humble and behaves in a God-fearing manner: he removes the high places and Asherah poles from Judah—though this contradicts 20:33.

17:7–9, all Judah is informed by the royal officers, Levites, and priests (in that order!) on the book of the law of the Lord (probably the five books of Moses). This is surprisingly undertaken on the king's initiative (Japhet (1993: 749) suggests that this relates to normal practice during the Persian period: Ezra 7:25). In pre-exilic times, this was the task of the priests. According to the OT, it was only in post-exilic times that Levites were also included. The Deuteronomistic demand that the people should know the law is put into practice here in a democratic manner appropriate for the Chronicler: the ruling classes play the role of educators to the advantage of the entire population. To what extent post-exilic custom (cf. Ezra's reading of the law in Jerusalem) has been revised to conform with pre-exilic practices is difficult to discern.

17:10–19 is a second summarizing description of Jehoshaphat's reign. v. 10, the Chronicler clearly emphasizes that all the lands around Judah (and therefore Judah itself by implication) were struck by fear of the Lord. This thought must have been a consolation to members of the tiny temple state in the middle of an almighty Alexandrian or Ptolemaic kingdom. v. 11 documents the tribute paid by other peoples. See also 27:5. Mention of the Arabians makes it unlikely that the Chronicler used a (historically reliable) independent source here. vv. 14–19, these statements on the army's composition are closely linked with those concerning the construction of forts. Their language shows that they are later additions, since expressions such as 'the muster of them according to ancestral houses' clearly point to exilic and post-exilic times. If the Chronicler had copied a list here, it would have been more rigidly structured (Welten 1973: 84). As elsewhere, he differentiates between army divisions from Judah and Benjamin, also mentioning the Benjaminites' (light) armour, that is, bows and shields. The numbers of individual army divisions are strongly exaggerated (going beyond all contemporary estimates of Judah's population), especially since these figures do not include the soldiers already deployed in the forts. The Chronicler does at least respect the fact that Judah is larger than Benjamin. v. 16, voluntary service is one of the Chronicler's favourite attitudes.

(18:1–19:3) Jehoshaphat's Support of Ahab's Campaign Focusing more on prophecy than on the campaign against Ramoth-gilead, the Chronicler uses 1 Kings 22 as material for this chapter, whilst giving it a different introduction and conclusion. The motivation behind following this source might be to show that true YHWH-prophecy also existed in the northern kingdom, or perhaps to underline that Jehoshaphat is somewhat better than Ahab, for it is on his initiative that the four hundred prophets are consulted, followed by Micaiah. But these are at best secondary issues. Japhet (1997: 311) refers to the most important reason: although the Chronicler ignores the history of the northern kingdom, he follows parts of the books of Kings in which Israel and Judah interact with each other.

The Chronicler makes only few changes to his source model. Nevertheless, the story's two versions carry different weights: in 1 Kings 22, it forms part of the conflicts between the northern kingdom and Aram. It concentrates particularly on how Ahab dies (which is greatly shortened in Chronicles). The later version neglects the historical background, turning a story about Ahab into one about Jehoshaphat (nor is the Israelite king's death interpreted as fulfilment of prophecy).

18:1–3 does not follow the source model closely. v. 1, referring back to 17:5, the Chronicler points out that Jehoshaphat is a wealthy man, whilst his comment that Jehoshaphat's son Joram married one of Ahab's daughters stems from 2 Kings 8:18, 27. This marriage was probably driven by mutual political interests. Mentioning Jehoshaphat's wealth underlines that it was not necessary for his family to marry into Ahab's house, since he was regarded as an apostate. The statement could also imply that Jehoshaphat's wealth made him immune to blackmail. From v. 4, the text follows 1 Kings 22 closely.

19:1–3, unlike Ahab, Jehoshaphat returns home peacefully, thereby literally fulfilling Micaiah's demands (18:16), though not complying with the spirit of his plea. v. 2, Jehu, Hanani's son (see 16:7), confronts Jehoshaphat. 'Love' and 'hate' are not emotional terms here, but are used as part of a political vocabulary. Here, 'to love' means virtually to form a coalition. God's anger at Jehoshaphat does not materialize, unless the attack made by the Transjordanian alliance described in ch. 20 is seen in this light. v. 3, without going back on the accusations made in v. 2, the Chronicler places them in relation to the good things/deeds (singular expression) Jehoshaphat did. He removed the Asherahs from the land and, going beyond this concrete action, showed a positive attitude towards the Lord by setting his heart to seek God (one of the Chronicler's favourite expressions).

(19:4–11) Jehoshaphat's Legal Reforms The Chronicler's report can be divided into two parallel sections: vv. 5–7: judges in the fortress cities, and vv. 8–11: judges in Jerusalem, each consisting of their appointment (vv. 5, 8), and Jehoshaphat's speeches (vv. 6–7, 9–11).

The historical reliability of the legal reforms, which scholars have occasionally ascribed to Josiah, is the subject of strong debate. Whilst there is consensus regarding the tone of the sermon, which is heavily influenced by the Chronicler's opinions, the question of whether reliable historical information lies behind the speech is unclear. Evidence for such a possibility has been shown in a large number of general and specific arguments, of which only some can be mentioned here: Japhet (1993: 772–4) points out that such reforms would have been necessary following the division of the Davidic/Solomonite double monarchy, and that Jehoshaphat's skilful handling of domestic and foreign politics indicates that he was capable of reforming his system of government. Certain details do not correspond with Deuteronomic specifications. Ordering the Levites before the priests (v. 8) is not regarded as the Chronicler's work, whilst the rank of 'governor of the house of Judah' (nāgīd, v. 11) was only necessary during the monarchical period. According to Wellhausen (1886: 96–7) and many commentaries following him, the report is a complete fabrication by the Chronicler, who developed a 'midrash' from Jehoshaphat's name (which means 'YHWH judges'); vv. 5–11 reflect the legal system during the Chronicler's lifetime. We accept this theory, whilst suggesting that the Chronicler also inserted some ideas on an ideal legal system.

v. 5, the appointment of judges in the fortress cities, city by city. The Chronicler was particularly interested in the fortress cities, taking pains to deal with each equally and fairly (city by city, cf. e.g. 17:7–9). For this reason he digresses from his source model, Deut 16:18, where judges are appointed in all cities and all tribes. v. 6, two significant factors emerge in the first of the Chronicler's two sermons: he values the deeds of those addressed, therefore often using the verb 'to do', as he does here. Furthermore it is important that everything occurs in the service of YHWH and in his name.

'[H]e is with you': a theologoumenon typical of the Chronicler, which he probably drew from Ex 18:19, a passage also dealing with legal reforms. The Chronicler is probably attempting to draw parallels between Moses and Jehoshaphat here. v. 7, attributes of YHWH here are directly demanded from the judges in Deut 16:19 (though cf. Deut 10:17). The judges must behave as the Lord does. This, though indirectly expressed, is a more weighty responsibility than the demands made in Deut 16:19. v. 11, the many names and functions give the impression of concrete, historical reliability and are especially representative of the Chronicler. The names Amariah and Zebadiah appear only in Chronicles. On the Levites' description as officers cf. 1 Chr 26:29 (23:4) and 2 Chr 34:13. The term is probably used here because it appears in the source model, Deut 16:18.

It is difficult to determine what exactly is meant by the 'matters of the Lord' and the 'king's matters'. Because he makes this distinction, the Chronicler must name a 'governor of the house of Judah', who is responsible for the matters of the king, to stand by the high priest, who obviously deals with religious matters. The Hebrew term for him (nāgīd) is rather neutral, but the Chronicler did not have a better word at his disposal.

(20:1–21:1) Jehoshaphat's War against a Transjordanian Coalition and other Reports This lengthy battle report is unique to the Chronicler and serves as a replacement for 2 Kings 3. The action on the field is kept to a minimum, since the battle is exclusively YHWH's affair (v. 15) and the enemies destroy themselves. Israel only gains the spoils of war and, more importantly, speaks, prays, sings, and plays music (in unison), thereby giving the battle an entirely spiritualized atmosphere.

The exact place-names, not all of which can be identified (the region of En-gedi, the Dead Sea, Judean desert, Tekoa, Beth-lehem, Jerusalem), point to a limited area and therefore to local skirmishes rather than a great battle. It is unlikely that Jehoshaphat's conflict with his Transjordanian neighbours forms the core of this report. It probably reflects hostilities between the temple state and groups of its eastern neighbours during or shortly before the Chronicler's lifetime. The Chronicler shifts these minor conflicts into the past and inflates them to almost cosmic proportions. So long as God is at its side, even a small community need not be afraid. This is the consoling message the Chronicler is attempting to pass on to the reader.

v. 1, the Transjordanian armies advance to face Jehoshaphat in battle: they comprise Moabites, Ammonites, and Meunites (as named in the Septuagint, replacing the already mentioned Ammonites). Noth (1944–5: 58–60) believes them to be Nabateans, whilst Welten (1973: 142–5) and others regard them as Idumeans. vv. 2–4, Jehoshaphat is informed about the opposition and vast size of the enemy army. 'Edom' instead of 'Aram' would be more geographically fitting here. Jehoshaphat is afraid, not because he is timid by nature, but because the enemy army is huge. He seeks YHWH (one of the Chronicler's favourite phrases) and proclaims a fast (as was particularly popular in post-exilic times) in reaction to the crisis. The ensuing success is great and their efforts are impressive.

vv. 6–12, Jehoshaphat's prayer, which has often been called a 'national lament', refers to their present crisis, but also contains an element of dogmatism. YHWH is addressed here with one of the Chronicler's favoured expressions, namely, 'O LORD, God of our ancestors'. He is described as the ruler of all peoples who gave the Israelites their land, thus being simultaneously the God of the whole world and the God of a specific people. He can aid his people against all the enemies in the world. The recapitulation of salvation history by the Chronicler is limited to vague references to the Conquest. Its beginning is linked with the name of Abraham. v. 9 is a traditional list of possible calamities and can also be found in ch. 6 (and elsewhere). (The specific situations in which one can call upon God are not restricted to moments of crisis in this chapter.) vv. 10–12, YHWH's might and his gift of land strongly contrast with the Transjordanian military power-structures which are swiftly shown to be no match. Israel had refrained from attacking their Transjordanian neighbours on YHWH's orders (Deut 2). Now, however, Jehoshaphat draws attention to their threat by appealing to YHWH's own interests: they must be expelled from his land. Jehoshaphat closes his prayer with a plea for help, using the language of psalms in his emphasis upon human weakness.

v. 13, in another example of the Chronicler's democratic tendencies, this verse stresses that all Judah—even women and children—assembled in such a time of need. vv. 14–16, a characteristic, salvatory oracle takes centre-stage in the portrayal of YHWH's war. God's spirit does not fall upon a prophet, but (appropriately for the temple setting) a Levite whose long lineage links him with Asaph, the original temple musician at the time of David. Jahaziel, who addresses Judah, Jerusalem, and the king (in that order!), calls upon them twice not to be afraid and repeats two of the Chronicler's most important theologoumena: the war is YHWH's; he is with the Judeans. Jahaziel speaks in v. 17 as Moses does in Ex 14:13–14. Geographical points have also been inserted in v. 16. The religious speech dominates the section, insisting that it represents an answer to the concrete Transjordanian threat. vv. 18–19, Jehoshaphat, all Judeans and the citizens of Jerusalem worship YHWH in joyful reaction to the oracle's promise of salvation. They are followed by the Levites, who also praise God even before he has saved them.

vv. 20–8, following Jehoshaphat's orders, the Israelites behave in battle as if they were holding a religious service. Jehoshaphat makes a further speech, calling upon his people to have faith in God and his prophets (a reference to Isaiah's 'If you do not stand firm in faith, you shall not stand at all', Isa 7:9. Cf. also the same logic in sentences such as Ex 14:31). If they take these thoughts to heart, success is assured. After these brief words of encouragement, the king consults the people to develop a liturgical battle order. In keeping with Chronicles' continuous theme, 'His steadfast love endures for ever' (cf. e.g. 5:13; 7:3, 6), Israel draws its enemy nearer so that YHWH can act at the moment of greatest faith. He sets (either heavenly or worldly) ambushes amongst the three advancing armies so that they destroy each other. Both motifs (ambush and self-destruction) exist elsewhere in the OT and are therefore part of a tradition. The entire reaction in v. 20 takes place early in the morning, i.e. the time at which God usually acted.

vv. 24–5, the spiritual battle is interrupted. The Chronicler uses all his skill to portray the size of the spoils, the largest in the entire OT: the list of booty is long, many objects are qualified by adjectives, the spoils take three days to be collected and can hardly be carried. This enormous prize and the fact that not a single member of the enemy armies survives, underline the momentous nature of the victory. In holy wars, the spoils must be left to YHWH. The Chronicler, however, has good reason to break with this tradition. King and country are to be rewarded for their exemplary behaviour. The dogma of retribution is a little stronger than the rules of YHWH's wars. vv. 26–8, the war ends where it began, in Jerusalem, in the temple, and (typically for Chronicles) with music. vv. 29–30, cf. 17:10. By contrast to that passage, fear of YHWH spreads not only across all Judah's neighbouring kingdoms, but beyond this, to all the kingdoms in the region. Only now is Judah safe from all its enemies—a reward for the country's exemplary behaviour.

v. 33, 'yet the high places remained': this contradicts 17:6 and, like other incongruencies in Chronicles, cannot be explained. 'The people had not yet set their hearts on the God of their ancestors' represents the Chronicler's characteristic interpretation of his source model. He gives the reason for the acts mentioned in the source model. He is interested in the basic attitude underlying them. ('The people still sacrificed and offered incense', 1 Kings 22:43.) Chronicles asserts the same basic attitude towards Jehoshaphat as expressed in its source model. v. 34, as so often, the Chronicler names a prophetic source for his portrayal of Jehoshaphat's reign; one, however, which was also used in the book of the Kings of Israel. For Jehu, see 19:2. vv. 35–7, in Kings, Jehoshaphat acts alone in building up the fleet that is destroyed at Ezion-geber, before declining Ahaziah's offer of support. Chronicles, however, portrays both kings acting together and consequently failing together. Failure implies a sin in the Chronicler's eyes. In this case, it is the result of the otherwise good King Jehoshaphat's alliance with the northern king. The Chronicler justifies such a reinterpretation of the story by interpreting 'Then said Ahaziah' (1 Kings 22: 49) as 'Ahaziah had said'. So Ahaziah's offer referred not only to the journey but also to the building of the fleet. Jehoshaphat accepted this offer.

v. 37, as customary for Chronicles, a warning is made by means of a prophet. Jehoshaphat is given the opportunity to cancel his godless plans; he does not take this chance and is therefore condemned to failure. His concluding judgement, however, is not particularly affected by his final act of godlessness.

Jehoram (2 Chr 21:2–20)

Asa and Jehoshaphat, two kings with relatively positive judgements, are followed by Jehoram, who receives very poor verdicts in Kings and (consequently) in Chronicles. Since 2 Kings 8 does not report much about him, the Chronicler is forced to expand substantially on his model, thereby omitting one source reference (v. 23). He reports extensively on the king's brothers—something which occurs nowhere else in Kings or Chronicles with the exception of David. Ch. 21 is thus unique. It is also special since not a single prophet appears in flesh and blood, since Elijah only sends a letter containing a threat of punishment (rather than a warning). Jehoram is not granted an opportunity to convert—another unusual factor in Chronicles. The passage following the letter contains a description of the punishments threatened by Elijah.

The relationship between the source model and its interpretation is one of doubling: the source model describes one sin and one punishment, whilst Chronicles portrays several sins and consequently double punishment. The chapter is dominated by the ubiquitous theme of the Davidic dynasty, influencing events even beyond the source model.

vv. 2–4 concern Jehoram and his brothers. One would expect v. 5 (describing Jehoram's reign) to be placed before this passage. The Chronicler, however, refrains from using this sensible order so that he can insert the text from the source material in a single block. Jehoram's brothers, who are twice notably described as the sons of Jehoshaphat, are given tasks in the fortified cities. Although this passage contains no concrete references other than names, commentaries are surprisingly unanimous in regarding this assertion as historically reliable. v. 2, Jehoshaphat is called 'King of Israel' (though this has erroneously been corrected to read 'King of Judah' in certain Bible translations, including NRSV). 'Israel' must be regarded here as the ideal Israel, comprising both the southern kingdom of Judah and the northern kingdom of Israel, a title the Chronicler consistently clung to. v. 4, both good and bad deeds often occur in Chronicles immediately after the relevant king's accession to the throne. Thus Jehoram has hardly come to power before he brutally murders all his brothers and several notables. No reason is given for these murders (perhaps because they were known to the reader). He was probably driven by a lust for power or the fear of losing it.

vv. 8–11, it is unclear in the source whether Jehoram actually defeated the Edomites. It may be that they defeated him, forcing the king to escape through enemy lines. The Chronicler subtly changes the text (or perhaps used a different source), thereby clarifying events. He does not mention the people's flight into their tents and writes 'and his chariot commanders' instead of 'to Zair' (two phrases which sound similar in Hebrew). Is this a reading or writing error, or the version considered most appropriate by the Chronicler? vv. 10–11, Jehoram ought to have understood the loss of Edom and Libnah as a warning, but instead he continues to commit sin. At this point, the Chronicler's unique material begins. The high places are cultic sites respected above all others by the people. A king's continuing tolerance of such places is not regarded as a particular crime. Jehoram, however, is accused here of the grave crime of establishing (rather than tolerating) them as well as encouraging Jerusalem and Judah to worship idols.

vv. 12–15 document Elijah's letter. It is impossible to establish from biblical accounts whether Elijah, who is largely ignored in Chronicles since he was active in the northern kingdom, could have lived during Jehoram's reign (cf. e.g. 2 Kings 1:17). In any case the Chronicler was not particularly interested in questions of chronology. The idea that a prophet could make a written declaration probably stems from a (post-exilic) time in which the transcription of oral prophecy enjoyed increased importance. vv. 12–13, in the first part of the letter, Elijah accuses Jehoram of the crimes already described, keeping close to the text of the previous verses. Jehoram is directly and indirectly compared with various other kings: David, Jehoshaphat, Asa, and Ahab. The theme of the Davidic dynasty strongly influences this chapter. vv. 14–15 list Elijah's threats of punishment, all of which are fulfilled (vv. 16–19). vv. 14–15, 16–19, use very similar language. Jehoram must be punished, along with his people, his family, his property, and (representing the only details mentioned by Elijah) his body.

vv. 16–19, maybe these verses reflect contemporary events, i.e. skirmishes of the temple state with its south-western neighbours. '[T]he Arabs who are near the Ethiopians': cf. 2 Chr 14:9. Keeping the focus of his attention on the Davidic dynasty, the Chronicler only briefly describes the plague which strikes the people (cf. v. 14), whilst portraying the deportation of the king's property, wives, and sons in greater detail. Only the youngest son survives. Jehoram's crimes lead almost to the disappearance of the Davidic monarchy. vv. 18–19, the Chronicler describes Jehoram's final punishment most extensively, namely his painful, incurable, yet indefinable sickness. Suggestions include diarrhoea or a stomach ulcer leading to a chronic rectal prolapse.

v. 20 is a continuation of the statement on Jehoram in v. 5. As a consequence of his godless life, Jehoram does not receive an honourable funeral. Nobody mourns for him (unsure translation). The Chronicler knew from his study of the Elijah tradition that idol-worshipping led to the destruction of Ahab's dynasty and applied this logic to the (almost eradicated) Davidic line.

Ahaziah's Year-Long Reign (2 Chr 22:1–9)

The source model for this chapter portrays events during the king's reign in the context of the revolutionary crisis developing in the politically more significant northern kingdom. Ahaziah's death is integrated into the story of Jehu's revolution and plays only a minor role. In Chronicles, however, events in the northern kingdom are mentioned only if they are required to explain Athaliah's fate. The following sources are used: vv. 1–6 correspond with 2 Kings 8:24b–9 (although the Chronicler made some changes and, above all, additions). vv. 7–9 are the Chronicler's extremely brief summary of 2 Kings 9:1–28 and 10:12–14. Only here does he use such a literary technique. The main message of his reworking summary of these verses in Kings is that religious and political co-operation with the breakaway, godless northern kingdom must lead to downfall.

v. 1, in an emendment to his source model, the Chronicler stresses that the people of Jerusalem made Ahaziah king. There is no parallel with this in the entire OT: reports concerning the co-operation of larger classes at the royal installation refer to the 'people of the land'. The verse refers back to 21:17 and clarifies why of all Jehoram's sons, the youngest should become king. v. 2, 'forty-two years old': cannot be correct, since it would mean that on the day of Ahaziah's accession to the throne he was older than his father. (The source states twenty-two years, whilst LXX states twenty.)

vv. 7–9, from this point, the Chronicler writes quite independently. The passage is framed by two sentences in which the authorial voice is particularly clear. This digression from the source model's narrative flow can be explained by the Chronicler's theologically motivated interest in placing Ahaziah in the centre of his account. He does not use an old source for this. v. 8, according to Chronicles, it is the sons of Ahaziah's brothers that are murdered, and not his own brothers, as in 2 Kings 10:12–14. There is a simple explanation for this: Ahaziah's brothers have been deported (and perhaps murdered, 2 Chr 21:17). The two texts should not be assimilated by interpreting 'brothers' in terms of 'relatives'. Chronicles also describes the murder of several princes. Are these a replacement for the Israelite notables murdered by Jehu in 2 Kings 10:11? v. 9, the source model describes events differently: Ahaziah is wounded while fleeing near Ibleam, but gets as far as Megiddo, where he dies. He is subsequently transported to Jerusalem and buried alongside his fathers. The Chronicler omits many of these details, perhaps because he presumed knowledge of these events, leaving Ahaziah to die in Samaria, the evil capital. The Chronicler does not explicitly confirm that he is also buried there. Ahaziah receives a burial here only because of his ancestor, Jehoshaphat, who is regarded as having been God-fearing his whole life. This somewhat undermines the dogma of retribution. 'And the house of Ahaziah had no one able to rule the kingdom': the Hebrew term for 'be able' is one of the Chronicler's favourite expressions, since he admired strength and power and repeatedly wrote about such values.

Athaliah the Usurper Queen and the Enthronement of Joash (2 Chr 22:10–23:21)

Once Ahaziah and the Judean princes have been murdered, the kingdom finds itself in a similar situation to that at the end of Saul's career (as portrayed in 1 Chr 10), giving meaning to the reference to David (see e.g. 23:3). Indeed the Chronicler's description of the early phase of Joash's reign shows similarities with that king (especially the theme of concern for the temple and the cult). King Joash is saved by a secret plot and later placed upon the throne. The Chronicler characteristically turns this plot into a popular enterprise. The fact that, had the people been involved, Athaliah would have discovered the plan and crushed it does not concern the author. He turns a political act in the source text into one of religious politics, in which the priests and Levites play the leading roles. The high priest Jehoiada, somehow the guardian of the young king (24:3), is more prominent in the Chronicler's version than in the source model. What is his exact position? Some commentaries see him as unifying in some way the offices of king and high priest, as was practised during the Chronicler's lifetime. Williamson (1987: 113–14) and some others, however, think that the portrayal of Jehoiada by the Chronicler contains implicit criticism of the lust of contemporary high priests for political power; Jehoiada is just not striving for it. The king's daughter Jehoshabeath is also given a more conspicuous role in Chronicles (v. 11). A large number of commentaries regard the statement that she is the high priest's wife to be historically reliable despite the lack of evidence to support this from elsewhere. It would at least explain why she had such easy access to the temple grounds (cf., however, 8:11). It is more likely that the Chronicler joined them together on the logical basis that since both played key roles in the same project, they must be husband and wife.

(23:1–21) vv. 1–3 are analogous with 2 Kings 11:4. The Chronicler turns Jehoiada's secret plot, involving only the captains of the royal guard, into a major campaign including the Levites and the entire community. v. 1, going beyond the source model, the Chronicler characterizes and judges Jehoiada's actions: he 'took courage'. All those involved in the plot are named, lending it a degree of tangibility. With the exception of Elishaphat, all the names appear in the lists of priests and Levites in Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles. vv. 4–5a, neither these orders nor those in the source are entirely clear, since routine tasks that the author of Kings (and presumably the reader) knew well enough are not reported. The Chronicler follows certain guidelines laid down by Kings, describing the guards and the division of forces into three parts. The rest of the content is completely altered, so that the royal guards, whose duty it is to protect the king, are replaced by priests, Levites, and the people. Here, they serve the added purpose of keeping others from entering the temple. It is difficult to interpret the significance of the different localities mentioned. v. 7, the royal guard can only be composed of Levites since they alone have the right to enter the temple precinct. '[A]nd whoever enters the house' is a religious adaptation of the more militarily orientated 'whoever approaches the ranks' in the source (2 Kings 11:8). The Levites are also required to prevent the king from entering the temple.

v. 8, 'for the priest Jehoiada did not dismiss the divisions': the way the Chronicler conceives the temple personnel's organization (see also 1 Chr 23–6) clearly serves as a background for this reference. v. 13, 'standing by his pillar at the entrance' should perhaps be corrected to read, 'at his place at the entrance'. The source reads: 'standing by the pillar, as was the custom'. The Chronicler clearly wishes to emphasize that even the king could not enter the temple. Unlike the source, Chronicles does not have just trumpets announcing the joyful occasion, but adds various other musical instruments. This also strengthens the religious atmosphere of the celebrations.

vv. 16–21, the source reports on two covenants: (1) Between the king, the people, and God. (2) Between the king and the people. Since the Chronicler has already introduced the second in v. 3, he limits his description to the first (according to the Hebrew text) between Jehoiada, the people, and the king (although the people are mentioned first, unlike the source). God is not a reciprocal partner in the covenant; the human partner alone has obligations—towards God (cf. 15:12). vv. 18–19 describe positive cultic reforms. In Chronicles, these occur at times when the legitimate temple service has entirely collapsed. Jehoiada organizes the offices (priests and Levites) and their cultic duties (sacrifices and music), referring back to the law of Moses and David's orders (since Moses made no law concerning cultic music).

Joash's Reign (2 Chr 24:1–27)

As with Asa, this description is divided into two phases, namely a God-fearing and an apostate period. The second phase hangs not on a rather implausible criticism of 2 Kings 12:3, but on the king's violent death indicating previous failings. This leads to a radical reinterpretation of the source model, and especially to striking additions such as the lengthy passage concerning the appearance of prophets and Zechariah, the son of the priest Jehoiada (vv. 17–22). The Chronicler can hardly have used his own independent sources for this section (cf. 2 Chr 24:26, however).

(24:1–3) The Chronicle v. 2, 'all the days of the priest Jehoiada' (source: 'all his days, because the priest Jehoiada instructed him'): this slight emendment makes it easier for the Chronicler, who is unique in describing Jehoiada's death (v. 15), to divide Joash's reign into two periods. The source model judges the king positively, since 2 Kings 12:3 is only a minor comment. The result is that the Deuteronomist generally judges the king positively (v. 3, which deals with sacrifices and incense-burning by the people at the high places, had to be omitted by the Chronicler since it occurred during Joash's positive period).

(24:4–16) The Restoration of the Temple and Collection of Money This passage sticks as closely to its source model in some ways as it diverges from it in others. Only the main variations are mentioned here. According to the source, priests can claim a certain amount of money for the temple, but have the responsibility of using such money to restore the temple. Since they have neglected this duty for a long time the king relieves them of it, and with it the right to oversee the temple contributions. These are collected in a chest and passed on to craftsmen as payment for their work in good faith. This becomes a long-term system. The Chronicler converts it into a single payment (though to be repeated, v. 5) which primarily involves the Levites (Levite priests), deletes the source's criticism of the priests (vv. 4–8), and interprets the laymen's contributions as a form of taxation, similar to the tax collected in the desert in connection with the tabernacle. Furthermore, in another divergence from the source, he allows the unspent contributions to be used to buy cultic material.

v. 6, this is a relatively awkward definition of the tax imposed upon the Israelites by Moses to pay for the tabernacle

(Ex 30:13; 38:26). In a certain way it replaces the still more difficult expression in 2 Kings 12:5. Since the tax should be equally high for everyone, the laymen's generosity cannot be mentioned here. The joy with which they make their contributions is emphasized instead (v. 10). v. 8, by changing the source model, the Chronicler secures the chest's position in a place to which laymen have access. v. 13, in characteristic fashion, the Chronicler underlines the craftsmen's good work, pointing out that the temple will look as it did at the time of its original construction. Thus continuity is guaranteed. v. 14, unlike the source model, the unused money is used to produce cultic objects so that proper sacrificial burnt-offerings can be carried out. This occurs as long as Jehoiada is alive. vv. 15–16, only Jehoiada, who lives longer than Aaron (Num 33:39) and dies as an aged man 'full of days' (like patriarchs and others), is buried 'among the kings'. This is the clearest expression of his standing as a truly regal priest.

(24:17–22) Joash's Falling Away v. 18, the Chronicler uses typical vocabulary to describe Joash's fall: e.g. 'abandoned the house of the LORD', 'sacred poles', and 'idols'. To clarify the connection between his deeds and his fate, the Chronicler already mentions the result of his religious crimes, although the idea is only brought to its conclusion in vv. 23–5, after the theological/historical exposition in v. 19 and Zechariah's appearance in v. 20. v. 19, the Chronicler expresses one of his most important theological statements here: the Lord gives sinners the opportunity to return to his way by sending prophets to them. These occasionally manage to convert their addressees. Unfortunately this is not the case here. v. 20, the principle is followed by its application. The prophet Zechariah, who is not mentioned elsewhere, wishes to convert the people. He does not use this term, however, merely pointing out that God-fearing behaviour leads to success (one of the Chronicler's favourite themes). 'Because you have forsaken the LORD, he has also forsaken you': a precise expression of the dogma of retribution. v. 21, the reaction to this mild, well-intended call to repent is shocking: the king orders Zechariah to be stoned to death, in the forecourt of the temple. (A legal stoning must take place in a public place, cf. Deut 17:2–7.) v. 22, showing no gratitude to Jehoiada, the king kills his son Zechariah. His dying words are slightly emended lines from Ex 5:21, expressing the king's inability to escape his fate.

(24:23–7) The Syrians' Victory and Joash's Death The Chronicler uses no source of his own here, radically rewriting 2 Kings 12:17–18 to emphasize his theological priorities: the source text describes Joash being spared by the invading King Hazael upon payment of an enormous tribute from the temple and palace treasuries. In Chronicles, the Arameans take action (though their king does not appear). Although they are greatly outnumbered by the Judeans, they defeat them. Thus the Chronicler's favoured theme of a small Judean force defeating powerful armies with the help of God is reintroduced and inverted. vv. 25–6, although the king's burial takes place in the city of David (due to his earlier good behaviour) he is not buried amongst the kings (as a result of his sins). v. 26, the Chronicler changes the names of the conspirators (there is probably no damage to the text). This gives them similar names (since they carry out their plan together), turns their fathers into mothers, perhaps because Shimeath's 'ath' ending was mistakenly interpreted as female, and declares them to be foreigners, for which there is no evidence in the source model. Does this imply that nothing better can be expected from sons of foreigners? The Chronicler's positive attitude towards mixed marriage would contradict this. His attitude towards the plot itself is also unclear. v. 27, 'Story' is the right rendering of 'midrash' here: cf. 2 CHR 13:22, which is the only other passage in the OT containing the word.

Amaziah (2 Chr 25:1–28)

The Chronicler takes all his material concerning Amaziah from 2 Kings 14, reworking it according to his narrative and theological principles. He greatly extends 2 Kings 14:7, which describes the victorious battle against Edom, by portraying the troops' selection, the appearance of a man of God before the battle, and of a prophet after its conclusion. vv. 7–10 are often regarded as having stemmed from an independent source available to the Chronicler, since they do not conform with his theology. In the source model, King Amaziah is judged positively except for one small criticism. Since he falls victim to a conspiracy, the Chronicler's logic dictates that he must somehow have offended God: he is thus accused of worshipping Edomite gods, although this seems to contradict his honourable burial (cf. 2 CHR 25:28, however).

vv. 1–4, apart from minor, yet characteristic emendments, the Chronicler keeps close to his source model. v. 2, he repeats the source's positive judgement on Amaziah, though radically shortening the criticism it contains, adding one of his favourite phrases as replacement: 'yet not with a true heart'. This serves as a precursor to his later fall whilst at the same time being relatively mild. vv. 5–6 describe the selection of troops and the recruitment of mercenaries. The notes regarding this army differ from comparable passages connected with military campaigns (and are not used to assess the king). Despite the traditional mention of both Judah and Benjamin, only Judah's weaponry is listed, leading Welten (1973: 92) to suggest that the inclusion of Benjamin is a secondary gloss. Recruiting Israelites is not only a godless act (v. 7), but is also unnecessary given the size of the Judean army (cf. 14:7; 17:14–19, however).

vv. 7–10, a man of God appears. Like the prophet in vv. 15–16, but contrary to the Chronicler's more common practice, he remains unnamed. This, however, need not indicate a source which the Chronicler did not dare to emend, since the passage contains the Chronicler's usual theology: a battle is not decided by armies (and their strength), but by YHWH alone. v. 7, 'the LORD is not with Israel': this is not a principle, but is due to their faithless attitude. v. 8, the Hebrew text may be damaged here and may require correction to clarify the point that the king is mistaken if he believes he can achieve victory by strengthening his forces with mercenaries, and will fall.

vv. 11–13, the Chronicler takes the report of a victorious battle against the Edomites in 2 Kings 14:7 and develops it further to create a midrash. Although he does not mention the name of the battleground (Sela is Joktheel), he uses the meanings of these two names. He probably understood Sela to be the contemporary Petra (i.e. 'rock', sela' in Heb.). This name and Joktheel (God destroys) probably gave him the idea of the Edomites' cruel treatment. It also allows him to omit the conquest of the city of Sela. vv. 14–16, the king behaves both foolishly and godlessly. The great powers of the Near East often took the gods of defeated nations back home with them in order to win their new subjects' favour. This does not occur here. To worship the gods of defeated powers is seen as particularly futile. In keeping with the Chronicler's habit, the king is warned about this matter by another anonymous prophet. Yet the king dismisses the prophet and even threatens to execute him. The passage is cleverly interwoven with several keywords: according to v. 10, the mercenaries' anger is kindled against Judah, whilst the Lord's wrath is kindled against Amaziah in v. 15. The king accuses the prophet of being an unwanted counsellor, whilst the latter reminds him of God's own forgotten counsel (v. 16). The same Hebrew root—meaning 'take counsel' also occurs in v. 17.

vv. 17–24, having reworked and extended his source model up to this point, the Chronicler has created the conditions to use the source's subsequent description of Amaziah's defeat without significant changes. The king must fail since he sought the Edomite deities (vv. 15, 20). His foolish behaviour is contrasted with that of his sensible Israelite counterpart. This is another example of the Chronicler's subtly diversified attitude towards the northern kingdom. v. 20, 'it was God's doing' is the most important addition made by the Chronicler in this section, since it explains Judah's subsequent defeat: they sought the Edomite gods. The vocabulary here is typical for the Chronicler: cf. 10:15; 22:7.

v. 28, 'in the city of Judah' (Heb. text): the source writes: 'in Jerusalem... in the city of David' (probably 'in Jerusalem' because he died in Lachish). Perhaps the text should be corrected to conform with the source. Perhaps the Chronicler changed it, however, so that this not-so-glorious king did not receive too splendid a funeral.

Uzziah (2 Chr 26:1–23)

Uzziah's fifty-two year reign is surpassed in length only by that of Manasseh. Beyond the customary information, the books of Kings (2 Kings 14:21–2; 15:1–7) report only on the fortification and conquest of Elath and the king's illness. The Chronicler adopts this meagre frame, deletes its mention of the people's continued sacrifices carried out at the high places, and inserts details concerning wars, construction projects, agriculture, military organization, and the army's weaponry (vv. 6–15). In keeping with the Chronicler's dogma, Uzziah's long reign and successes are regarded as a result of seeking God. The same logic dictates that Uzziah's illness was caused by a previous failing as described in vv. 16–21. Thus, like some kings before him, Uzziah's reign falls into two periods: one positive and one negative.

v. 5, Uzziah's positive attitude towards YHWH is expressed by the favoured term, 'to seek God', which is coupled with the resulting, 'God made him prosper'. Zechariah, who is given no title here, teaches the king to seek God (maybe the Heb. text should be emended—as in NRSV: 'in the fear of God'). He appears at this point because Uzziah is named in the book of Zechariah (Zech 14:5; unless this is a reference to the Zechariah mentioned in Isa 8:2). As long as Zechariah lives, Uzziah behaves well, thus linking him with Joash, who falls away only after the death of the priest Jehoiada.

vv. 6–15, the historical reliability of these statements is the subject of debate. Some exegetes regard its precise, informative style and the exact place-names as evidence of its plausibility, and even as archaeological fact. This is contradicted by the existence of nearly all the Chronicler's most valued themes and the possibility that the details described could reflect events that occurred shortly before or during the Chronicler's own lifetime. If sources were used here, they were radically reworked. v. 7, the existence of Arabs in the Judean sphere of influence is anachronistic. Exegetes view them as Bedouin, and consequently regard v. 7 as being based on contemporary sources. See comment on 2 CHR 20:1 regarding Meunites. v. 8, the Chronicler always describes 'Ammonites' (in Heb.), as 'sons of Ammon' elsewhere. This may be another spelling mistake for Meunites (v. 7). v. 10, the description of Uzziah's building projects in the south is supported by archaeological evidence that could, however, stem from the time of Jehoshaphat or another king! It is written in the tone of Ptolomaic times, emphasizing economic factors which had already gained importance during the Persian period and were further developed by the Ptolemaeans. The claim that Uzziah loved agricultural matters should be regarded in this light. v. 15, the artfully designed machines are probably catapults which were invented around 400 BCE in Syracuse, according to Didorus Siculus' literary documentation. Jews must first have encountered catapults (and similar hurling implements) during the siege of Tyre in 332 BCE. The Chronicler transforms them into defensive weapons, accrediting their invention to a Judean king. Other interpretations of these machines are too artificial.

vv. 16–23, at the zenith of his power, Uzziah grows proud and commits a sin. His fall, which is described using typical terminology, is caused by his entrance into the temple. This would have been permitted in pre-exilic times, but post-exilic values forbid such an action. His attempts to burn incense are, however, entirely unacceptable. The priests warn the king, thus serving the same purpose as prophets: according to the Chronicler's logic, every sinner is given the opportunity to turn away from his godless behaviour and be reassured of YHWH's good intentions. Uzziah becomes angry, opposes the priests, and is immediately smitten with leprosy. From this moment on, he must live in a separate house, euphemistically described as the house of freedom. His son rules as regent. This episode, which contrasts with the Chronicler's usually calm and schematic style, shows signs of OT sources which inspire his own imaginative narration: one such source may have been 1 Kings 13, in which the fallen King Jeroboam burns incense at the altar in Bethel.

Jotham (2 Chr 27:1–9)

The Chronicler is unlimited in his praise for Jotham. This explains the changes he makes to his source model. Rezin and Pekah cannot threaten Judah as early as Jotham's reign since he commits no sin. The positive judgement on Uzziah (25:2), which is repeated in the chapter on Jotham (v. 2), is weakened by the Chronicler, using a positive statement on the latter: 'only he did not invade the temple of the LORD'. The statement is linguistically linked to the source model's, 'Nevertheless the high places were not removed' (2 Kings 15:35), which it replaces. Jotham receives threefold reward for the exemplary behaviour described in the Chronicler's unique material in vv. 3–6: (1) He builds more than in the source model, namely various kinds of fortresses on Judean territory, as well as the upper gate of the house of the Lord and on the wall of Ophel. (2) He defeats the Ammonites, who do not have a common border with Judah at the time of Jotham's reign. This note is made slightly more historically plausible (though by no means convincing) by suggestions that he is referring to the Meunites here. (3) Jotham receives an extremely high tribute from the Ammonites for the period of three years. The Chronicler probably had contemporary circumstances in mind when writing these three statements.

Ahaz (2 Chr 28:1–27)

From a historical perspective, Ahaz's reign is dominated by the Syro-Ephraimite war, during which the kingdoms of Israel and Judah were in conflict with each other. The Chronicler, who takes every opportunity to expand on the errant nature of the northern kingdom, does just that here. He wishes to emphasize that reunification is almost possible at this point in time. But whereas Israel was responsible for the original partition of the kingdom, it is Judah that prevents a reunion here. Ahaz is godless and does not regard punishment as an opportunity to convert, indeed even worsening his behaviour following each form of punishment. After its victory over Judah, Israel is humane towards the vanquished, heeding YHWH's word. This chapter is a mirror image of ch. 13, in which Judah and Israel have exchanged their roles. This main goal explains almost all of the (sometimes surprising) changes the Chronicler makes to his source model, including those statements whose meanings he inverts.

v. 3, whilst the source model reports that Ahaz let his 'son pass through fire', the Chronicler has his 'sons'. He thus turns a unique act into a cultic rite known to have been performed more than once by Ahaz. He even specifies the site of the ritual (cf. amongst others Jer 7:31–2), simultaneously using it as the place at which Ahaz carries out his (obviously illegitimate) sacrifices. These elements do not exist in the source model. vv. 5–8 concern the war against Syria and the Ephraimites. Whereas the source model describes Israel and Aram's campaign against Judah as a minor success and draws no causal links with the southern kingdom's apostasy, the Chronicler transforms this into a series of painful blows to Judah under Ahaz. He does not use an unknown report on the Syrian-Ephraimite war or any other conflict as a source here. He also separates previously coherent factors in order to allow for his description of the lengthy conflict between Israel and Judah (vv. 5b–15), whilst the war against Aram takes up merely half a verse (5a). vv. 5b–8, in a battle which is not clearly described, Israel crushes Judah, the number of victims perhaps being an implicit comment on the kingdom's original unity (120,000 = 12 tribes). The Chronicler's explanation for this defeat is stereotypical—because they had forsaken 'the LORD, the God of their ancestors'.

vv. 9–15: the Good Samaritans. The following report is, as its title suggests, the main source used by Luke for his well-known story (Lk 10:25–37), as a number of identical details underline. It was conceived exclusively by the Chronicler. Suggestions that this is not the Chronicler's own narrative, due to its pro-Israelite tone, are not plausible. The Chronicler has nothing against the (all too rare!) YHWH-faithful Israelites, even rejoicing at their existence. Furthermore, his praise for their exemplary behaviour is facilitated by the absence of the king's name, as if the northern kingdom had already been destroyed by the Syrians. (The entire chapter makes allusions to the Babylonian Exile: cf. e.g. vv. 5, 8.) vv. 9–11, Oded's sermon is typical for Chronicles, declaring to his people that YHWH's wrath, rather than they themselves, was responsible for the defeat of the Judeans. Should they continue to live in such an godless fashion, YHWH's wrath would also befall them. Using a keyword for this chapter, Oded describes them as 'brothers' (NRSV, kindred) thereby using the strongest term to describe the political and religious connection between the Israelites and the Judeans. vv. 14–15, the prisoners receive clothes, food, water, and medical attention—evidence of their humane treatment. The Chronicler may have been inspired by the description of the Israelites' exemplary behaviour in 2 Kings 6:22 and applied it to Oded's sermon. v. 15, the parallels with Lk 10 are strongest here. Why are the prisoners taken to Jericho of all places? Is it merely because Jericho lies on the border between Judah and Israel?

vv. 16–21, the source model describes how Ahaz is forced to seek Tiglath-pileser's support and thus pay him a tribute from the temple and the palace. Tiglath-pileser accepts the offer, defeats Damascus and deports its citizens, and kills king Rezin. The Chronicler changes the chronology of events, by placing the statement that Rezin had returned Elath to Edomite hands, forcing the Judeans out of the city, before Tiglath-pileser's campaign. He also radically rewrites the passage: he describes the Edomites waging war against Judah (deporting further captives—an allusion to the Exile, v. 17), also allow the Philistines to attack Judah (v. 18), all because of Ahaz's godless behaviour (v. 19). This is the reason for Ahaz's appeal to the Assyrian king (v. 16). vv. 20–1, contrary to the source model's description (and historical fact), Tiglath-pileser does not come to his aid, he even attacks him. The Chronicler's logic dictates such circumstances, since those who are in difficulties should not appeal to foreign powers, but to the Lord. Ahaz calls upon the Assyrian king for help (v. 16), but is not helped by him (v. 20; another verb in Heb.), nor does it help to offer him a tribute (v. 21). The play on 'help' is obvious. Unlike the source model, the tribute does not stem only from the temple and the palace, but is also financed by the princes—a further, somewhat curious example of the Chronicler's democratic tendencies.

vv. 22–5 document the cultic sins of the king. According to the source model, Ahaz orders the construction of a copy of the altar he saw in Damascus, giving the priest Uriah comprehensive instructions concerning it. The Chronicler transforms the altar into a place of worship for the gods of Damascus, thereby increasing Ahaz's sin.

Hezekiah (2 Chr 29:1–32:33)

(29:1–36) Cultic Reform and the Temple's Consecration The Chronicler wrote more extensively about Hezekiah than any other king who ruled Judah alone. He used 2 Kings 18:9–12 as a source model, greatly reworking its middle sections and adding material on the cult. Hezekiah the politician in Kings (only 2 Kings 18:4 concerns the cult) is thereby transformed into Hezekiah the reformer of cult in Chronicles.

vv. 3–11 report the king's speech. vv. 3–4, immediately after his accession, i.e. without delay, the king opens the doors of the temple: this act, which takes place on the eighth day of his reign according to v. 17, symbolizes his resolute attempt to restore order. Since the temple is still unclean, Hezekiah is forced to hold the meeting with his priests and Levites elsewhere, at the square on the east. vv. 5–11, the frame of the speech (vv. 5, 11) calls upon the Levites (and priests) to become active. The middle section (vv. 6–10) concerns sins (vv. 6–7), their effects (vv. 8–9), and the consequences the king draws from them. The vocabulary used to describe Judah's situation warns of the forthcoming exile, clearly drawing parallels with the terminology used in Jeremiah.

vv. 12–19 describe the cleansing of the temple. vv. 12–14, the Levites immediately begin their work. Two sons of each of the seven families are named. The number seven is a keyword in this chapter (cf. e.g. vv. 17, 21) and can be regarded as an aesthetic concept. The last three sons named (Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun) are the singers ascribed to the Levites. Cf. 1 Chr 15:5–7 regarding the first three names. The Kohathites are probably priests (who are required for the temple's cleansing, since they alone are permitted to enter). Elizaphan is mentioned elsewhere only in 1 Chr 15:8; maybe he serves to make up the number. vv. 15–17, having sanctified themselves (an act that is not described further), the Levites and priests go straight to work. The king's order is in accordance with YHWH's law as applied by Hezekiah. The tasks are divided in the only way possible: the priests remove unholy material from the temple whilst the Levites carry it from the forecourt into the Kidron valley. v. 17, the chronological statements here do not conform with the information in v. 3. It is, however, an important point that sanctification of the temple was completed on the sixteenth day, forcing a delay in the Passover feast. This could be regarded as early muted criticism of the priests as a precursor to a more overt reproach later on (30:3). vv. 18–19, the report to Hezekiah indirectly underlines his leading role in the project. For the first time in this chapter, Ahaz is explicitly mentioned. It is no doubt deliberate that the temple equipment is the centre of attention here. The utensils guaranteed continuity with Solomon's temple in post-exilic times for the construction of the second temple; they were returned by the Persians to those who resettled Jerusalem.

vv. 20–36, a great cultic feast, without parallel in the OT, takes place once the consecration of the temple has been completed. It probably represents a mixture of cultic rituals during the Chronicler's lifetime and sacrificial laws laid down in the OT. Besides Leviticus, Ezek 43–5, the procedure for sanctifying altars (Num 7:88), and the report concerning the consecration of the second temple (Ezra 6:17; 8:35) all play an important role. These similarities mainly apply to the sacrificial animals. The feast has three parts: preparations, sacrifices made by the princes (and carried out to purify the temple and free it from sin, along with great musical accompaniment), and the sacrifices made by the people, which are made voluntarily and joyfully. v. 24, it is perhaps a measure of the festive occasion that the priests themselves and not the laymen perform the slaughter. The verse is a further indication of the king's initiative. vv. 25–6, the Chronicler emphasizes how Hezekiah reorders the cult (making him almost comparable to David). This new order is secured as rigidly as possible: it refers back not only to David, but also to Gad and Nathan, who lived during his reign. The order of music, however, is from the Lord through his prophets. vv. 31–5, once the temple has been made worthy for ordinary worship by sacrifices, the second part of the feast takes place. Hezekiah then calls upon the congregation to make further burnt offerings, to which it responds positively. The Chronicler first mentions the people's voluntary offerings here—they are not mentioned elsewhere in his book.

(30:1–27) The Passover The measures described in the previous chapter are closely linked to the Passover feast. It is important for the Chronicler that Hezekiah should carry out all the significant measures in the first year of his reign. His accession comes at a time when the northern kingdom may already have fallen. The Chronicler cannot imagine that there would be anything Hezekiah would not have undertaken to achieve reunification. Since this is impossible by political means, due to the Assyrian threat, he portrays the king making a final attempt to restore the unity of the cult. This description is often considered to contain historically reliable elements, especially since negative aspects are also reported on. But these are limited and probably reflect contemporary problems.

Ch. 30 contains the first description of a complete pilgrimage in the OT, perhaps mirroring one as it took place during the Chronicler's time. The first part of the chapter (vv. 1–13) describes preparations for the Passover feast, whilst the second, slightly longer section deals with its celebration. It surprisingly coincides with the festival of Unleavened Bread, as does the subsequent festivity.

vv. 1–7, in keeping with the Chronicler's democratic convictions, the king, the princes and the people decide to celebrate Passover. Due to the lack of preparation for such a feast (v. 3), they decide to delay it until the second month. This strictly speaking grave aberration from the cultic calendar is not criticized by the Chronicler since he values the basic change in attitudes here and also tacitly refers to a previous occasion when this occurred (Num 9:6–13). According to Deuteronomistic teachings, the Passover was a family celebration until King Josiah centralized it in Jerusalem. This is of no interest to the Chronicler, who refers directly to the duties laid down by the law, describing them comprehensively, though rather unconventionally. Following this successful, indeed unanimous assembly, the king sends messengers all around the country and particularly to the northern kingdom. v. 1, in an example of his narrative skill, the Chronicler begins the chapter with calling his readers' attention to this point before mentioning the assembly.

vv. 6–9, the messengers spread across the country and recite a sermon to the audience. Its central message is expressed using a play on words: return to YHWH, he will return to you. The largely unreported demise of the northern kingdom has led to difficult circumstances for those who remain on the land and those who have been deported. If the Israelites turn back to the Lord and express this through a pilgrimage, perhaps even those who have been deported may find the Lord's mercy. Repentance is always possible. v. 6, does such use of messengers and letters to inform the people of royal decisions mirror similar practices in Persia? vv. 10–13, reactions to the invitation are varied. Most inhabitants of the northern kingdom react with derision and scorn, though some accept the offer by humbling themselves (typical vocabulary). This reaction conforms with the usual pattern in Chronicles; only the Judeans react in an exemplary manner, acting with 'one heart' (v. 12—also typical terminology). v. 12, as much as the Chronicler emphasizes the importance of individual responsibility, he does occasionally point out that correct behaviour ultimately stems from God's actions (cf. 1 CHR 29). He does not regard this double causality as a contradiction. v. 13, it is surprising that the 'very large assembly' (one of the Chronicler's favourite phrases) gather to celebrate the festival of Unleavened Bread. Passover and Unleavened Bread were originally two independent festivals that grew together in the course of time, as this verse demonstrates more clearly than any other OT text. v. 14, once the temple has been cleansed (ch. 29), the city is also freed from all foreign influence: only thus can legitimate ritual take place.

vv. 15–20 report the celebration of Passover. A number of aspects are unclear. As may have been the case during the Chronicler's lifetime, many pilgrims have not prepared themselves for the Passover since they have not cleansed themselves as stipulated by the law. But good religious intentions make up for the lack of cultic correctness. Hezekiah calls upon YHWH to pardon the people who have not cleansed themselves and is heard. The Chronicler may deliberately have created a precedent to follow in the future here. The cult officials, the priests and the Levites, also fall short of the usual standards. But they are trying hard to show their change of heart, and that is what seems most important to the Chronicler. v. 17, according to the law, the person making the sacrifice, i.e. a layman, is responsible for its slaughter. But since the people have not been cleansed properly, the Levites assume this role.

vv. 21–2, this summary again refers to the festival of Unleavened Bread rather than the Passover. It is a typically unanimous and joyful festival (involving priests, Levites, and laymen), a very important factor for a feast in Chronicles. vv. 23–7, voluntary action is another important theme in Chronicles. It is underlined here by the fact that the whole assembly remains for a further seven days in celebration. A great sense of unity, joy, and generosity is prevalent amongst the king and the notables, and many animals are sacrificed. v. 26, the Chronicler's statement that such scenes had not been seen since the days of Solomon refers to the manner of the celebration alone and is a logical reference: after Solomon, the kingdom fell apart, but the present festivities give the impression that reunification may be possible. Such scenes are repeated only during Josiah's reign. Thus, the Chronicler mentions the kings with whom Hezekiah is to be compared: Solomon and Josiah. v. 27, at this point it is clear that the Chronicler wrote in post-exilic times: during the monarchical period it was the privilege of the kings, rather than the priests to bless the people, though the Chronicler does not entirely remove this element from his source (cf. 2 Sam 6:18; 1 Kings 8:14, 54–6; 2 Chr 6:3). The Levite priests bless the people, a concept the Chronicler derived from Josh 8:33 amongst others.

(31:1–21) Cultic Reform and the Reorganization of the Temple Service The Chronicler uses 2 Kings 18:4, 5–7 as a source model for this chapter, including the single-versed summary of Hezekiah's reforming measures (v. 4) and the assessment of their effectiveness (vv. 5–7). Both of these elements are strongly emended by the Chronicler to suit his purposes.

Within this frame, he inserts detailed descriptions of the temple tithes and their distribution (vv. 2–19).

v. 1 details the destruction of the cultic images. The brief mention of Hezekiah's reforming measures in the source model becomes a small part of the Chronicler's report on Hezekiah's reorganization here. Furthermore, the snake Nehushtan is ignored in Chronicles, perhaps because the idea that it derived from Moses was unpleasant to the Chronicler. Otherwise, the source model is greatly extended upon. The destruction of local cults by the entire population is unique in the OT and extends into the territory of the fallen northern kingdom, though this may be a reflection of events during the Chronicler's lifetime.

vv. 2–10, once the king has reinstalled the temple service, in which priests and Levites are mentioned in connection with their main duties (cf. 8:14; 23:18–19), he prepares orders regarding the tithes. These partly conform with the regulations found in the Pentateuch, though they no doubt reflect contemporary practice (or the Chronicler's ideal conception). The king is responsible for the sacrifices, whilst laymen undertake to support the priests and Levites financially. It is impossible to determine to what extent this really was the case during the monarchical period. The king after all carried the main responsibility for maintaining the cult. Reports from Persian times, which might have inspired the Chronicler, contradict each other. Whilst Darius states that the cult is financed by the state coffers, the book of Nehemiah (10:32–3) mentions a temple tithe for this purpose which is paid by everyone. The Chronicler spreads responsibility amongst the king and his people, thereby conforming with his own ideals. vv. 5–6, the king's word spreads with extreme speed and the first tithes are paid in abundance, i.e. correctly. This is another example of what the Chronicler might regard as lacking in his own society and what he expected from it. v. 7, the third month is the month of the grain harvest and at the same time the month of the harvest festival (Feast of weeks) whereas the Feast of Ingathering is celebrated in the seventh month which is the period of vine and fruit harvesting. vv. 9–10, the generosity also causes problems: the king approaches the priests and Levites and asks them to explain the great piles of donations (though the wording is vague). They repeat the message of v. 8 using different terms: generosity is rewarded by wealth and the Lord's blessing. Azariah: the chief priest under Solomon is also called Azariah. This may be the reason why the present chief priest has this name. Although David (and Solomon) are not explicitly mentioned in this chapter, it is clear that Hezekiah is portrayed in a similar light to them.

vv. 11–19, the tithes are stored and duties allocated. vv. 11–13, the king orders chambers either to be built or renovated in order to store the tithes. It is difficult to determine which of these two options is the case. Two Levites administer the tithes, offerings, and dedicated things (terms stemming from priestly literature and used slightly differently by the Chronicler here). They command ten men, leading to the round sum of twelve (which may be an organizational formula). vv. 14–19 describe the distribution of the offerings amongst the priests and Levites. Priests and Levites have the right to financial support, as carried out here. Several points in this text are difficult to comprehend, but the basic guidelines are clear: from the age of 3, all priests have the right to support. They are registered according to their lineage and must have a purely priestly 'pedigree'. Distribution is made on the basis of the number of priests. Payment of Levites is made on the basis of the size of the family, whereby the eligible age is 30 years (see 1 CHR 23:3). (Levites rather than the priests are referred to in v. 18.) Distribution occurs both in Jerusalem and in the other cities. The main gatekeeper at the eastern gate and his six subordinates are responsible for it. v. 18, 'they were faithful in keeping themselves holy': one of the many statements praising the Levites which characterize Chronicles.

vv. 20–1, the verdict on Hezekiah: the source model upon which the Chronicler partly bases this chapter has more praise for Hezekiah than for any other king. The Chronicler's version seems weak by comparison, even though his praise is also great. This is, however, made good by his extensive description of Hezekiah's reign and the implicit praise within it. '[g]ood and right and faithful before the LORD': Hezekiah alone is given this threefold praise, and he alone is described as someone who was faithful.

(32:1–33) Jerusalem Saved from Sennacherib; Testing of Hezekiah What is true in many parts of Chronicles is particularly true in ch. 32: this chapter cannot be understood without knowledge of its source model (and of Isaiah's statements on Judah's behaviour whilst under threat from Sennacherib). The Chronicler uses his source texts as a framework for all important components of the story, but rewrites them to a great extent. He also makes severe cuts, especially regarding concrete information such as figures. According to the Chronicler, Sennacherib does not conquer the towns of Judah, nor does he besiege Jerusalem, but remains in Lachish. Moreover, Hezekiah, who, unlike the source model, has no fear, does not have to pay a tribute to the Assyrian king. The Chronicler even converts the two advances made by Rabshakeh and Sennacherib into a single event. It is notable that Hezekiah's prayer, in which the king underlines YHWH's exclusive existence, is also omitted. Beyond this, the Chronicler shortens the text further by almost entirely ignoring Isaiah, the protagonist of the source model and of the book named after him. He merely portrays Isaiah praying with Hezekiah and cites him in his list of sources at the end of the chapter.

Whilst the source model portrays a political Hezekiah, the Chronicler's king is a religious figure. In this sense it is surprising that he diverges from the source model to add extensive details concerning the defensive measures taken in vv. 2–6, 30 (though he does give military details elsewhere). He may have reinterpreted information given in Isa 22:8–11 in a curious way to come up with this information, though the critical consensus believes that he used his own sources to do so. vv. 23, 27–9 (especially concerning the economy), vv. 7–8 (a speech by Hezekiah), and vv. 25–6, 31b (theological comments), are the Chronicler's original material.

v. 1 is transitional. 'After these things and these acts of faithfulness': owing to his exemplary behaviour in connection with the cultic reforms, Hezekiah must immediately be rewarded—in the form of deliverance from Sennacherib—and not have to wait until the fourteenth year of his reign, as in the source model. Unlike in the earlier text, Sennacherib does not manage to conquer the fenced cities in Judah, but only intends to do so. vv. 2–6, defensive measures are taken. Since Hezekiah has proved his God-fearing behaviour through his cultic reforms, he does not need to pray to YHWH, as would have normally been the case under such threatening circumstances. Instead he can concentrate his efforts on military defence measures. The Chronicler knew from his sources roughly what kind of measures these were (see 2 Kings 20:20 and particularly Isa 22:8–11). This is not contradicted by the fact that he describes and interprets them differently, especially by comparison with Isaiah (v. 11: 'But you did not look to him who did it'). Hezekiah concentrates on the water supply, carries out the necessary building works, acquires the weaponry required, and organizes his army. The general nature of his statements also suggests the absence of additional sources. vv. 6b–8, Hezekiah's encouraging speech is a patchwork of biblical expressions and statements, even using Isaiah to contradict Isaiah. v. 9, unlike the source model, Jerusalem is not besieged. This statement is an extreme and hardly justifiable interpretation of 2 Kings 19:32: 'He shall not come into this city'.

vv. 10–17, this speech by Sennacherib's servants summarizes the speeches made by Rabshakeh and the Assyrian king in the source model, whilst emphasizing different aspects. v. 10, unlike 2 Kings 18:21, the Assyrians are not even permitted to claim that Judah is reliant upon Egypt. It is almost as if they had heard Hezekiah's speech and respected it. Ironically, they phrase the most important question correctly: 'On what are you relying ...?' v. 12, 'Before one altar': a clarification and strengthening of the source model ('before this altar'). Just as there can be only one God, there can also be only one altar. If God wants to help, king Hezekiah has destroyed his altars! This is the logic used by Rabshakeh in 2 Kings 18:22. By making a slight change in the text, the Chronicler changes its emphasis: Can Hezekiah be trusted?

v. 18, even Rabshakeh's speech threatening Hezekiah and his people is alluded to: cf. 2 Kings 18:28, 27 (in that order). v. 19, this verse curiously breaks with the source model, following a very complicated line of interpretation. Unlike the source text, the conflict is based on nothing other than theological principles. The Assyrians speak of the God of Jerusalem as they do of all foreign deities (since they assume that Jerusalem will be conquered in a similar manner). They do not realize, however, that the deities of the peoples of the world are merely human creations. The Assyrians' speech and the Chronicler's comments on it are also summarized here. v. 20, unlike the account in the book of Isaiah, the prophet and King Hezekiah are not opponents here, but pray together side by side. This must be so since Hezekiah is a God-fearing man and therefore (like all prophets) on the right side. v. 21, cf. 2 Kings 19:35–7. 'And the LORD sent an angel': the source model makes the angel the active party, but this is not possible in the eyes of the Chronicler. He also omits the number of men killed and shortens the report on the unrest within the Babylonian royal family, mentioning no names. vv. 22–3, the Chronicler uses these two verses to interpret events, naturally emphasizing that Hezekiah's and Jerusalem's (aid and) salvation is due to YHWH.

vv. 24–6, according to the Chronicler, Hezekiah's illness must have been caused by a previous failing on his part. This sin may be his boastful behaviour during the Babylonian delegation's visit (2 Kings 20:12–15). The Chronicler, however, only mentions this visit in v. 31, without describing Hezekiah's behaviour. Despite knowing of Hezekiah's illness, the Chronicler knew of no sin he had committed. Is this the reason for describing his failing (arrogance and ingratitude) so briefly and vaguely? Hezekiah also behaves correctly by praying to his Lord and humbling himself. Such explanations can only be vague speculation. See comment on v. 31 regarding his miraculous recovery. vv. 27–9, God-fearing kings are wealthy and economically active, as the Chronicler confirms once more here. Such unspecific descriptions cannot stem from any non-biblical sources, but are his own invention.

v. 31, 2 Kings 20:12 specifically reports that the Babylonian delegation came to Jerusalem because they had heard of Hezekiah's illness. The Chronicler probably assumes knowledge of this fact. 'The sign that had been done in the land': does he mean the reverse movement of the sundial (2 Kings 20:8–11) or the king's recovery? Perhaps the two events should not be separated too strictly. Since the Babylonians were famous for their astrology, the reader at least initially would have thought of the sundial's reversal. The nature of Hezekiah's temptation is stated explicitly ('God left him to himself; in order to ... know all that was in his heart') and is taken from Deut 8:2. Is Hezekiah's humility (v. 26) being tested here? The verse does not state the outcome, though it is obvious.

vv. 32–3 are the concluding verdict on the king. v. 32, instead of 'all his power' (source text) that Hezekiah is reported to have obtained, the Chronicler describes his 'good deeds', a term used elsewhere only to describe Josiah (35:26). According to the Hebrew text (and unlike some translations), the History of the Prophet Isaiah forms part of the Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel. The author is therefore the most important prophet of that period. It is impossible to determine whether the Hebrew text is meant to refer to Hezekiah's burial-site (Galling: 1954: 166: the upper level of a double-layered royal burial site situated on a hill to the south-west) or whether it serves to emphasize the special honour his funeral received. Whatever is the case, Hezekiah receives one of the most impressive burials given to kings in Chronicles.

Manasseh and Amon (2 Chr 33:1–25)

(33:1–20) Manasseh Manasseh, who is historically regarded as having been an exceptionally skilful ruler, remained on David's throne longer than any other king, for 55 years. The books of Kings portray him as the most godless king of all and describe at great length his disgraceful behaviour which leads to the downfall of Judah (2 Kings 21:1–18). The Chronicler changes none of the account's factual content, but rewrites Manasseh's biography to conform with his implicit principle that a long reign is a result of God-fearing behaviour. He therefore causes Manasseh to repent during his deportation to Babylon. On his return to Jerusalem, he removes all foreign images and carries out the usual construction measures. The story of Manasseh is a spectacular indication of the strict dogma of retribution applied in Chronicles, combined with the constant opportunity to repent. It serves as an image with which to comment on the forthcoming theme of exile and return, stressing that the Judeans will always have the chance to return to their homeland. The chapter also contains a hidden reference to the Babylonian Exile. This theory is supported by the fact that Manasseh is deported to Babylon, instead of the historically more plausible Assyrian capital.

The historical reliability of Manasseh's deportation to Babylon has occasionally been claimed on the basis of the following points: Manasseh was encouraged by the unrest led by Ashurbanipal's brother Shamash-shum-ukin in 652–648 and became unruly himself. He was thereupon deported to Babylon before being allowed to return as ruler. Some commentaries have referred to the Egyptian pharaoh Neco, who was deported by Ashurbanipal and later returned to his homeland. This assumption is contradicted by the fact that the Assyrian annals describe Manasseh as a consistently loyal vassal, and that his journey to Babylon would certainly have been mentioned in Kings if it had any historical basis. However convincing the story seems, it is therefore more probably an invention inspired by the Babylonian Exile and biblical material.

vv. 11–9, the Chronicler closely follows his source model here, with a few minor changes. v. 10, at this point in the source model (2 Kings 21:10–15) there is a lengthy prophetic speech to Manasseh predicting Judah's downfall. It is followed by a comment that Manasseh shed innocent blood in abundance. The Chronicler omits the last comment completely and replaces the speech (which he cannot include due to its content) with a comment that Manasseh and the people did not heed God's warning.

vv. 11–13, the advancing Assyrians' treatment of Manasseh is based on the similar treatment of Jehoiachin (Ezek 19:9; 2 Chr 36:10). The Chronicler probably also used 2 Kings 19:28 as a literary source: the Assyrian king is called upon to wear a ring through his nose so that he could be dragged back up the road down which he was advancing. vv. 12–13, Manasseh does exactly what is expected of a sinful king. He humbles himself and prays to God, as instructed by the temple-consecration prayer (cf. 6:36–9; 7:14). The reaction is swift: the Lord (and not the Assyrian king!) allows the king to return to Jerusalem.

vv. 14–17 relate Manasseh's actions after his return to the throne. Like many God-fearing kings, Manasseh is shown God's blessing by being allowed to carry out construction projects and build fortresses in Jerusalem and Judah. It is unlikely that this report is based on historically reliable sources, although it would not be surprising if he strengthened his fortification following Sennacherib's campaigns in Judah.

(33:21–5) Amon The description of Amon's rule is also brief in the source model. The Chronicler makes slight changes to make it conform with his depiction of Manasseh, as a godless king.

Josiah (2 Chr 34:1–35:27)

(34:1–33) Renewal of the Cult; Reinstatement of the Law; Confirmation of the Covenant 2 Kings 22–3 describes how in the eighteenth year of his reign, Josiah coincidentally discovers a book (which can easily be identified as Deuteronomy), upon which he undertakes a comprehensive reform of the cult, combined with its centralization in Jerusalem. The Chronicler could not use this version without changing it, for several reasons. Josiah, who is judged positively, cannot begin his reforms as late as his eighteenth year of reign, since the delay would constitute a sin. His reforms must also be different from those in the source model, since in Chronicles, Manasseh had already taken similar measures and his son Amon had not resumed all of Manasseh's old, godless rituals. Since the Chronicler did not wish to change the date at which the book is found (it is the entire Pentateuch, rather than simply Deuteronomy here), he weakens the significance of the discovery by making Josiah's reforms pre-empt it. It is thus not a case of coincidence, but the king's God-fearing will that brings improvement. This explains the changes to the source text undertaken by the Chronicler. Many points are summarized descriptions of the source model, in which details are omitted, whilst other areas are expanded to accommodate some of his favourite theologoumena and opinions, i.e. the Levites, the inclusion of the north, etc. At first sight, his somewhat weaker praise for Josiah may be surprising, since he is one of his favourite kings. But Josiah died on the battlefield and therefore must have committed some previous sin. The Chronicler's description of the process of reforms is more historically reliable than his source. All alterations are dictated by the Chronicler's own specific profile.

vv. 3–7 detail cultic reforms. Since Manasseh had already cleansed the temple (33:15) and Amon had hardly changed this, the present king must concentrate on cleansing the country, first Judah and Jerusalem (vv. 3–5), and later also the north (vv. 6–7). Unlike the source model, Chronicles merely summarizes this report. v. 3, although still young (16 years old), Josiah already begins to seek God (one of the Chronicler's favourite phrases). Since he is not yet of age, he does not undertake any public measures. These are carried out in the twelfth year of his reign, i.e. in adulthood. vv. 6–7, the inclusion of the north in his reform of the legitimate kingdom plays a central role in Chronicles here (cf. vv. 9, 21, 33) and later in 35:17–18. v. 7, 'he returned to Jerusalem': with this statement, which relates to 2 Kings 23:20, the Chronicler underlines that the king is personally responsible for the named undertaking.

vv. 8–13 describe donations for the temple's improvement. The Chronicler extends a relatively brief order to collect money to pay for the necessary improvements to the temple, transforming it into an extensive report. v. 9, in his description of the collection of tithes (from the entire population)—cf. 24:5–9 and David's approach in connection with the temple's construction (1 Chr 29), the Chronicler emphasizes the co-operation of all the people more strongly than does the source text, listing those involved (including people from the north). vv. 12–13, the workmen work honestly (source model: deal honestly). The Chronicler highly esteems good work. Going beyond his source model, the Chronicler names those responsible. They are naturally Levites who have similar duties to those in 1 Chr 26, though they perform these tasks for Josiah only in Chronicles. One would expect from 29:12 that Gershonites were among them. Perhaps the singers mentioned here dictated the rhythm of their work with their music.

vv. 14–33, document the discovery of the book of the law, its study, and the renewal of the covenant. Apart from some minor details, the Chronicler follows his source text here. v. 14, first the money for the temple, then the book: this amendment to the source model once again underlines the Chronicler's outlook. The book is found because Josiah and his people behave in an exemplary manner. It is not clear where the book of the law, which was written by Moses (though only in the Chronicles version), was discovered. Since not only Deuteronomy, but the entire Pentateuch is discovered in Chronicles, it is not surprising that Shaphan reads 'from' it (in Heb. text; source model: read it) rather than all of it, before the king (cf. v. 18). v. 24 has 'all the curses that are written in the book', instead of the source model's 'all the words of the book'. Perhaps the Chronicler was thinking of Lev 26; Deut 27–9 here. v. 30, 'the Levites' (source model: 'the prophets'): this slight change displays the Chronicler's conviction that the Levites have 'replaced' the prophets to some extent by his own lifetime and fulfil their role of announcing God's word. This replacement does not, however, represent a demotion of the prophets, who still have their place of honour in Chronicles. v. 33 is an extremely shortened summary of 2 Kings 23:4–20 and seems to contradict vv. 3–7, which already mention the cult's cleansing. The two passages use different terms, however, so it is possible that the Chronicler is describing two different forms of cleansing.

(35:1–27) The Passover and Josiah's Death This chapter can be divided into three parts: the extensive description of the Passover feast, which Josiah feels obliged to celebrate after his reforms, the report on Josiah's death, and the concluding verdict upon him. The Chronicler uses his source model for all three parts of the chapter, but greatly changes and extends the material in the first two parts in order to apply his cultic and theological priorities to the king he loved so much. It is unlikely that these additions (regarding the Passover feast) and alterations (in connection with Josiah's death) are based on older sources not present in the OT.

vv. 1–19, the special features of the Passover feast carried out by Josiah can be explained almost entirely by the following factors: (1) The OT contains contradictory instructions regarding the Passover. Whilst it is a feast celebrated within the family in Ex 12, during which sacrificial animals are roasted, Deut 16 describes it as a ritual performed in the central holy place (in Jerusalem) at which the sacrificial animals are boiled. (2) The main difference between the Passover feasts of Hezekiah and Josiah is that Josiah's is not celebrated with such great haste. Its liturgy is also described more extensively. To a certain extent, Josiah represents a solid, legal version of what Hezekiah put into place. This is emphasized by the Chronicler's lengthy explanation of the 'legal' basis of the feast (Moses, David/Solomon, Josiah). This order is probably both the Chronicler's concept of an ideal procedure and common practice during his lifetime, though it is difficult to determine which factor is decisive. (3) The Chronicler firmly places his beloved Levites (and musicians) into the Passover procedures. (4) He links well-being offerings with the Passover procedures in an obscure way. (5) As so often, he uses speeches to express his own theological convictions.

vv. 1–9 (10) detail the preparations. v. 1, as implicitly suggested in Deut 16, the feast takes place in Jerusalem on the appointed day. v. 3, 'Put the holy ark in the house . . .': does this appeal suggest that the ark had been removed from the temple, perhaps during Manasseh's reign, or is it a literary technique to mark the renewal of the cult? It could even be the result of textual damage. vv. 4, 6, cf. comments on David (1 Chr 23–7) and Solomon (2 Chr 8:14) concerning the ancestral houses and their order. Moses did not lay down a law regarding this aspect, unlike the Passover procedure itself, to which the last verse exclusively refers (cf. v. 13). vv. 7–9, as with the temple construction and King Hezekiah's Passover feast, King Josiah and his officials (in this case the princes and the notable Levites—but not priests) are characterized by their generosity. One of the Chronicler's keywords, 'willingly', is repeated here.

vv. 10–15, once the king's instructions have been carried out, the actual sacrifice takes place. Here the priests are limited to their central role of performing the blood ritual and offering the sacrifice, whilst the Levites make all the necessary preparations (a role reserved for laymen according to Leviticus). This included slaughtering the animals, skinning them, receiving the roasted/boiled meat, and distributing it amongst themselves and the musicians so that they can continue their own duties. The Levites are therefore presented as an essential part of the ritual. v. 13, 'they boiled in the fire' (literal translation from the Heb.); the Chronicler uses this unusual phrase to combine the two contradictory instructions in Ex 12:8–9 and Deut 16:7. '[Q]uickly' emphasizes the Levites' good work whilst simultaneously referring to Exodus' instructions to consume the Passover quickly (Ex 12:11). v. 15, the musicians are first called the 'descendants of Asaph' after their most important ancestor and are then listed according to their families.

vv. 16–17 actually summarize the re-establishment of a religious service which was probably also attended by people from the northern kingdom. The Feast of Unleavened Bread follows immediately after the Passover, though, unlike in Hezekiah's account, is not dealt with in detail.

vv. 18–19, the unique nature of this Passover feast in Kings is due to its central celebration in Jerusalem. This is not the case in Chronicles since Hezekiah's Passover had also been performed in the capital. The unique aspect here is its place in cultic history, since Hezekiah's feast was not correctly prepared for. v. 18, 'since the days of the prophet Samuel' replaces 'since the days of the judges' in the source model. The Chronicler hardly mentions the judges period in general. Since Samuel is regarded as the final judge of the period, the Chronicler is relatively correct in his statement, but is able to simultaneously mention one of the prophets he likes so much.

vv. 20–7, the Chronicler takes the brief note concerning Josiah's death in his source, whilst altering and greatly extending it. Some commentaries have regarded this report as historically more reliable than the source text, although most of its inconsistencies can be explained by the Chronicler's personal perspective. The source model incorrectly states that the Egyptian pharaoh led a campaign against the Assyrians. In fact the pharaoh advanced in support of the Assyrian king, a fact that the Chronicler does not explicitly state. The reference to Carchemish on the Euphrates (v. 20) probably stems from Jer 46:2, since the wording is similar to this passage. However, another interpretation has been suggested: the Assyrian King Ashurbanipal founded his new capital city in 610 BCE. The Egyptians supported the Assyrians at this time, as can be seen from the counter-offensive against the Babylonians in 609. Ch. 35 must therefore be regarded in the light of these events. We suggest, however, that the entire section must be understood from the perspective of Josiah's violent death. According to the Chronicler's logic, it is an indication of the king's previous sin. Since there is no mention of such a sin in the source model, the Chronicler is forced to invent one. He has great affection for the king, however, so he places his fall from grace as late as possible, upon the battlefield. Thus he creates the rather unconvincing literary construction by which Josiah rejects the word of God. (The heathen Neco is naturally not permitted to use his name and thus uses the word 'God' instead.) Josiah, who is expected to believe the heathen king's claims (!), insists on meeting him in battle (of which there is no description in the source model) and is killed. His armour, his wounding, and his order to be taken to Jerusalem are not an indication of supplementary information, since the description is based on Ahab's fate. He too dressed for battle, defied God's warning, was wounded, and ordered his men to withdraw (1 Kings 22:30, 34). The astonishing comparison between Josiah and the godless Ahab is probably due to the fact that he was the closest comparable figure who committed a sin on the battlefield.

vv. 24b–25, ultimately, the Chronicler regards Josiah's (only!) sin as not sufficiently grave to deny him an honourable funeral, although this contradicts his own logic. Indeed all Judah and Jerusalem mourn for him, a unique description in Chronicles. Jeremiah even composes a lament to commemorate him which is still included in all laments 'to this day'. Thus the song must be included in all future laments. This may be the biblical parallel to the tradition maintained in the Talmud ascribing Lamentations to Jeremiah. Perhaps the Chronicler is referring to Zech 12:9–14 here, since it also seems to refer to Josiah's death.

The Last Kings of Judah, the Fall of Judah, and Cyrus's Edict (2 Chr 36:1–23)

The Chronicler further reduces his source's rather brief description of the history of Judah's final four kings (to less than half its original length), although he not only deletes material, but also adds a small amount of his own. Above all, he omits the details concerning Jerusalem's destruction, the names of the queen mothers, part of the verdicts on the kings, even certain death announcements (because the relevant kings died in a foreign land), and further Deuteronomistic interpretations of Jerusalem's destruction (as due to Manasseh's sins, 2 Kings 24:3; cf. v. 20). Thus the kings are shifted closely together—forming a kind of indistinguishable massa perditionis—giving the story greater unity than its source model. The Chronicler's additions refer to the temple, whose fate is important to the author. His descriptions of the people's responsibility (and their forthcoming downfall) are characterized not so much by colourful details as by strong theological argument.

The deportation of the survivors of Judah is described in one verse (v. 20) which also contains mention of the Persian successors to Babylon. Only v. 21 contains an interpretation (and not a description) of the Exile ('until the land had made up for its sabbaths') and part of the edict of Cyrus as described in the book of Ezra, which allowed deported Jews to return to Jerusalem and rebuild the temple. This description has the effect of concealing the Exile whilst not denying its existence, allowing the Chronicler to close his work with an image of the temple.

(36:1–4) Jehoahaz The Chronicler's description of Jehoahaz is extremely brief and omits details concerning his journey to the land of Hamath. The concluding judgement upon him is completely ignored (as is the case with Abijah, the only other king to receive such treatment). Is this the result of his short reign, a damaged text, or perhaps the fact that Jeremiah gives him a positive verdict (Jer 22:15–16)?

(36:5–8) Jehoiakim This section contains the usual omissions from the source model. The advance of an alliance of Chaldeans, Arameans, Moabites, and Ammonites (which God had incited!—2 Kings 24:2) is replaced in Chronicles by the claim that Nebuchadnezzar attacked the king, placed him in fetters and deported him to Babylon. The Chronicler probably extracted this information from Dan 1:1–2 and it can hardly be regarded as historically reliable. The last kings of Judah were all deported. Here, Jehoiakim receives the same treatment as Manasseh, though it is unclear whether he is actually deported or whether the Babylonians merely intend to do so, since the Hebrew text allows both interpretations. v. 7, the Chronicler is most interested in the fate of the temple and its equipment (see also vv. 10, 18–19) and uses Dan 1:2 as a source for his description.

(36:9–10) Jehoiachin The source model portrays a comprehensive deportation (597 BCE) which does not differ completely from the second transportation. The Chronicler, however, reduces Jehoiachin's description to an absolute minimum, concentrating on the king's deportation and the (valuable—note the emphasis compared to v. 7) temple equipment.

(36:11–16) Zedekiah The Chronicler applies the same editing principles for Zedekiah as he used for the previous three kings, describing events as briefly as possible. He does, however, introduce new emphases compared with the previous kings. He does not directly report Zedekiah's deportation (cf. the three previous kings), which disappears in the mass of deportations carried out. This is probably an attempt to protect the Davidic monarchy, to which he still clings. Nor is his description of the pillage of the cultic vessels extensive (cf. v. 18 and 2 Kings 25:13–17), since the central issue of importance to the Chronicler is the mere fact of the deportation, rather than individual details. He is of course more extensive in his description of Zedekiah and the people democratically bound to him than in the description of the three previous kings, but there is one reason for this: since each generation and every king is responsible for their own fate, the sins committed by Zedekiah, his notables, and the people must have been great. The source model has little to report here (since the Exile is seen as the result of Manasseh's sin): 'He did what was evil in the sight of the LORD, just as Jehoiakim had done' (2 Kings 24:19). The Chronicler uses this reference to Jehoiakim to make further additions. He (explicitly) points out Zedekiah's disobedience towards Jeremiah (who plays a central role in the background of the entire chapter) and the king's lack of willingness to repent. Furthermore he makes general criticisms, such as that the princes and people were disobedient towards the prophets. This section contains many references to biblical texts, which cannot all be listed here. One reason for this plethora is the notion that what the prophets predicted, based on the law, has come about.

v. 14 underlines the fact that the people and the people's leading ranks (perhaps with the exception of the Levites, who remain unnamed) are responsible for their own exile. The accusations are extremely harsh since active spoiling of the temple—consecrated by God—is described only here. vv. 15–16, apart from Jeremiah, other (unnamed) prophets are mentioned, whose mission is not described by the Chronicler (perhaps because it would in any case have been unsuccessful), but can only be to bring the king and his people to repentance. The motive behind God's invitation to repent is stated, however: compassion for both the people and the temple. It is significant that the people and the temple have the same status here. The language is once again strongly influenced by the book of Jeremiah.

(36:17–21) The End of Judah v. 18, the plundering of the temple reaches a climax: 'All the vessels of the house of God'. In addition, the king's and princes' private treasures are taken. v. 19, Jerusalem's actual destruction is portrayed in a few words. Thus the Chronicler's mention of the 'palaces' is even more striking. v. 20, the Chronicler intentionally omits the source model's mention of vineyard and field workers who remained on the land, concentrating his description of this last phase on Jerusalem, leaving the question of those who remained unanswered. The experience of the Exile is not described at all. v. 21, this sentence combines Jeremiah's announcement of 70 years of exile (Jer 25:11–12) with the warning made in Lev 26, in which the land spits out disobedient dwellers, to restore peace and enable the long-abused sabbath to be observed.

(36:22–3) Cyrus's Edict vv. 22–3, after the extremely brief treatment of the Exile, the Chronicler moves directly on to the Persian King Cyrus's order enabling a return, a central theme of which is his permission to rebuild the temple. The Chronicler bases his text on Ezra here, even quoting it occasionally (cf. Ezra 1:1–3). This is nevertheless no proof that Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah form a Chronicler's history and were only separated at a later date. The Paraleipomena have an open ending, with the appeal, 'Let him go up'. This may encourage the reader to refer to the events described in Ezra and Nehemiah, but can also be regarded as a reference to the future in general.

15. Ezra–Nehemiah

DANIEL L. SMITH-CHRISTOPHER

INTRODUCTION

A. Text and Language. 1. Originally one work (b. B. Bat. 14b–15a); Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 4.26.14), the books of Ezra and Nehemiah share themes, and even specific texts (the most obvious being what is called the Golah List, Ezra 2 || Neh 7, gôlâ meaning 'exile'). In addition, the main character changes from Ezra, then to Nehemiah, and then back to Ezra, etc. The short books are composed largely in late biblical Hebrew, but contain significant sections (Ezra 4:8–6:18; 7:12–26) written in what is often referred to as imperial or official Aramaic (Rosenthal 1974). By general consensus, the texts are well preserved (Rudolph 1949: p. xix). There are fragments of Ezra among the Dead Sea scrolls (4QEzra) which are quite close to the Hebrew and Aramaic sections of the MT (only

4:2–6 in Heb.; 4:9–11; 5:17–6:5 in Aramaic). The text occasionally reflects Old Persian vocabulary (for a list: Fensham 1982: 22), but there is little significant influence from Greek.

2. There are two translations in Greek, known as Esdras alpha (1 Esdras) and Esdras beta. Esdras beta is quite close to the canonical work, but 1 Esdras is an independent work which reproduces only the Ezra materials (including the reading of the law which appears in MT Neh 7:72–8:13 (1 Esd 9:37–55; see the helpful discussion in Myers 1974: 1–19)). 1 Esdras includes a charming court tale of Zerubbabel very much in the Daniel tradition. Certain readings in 1 Esdras can be used to correct difficulties in the MT (note list in Rudolph, 1949: p. xvi) but in general it is considered a later text featuring a free rendering into Greek.

B. Subject-Matter and Literary Genre. Contemporary scholarship has formed an uneasy consensus around the notion that Ezra and Nehemiah had their origin in two separate ‘memoirs’ from the two historical figures in c.460–440 BCE. But why were they written? Some have suggested comparisons with official reports written to the Persian monarch (Blenkinsopp 1988: 262), while others have suggested that, at least in the case of the Nehemiah memoirs, they were originally written as a defence against accusations of sedition. Others have suggested biblical precedents such as psalms of lament or defence (so Kellermann 1967). To these memoirs were joined two sorts of supporting materials. First, older correspondence and documents involving both local and imperial Persian authorities provided the material for Ezra chs. 1–6. Secondly, a series of lists was added (the dates are debated), most prominently the Golah List of Ezra ch. 2 || Neh ch. 7. The many lists form one of the most perplexing features of the work.

C. The Religious Teaching. The main issue in Ezra and Nehemiah is the restoration of the post-exilic Judean community. There is a contrast established between the ‘official’ methods and attitudes of Nehemiah, whatever his title or authority may have actually been, and the more theologically based authority of the priest/scribe Ezra. Nehemiah’s focus is on the physical infrastructure—particularly the city wall around Jerusalem. Ezra, on the other hand, is intent on the restoration of the Mosaic law as the spiritual centre of the post-exilic community. Otherwise, both are Jewish officials or leaders (Ezra 7:1–10; Neh 2:1–2) who become concerned about the state of affairs amongst the Jews in Jerusalem; both seek permission from the Persian monarch to carry out their mission (Ezra, implied in 7:6; Neh 2:1–4); both preside over a number of significant reforms in the Jewish communities in Jerusalem; both write of their experiences in the first person. Noting this, Eskenazi (1988) points out that the editorial tendency is towards a preference for Ezra: ‘The Omniscient narrator . . . corroborates Ezra’s assessment of reality by repeated references to divine support for Ezra’ (ibid. 134). The contrast between the two figures can, however, be taken in other directions. Kapelrud (1944) based his doubts about the very existence of a historical Ezra on this same literary parallelism. Smitten (1973: 88; echoing the earlier work of Torrey (1970)) agrees, considering Ezra a pious fiction created from priestly imagination in order to contrast proper religious conduct against that of Nehemiah (objections include Williamson 1985: 115–16, and Blenkinsopp 1988: 216).

D. Date and Place of Composition. 1. Despite the fact that many of the scenes of the Ezra and Nehemiah story take place in the eastern diaspora in the Persian empire (so reminiscent of court stories such as Daniel and Esther), the movement of the narratives is clearly towards the resettled community in Judah. The narrative ends rather suddenly after the rededication of the temple in Neh 11–12, followed by some afterthoughts in ch. 13. We do not know the fate of either Ezra or Nehemiah.

2. Although we know of important events in the Persian period from Greek sources (pre-eminently Herodotus, Hist.), none of these is explicitly referred to in Ezra or Nehemiah. This is particularly problematic given that this was a notably unstable era in the Persian empire (Dandamaev 1989: 351–4). Despite this, the memoirs surely arose within a short time of the work of both Ezra and Nehemiah, and the correspondence between local and imperial Persian officials in Ezra 1–6 may well date from the time of the Persian emperors named. Thus, the events mentioned give us an earliest possible date for the traditions, beginning with the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus in 539 BCE. The last clear reference, Neh 12:22–3, is to Jaddua, high priest at the time of Alexander the Great, according to Josephus, and dated to roughly 323 (Clines 1984: 222; Blenkinsopp 1988: 340), but this reference is almost universally considered to be an insertion by a very late hand, in order to bring the list down to the editor’s time. It would therefore be hazardous to use this as an indication of the completion of most of the book, which was undoubtedly in more or less present form by the late fifth century (430–400 BCE).

E. Literary and Historical Problems. 1. Among the more vexed problems of Ezra–Nehemiah scholarship is the problem of determining the historical relationship of the presumed historical figures of Ezra and Nehemiah: Who came first? Did their time in Judah overlap? Another problem has been the possible relationship to the writings of the Chronicler. We can only briefly review these questions here, beginning with the latter question on the relationship to Chronicles.

2. Chronicles ends with the same phrases with which Ezra begins—the suggestion has often been made that they are originally intended to be parts of one work. Among modern commentators, Blenkinsopp (1988: 47–54) defends this unity on both lexical and thematic grounds (David as founder of temple, interest in the details of temple construction and worship, etc.). But as Williamson (1985: pp. xx–xxii), in agreement with the arguments of Japhet (1968), concludes, there are good historical grounds for considering Ezra–Nehemiah as a single work that predates the creation of 1 Esdras, and therefore 1 Esdras cannot be used as an argument that Ezra–Nehemiah were originally the ending of a large work that included Chronicles. These arguments tend towards surveys of lexical comparisons between the two works, including stylistic features. Williamson further argues that Ezra–Nehemiah was completed in three stages: (1) the writing of the primary memoirs of Ezra and Nehemiah, close to their actual lifetimes; (2) a combination of materials that resulted in Ezra 7–Neh 13 (with some parts added later); and (3) the final addition of Ezra 1–6. Although admittedly without great confidence, the presumption of this commentary on Ezra–Nehemiah tends towards reading it separately from Chronicles, except for some thematic and historical similarities which need not depend on common authorship, but simply common historical and sociological circumstances.

3. The problem of when Ezra and Nehemiah arrived in Jerusalem is also complex, and made more so by the number of rulers named Artaxerxes, and the popularity of similar Jewish names among the exilic communities! In short, the same name cannot always be taken to be the same person. For example, the seventh year of Artaxerxes I would be the traditional date for Ezra of 458 BCE, before the date of Nehemiah’s opening memoirs, which would be 446 BCE (there is little debate that Nehemiah served under Artaxerxes I). But if it is Artaxerxes II, then the major alternative argument suggests that Ezra arrived in Jerusalem years after Nehemiah, in 398 BCE. Arguments between these options are not decisive, but more recent trends have accepted that Nehemiah's actions make more sense following the precedent of Ezra's legal reforms, rather than preceding them. Nehemiah's reforms on mixed marriage, for example, seem more focused than Ezra's general actions, and tend towards heightening the severity of Nehemiah's judgement against local authorities who still did not comply with what the local population had already dealt with! Williamson (1985: p. xlv), too, notes that Nehemiah's actions did not raise the local controversies that Ezra's actions did, suggesting that by Nehemiah's time these were not generally perceived as controversial actions. Still, Ezra 9:9 raises questions about whether a wall had already been built. Again, risking a position on shifting sands, this commentary will presume that Ezra arrived before Nehemiah, and both engaged in their work (or, to be more precise, the text represents their work) during the reign of Artaxerxes I Longimanus (465–424 BCE) as opposed to the later Artaxerxes II Arsakes (405–359 BCE).

F. The Sociology of Reading Ezra and Nehemiah. 1. Recent work on Ezra and Nehemiah has focused on the presumed relationship between the post-exilic returning Golah community, and the Persian administration. Nehemiah's mission was part of Persian attempts to shore up their western flank in the face of growing Greek involvement in Egyptian rebellions (Hoglund 1992). Berquist (1995) goes further in arguing that the Jewish officials were enthusiastic supporters of Persian goals, and that the court of Darius may have been the workroom for the Torah itself as a civil code for the Jewish subjects. Related to this, Richards (forthcoming) argues for a recognition of 'the ideological collusion of the Ezra-Nehemiah text with Persian colonial ideology'. To a greater or lesser degree, these recent statements share an assumption of complicity with Persian imperial policy in both Ezra and Nehemiah. But it is possible to read Ezra, particularly, in a different light.

2. If one reads from an assumption of the social realities of occupied Judah under Persian imperial power, then one ought to read with attention to the vastly underestimated varieties of ways in which subordinated peoples resist a militarily superior force other than open confrontation (cf. Scott 1985). Reading Ezra's prayer (Neh 9) surely gives one pause ('Here we are, slaves in our own land!'). Further, the only occasion in Ezra–Nehemiah that actually gives us a reason for drawing up a list of personal names is Ezra 5:4, where the situation is of a Persian official wanting to report specific names because he suspects them of rebellious activity. When read in the context of minority strategies of resistance and circumstances of colonialism (see also Fanon 1963; Raboteau 1978; White 1983; Lanternari 1963, and Memmi 1965), Ezra and Nehemiah can be understood quite differently, and it is precisely this post-colonial sociology of resistance that informs the critical reading of Ezra and Nehemiah that is presumed in this commentary.

G. Nehemiah and the Persian Court. Neh 1:1–2:8, normally read as part of the 'Memoirs' of Nehemiah, is surely fanciful legend. Nehemiah's relationship with the emperor is another example of a standard element of Hebrew diaspora legend, so reminiscent of the tales of Daniel, Joseph, and Esther. Cook (1983: 132) reports that 'The King lived largely in seclusion; he is said by Xenophon to have prided himself on being inaccessible'. Georges (1994: 49) discusses that fact that the Persian court fascinated the Greeks—mainly because of the mystery of court life—the Persians in general remained a 'tabula rasa upon which the Greeks drew a portrait in their own idiom'. Persians kept aloof from their subjects 'by the gorgeous and impermeable carapace of formal protocol'. When the few Greeks that did attend court were there, they were 'buffered by courtiers and interpreters' to maintain the remove of the emperor surrounded by the symbols of power and control over his slaves or bondsmen (as all subjects were considered: Cook 1983: 132, 249 n. 3). Indeed, Xenophon (Cyros 8.2.7) admired such power, 'Who else but the King has ever had the power to punish enemies at many months distance?' Georges comments that even Ctesias, who supposedly had close connections to the emperor as a court physician, probably reads like so much harem gossip precisely because his contact with the court (even if authentic) was not so direct as we may imagine (Georges 51). Finally, Dandamaev (1989: 12) raises the prospect of court tales being concocted within the Persian court itself to discredit former royal lines or figures in order to justify changes in administration or policy. One is left with the impression of a Jewish lower official, whose actual relationship to the emperor (if any of the court tale is historical) has become at the very least highly exaggerated in ancient Hebrew imagination—and thus we are more alert to the more negative elements of this story, such as Nehemiah's fear before the emperor, and the reference to God's protection when he stood before 'this man'.

H. The Walls of Jerusalem. 1. Discussions about the possible royal associations of Nehemiah often overlook the fact that wall-building is seen as royal responsibility par excellence in the late historical work of the Chronicler (2 Chr 8:5; 11:11; 14:6; 17:2; 26:9; 27:3–4; 32:4–5; 33:14, 34; cf. Ps 51:18 and 1 Macc 4:60–1; 12:38; 14:32–4). Further, breaches in the walls of Jerusalem are causes for painful reflection (2 Kings 25:4; Ps 144:14; Lam 2:8, 18). Visions of peace speak of Jerusalem without walls, or with doors always open (Ezek 38:11; Zech 2:5; less certainly Isa 60:11). In his classic study, Mumford (1961) writes of the significance of the wall as part of social and political symbolism: 'what we now call "monumental architecture" is first of all the expression of power... the purpose of this art was to produce respectful terror'.

2. A great deal of effort has been expended on the geographical references in Nehemiah, but Avigad (1983: 62) concludes: 'no generally accepted solution for the problem of Nehemiah's wall has emerged'. The importance of wall-building for city defence is reviewed in the classic work of Yadin (1963: 19, 70–1, 313–28). Notably, city gates were the most vulnerable section of the wall, not only because of the weakness of the fortification, but also because battering-rams could cross hostile terrain without siege ramps. Nehemiah's later attention to the gates, therefore, was a necessary precaution (Neh 7:3). Their vulnerability may also explain why gates change location and name frequently (which is a difficulty of precisely locating Nehemiah's geographic references around the wall).

COMMENTARY

Ezra

The Edict of Cyrus and Preparations to Return (Ezra 1)

(1:1–12) vv. 1–3, the opening scene of the book of Ezra connects clearly to the end of 2 Chronicles (36:22), which is taken by many (Rudolph 1949: 2–3) to be another indication of the original unity between the books of Chronicles and Ezra/Nehemiah (contra Japhet). The emphasis of this introduction is on the first year of the reign of Cyrus of Persia (b. 590/589, d. 530). However, this must certainly refer to the first year of his rule of the Babylonian territory, thus 539. The reference to the predictions of Jeremiah is an indication of the beginnings of a textual canon, and its interpretation. The term 'to fulfil/accomplish' can refer to completed time (Gen 41:53, Jer 8:20; Isa 10:25; 24:13; Ruth 2:23; 2 Chr 29:28) or to finished work (1 Kings 6:38; 1 Chr 28:20; 2 Chr 8:16. Note especially Dan 11:36, 'period of wrath is completed'). Williamson (1985) argues that the fulfilment of the word refers not to Jeremiah's 'seventy years' but rather to Deutero-Isaiah's prediction of a victor from the east (Isa 41:2, 25; 45:13). God's 'stirring' of Cyrus ought not to be taken as sympathetic to Persian rule—rather it represents God's control of what appears to be human events (see Isa 41:2; 45:13). This is also clear in the use of the term p-q-d. That God 'entrusts/charges' the Emperor can be seen as some kind of endorsement of Cyrus, but it can also be a somewhat subversive statement about who is, in fact, in charge despite appearances (note also Neh 7:1; 12:44).

The use of 'God of heaven' has been taken by some to be a Persian equivalent of the concept of Ahura-Mazda, the central deity in Zoroastrianism, although it is controversial whether Cyrus was already Zoroastrian (Boyce 1975–82). The phrase 'God of heaven' is only used in Persian contexts in the Bible, thus affirming a possible parallel in the Persian mind between the two deities. Finally, the mention of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin is probably based only on the fact that they are the majority group here.

v. 4, on the possibilities of š-r as a technical term see Hasel (1972). nādab || nēdābā is a reference to freewill-offerings of the temple (Ex 35:29; 36:3; 2 Chr 31:14; Ezra 8:28, and negatively in Am 4:5). Japhet (1993: 503–5) notes the emphasis on these freewill-offerings in the Chronicler (1 Chr 29:5, 6, 9, 14, 17) as part of the Chronicler's emphasis on the whole-heartedness of the community.

It is widely accepted that Ezra 1 represents an oral form of the edict of Cyrus, which appears in written form in ch. 6. The latter is the more historically reliable text, ch. 1 being a summary (Bickermann 1976; Smitten 1972–4: 171).

v. 5, interest in the temple had significant economic implications (Weinberg 1992). v. 6, šēgīḡīm (lit. the ones around) means 'foreign peoples' (Ps 50:3; 76:12; 97:2; Jer 48:17; Lam 1:17; Ezek 16:57; 28:24; Dan 9:16). This is part of the 'despoiling Egyptians/new Exodus' motif of Ezra 1–6 (Williamson 1985: 16; Blenkinsopp 1988: 135–9). An awareness of the watchful eyes of the surrounding peoples is prominent in exilic and post-exilic writings. This awareness of wider society, of the presence of others who may laugh or ridicule, is a significant aspect of colonized societies who are sensitive to all aspects of their humiliation (Fanon 1963; Memmi 1965). v. 7, the humiliation theme continues with the mention of Nebuchadnezzar's placing of the vessels 'in the house of his gods', suggesting that even the gods of the defeated peoples are subservient to Marduk (2 Chr 36:10, 18 suggested that all the temple vessels were taken).

v. 8, Cyrus releases the vessels to a certain Mithredath (Persian) who is called gizbār (treasurer? from the Persian ganzabara (Fensham 1982: 46)). There are problems with interpreting the inventory. References to gold and silver basins and bowls are followed by 'knives' (?)—a difficult translation. The total does not match the enumerated items. The numbers are corrected in 1 Esd 2:2–11. Here is the first mention of Sheshbazzar, who remains the somewhat enigmatic leader of the first group of returnees soon after Cyrus's conquest of Babylon. Most scholars reject the equation of Sheshbazzar with Zerubbabel, simply considering Sheshbazzar to be the leader of the earliest, and unsuccessful, mission back to Judah (but see Galling 1961). Sheshbazzar is called here nāšī', which is not necessarily a royal figure (but cf. Ezek 40–8). Moreover, it is probable that many different journeys have been collapsed into one Exodus-type return in chs. 1–2.

(2:1–70) The Golah List v. 1, the term š-b-h (take captive) and šēbī (captivity) are used in combination with gōlā (exile) also elsewhere (Nah 3:10, Ezek 12:11). The LXX is sometimes confused as to pointing of the term šēbā which can be either 'exiles' or 'elders' in the Aramaic sections. In this context, the meaning is clearly a reference to exiles, but in other cases it is not so clear, since the leaders of the community are also referred to. The reference to hammēdīnā has provoked a continued debate with regard to the nature of the geographical/political entity in question. Was this a province of the Persian empire, or were the Jews administratively under the province of the much larger land-area of Samaria (Abernahara, 'Across the River')? Was 'Yehud' officially designated?

vv. 3–58, the list of the leaders of the community is arranged differently in Neh 7:7. There are suggestions that there was an intention to list leaders in parallel columns, as if to indicate the two leaders of various time periods, e.g. Zerubbabel (political leader) with Jeshua (priestly leader), and Nehemiah (political leader) with Seraiah (Ezra?), but such a plan breaks down because of our lack of knowledge of other periods of time. Who, for example, are 'Reelaiah || Ramiah' or 'Mordecai || Nahumiah'? Alternatively, 1 Esd 5:8 understands the names following Zerubbabel and Jeshua to be proēgoumenōn (those who go before) (in Deut 20:9 they are officials who address troops). This is a term used in later Christian literature of exemplary individuals.

When we get into the list of bēt' ābôt (lit. house of the Fathers) itself, there is further confusion between the parallel accounts in Ezra, Nehemiah, and 1 Esdras. The total numbers are problematic as well. The grand total of the laity alone is 24,141 in Ezra, 25,406 in Nehemiah, 'not unreasonable' for a population of the province of Yehud (Blenkinsopp 1988: 85). Galling (1964: 89–108) had earlier argued that this list represented many groups of returnees. Carter (1991) has proposed a small population for Yehud at 17,000. The Golah List, in such a case, must represent not only a succession of time periods added together, in Carter's estimation, but also population from outside the confines of his proposed 'Yehud'. Note, however, that precise numbers may not be as important as the mere fact of counting, as a significant concern in itself. Galling, noting the struggle with those who sought to assist the returning community, wants to add elements of racial consciousness, or racial continuity with the past, on the part of the returning community ('the purified community', so Galling 1951).

vv. 59–63, the words 'and these' clearly mark this section as separate from the list as a whole. It is possible that further reflection on this episode may help to determine the original meaning of the list. For whom are such lists of significance? 'Counting' is administrative, suggesting responsibility to higher officials—occupied peoples are familiar with the ubiquity of forms, numbers, rolls, registrations, etc. The terms used to describe these people in addition to those related to priestly families, are all place-names. The terms Tel-melah, Tel-harsha, Cherub, Addan occur only here. Immer refers elsewhere to a priestly family (Jer 20:1; Neh 3:29; Ezra 10:20). The presence of those claiming priestly descent would be an unusual claim if it were not authentic (2 Sam 17:27; 19:31–4, 39; 21:8; 1 Kings 2:7). The final decision awaits the re-establishment of the high priest.

It is often pointed out that the numbers do not tally (totals are: 31,351 in Ezra 2; 31,089 in Neh 7; and 30,142 in 1 Esdras).

Would women make up the difference? If so, does this partially explain the mixed marriage crisis? Rudolph (1949: 25) suggests that few women travelled with the returning community, leading some of the exiles to seek marriage partners among the people left in the land.

Two different forms of authority and power are contrasted in the early chapters of Ezra. The political leaders are the Persians and those delegated by them ('governors', tirshata, etc.), who represent the military élite, but of greater importance for the returned community of exiles is charismatic authority—the divinatory authority of the Urim and Thummim, and the prophets (on magic and myths among occupied people, see Fanon 1963: 55).

vv. 64–7 note the relative value of the animals that are listed, when divided amongst the total people counted in this list: 736 horses represents one for every 57 community members; 245 mules, one for every 172; 435 camels, one for every 97; 6,720 donkeys, one for every 6. Mules are associated with royalty in the Bible, and are the prized and rare possession among the community members (2 Sam 13:29; 18:9; Isa 66:20; Zech 14:15; 1 Kings 10:25 || 2 Chr 9:24, mules among gifts to Solomon). Horses, interestingly, are most frequently associated with warfare (pulling chariots only, stirrups were not used in the ancient Near East), so the number of horses would be of obvious interest to Persian officials. Most of the community members could not afford the long-distance trade animal, the camel (Firmage 1992: vi. 1136–7). Donkeys are clearly the common person's pack animal of choice.

vv. 68–9, the enumeration of financial gifts to the temple is intended to repeat the attitude of freewill-offerings noted already in ch. 1. It is often claimed that this amount of money indicates a wealthy community who had possibly benefited from financial success in the Persian heartland. However, there is reason to question this. These verses tell us that the community managed to donate 61,000 darics of gold, and 5,000 minas of silver to the work of rebuilding the temple. Is the mention of 'daric' anachronistic? Dandamaev believes that 'it is completely possible' that Cyrus issued coins (Dandamaev and Lukonin 1989: 196; and cf. Davies 1994).

Working with weights and measures in the HB is a vexed problem (see Betylon 1992: vi. 1076–89; Zograph 1977; Morholm 1991), but we can generalize to get the following picture. Basing our calculations on a Persian gold daric at 8.4 g., and a mina as 50 shekels of silver (but 60 in the Babylonian standard), we can convert to metric weights: 512,400 g. of gold and 1,337,500 g. (Babylonian standard, 1,605,000 g.) of silver. This results in an average of 8.04 to 9.64 silver shekels per person, and 1.96 darics of gold per person (the relative value of gold to silver would have been 13.3 : 1). Is this a great amount of wealth? Zech 11:12 refers to 30 shekels paid to a shepherd, presumably for an entire season of work, and Jeremiah bought the field in Anathoth for 17 shekels (Jer 32:9). Hosea bought his wife (presumably Gomer) for 15 shekels of silver. As late as 1 Macc 10:42, there is a reference to a 5,000 shekel tax on the temple (which would be a significant percentage of the total given in Ezra 2). The donations, when calculated per person, are rather meagre. A question remains, however, whether we are to consider these figures as donations to the work of the temple, or intended for the wider economic life of the community.

The dimensions of the inner sanctum (Holy of Holies) were $20 \times 20 \times 20$ cubits (1 Kings 6). A cubit is generally held to be approx. 50 cm., and thus, in order to even begin to reproduce Solomon's temple, they needed sufficient gold to gild 500 sq. m. of wall space in the inner sanctum alone. Both Ezra 6 (Darius's instructions) and 1 Kings 6 (Solomon's temple) suggest that the stone walls were first lined with wood and then gilded. Gold, with a basic weight of 18.88 g. per cu. cm., could be applied to a thickness of .001 cm. (based on Egyptian art; thanks to Dr David Scott, Getty Museum, Los Angeles, for figures on gilding). A square metre of gilt, therefore, requires at least 188.9 g. of gold. Just the inner sanctum would minimally require 94,450 g.—about one-fifth—of the 512,400 g. available. However, are we to believe that this community had over a ton of gold available to it (about $1\frac{2}{3}$ cu. m. of gold) besides Persian gifts? The disparity between silver and gold resources in this list, given their relative values, would otherwise seem hard to explain.

We obviously cannot be confident about the historicity of these figures, but the general indications of both the amounts and the tasks required indicate a relatively modest budget with which to try and reproduce Solomon's great achievement. Clearly, we are not dealing with a tremendously wealthy group of returning exiles, and probably must think in terms of a smaller percentage of those able to give larger amounts to achieve the per-capita average that we have indicated.

(3:1–13) The Beginning of the Temple Reconstruction under Zerubbabel Some scholars have suggested that ch. 3 is an independent account of the reconstruction of the temple (combined with 6:19–22; Blenkinsopp 1988: 96). The work establishes the altar, the sacrificial system, and then the shrine that housed it, in that order. The writer wishes to emphasize continuity with what had gone on before. Clines (1984) even writes of the community described here as 'reactionaries' and 'conservatives'. Surely this comes close to blaming the victims! The obsession with rules and regulations may reflect a certain conservatism bordering on reactionary attitudes, but it more probably reflects the fear of taking an unauthorized step. The unity of the people is represented by acting 'as one' or 'as one person' (as the Heb.; also at Judg 20:11; Neh 8:1). The indication 'seventh month' may be left over from the Golah List (ch. 2) being originally from the Nehemiah materials, and transposed to its present location in Ezra. v. 3, related to the community's sense of urgency is the theme of fear of foreigners—'dread' ('ēnā) of the neighbours—enemies (gē'ēbā) (see Gen 15:12; Ex 15:16; Isa 33:18; Josh 2:9; Prov 20:2; Ps 55:5); but 'neighbours' can mean 'enemies' as the LXX adds: 'for all the peoples of the land were hostile to them, and were stronger than they' (1 Esd 5:50). v. 7, there are echoes of Solomon's project here, particularly in the specific mention of dealings with Sidonians and Tyrians (cf. Solomon and Hiram of Tyre, 1 Kings 5).

vv. 11–13, the throngs give a great shout (tēnū'ā gēdōlā). This exact phrase occurs at the battle of Jericho (Josh 6:5, 20). Although it can be read as shouts of joy in connection with the movements of the ark (1 Sam 4:5, 6 and 2 Sam 6:15), the ark as war palladium would render these passages much closer to the more frequent reference to such great shouts as acts of warfare (Am 1:14; 2:2; Zeph 1:16; Ps 27:6; 47:6). When seen in the context of the fear of their enemies, the dedication of the temple was thus an act of spiritual warfare—they are shouts to God their Divine Warrior—and the shouts were heard 'far away' (as the Philistines heard the shouts around the ark, 1 Sam 4:5–6). Such a theme of deliverance from enemies fits with the predominant use of hased, the delivering love of God.

Although it is not expressly stated, it is widely assumed that some elders wept at the sight of the new temple because of great disappointment (cf. Hag 2:3; Zech 4:9–10). Sociologists have noted the phenomenon of exiles whose memory of home becomes quite stylized over the years, with streets paved with gold, and valleys perpetually green and inviting (Baskaskas 1981). The return home is inevitably a disappointment—and we know that the temple was definitely a subject of exilic imagination and longing (Ezek 40–8).

(4:1–24) History of Opposition to the Temple vv. 2–3, other people approach Zerubbabel and Jeshua and say that they, also, 'seek' (d-r-š) God. Their reference to a deportation during the time of Esar-haddon may be credible (Williamson 1985: 49; Fensham 1982: 66; cf. Oded 1979). But the leaders make claim to the exclusive right to build the temple. The 'adversaries' appeal on the basis of religion, and the Israelites respond on the basis of permission. In any case, we must reject the identification of these people as 'the Samaritans', a much later Jewish sect who do not emerge until the Hellenistic period (and would be noted for their conservatism, and interest in an alternative temple site!). Blenkinsopp (1988: 105) argues that an emphasis in Ezra on external problems may effectively avoid mentioning the internal struggles that are noted elsewhere (Hag 1:2–4; Isa 58:4; Zech 8:10; Isa 66:1–2).

vv. 4–5, the response of the surrounding peoples was to discourage the Jews from building their temple, particularly through bribery to 'frustrate/break' (p-r-r) the work (2 Sam 15:4; 17:14; Ps 33:10; Isa 14:27). The means used by the opposition is more explicit here than in 1 Esdras, which gives a somewhat more startling series of terms that appears to intensify the conflict: epiboulas (plots); episustaseis (insurrections); dēmagōgias (lit. leading crowds/mobs of people). This suggests far more social instability surrounding the activities of the Jewish community than does the MT of Ezra. Fensham (1982: 68) thinks that the text is speaking of Persian-appointed officials who were bribed, and we know that bribery was a significant Persian tactic (Darius boasted that, 'I will conquer Greece with my archers', an ironic reference to the archers appearing on gold darics and silver sigloi (Davies 1994: 66)). v. 6, Xerxes, we know, moved large numbers of troops through Judah to quell a major revolt in Egypt in 485. v. 7, from 1 Esd 2:16, we read Beelteemos (NRSV: Beltethmus), from Aramaic 'one who issues decrees', as a signatory of the letter. At this point the book of Ezra switches to the imperial language of the Persian empire, Aramaic, and continues until 6:18. This section deals largely with correspondence between local officials in Judah and the royal court. vv. 8–10, Rehum is called b'l š'm (NRSV: royal deputy; from Akkadian, 'official in charge'), an office which turns up regularly in Persian period biblical literature (Ezr 5:5; 6:14; 7:23; Dan 3:10 and 6:3), perhaps a civilian leader or chancellor (Blenkinsopp 1988: 112). The word used for 'letter' is īgrā, a term used only in Ezra. The list of peoples involved in sending the letter is difficult. The first term, for example, ʾāparsatkāyē, is taken to be 'Persians' or 'generals/envoys'. The ending y in Aramaic came to be understood as Gentilic, instead of referring to officials, which in the first three cases is more likely (e.g. generals, envoys, secretaries, then Erechians, as well as Babylonians, Susians, Elamites). The impression given is of a large number of peoples arrayed in opposition to the returning Jewish exiles, perhaps even implying the threat of insurrection or instability in the region. The list of various officials could also be a typical Persian-period guarantee against subversion by having all witnesses indicate their presence and agreement and confirm the contents.

vv. 12–13, Jerusalem, this 'wicked' and 'rebellious' city, is resurrecting itself! If it is completed, the worry is that the empire will lose their collections of 'tribute, custom, and toll' (v. 13; all Akkadian loanwords, mandattu, biltu, ilku—three types of tax: Fensham 1982: 74), thus 'the royal revenue will be reduced' and the king will suffer loss (cf. Dan 6:3b). The term n-z-q means 'loss-making', or 'unprofitable' (NRSV: hurtful) (v. 15). The greatest treachery in the eyes of imperialism is always loss of profit; despite flowery rhetoric about national interests. Scholars debate whether a precise rebellion is being alluded to here, but the general historical circumstances, including the Inaros Rebellion in Egypt in 460 BCE, and the later rebellions of the satrap Megabyzus in 448, make the accusations all the more dangerous. v. 14, the reference to eating the salt of the palace is taken by Williamson (1985: 56) to mean, 'in the pay of the court'. Perhaps it relates to an oath of office (Num 18:19; 2 Chr 13:5).

vv. 15–16, the accusations against Jerusalem continue—this time including a Persian loanword ēštaddūr (Rosenthal 1974: 59) which refers to a 'breach of the peace'. Because of these troublesome activities, the city was 'laid waste' (h-r-b). The appeal to the Persian authorities is based on royal interests; historical precedent (note v. 16, 'rebuilt', i.e. built as before); common interest in maintaining authority and order. vv. 19–20, the suspicions about Jerusalem are confirmed. It was once a rebellious and powerful city—the centre of a regime; for the Persians the implication is clear: it is a dangerous threat. Note the particularly incriminating evidence (v. 20): they once collected taxes for themselves. vv. 21–4, the work stoppage is backed up by military force. The chronology is confused here. Williamson (1985: 57) argues that v. 24 is a resumption of the narrative that was interrupted by vv. 6–23. The passage inserted was intended to justify the harsh treatment of the foreigners by pointing out that the Jews did, in fact, have some justification in being worried about them. The argument, however, would be strange, justifying their earlier action by what actually happened much later.

(5:1–17) Clarification of Persian Permission to Rebuild v. 3, a certain Tattenai is considered pahat (governor), and supported by another official, Sētar Bozenai (NRSV: Shethar-bozenai). The questions appear to be directed at the use of timber rather than religious matters: structures, money, and authority, and ultimately the threat of a competitive power centre. v. 4, the officials' request for the names implies a threat. Indeed, when Tattenai asks for the names of the people, this is the only occasion in Ezra–Nehemiah when a reason is given for drawing up a list of names. Perhaps commentators have missed this clue for the presence of lists running throughout Ezra–Nehemiah. Lists serve the occupying power by keeping constant record of every move, and reveal an atmosphere of control and caution, particularly where there are threats of punishment and warnings that orders must be carried out 'diligently'. They also give a sense of unity and cohesion, of pedigree and authenticity, to the people themselves.

v. 5, the 'eye of . . . God' was on the exiled community. Williamson (1985) trenchantly suggests that the eye of God is to be contrasted to the famous Persian spies throughout the empire known as 'the king's eyes' (cf. 'eye of God' in Ps 33:16–18; Ps 34; Job 36:7). Some classical scholars argue that the 'king's eye' existed only in Greek imagination, although that does not prevent Israelites from having a similar imagination (Hirsch 1985: 101–31). vv. 8–10, Tattenai refers only to elders, which led Zucker (1936: 20) to state that Zerubbabel must not have been appointed governor as yet. The leaders of the apparent insurrection in Jerusalem were questioned. The empire would be interested in removing the apparent cause of the trouble, i.e. the leaders. As with empires everywhere, it is assumed that the leaders are responsible for inciting the otherwise obedient and peaceful masses, apparently incapable of comprehending a people's movement based on principles other than hierarchy. vv. 11–12, in response to this challenge, the exiles respond with their understanding of power—'We are the servants of the God of heaven and earth'. The political question is given a theological answer. The phrase 'God of heaven and earth' is telling when one recalls a common claim of ancient Near Eastern emperors to be 'Kings of the four corners of the earth', of 'all the lands', etc. Thus, the Persian officials are taught a lesson in religious and Jewish history—in effect, 'we were taken away because of our sin, and not because of the powers of this world'.

vv. 13–17, only now do we arrive at the issue that the local governors are truly interested in—permission, documents, and authority. A probable impatience with religious notions gives way to attention when Cyrus and an exchange of commodities is mentioned. The real issue, for the Persian officials, is whether Cyrus wrote such a document or not. A search must be made. This is a matter of the 'pleasure' (cf. Kraeling (1953), AP 27:21, 22; 30:23) of the king. Like St Paul (Acts 22:25–6) finally appealing to his Roman citizenship, official wheels are set in motion with this claim.

The disappearance of Zerubbabel without explanation is often grounds for speculation. Was Zerubbabel the centre of an attempt to restore a Davidic leader to the Jewish community, and eventually deposed in disgrace by the Persians? (Waterman 1954: 73–8; Galling 1961: 80–4; Sauer 1967; Fensham 1982: 78). Others deny a conspiracy, and speak only of a mystery surrounding Zerubbabel's fate (Williamson 1985: 76). The speculation is heightened by the confusing language in Zech 6:9–14, which seems to imply the crowning of a king, although the high priest Jeshua has replaced Zerubbabel (a move possibly aimed at hiding the messianic speculation of the original passage).

(6:1–22) Search of the Archives and Completion of the Temple vv. 1–4, Darius makes the search (cf. the legendary Persian obsession with unchangeable law: Dan 3:28; 6:8, 15) and the document is found. Xenophon noted that Cyrus wintered in Babylon, spent the spring in Susa, and summered in Ecbatana (Cyr. 8.6.22). Many scholars now insist, on the example of Elephantine letters (Kraeling 1953: AP 30) that the Persians would have been interested in exact details (Blenkinsopp 1988: 124; Williamson 1985: 80–1, especially citing Hallack (1960) where payments are carefully noted; Fensham 1982: 87–9). v. 6, the local officials are told, ‘keep away’. Although Williamson (1985: 81) protests that local officials must surely have retained rights of inspection, the authoritarian nature of this order is certainly in keeping with Persian style (Olmstead 1933: 159–60) and seems in the same spirit as the language of threat in the rest of this communiqué. v. 8, the response was surely a humiliating reversal for the local officials, whose initiative stopped this work in the first place. Now they appear to be insubordinate to the authority of Cyrus himself! Furthermore, these ‘insurrectionist Jews’ are even to be supported from the tax coffers.

vv. 9–10, the provisions emphasize ‘whatever ... the priests ... require ... given day by day without fail’. One reason for the Persian interest in the religious life of the subordinate peoples is clear: they insist on ‘pleasing [soothing] sacrifices’ to accompany prayers offered for the Persian royal family (contrast this with the behaviour of Cambyses with regard to the Apis Bull: see Depuydt (1995), who concludes that Cambyses did kill the Apis Bull, as Herodotus suggested). Williamson (1985: 82), citing Jer 29:7 and AP 30 (Kraeling 1953), claims that the Jews would not have been ‘averse to complying with such a request’. And Blenkinsopp (1988: 129) adds, ‘The author ... accepts the possibility of a genuine religious life under foreign rule’. Both statements, however, are constructed out of a telling silence in the text on this matter. If the Jews were so sanguine about such prayers, where are they in the biblical tradition?

v. 11, the benevolence of Persian rulers is ironically backed by the threat of powerful military response if the Persian ruling is disobeyed. Now we recognize the rhetoric of power—anyone who transgresses this law will have a beam pulled from his home, and he will be impaled on it, and his house becomes a refuse heap. v. 12, the message is not subtle, the warning is not merely to individuals. The second part seems cleverly aimed at preventing the Jews themselves from having any independent ambitions, as well as at other political entities in the area. To whom is it directed? Foreign kings? Usurpers? Keep in mind that the Persian authorities have not necessarily forgotten that Jerusalem was ‘that rebellious and wicked city’, and that all around them is the threat of rebellion. v. 13, the king’s orders are carried out ‘with all diligence’. The term ’osparna (exactly, perfectly: Rosenthal 1974: 58) is the language of obedience, translated variously as ‘without delay’, ‘in full’, ‘with all diligence’—the message is clear—a powerful authority has spoken (Ezra 5:8; 6:8, 12, 13; 7:17, 21, 26; cf. Deut 4:6; 5:1; 6:3). vv. 14–15, if the temple was completed in 515, as is widely argued, then it was completed some 70 years after its destruction in 587–6, and thus perhaps comes close to Jeremiah’s predicted seventy years of exile. v. 17, the impressive array of sacrifices is supplied by Persian order, at Persian expense, and thus should moderate hasty conclusions about the alleged wealth of the exiled community.

vv. 19–21, the text reverts to Hebrew at this point, and we find the reference to the ‘sons of the exile’ (bēnē-hagōlā) (NRSV: returned exiles) for the first time here (see Smith 1989: 197). The emphasis on the rededication of the temple now shifts to a celebration of the main Exodus event—the Passover rites. v. 21 specifically notes that some from the surrounding peoples separated themselves from the ‘pollutions of the nations of the land (gōyē-hā’āres)’ (the use of gōy is somewhat less typical than that of ‘am, ‘people’), and joined with the returned exiles. That there were proselytes among the exiles may mitigate harsh judgements about their xenophobia (Fensham 1982: 96; Blenkinsopp, 1988: 133), although they may simply have been Jews who had ‘joined them’. v. 22, the festival of Unleavened Bread is celebrated in the context of God’s ‘turn[ing] the heart’ of the king of Assyria. The MT lacks an explicit air of friendliness here—God was acting in the interests of the Jews. Many scholars have noted the Chronicler’s arrangement of important celebrations of Passover to mark deliverance from threat (2 Chr 30, 35, in the context of deliverance from Assyrian threat).

(7:1–28) Ezra Given Permission to Return to Jerusalem
vv. 1b–5, the story of Ezra begins with a genealogy, in the classic Priestly tradition. Part of the significance is the association of Ezra with Moses. Note that Ezra is from Babylonia, a different source community from Nehemiah. We are left to speculate about the precise nature of Ezra’s role vis-à-vis the Persian authorities. Fensham argues that špr is an official Persian title (Fensham 1982: 99; Williamson 1985: 100 sees the phrase ‘Scribe of the Law of God in Heaven’, from v. 12 as the title); while Blenkinsopp (1988) is cautious, suggesting on the basis of Herodotus 3. 128 (dealing with officials under the Persian authorities) and AP 17 (Kraeling 1953), that Ezra may have occupied an office in the Babylonian satrapal court. It is going too far, however, to argue with Fensham (1982: 98) that the fact that ‘Ezra was entrusted with such an important mission indicates that the Jews prospered in Babylon and were well educated’. It can be argued, on the contrary, that Ezra’s relationship with the Persian authorities is left vague precisely to contrast his authority with that of Nehemiah, who was an insider. vv. 6–8, Ezra is described as māhīr (skilled). Note that this is from the root m-h-r (hasten) (cf Ps 45:1 (HB 2); Prov 22:29). Ezra is ‘skilled in the law of Moses’. Since the ‘hand of ... God was upon him’ (a phrase that typically expresses good fortune in relation to the occupying powers) he was granted what he sought from the Persian authorities. 1 Esd 8.4, typically, goes further by stating that Ezra was held in ‘honour’ and ‘favour’. The third-person account states that the king granted all that Ezra asked for, although there is no narrative account of Ezra appearing before the Persian monarch (as in Nehemiah). The seventh year of Artaxerxes would be c. 458 if we presume this to be Artaxerxes I. The occasional suggestion of 398 (thus a later Artaxerxes) raises more questions than it answers.

vv. 10–13, note ‘statutes and ordinances’ as a way of referring to the laws of Moses (Ex 15:25; Josh 24:25; Deut 4:1, 5, 8, 14; 5:1; 1 Chr 7:17). Ezra’s pre-eminent concern with Mosaic law, not Persian backing, is the source of his authority. Note, in v. 13, the implications of power in the ironic terms used to describe the composition of Ezra’s travelling party: Jews are authorized to 'freely offer' by the ones who command! v. 14, Artaxerxes' authority is vested in the 'seven counsellors'. The reference here is to the seven aristocratic ruling families or houses of the Achaemenid period that supported Darius's rise to power (Berquist 1995: 51–2; however, we note in Xen. An. 1.6.4–5 that Cyrus also had seven counsellors). vv. 15–16, silver and gold are found in Babylon for the express purpose of the temple in Jerusalem. In addition to the 'despoiling the Egyptians' theme, perhaps operating here, is a sense of compensation. After all, Babylon's gold consisted in part of the gold and silver stolen by Nebuchadnezzar from Jerusalem in 586, and provided for by tax payments ever since (according to Herodotus 3.90–1, the annual tax for the entire satrapy of Achaemenah is 350 talents of silver)—a matter hardly to be missed by writers of the post-exilic community. vv. 17–21, the emphasis on the temple and temple rites is further elaborated in the instructions to provide sacrificial materials, 'bulls, rams, lambs . . . grain-offerings and drink-offerings' which are to be offered to 'your God in Jerusalem'. The apparent nonchalance about the remaining funds is clarified by vv. 19–20—any withdrawal from the king's treasury would obviously have required careful accounting.

With v. 22, we are back to the detailed accounting, although the constant use of 'one hundred' probably intends merely to convey large amounts (100 talents of silver is a massive amount, greater by far than the amount mentioned in the Golah List). Williamson (1985: 103), considering this to be about a two-year supply, wonders if that was the original length of Ezra's mission, while Blenkinsopp (1988: 149) considers the mention of wheat, wine, and oil to be 'clear indication of a Jewish redaction' in the light of Num 15:1–16. v. 24, included in this purchase of the loyalty of religious leaders is a release of taxation on the major parties involved in the temple. This would support Weinberg's (1992) arguments about the economic centrality of the temple in the community. v. 26, if Ezra's authority is rooted in scholarship of the religious literary tradition, the Persian's basis for authority is the threat of death; banishment (šērōš, uprooting); confiscation of property (note Nebuchadnezzar's confiscation: cf. Wiseman (1956: 35); ANET 546; cf. 1 Kings 21:13–15); and imprisonment ('ēšūrīn) (on imprisonment as a late form of punishment in the ancient Near East, usually associated with debt, cf. Smith 1989: 171–4). vv. 28–9, lest one be overly sanguine about what has occurred in v. 27, vv. 28–9 add a darker colour—Ezra was protected by God's hesed before the king, counsellors, and the 'mighty officers'. The suggestion here is clearly the contrast of apparent Persian power, and God's actual power.

(8:1–36) The Journey to Jerusalem, Delivery of Royal Funds vv. 1–14, in this list, we are intended to see a parallel with the famous Golah List of Ezra 2 || Neh 7. Note the predominance of priestly associations before any Davidic identification. The mention of Hattush as a Davidide makes any other date than 458 difficult (he would be the fourth generation after Zerubbabel, cf. Blenkinsopp 1988: 162). v. 15, the gathering camped by the River Ahava. The camp (associated with the Exodus in Ex 13:20; 14:2; Num 9:18–20) is also used in connection with military campaigns (Josh 10:5; 2 Kings 25:1). vv. 16–17, the absence of Levites is a matter of concern—a note revealing an interesting openness on the part of a Zadokite priest such as Ezra. Two of the leaders (Joiarib and Elnathan) are selected, according to the LXX, as 'men of understanding' (almost always used of Levites, so Blenkinsopp 1988: 165). There is considerable speculation on the nature of 'the place' at Casiphia. Scholars widely assume that some form of institution for worship, or perhaps religious instruction, must have existed there. In Deuteronomic thought, the 'place' (māqôm) often refers to the temple.

vv. 21–4, Ezra is clearly contrasted with Nehemiah, who accepted an armed guard. Ezra proclaims God's protection (cf. 2 Kings 6:17; Mt 26:53). Contemporary scholarly attempts to belittle Ezra's faith at this point ('embarrassing', 'humiliating', 'he made a mistake', and similar) miss the context of divine warfare of the type indicated in Ex 14:14 and illustrated in Judg 7 (Lind 1980). v. 21, the fast (som) was proclaimed in order to call on God, an action frequently associated with preparations for warfare or preparing to face crises (1 Chr 16:11; 2 Chr 11:16; 15:4; 20:3–4; Ps 40:16 || Ps 70:5; Jer 29:13; 50:4; Jon 3:5; Zech 8:21, 22). God will provide 'a straight path' (NRSV: safe journey), a term associated with second Exodus themes of the return from exile (Isa 26:7–19; 40:3; Jer 31:9; Ps 107:6–7).

v. 22, who are the ones who 'forsake' God? In Judg 10:10 it refers to apostasy—by those who serve Baal (cf. Deut 28:20; 31:16; Jer 1:16; 2:19; 5:19; 17:13; 22:9). The formulaic saying is intended to mean, in paraphrase, 'If we call on God, God will protect us, but if we forsake him, his anger will be on us (by means of enemies, ambushes, etc.)'. Given the association of so many of these terms with YHWH war language, it is clear that what we have here is another element in spiritual warfare—i.e. the necessity to believe in the protection of God. Ezra's fast was part of his belief in God's miraculous fighting on the side of those who trust in God's protection, as opposed to the faithlessness of depending on actual armaments (see Smith-Christopher 1993: 269–92). vv. 23–30, the actual amounts given in vv. 26–7 are dramatically higher than the amounts of silver and gold in the Golah List: 650 talents of silver and 100 talents of gold. The reality of these figures can be questioned when they are translated into contemporary weights and measures—the amount of gold mentioned in the Golah List was already nearly a ton— $1\frac{2}{3}$ of a cubic metre of metal. Either there is corruption in the amounts given here, or they are totally fanciful. In any case, these are Persian resources, not Jewish. Dandamaev and Lukonin (1989: 205) note that, at the time of the fall of the Achaemenid state, Alexander seized no less than 7,000,000 kg. of gold and silver hoarded in the official treasuries. vv. 30–4, the travel is reported carefully, as well as the distribution of the financial assets of the mission, with proper notification that all has been written down. It is hard to escape the strong sense of Persian officials looking over the shoulders of the Jewish officials. v. 35, the twelve sets of animals are symbolically offered 'for all Israel', i.e. representing the twelve tribes (bulls and goats; cf. 2 Chr 29:20–4). v. 36, the satrap was the highest official of the province. More likely some lower officials, perhaps 'governors' is intended here.

(9:1–15) Ezra Discovers the Problem of Mixed Marriage: The Prayer of Confession vv. 1–2, it is likely that Neh 8 originally appeared between Ezra 8 and 9. The actions and reactions in ch. 9 ought to follow a reading of the law, as in Neh 8 (Williamson 1985: 127; Fensham 1982: 123).

No sooner had Ezra cleared his royal obligations, than he faces a crisis. The complaint here is that the people have not 'separated themselves' (b-d-l) from the 'peoples of the lands'. The term 'separation' is deeply significant to the heightened purity consciousness of the Holiness Code/Priestly redaction of the Bible (Smith 1989: 139–51). The priesthood was committed to separation of pure from impure, and the people themselves are violating this passionate concern.

The 'peoples of the lands', are associated with tō'ēbōt (abominations), the most common cultic term for idolatrous practices, but also of objectionable actions and behaviour. Note, however, the list of peoples: Canaanites, Hittites, Perizzites, Jebusites, Ammonites, Moabites, Egyptians, Amorites. Portions of this list are clearly anachronistic (Jebusites and Perizzites) and are intended to refer, with obvious revulsion, to the peoples traditionally driven out of the promised land by Joshua. The implication is that the planned second exodus is not being carried out with the same attention to purified peoples as the original Exodus. An argument can be made that Ezra is referring as much to fellow Jews who are not part of the 'sons of the Golah' as any ethnic non-Hebrews at this point (Smith-Christopher 1994). Blenkinsopp (1988: 175–6) comments that Ezra has combined ideas from Deut 7:1–5 with regard to the seven nations, and Deut 23:4–8 with regard specifically to Ammonites and Moabites, although Egyptians and Edomites are allowed after a minimum amount of time. Williamson (1985: 130), too, protests that many heroes of the faith contracted mixed marriages: Gen 16:3; 41:45; Ex 2:21; Num 12:1; 2 Sam 3:3. To understand this action, we must think in terms of minority consciousness of perceived threat and the response to insulate themselves from threatening influences. Mal 2:10–16 even suggests that some of the Jewish women were first abandoned so that the men could take on the foreign wives (presumably they were not economically wealthy enough simply to take on a second wife), which has led some modern feminist readers of this episode to note the interesting silence of the Jewish women of the exiled community, who may well have sided with Ezra!

v. 3, Ezra's attitude is that he is 'appalled' (š-m-m, desolated: a strong term). Ezra's behaviour is to violate the carefully prescribed decorum of priests, who must not, according to Lev 10:6, unbind their hair or tear their clothing (cf. Lev 21:10 and Ezek 44:20; 2 Sam 13:19; 2 Kings 22:11). Ezra's abandonment of proper behaviour, rather like Ezekiel's, is a measure of his reaction to the events at hand. His actions have been compared to mourning for a death (Williamson 1985: 133; Blenkinsopp 1988: 177). vv. 5–6, Ezra rose from fasting: the position of praying on one's knees begins only in the exile (Blenkinsopp ibid.). Ezra's great prayer of confession begins with his recognition of the 'iniquities' of the people (cf. Ps 38:4; 40:12; 79:8). The prayer of confession is reminiscent of other famous prayers of confession known in Hebrew literature—Ps 78, 106, Dan 9, and 4QDibHam. v. 7, reflecting Deuteronomic theology of blaming sins especially on the leadership of monarchical Israel, Ezra refers to the kings and priests of the past. Their sin led to the following threefold punishment—the people given over to the sword; exile and captivity; plunder (b-z-z: to spoil, plunder, cf. Ezek 5:12).

vv. 8–9, the Jewish community are called 'slaves' (Deut 6:21; Esth 7:4; 1 Sam 8:17; Add Esth 7:4/14:8). This starkly negative term represents one of the most forthright judgements on Persian rule that we have in post-exilic literature (except Neh 9:36). The 'little sustenance in our slavery' is surely ironic in Ezra, although once again, the LXX transforms this into much more positive language, speaking of the Persians 'giving us food' (1 Esdr 8:80). Finally, to refer to God not 'forsak[ing] us in our slavery' clearly compares the Persian period to the Egyptian period before the Mosaic liberation. Fensham (1982: 130) clarifies that the hesed is from God, not the Persian rulers. It is often objected that all Persians considered themselves slaves to the emperor as a mere euphemism (the Gk. sources use doulos: Cook 132, 249 n. 3) but the context of this use in Ezra 9 is clearly not encouraging us to read this as a neutral term.

v. 11, the language of impurity is reminiscent of Ezekiel (18:6; 22:10; 36:17; cf. Lev 12:2; 15:19, 20, 24). As all of these earlier Priestly references are to the impurity of women during menstruation, the sexual innuendo may foreshadow the issue of mixed marriages. v. 12, the prohibitions against mixed marriage are taken beyond their textual validity (Deut 7:2–3). In none of the older passages prohibiting mixed marriages is there the further command not even to seek the peace of these peoples. Do we have here an argument with the more open legacy of Jeremiah's letter to the exiles in Jer 29, where the exiles were instructed to 'seek the šālôm of the city'? A major concern with mixed marriage is the problems of inheritance and the economic survival of the exclusive community (Eskenazi and Judd 1994: 266–85). This event, so obviously distasteful for modern commentators, must be read within the context of sociologically informed suspicions about perceived advantages of 'marrying up' into wealthier local families, and our further suspicions that the 'foreigners' may have been Jews who were not part of the exilic community.

(10:1–44) The Mass Divorce of Foreign Wives by Group

Covenant v. 2, sections of ch. 10 appear to have been displaced. Blenkinsopp (1988: 187) wonders why 10:1–5 would contain the oath of the assembly to act on Ezra's concerns, yet in vv. 6–8 Ezra continues to complain. Williamson (1985: 148), too, notes that the differences between the first-person and the third-person narratives suggest a later editor of the Ezra memoir material. The phrase 'broken faith' (been treacherous) has Priestly, and other late use (Lev 5:21; 26:40; Num 5:6; Josh 22:16; 1 Chr 10:13; 2 Chr 28:19; Ezek 17:20; 20:27; 39:26; Dan 9:7). Despite this, 'there is hope' (Ps 33, 119, esp. 147:11). v. 5, Ezra makes the leaders, priests, Levites, and all Israel 'swear' to abide by this covenantal agreement. Despite the fact that Ezra has apparently been given Persian authority, his actions reflect internal politics, unlike Nehemiah, whose tendency is to command and order. v. 6, an interesting debate in the secondary literature involves the person Eliashib named here. It is often argued by those who assign Ezra to a later date (e.g. 398, following the missions of Nehemiah) that this is the Eliashib of Neh 3:1, and thus Ezra is in Judah when this Eliashib's son, Jehohanan, is active. But Blenkinsopp (1988: 190) points out that the Eliashib in Nehemiah is condemned by Nehemiah for defiling the priesthood—and thus one wonders if Ezra would associate himself with a family with such a reputation. Williamson (1985), on the other hand, notes that Neh 13:4 seems carefully to identify the Eliashib related to Tobiah as a different person. Names are often repeated and can become fashionable in an era, and so it is hazardous to assume that all occurrences of a person with the same name are, in fact, the same individual.

v. 8, the threat to those who do not participate in the community reformation is serious—they are to be banned h-r-m (using the strong term of total annihilation from the period of conquest) and forfeit their rēkūš (property). That the temple contingent can take such steps implies their economic power in the community. vv. 11–12, the community agrees to these conditions en masse, but then proceeds to ask for clarifications, stipulations, and conditions. Some members ask for more time, better weather conditions, and patience with the problems created by the number of people involved. v. 15, we are not privy to the basis of the objection by some who protested, and whether it was an objection to the process, or the entire issue of breaking up the mixed marriages. As we have evidence of more open-minded attitudes to foreigners elsewhere in the HB (Smith-Christopher 1996) it seems quitelike that they opposed the entire action. On the other hand, Blenkinsopp (1988: 194) refers to these as ‘rigorists’, because they oppose the delay in taking action that the process agreed upon implies. 1 Esdr 9:14 transformed the opposition into a passage about those who carried out the work!

vv. 25–43, the secondary literature carries on an extended discussion about attempts to work out the names in this list toward the expected twelve. v. 44, the foreign women are sent away with the children. Children, of course, are the main threat in the issue of inheritance, much more so than the women themselves. This ending of the book of Ezra appears to many commentators to be abrupt, leaving the reader with an uncomfortable sense of reading a book with missing pages.

Nehemiah

Nehemiah's Memoirs (Neh. 1–8)

(1:1–2:9) The Court Narrative of Nehemiah 1:1, Ezra uses the nomenclature of the Torah—that is, numbered months, while Nehemiah uses Babylonian calendrical names (Demke 1996). 1:2, ‘brothers’ is to be taken figuratively, given the context of Nehemiah’s presence in a foreign court, but Williamson (1985: 171), noting Neh 7:2, takes this literally. 1:3, the news of the state of Jerusalem is troubling to Nehemiah partly because of the ‘shame’ (herpā) of this circumstance (on taunts of foreigners, Ps 69:20, 21; 71:13; 89:51; 119:22; Isa 51:7; Jer 51:51; Lam 3:61; Zeph 2:8). But what is the devastation that Nehemiah is reacting to? It seems unlikely that he would be shocked to hear about the destruction that remained from the Babylonian conquest in 586, so perhaps he is hearing about the results of the events described in Ezra 4:23. It is possible, on the other hand, that we should infer from Nehemiah’s reaction that he is surprised that the walls are still down, even after the temple has been rebuilt. 1:6, ‘let your ear be attentive and your eyes open’ (cf. Ezra 5:5). Requests for God to hear and see are common. There are appeals to the ear of God at Ps 5:1; 17:1, 6; 31:2; 54:2; mention of the eye and ear in Isa 37:17; Lam 3:56, and note the special emphasis on the eyes of God in Ezek 5:11; 7:4, 9; 8:18; 20:17; Zech 12:4. Attention to the eyes of God, especially in time of exile, is further indication of awareness of other eyes of a more hostile nature. For a courtier, the ‘agents of the secret police’ (Dandamaev and Lukinin 1989: 111) would be all too familiar.

1:10–11, restoration from exile: see also Jer 31:11; Zech 10:8; Isa 35:10 = 51:11. The phrase ‘this man’ has engendered considerable discussion. Its disrespectful tone contradicts the generally held assumption that Nehemiah’s relationship with Artaxerxes was something other than the conquered to the conqueror. Given the realities of Persian rule, Nehemiah’s disdain is understandable and his fear is prudent. ‘I was cupbearer’ (see also Gen 40:1; 41:9) gave rise, in the LXX, to a variant that suggests Nehemiah was a eunuch—cf. oinochoos of Alexandrinus to eunouchos found in Vaticanus, Sinaiticus, and Venetus—all strong texts. Most scholars reject the variant tradition, and Williamson (1985: 174) further argues that being a eunuch would have created difficulties in exercising authority in Jerusalem. Many scholars suggest that ‘cupbearer’ meant one who tasted wine for poison (Xen. Cyr. 1.3.9; see Yamauchi 1990: 259), and note that Ahiqar was also a cupbearer (Tob 1:22). It must be said, however, that the arguments against Nehemiah’s physical mutilation tend to be motivated, once again, by the myth of Persian beneficence. Isa 56:4–5, for example, suggests that the notion should not be dismissed lightly, and sociological studies lend further weight to the probable folklore elements involved in the Nehemiah court tale, including the tradition of his being a eunuch (see Balch 1985; Cozer 1972).

(2:1–2) The words of the emperor strike fear in Nehemiah. He is worried about offending the king, despite what sounds like comforting concern. The emperor asks why he appears this way. Fensham (1982: 160), among others, comments that this concern is a ‘reflection of his humane character’. Humane indeed! If Nehemiah is the official wine-taster, then the emperor might well be worried if Nehemiah looks sick! 2:3–6, burial in Jerusalem is associated with kings (2 Kings 21:26; 23:30; 2 Chr 16:14; 35:24). The association with tombs of ancestors and Jerusalem strongly suggests royalty, and Nehemiah’s reference to ‘the place of my ancestors’ graves’ further supports the royal implications of Nehemiah’s concern with Jerusalem (Kellermann 1967: 156–9). In any case, the story seems less compatible with the idea of Nehemiah as governor of a province than a courtier being allowed to run an errand. 2:8, the word translated ‘king’s forest’ is ‘paradise’ (from Persian), and would normally refer to royal woodland or a forest reserve. Dandamaev (1989: 144–5) concludes that paradises were parks with fruit trees, animals, and other agricultural resources that could belong to king or nobility. 2:9, in stark contrast to Ezra, there is no description of the journey or elaborate preparations. Nehemiah has letters and a military escort consisting of officers (sārē), army (hayil), and cavalry (pārāšim). That Persian soldiers were certainly present in Judah is proven by the presence of cist-type tombs otherwise found in Persian archaeological sites (Stern 1982).

(2:10–20) Reconnaissance and Opposition vv. 10–12, the local resentment recalls Ezra 1–6. Sanballat is called ‘the Horonite’. Blenkinsopp (1988: 216) argues that this is undoubtedly a reference to Beth-Horon (Josh 16:3, 5), northwest of Jerusalem (not the Horonaim of Moab, Isa 15:5; Jer 48:3), and that Sanballat would have considered himself a YHWH worshipper after a fashion (Blenkinsopp 1988: 216). There is considerable evidence for Tobiad connections to Ammon. Perhaps this opposition explains Nehemiah's concern for secrecy. vv. 13–15, there is an interesting amount of detail in the locations mentioned by Nehemiah, which invites attempts at close analysis. The Valley Gate would have led west (500 m. from the Dung Gate), and Nehemiah would then have turned south. The Dragon Gate is often associated with the Serpent Stone which is known also as Job's Well, 200 m. south of Ophel. The Fountain Gate would be the south-east corner towards En-rogel, and the King's Pool could be a reference to the Pool of Shelah or the Lower Pool, although Williamson (1985) identifies the King's Pool with the Pool of Solomon. In any case, the tour would have consisted largely of the south-east and south-west sections of the wall. Nehemiah is not able to traverse portions of the wall. Are we to presume that he rode on the wall, and therefore could not go further? Nehemiah travels by night to complete his survey. With Nehemiah, however, the reader is also left in the dark with regard to whether Jerusalem was in this state from the devastation of 587/6—the Babylonian destruction—or whether this is the result of a more recent difficulty.

v. 19, the enemies now include Geshem the Arab. A bowl from Ismailia mentions a Geshmu—King of Kedar (for Kedarites see Gen 25:13; Isa 21:16–17; 42:11; 60:7; a 'King of the Arabs' is noted in Herodotus 3.4.88). Thus, Blenkinsopp (1988: 225–6) notes that Nehemiah is surrounded by opponents: Samaria to the north, Tobiads to the east, and Kedarites in the south. They 'mocked and ridiculed' (לִּגְ, Ps 59:9; Isa 37:22, and בִּזְזָה, Ps 15:4; 119:141) but their tangible accusation is that Nehemiah is inciting a revolution against Persian authority. Note the number of times that forms of the verb m-r-d (to rebel) will appear in the discussions between Nehemiah, Sanballat, and Tobiah (see NEH 6:4 and following). v. 20, the term 'share' (2 Sam 20:1; 1 Kings 12:16) refers to political association, 'claim' suggests jurisdiction, or legal rights, and 'historic right' (zikkôn) refers to a traditional claim resulting from participation in the cult (Williamson 1985: 192). Although neither Sanballat nor Tobiah has asked to participate in building, one notes the influence of the events in ch. 4. There is a significant suggestion, then, that Nehemiah is finishing what Zerubbabel started—and both have messianic associations.

(3:1–32) v. 1, Eliashib and the priests rebuild the Sheep Gate. Williamson (1985: 195; following Ehrlich 1914) reads not qidēšūhū (they consecrated), but qirēšūhū (they boarded it). Commentators have noted that vv. 1–15, working on the north and west sections, have names linked by 'next to', with locations given. But in vv. 16–32, on the east and south sections of the wall, the link is 'after him', and groups are given according to places in the city. Blenkinsopp (1988: 232) speculates that vv. 16–32 focus on the more devastated part of the wall. Indeed, twenty-one work details were on the east side of the wall, and workers on the Fish Gate 'built' rather than 'repaired' the wall. The north would have suffered the brunt of most attacks on Jerusalem, for those arriving from Mesopotamia (famously, Jer 1:13–15).

v. 7, the names of Gibeon and Mizpah, territories apparently outside the parcel of land-area granted to the exilic community, are mentioned as under the authority of the governor of Beyond the River. The term of authority is literally, 'to the throne' (lēkissē) (NRSV 'under jurisdiction'). Ch. 3 presents us with six districts: Jerusalem, Beth-zur, Keilah, Beth-haccherem, Mizpah, which was the administrative centre of the area after the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians, and obviously retained its importance to this time, and Jericho. (Simons (1959: 392–3) warns that mentioning a place-name need not imply actual residence, but merely the use of a location as a group identification.) v. 16, the 'house of warriors' (bēt haggibbōrīm) may be the Persian garrison.

(4:1–23) Militarizing the Wall Building v. 1, Sanballat was 'greatly enraged' and 'mocked the Jews' (cf. Ps 44:14; Ezek 23:32). 'What are these feeble Jews doing?' The adjective here is rare; ēmēlāl is usually translated 'languish/ed': 1 Sam 2:5; Isa 16:8; 24:4; 33:9; Jer 15:9; Hos 4:3; Nah 1:4. v. 3, the language about the fox on the wall has been troublesome. Some see the term as a reference to a siege weapon, but Williamson (1985: 214) sees it as a sarcastic reference to a small animal being able to break apart what the Jews are putting together. vv. 4–7, after asking God to 'hear' Nehemiah says that the Jews are being 'despised' (b-z-h); the focus moves to their 'taunt' and reproach (cf. 1 Sam 17:26; Ps 69:20, 21; 71:13; 89:51; 119:22; Prov 18:3; Isa 51:7; Ezek 21:33). They are to be given over as 'plunder' (bizzā) in a land of captivity. In short, the curse calls for a reversal of fortune—God, do to them what they did to us! The opposition includes traditional enemies.

vv. 10–13, the fear, it appears, comes from the threat of guerrilla-type assassinations amongst the piles of rubble, not from large-scale attacks. The murmurings get so serious among the 'Jews who lived near them' (i.e. enemies), that Nehemiah arms the population. vv. 14–15, 'Do not be afraid' (al tīrē'û: fear not!). This is the great battle-cry of ancient Israelite YHWH War (Deut 20; von Rad 1991; Lind 1980). But as quickly as the crisis builds, it disappears in a single sentence. v. 16, more than mere hand weapons are referred to here: there are shields and body armour ('Persian weapons', Blenkinsopp 1988: 252). vv. 17–18, the concern for defence is emphasized—one hand on a tool, one hand on a weapon. Nehemiah also keeps the trumpeter close at hand so that he can rally the troops at a moment's notice. v. 20, with the blowing of the shofar, a YHWH War was declared—complete with the belief that 'Our God will fight for us' (cf. Judg 3:27; 6:34; 7:18; 1 Sam 13:3). vv. 21–3, there continues the great emphasis on preparation for war. The final phrase (lit. 'a man his weapon the water') is quite impossible. If hammayim (water) is emended to hayyamîn (right hand), then it makes sense! 'each [man] kept his weapon in his right hand'.

(5:1–19) Nehemiah's Reforms v. 1, šā'āqāt hā'ām (outcry of the people), the cry of oppression against their Jewish neighbours. The cry against Pharaoh, the cry against enemies, is here raised up against their own people (cf. Ex 14:10; 22:23, the cry to God for deliverance from injustice and abuse; Ps 107:6, 19–20). Some have suggested (Neufeld (1953–4) that the time of the wall building was before the olive and grape harvest, and thus hit local society at an economically weak point. We also know that the imperial tax burden went up during the time of Darius, and again in the time of Xerxes, in order for the latter to pursue his military campaigns against the Greeks (Blenkinsopp 1988: 257). But the bitterness here seems directed towards fellow Jews. vv. 2–3, ‘With our sons and daughters, we are many’, and in 5:3 ‘We are having to pledge our fields, our vineyards, and our houses in order to get grain during the famine’ (cf. Gen 47:13–26). Besides the obvious connection to the enslavement narratives of the Exodus, there is also close parallel in image to the laws of divine warfare in Deut 20 where Israelites are exempt from warfare if they have not yet enjoyed the fruits of peace: namely marriage, gardens, and houses. The implication, then, is a protest against Nehemiah’s militant enlistments for his building campaign: ‘How can we carry on your battles, when we haven’t even enjoyed the fruits of peace?’ vv. 4–5, now the accusation is directed at the emperor. The Persian tax requirements are also oppressive. The tax had to be paid in silver by the time of Darius (on the exploitative result of using silver for taxation, see Kippenburg 1982). This suggests that the main danger is from fellow Jews who would exploit the condition of the new administration. vv. 6–8, Nehemiah ‘brought charges’ (r-y-b ‘disputes’, suggests legal action; cf. Ex 23:2, 3, 6; Deut 21:5; 25:1). On the theme of the ‘sold ones’, ‘our Jewish kindred . . . sold to other nations’, (cf. Gen 37:27; Lev 25:47–55; Ps 105:17; Isa 50:1; 52:3; Jer 34). The accusation of Nehemiah seems tantamount to saying, ‘you are exiling your fellow Hebrews at precisely the time we are trying to ransom the exiles back from foreign control’. v. 10, Nehemiah points out that these exploiters are even taking advantage of the fact that they have been helped from his funds as a royal representative. Fensham (1982: 194–5), on the other hand, sees this as a confession by Nehemiah that he, too, was involved in this financial exploitation.

v. 15, the previous governors took bread, wine, and ‘forty shekels of silver’. This per-diem amount places Nehemiah in a social category far above the per-capita holdings of silver of the average Israelite, if the numbers in Ezra ch. 2 are to be taken seriously at all. This passage has been taken to prove the existence of Judah before Nehemiah, with previous governors before him (the case is hardly closed. See McEvenue 1981; Lapp and Lapp 1974: 81; Stern 1982; for an earlier Judah, Blenkinsopp 1988: 264; Williamson 1985: 243). v. 16, the work on the wall is implied to be of benefit to all the people, but this point can be questioned. Note that in Lev 25:29–31, the year of Jubilee and redemption does not apply to houses in walled cities! There, a person has only one year to redeem a house. The monied rights of the urban aristocracy defeated even the radical measures of the Jubilee redistribution of land (Weinfeld 1995: 176). By rebuilding the wall, Nehemiah also guarantees the financial rights of the wealthy class of Jerusalem—in a sense creating economic opportunity zones within the boundaries of the administrative city that he is trying to rebuild (as a royal figure?). Note the similar impact of Josiah’s reforms in 2 Kings 23 (see Nakasone 1993). vv. 17–19, it is so with all the privileged in history—their over-indulgence is justified by their presumed self-importance, and further, the claim that their exploitative practices are for the good of all.

(6:1–19) Continued Opposition, Internal and External vv. 1–2, the suggested meeting-place, the plain of Ono, is surely either on the border (Fensham 1982: 200, Blenkinsopp 1988: 268), or outside Judah altogether, although Williamson places it in Judean territory (Williamson, 1985: 255). vv. 4–7, a rebellion must have a leader, and Sanballat writes that Nehemiah proposes to ‘become their king’. Sanballat is well aware of the possibility that popular sentiment will stand behind a claim to restore an independent Judah, and accuses Nehemiah of sponsoring prophetic support (note the importance of prophetic authority in Ezra–Nehemiah). The reason for the open letter is now clear. Sanballat warns that the Persian monarch will soon hear of these plans. We have seen that Nehemiah’s activities mirror royal authority and activities to such a degree that Sanballat’s accusation, to say the very least, is rational and well founded! v. 10, scholars have suggested that Shemaiah proposes that Nehemiah openly proclaim his kingship by closing the doors of the temple (Ivry 1972: 35–45; cf. 2 Chr 23). The temple, it must be recalled, is the administrative centre of the Judean settlement under the Persians. To close the doors of the temple is to declare oneself in charge over that institution, which would apparently declare open sedition against the Persian authorities. Yadin (1963: 95) also notes that the temple was often fortified as a final retreat after the walls of a city were broken. Others have argued that the temple was a site for asylum, and that Nehemiah was being warned of a conspiracy. This would seem to square with his reply about being afraid. A certain Noadiah is also named as a female prophet hired by Sanballat (this accusation, however, is doubted by Carroll 1992). Nehemiah, in his report to God (rather like a report to the Persian monarch) names those who sought to do him harm. v. 17, ‘nobles’ (hōrīm) of the Jews continued to correspond with Tobiah, apparently because they were actually intermarried with Tobiah’s family. While Sanballat appears defeated by the completion of the wall, Tobiah continues to be a threat, indicating that Tobiah is more closely related to the people with whom Nehemiah must deal (see Neh 13).

(Ch. 7) The Golah List v. 2, the joint appointments of Hanani and Hananiah over Jerusalem ‘and the citadel (military garrison?)’ raises some questions. Is Nehemiah preparing to complete his work and return to the Persian heartland? v. 3, the verse is difficult. Many commentators cite the practice of the siesta which is typical in warm climates. Thus, it would be a time for particular vigilance. v. 5, the second appearance of the Golah List is introduced by the idea that Nehemiah wanted to register everyone by their lineage. The editor is clearly aware of this secondary use by his introduction. Many scholars believe that the original purpose of the list is best tied to its location in Nehemiah rather than in Ezra chs. 1–6. In vv. 43–5, gatekeepers and singers are enumerated with the Levites. This serves as one of a few reminders that not all difficulties with the list are solved by dating it to 460–430 BCE.

(8:1–18) The Study of the Law v. 1, the presence of Ezra and the virtual absence of Nehemiah support the argument that ch. 8 is among the displaced chapters from the Ezra material. According to the date given, the ‘seventh month’, this episode is often placed before the marriage crisis in the ninth month as noted in Ezra 9–10. Thus, the original place for ch. 8 would logically have been between Ezra 8 and 9. The action of bringing ‘the book of the law of Moses’ (Torah) (note 2 Chr 23:18; 30:16; Ezra 3:2; 7:6; Dan 9:11, 13; Mal 3:22; Ps 119, 'Torah of YHWH') and reading from it reminds many contemporary scholars of the later synagogue service, and suggests that some aspects of the later service have their roots in a formal ceremony of reading and teaching Torah (on the presence of a service format here see Blenkinsopp 1988: 285, and the variant in Fensham 1982: 215; Clines 1984: 183 and Williamson 1985: 281 disagree). v. 2, the phrase 'hear with understanding' (lit. understood to hear) (Neh 10:28; Ps 119:10, 32, 34, 73) can be compared to the teaching of the wise in Dan 10:12; 11:33—the wise who give understanding to the many. v. 3, Ezra reads facing the square: 'In a society defined by ethnicity and nationality, the square concentrates a potentially diffuse, and therefore, difficult to control, population into a small geographical space. From this place, the royal/governmental power may keep its hegemony over the elite, while creating an ideology of participation and equality' (Wright 1990). Cf. Josiah's hearing of the law, 2 Kings 22–3.

v. 6, there is an interesting series of actions described here, which reminded Rudolph (1949: 147) of Islamic prayer rites. v. 8, yet another term is used here: 'the book, the law of God' ('ēlōhīm). The Levites read 'with interpretation' (cf. Lev 24:12; Num 15:34; Esth 4:7; 10:2; Ezek 34:12). They 'gave the sense' (cf. Dan 8:25 'cunning!'; 1 Chr 22:12; 2 Chr 2:11; Ps 111:10; Ezra 8:18). 1 Esd 9:55 has the people understanding the reading by using emphusiao (to infuse life into) (cf. LXX Gen 2:7; Wis 15:11). v. 9—'The governor [tirshata] ... said', MT adds Nehemiah's name here, but the LXX omits it. Some scholars have noted that the use of the singular verb, also at v. 10, indicates that Ezra acted alone in the original account. vv. 10–13, this admonition to give to those who are poor may not be simply an obligatory piety, but speak to actual conditions among the returning community (cf. Neh 5). As is the pattern, the command is followed by the description of its fulfilment. vv. 17–18, the reference to Joshua lends further nationalist overtones to the celebrations.

(9:1–38) Ezra's Confessional Prayer; Mixed Marriage Crisis vv. 1–3, the people stand and proclaim their sins and iniquities, and those of the fathers—as in v. 3—'making confession' (see Lev 5:5; 16:21; 26:40; Num 5:7; 2 Chr 30:22; Ezra 10:1; Neh 1:6; Dan 9:4, 20). vv. 4–6, the general prayer of confession follows set patterns established throughout the late biblical material. The theme of God as Creator is a theme that is typical of post-exilic theological reflection (Isa 40–8; although Amos 4:13; 5:8–9; 9:5–6, see Blenkinsopp 1988: 303). God as Creator effectively trumps the claims of universal rule of the Persian emperors as well—note the same theme in the face of Babylonian claims in Daniel (Dan 9; cf. Baruch 1:15–3:8; 1 Kings 8; Ezra 9: all post-exilic confessional prayers). v. 7, the historical events are certainly not chosen arbitrarily. The Persians are presumed to be listening. God is identified as Creator, who exercises the military-political tactic of name-changing—the privilege of the conqueror. vv. 8–11, note that the beginning of this prayer makes these strong statements: (1) The land is given outside Persian authority (i.e. by God); (2) The claim is based on God's sanction, not Persia's; (3) The claim is prior to Persian claims. Also, note the reference to sinking 'like a stone' (Ex 15:15)—God's defeat of Pharaoh.

v. 15, for hunger there was manna from heaven (Ex 16; Ps 78; 2 Esd 1:19;) and for thirst, water from rock (Num 20; Ps 78; 105; 114; Isa 48; Wis 11:4; 2 Esd 1:20; 1 Cor 10:4). By the end of v. 15, Ezra has established that God was fully capable of delivering the people from physical, earthly rule, ordering their daily lives, and providing their basic necessities. The obvious implication is, 'What do we need the Persians for?' v. 16 turns the corner. The people reject God's care because they are 'determined to return to their slavery' (v. 17). It can hardly mean anything other than the implication that their present circumstances are part of the slavery of rejecting God's good care in the past! The stubbornness of the people is contrasted to the 'wonders' performed by YHWH (Ex 3:20; Judg 6:13; 1 Chr 16:9; Jer 21:2; esp. Ps 9:1; 26:7; 105; 106; 107).

vv. 22–3, Sihon and Og (1 Kings 4:19; Neh 9:22; Ps 135:11; 136:19—note that Ps 135, 136 are passionately nationalist) represent kings that were defeated at the initial stages of the conquest of Canaan. Might we have a historical reference to the territories of Sanballat and Tobiah here? The kings of Heshbon and Bashan are, at the very least, symbols of those who resisted the Jewish conquest under God's leadership (Deut 1:4; 29:7, and as a saying in current use, cf. Deut 31:4; Ps 135, 136). v. 24, 'Doing ... as they pleased' is royal prerogative in late biblical literature, often linked with Persian rulers (Esth 1:8; 9:5; Dan 8:4; 11:3, 16, 36). vv. 32–4, 'hardship' or weariness is tēlā'ā (Ex 18:8; Num 20:14; of exile, Lam 3:5; Mal 1:13). The use of 'Assyria' implies, even if not stated explicitly, 'that there was not much to choose between the Assyrians and their imperial successors: the Babylonians and Persians' (Blenkinsopp 1988: 307). These events, including Persian rule, are seen as punishment. vv. 36–7, the central point is this: 'we are slaves' followed by 'the land'. The people and the land are in slavery. The rich yield (Lev 25:20; Prov 10:16; 14:4; 15:6; 16:8) goes to foreign kings. As one might expect in a prayer of confession, the central theology here is Deuteronomistic 'God's punishment' theology. There is a possible word-play on rāṣôn, the king's 'pleasure', and the ṣārā (difficulty) of the Jews—in other words, their 'pleasure' is our 'pain'. Blenkinsopp (1988: 30) reminds us, 'One of the worst aspects of imperial policy under the Achaemenids was the draining away of local resources from the provinces to finance the imperial court, the building of magnificent palaces, and the interminable succession of campaigns of pacification or conquest.'

(10:1–39) Crisis Resolved; People's Covenant vv. 1–27, the list interrupts a narrative beginning with v. 1, and continuing with vv. 29–30. Note that Nehemiah is called 'tirshata'. Nehemiah may have carried such a title. v. 28, the people are referred to as 'the rest', or remnant, but this includes 'all who have separated themselves from the peoples of the lands'. Presumably these are people from the groups that did not go into exile, or from earlier returns. vv. 29–31, the movement of females is stressed here (lit. 'our daughters not to them; their daughters not to us'). Foreign daughters coming into the group may result in inheritance passing out of the community on the death of the male. Both directions, however, are an economic threat.

v. 33, the rows of shewbread are noted in Lev 24:5; 1 Chr 9:32; 23:29; 2 Chr 2:4, 11; 29:18. The regular burnt-offerings for priests are noted in Num 15:1–10. The breakdown of the following suggests the divisions of ‘holy time’: sabbaths (weekly); new moons (monthly); and festivals (annually). v. 35, the casting of lots is clearly to seek fair distribution (1 Chr 24:5, 31; 25:8; 26:13, 14; Ps 125:3) of the wood-offering—by ancestral houses. Cf. the emphasis on fair distribution in Ezek 40–8 on land, weights, and finances. vv. 39–40, the term ‘chambers’ of ‘storehouses’ (NRSV: storerooms) is found in previous texts: 1 Chr 9:26, 33; 23:28; 28:11, 12; see also Deut 28:12; 2 Kings 20:13, 15; 2 Chr 32:28; Job 38:22; Ps 33:7; 135:7; Jer 38:11; Mal 3:10. Fensham (1982: 241) suggests that we may have a picture of Persian tax collecting policies, with the temple at the centre. The people will not ‘neglect’ (‘-z-b) the house of God, because God has not neglected them.

(11:1–36) Repopulating Jerusalem v. 1, the military overtones of this entire episode, surely resulting from Nehemiah’s Persian commission, have been noted in the literature (Kellermann 1967; Wright 1990; Hoglund 1992). The unusual term for Jerusalem this early (lit. holy city), is found in various forms in 19 other places in the HB, and alluded to in the NT. v. 12, volunteering to live in Jerusalem continues the military theme (cf. Judg 5:2, 9, and esp. 1 Chr 29:5–6). v. 4, ‘Judahites and... Benjaminites’ become symbolic of the majority, rather than exclusive of those from other tribal backgrounds. vv. 4b–36, the sources of this list are usually considered early, given that gatekeepers and singers are not yet listed with levitical status (so Williamson 1985: 347; Blenkinsopp 1988: 325–7). The listing of persons follows the order: (1) vv. 4–6, Judahites; (2) vv. 7–9, Benjaminites; (3) vv. 10–14, priests; (4) vv. 15–18, Levites; (5) v. 19, gatekeepers; (6) vv. 20–1, ‘the rest of Israel’, those who live each on naḥālātō ‘his inheritance’. Special mention is made of nētūnīm (temple servants) (Weinberg 1992: 75–91).

v. 25, there is an unusual combination of terms used here: ‘villages’ and ‘fields’ (ḥāṣṣerīm, bišēdōtām). Generally, Williamson (1985: 350) considers the role of villages to be a utopian view of post-exilic geography, although we have noted that this list is taken from Josh 15, and thus intended to mimic the conquest of the land (Simons 1959: 393; Blenkinsopp 1988: 330). v. 36, the term used for ‘divisions’ is typical of the Chronicler (1 Chr 23:6; 24:1; 26:1, 12, 19) and almost always of priests and Levites (see, however, Josh 11:23; 12:7; 18:10).

(12:1–47) Processional Dedication of the Wall vv. 1–21, the first half of this chapter consists of a record of priestly and levitical families, including a record of high priests that, although incomplete, takes us down to the time of Alexander the Great (Jaddua, v. 22; see Jos. Ant. 11.302). Nehemiah is mentioned as if the narrator is writing from beyond his time (note the two historical figures David and Nehemiah in v. 46). The chapter shows considerable editorial activity, in the late additions found in vv. 6, 19, 22, and 23. v. 23, the importance of records read to the king further supports the view that the lists throughout Ezra–Nehemiah are evidence of the constant watch of the authorities. v. 26, Joiakim could hardly be Jehoia-chim, king after 605 BCE in Judah. v. 27, the term ḥānukkā (dedication) is only late, of dedications in P and other later biblical books. All the instruments must have been carried during the procession, which may affect how we imagine the size of the various specific instruments (Williamson 1985:

372). v. 30, t-h-r (purify), predominately used in P (Lev 13:6, 34, 58). Purification, of course, has been a central concern throughout the exile (Smith 1989: 49–65, 139–51).

v. 31, two or three people abreast could walk on top of Jerusalem’s walls, according to Kenyon’s excavations (Avigad 1983: 23–63). v. 36, ‘the scribe Ezra’ is almost certainly a later addition to the text. vv. 38–9, the places named are confusing: Tower of the Ovens; Broad Wall; Gate of Ephraim; Old Gate; Fish Gate; Tower of Hananel; Tower of the Hundred; Sheep Gate; Gate of the Guard. The number of gates around Jerusalem has always been in flux, and named for either direction, particular event, or destination of those who travel from that gate (e.g. Ephraim Gate—cf. the modern Damascus Gate). In the light of the weakness of gates (H.2) this variation in names and locations for gates and towers is rational. v. 43, of joy in Jerusalem, cf. 2 Chr 20:27; 30:26; Esth 8:16, 17; Ps 35:37; 105:43; Tob 13:10, 17; esp. Isa 65:18. The hearing of joyful celebration, especially at a distance by enemies, is an interesting theme (Isa 15:4; 1 Sam 4:6; Ruth 1:6; enemies hearing in Ezra 3:13; Neh 2:10, 19; 4:1, 7, 15; 6:16; and 9:9, 27, 28; of God hearing, see Isa 66:19; Jer 40:11; 49:21; 50:46; 1 Macc 14).

(13:1–31) Nehemiah’s Second Visit: Further Reforms It has often been observed that ch. 13 seems an afterthought—a collection of issues that a later editor considered to be loose ends that required tying up. The chapter easily breaks up into separate episodes: vv. 1–9, the presence of Tobiah in the temple; vv. 10–14, levitical duties; vv. 15–22, concerning trade and commercial activities on the sabbath (‘In those days I saw...’); vv. 23–9, further concerns on mixed marriage issues (‘In those days I saw...’); vv. 30–1, summary of entire chapter. It is possible, furthermore, that vv. 6–7 provide the reason—they seem to point to an addition from a second term of Nehemiah’s responsibilities in Judah.

v. 1, the introduction to the reading of the books of Moses leads to the emphasis on the Ammonites and Moabites (Gen 19:38; Deut 23:3; Neh 4:7; Amos 1:13; Zeph 2:8; Jdt 6:5—a racial slur?). Note, however, that Ruth is a Moabite, and Isa 56:6–8 looked to an era when foreigners would be welcome in the ‘house of prayer’. v. 2, Balak and Balaam are recalled here (Num 22–3; cf. Isa 15–16; Jer 48). The tradition becomes a code to speak of issues of contemporary economic and political tension. v. 4, Tobiah was ‘close’ (qārōb) in the sense of related by family ties (cf. Lev 21:2, 3; 25:25; 2 Sam 19:43). v. 5, Tobiah’s storehouse was a base of operation. Commentators compare the commercial problems in vv. 15–22, concluding that Tobiah was using a privileged position in the temple economy to pursue advantageous business arrangements (Blenkinsopp 1988: 354; Williamson 1985: 386). v. 6, notably, Nehemiah is not present, and Artaxerxes is called ‘King... of Babylon’. vv. 8–9, Nehemiah states that he threw out ‘vessels [NRSV: household furniture] of the house of Tobiah’. The possibility of rendering the term ‘vessels’ suggests that Tobiah had religious utensils in the temple. There are suggestions here of Josiah’s (and Hezekiah’s) cleansing of the temple (again implying royal activities for Nehemiah). They ‘cleansed [t-h-r] the chambers’ (for Holiness Code see Lev 15:13, 28; 22:4; 13:6). The implication is to make clean from idolatry (Jer 13:27; Ezek 24:13). v. 14, Nehemiah’s phrase, ‘Remember me, O my God’ is helpfully noted by Eskenazi (1988), who reminds us to contrast this first-person request to be honoured, with the editor's third-person report that God, in fact, honoured Ezra.

v. 16, the Tyrians (Phoenicians), of course, were renowned tradesmen in the ancient Near East. vv. 17–18, regarding the sabbath, economic activity is considered polluting in the ritual sense. There is an interesting interrelationship of ritual profanation and economic social issues, here. We must guard against the stereotype that priestly concerns are often 'empty ritualism' without connection to justice issues. v. 21, Nehemiah's threat is to 'lay hands on' these sellers! (cf. Esth 3:6; 9:2; Add Esth 6:2; 12:2.) v. 22, Levites must purify themselves. Once again, terms of ritual, purity, 'purify' and 'holy' are used in the arena of finance and economics. v. 23, there is considerable discussion about the relation of Josephus, Ant. 11:306–12, to these events. Some have suggested that Josephus is speaking of another event entirely, or at the very least a garbled version of these events. It is now rare for modern commentators to argue that Neh 13 has garbled events of which Josephus has more accurately written.

v. 24, what was the language of Ashdod? Some have suggested that it simply means 'foreign language' and not a specific, known dialect at all, while others argue for an Aramaic or Philistine (or Gk.?) dialect. Blenkinsopp (1988: 363) is surely correct, however, in stating that the real issue is the inability to speak Hebrew, not the specific language they did speak! Political considerations seem predominant in Nehemiah, giving the impression of treacherous power-grabbing in both temple and government through strategic marriages. The example that Nehemiah chooses to illustrate the problems of foreign marriage is an example of political leadership: Solomon. From Nehemiah, much more clearly than from Ezra, we gain the strong impression that the problem of foreign marriages is centrally a political problem, involving the Jewish aristocracy and local governmental leadership. The politics of associating with the descendants of Ammon and Moab is also much more explicitly a reference to local leadership than is the case with Ezra, where the ethnic categories in use seem more pejorative than informative. In the Nehemiah case, the guilty are males who are presumably attempting to 'marry up' to exchange their low status of 'exiles' for participation in aristocratic society. Sociological inferences lead one to conclude that the mixed marriages are built on the presupposition that the exile community was the relatively disadvantaged one of the two (or more) groups involved in the marriages (cf. Smith-Christopher 1994: 243–65). v. 31, the final word regards provisions for the temple's wood-offering (cf. Gen 22; Lev 1; 6:12; Jos 9:21–7; Ezek 39:10). With the final words, 'Remember me!', this additional word about wood supplies must surely qualify as among the least conclusive final sentences of the Bible.

16. Esther

CAROL MEYERS

INTRODUCTION

A. Overview. 1. The Book of Esther, or Scroll of Esther as it is called in Jewish tradition, is part of the third major section, known as the Writings, of the Hebrew Bible (OT). One of the two books in Hebrew Scripture to bear the name of a woman, its title is the name of the book's heroine. The name is not Hebrew, but its origin is uncertain. It may come from Persian stara ('star'), Akkadian īštār (the goddess of love), or even a hypothetical Median word astra ('myrtle'). The last possibility is related to the fact that Esther also has a Hebrew name (see 2:7), Hadassah, which means 'myrtle'.

2. That the leading character has two names is indicative of the cultural situation that determines the setting and the plot of this exciting and fast-moving tale. The book of Esther is concerned with the often precarious situation of any minority people within a dominant majority culture. In this case, the Jews are dispersed within the Persian empire and face almost certain annihilation through the whim of a power-mongering bureaucrat (Haman). Only through the courageous and creative deeds of a Jewish woman, Esther, along with her mentor, Mordecai, do they escape harm and actually improve their status, though still remaining a subject people. The two names and identities of Esther—as both Jew and Persian—represent the political and ethnic problems facing people who live simultaneously in two cultures.

3. The ostensible reason for the inclusion of this book in the canon of the HB is that it purports to provide the historical origins for a festival known as Purim ('Lots'), a popular and raucous Jewish celebration held on the 14th and 15th of Adar

(Mar.–Apr.). Yet the book's historicity, as well as its legitimacy as a part of both the Jewish and Christian canon, have been the subject of serious disagreement since antiquity.

B. Ancient Versions. 1. The ancient concerns about the legitimacy of what appears in the received Hebrew text of Esther gave rise to a series of six midrashic supplements to the book that appear in the Septuagint version of the late second or early first century BCE. Those Greek Additions, lettered A to F, are interspersed throughout the book (see ch. 42, Esther (Greek)). They were placed together at the end of the canonical book, however, in the fourth century CE by Jerome in his revision of the Old Latin translation. English translations today place those Additions in the Apocrypha, although recent Roman Catholic editions integrate them with the Hebrew Esther.

2. The Septuagint text of Esther, with its additions as well as its omission of the many repetitive words and phrases of the MT, is probably the final stage in a complex process of tradition formation in which two component tales (one about Mordecai, another about Esther) were gradually brought together and elaborated in three successive stages of the Hebrew text (the latest being virtually identical with the present MT), and then the Septuagint stage. This last stage is faithful to the content of the Hebrew but less so to the wording (Moore 1971: lxi–lxiv; see also Clines 1984 and Fox 1990). Esther also exists in another ancient Greek version (the Lucianic recension, or A-text). The Vulgate and Syriac translations are both based on the Hebrew and are quite close to it, although Jerome's translation is a little freer than in most other parts of his work. Two Aramaic translations are quite expansive.

C. Provenance and Date. 1. The tale's focus on the Jewish community in Persia, along with its intimate knowledge of Persian customs and its total lack of interest in Judean life and institutions, indicates that Esther was composed in the eastern Diaspora. Jews who lived as a minority near the locus of power in the post-exilic period would have been the natural audience for this tale of Jewish accommodations and accomplishments in a foreign setting.

2. Extensive textual analysis in the last decade has established that the final Hebrew stage of the book would have been formed by the second century BCE. That it lacks any Greek words or evidence of Greek culture pushes it back to the pre-Hellenistic period for most scholars, although that absence is possibly the result of deliberate archaizing (so Berg 1979: 170–1). The earliest date would be that of the only identifiable historical figure in the book, the Persian ruler Ahasuerus, or Xerxes I (486–465 BCE). Some late fifth-century elements are possible, but the story shows some distance from Xerxes and probably did not reach its present form until some time in the fourth century. In vocabulary and syntax, its Hebrew has much in common with that of the Chronicler (c.400 BCE); and its sense of Jews widely and comfortably—though not necessarily securely—settled throughout the empire suits the Persian II period (see Hoglund 1992).

D. Interpretative Problems and Canonicity. 1. Esther is the only book in the Hebrew canon for which no fragments have been discovered at Qumran. Its absence from the corpus of Dead Sea scrolls attests to the difficulty it had in reaching canonical status in early Judaism; and the fact that the Western Fathers merely mention it while the Eastern Church did not accept it as part of the canon until the eighth century CE is indicative of its controversial nature in early Christianity. For both Jews and Christians, the most prominent reason for its disputed status is its lack of explicit religiosity. God is never once mentioned, nor are basic biblical concepts such as covenant, Torah, and temple. Also absent are standard elements of Jewish piety such as dietary laws, sacrifice, and prayer; and virtues such as mercy and forgiveness are not present. The reasons for such omissions are only speculative (see the summary in Moore 1992: 636–7), but the fact that many of these 'missing' elements appear prominently in the Additions to Esther demonstrates clearly how deficient the canonical Esther seemed. Not only are its deficiencies troubling but so also are some of its features, such as the apparent vindictiveness with which the Jews avenge those who would have destroyed them, although that particular aspect may be part of the peripety (unexpected reversal of fortunes) that characterizes the literary structure of the book.

2. Controversy has also surrounded the value of Esther and her deeds as a female role model. Some biblical scholars have downplayed her activities, making Mordecai into the true hero of the tale (see Moore 1971: lii) and questioning Esther's sexual ethics (as Paton 1908: 96). Some radical feminist critics would rather make Vashti the heroine (Gendler 1976); they object to Esther's use of sexuality and food to achieve her ends (as Fuchs 1982). Others writing with a feminist perspective (e.g. LaCocque 1990; White 1989; 1992) are respectful of such tactics of indirection, which serve as models for the powerless, whether individuals or communities, who struggle to establish and maintain a semblance of agency in their lives. For those who view her positively, Esther becomes a sage in her own right: she dominates the action, surpassing Mordecai and subordinating the king to her will (Hallo 1983: 24–5). The characterization of Esther in post-biblical Jewish tradition, such as the Additions (see Day 1995) and rabbinic literature (as Bronner 1994), is another aspect of feminist interest in this biblical book.

E. Genre and Purpose. 1. The blatant historical difficulties, the internal inconsistencies, the pronounced symmetry of themes and events, the plenitude of quoted dialogue, and the gross exaggeration in the reporting of numbers (involving time, money, and people) all point to Esther as a work of fiction, its vivid characters (except for Xerxes) being the product of the author's creative imagination. Recognizing that it is not historical, although it reflects actual conditions and problems of the post-exilic Jewish Diaspora, has allowed scholars to appreciate many of its literary features and to compare its thematic aspects with those of certain other canonical, deuterocanonical, and extracanonical pieces.

2. Esther has long been called a 'Diaspora novella' (Meinholt 1969; 1975–6). Like the Joseph story in Genesis and the book of Daniel, it is a fictional piece of prose writing involving the interaction between foreigners and Hebrews/Jews. In all these works, the Jews have low status, are threatened, and at the end achieve success and a rise in status. The plots of these tales depict only one series of events, all occurring within a limited time period. Esther's similarity to Daniel and to the Joseph tale, especially with many lexical connections to the latter, may be the result of all three of these novellas also being 'royal courtier tales' (see Humphreys 1973). That such tales contain many elements of wisdom literature is also a compelling consideration (Talmon 1963).

3. An important dimension to the wise-courtier aspect of Esther and other biblical pieces is added by noting its folkloristic features (Niditch and Doran 1977). Recognizing the presence of certain elements that are known cross-culturally, outside biblical tradition, broadens the consideration of literary traits and genres to include awareness of the social setting. The type of folk-tale exemplified by Esther involves status difference as a critical element. The interplay and tension between high- and low-status persons and/or groups, with the lower-status character or community prevailing, constitute a kind of resistance literature (Smith 1989: 162–4). The creation of such tales in many cultures uses similar themes and elements because those features, whereby a minority hero/heroine rises above and achieves some sort of victory over the dominant power, allow the oppressed group to maintain identity, self-respect, and hope. Through her cleverness and patience, Esther thwarts a superpower. The official culture's dominance is thereby contested, and traits (wisdom, piety, cleverness) available to even the powerless are shown to have empowering value.

4. In the case of the Book of Esther, as in many other such folk-tales, the outcome does not mean that the dominant power is toppled. Rather, the achievement of the hero/heroine is to establish the integrity of the minority group within the larger culture. That is, Judaism cannot and thus will not overtly oppose its imperial masters; but it can maintain its core identity while subscribing to most of the Persian regulations and structures. More broadly, Jews can be loyal to two masters; they can live successfully in the Diaspora.

F. Outline. 1. As a well-constructed narrative tale, Esther has a clearly demarcated beginning ('exposition', chs. 1–2), middle ('complication', chs. 3–9), and end ('resolution', chs. 9–10), with these three parts each having a number of discrete sections (Clines 1988).

Introducing the Setting (1:1–2:23)

The Vashti Incident (1:1–22)

Esther's Accession to the Throne (2:1–23)

The Plot Unfolds (3:1–8:17)

Struggle between Haman and Mordecai (3:1–4:3)

Esther Becomes Involved (4:5–5:8)

The Mordecai–Haman Problem Escalates (5:9–6:14)

Haman is Overcome and Replaced (7:1–8:17)

COMMENTARY

Exposition (1:1–2:23)

(1:1–22) The Vashti Incident The opening four verses provide the setting for most of the book: the sumptuous court of the Persian ruler Ahasuerus (Xerxes), the only historical figure in the book. The exaggerated vastness of the kingdom ('over one hundred and twenty-seven provinces from India to Ethiopia', v. 1) and of the initial banquet, which lasts for the improbably long period of 180 days, emphasizes imperial power and thus prepares the way for the enormity of the reversal that will take place at the end of the book, when Persian political privilege becomes accessible to a subject people. The Hebrew root m-l-k ('to rule') appears for the first time in the first verse in designating the king's rule; except for the introductory term 'happened', 'ruled' is the first verb in the book and establishes a major theme. The word appears in various noun and verbal forms some 250 times in Esther, thereby emphasizing the royalty of the governing power, a dominant motif in the book (Berg 1979: 59–72).

The initial use of the term 'banquet' also appears at the beginning of the book (vv. 3, 5, 9). That word (mišteh) appears 20 times in Esther but only 24 times in the entire rest of the HB. The importance of official feasts, of which there are eight altogether in Esther (three called by the king, one by Vashti, two by Esther, and two by the Jews), is thus introduced. The symmetry of the book, with feasts at the beginning, middle, and end, is also thereby established. The two feasts called by the king at the outset, with the second one (vv. 5–8) described in exceptionally lavish detail, are mirrored at the end by the two Jewish feasts. In the first instance the imperial power indulged its wealth; and in the second instance, after a series of breathtaking reversals, the Jews in all 127 provinces celebrate their survival.

Another important feature of Esther emerges in the language of the first chapter. The importance of law and the related issue of obedience versus disobedience is obvious from the repeated use of the term dāt (vv. 13, 15, etc.). This Persian word, meaning 'law' or 'decree', appears about 20 times in Esther (elsewhere only twice in the HB). Other words for edicts, orders, customs, commands, and proclamations abound. The frequent use of dāt and other such terms introduces the problem of Jews adhering to an external legal and cultural system while remaining faithful to Jewish tradition. The recurrent vocabulary of governance highlights the continual tension experienced by any subject group, with its own codes of behaviour, struggling to survive in a land not its own, in a culture with codes and procedures at variance with its own.

Although the king's royal power and palace munificence are important introductory themes of the first chapter, the book's plot is initiated by an incident involving the queen, Vashti, who gave her own banquet at the same time as the king's second one. The announcement (v. 9) of the queen's feast, which appears almost as an aside, establishes the legitimacy of official banquets being offered by the queen of the realm and anticipates the meals to be hosted later by Esther at a critical point in the tale. Certainly the fact of Vashti hosting a banquet for women does not seem essential for the incident that next occurs—except that it may indicate that Vashti was too busy to respond to her husband's request that his beautiful queen be paraded before the king, his officials, and all the people in attendance at the king's second banquet. She survives her disobedience by losing only her position (v. 19). The calm assertion of autonomy by Vashti results in royal rage and then a ridiculous royal decree—that all men should be master in their own homes—which adds a comic touch in that it could hardly be enforced, and indicates that men were not actually dominant in their households.

(2:1–23) Esther's Accession to the Throne When Ahasuerus' anger abates, he again takes action, authorizing the search for a new queen. The idea of his ire dissipating occurs once more, using the same verb (š-k-k), in 7:10, when the king is calmed after another royal order is carried out. In both cases his wrath emerges from a spouse problem; in the first case the queen (Vashti) threatens his authority, whereas in the second case, his chief officer threatens the queen (Esther). The king apparently experiences intense anger only in matters of the heart.

In introducing Esther, the narrator informs us of her relationship to Mordecai, her cousin, adoptive father, and mentor. Mordecai's name, which is probably a Hebraized form of a Babylonian name with the theophoric element Marduk, contains an idolatrous element; but he may have had (as did Esther) a true Hebrew name as well (Moore 1971: 19). If his name is suspect, his lineage is not. The genealogical information in vv. 5–6 puts him in the family of Saul, the first Israelite ruler. This brief genealogy accomplishes three things. First, it gives Mordecai a royal identity, fitting his eventual high position in the Persian court (8:2, 8, 10, 15; 9:4). Yet, as a Saulide rather than a Davide, his royal heritage poses no threat to Persian dominance; it is the Davidic line and not the Saulide one that is expected one day to regain power. Second, it sets up the opposition between Mordecai and his nemesis Haman, the king's chief official. Haman is an Agagite (3:1), a descendant of the Amalekite king who opposed King Saul (1 Sam 15:32). Mordecai and Haman thus echo the historic confrontation between Saul and Agag. Third, it gives a sense of Jewish continuity in presenting Mordecai's family as having survived since the days of Saul. Saul the Benjaminite preceded David the Judahite, and his descendant Mordecai now outlasts Davidic rule.

The beautiful Esther is chosen for the king's harem and receives special food and seven serving maids. These two benefits anticipate an important reversal at the turning-point of the story, when Esther and her maids fast for three days (4:15). Obeying Mordecai's charge, though later she will disobey even the king, Esther does not reveal her Jewish identity (vv. 10, 20). It is not that her identity would have disqualified her from the harem; rather it would preclude the plot development that will enable her to act on behalf of her people. The king must not know her national or ethnic origins ('her people or kindred').

Esther's beauty wins the approval of the king, who crowns her queen (v. 17) even though she requests no special attire or adornment (see vv. 13, 15) when she first enters the king's presence. Her role in saving the king's life in this opening section of the book is just as important as is her beauty in sealing her favoured position. Through her informant Mordecai, she learns of a plan to assassinate the king and warns him of it (vv. 21–2). The would-be assassins die on the gallows, and the motif of the hanging of the king's enemies enters the narrative. All the elements necessary for the central problem of the story are now in place, and the plot begins to unfold in ch. 3.

The Plot Unfolds (3:1–8:17)

(3:1–4:3) Struggle between Mordecai and Haman The only major character not yet on the scene appears in the first verse of this section: Haman the Agagite, linked by his genealogy to Israel's archetypal enemy and historical foe of King Saul, from whose father, Kish, was descended Mordecai (see 2:5–6), who will be his opponent and nemesis in this tale. The issue of obedience is immediately raised, this time in relation to Mordecai. Having elevated Haman to a lofty position in the court, the king has ordered everyone to bow down to him. Mordecai refuses to do so (3:2). This act of defiance is not directly explained, but the servants who witness it and who fail to convince Mordecai to honour Haman then inform Haman of Mordecai's Jewish identity. Perhaps it is implied, as Jewish commentaries from the rabbinical period onwards have suggested, that Jews would bow down only to their God (cf. Dan 3). If so, the tension of binational loyalty, i.e. the problem of diaspora Jewry, appears directly in the story, and a religious dimension is indirectly introduced.

Even if Mordecai's Judaism is not the cause of his refusal to do obeisance, it becomes the reason for Haman's response: a monumental overreaction to a snub. His revenge would be the destruction not simply of Mordecai but of his entire people (3:8). The vastness of Haman's plan to relieve his malice towards Mordecai in some ways recapitulates the outrageous scale of Ahasuerus' response to Vashti's snub, whereby he subordinates all women to their husbands. The parallel between Jews and women is clear. They both must be dealt with in their entirety to rectify the impropriety of one of them towards the royal power. Perhaps, too, both women and Jews have greater potential power than their apparently subordinate status would indicate.

Haman then casts a lot, or pûr—an act well-documented as a tool of ancient imperial decision science (see Hallo 1983)—to select the day for this genocide. This procedure is to become the raison d'être for the festival of Purim (9:24–6). That the date selected—the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, Adar (3:7, 13)—involves the number 13 (thought to be unlucky already in biblical antiquity) perhaps prefigures the fateful turn of events when that day finally arrives. Haman's plan is approved, at least in part because he makes a donation to the king's treasury of 10,000 talents of silver, a highly inflated sum indicative of the fictive quality of the tale.

Ahasuerus then acts in equally grandiose fashion, allowing Haman to use his signet ring, the ultimate instrument of authority. Because of this preposterous if temporary transfer of royal power to Haman, the ultimate death of the villain will mean that the subject people will have overcome the 'ruler', who is not the actual ruler; and Ahasuerus, the somewhat bumbling good-hearted monarch, will maintain the respect and loyalty of his subjects. The Jews will reverse their subordinate status by disposing of their oppressor while remaining loyal subjects to the real king.

Now it is time for reactions to the evil decree. First the city of Susa itself is 'thrown into confusion' (3:15; cf. the reversal of this situation in 8:15). Then, upon hearing the news, Mordecai and all the Jews throughout the empire go into mourning by donning 'sackcloth and ashes', by crying out, and by fasting (4:1–3). This last act, fasting, is mentioned twice more, when Esther and her maids fast (4:16), and again in the proclamation of future fasts (9:31). The emphasis on abstention from food as a reflection of and response to the impending death sentence provides a stark contrast to the joyous consumption of food at the various banquets and feasts that punctuate the tale. At the same time, the appearance of fasting may be the one possible example of Jewish religious observance in the entire, rather secular, book of Esther. Fasting together with weeping has good biblical precedent as an individual intercessory attempt to plead with God and thus save a life; the story of David's actions on behalf of his first son by Bathsheba is notable in this regard (2 Sam 12:15–17). Also, as a community-wide response to disaster, the events surrounding the sixth century BCE destruction of Jerusalem and the temple apparently produced several fast days (see Zech 7:4; 8:19).

(4:5–5:9) Esther Becomes Involved The story at last turns towards Esther's response, which will ultimately lead to a reversal. She sends the eunuch Hathach, who is one of her attendants, to Mordecai to find out about Haman's decree. Replying through this messenger, Mordecai charges her to approach Ahasuerus, in order 'to make supplication to him and entreat him for her people' (4:8). Now we hear Esther's voice directly for the first time (4:11–12). This first instance of reported speech for her, followed soon by a second (4:16) as she informs her cousin that no one can approach the king unbidden under threat of death, signals two important shifts. First, Esther has her own voice and is now acting in her own right, no longer under her mentor's direction. Second, her words mark her explicit involvement in her people's dilemma and in the rescue she will orchestrate. Esther's two statements in ch. 4 provide the turning point of the tale; they draw attention to her potential power evident in her astute reading of the palace rules.

In learning of Esther's response, Mordecai presses her further: she will ultimately die anyway, and she must go to the king. Mordecai's words suggest that help may come 'from another quarter'. The Hebrew term here, māgôm ('place'), is sometimes a euphemism for the divine presence; if so, the word provides a hint of religiosity and of the salvific working of divine providence. Similarly, the fact that Esther proclaims a fast for herself bespeaks a supplicatory or prayerful attitude, perhaps an indication of the queen's Jewish piety. In any case, Mordecai's immediate obedience to Esther's command (4:17) is an explicit reversal of her earlier acquiescence to his instructions.

In accordance with the information she sent to Mordecai, Esther takes the courageous step of approaching the king unbidden at the end of the three-day fast. She disobeys royal law in appearing before him, yet her risky behaviour is richly rewarded, for he generously offers to give her whatever she wants, 'even to the half of my kingdom' (5:3). But Esther cleverly asks for nothing more than an opportunity to entertain her husband and his chief officer. They are both pleased at her hospitality; and the king again offers her half the empire. This time she requests only a second banquet, thereby demonstrating to the king that her requests are easy and pleasant to fulfil. Her strategy of making the king eager to agree to whatever she wishes is in place.

(5:9–6:14) The Mordecai–Haman Problem Escalates Happy as Haman was to have been entertained by the queen, he becomes intensely distressed when Mordecai once more refuses to do obeisance. At the bidding of his wife Zeresh, he erects monumental gallows intended for Mordecai; only then can Haman feel relaxed enough to look forward to Esther's second banquet. Meanwhile, to pass the hours of a sleepless night, Ahasuerus makes the unlikely but fortuitous move of having his court annals read aloud, thereby discovering that he had failed to reward Mordecai for passing on the information about the assassination plot. In a marvellously ironic scene (6:4–11), as the tale moves inexorably to its ultimate reversal, Haman appears on the scene and is asked what a king should do to honour someone. With his arrogance and egomania, Haman believes he is the one deserving such honour and constructs a reward—parading the honoured man, on horseback and in royal garb, to the city square—that is then given to Mordecai. Haman must lead the horse and proclaim the king's favour for Mordecai. Understandably devastated, Haman is now the one who exhibits mourning behaviour. Once more his wife takes note, this time with the pessimistic notion that Haman's intent to destroy Mordecai may end up with the opposite result. The reason for this? Mordecai is Jewish (6:13). Zeresh's response conveys a powerful notion underlying the book—that the Jews are ultimately inviolable and will somehow survive.

(7:1–8:17) Haman is Overcome and Replaced At the queen's second banquet, when the king is determined to grant her any request, Esther speaks to Ahasuerus in a way that signals her readiness to take advantage of his goodwill. In 7:3 she addresses him for the first time in the second person, saying 'If I have won your favour', rather than using the third person, 'If I have won the king's favour', as in 5:8. She is now ready to be direct in her petitions as well as in her identity. In 7:4 she paraphrases Haman's edict, written in the name of Ahasuerus, to destroy the Jews (3:13). In so doing she identifies herself for the first time as a member of the people to be killed and then requests that the lives of all this group be spared. Incredibly, the king seems ignorant of the decree. Perhaps, because Esther mentions an alternative scenario—that the order might have been to enslave the Jews rather than annihilate them—he had thought he was authorizing a servitude plan. In any case, when Esther identifies Haman as the perpetrator of the projected genocide, the king stomps out to his garden in a rage but says nothing about reversing Haman's edict.

Left alone with Esther, the terrified Haman falls upon the couch where she is reclining to plead for mercy. At that moment the king returns and sees what appears to him to be a sexual assault on his queen. This at last precipitates the climactic reversal of the tale. But it occurs on a personal level. Even with the knowledge that all the Jews were to be slaughtered, the king does not act until his own wife's sexuality is apparently threatened by Haman, just as his proclamation that all men are to be masters in their homes (1:22) is the result of the defiance of his own wife. Now his orders are first to hang Haman—with delicious irony, on the very gallows intended for Mordecai—rather than to reverse Haman's edict. The immediate threat to his wife having been removed, the king's anger is abated (7:10, as in 2:1 when he dealt with Vashti).

Yet the ultimate reversal has still not been accomplished; Haman has been hanged, but his order to destroy the Jews has not been revoked. The next two acts of the king do nothing to change this situation. He continues to respond on a personal level, awarding Haman's household to Esther and giving Mordecai Haman's signet ring. Mordecai and Esther thus together assume ownership of their enemy's holdings, a development hardly satisfactory to Esther, now openly connected with the Jew Mordecai (8:1). Consequently, Esther abandons all guile and falls to the king's feet in tears. Both Esther and the honoured Mordecai are in the king's presence, but it is Esther who speaks out, reverting to the third person in beseeching Ahasuerus to order Haman's decree invalid and in asking that the calamity awaiting her 'people' and her 'kindred' be averted (8:6). Her use of those two terms, in the reverse order to that of ch. 2, finalizes the reversal. Her previously concealed identity is asserted, changing the situation noted in 2:10, which states that Esther 'did not reveal her people or kindred' when she entered the harem.

Just as Ahasuerus had given Haman the authority to issue an edict in the name of the king, he now provides for a symmetrical ending by giving a parallel right to Esther and Mordecai (8:7–8). In the language of formal royal activity, which reflects that of 3:12 when Haman formulated the terrible decree, the narrator tells us about a new irrevocable edict to be sent out to all the Persian provinces. The multicultural nature of the empire was duly noted in the account of the earlier edict, which was sent to 'all the peoples, to every province in its own script and every people in its own language' (3:12), a situation that accords with documented Persian policy allowing peoples comprising the empire to maintain a significant amount of political and economic autonomy. In the reprise in ch. 8 of the stereotyped language of edict promulgation, however, the Jews are singled out; the new orders are of course sent to all those peoples in their own scripts and languages 'and also to the Jews in their script and their language' (8:9).

The new decree, interestingly enough, does not directly revoke Haman's edict; royal edicts issued with the king's signet could not be overturned (8:8). Instead, it authorizes the Jews to annihilate those who, in trying to carry out the terms of Haman's decree, would attempt to slaughter them. In other words, the peculiarity of Persian law in this tale forces the Jews to survive by engaging in the very kind of deadly physical assault to which they are objecting. The official statement, in which the Jews are instructed to assemble and to kill not only their attackers but also the families of their attackers, is a troubling sanction for Jewish violence. But its context, an edict that must overpower an unremovable earlier one, along with the absurdity of the presumably unarmed and militarily untrained Jews overwhelming the imperial forces charged with their slaughter, should ameliorate the horror of the retributive actions to take place at the appointed time. That moment, of course, is to be the thirteenth day of the twelfth month of Adar (8:12), the very day earlier selected by lot for carrying out Haman's edict (3:7).

Accompanying the new edict is the garbing of Mordecai in stunning royal apparel, with a 'great golden crown' (8:15). The leading Jewish male in the kingdom now joins the leading Jewish female (cf. 2:17) in wearing the kind of royal headgear so coveted by Haman (6:7). This vivid reversal is accompanied by a similar sea-change in the response of the people. The citizens of Susa had been 'thrown into confusion' (3:15) by Haman's decree; in contrast they respond with great joy to Mordecai's edict (8:16). The Jews are similarly ecstatic and initiate festive activities. This whole turn of events, in which certain Jewish annihilation has been replaced with greatly elevated Jewish status along with royal power placed in the hands of a Jewish official, leads to the astonishing statement that many of the peoples in the empire 'professed to be Jews, because the fear of the Jews had fallen upon them' (8:17). Whether or not this is to be taken as a description of the conversion of some groups to Judaism, the statement does convey the fact that people are inexorably drawn to the security of siding with those in power and that concepts of ethnicity are complicated by the dynamics of political privilege.

The Crisis is Resolved (9:1–10:3)

(9:1–19) Events of the Thirteenth of Adar The opening verse of this section is explicit in describing the power reversal that ensues. On the very day that the Jews' enemies were to have vanquished them, the opposite would happen: 'the Jews would gain power over their foes' (9:1). That the fear of the empowered Jews mentioned at the end of ch. 8 and repeated in 9:2 (with an additional statement about Mordecai's high standing in the court) was warranted became clear on the thirteenth of Adar, when the Jews struck down their enemies—75,000 in the provinces (9:16) and 500 in the citadel of Susa (9:6)—defined as all who hated them (9:5). They refrained, however, from plundering. This point must be an important one, because it appears three times (9:10, 15, 16). Perhaps it resumes the parallel setup between Mordecai/Saul and Haman/Agag. When Saul defeated the Agagites, he slaughtered men, women, and children but kept the best sheep and cattle as spoils. He earned divine disapproval for the latter act, with God regretting the choice of Saul as king. The echo in Esther of the 1 Sam 15 narrative clearly stops at the plunder issue. Mordecai and the Jews will refrain from taking booty and, unlike Saul, maintain their favoured status (with God?).

The issue of restraint in the taking of plunder, therefore, is not so much an indication of noble character as it is a narrative intent to complete the Saul/Agag parallel with an improvement over the 1 Samuel episode. Yet the vindictiveness of the Jews again seems problematic in their treatment of the people of Susa. A special additional edict is provided directly by the king at Esther's behest, allowing the Jews to kill their 300 remaining enemies in the city of Susa (as opposed to its citadel, which presumably contained the palace and government complex). They do this on the following day, the fourteenth of Adar. At the same time, also in accord with the additional royal edict Esther requested, they hang the bodies of the ten sons of Haman on the gallows. This final gratuitous act may also be an echo of the Agag narrative, which ends with Agag himself being hacked to pieces, his lineage thus symbolically destroyed (1 Sam 15:33). Putting the bodies of Haman's sons, tantamount to pieces of his body, on the gallows has a similar effect. A literary purpose is achieved at the expense of the humanity of the Jews of Susa.

The fictive nature of the slaughter appears not only in the account of Haman's sons, but also in the specification of the huge numbers of Persians struck down by the Jews. Those incredibly large figures are hyperbole designed to emphasize the reversal of the Jews' expected fate and the fact that they have enormous power despite their second-class status. Similarly, the notion that the Jews had enemies everywhere flies in the face of the details of the story, in which Haman alone is the foe. Assigning large numbers to the people slaughtered by the Jews represents the paranoia of the powerless; everyone of higher status has the potential to do them harm and thus de facto is a foe.

The immediate consequence of the acts of the thirteenth and fourteenth of Adar is celebration. In the villages of the provinces, the Jews rest on the fourteenth day from the exertions of the previous day (9:17, 19), whereas in Susa the Jews do not celebrate until the fifteenth day because they were engaged in overthrowing enemies on the fourteenth as well as the thirteenth days (9:18). Regardless of the date, the day of rest is a day of joy and yet another occasion for feasting. This set of holidays held by Jews constitutes the final reversal of the tale; the pivotal fasts of 4:3 and 16 become feasts, echoing the two royal banquets that initiate the tale. They not only recall earlier banquets held by the king, as well as those of Vashti and Esther, but also introduce a new element. In the celebratory banquet of 9:19 (cf. 9:22), the Jews hold feasts and at the same time send food around to each other, intensifying the notion of well-being for all.

(9:20–32) Purim Becomes a Festival The momentous events of Adar certainly deserve commemoration by future generations. vv. 20–32 provide for just that. Perhaps an addition to the coherent narrative of 1:1 through 9:19, this section recapitulates the core reversals: relief from persecution, turning 'sorrow into gladness' and 'mourning into a holiday' (9:22). The rehearsal of the reason for the celebration takes us back to Haman's casting of lots (pûrîm), thereby providing an etymology for the festive days. The holiday is, of course, to be held for two days, in the light of the fact that the original feasting and rejoicing took place on the fourteenth of Adar in the provinces and a day later in Susa.

A touch of formality is lent to the newly instituted festival by another set of letters, said to be sent to Jews in 'all the provinces' (v. 20; cf. v. 30) and thus using the same language as in the accounts of earlier royal edicts (1:22; 3:12–13; 8:9). Mordecai writes these official letters enjoining Jews to celebrate Purim; and Esther writes them with him (vv. 29, 31), perhaps even writing a second letter (v. 29). Her royal authority in establishing Purim is reaffirmed at the end of this section, where she is the one said to have established the customs of the holiday (v. 32).

(10:1–3) Conclusion If there is reason to consider ch. 9 an addendum meant to institute the festival of Purim, there is good cause to view ch. 10 as another, briefer addition. Ch. 9 ends with the accomplishments of Esther, and ch. 10 is an encomium to Mordecai. But Mordecai's power is here set alongside that of the king. That is, with a Jew as second in command to a Gentile king, the interests of both groups—Persians and Jews—are well served. The ideal diaspora situation is achieved and serves as a model for all diaspora communities.

17. Job

JAMES L. CRENSHAW

INTRODUCTION

A brief narrative informs the reader that the hero is subjected to a divine test as a means of ascertaining whether or not he serves the deity without thinking about profiting from it. A poetic debate between Job and three friends follows, in which they discuss Job's suffering and the broader issue of divine justice. This debate opens with Job's powerful lament; from then on, a friend speaks and Job responds. This happens for three cycles of debate, except that Bildad's last speech is quite brief and Zophar's is missing. Job then remembers his happy past, contrasting it with his miserable present. A poetic interlude asks where wisdom can be found, and Job pronounces an oath of innocence aimed at evoking a divine response. Instead of the anticipated deity, a youthful Elihu appears and criticizes the friends for failing to answer Job effectively and Job for the nature of his complaints. God finally arrives in a tempest, rebukes Job, and praises the wonders of nature, both heavenly and earthly. In the face of such majesty, Job relents—although the text is ambiguous at this point. The book concludes with a short narrative telling about Job's restoration.

A. Composition. 1. The book of Job receives high praise from critics of every persuasion—literary, philosophical, psychological, and religious—despite its flaws. One interpreter uses the phrase 'a blemished perfection' (Hoffman 1996), comparing the book to Venus de Milo and August Rodin's Torso of a Woman. Another appreciative reader observes that 'Here, in our view, is the most sublime monument in literature, not only of written language, nor of philosophy and poetry, but the most sublime monument of the human soul. Here is the great eternal drama with three actors who embody everything: but what actors! God, humankind, and Destiny' (Alphonse de Lamartine, cited in Hausen 1972: 145).

2. Such accolades persist partly because of the book's ambiguity, its capacity for ironic readings. A book at odds with itself, the combination of prose and poetry leaves numerous unanswered questions. The story depicts a blameless Job who patiently accepts grievous loss, persists in his integrity by worshipping the one who gives and takes away, and in the end receives everything back—with new children. The poetic debate presents an entirely different hero, one who lacks patience and openly attacks the deity for injustice. This section of the book rejects the hypothesis of a universe operating on a principle of reward and punishment, whereas the prose implies that YHWH does act towards the friends and Job on the basis of merit. Moreover, the names for deity differ in the prose, which uses YHWH, and the poetic debate, where the more general names El, Eloah, and El Shaddai occur, with a single exception, itself a stereotypical expression ('hand of YHWH', 12:9).

3. Other indications of disjointedness give the impression of imperfection. An Adversary (haśśāṭān) is featured in the prologue as the heavenly accuser of Job, but the epilogue proceeds without mentioning this character. YHWH's praise of Job for speaking truthfully about the deity suggests that the author of the epilogue had no inkling as to the nature of Job's speeches in the poetry. The youthful Elihu, whose expansive speeches delay the expected appearance of YHWH interminably, is ignored both by YHWH and by the author of the epilogue. This angry young man alone addresses Job by name, frequently quoting his earlier speeches. At the same time, Elihu anticipates major themes in the divine speeches, in a sense stealing divine thunder.

4. A poem (ch. 28) also offers a premature answer to the question it poses: 'Where can wisdom be found?' Having celebrated human achievement in prospecting for and mining precious gems, the poem denies access to wisdom, with the sole exception of God. Strangely, it concludes on a traditional note: God grants wisdom to faithful worshippers. In addition, this poem interrupts Job's final speech, necessitating a repetition of the formula in 27:1 ('Job again took up his discourse and said') in 29:1.

5. This introductory formula differs from the usual one ('Then Job answered'), suggesting that its initial occurrence in 27:1 resulted from textual dislocation, some of Bildad's final speech being attributed to Job and all of Zophar's speech dropping out. It has been suggested that the author used this subtle means of announcing that Job's friends have run out of anything to say; but Elihu's failure to discern the point makes this view unlikely. Job's unexpected comments in ch. 27 could be explained as sarcasm or irony; textual dislocation is more probable.

6. Even divine speeches indicate disjointedness. First, there are two divine speeches and two 'repentances' on Job's part, giving the appearance of browbeating. Second, the references to the ostrich and mighty war-horse differ markedly from the previous celebrations of wild creatures. According to 40:5, Job vows to remain silent from this point, but 42:1–6 disregards this promise and has him speak once more.

7. Various theories have been advanced to explain these phenomena, but no consensus exists. The assumption underlying this commentary is that a poet used an existing popular story as the framework for exploring the possibility of disinterested righteousness and the different answers to the problem of innocent suffering. Removing an original section of the story that can only be implied now, that daring poet wrote three cycles of debate, the last of which became dislocated, and concluded them with Job's address to God (chs. 29–31) and YHWH's response (chs. 38–41). At a later time, someone added the poem in ch. 28 and the speeches of Elihu, along with the prose introduction to them (chs. 32–7). Alternative readings cannot be ruled out: ch. 28 retards the action and assuages human emotions; Elihu serves as an ironic foil to the deity, and his citations constitute literary foreshadowing and anticipation; stylistic variety is a mark of literary craft; the book abounds in irony; Job's first repentance was incomplete, requiring further rebuke by God; the breakdown of the friends' speeches declares Job the victor; Job's restoration was an act of grace entirely unrelated to his repentance.

B. Structure. 1. The structure of the book depends on the perspective from which it is viewed, whether on the basis of diction, or dramatic movement, or individual components in sequence. By eliminating brief prosaic introductions and observations, the first approach yields two distinct sections, a narrative and a poetic debate. Stressing the prose introductions, and in some instances conclusions, leads to three divisions within the book (1:1–2:10; 2:11–3:40; 3:1–42:17). Attention to content alone suggests a quite different arrangement (1–2; 3–31; 32–7; 38:1–42:6; and 42:7–17).

2. A striking feature of the book is the use of a framing story to enclose the poetic debate. Widely employed in the ancient Near East, this practice enabled authors to provide essential data for understanding philosophical reflections and for appreciating proverbial sayings. Just as a simple frame enhances a work of art, these brief narratives focus attention away from themselves and offer a perspective from which to view the poetic debate. Twice the narrator passes independent judgement on the hero (1:22; 2:10), one confirmed by YHWH and Job's wife, then withdraws to allow other voices to be heard in the poetry. A story begins, only to be interrupted by poetry that fashions a story within a story, and then resumes so as to bring closure. The prologue evokes dialogue, and the epilogue terminates it, at the same time suppressing the voice within the poetry that rejects the kind of optimism represented by Job's friends and by Proverbs. A story that opens in heaven concludes on earth, where the principle of do ut des ('I give in order to receive') is still alive and well. Viewpoints collide everywhere, and the one source of a definitive answer dodges the issue entirely, as YHWH drones on about meteorological phenomena and wild creatures, especially the two favourites, Behemoth and Leviathan.

3. The dramatic development suggested by the three prose introductions in 1:1–5, 2:11–13, and 32:1–5 points to distinct episodes of conflict: YHWH afflicts Job, Job challenges God, YHWH rebukes Job. Alternatively, one may speak of hidden conflict, conflict explored, and conflict resolved (Habel 1985). In this view, the fundamental category of the book is prose, with poetry serving to retard the movement of the plot and heightening the emotions. This understanding of the book encounters considerable difficulty: the narrator's comments mark two closures in the prologue (1:22 and 2:10); the third section has two 'endings'; Elihu's speeches do not resolve the conflict between Job and God; and that resolution occurs in the poetic section.

1. The obvious structure of the book consists of (1) a story about Job's affliction, (2) a debate between him and three friends, (3) the speeches of Elihu, (4) divine speeches leading to Job's submissions, and (5) a story about Job's restoration. Rather than viewing the poetry as a retardation of the plot, one may see it as a way of introducing multiple responses to the problem of evil. Progress does occur, however, with Job gradually moving away from welcoming death and closer towards imagining a judicial resolution, one made possible by a third power, variously understood as umpire, arbitrator, or redeemer.

C. Historical Setting. 1. A second-century BCE Targum on the book of Job discovered at Qumran and the translation into Greek in the Septuagint require an earlier date for the biblical text than the third century. Linguistic evidence seems to point to the sixth century or later (Hurvitz 1974), and certain other features also indicate the Persian period (539–332), for example the language for administrative bureaucracy (3:14–15, kings, counsellors, and princes), the probable allusion to the Behistun Rock, with lead inlay depicting the achievements of Darius the Great (19:24), the reference to caravans from Teman and Sheba (6:19), and the form of the title for the Adversary (the definite article with śāṭān as in the sixth-century text of Zechariah and unlike the later form in Chronicles).

2. Several other factors may not settle the debate, but they fit into this general period: the numerous Aramaisms, the similarity with laments in the Psalter, as well as sections of Deutero-Isaiah and Jeremiah, the theological similarities with Ps 73, and the emerging monotheism and monogamy. Less convincing are the sociological conclusions of Crüsemann (1980) and Albertz (1981) that the oppressive conditions reflected in the book of Job point to the time of Nehemiah. Such abuse of power by the nouveaux riches may have occurred at various periods in ancient Israel and Judah.

D. Ancient Near-Eastern Parallels. 1. The closest extant parallels to the book of Job come from Mesopotamia. The Sumerian Man and his God (2nd millennium) tells about a sufferer who complains to the gods, although conceding that none is born sinless. In the end he confesses his guilt and is restored by the righteous shepherd. The Babylonian I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom denies that anyone can discern the will of the gods; nevertheless, this sufferer trusts in divine mercy, acts in the proper cultic manner, and experiences restoration. This text concludes that the gods have a different system of values from the human one. The Babylonian Theodicy (c.1100 BCE), an acrostic, or alphabetic, poem of twenty-seven stanzas with eleven lines each, comprises a debate between an innocent sufferer and a friend. It accuses the gods of endowing humankind with lies. The two debaters maintain a polite tone, while disagreeing with one another, and in the end the complainant prays that the shepherd will once again 'pasture his flock as a god should'. A fourth text, The Dialogue between a Master and his Slave, resembles Ecclesiastes more than the book of Job, although both texts reflect similar social turmoil that generated acute personal misery. The master sees no reason to follow any particular course of action, and the slave commends first one thing then its opposite, until the thought of suicide surfaces, followed by the threat of murdering the slave, who seems to say that the master will not survive him three days.

2. Texts from the Egyptian Twelfth Dynasty (1990–1785) with a similar theme demonstrate the extent of intellectual unease resulting from suffering that was perceived to be unjust. The Admonitions of Ipuwer conjectures that the divine herdsman either loves death or has fallen asleep. Social turmoil forces the author to reflect on the appropriateness of traditional teachings, for how can the gods possess authority, knowledge, and truth when they permit such chaos in society? The Dispute of a Man and his Ba consists of an attempt by a person, overwhelmed by life's misery, to persuade his soul to join him in suicide. The Eloquent Peasant depicts the suffering inflicted on a peasant by a governmental figure. These latter two texts abound in positive similes for death, e.g. death is like recovering from illness, like the fragrance of myrrh, like an infant's mouth reaching for milk.

3. A text from Ugarit, the Epic of Keret, tells about a hero who loses his wife and children but eventually finds favour with the gods and receives a new wife and more children. The Greek myth of 'Prometheus Bound' has been compared with Job, but Prometheus, a Titan, brought down Zeus's wrath through a wilful act. An Indian tale of a divine discussion leading to a test of the hero, Harischandra, by the god Shiva that demonstrates his virtue shows how the problem of evil pressed itself on thinkers far and near.

4. None of these texts provides an exact parallel to the book of Job, which adapts the traditional genre of debate and framing narrative from the Babylonian Theodicy and I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom respectively, adding more friends and enhancing the theophany by incorporating it into the debate. In addition, the biblical author uses extensive catalogues, or lists, hymnic texts, a negative confession, and laments. In the end, the book of Job stands alone, like the hero of the book.

E. Canon and Text. 1. At least one Christian theologian, Theodore of Mopsuestia, questioned the authority of the book of Job, and Job's historicity was called into question in a rabbinic tractate (B. Bat. 15a). The exact position of the book of Job in the canon was a matter of dispute. Jewish tradition designates the two different views by acrostic abbreviations, 'mt (truth) for Job ('iyyôb), Proverbs (mišlê) and Psalms (tēhillîm) and 't'm (twin) for the sequence Psalms, Job, and Proverbs.

2. The Greek text of the book of Job, much shorter than the Hebrew, often amounts to a paraphrase. It shows definite theological bias at a few places, e.g. the repointing of a negative particle in 13:15 to affirm trust in God when confronted with the prospect of death at the hand of the deity (Pope 1973: 95–6). The Targum of Job from Qumran has the same disorder in chs. 24–7 as that in the MT. Surprisingly, the Targum seems to conclude the book at 42:11 instead of 42:17.

F. History of Interpretation. 1. The Testament of Job (1st cent. BCE?) is characterized by zeal against idols, extensive speculation about Satan, cosmological dualism, interest in women, burial customs, magic, mysticism, angelic glossolalia, and patience. The author diverges from the biblical story in a number of ways: (1) Job destroys Satan's idol and incurs his wrath, but when Satan disguises himself to trick Job, an angel reveals his identity; (2) Job's possessions and virtuous deeds are magnified in haggadic fashion (i.e. with sermonistic or pious exposition); (3) Job's wife, Sitis, demonstrates her loyalty by begging for bread and selling her hair to obtain food; (4) Satan concedes defeat in the conflict with Job; (5) Bildad poses 'difficult questions' and Zophar offers royal physicians to Job, who relies on the one who made physicians; (6) Sitis expresses concern for her children who have not received proper burial, and Job tells her that God took them; (7) God condemns the friends for not speaking the truth 'about Job'; (8) Job's daughters inherit magical items and a gift of glossolalia; and (9) Job is transported into heaven by means of chariots.

2. The author of the Epistle of James emphasizes Job's patience, but 'Abot de Rabbi Nathan accuses Job of sinning in his heart and Rashi faulted Job for excessive talking. According to Glatzer (1969), later Jewish interpreters called Job a rebel (Ibn Ezra, Nachmanides), a dualist (Sforno), a pious man searching for truth (Saadia Gaon), one who lacked love (Maimonides), an Aristotelian denier of providence (Gersonides), one who confused God's work with Satan's (Simeon ben Semah Duran), a determinist (Joseph Albo), one who failed to pacify Satan, a scapegoat, an isolationist (the Zohar), one who suffered as a sign of divine love (the Zohar, Moses ben Hayyim). A Jewish legend states that God turned Job over to Satan, called Samael, to keep him occupied while the Jews escaped from Egypt; then God rescued Job from the enemy at the last moment.

3. The early church emphasized Job's suffering as a moral lesson and included readings from the book of Job in the liturgy of the dead. Gregory the Great wrote thirty-five books of sermons on Job, and Augustine read the book as an example of grace. Thomas Aquinas used the book as a starting-point for discussing the metaphysical problem of divine providence (Damico and Yaffe 1989). Calvin wrote 159 sermons on the book of Job, mostly polemical defences of providence (Dekker 1952). In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the emphasis fell on Job as a rebel. Voltaire viewed Job as a representative of the human condition (Hausen 1972).

4. Modern critics also tend to view the book in the light of prevailing intellectual or religious sentiment. Carl Jung (1954) used psychology as the key to interpreting the book. In his view, the marriage of the powerful but unreflective deity to hokmâ (wisdom) resulted in the cross, an attempt to provide a more reasoned response to the problem of evil. Jack Kahn (1975) draws on psychiatry to trace the process of grief through which Job passed. Goethe's Faust and Archibald MacLeish's J. B. (1956) approach the problem of evil from a literary perspective, whereas Girard (1987) stresses the universal desire to establish order through identifying and murdering a scapegoat, and Gutiérrez (1987) identifies the problem as that of speaking properly about God in the midst of poverty.

5. A philosopher emphasizes Job's bitterness of spirit (Wilcox 1989); artists depict Job's suffering in the light of Greek mythology (William Blake) and the holocaust (Fronius 1980); and a Yiddish interpreter uses Goethe's Faust as a lens through which to view Job positively (Zhitlowsky 1919). A contemporary novelist and survivor of the Nazi concentration camps likens the Jewish fate under Hitler to Job's affliction (Elie Wiesel) but is opposed by a humanist who contrasts Job's survival with the victims of Auschwitz and Dachau (Rubenstein). Existentialists use Job as an example of the human situation (Camus, Kafka), and a Marxist philosopher sees him as an exemplary rebel against theism and the abuse of power by religious establishments (Ernst Bloch).

6. Within the circles of biblical scholarship, interpreters provide various literary readings of the book: a feminist, a vegetarian, a materialist, a NT ideological critique (Clines 1989). An older reading of the book as drama has been revived (Alonso-Schökel 1977), together with a shift to viewing it as comedy. The modern silencing of ancient dissent in the Roman Catholic liturgy (Rouillard 1983)—in which only affirmative passages are read publicly—and interpretation (Tilley 1989) has evoked dismay. A contemporary poet has provided a fresh translation, removing its sting by omitting crucial verses (Mitchell 1987). In short, interpreters of the book of Job have used it as a convenient means of putting forth their own understandings of reality.

COMMENTARY

The Prologue (1:1–2:13)

In five scenes of elevated prose (1:1–5; 1:6–12; 1:13–22; 2:1–6; 2:7–13 (3:1)) the narrative introduces the main characters in dramatic conflict and the theological issue that will be explored. Part of the problem is the heavenly backdrop of two scenes, for this information is hidden from the hero and his detractors. The Adversary poses the issue in a terse question: Does Job serve God (‘ēlōhīm) for nothing? Its staccato rhythm expresses impudence, as does the laconic answer in 2:2 (Gordis 1978: 15). A series of calamities puts Job to the test, and he emerges as a faithful servant despite excruciating circumstances. The arrival of Job's three friends advances the conflict to a different level, one occasioned by poetic debate.

(1:1–5) The five scenes alternate between earth and heaven. The story opens with a description of an exceptional man, Job, who had a full quota of children (seven sons, three daughters; both 7 and 3 are complete numbers) and possessions (7,000 sheep, 3,000 camels, 500 each of oxen and she-asses; 7 and 3 again, equalling 10; 5 and 5 equals ten, a complete number). The description moves outward, from the most intimate to the most distant (Newsom, 1996: 349). v. 1, the reversal of normal order for the verb calls attention to the predicate, Job. A complete (tām has this meaning rather than ‘perfection’) man of integrity, he was also morally straight, religious, and ethical. A non-Israelite, his home was Transjordanian Uz, a name probably chosen as an audial pun on the sages’ word for counsel, ‘ēṣā (Weiss 1983: 23). v. 3, none surpassed him in the East, just as no king rivalled Solomon in wisdom, according to 1 Kings 4:30 [MT 5:10]. v. 4, ‘in turn’ (lit. each on his day) probably refers to the several birthdays of the sons, not to constant rounds of feasting. The brothers’ inclusion of their sisters in these festivities is extraordinary for the ancient culture; their unusual generosity is matched by their father in the epilogue (42:15). v. 5, the narrator views Job's offering of sacrifices as another positive attribute. Job worries that the children may have missed the mark and blessed Elohīm without recognizing their guilt. Alternatively, the verb br-k is used euphemistically, in place of g-l-l, hence ‘cursed’. Ironically, Job's goodness brings about his terrible misfortune, including the death of his children.

(1:6–12) The idyllic setting, except for Job's unease about his children, shifts, both in location and tenor. An Adversary (haśśāṭān, a title rather than a proper name) joins the assemblage of divine beings and responds to the deity by means of a pun on his name (śūl, to wander). This heavenly Adversary is a counterpart to Job, suspecting everyone just as Job suspected his sons (Weiss 1983: 40). In a rhetorical question indicating ongoing rivalry, YHWH brings up Job's name and vouches for his integrity, using the same language as v. 1, but the cynical Adversary accuses Job of serving God because it pays well to do so. To determine who has correctly seen into Job's heart, the Adversary proposes to put him to a test by removing all indications of divine favour, here understood as possessions (including children). YHWH agrees to the test, turning Job's possessions over to the Adversary, with a single restriction, that he not harm Job's person.

(1:13–22) The third scene begins on a happy note but quickly descends to the depths of human suffering. Successive messengers inform Job and the reader simultaneously of four calamities, two of heavenly origin and two inflicted by human foes (note the symbolism, four for completion, heaven and earth for the entirety of space). Repetition gives the awful news a stupefying effect. One by one the lone survivors tell Job of his losses: marauding Sabeans killed his oxen and donkeys, a heavenly fire consumed his sheep, Chaldeans stole his camels, and a mighty wind demolished the house in which his children were feasting, killing all of them. These messengers mirror the heavenly ones reporting to YHWH; only the fourth interjects a sign of emotional distress (hinnēh). The Sabeans were probably northern Arabians rather than people from the south or Africa. Chaldeans were semi-nomads, not the later Neo-Babylonians of the seventh and sixth centuries BCE, who conquered Judah in 587 BCE and took many citizens of Judah into exile. As this tale of woe unfolds, ‘Satan lurks, waiting for the blasphemy’ (Dhorme 1967: p. xxx).

Job responds to this litany of destruction in the manner of a faithful servant; he mourns according to custom and quotes a proverb, adding his resolve to bless YHWH. Job does not say he will return to his mother's womb—not even mother earth. The Hebrew word sāmmā is a euphemism for Sheol, the land of the dead (cf. Eccl 5:15; Sir 40:1). The proverb uses synonymous and antithetic parallelism (naked/came from || naked/return to), while Job's addition limits itself to antithetic parallelism (gave || took away). v. 22, the narrator intrudes long enough to pronounce judgement on Job, whom he declares blameless.

(2:1–6) The fourth scene opens like the second, as if nothing has intervened, although YHWH concludes with an indictment of the Adversary. The word hinnām (tr. ‘for no reason’) repeats the word that the Adversary singled out as Job's flaw ‘Does Job serve God for nothing [for no reason]?’ v. 4, ‘Skin for skin’ implies a culture characterized by barter rather than monetary exchange, but its meaning is unclear. It may suggest equal value, or the expression may refer to exchanging one kind of skin for another kind. Job's possessions accord with the (pre-)patriarchal setting, but his sons dwelt in houses, not tents. The Adversary incites YHWH to intensify the test by striking at Job's health. When referring to the deity, the stretched-out hand signifies misfortune. This time, too, YHWH limits the Adversary: Job's survival was essential to the story's dramatic unfolding.

(2:7–13) Smitten with a disease of the skin that cannot be identified on the basis of the poetic allusions in the dialogue, Job scrapes himself with a piece of broken pottery, either to ease the itching or as a sign of self-mortification. In his isolation, Job's wife repeats YHWH's affirmation of her husband but turns it into a question: ‘Do you still persist in your integrity?’ What she urges him to do is unclear. The verb bārak may be undecipherable (Linafelt 1996). In favour of translating it 'curse' is Job's harsh reply. He likens her to foolish or vulgar women. The LXX attributes a longer speech to Job's wife, and the Testament of Job presents her in a much more favourable light, giving her an actual name, Sitis (the Targum at 2:9 calls Job's wife Dinah). Job reminds his wife that we receive both good and evil from God. He implies that if people receive good they cannot reject the bad. The narrator enters the story for a second time, changing the language ever so slightly. Later Jewish interpreters seized this opening to accuse Job of sinning in his heart while outwardly uttering devout sentiments. The visit by Job's three friends (kings in the LXX) from Edom and Arabia provides a transition from prose to poetry, one appropriately characterized by profound silence. Their stated purpose in coming was pastoral—to bring consolation—and their long silence (only here does the phrase 'seven nights' occur) as they sat with him on the ash heap confirms that positive intention. Their act of throwing dust heavenward may have been apotropaic, to frighten away evil powers. The name Eliphaz occurs in Gen 36:15; the names Bildad and Zophar are not found elsewhere in the Bible. Teman was in Edom; the location of Shuah and Naamah is uncertain. The final scene of this popular narrative appears in 42:7–17, which tells about Job's restoration.

The Poetic Debate (3:1–42:6)

The familiar folk-tale about a virtuous man who loses everything for no apparent reason (cf. Ezek 14:14, 20 where Job is mentioned along with Noah and Dan'el (of Ugaritic legend)) occasions a debate about the relationship between goodness and suffering. A poem about wisdom follows; then Job contrasts his glorious past with his ignoble present and utters an oath of innocence aimed at forcing God to respond (chs. 28–31). Instead, Elihu answers (chs. 32–7) but evokes silence until YHWH speaks from the whirlwind (38:1–42:6), reducing Job to two brief responses (40:3–5; 42:1–6). The poetry is some of the most difficult in the Bible, due partly to the number of rare words but also to the distinctive syntax and grammar. Multiple readings are inherently necessary, both because of the rhetorical strategy and the poetic language. Perhaps also the emotional intensity contributes to unintelligibility at crucial points (e.g. 19:25–7; 42:5–6).

(3:1–26) Job Curses his Birthday A lament is Job's way of opening the debate; instead of cursing God he pronounces a curse on the day of his birth and the night of his conception (the beginning and end of gestation), as if wishing it to be obliterated from the calendar. The verb for curse (g-l-l) differs from that of the prologue, where b-r-k occurs. In 3:3–10 the curse encompasses the whole creation, seeking to reverse the favourable conditions set into place by God in Gen 1:1–2:4a. A similar anticosmic description occurs in Jer 4:23–6, where the prophet seems to behold a reversal of conditions that rendered life on earth possible, and a curse of one's birthday can be found in Jer 14:14–18 (with an allusion to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah). The reference to an infant as a geber (elsewhere used of much older boys, even a soldier) contains a pun on the word for grave, geber. Poetic parallelism between Leviathan and Yam (the Sea) favours this reading over 'day'; in an unpointed text the Hebrew words for 'day' and 'sea' are identical. The poet echoes the myth of a chaos-dragon in the ancient Near East (Tiamat in Mesopotamia, Lotan and Yam in Ugarit), one that was also at home in several biblical texts, where various names for the monster occur (Rahab, Leviathan, Tannin, cf. Isa 27:1; 51:9; Ps 74:14). Professional cursers recall Balaam (Num 22–4; a non-biblical text from Deir Alla mentions this prophet whose reputation became tarnished in biblical memory). In 3:12 Job alludes to a ritual by which a parent acknowledged a newborn by holding it on the knees (cf. Sir 15:2). The threefold use of šām ('there') in 3:17–19 recalls the euphemism for Sheol in 1:21. The image of grave-robbers informs 3:20–2, where Job ironically compares their excitement in digging for treasure, buried along with the dead, with his own fantasy of death. The word for 'fenced in' (3:23) differs from that in 1:10 (sūk and šūk respectively). Tenses in Hebrew are notoriously difficult, making it impossible to know whether or not Job's fear expressed in 3:24 was habitual; if the verbs designate the past, they undercut Job's extraordinary piety (Good 1990: 208). Three parallel expressions (no ease, quiet, rest) contrast grammatically with the fourth (dread) and the verb 'come' links this verse with the previous one. By this means the poet indicates that Job's character is more complex than the posture acknowledges.

Job's lament combines a number of grotesque images: a perpetually pregnant woman, Job's mother; a day robbed of its essence, light; two personified lovers, night and dawn, awaiting one another and condemned to an absence of sexual ecstasy; former enemies, oppressors and the oppressed, at rest together; and an instance of divine mockery, the giving of light to the blind. YHWH's speeches from the tempest will return to this notion of divine largesse; there, too, the gift does not benefit the human population.

(4:1–5:27) Eliphaz Introduces the Parameters of the Debate The only one of Job's three friends whose character is rounded, or fleshed out, Eliphaz sets forth the different arguments that will be explored in the course of the debate: you can trust in God to restore you (here Eliphaz uses two words that earlier characterized Job, 'blameless' and a 'God-fearer', 1:1, 8; 2:3); wickedness is punished; human beings are naturally culpable; the prosperity of the sinful will be cut short; the best course is to seek God; suffering is an indication of divine discipline; you will attain a ripe old age. Beginning on a positive note (unless 4:10 cruelly refers to the death of Job's children through the metaphor of a lion), Eliphaz mildly rebukes Job for impatience when personally victimized. The charge of duplicity weakens his positive affirmation of his friend, one who strengthened others in misery. The rich vocabulary permits the poet to use five different words for lion in 4:10–11 (cf. Joel 1:4 for similar richness). Convinced that a principle of reward and punishment governed the universe, Eliphaz is oblivious to the pain resulting from this dogma (4:7–9, where a divine wind brings destruction like the tempest that killed Job's children). According to Gen 2:7 the breath of YHWH animated the first human; now that wind wields devastation.

(4:12–5:8) The closest thing in wisdom literature to the mantic wisdom of the book of Daniel, a type of wisdom widespread in Mesopotamia, this section resembles a theophany, particularly the divine manifestation to Elijah in the cave at Mt.

Horeb (1 Kings 19:11–18) and to Abraham in Gen 15:12–17. Like Abraham, Eliphaz receives the divine visitation while in a deep sleep (tardēmā). An elusive word steals past, quiet like a whisper; the prophet Elijah experienced YHWH's word as a faint echo, in contrast to the spectacular phenomena of wind, fire, and earthquake preceding it. Whereas Job felt dread as a result of the calamities that befell him, a sleeping Eliphaz encountered it when a wind (rūah) glided past his face. It is not stated whether or not Abram saw the smoking fire-pot and flaming torch that passed through the severed pieces and secured the covenant with a powerful promise, but Eliphaz is said to have been unable to make out the exact appearance of the deity. He does grasp the brief word that follows an eerie silence: 'Can a mortal be more righteous than God (Eloah)?' This reading takes into consideration the broader context where the issue becomes that of Job's claim to be pure at the same time as he indicts God for crimes against humanity. Those translators who read 'Can a mortal be righteous before God?' emphasize the immediate context, which stresses human vulnerability, as well as angelic fallibility. The irony of this reference to God's lack of trust in his servants is missed by Eliphaz, who does not know about the Adversary. Does Eliphaz also miss the irony of his own counsel? If humans really die without ever attaining wisdom, what does he dispense? Folly? Eliphaz appeals to consensus (4:7), expecting Job to concur in the common dogma of retribution; he also appeals to individual experience (4:8, 'As I have seen'), to special revelation (4:12–21), to collective experience (5:27a, 'See, we have searched this out; it is true'), and to the obvious insights encapsulated in proverbial sayings (4:8, 'those who plough iniquity and sow trouble reap the same'; 5:2, 'Surely vexation kills the fool, and jealousy slays the simple'). In 5:3–5 Eliphaz's remarks border on cruelty, for Job had 'taken root' only to have his dwelling cursed and to discover that his children lacked safety. Does his precipitous fall mark Job as a fool like those scorned by Eliphaz? It appears that Eliphaz considers finitude a breeding-ground for trouble (5:7, where the Heb. words tr. 'sparks' are literally 'sons of Resheph'; in Canaanite mythology Resheph was the god of plague and pestilence). There may be a clever pun between the Hebrew words for ground ('ādāmā) and mortal ('ādām) in 5:6–7 as in Gen 3:17. A striking feature of 5:8 is the initial aleph (the first letter of the Heb. alphabet) in eight of the nine words; the last word breaks the pattern. In this verse, too, the reader encounters two general words for deity, 'ēl and 'ēlōhīm.

(5:9–13) Participles set this brief unit apart as a doxology, a hymn extolling God whom Job is urged to seek. The language is traditional. Beginning with a reference to innumerable wonders, the hymn then highlights an important specific action, the sending of rain, an oft-mentioned vital necessity in the ancient Near East. It moves on to consider the activity of God in exalting the lowly and bringing down wicked schemers. v. 13, this is the only passage from Job that is cited in the NT (cf. 1 Cor 3:19).

(5:14–27) v. 17, two names for deity occur here, 'ēlōah (Eloah) and šadday (Shaddai). The meaning of the latter is often taken to be related to the Akkadian word for 'mountain' or to mean 'destroyer'. The ideas expressed in vv. 17–18, that God disciplines the ones he loves, are widespread in the Bible (cf. Deut 32:39; Ps 94:12; 107:42; Prov 3:11; Hos 6:1). A significant metaphor for YHWH in the story of the Exodus, the healer (Ex 15:26), informs Eliphaz's advice in v. 18. Here, as in Exodus, this metaphor vies with its opposite, that of the warrior (Ex 15:3). Eliphaz understands both wounds and healing as acts of the one deity. Both parental discipline and teachers' punishment of students in Egypt and in Mesopotamia included corporal punishment. Its purpose was to instill reliable teaching in the minds of youth and thus to form character. This motive behind harsh discipline explains Eliphaz's 'macarism' (an expression, frequent in Psalms, that begins with 'Happy', Heb. 'āšrē), 'Happy is the one whom God [Eloah] reproves'. v. 19, numerical parallelism, rarely found in Mesopotamian and Egyptian literature, occurs more often in the Bible and in Ugaritic texts. Biblical usage varies, at some times referring to a total number symbolizing fullness (as in the Epic of Keret from Ugarit) but at other times actually specifying the higher number of items, with emphasis on the final number. The former occurs in Am 1:3–2:16 ('For three . . . indeed for four . . .') and the latter is exemplified by numerous proverbial sayings (Prov 6:16–19; 30:15–16, 18–19, 21–31). Eliphaz uses the numerical saying for fullness: 'he will deliver you from every trouble'. v. 22, the allusion to destruction may conceal a play on the divine name Shaddai. v. 23, elsewhere the Bible does not mention a covenant with stones, but Isa 11:6–9 gives poetic form to the anticipated peaceful relationship between animals and humans. v. 25, the usual biblical similes for Israel's countless progeny, 'like the stars' or 'like the sands of the sea shore' (cf. Gen 15:5), give way here to an appropriate image for a desert nomad: 'like the grass of the earth'. v. 26, Job does not share this comforting view of death, for in his miserable state he cannot imagine that he will reach old age. Eliphaz's prediction is precisely what happens in the epilogue. How differently the author of Ecclesiastes viewed old age and death (cf. Eccl 11:7–12:7).

(6:1–7:21) Job's Response to Eliphaz Employs both Sarcasm and Parody The participants in this debate seldom respond to the issues raised by the previous speaker, making it difficult to track the development of ideas. Job excuses his bold language by appealing to the deep agony enveloping him at the moment. He thinks it would outweigh the heaviest thing he can imagine: the sand of the sea. The image is striking; psychological and physical suffering in one side of the balance, all the sand of the sea in the other half of the scale. v. 4, no evidence of poison arrows has survived in the ancient Near East, although the dipping of arrowheads in poison was known to Virgil (Aeneid, 9.773) and Ovid (Epist. ex Ponto, 1.2.17–18). The expression may be Job's rhetorical manner of emphasizing the devastating effect of the divine arsenal. Job uses familiar imagery of a divine warrior; ancient peoples, biblical and non-biblical, understood their deities as accomplished fighters. The epithet, YHWH of hosts, probably alludes to heavenly hosts who did battle at YHWH's behest, later coming to mean also Israelite soldiers. Job uses the divine name Shaddai in this instance. vv. 5–6, two 'difficult questions' emphasize the appropriateness of Job's complaint. An animal does not bray when its mouth is full; Job would have no reason to complain if he were contented like well-fed oxen. Life has become for him like tasteless food; he has no more appetite for either food or life. v. 10, following a kind of imitation prayer, the best Job can muster at the moment, he identifies the deity as the Holy One (cf. Isaiah, who often called YHWH the Holy One of Israel). In 5:1 Eliphaz had asked Job which of the holy ones he would turn to; the reader knows about one member of the divine assembly, the Adversary, who would be a poor choice indeed.

(6:14–21) Job imagines a wadi in the wilderness that has so much water that caravaneers have come to rely on it. To their dismay, the stream-bed has dried up in the heat of summer, precisely when they need water most. Sixth-century texts mention traders from far-off Tema and Sheba, apparently travelling a lucrative trade route. The application of this image to Job's circumstances is obvious; he expected comfort from friends, only to get a rebuke. A pun between similar Hebrew words occurs in v. 21, rā'ā ('to see') and yārē ('to fear').

(6:22–30) vv. 22–3, the language derives from more than one context. A gift implies that Job's deepest need is economic; bribe suggests that he is facing a judicial trial; the reference to saving him fits into a context of attack; ransom refers to a situation in which the opponents have taken Job hostage. By using these different ideas, he hopes to cover all possibilities. v. 24, Job's appeal to be taught anticipates the divine speeches, which succeed in silencing him. An Egyptian proverb states that 'There can be no instruction where love is absent' (Papyrus Insinger, 8:24). The intent is ambiguous: love of the teacher, the student, the subject? In Job's case, the evidence persuades him that the friends do not love, for they speak dishonestly. v. 26, the word for desperate (nō'āš) may play on the word for humankind ('ēnōš). vv. 28–9, a rhetorical ploy aims at converting—turning around—the friends. Alternatively, Job watches as they start to walk away; concerned that he could not be vindicated in their eyes unless they remain, he appeals to them to turn back.

(7:1–10) Job portrays human existence in an entirely negative manner, culminating in a graphic image of a weaver's shuttle that speedily comes to an end without hope. The Mesopotamian myth of creation, Enuma Elish, states that the gods created humankind to serve their makers. Job refers to sleepless nights occasioned by bodily sores infested with worms. The Testament of Job uses this idea to illustrate Job's complete willingness to bear his suffering patiently. In this version, he picks up a worm that has dropped to the ground and places it on his sore from which it had fallen. He rejects Eliphaz's optimistic view that hope remains for him (6:20); in doing so, Job creates a pun on the Hebrew words for hope and thread (tiqwā). v. 8, the one to whom Job directs these remarks is unclear, but the following verses will reveal that he has turned away from Eliphaz momentarily to address God. Job does not expect to live long.

(7:11–21) Job's distress prompts him to utter bold concepts and even to parody traditional hymnody. v. 12, unlike the monster in the myth of chaos, either Yam (the Sea) or Tannin, Job presents no threat to the deity. Why, then, does the deity find it necessary to set a guard over him? Both Yam and Tannin echo the Canaanite myth of chaotic forces that are ultimately defeated by Baal. The enemy is also called Mot; the Hebrew word for death is the same (mōt, or māwet, 7:15).

vv. 14–16, the usual time for resting from one's labour offers no comfort to Job, whose nights are full of terrifying dreams. (The idea of psychological anxiety as punishment for sin is developed further in Sirach and Wisdom of Solomon.) Does Job refer to Eliphaz's allusion to a frightening nocturnal visitor? Breath (hebel) as a metaphor for life goes beyond the image of wind in 7:7 (rūah). The author of Ecclesiastes uses hebel in this way thirty-eight times; its meaning is generally 'futile' or 'absurd', occasionally 'ephemeral'. vv. 17–21, these verses sound like a parody on Ps 8. In this psalm the author expresses wonder that the majestic creator thinks so highly of humankind and watches over the vulnerable creatures with extraordinary solicitude. In contrast, Job views the divine attention as entirely unwanted, a test rather than comfort. Such divine surveillance interferes with Job's need to swallow his spittle. In v. 20 he gives voice to wholly unconventional theology: human sin does not affect God. Moreover, the epithet, 'watcher of humanity', contains an accusing tone, whereas traditionalists often spoke enthusiastically of YHWH's providential care, a shepherding of the people. In Job's view, the guardian has turned villainous. The last verse in this unit may contain an ironical allusion to an ancient worthy, Enoch, who is said to have walked with God and 'was no more, because God took him' (Gen 5:24). Job has suggested that God's watchful eye cannot prevent his lapsing into death (7:8); now he thinks of the deity searching for him after he has descended into Sheol.

(8:1–22) Bildad Makes God's Character the Issue The fundamental premiss of Bildad's argument is stated in the form of a rhetorical question: 'Does God [ēl] pervert justice? Or does the Almighty [sadday] pervert the right?' (v. 3). Such distortion is unthinkable to Bildad, who consequently deduces that Job's children were terrible sinners and that their father's sins were less serious, since he survived divine retribution. With this cruel conclusion, Bildad actually states the central problem that will exercise the imaginations of the four friends throughout the debate: is God at fault? The reader knows that the answer to this haunting question is a resounding 'yes'. A clearer answer can scarcely be found than the deity's concession that the Adversary had provoked him to afflict Job without cause (2:3). Lacking any knowledge of the heavenly proceedings, Bildad relies on traditional belief that one's external conditions accurately reflect inner states. Good people prosper and wicked people do not; this axiom lies behind everything he says. v. 2, the Hebrew expression for 'great wind' differs from that employed by the narrator in describing the death of Job's children (rūah kabbīr in v. 2, rūah gēdōlā in 2:19). v. 3, the twin concepts, justice and righteousness (mišpāt and sēdeq), are central to many biblical texts describing the Lord's activity. The earth is established on these two principles, as is God's throne (Ps 97:2). God requires these qualities of Israel (Isa 5:7), and the covenant is grounded in justice and righteousness (Hos 2:19). The prophet Amos singles out these two concepts as the Lord's requirement for Israel (Am 5:24). vv. 4–7, Bildad's language implies that sinful deeds possess an inherent power to destroy those perpetrating them. Such language has led to the hypothesis that an automatic principle governed human lives, punishing the guilty and rewarding the virtuous. YHWH's only role, according to this theory, was to act as a kind of midwife assisting in the birth of disaster or its opposite (Koch 1955). Each of the first three verses in this unit begins with the same Hebrew particle, 'im (if). In its first use, the hypothetical aspect is attenuated, giving the sense of 'although', for Bildad has no doubt about the guilt of Job's children. Ironically, Bildad's speculations about Job correspond with reality. He does seek God, but not in the manner intended by Bildad, and is restored. Bildad's description of Job's beginning as 'small' hardly accords with the narrative (1:1–3) or with Job's own account of his previous fortune (29:1–25). Nevertheless, Bildad's assessment of things is not far off, for Job's possessions are doubled in the end (cf. 42:12). vv. 8–10, Bildad appeals to ancient tradition, a sure corrective to individual insight. The accumulation of knowledge over the years is reliable, he thinks, and offsets human ephemerality. Whereas several psalms emphasize life's brevity as a decisive difference between humankind and deity (Ps 90:5–6; 103:14–16), Bildad uses the contrast to call into question knowledge acquired by a single individual. The lengthening of a shadow as the sun slowly goes down provides a vivid image of life itself. vv. 11–15, two impossible questions (Crenshaw 1980) introduce the theme of this unit: just as one cannot expect papyrus to grow without marshy conditions or reeds to flourish away from water, so those who turn away from God cannot thrive. Initial promise quickly fades, as hope proves to be no more substantial than a spider's web. This difficult text is understood differently in the LXX, where 'destiny' replaces 'paths'. Perhaps the author intended a wordplay between 'orhôt and 'āḥērīt ('path' and 'end, destiny'). vv. 16–19, this section can be understood in directly contrasting ways. Unlike the flimsy web of a spider, plants with roots firmly penetrating the rocky ground can endure. Alternatively, such plants do not last because the roots lack adequate nourishment. It seems that Bildad returns to his earlier remark about Job's hope and a promising latter end, the word 'āḥēr (behind) recalling 'āḥērīt (another plant arises). vv. 20–2, Bildad does not know that God has declared Job to be blameless. Ironically, Job will later reject (mā'as) something unspecified in his second response to God (42:6). The last word of Bildad's speech and the last word in Job's previous speech are the same, except for the pronominal suffix ('ēn-ennū/'ēnennī). Bildad and his other two friends will become Job's enemies and will experience shame.

(9:1–10:22) Job Wishes to Enter into a Lawsuit with God In 9:2–4 Job either agrees with Bildad's concluding remarks or insists on the truth of the rhetorical question: 'how can a mortal be just before God ['ēl]?' If the former, Job speaks ironically; if the latter, he emphasizes the utter impossibility of being vindicated before God. The verb š-d-q carries two senses, 'to be just' and 'to be legally in the right'. The prophet Jeremiah also despaired of receiving a fair trial, because YHWH acts as prosecuting attorney and judge (Jer 12:1). Eliphaz has asked, 'Can a mortal be more just than Eloah' (4:17a, see NRSV marg.), but Job uses different language ('im, before). A decisive shift occurs in v. 3, one from morality to legality. Job introduces an entirely different metaphor, of the heavenly Judge. He uses the technical word for a lawsuit (rib) but quickly acknowledges the absurdity of such an idea. The expression 'once in a thousand' occurs elsewhere to imply that trustworthy men are rare and comparable women non-existent (Eccl 7:28), and with reference to childlessness, which Ben Sira understands as preferable to having ungodly children (Sir 16:3). The phrase also occurs in Egyptian wisdom literature.

(9:5–11) Job employs a traditional hymn (vv. 5–10) and gives his own bewildered response to an invisible deity (v. 11). In 5:9–16 Eliphaz used hymnic material to emphasize the orderly universe and the power of its creator. In Job's deft fingers this imagery carries an opposite stamp, connoting the chaotic aspects of reality: earthquakes, a sun that does not rise, stars that exhibit no light. The claim in v. 4 that El is wise finds no support in the doxology that follows (vv. 5–7). The next four verses of the unit do, however, reinforce the identification of El as powerful. Job alludes to the chaos myth in which Marduk conquers Tiamat, the linguistic equivalent of the biblical tēhôm (great deep) in Gen 1:2. The expression, 'trampled the waves of the sea' derives from military combat and signifies victory over an enemy (Crenshaw 1972: 39–53). The sea is personified as in Canaanite myth. v. 9, which refers to four constellations, resembles the doxological fragment in Am 5:8–9, where two, possibly four, constellations are named. v. 10, Job uses conventional views to increase the shock-value of his conclusion in vv. 11–12. Yes, God's deeds defy understanding and cannot be counted, but this concession brings little comfort. For Moses (Ex 33:18–23) and Elijah (1 Kings 19:11–12) God's passing by was revelatory. Job experiences El as elusive and concludes that God is beyond challenge when seizing someone's possessions (v. 12).

(9:12–24) v. 13, Job despairs of facing an angry El who conquered the chaos-dragon, here called Rahab as in Ps 89:10 (MT 11). v. 15, the universe is fundamentally twisted when an innocent person is obliged to appeal for mercy. v. 16, Job does not subscribe to the traditional credo in Ex 34:6–7; indeed, he does not believe he could obtain a hearing even if he were successful in catching El's attention. v. 17, the rabbis understood this verse as a foreshadowing of God's appearance to Job in a tempest (B. Bat. 16a). In the light of Job's addition of the particle hinnām (without cause), which functions thematically in the Prologue, some interpreters emend the Hebrew word for a tempest (šē'ārā) to a similar word for hair (šā'arā) and obtain a better parallel for hinnām. The meaning would then be that El crushes Job for a trifle and multiplies wounds gratuitously. v. 21, confident that he is blameless, although lacking any knowledge of higher confirmation of this fact (God's, 1:8; 2:3; the narrator's, 1:1; Job's wife's, 2:9), Job does not recognize himself. Therefore he rejects life itself (in contrast to 7:16, Job now supplies the object of his loathing). v. 22, the logic of Job's reasoning leads him to reject the concept of individual retribution, the comforting belief that God rewards the virtuous and punishes the wicked. Job now believes that God makes no distinctions between the innocent and the guilty. The Mesopotamian Erra Epic, which deals with a similar collapse of the moral order, has the god of Pestilence confess: 'The righteous and the wicked, I did not distinguish, I felled.' vv. 23–4, even worse, God has taken sides with the wicked, gleefully mocking the innocent when they fall and blinding judges so that they cannot distinguish between guilt and innocence. Because Job subscribes to a modified monotheism, he must attribute both good and evil to the one deity. The question in v. 24 functions rhetorically: God alone has done it.

(9:25–35) For the first time, Job addresses God directly. Convinced that God would besmirch him even after his hands are washed, Job returns to the idea of a trial but imagines that he has an advocate (an arbitrator or umpire). The odiousness of divine perversity has resulted in the ridiculous notion of a neutral figure powerful enough to force God to act fairly towards Job. Such an umpire does not exist for Job, who must hope for God's partial relenting. Meanwhile, his days are swiftly running out; the three images in v. 25 from land, water, and air refer to movements of increasing swiftness.

(10:1–7) v. 1, in 9:21 Job complained that he no longer understood himself and thus loathed his life; in 10:1 he returns to the earlier conclusion, but he uses a different verb here (nqt or qut). Because he despises life, he will speak freely to God. v. 3, Job thinks of God's behaviour as cruel, irrational, and immoral: cruel because God enjoys oppressive conduct, irrational because God destroys what he has fashioned with care, immoral because he gives preferential treatment to the wicked. vv. 4–5, Job underscores the absurdity of God's behaviour by implying that God has forgotten the fundamental difference between ephemeral mortals and the eternal Creator. In v. 7 Job acknowledges that God's eyes have no fleshly components that would make them fallible, so God knows that Job is innocent.

(10:8–22) Returning to the idea of humans as works of God's hands (v. 3), Job develops this theme in some detail. He employs three basic images (a potter, a cheesemaker, the force behind gestation). According to the tradition in Gen 2:4b–3:24, the return to dust was a result of human choice, a refusal to obey the divine command. Either Job understands the curse as unfair, or he thinks of premature death. According to v. 12, the Creator bestowed life, compassionate love, and providential care on the finished product of the creative force (cf. 2:6). v. 14, the thought of God keeping watch over newly formed humans leads Job to object that in his case the scrutiny has been oppressive, as he did at 7:20. v. 16, Job understands God in terms of ancient Near-Eastern concepts of royal sport. God, the King of Heaven, hunts the vulnerable lion, Job. vv. 20–2, the dreary picture of Sheol as unrelenting gloom, chaos, and darkness concludes with an oxymoron ('light is like darkness') that is the mirror image of 'That day, let there be darkness' in 3:4a (Good 1990: 229).

(11:1–20) Zophar Thinks that God is Lenient The link between excessive talk and sin was acknowledged in a biblical proverb: 'In a multitude of words, sin is not lacking' (Prov 10:19). In v. 2 Zophar describes Job as a 'man of lips' (NRSV 'one full of talk'), a person of superficial speech. Such an one, he thinks, can never be vindicated. He goes one step farther, accusing Job of mocking his friends. Clearly, Job's sarcasm and parody have not escaped Zophar's attention. Such talk falls under the category of senseless babble, Zophar believes, and deserves an answer. Although failing to recognize the real reason for Job's extreme language, Zophar does possess the ability to see what is at stake, for he returns to the theme of vindication that Job has brought into the discussion (v. 2). v. 4, for Job the decisive issue was moral rectitude, and that issue applied to God as well as to him. Zophar sees things differently; he concentrates on ritual purity (cf. also v. 15 where he uses the word 'blemish'). His inaccurate quotation of Job's words puts the emphasis on external matters rather than moral integrity. vv. 5–6, this expression of a wish that God would answer Job is an example of literary foreshadowing, one filled with irony at Zophar's expense. God will indeed answer Job, but in a tirade of words and without divulging wisdom's hidden qualities. That topic will be addressed in a different fashion (ch. 28), and its meaning will be considerably less ambiguous than Zophar's comment about wisdom (cf. Sir 6:22, 'For wisdom is like her name; she is not readily perceived by many'). Zophar takes offence at Job's certainty that he is blameless; taking up his language of knowing, Zophar turns on him: 'Know then that God (Eloah) exacts of you less than your guilt deserves.' Israel's sages were reluctant to reckon with the notion of divine compassion, for it seemed to place in jeopardy their belief in a principle of moral retribution. In this scheme, an individual received the appropriate reward or punishment for conduct, and there was no place for mercy. One's destiny lay in one's own hands. Historical circumstances eventually undermined such optimism and prompted the sages to incorporate traditional teachings about divine compassion (cf. the ancient creed in Ex 34:6–7, which occurs with some frequency in later liturgies, e.g. Neh 9:17, 31; Ps 86:15; Joel 2:13; Jon 4:2, always in truncated form). The struggle to keep both sides of the equation, justice and mercy, in tension required constant watchfulness (Fishbane 1985: 335–50). vv. 6–12, Zophar's attempt to match the earlier hymnic passages falls short. He does succeed in pointing to the mystery beyond human grasp, but the thoughts quickly descend to the mundane. Ironically, Zophar has just claimed to know the nature of Eloah: that God acts leniently towards Job. Now, however, Zophar implies that Job, and presumably no one else, can discover the mystery that God withholds (cf. Deut 29:29 (MT 28), 'The secret things belong to the Lord our God, but the revealed things belong to us and to our children forever, to observe all the words of this law').

The verb hāqar means 'to probe deeply', and the noun heqer refers to the act of searching as well as the result, as here. Having used this nominative form of the verb for intellectual inquiry, Zophar seems at a loss for a suitable parallel to māṣā' (to find), which he uses twice. v. 8, Ben Sira makes a similar point ('The height of heaven, the breadth of the earth, the abyss, and wisdom—who can search them out?', Sir 1:3). v. 10, the language of theophany, already used by Eliphaz and Job, appeals to Zophar also, but he places it in the context of a judicial trial. v. 12, a proverbial impossible saying, like Ovid's remark, 'Then will the stag fly,' seems to accuse Job of stupidity in addition to iniquity. An echo of Gen 16:12 may be detected; there Ishmael is described as a wild ass of a man. As Zophar employs it, the proverb views ignorance rather than morality as the dividing line between humanity and deity. v. 13, like Ps 73, which identifies the heart (mind) as decisive in determining purity, Zophar understands Job's problem as a misdirected heart, which he can correct through prayer. v. 18, having repented and been cleansed of impurity (v. 15), Job will finally have hope and confidence (a recurring theme thus far). v. 20, Job has longed for death; Zophar threatens him with loss of an escape route and the death of hope unless his guilt is removed.

(12:1–14:22) Job Reflects on the Nature of Wisdom and Life's Brevity 12:2 reeks of sarcasm as Job suggests that the total accumulation of human wisdom is concentrated in his three friends and will die along with them. 12:3, twice in this section (cf. also 13:2) Job claims equality with his friends with respect to knowledge. 12:4–6, before resuming the ideas expressed in the first three verses, Job contrasts his own situation with the divinely protected life of marauders. Although he once enjoyed a special relationship with God, one characterized by prayer followed by divine response, Job has now become an object of scorn. In this setting Job once more characterizes himself in the language of the narrator and God: a just and blameless man. The reference to a vital relationship with God stands in tension with Job's later confession that his previous knowledge of God was derivative, information based on hearing rather than sight (cf. 42:5), if that is what the later text implies. The meaning of v. 6 is not entirely clear. Does it refer to idolatry? Or should one understand the subject as God, who empowers egregious sinners? 12:7–9, Israel's sages believed that the movement of heavenly bodies, the activity of the weather, and the actions of animals contained hidden knowledge about ways of coping with life. By studying these phenomena, one discovered truth that, by analogy, applied to human conduct. Job recognizes the significance of this avenue to knowledge. His use of the plural form, bēhēmôt, anticipates the description of the partly mythic creature in 40:15–24. Otherwise the singular bēhēmā would have sufficed (note the singular verb that follows). 12:9, Job's point is that such knowledge is readily accessible, not hidden beyond human grasp. In making this point, Job uses a cliché: 'For the hand of the LORD [YHWH] has done this'. Here alone in the poetic dialogue between Job and his three friends does the divine name YHWH appear; in some MSS it also occurs in a familiar cliché in the poem about wisdom (28:28). 12:11 emphasizes the importance of possessing powers of discrimination. As the palate distinguishes between appetizing and unappetizing foods, so the ear discriminates between wisdom and folly. 12:12, the accepted view that only the aged possess wisdom appears here in interrogative form; Job will deny its accuracy shortly (v. 20).

(12:13–25) In royal ideology the king was thought to have wisdom, strength, counsel, and understanding (cf. Isa 11:2, where an additional dimension, religious devotion, occurs). Job attributes these four characteristics to God, who frustrates human efforts at being wise. Kings, counsellors, priests, judges, and elders—the entire ruling class of society—are mere pawns in a divine game aimed at exposing human stupidity. This game also involves whole nations, whose fortunes depend on God's whim, and whose leaders are reduced to staggering in darkness like drunkards.

(13:1–3) vv. 1–2, having completed his parody of the friends' claim to possess wisdom and of conventional hymnic descriptions of divine power, Job now insists on his own ability to observe reality and draw accurate conclusions on the basis of experience. The difference between Job and his friends with respect to epistemology is striking. Eliphaz relied on a revelatory disclosure; Bildad appealed to ancestral tradition; Zophar deduced the facts from a preconceived notion about divine knowledge. v. 3, frustrated over his friends' inability to comprehend Job's viewpoint, he contemplates a bold alternative: he will argue his cause with Shaddai. The debate will take a different turn as Job gradually moves away from addressing his friends and directs his words to God, but first he will express his contempt for the way they have treated him.

(13:4–12) He accuses them of hypocrisy and ineptitude; they have covered the real situation with an attractive façade and offered him worthless medicine. These are strong accusations, given the prophetic language about false prophets who whitewash their lies and the dubious status of physicians in a society that viewed sickness as divine punishment for sin (cf. Ben Sira's valiant effort to salvage the medical profession in Sir 38:1–15). v. 5, in Egyptian wisdom silence was so important that the expression 'Silent Person' came to signify anyone who embodied the virtues. Job's use of the verb hāraś has a narrow sense ('stop talking'). Elsewhere the mere withholding of one's tongue is seen for what it is, for it may be an indication of ignorance. v. 6, he who has been called 'a man of lips' (11:2) proudly describes his appeal to the friends as 'pleadings of his lips'. In vv. 7–11 Job's questions contain irony that will not become clear until the Epilogue, where the Lord rebukes the friends for failing to speak the truth about the deity.

(13:13–19) Once more Job asks his friends to keep silent, and he begins to muster courage as he contemplates the consequences of taking his life in his own hands. The ambiguity of the text matches his own uncertainty. Is he essentially a Promethean rebel who shakes his fist in God's face or 'a person wracked by the paradoxes of God' (Newsom 1996: 435)? The body of the text has a negative in v. 15 ('I have no hope'), but a marginal note reads differently ('I will hope in him'). The verse can be read as determination: 'See, he may slay me; I cannot wait, for I must argue my ways to his face.' v. 16, this verse focuses the dramatic action of the book: Job argues that only a virtuous person can survive a face-to-face encounter with God. If Job can appear before God and live to tell it, he will have been vindicated. That is true regardless of how 42:6 is understood. Job's use of yěšū'ā (salvation) instead of the earlier tiqwā (hope) emphasizes the finished deed, a reality as opposed to an anticipated event. vv. 18–19, judicial terminology abounds here: mišpāt, sedeq, and rib. Job imagines that he will achieve vindication through litigation, acting in his own defence, and then he welcomes death.

(13:20–7) Job makes an appeal to God lest divine majesty overwhelm him but concludes that he is being treated like an enemy. This allusion to an enemy may be a pun on Job's name ('ōyēb, enemy; 'ryōb, Job). v. 20, the prayer attributed to the foreign sage Agur (Prov 30:7–9) has a request that two things be granted: that deception be banished from him and he be given neither poverty nor riches. v. 23, in the Prologue Job fretted over the possibility that his children had unconsciously sinned; here he may wonder if he himself is unaware of guilt that is obvious in God's eyes, or he challenges God to identify a single transgression. v. 26, God was believed to have kept a ledger containing the names of virtuous people (Ex 32:32). Does Job imply that God also keeps a record of one's sins? Or that God jots down the punishments that will be directed against sinners?

(13:28–14:6) The simile (13:28–14:1) for the brevity of life fits better with what follows than with what precedes it. Job characterizes life as both short and miserable. Youthful vigour (a flower) soon fades, and disappears like a shadow. 14:4, Eliphaz's low estimate of mortals seems to have found a parallel in Job's ruminations about extracting something clean from an unclean thing. The Sumerian parallel to Job, A Man and his God, states that no sinless person has been born of a woman. This expression has nothing to do with any supposed taint involving the birth canal; instead, it merely means 'everyone'.

(14:7–17) Drawing on his knowledge of horticulture, Job contrasts the fate of trees and human beings. The trunk of a felled tree will sprout new growth if given adequate water, but mortals die and cease forever—just as the water in a lake or river dries up. In Job's view, death is final. Not everyone in ancient Israel shared his opinion, and gradually a belief in an afterlife emerged (cf. Isa 26:19 (collective Israel), Dan 12:2, and Ps 73:23–8). v. 13, Job fantasizes about a kindly deity who would hide him in Sheol until his anger waned, a God who really longed for the work of his hands and who would not monitor his actions in search of transgressions.

(14:18–22) The inevitability of death is foreshadowed by the effect of water on seemingly impenetrable rock. The mighty mountains waste away, and so do mortals. Job ascribes this destructive activity to God: 'so [in like manner] you destroy the hope of mortals' (v. 19). In Sheol the dead do not know the events transpiring on earth; here Job reverses the customary talk about remembering the dead. The isolation of the dying (v. 22) seems misplaced; perhaps Job uses this language to emphasize the thin line between the dying and the dead.

(15:1–35) Eliphaz Defends Conventional Wisdom Eliphaz now appears convinced that his friend is an inveterate sinner, for Job's speech confirms this conclusion. Arguing on the basis of age and consensus, Eliphaz makes two points: Job has sinned, and the punishment for sinners is certain. v. 2, Eliphaz accuses Job of being full of hot air (which comes from the east). v. 4, this is the only instance in the debate of anyone other than Job using this Hebrew word for meditation (siḥā). In Eliphaz's view there was no place for honest expression of doubt. v. 7, Job was not the only one capable of sarcasm; Eliphaz responds to his challenge that the friends consult earth's creatures in search of knowledge by asking if Job were the firstborn of the human race. Rarely does the HB refer to the primal couple outside Genesis. A shift occurs in the early second century, for Ben Sira alludes to the story twice (Sir 25:24; 49:16). v. 8, as illustrated by the Prologue, the destiny of mortals was determined by a divine council. The prophets Amos and Jeremiah claimed to have listened to YHWH's council (Am 3:7; Jer 23:21–2; cf. also the story about the prophet Micaiah ben Imlah preserved in 1 Kings 22:1–28). v. 10, youth was generally understood as a period of immaturity and rashness (cf. 1 Kings 12:1–6), whereas old age was viewed as a time of wisdom. Neither Job nor Elihu accepted this understanding of things, but Eliphaz and his two companions took it for granted. Under Hellenistic influence, this traditional view changed radically (Crenshaw 1986). vv. 14–16, this linking of purity and morality results in a low opinion of humankind, for Eliphaz assumes that everyone drinks iniquity like water. If he is right, Job's effort to obtain vindication does not stand a chance. vv. 17–19, Eliphaz will give Job the benefit of his own experience, coupled with ancestral tradition. In v. 18 the Hebrew reads (nonsensically): 'which the wise have declared and have not concealed from their ancestors'. The gift of land and an absence of foreigners (v. 19) confirms the sages' wisdom and goodness, in Eliphaz's logic. The desire to dwell among kindred people arose from suspicion of foreigners (cf. Joel 4:17). For the author of Prov 1–9, the strange, or foreign, woman represented the greatest threat to youth. vv. 20–35, Eliphaz uses a traditional topos about the fate of sinners, including psychological anxiety. The primary visual image is that of faded blossoms (cf. 8:12) and wilted plants, corresponding to human isolation (living in ruins). In vv. 31–2 a failed commercial transaction focuses the concept of futility that underlies this entire unit.

(16:1–17:16) Job Identifies God as his Attacker and Abandons all Hope Job accuses his friends of failing as comforters in the same way they did not succeed as physicians. He claims that he could do better than they, although in his present state speaking out brings no solace. He imagines that God has singled out Job as his personal target, coming against him with exceptional brutality. His archers hit their mark, and God disembowels the fallen Job. At 16:15 Job thinks of his mourning as a permanent condition, for it seems as though he has sewn sackcloth to his skin. Such material was worn during mourning and periods of grief associated with repentance and calling upon God for deliverance. 16:17, Eliphaz's assumption that everyone carries a taint (15:14) is not shared by Job, who insists on the purity of his prayer. Not all who lifted their hands and voices in prayer could make such a claim, as various prophets recognized (cf. Isa 1:15). 16:18–19, according to Gen 4:10, the blood of an innocent victim cried out to YHWH for revenge. Job addresses the earth and asks that it leave his own blood exposed until vindication is assured. In v. 19 his imagination soars to new heights as Job envisions a heavenly vindicator—in 9:33 he had dismissed such hope as wishful thinking. Beginning with 16:22, and ending in 17:16, Job concentrates on the grave and the present conditions that will hasten his arrival there. Surprisingly, he thinks in terms of years instead of days or weeks; but when referring to his broken spirit, he shortens the time span to days, as if to emphasize the grave's readiness to receive him. 17:3–4, the appeal seems to be directed to God, whom Job wants to provide surety for him. Because he attributes the friends' closed minds to divine intervention, he thinks God owes him something. 17:10, again Job urges his friends to come back, although he believes that they will do him no good. 17:11–16, returning to the temporal language of 16:22 and 17:1, Job views his life as over. The description of Sheol as a house gains force when one realizes that ossuaries were shaped like houses. The other images are readily comprehensible; in death one appears to be sleeping, and the lifeless body is soon inhabited by worms. Job's fertile imagination portrays him as an intimate of the personified underworld and its denizens, personified worms. In such circumstances, he laments, hope has vanished. Hence the rhetorical question in v. 15 with its repetition of the word 'hope'. The obvious answer to the questions in v. 16 is 'no'. Hope will not accompany Job into Sheol, the land from which no one returns.

(18:1–21) Bildad's Horrifying Description of the Fate of Sinners The plural verbs in vv. 2–3 may be an error for the second person singular; it is much more likely that Bildad addresses Job rather than his two friends. v. 4, from Bildad's perspective, Job's demands would require the suspension of the moral order of the universe, which guarantees that the wicked are punished. Job wishes to be an exception to this rule, Bildad argues, even if it means catastrophic changes on earth. vv. 5–6, in the Bible light often serves as a metaphor for life, as in Othello's famous speech: 'Put out the light, and then put out the light' (cf. the extended metaphors for death in Eccl 12:6–7, as well as the symbolic use of light in Prov 6:23–30, which contrasts parental teaching with lust that burns within). vv. 8–10, Bildad thinks that an intricate network of traps has been laid out to capture the wicked who wander unsuspectingly into the snares like wild animals. v. 13, death was frequently personified in ancient Near-Eastern literature. No record of Mot's firstborn has survived in Canaanite texts, but the Mesopotamian god of plague, Namtar, seems to have been the firstborn of Erishkigal, queen of the underworld. Bildad's meaning is unclear, but it should probably be translated 'Death, the firstborn'. v. 15, according to a practice mentioned by Homer (Odyssey, 22.480–1, 492–4), sulphur was sprinkled over a site to purge it from contamination by corpses. In the Bible salt and sulphur were spread over a location to make it unfit for habitation (Deut 29:23 (MT 22); cf. Judg 9:45 (salt alone)). vv. 16–20, a double merism occurs in v. 16 (above/below; branches/roots). Bildad denies that the wicked enjoy either of the two means of surviving death available in popular thought: survival in others' memory and permanence through offspring. The author of Ecclesiastes extended the argument, making it universal with respect to memory and meaninglessness where descendants were concerned. The reference to inhabitants of west and east may be symbolic; if so, it signifies past and future generations. v. 21, this summary-appraisal expresses Bildad's certainty that the wicked will dwell in darkness—precisely what Job has said characterizes his own existence.

(19:1–29) Job's Imagination Scales New Heights The conviction that he is being persecuted relentlessly by God leads Job to wish the impossible: either that a redeemer would avenge his death on the basis of a permanent record or that he would actually live to behold his vindication. Here for the first time Job concludes his speech with something other than a meditation on death. In its place is a threat aimed at his friends. v. 3, thus far the friends have spoken only five times; the reference to ten times may be taken as a round number or it may indicate Job's impression that his friends have talked excessively (cf. Gen 31:7 and Num 14:22 for references to a full quota of tests). The verb kalam (to humiliate, insult) indicates that Job thinks of his friends' words as insulting. vv. 4–6, the conditional sentence does not implicate Job for sins of some kind; he reasons that even if such were true, the consequences would settle on him. Instead, Job argues, Eloah has perverted things and imputed the guilt to him. The image of God as a fowler hurling a net to capture prey occurs in ancient Near-Eastern political treaties as a deterrent against rebellion. vv. 7–12, Job's innocence contrasts with Eloah's guilt. He calls for help and God pays no attention (cf. Hab 1:2 and Lam 3:8); instead Eloah's violent conduct towards Job escalates. The elaborate preparations to attack his tent, more appropriate for laying siege to a city, suggest the personal animus that Eloah has towards Job. The idea of a divine enclosure in v. 8 differs greatly from Satan's understanding of YHWH's protective fence around the prosperous Job. In vv. 9–10 he accuses God of stripping away his wealth and honour (the Heb. noun kābôd has both senses), removing his crown, and uprooting his hope. Unlike the earlier image of a tree-stump left in the ground and capable of regeneration, the complete removal of the roots from the source of nourishment rules out all hope. vv. 13–22, this description of social reversals resembles a literary topos from ancient Egypt and Mesopotamia. An individual complains that society has been turned upside down, with slaves riding horses and nobles walking. Friends have become enemies, and no one can be trusted. Job's servants consider him a foreigner (contrast 31:13–15); the irony in this conception may be lost on those who do not know that most slaves were foreigners acquired through warfare or purchase. Job's loss of control over his slaves means total humiliation within the intimacy of the home. Even his wife finds his breath unpleasant; the Hebrew can also mean: 'my spirit is alien to my wife'. The reference to 'children of my belly' (NRSV: 'my own family') in v. 17 presents difficulty, inasmuch as children would be more appropriately designated as products of his wife's womb and, moreover, Job's children are dead, according to the Prologue. Ancient sexist views may explain such language, which would assume that ownership of a wife gave Job the right to claim her belly as his own (cf. the awful punishment imagined for his wife if he were guilty of adultery, 31:10). Alternatively, Job may refer to his brothers, 'my belly' implying the one from which he emerged, that is, his mother's womb. The topsy-turvy world extends to Job's body; his bones cling to his skin and flesh, instead of the reverse (v. 20). Like El, the friends pursue him relentlessly. The imitatio dei is here understood as an undesirable trait; God sets a bad example for them. The simile, 'like God [ēl]', stands out in v. 22, as does the negated verb, 'to satisfy'. Job has escaped with nothing ('by the skin of my teeth') and now his friends want more than his flesh. vv. 23–7, Job gives voice to an impossible wish, that his words be inscribed as a perpetual testimony to his innocence (cf. Isa 30:8). Precisely in what medium remains unclear. He may refer to three different forms of preserving media: a scroll, a lead tablet, and a stone with lead inlay, like the famous Behistun Rock on which the Persian king, Darius, boasts of his exploits. More probably, Job indicates a single medium for displaying his words, a stone with lead inlay. Textual difficulties render it impossible to interpret vv. 25–7 with any confidence, and familiarity with Handel's Messiah gives the impression that one already understands the verses. The word gō'ēl ('redeemer') derives from family law. According to Num 35:19 and Deut 19:6 this avenger of blood, the nearest male relative, would vindicate a wronged member of the family. The gō'ēl also redeemed property (Ruth 4:4–6; Jer 32:6–7; cf. Lev 25:25) that had been sold because of economic distress, recovered stolen property (Num 5:8), bought back a family member reduced to slavery (Lev 25:28), and married a childless widow to perpetuate the dead husband's name. Job's use of this term indicates that he has given up on justice and begins to hope for revenge. The idea that a redeemer could call God to account for his actions may derive from Mesopotamian religion, where one's patron deity intercedes on behalf of a person in distress, but Job seems to attribute more power to the figure of the redeemer than intercession implies. Job's cry of assurance recalls a Ugaritic text in the Baal cycle: 'And I know that Aleyan Baal is alive', a confession of the god's revivification according to an agricultural calendar. What does Job imply? Three possibilities present themselves: (1) a heavenly figure, like the witness (16:18–21), will champion Job's cause after his death; (2) a heavenly figure will enable him to arise from the dead, or as a disembodied shade Job will witness his vindication; and (3) vv. 25–6a refer to vindication after Job's death, but what he most desires (vv. 26b–27) is that this event occur prior to his demise. The threat to his existence has prompted speculation about heavenly intermediaries: an arbitrator (9:33), a witness (16:18), and a vindicator (19:25), but none of these will accomplish what he truly desires, as expressed in 13:16. Only seeing God and surviving that experience will satisfy Job. From this point on (19:25), Job will not refer to heavenly mediators; instead, he will press his case for an audience with God.

(20:1–29) Zophar's Confidence in the Moral Order This description of the fate of the wicked corresponds to normal expectations in the psalter and in the book of Proverbs. A similar optimism characterizes one of the oldest Egyptian instructions, Ptahhotep, which observes that wickedness never brings its goods into safe harbour. Zophar thinks of a principle established in the beginning of time, one that guaranteed justice in the world. The wicked flourished only momentarily, whereas good people enjoyed lasting prosperity. v. 6 may contain an allusion to the story of the tower of Babel in Gen 11:1–9. The idea that the wicked are obliterated like a dream also appears in Ps 73:20. The images that Zophar uses suggest the extent to which the formerly rich have fallen: like dung, unseen, begging from those who have nothing themselves, dust. The popular idea that wickedness had a pleasant taste (cf. Prov 9:17) has left an impression on Zophar, but he thinks God changes the food into poison. This whole section, vv. 12–19, resembles futility curses. The mistreatment of the poor was considered a serious offence throughout the ancient Near East, and legislation aimed at protecting marginalized citizens is widespread. The image of poison-induced vomiting and gastric illness continues in the concluding section of Zophar's speech, vv. 20–9. Both heaven and earth turn against the wicked; their legacy is fire, darkness, and utter deprivation. This picture contrasts sharply with traditional understandings of the Lord or the land as the heritage of the faithful. Like Am 5:19, flight from one danger leads to yet another form of death (v. 24, where bronze bow functions as synecdoche for bow and arrow).

(21:1–34) Job's View of an Immoral Universe Job utters words that must surely have horrified his friends, for he denies the moral order of the universe, which they take for granted. In his considered opinion, the wicked enjoy the pleasant life that Job's friends believed was reserved for good people. He realizes how outrageous his remarks will sound; hence he anticipates their mockery (v. 3). Indeed, he urges them to use a gesture indicating shock; placing one's hand over one's mouth could also express respectful speechlessness, but Job does not hope for this type of response from his erstwhile friends. vv. 7–16, this picture of the prosperity of the wicked contrasts with Job's own misery and serves as self-justification. The particularities of the account constitute a powerful indictment of God, who fails to act even when the wicked ignore him. They reach old age, their children thrive, their cattle multiply, the wicked rejoice. The Babylonian Theodicy has the sufferer complain that he has not profited from serving his personal god, whereas 'those who do not seek the god go the way of prosperity while those who pray to the goddess become destitute and impoverished'. vv. 17–18, the fourfold rhetorical question in the NRSV, 'How often?' is represented by a single kammā with sequential verbs. Job asks his friends to test the traditional theory that God punishes the wicked. How often have they witnessed it? vv. 19–26, here Job addresses a possible response: that God punishes the children of evildoers (cf. Jer 31:29 and Ezek 18:2). Job assumes that such scoundrels as he has been describing will lose no sleep over their children's destiny. v. 22, beginning with a common cliché ('Will any teach God knowledge . . .?'), Job proceeds to argue that God does not distinguish between good and evil people (vv. 23–6). In life and in death God makes no distinction. vv. 27–34, Job urges his friends to test his theory by consulting travellers who have observed things far and near. He is certain that they will confirm his conclusion that the wicked are spared when calamity strikes the innocent. The beginning and end of this section reveals Job's distrust of his friends. The semblance of dialogue has completely vanished; insults have taken its place.

(22:1–30) Eliphaz Accuses Job of Great Wickedness Job's extreme sufferings, coupled with his intemperate language and untraditional views, convince Eliphaz that his friend is guilty of the most heinous offences imaginable. Therefore, Eliphaz calls them to mind, after first insisting that God who sits above the human scene cannot be affected by either good or evil. Eliphaz accuses Job of taking advantage of members of his family and of mistreating the naked, widows, and orphans, and (implicitly) of strengthening the hand of powerful oppressors. vv. 12–20, Eliphaz mocks the wicked who imagine that God cannot see through the thick clouds, a motif that is also found in Psalms (Ps 10:11; 73:11; cf. Isa 29:15; Jer 23:23–4; Ezek 8:12). In v. 15 the Hebrew word 'ōlām (ancient) can be pointed differently to indicate concealment, which continues the thought of the previous verse. Like those who deceive themselves that God cannot see, will you also walk along hidden paths? In v. 18a Eliphaz concedes that God bestows good gifts on the wicked, but such an admission prompts him to reject their schemes as odious, and to cast his allegiance with the righteous who laugh at the perishing wicked. vv. 21–30, Eliphaz has not given up on his friend, whom he urges to make peace with God. The Mesopotamian parallel text, I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom, recommends correct ritual and repentance as a means to restoration. Eliphaz's promising account of what will happen if Job repents comes close to what actually occurs in the Epilogue. v. 24 is laden with wordplays: the Hebrew word for treasure resembles the word for 'like the stones' and that for 'dust' recalls the word for Ophir. v. 27, neglecting to fulfil one's vows was considered a serious offence (cf. Eccl 5:4 and the Canaanite Epic of Keret). v. 30, Eliphaz cannot know the irony in this statement, for he—the guilty one—will actually benefit from Job's intercessory prayer (42:8).

(23:1–24:25) The Turmoil within Job's Soul Job may have abandoned belief in a moral order, but he cannot bring himself to give up on God completely. Somehow he still thinks that the judge of all the earth would act fairly if only Job could track him down. Mistakenly, Job believes God would not argue on the basis of power. At this point he still thinks in terms of a lawsuit, despite his earlier insistence that God makes a mockery of justice.

(23:8–9) In Ps 139:7–12 the psalmist takes comfort in the knowledge that one cannot wander beyond God's watchful eye. That soothing feeling is not shared by Job, who despairs of finding God anywhere. He mentions all four directions; in the Bible directions are indicated by picturing someone standing and facing the rising sun. Forward is east, backward is west; to the left is north, and to the right is south.

(23:10–17) v. 10, the understanding of suffering as a divine test was widespread; Job briefly recalls this explanation for his misery and expresses confidence that he will emerge from the smelting process as pure gold. He has no idea how accurate this assessment of things really is. Dread of God returns, along with a renewed wish to be hidden. Unlike the wicked, he knows that one cannot hide from God.

(24:1–12) One can hardly imagine a more powerful indictment of God's ways than this brief section. Job begins by asking why Shaddai does not adhere to times of judgement; he proceeds by giving specific examples of dereliction in the office of judge. In a word, the offences strike at the very foundation of society, its concern for the well-being of those who were unable to fend for themselves. Crimes against widows, orphans, and the needy do not move God to action. These unfortunates are forced to eke out a living and to sleep without protection from the elements. Their clinging to a rock for shelter is Job's shattering blow against traditional belief that the Lord was a protective rock. Job portrays God as totally oblivious to such misery. Job does not stop here but goes on to describe the oppression of the poor and to finish with a rhetorical flourish (v. 12). The dying pray for help, but Eloah ignores the groaning.

(24:13–27) Whereas the author of Ps 104:20–3 rejoices over the orderly creation in which nocturnal animals restrict their movements to the dark hours, Job describes human villains who use the darkness of night to conceal their criminal acts from others. The futility of such clandestine behaviour is proclaimed in Prov 7:6–23.

(24:18–20) The sentiments expressed here do not accord with Job's attitude and must be a caricature of his friends' view, or they represent his wish that they be punished. Contrasting images appear in v. 20, the womb symbolizing life and the worm symbolizing death.

(24:21–5) Job returns to his indictment of God for empowering the wicked to oppress the widow; he accuses God of watching over such criminals (v. 23). In Job's mind, providence has turned lethal. Again he wishes that God would exact judgement against such criminals (v. 24). Job concludes with an open challenge to his friends: 'prove me wrong'.

(25:1–6) Bildad's Low Opinion of Humanity Several features of chs. 25–7 indicate disarray: the brevity of Bildad's third speech and the absence of Zophar's; the attribution of specific material to Job that expresses views elsewhere rejected by him but articulated by the friends; and the presence of introductory formulas for speeches different from all previous ones ('Job again took up his discourse and said' (27:1; cf. 29:1) as opposed to 'Then Job answered'). In addition, the isolated nature of ch. 28 and the longer introductory formula in 29:1 suggest either an editorial hand or an effort to set apart this material for some unknown reason. It has been surmised that the author never actually completed the third cycle of speeches but merely provided provisional notes for future reference. Inasmuch as the narrator gives no clue that the friends have run out of anything to say, and nothing subsequent to this section suggests a conversion on Job's part at this stage, and arguments for an unfinished debate have little merit, the probable cause of the present disarray is textual transposition. In all likelihood, the insertion of 26:5–14 has brought about this dislocation, one accentuated by the addition of ch. 28. In 25:1–4 Bildad stresses God's governance of the heavens, keeping that domain safe in the face of revolt (cf. 1 Enoch 6–11 and Dan 10; cf. also Isa 14:12–21). In Bildad's opinion, God's purity dwarfs everything, from moon and stars to those born of woman, here called maggots and worms.

(26:1–27:23) Job's Integrity Compromised (?) The mixture of untraditional views and orthodox sentiment seems to compromise Job despite his protests otherwise. Did his closing responses to Bildad and Zophar so anger readers that they replaced them with palatable views? What could he have said that went beyond the stinging indictment of God in 24:1–12? Clearly, his anger has reached the boiling point here, and one would expect even harsher observations to follow.

(26:1–4) As usual, Job comments on his friends' failure; the remarks contain bitter sarcasm and are addressed to Bildad alone. Furthermore, the syntax permits one to take the negatives as references to Bildad: 'How you have helped, without strength! . . . How you have counselled, without wisdom!' Job even questions the divine source of such banalities, risking blasphemy.

(26:5–14) This hymn has mythical elements (the reference to Abaddon, a name for the underworld probably derived from the verb 'b-d, 'to perish'; the name Zaphon, the mountain of Baal in the north similar to Mt. Olympus in Greek mythology; the chaos-monster, here identified as Sea and Rahab—cf. Isa 27:1 for a reference to the fleeing serpent, Leviathan). A naked Sheol stands exposed before God, who proceeds to cover it with the cosmic mountain and the earth. One expects it to be 'the heavens' that God stretches out (cf. 9:8; Ps 104:2; Isa 40:22). The language in v. 7 echoes the myth of creation in Gen 1:2 (tōhū, 'formless'; beli-mā, for nothing; bōhū, 'waste', 'void'). The waters are envisioned as waterskins (v. 8), and the word for moon actually is pointed as 'throne'. v. 14, an appropriate reminder that one can only comprehend a tiny portion of God's majesty concludes this hymn. Those who proclaim the remarkable story of a cosmogonic battle and an ordering of the universe have succeeded in describing the 'outskirts' of his way and have heard only a 'whisper'.

(27:1-6) The new introductory formula in v. 1 uses the noun mēšālō, usually translated 'proverb', 'likeness', 'analogy', and occasionally 'parable'. Job swears by God, whom he has rejected, that he will not give up his integrity. The oath in the name of the deity who has demonstrated total disregard for justice, in Job's view, corresponds to Job's relentless seeking to face God in a trial, although convinced that the divine Judge twists the truth. Such inconsistency grows out of the enormity of Job's suffering and his reluctance to abandon the sole possibility for vindication. Job therefore appears as a much more complex character than his friends. Contradictions are part and parcel of daily existence. Thus Job thinks that God afflicts him on every side and pursues him relentlessly, but Job also claims that he can find God nowhere.

(27:7-12) If spoken by Job, this section begins with irony and ends in insult (his friends blow wind; the noun hebel in v. 12, as well as the verb from the same root, h-b-l, means 'breath', hence lit. 'breathes a breath,' blows wind). Between these sharp barbs rest rhetorical questions that emphasize God's arbitrary power and complete indifference to sinners by God and to God by them. There, too, is a promise to instruct the friends more fully about God's actions.

(27:13-23) The opening verse, which repeats Zophar's conclusion in 20:29, signals the imitative quality of this unit. Job appears to say that he can make Zophar's speech more effectively than the Naamathite can. In the light of the reference to the death of children by a sword and the allusion to a whirlwind (vv. 14, 20), this speech makes more sense when attributed to Zophar. v. 16, the parallelism of silver and clothing is striking, as one expects the pair 'silver' and 'gold'. v. 19, the fleeting nature of wealth was a common topos in the ancient world; according to the Instruction of Amen-em-ope, it takes wings like geese and flies away (cf. Prov 23:4-5); Hag 1:6 mentions wages placed in a bag with holes. vv. 20-3, the recurring theme of a wind recalls the sharp attack on the friends for producing empty wind (v. 12, hebel and the verb hābal, 'to become futile, ephemeral').

(28:1-28) Where Can Wisdom be Found? This exquisite poem functions as an intermezzo, an interlude that enables readers to pause long enough to weigh the arguments on both sides of the debate and to prepare for what follows. The poem consists of two parts, vv. 1-11 and 12-27, with a concluding statement in v. 28. This chapter resembles the divine speech in ch. 38, particularly the cataloguing of facts lying beyond human ken and the use of rhetorical questions (Geller 1987).

(28:1-11) The author of this section marvels at human achievement in searching for (prospecting) and extracting (mining) precious metals from remote depths. The exact meaning of v. 4 is more hidden than the gems being sought, partly because of ignorance about ancient mining techniques and partly because of obscure language. Its central point can be captured in the expression, 'far from'. Whatever activity is described takes place in virtual isolation.

The phrase in v. 8, 'children of pride', used in 41:26 in association with Leviathan, stands as a parallel to šahal, which occurs elsewhere in 4:10 in parallelism with 'aryēh (lion). Its meaning in 4:10 is indisputable, for it represents one of five different words for lion. The reference in v. 11 to probing the sources of the rivers echoes Canaanite myth, which locates the abode of the god El 'at the sources of the two rivers, in the midst of the channels of the two seas'. Several phrases in this section suggest cosmic activity rivalling the achievements of deity: overturning mountains by their roots (9:5; cf. Hab 3:6), opening channels in rocks (Hab 3:9; Ps 74:15), and exposing hidden things to light (12:12; Dan 2:22).

(28:12-19) v. 12 continues the thought of v. 1 by providing its contrast; it does this by means of a sophisticated wordplay between 'mine' (mōšā) and 'find' (māšā), while repeating the word 'place' (māqôm). The Hebrew word for wisdom, hokmā, is a supronym indicating a quality of knowledge for which as many as nine nouns stand in parallel cola (bīnā as here seems to be the preferred parallel). 'Wisdom' is the general term; bīnā is the more specific one for intellectual discernment. Nothing in vv. 12-28 resembles the personification of hokmā as depicted in Prov 8:22-31 and Sir 24:1-22, among other texts. Four different words for 'gold' and seven different gems give this text a distinctive character, 'suggesting a connoisseur's familiarity with rarities among rarities' (Newsom 1996: 531). The negative particle lō introduces vv. 15-17, 19; in v. 18 it appears as the third word. The four different words for purchasing ('weighed out', 'given', 'be paid for', and 'valued') in vv. 15-17 contrast with the understatement, 'no mention', in v. 18. The exceptional value placed on wisdom elevates it just as effectively as the author of Prov 8:22-31 does in quite a different way, by imagining her as pre-existent artisan or witness to the act of creation.

(28:20-7) The opening verse repeats the question in v. 12, with one change (the verb 'come' replaces 'be found'). The personification of Abaddon and Death in v. 22 provides smooth transition to the emphatic 'God' in v. 23 ('He' is also in the emphatic position). According to Isa 43:13, YHWH laid claim to the ancient epithet, hū ('He', 'That One'). The personal pronoun in v. 23 may echo this tradition rooted in stories about divine self-manifestations that evoked an ecstatic shout, 'O He'. The emphasis shifts from spatial language (v. 24) to temporal expressions in vv. 25-7 ('when' ... 'when' ... 'then'), resembling ancient Near-Eastern stories about creation (cf. also Prov 8:24-30a). The poem claims that Elohim recognized wisdom during an act of creativity. Educational terms describe the deity's intellectual pursuit of wisdom: 'Then he saw it and declared it, he established it, and searched it out.' Observation led to articulation of the facts as perceived; the positing of a theory followed, with further probing of its accuracy or inaccuracy (cf. Eccl 7:23-5; Sir 6:27). The conclusion of this majestic poem is something of a let-down. One expects a profound statement; instead, a cliché brings readers back to earth. Wisdom is encountered in the mundane choices one makes, specifically in religious devotion. (Using this criterion for wisdom, Job already possessed it and more, according to 1:1 and repeated citations of this fourfold description of his character.) Interpreters have expressed disdain for this formulation of things subsequent to the debate in chs. 3–27, which surely undercuts such simple answers to complex issues, and have insisted that any resolution at this juncture is premature. The unique appearance of the name Adonai in this verse is noteworthy; in Jewish tradition this name was pronounced instead of the sacred name, the Tetragrammaton YHWH. This special name for God was left unuttered out of profound respect.

(29:1–31:40) Job Challenges God In ch. 29 Job remembers an idyllic past, contrasts it with his miserable present in ch. 30, and pronounces an oath of innocence in ch. 31. Much of the material in this section comes from stock expressions in the ancient world, which explains its apparent lack of fit with Job's circumstances in some instances. Reaching historical conclusions about Job's precise role in the community on the basis of this material misconstrues its typical nature. Exaggeration belongs to autobiography; so do self-exoneration and considerable fabrication. Accordingly, Job understands himself in royal categories.

(29:1–25) Job begins his nostalgic reminiscence on a level of intimacy, then moves outwards from this family scene to his role in society and its rewards. When contemplating his activity as champion of the downtrodden, Job returns once more to his most intimate thoughts (vv. 18–20). The reference to autumn days in v. 4 (tr. as 'my prime' in NRSV) strikes Western readers as peculiar, but in the Near East the autumnal New Year signalled a time of regeneration after the drought of summer. The picture of divine care while Job and his entire family sat under his tent contrasts with the following image of an urban dweller (v. 7). The desert sheik was content with cream and oil; the city-dweller takes the leading role in judicial disputes at the gate. Job recalls that he silenced everyone (young and old, prince and nobles) because he embodied the values of the group as expressed in looking out for the interests of the weak. He overlooks none of them, for the list of persons receiving his help includes the usual categories—widows, orphans, poor, stranger—as well as the blind and lame. According to royal ideology, kings were charged with ensuring the well-being of these lowly members of society, and failure to abide by this rule was viewed as grounds for abdication of the throne in the Canaanite story of Aqhat. vv. 18–20, the Hebrew of v. 18 reads 'sand', which makes sense in context and is not excluded by the earlier 'nest'. The mixture of metaphors in this brief reflection argues against reading 'phoenix', for Job thinks of a bird, sand, roots, dew, and a warrior's bow. These images may be placed alongside the more familiar prophetic scene of sitting peacefully under one's vine and fig tree. With the exception of the initial metaphor (dying in one's nest), all Job's images symbolize vitality; the final one, a fresh warrior's bow, has sexual overtones in the tale of Aqhat, where the goddess Anat covets the prince's bow and offers her love in exchange for it. vv. 21–5, unlike Job's miserable comforters, he insists that he actually brought comfort to the needy.

(30:1–31) Job's description of his present circumstances comprises four sections, the first three beginning with a contrasting particle, 'but now', and the fourth with 'surely'. He demonstrates his remarkable skill at insulting others (youth insult me, whose fathers are not even good enough to accompany my dogs; cowering in wadis, they bray like cattle). Such contempt for the poor contrasts with the attitude expressed in 29:12–17 and 31:16–23, although Job's description of their feeble attempts to survive in harsh economic conditions shows that he has internalized their needs. Job acknowledges the principle that religious people tend to identify those whom God has ostracized and to count them as their enemies too (v. 11). In vv. 16–19 Job returns to his earlier suspicion that God personally attacks him. This unpleasant thought gives way to direct address of God for the first time since ch. 16. He imagines that God ignores his cries for help and tosses him about on the wind (vv. 20–3). Job concludes this section with observations about his psychic distress. Together, chs. 29 and 30 effectively describe Job at the pinnacle of success and the nadir of his isolation from society. At one time the aged and nobles stood in awe of him; now children of a no-name mock him (cf. 30:8, 'senseless', lit. children of a fool, 'disreputable', lit. children of a no-name). In previous days he presided over the judicial assembly; now he calls jackals and ostriches his companions. Such ostracism is aptly symbolized in the words that conclude the chapter, 'a sound of weeping'.

(31:1–40) Job's final speech in the debate takes the form of a negative confession reinforced by an oath. Similar oaths of innocence are known from ancient Mesopotamian and Egyptian liturgical texts. Although the context of Job's oaths is a lawsuit, the offences listed are not subject to legal remedy. Job uses two kinds of oath, the complete oath with the consequences specified, and an abbreviated oath that stops short of mentioning any punishment. Interpreters differ in estimating the exact number of oaths and, in a few instances, their specific nature. The latter point applies to the opening reference to looking on a virgin. On the basis of Canaanite mythology of the perpetual virgin goddess Anat, some scholars think Job denies having participated in idolatrous worship. To them, this offence seems more appropriate at the head of a list of wrongs, especially since lust and adultery are treated later (vv. 9–12). The offence, lust (whatever its object, whether a foreign goddess or an ordinary virgin), marks this code of ethics as special, going as it does beyond the actual act to the prior intent as in Jesus' later formulation of the issue. The second and third oaths concern ethics generally—deceit and greed—while the fourth returns to sexual ethics (adultery). The oath in v. 7 refers to hands, feet, heart, and eyes, indicating that Job's total being is devoid of fault (Habel 1985: 433). The first stated punishment in v. 8 resembles a futility curse ('let me sow and another eat'); unlike the next one (v. 10), it does not conceive of the punishment as an appropriate 'fit' to the crime. The prescribed punishment for adultery would fall on Job's wife (others would turn her into a prostitute), but that harsh treatment accorded with the ancient understanding of a wife as the husband's property. The anomaly is that sexual ethics could simultaneously generate the exalted view in v. 1 and the reprehensible attitude of v. 10. The language describing adultery and its punishment is rich in double entendre, with 'door' representing the entrance to the womb and the paired verbs 'grind' and 'kneel', signifying the sex act.

Thenextfour oaths consider the matter of social ethics (vv. 13–15, slaves; vv. 16–18, the poor; vv. 19–20, the needy again; vv. 21–3, the orphan again). Job acknowledges that social distinctions between masters and slaves are human contrivances, for God created both (cf. Prov 22:2 and 29:13 for the same attitude with reference to rich and poor). In v. 22 the full form of the oath occurs for the third time; in this instance the punishment fits the crime; aggression leads to further aggression, the abusive fist to a broken and useless arm. The three oaths in vv. 24–8 deal with various forms of idolatry (gold, wealth in general, worship of heavenly bodies) but lack a specific punishment. The gesture mentioned in v. 27, the mouth kissing the hand, may allude to a Babylonian expression for a gesture of obeisance in which the hand touches the nose. The modern ‘blown kiss’ involves a somewhat similar gesture. Two oaths in vv. 31–3 concern the obligation of providing hospitality to strangers on a journey (cf. the stories about Abraham’s hospitality to the divine messengers in Gen 18:1–15 and its sequel about Lot in a similar role in 19:1–11, as well as the scandal involving the Benjaminites living in the town of Gibeah as told in Judg 19). The language of v. 31 suggests homosexuality; Job denies that anyone in his tent ever abused strangers in such a manner. At this point Job utters an aside (vv. 35–7) in which he expresses a wish to be heard and openly challenges Shaddai. He juxtaposes the thought of his own mark over against a non-existent indictment written by his adversary. The word for ‘mark’ is the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet, a taw resembling an x. In Ezek 9:4, 6, it signified persons to be spared God’s judgement. Job imagines that he would wear the indictment for all to see (cf. Hab 2:2 for a prophetic message being publicly displayed). The image of a prince with an indictment for a crown corresponds to Job’s ambiguous situation itself. The final oath (vv. 38–40) touches on his relationship with the land. The ancients viewed society and land reciprocally; crimes against one another affected the land adversely. Furthermore, respect for the land required proper treatment, including a practice of periodic release from cultivation. Job’s oath seems to echo the story about unavenged blood crying out to God. The full form of the oath once again envisions an appropriate punishment, an unproductive field. The narrator enters for a brief moment to observe that Job’s words have come to an end (cf. Ps 72:20); the verb tammû echoes the adjective describing his integrity, tām.

Elihu Attempts to Answer Job (32:1–37:24)

A youthful figure, previously unmentioned, comes forward and angrily rebukes all four of those engaged in debate. This individual is called Elihu, which means ‘He is my God’ (cf. Isa 41:4, ‘I am He’); he alone is given an impressive Jewish pedigree (cf. Gen 22:21, there Buz is identified as a son of Nahor, Abraham’s brother). The name of Elihu’s father, Barachel, means ‘El has blessed’, a significant appellation in the light of the dispute within the prologue over whether or not Job would bārak God. Elihu’s long address, uninterrupted by responses from anyone, is divided into four parts by prose introductions at 32:1–6; 34:1; 35:1; and 36:1. The speeches appear intrusive for several reasons: Elihu’s sudden appearance without previous mention, his Jewish ancestry, his distinctive style and language, his familiarity with the rest of the book, and his disappearance without a trace after 37:24. He alone addresses Job by name, and he quotes liberally from the book, even anticipating the divine speeches. He prefers the divine name El, the short form of the personal pronoun ‘I’ (’ānī), and the word for knowledge (dēa’) missing elsewhere in the book. His vocabulary has more Aramaisms than used by other characters, and he seems determined to tie up loose ends in the arguments against Job. Interpreters generally view Elihu as an intruder, an attempt by a later Jewish author to provide a more orthodox answer to the issues being addressed in the book. Elihu’s youth may signal the lateness of this section (Zuckermann 1991: 148, 153). The similarities between Elihu’s ideas and certain Hellenistic texts has also confirmed the lateness of these chapters for some critics (Wahl 1993: 182–87). Others insist that both style and content argue for the integrity of the unit and view its anomalous features as artistic skill. While some interpreters consider Elihu a buffoon, a self-destructing upstart, others see him as a bearer of remarkable insight into the nature of suffering and divine majesty.

(32:1–5) The narrator provides a glimpse into the minds of the three friends who have given up on Job, convinced that he was deluding himself (cf. Prov 12:15; 26:5, 12, 16; 38:11; 30:12). The phrase, ‘innocent in his own eyes’, means that in a legal sense Job saw himself as not guilty; from the friends’ perspective, that assessment of things had no firm basis in fact. The narrator characterizes Elihu as angry, repeating the idea four times in as many verses (vv. 2–5). An ideal among the sages was the control of the passions (lust, greed, anger, appetite), but the young Elihu remains very much in their grip. His anger flared at Job and his three friends—at Job because he justified himself and at the friends for their inability to answer him successfully. The narrator explains Elihu’s belated remarks as required by ancient protocol: youth must wait for age to speak first. Would ancient readers have expected much from an angry young man? In v. 3 the Masoretes, guardians of the ancient manuscript tradition, inserted a rare change in the text; the original read ‘declared God to be wrong’. Elihu’s perception of their responses does not instil confidence in his reading of things.

(32:6–14) Not content with the introduction accorded him by the narrator, Elihu provides further justification for his remarks. He does so by juxtaposing two fundamental principles, the first, that age deserves precedence, and the second, that every person has direct access to the divine spirit. For him, the second principle took precedence over the first. He dutifully awaited his turn to speak but became convinced that age does not necessarily imply wisdom. Elihu’s ambiguous remark about the breath of the Almighty seems to suggest special inspiration (v. 8, ‘bestows understanding on them’). Similar ambiguity surrounds this concept elsewhere in the Bible (cf. Gen 2:7 where the breath of YHWH animates humankind and Isa 11:2, where it suggests special knowledge on the part of a chosen ruler). The author of Ps 119:99–100 expresses the rare notion that meditation on the Torah and obedience to it endows youth with more wisdom than their teachers and elders possess. In v. 13 Elihu hints that he already knows the development of the plot, for he attributes to the friends the idea that God will refute Job. Elihu’s protestations to originality do not dissuade interpreters from viewing his contribution to the argument as minimal.

(32:15–22) The final section of Elihu's self-introduction uses the image of a wineskin about to burst from the pressure of fermentation. The sages were aware of a sense of urgency in speaking; they even made clever jokes about the desire to spread gossip, insisting that the words would not explode within one's belly (Sir 19:10). Prophetic literature also recognizes the necessity to express oneself (Jer 20:9). Elihu's language provides a pun on the narrator's description of him as angry ('ap 'ānî, 'also I' / wayyihar 'ap, hārā 'ap, 32:10, 17, 2, 3, 5). A twofold irony underlies vv. 21–2, for Elihu will certainly show partiality to God and, from the perspective of the plot and its development, will cease to exist.

(33:1–13) Elihu offers further rationale for daring to speak, addressing Job by name and citing him almost verbatim. By means of a teacher's summons to attention (v. 1), Elihu shifts the focus from himself to Job momentarily, but quickly reverts to the earlier concentration on his own unique qualifications to refute Job and his friends. No chasm exists between Elihu's mind and words, for he is both upright and pure (v. 3, yāšār suggests moral integrity; bārūr connotes the lack of any blemish). In v. 4 Elihu uses the ideas of God's spirit and Shaddai's breath in a general sense; as such, they do not reinforce his unique claim. They do, however, function to assure Job that he faces an ordinary mortal in debate. Elihu's citation of Job's fourfold affirmation of innocence and fourfold charge against God (vv. 9–11) is inexact but reliably summarizes what Job has said at some point (9:20–1; 27:4–6; 30:1–40; 33:24b–27a). To refute Job on all counts, Elihu voices a principle that will undergird everything he says: God is greater than any mortal (v. 12). Why then, Elihu asks, do you contend (ribôtā) with God? Mere mortals, he thinks, cannot enter into a lawsuit with Eloah.

(33:14–30) An inclusio connects v. 14 with v. 29 (one, two/twice, three times); between these numerical expressions Elihu's argument becomes expansive. He claims that God communicates by different means, sometimes through nocturnal visions and at other times through suffering. Both types of communication come as warnings to stem the natural emergence of pride. As a paragon of virtue, Job was particularly subject to this form of sin, for morally good people tend to recognize their superiority over the masses. Elihu admits that the recipients of divine warnings by night seldom perceive them for what they are (contrast Eliphaz's astute grasp of his divine visitor's message in 4:12–21). The stated purpose of these warnings is to prevent an early departure into the realm of the dead. Does Elihu envision death as crossing a river like the Greek notion of crossing the river Styx? The second type of warning results in emaciated bodies that elicit compassion from a mediating angel (mēlīš). The term denotes an interpreter (cf. Gen 42:23) and a mediator (Job 16:19 (MT 20)). In later Jewish literature the heavenly mediator becomes an intercessor for devout persons (1 Enoch 9:3, 15:2 and the T. 12 Patr.). The idiom 'one of a thousand' indicates rarity. The mediator does not offer any information about the nature of the 'ransom' that covers the sins of the person being spared the Pit. In Elihu's extraordinary scenario, the intercessor declares the guilty person innocent, and this in turn prompts the sinner to confess and receive God's forgiveness. To conclude this remarkable account of a compassionate God who warns sinners and responds favourably to mediators, Elihu praises the divine generosity, insisting that God acts this way repeatedly so that mortals may experience light rather than the darkness of Sheol.

(33:31–3) Again Elihu resorts to a teacher's appeal for an attentive audience; while inviting Job to respond, he states that his sole intention is to justify Job. In v. 33 Elihu promises to convey wisdom to Job (his choice of the verb 'ālāp' provides a pun on the earlier expression, 'one of a thousand' ('ehād minnī 'ālep).

(34:1–37) In some ways this chapter resembles the rhetorical conceit of the later Wisdom of Solomon, which also addresses an imaginary audience and offers philosophical reflection on God's just governance of the universe. In Elihu's case, only four persons are present, and he does not consider any of them wise. After a brief rhetorical appeal to the audience (vv. 2–9), Elihu proceeds to defend God's justice on two counts, God's absolute sovereignty and respect for justice (vv. 10–20). Then Elihu shows how God effectively punishes the wicked (vv. 21–30), which makes Job's claim of innocence appear ridiculous (vv. 31–3), as intelligent people will undoubtedly recognize (vv. 34–7). Elihu does not shrink from allowing his imaginary audience to join him in addressing Job by name.

(34:1–9) Elihu quotes a popular proverb (v. 3) reflecting his oral culture; the ear, not the eye, tests words. Ancient sages recognized the need to evaluate what was spoken in the same way one's palate discriminated between desirable and undesirable food. Three of the six occurrences of the noun mišpāt (just, right) in the larger section (vv. 12, 17, 23), mark the significance of vv. 4–6. Over against Job's charge that God has taken away his right, Elihu places the desired collective conclusion of his audience. They, not Job, have the responsibility of choosing mišpāt, here used in poetic parallelism with ṭōb ('good'). In vv. 7–9 Elihu accuses Job of standing out above all others, but not in goodness (contrast 1:3). He drinks mockery like water (habitually), associates with sinners, and blasphemes, i.e. he denies the fundamental principle that the universe is moral. In Elihu's opinion, whoever delights in God receives an appropriate reward; Job's experience taught him otherwise.

(34:10–15) Elihu appeals to intelligent listeners, reminding them of God's sovereignty. Such a one has no reason to pervert justice, he argues; the unspoken contrast is the human judge whose greed renders him subject to a bribe and whose vulnerability before the powerful leaves him open to showing partiality. vv. 14–15 allude to the ancient story of creation (Gen 2:7; 3:19).

(34:16–20) Appealing to his listeners again, this time in the singular to designate them individually, Elihu points out that God, who loves justice, chose to govern. It follows that God cannot pervert justice; the same person cannot be both šaddiq and reša' (wicked). Does Elihu's understanding of God leave room for the traditional belief that the poor occupied a special place in God's affection?

(34:21–30) God's overthrow of the wicked is made possible by keen sight, according to Elihu, for God sees everything they do. Despite Job's claims to the contrary, God punishes the wicked and pays heed to the cries of the oppressed. Having accepted as a reality the orthodox belief about God's just governance of the world, Elihu concludes that divine silence does not make the deity culpable.

(34:31–7) The meaning of this brief section is obscure. Does Elihu advise Job to repent in vv. 31–2, or does he contrast Job's obdurate conduct with one who repents when confronted with guilt? In v. 33 the verb reject (mā'as) lacks an object; a similar phenomenon occurs in Job's actual response to God's second speech from the whirlwind (42:6). Elihu cannot know the conditions governing the Adversary's test of Job—unless he really is a later intruder—and his wish that Job be tested to the limit violates the stipulation that his life be spared. The accusation that Job speaks without knowledge anticipates YHWH's words in 38:2. Here the Lord appears to corroborate Elihu's harsh assessment of Job.

(35:1–16) This entire chapter is structured around two of Job's objections: that in his case it has not paid to serve God and that God pays no attention to his cry for justice (vv. 3, 14–15).

(35:1–8) In the previous chapter Elihu invited rational people to judge for themselves; now he asks the embittered Job to reconsider his complaints against God. At issue is the justice of God as manifested to Job. Elihu thinks any sensible person will conclude that God is just; Job, therefore, has lost his capacity to reason when he says, 'I am more just (innocent) than God' (my tr.). Job's verdict is based on the failure of God to deliver appropriate rewards for faithful service. Job reckons that he has been treated by God like one who has not rendered loyal obedience. In short, religion does not pay. Elihu answers this charge by emphasizing the divine self-sufficiency, an approach that Job's friends have already taken. In Elihu's view, neither virtue nor vice affects God whatever, for God dwells in the remote heavens. Human deeds, both good and bad, relate solely to other mortals (v. 8). This answer does not really address Job's complaint, for even a self-sufficient deity can reward goodness and punish evil for purely altruistic reasons.

(35:9–16) How does Elihu's response to Job's other complaint fare? In this instance Elihu holds the citation from Job's speeches in abeyance until he has dealt generally with the problem it raises. Oppression among mortals compels the less fortunate to raise a cry to the heavens, but they do not cry out in prayer. That seems to be the meaning of vv. 10–12. Instead of searching for their Maker and expressing gratitude for the gift of songs during the night (the Heb. word zēmīrôt can mean either 'strength' or 'songs') and acknowledging that the divine teacher instructs by means of animals and birds, they swell with pride. Here Elihu mocks Job's earlier observation that God teaches through animals and birds; in addition, Elihu implies that Job, like the unnamed evildoers, has surrendered to the powerful temptation of pride. The antecedent of the phrase, 'because of pride', is unclear; it can be either the verb 'cry out' or 'does not answer'. If the former, it explains their reluctance to pray; if the latter, it states the reason for God's disregard. Now Elihu has prepared the way for yet another onslaught against Job's character. Thus he cites Job again, this time indirectly and in general (vv. 14–15). Job's firm conviction that God ignores his just cause has been robbed of its potency by Elihu's clever artifice. It has become obvious to Elihu that Job's talk lacks substance inasmuch as it consists of many words devoid of knowledge. Here Elihu anticipates YHWH's rebuke of Job in 38:2, which uses the same words. Has the later author of Elihu's speeches found a way to authenticate his own views?

(36:1–37:24) Elihu's View of God The conclusion to Elihu's speeches slowly moves away from Job's flaws to concentrate more fully on God's character and majesty. Accordingly, citations of Job's troubling view recede into the background as Elihu reinforces his own authority to speak correctly about God (36:1–4). Returning to earlier themes, Elihu emphasizes God's power, justice, and salvific activity (36:5–15), but in the process Elihu interprets the mystery of disciplinary suffering as an occasion to warn Job (36:16–21). Beginning at 36:22, a decisive shift in the tenor of the speeches takes place, one that anticipates the divine disclosure in ch. 38. The similarities between the two discourses suggest that Elihu intentionally steals a major share of divine thunder. The speech opens with an expansive introduction (36:22–33) divided into three distinct sections by the exclamation 'see' (hēn) in vv. 22, 26, and 30. The topics of this unit (divine majesty, God's control over rain and lightning) mark a transition (37:1–5) to the theme of a thunderstorm (37:6–13). Elihu asks several rhetorical questions like those soon to be ascribed to YHWH (37:14–20) and ends with a flourish (36:1–4). Elihu's final self-presentation indicates that he understands exactly what the issue is from Job's perspective: divine justice or, more correctly, its absence. Elihu differs, however, on whether or not it exists. He intends to bring his knowledge to bear on this matter, hoping thereby to refute Job's denial of God's justice. For Elihu, God is innocent and Job is guilty. Moreover, Elihu boasts, my knowledge is both accurate and sound (tāmīm).

(36:5–15) The twofold use of the adjective 'mighty' (kābbīr), together with another word for strength (kōaḥ), in v. 5 demonstrates Elihu's theological starting-point. God is great! When sovereignty and intelligence join hands, as here, one has truly happened upon the best of all possible worlds. Elihu offers a subtle hint of another dimension, compassion, for he claims that God does not reject (mā'as...). This verb has no object and therefore it must be supplied by readers. Presumably, Elihu means that God has no predisposition to despise anyone, and by implication God's treatment of individuals is fully determined by human conduct. Pressing the point further by means of a proverbial saying (v. 6), Elihu affirms both sides of the principle of reward and retribution. God destroys the wicked and exacts justice for the afflicted. Among the sages the usual pair of contrasting groups was righteous/wicked, but here rāšā' is matched with ʿāniyyīm (wicked/afflicted) as frequently in psalms of lament. The following verse brings the vocabulary more into line with customary sapiential speech, for it refers to these afflicted ones as righteous (šaddīq). The origin of the notion that the šaddīq and the poor were identical is difficult to trace, but it surfaced as early as the eighth century (cf. Am 2:6), becoming normal in later psalms, and evolving into a theological axiom in some post-biblical literature. Indeed, the name of the earliest Christian movement, Ebionites (the poor), reflects this understanding of the lowly as God's special people. Elihu relates divine power to human decisions; the arrogant wicked are overthrown by it, and the lowly afflicted are exalted. Against Job's claim that God looks away from the needy, Elihu boldly asserts the opposite (v. 7). Moreover, he interprets affliction as God's discipline aimed at restoring individuals. Their fate, he insists, lies in their own hands; if they heed divine instruction, they will be lifted up, but if they refuse to listen, they will perish. Here Elihu resorts to a play on words between the verbs for serving God and being destroyed ('abad/'abar). Elihu's virtual fixation with right thinking leads him to add 'without knowledge' (cf. 35:16, the same words YHWH will use with reference to Job in 38:2). In vv. 13–14 Elihu describes the punishment of people like Job who become angry because of divine affliction rather than imploring God's mercy. Such stubborn sinners die while young, ending up in the company of reprobates. The Hebrew word for male prostitutes associated with the temple occurs in v. 14. Despite biblical references to this practice in ancient Israel, its scope and nature remain obscure. Apparently, both men and women served as sacred prostitutes (qedēšīm), their earnings going into the temple treasury despite intense opposition in Deuteronomistic circles (Deut 23:17–18 (MT 18–19); 2 Kings 23:7). In v. 15 Elihu sums up his teaching about the positive use of discipline; by means of affliction, God opens the ear of the afflicted. An Egyptian proverb states that the teacher opened a student's ear by striking him on the back. It should be remembered that ancient educators made liberal use of corporal punishment. Curiously, Elihu uses the noun 'ānī rather than mūsār, so prominent in Proverbs and Sirach; the verb 'ānā carries a harsher connotation than yāsār.

(36:16–21) Elihu begins this unit by harking back to God's initial kindness to Job; the three images picture a person at one with the world (wooned from distress, a wide space, a table filled with rich staple foods). Two of these words recur in vv. 18–19 (sūt and šār, woe and distress). In other words, God has overcome Job's restrictive limitations and replaced them with wide streets and plenty of 'fat', a delicacy in the ancient world. God's generosity contrasts with Job's niggardliness, his anger. Elihu seems to warn Job against being enticed by his distress to pointless fury and mocking. His near obsession with justice (dīn) will backfire, in Elihu's view. Ultimately, dīn and mišpāt will overwhelm him. By this he probably means 'divine judgement'. The allusion to a great ransom (v. 18) echoes the remark by the mediating angel in 33:24, 'I have found a ransom'.

(36:22–37:24) The final section of Elihu's speech begins with a declaration of God's might and poses three rhetorical questions for Job's consideration (vv. 22–3). Each of the questions functions to negate the answers: no one compares with God as teacher, or tells God what to do, or can accuse God of wrong. The idea of God as teacher (cf. 33:14–22; 34:32; 35:11) reached beyond the sages such as Elihu to prophetic figures as well. In Isa 30:20–1 the themes of YHWH as afflicter and teacher come together in the same way they do in Elihu's discourse. Moreover, both Isaiah and Elihu put forth these ideas as a response to concern that God is hiding. For the prophet, the moment a person starts to veer off course, YHWH speaks up and points out the way to be travelled. Elihu's assurance that the one who afflicts the sinner uses adversity to teach a moral lesson lacks the emotional depth of the related prophetic text, but at least Elihu's understanding of divine activity has a moral dimension. That cannot be said for YHWH's speeches about the interrelationship between Creator and creature. The second rhetorical question also resembles a text from the book of Isaiah (40:12–14), which asks who has instructed the majestic Creator or taught him the path of justice. The implied answer to these rhetorical questions is 'no one'. Elihu's third question, like his second, underscores the absurdity—from his perspective—of Job's onslaught against the sovereign teacher. For him 'might' comes mightily close to representing 'right'.

(36:24–37:5) The proper response to God's grandeur, Elihu urges Job, is hymnic praise. To reinforce his point, Elihu extols the awesome power unleashed in thunder and lightning, with their accompanying rains that produce abundant food for all living creatures. Note every image in this description of heavenly fireworks is intelligible; for example, 'ēd in v. 27 actually refers to a primordial underground stream, at least in ancient mythology (cf. Gen 2:5–6), and the phrase 'cover the roots of the sea' in v. 30 seems strange. Perhaps it suggests that bright flashes of light expose the roots. On the basis of similarities between this text and Ps 29, some interpreters emend the verb 'cover' to a noun with a possessive pronoun ('his throne'; cf. Ps 29:10, 'The LORD sits enthroned over the flood; the LORD sits enthroned as king for ever'). The last verse of ch. 36 presents greater difficulty; Gordis (1978: 424) revocalizes it to read: 'His thunderclap proclaims His presence; His mighty wrath, the storm'. In 37:1–5 the point of view shifts from God's electrifying display to the human response. The same shift takes place in Ps 29:9 ('all say, "Glory!"'). In v. 2 Elihu uses repetition to effect a breathtaking pause in the action ('Listen, listen') as he invites others to share his excitement. The point of view in vv. 2–5 begins and ends on the human level but soars to the heavens in the interval. Elihu stands in awe of divine power, but he is not alone in failing to comprehend God's nīplā'ôt and gēdōlōt ('wondrous' and 'great' deeds).

(37:6–13) Turning to a less noisy but nevertheless spectacular display of a different kind, Elihu points to the formation of ice and snow, inclement conditions that force animals to seek shelter. The image of thick clouds and lightning prompts him to discern a moral in all this movement. In his view, such phenomena convey divine intention, but one may choose among three possibilities: for correction, for his land, or for love. Although Andersen (1976: 266) emends land ('eres) to acceptance (rāṣā), the broad focus in this section on people and animals speaks against emending the text. Elihu views such grandeur as aimed at disciplining wayward humans, nurturing all God's creatures, and as a general display of love. Here, too, Elihu's understanding of divine power is more comforting than YHWH's own interpretation of the same phenomena. Strikingly, Elihu makes minimal use of mythical images in this description. By way of contrast, YHWH will squeeze every ounce of mythic symbolism from the same activity.

(37:14–24) The speech of Elihu ends where it began, but the rebuke of the four men has narrowed to one, providing a smooth transition to YHWH's rebuke of Job. Just as Elihu's earlier rhetorical questions and description of meteorological phenomena anticipate one type of YHWH's speeches, the kind of questions that make up vv. 15–18 prefigure the other type of questions YHWH hurls at the beleaguered Job. These queries ('Do you know?', 'Can you?'), together with the sarcastic 'Teach us', may be understood over against the earlier concept of God as teacher. Elihu prepares Job to face a barrage of questions from the heavenly instructor whose knowledge is perfect (tām, cf. Elihu's similar claim about his own knowledge in 36:4). Mocking Job's wish to confront God (v. 20) as an automatic death-wish, Elihu reminds Job that God is far brighter than the sun (cf. Sir 43:1–5), on which none can look without harm. One would think that such brilliance could not be hidden from humankind, but just as the sun has its own hours of concealment, so Shaddai sometimes resides outside human perception. God chooses when to be seen and moves from the north, the mythic abode of the gods (v. 22). Elihu's parting moralism poses a problem. The first colon is clear: 'Therefore mortals fear him'. The second colon reads literally: 'He does not look on any person of intelligence'. Andersen (1976: 268) emends the verb 'see' to a similar verb, 'fear' (rā'ā to yārē), understands the negative lō' as lū ('surely'), and takes 'every intelligent person' as the subject (cf. the LXX). This attractive interpretation yields a sense equivalent to that in 28:28, and has Elihu concluding on a high note: 'Surely all wise of heart fear him.'

YHWH's Two Speeches and Job's Responses (38:1–42:6)

The dramatic climax to the book of Job finally arrives, after an interminable delay, at least from Job's perspective. In a sense, his eagerly awaited audience before the Creator contains no surprise, for he expected to encounter power; still, the divine speeches do not measure up to advanced billing. Instead of resolving the matter of Job's innocence, they completely ignore the problem that has exercised Job and his four detractors for so long. Nor do the divine speeches from the whirlwind throw any light on the suffering of innocent persons. YHWH's entire discourse ignores humankind, except in mocking questions addressed to Job. Instead, YHWH expresses exhilaration over meteorological phenomena and animals that dwell outside the ordinary habitat of humans, with one notable exception, the warhorse. Most importantly, YHWH reserves pride of place for two partly mythological creatures, Behemoth and Leviathan. The two speeches (38:1–39:30; 40:1–41:34 (MT 26)) begin with narrative introductions (38:1; 40:6), present direct challenges to Job (38:2–3; 40:7–14), and examine specific themes already articulated in the rebuke of Job (the divine plan, 38:4–39:30; mišpāt, 40:15–41:34 (MT 26)). Each speech has two distinct parts. The first speech takes up cosmological and meteorological phenomena (38:4–38) and then discusses five pairs of animals (38:39–39:30). The second speech is limited to two special creatures. After each divine speech, Job responds (40:3–5—following a specific invitation from YHWH to answer in 40:1–2—and 42:1–6). The content of the divine speeches resembles the exquisite poetry of Isa 40:12–31 and Ps 104. Readers react variously to the divine speeches; some consider them sublime irrelevance, others think they succeed in forcing a self-centred Job to take a less egocentric view of the universe, and still others discern an unpleasant fact beyond the playful(?) mockery: a world devoid of morality (Tsevat 1966: 73–106). Perhaps the poet chose the wisest course, to leave Job's problem unresolved, for no answer would have sufficed, whether spoken by YHWH or anyone else. This ambivalence suggests that the dominant genre, disputation, served the poet well, for its strength lies in its ability to present alternative viewpoints.

(38:1–40:5) The Divine Plan of the Universe YHWH's 'ēšā (plan, counsel) includes the cosmos and the realm of wild animals. The initial speech focuses on these two topics, highlighting the argument with periodic questions directed at Job ('Who? Where? On what? Have you? Can you? Where?').

(38:1–3) v. 1 derives from the narrator, who has framed the discussion thus far and made important judgements about Job's character. That the name YHWH occurs here, as in the prose framework (1:1–2:13; 42:7–17), comes as something of a surprise, for it has been avoided in the poetic discourses except for the cliché in 12:9. This name, together with the information that YHWH speaks from a whirlwind (se'ārā), reintroduces the additional problems posed by the interaction between the Adversary and YHWH. Does disinterested piety exist? Will anyone serve God gratuitously, for nothing? Furthermore, the destructive power of the whirlwind, its capacity to renew Job's gut-wrenching memory of often dead children, does not bode well for him. Biblical theophanies usually bring solace along with the inevitable sense of awe; in this instance, form and content clash (Crenshaw 1992). Job has his wish, but not on his own conditions. vv. 2–3 make this fact painfully clear; YHWH rejects Job's reasoning as senseless, an obfuscation of the divine plan. YHWH has no intention of capitulating before human charges of injustice; instead, he will expect far more intellectual rigour from the accuser. The initial question, 'Who is this?' has the tone of 'How dare you?' Job has demanded that God tell him the specific wrongs he has committed (10:2; 13:23), promising an answer for each breach of trust (13:22). This stance quickly becomes meaningless in the type of universe described by the divine speeches. YHWH does not encourage Job to hold on to his conviction that a moral principle governs the world. In the light of this radically different world-view, the situation has suddenly reversed. Instead of YHWH being obligated to answer Job (13:2), Job must now come up with an appropriate response to new revelations about the nature of the universe. The image, 'Gird up your loins like a man', probably refers to tucking the ends of one's robe into a belt to permit quick movement.

(38:4–7) The creation of the earth is described as if it were a huge temple; YHWH designs and constructs the edifice, to the jubilation of interested onlookers (cf. Prov 8:22–31, where the emphasis falls on wisdom's presence and excited reaction). The allusion to heavenly singing echoes the liturgical dedication associated with the construction of an earthly temple. The dedication of YHWH's temple evoked singing from the morning stars and divine beings. The final phrase of 38:5, 'surely you know!', occurs elsewhere in the related sayings attributed to the foreign sage, Agur (Prov 30:1–14, specifically in v. 4).

(38:8–11) Once earth has been established, YHWH sets about to contain the boisterous sea, which represented primeval chaos in ancient Near-Eastern myths. Acting as midwife, YHWH assists in its birth and cares for the newborn infant. At the same time he provided clothing for the sea (clouds and darkness), YHWH determined its limits, here envisioned as doors imposed by divine command. The image is that of parental discipline, a prohibition aimed at the infant's well-being. Behind this language of bursting forth and containment lie numerous biblical and non-biblical stories about primordial chaos, but that hostile power is here circumscribed (cf. Ps 74:13–14; 89:10–13 (MT 9–14); Isa 51:9–10; Enuma Elish). The allusion to proud waves points beyond itself to an important topos in the second speech (see 40:10–14).

(38:12–15) YHWH's description of dawn's power to renew creation each day echoes Job's earlier curse (3:9) and complaint about reversals of dawn and darkness (24:13–17). In YHWH's graphic image, a personified dawn takes hold of earth's corners like a bedsheet and shakes out the wicked like bedbugs. Their natural fondness for darkness becomes a self-fulfilling curse, light being denied them and their strength being checked (38:15). In YHWH's world, the wicked have a place just like the good, but dawn limits their destructiveness.

(38:16–21) Turning to the remote regions of the universe, YHWH asks Job about the extent of his progress in reaching the deep recesses, whether above or below. The prophet Amos mentions similar remote areas, along with hiding-places closer to home and a little more distant (Am 9:1–4, Sheol, the depths of the sea, heaven, caves on Mt. Carmel, exile). Whereas Amos emphasizes YHWH's ease in following and punishing anyone who might flee his wrath, the divine speech in Job 38:16–21 concentrates on Job's inability to make such a journey. Twice in this brief section YHWH mocks Job (vv. 18, 21). YHWH reminds him that his life span is but a speck on the eons of time.

(38:22–4) At this point, YHWH shifts from cosmology to meteorology. At least two, possibly three, of these items cause harm (hail, east wind, lightning (?)). The use of the Hebrew word ʾor (light) instead of the usual word for lightning (but see 37:11), and the reference to snow, suggest that the speech alludes to two positive and two negative phenomena. Only in one instance does YHWH elaborate: hail is associated with warfare (cf. Ex 9:22–6; Josh 10:11). Late Jewish literature describes heavenly journeys during which angels disclose esoteric knowledge to favoured individuals (cf. 1 Enoch 41:4; 60:11–12 for a journey to heavenly storehouses).

(38:25–30) YHWH asks Job if he knows pertinent facts about the rain, dew, hoarfrost, and ice. According to the ancient Israelite cosmogony, the firmament was thought to resemble hard metal, hence the language of cutting channels for the rain and making openings through which lightning could pass. YHWH goes to some lengths to emphasize the divine prodigality where rain was involved (cf. Am 4:7–8). Twice YHWH states that rain fell where no human being lived, in the desert waste. vv. 28–9 use images of begetting and birthing; rain and dew are referred to the male act of procreation, whereas ice and hoarfrost are associated with the womb. The formation of ice is further described as water hiding on a rock (cf. Sir 43:20, ice is viewed as a lake's breastplate).

(38:31–3) Unlike the rest of the sections dealing with meteorological phenomena, this one has nothing directly to say about water. Perhaps it was thought that the movements of constellations affected what transpired on earth, even influencing rainfall. The identity of the constellations mentioned here is not certain; a case has been made for the following: Pleiades, Orion, Sirius, and Aldebaran (de Wilde 1981: 366–7). He notes that the last three in this list appear when Pleiades is 'bound,' i.e. hidden from sight.

(38:34–8) The chapter concludes with questions about Job's ability to summon the rain and command lightning during a severe drought. YHWH asks Job if he possesses the requisite skill to handle containers holding precious water, skins and jugs. Although the Hebrew of v. 36 is difficult, it may refer to the ibis and the cock; ancient Egyptians thought the ibis announced the Nile's rising and the cock predicted the approach of rain. Divine sarcasm in v. 35 stands out above the constant ridicule of the rhetorical questions; YHWH imagines the ludicrous: lightning bolts address Job obediently, 'Here we are.'

(38:39–39:30) Beginning in v. 39, YHWH calls Job's attention to wild animals: lion and raven, mountain goat and deer, wild ass and ox, ostrich and horse, hawk and vulture. Scenes from the ancient Near East depict kings hunting many of these wild creatures. Such royal sport contains an element of control; as lord of all creatures, the King of the Universe subjects wild animals to his wishes. Two irreconcilable symbolic gestures rest behind these descriptions; YHWH protects his kingdom from all threat posed by wild animals, and he rules over the animals' well-being. The rhetorical questions continue throughout these descriptions, with the exception of the reference to the ostrich, where one also finds God mentioned in the third person.

(38:39–41) For some unknown reason the lion is paired with the raven. The terror inspired by lions prompted the prophet Amos to speak of the divine calling to prophesy as an inescapable summons, just as the roar of a lion brings terror (Am 3:8). YHWH asks Job if he can provide food for hungry lions and ravens when they cry out.

(39:1–4) In this section YHWH recalls an earlier stage, that of gestation and birth. He asks whether or not Job could watch over these intimate moments in the lives of mountain goats and deer.

(39:5–12) YHWH turns to discuss two wild animals with domesticated equivalents. The wild ass, or onager, lived in the steppe or in salt flats; its preference for living away from human presence gave rise to proverbial sayings (e.g. 'Ishmael is a wild ass of a man'). The strength of the wild ox, possibly the extinct aurochs, was an occasion for marvel. The questions regarding this animal approach the ludicrous: will it serve you, sleep in your crib, submit to your ropes, and plow a straight furrow?

(39:13–18) Like the wild ass, which laughs at noisy cities (39:7), the ostrich laughs at the horse and its rider. YHWH claims to have withheld wisdom from the ostrich, with unfortunate consequences for its offspring. In perpetuating this misconception about ostriches, YHWH gives voice to popular lore at the time of the author. In this matter, as in all others, the author faced enormous difficulty the moment he decided to allow YHWH to become one participant among several in a debate.

(39:19–25) The horse is the only domesticated animal in this list of ten, but what a majestic creature! YHWH can hardly contain the excitement over the warhorse. Completely devoid of fear, the mighty horse laughs as it charges into the heat of battle. The language of a ‘warrior god’ serves to characterize this horse (might, thunder, majesty, terror; so Habel 1985: 547). The horse’s desire for battle rivals the drive for water or sex (Newsom 1996: 612).

(39:26–30) The final pair of animals, hawk and vulture, watch from above as a grim scene unfolds on the battlefields below. From their perspective, corpses provide food for them and their young. This section reaches a conclusion by harking back to the provision of food for the raven and its offspring. Beginning with the description of the horse in battle, YHWH views the conflict of armies from the perspective of the horse and the vulture, rather than from war’s effect on human history.

(40:1–5) YHWH demands that Job respond. The former critic acknowledges his lack of honour (social status) over against YHWH and gestures that he will be silent. The earlier boast that he will approach God like a prince gives way now to a numerical saying. The expected disputation has not materialized.

(40:6–42:6) The Mystery of Divine Governance The second divine speech resembles the earlier description of the warhorse, only with considerably more detail. YHWH boasts about two powerful creatures, Behemoth and Leviathan. Partly animal and partly a product of a mythical imagination, these two liminal beasts cavort on land and in water. YHWH’s world makes room for such beasts, indeed he glories in their freedom and strength. Although a threat to any mortal who dared to challenge them, they, too, enjoy YHWH’s protection.

(40:6–14) The narrator repeats the introduction from 38:1 and the command to Job from 38:3, while explicating the accusation of 38:2 (40:6–8). Finally, YHWH comes to the point of the debate as Job understands it. God is guilty, and Job is innocent. Instead of accepting this view of things, YHWH bristles at such impertinence. To silence Job, YHWH challenges him to perform specific tasks that fall to the deity. First, to manifest his splendour, then to overcome pride (gē’eh), and vanquish the wicked. If Job can successfully perform these duties, YHWH will concede. Does the poet permit YHWH to indulge in a minor confession that even the Creator finds these tasks something of a challenge? By focusing on pride as the fundamental form of rebellion, YHWH shifts the issue from the realm of legality to that of inner attitude. The question is no longer guilt or innocence, whether Job’s or YHWH’s, but a correct assessment of one’s place. In YHWH’s view, Job’s helplessness when confronted with something as basic as pride renders his charges against the Creator null and void. The divine judge, as it were, has issued a verdict. YHWH, the accused, is innocent.

(40:15–24) The task of overcoming pride becomes concrete in the two descriptions that follow. Both Behemoth and Leviathan demonstrate what it means to encounter pride near at hand. The word Behemoth is a plural form of the usual word for cattle; it may be a plural of majesty, representing cattle par excellence (cf. the plural form of wisdom, hokmōt, in Prov 9:1). The description of this animal suggests either the hippopotamus or the water-buffalo. In Egyptian myth, the god Horus hunts Seth in the form of a hippopotamus (Keel 1978: 138–9). Ugaritic myth mentions bull-like creatures, and the Mesopotamian Epic of Gilgamesh records an incident in which Gilgamesh and Enkidu slay a ‘Bull of Heaven’. The comparison of Behemoth’s zānāb in v. 17 to a cedar derives from the role of bulls in fertility religion; the word zānāb (tail) is a euphemism for penis. This powerful creature is called ‘the first of the ways of God’; the same thing is said of Wisdom in Prov 8:22. With slight repointing of the Hebrew consonants in v. 19b, it may be translated ‘made to dominate its companions’, in context preferable to ‘its maker approaches it with his sword’, for elsewhere the description of Behemoth has no suggestion of a struggle between gods and chaos.

(41:1–34 (MT 40:25–41:26)) In contrast to Behemoth, an animal in repose, Leviathan stands before Job as a creature of violence. YHWH begins the description by posing rhetorical questions to Job that illustrate the absurdity of attempting to control this terrifying creature, visualized as part crocodile and part mythical monster (41:1–12) (MT 40:25–41:4). The images for hunting and fishing are not entirely clear, but the practice of controlling captured slaves by inserting a cord through the nose or cheek is mentioned in the Bible (e.g. 2 Kings 19:28; Isa 37:29). The idea of this powerful creature begging for mercy, or submitting to girls’ play, or even providing meat for bartering tradesmen approaches the ridiculous. Even the gods dare not engage Leviathan in battle (41:9 (MT 41:1)). Although difficult, vv. 10–12 (MT 2–4) may represent God’s indication that none can withstand Leviathan, the creature’s arrogant boast, and God’s decision not to silence such boasting. Leviathan boasts only about his own domain, unlike Job.

(41:13–24 (MT 41:5–16)) The description of Leviathan begins with its skin, resembling an impenetrable coat of mail, and moves from this general panoramic view to a close-up of the face, neck, and chest. Power and beauty combine to make this creature godlike; it has eyes like the dawn which emit a beam of light, and breathes fire like a dragon. The association of fire and smoke with the gods (cf. Ps 18:8 (MT 9)) is a common feature of ancient lore.

(41:25–34 (MT 17–26)) Before this awesome creature the gods cower, especially when it surfaces so that its impenetrable shield becomes visible. Weapons of war bounce off like harmless straw (sword, spear, dart, javelin, arrows, iron and bronze clubs). Laughter links this powerful creature with the wild ass, ostrich, and warhorse, but Leviathan’s ability to distance itself in raging water, disappearing in its white wake, makes it king over all the proud. In 40:11b YHWH challenged Job to ‘look on all who are proud and abase them’; here Leviathan ‘looks on all that are proud’ (41:34 (MT 26)).

(42:1–6) The exact meaning of Job’s response to YHWH’s discourse is unclear, perhaps intentionally so. He certainly acknowledges YHWH’s power, but that is not new. Job also quotes YHWH twice (42:34, 4) and responds to each citation; he concedes that he has spoken without understanding, but his second concession is capable of several interpretations. In fact, even his statement in v. 5 is ambiguous. Does he say that his previous knowledge of YHWH was second-hand (obtained through a rumour) or that he has just now really listened, in obedience to the divine command to hear, so that he is prepared to understand the meaning of the theophany, a seeing also? The next verse has built-in problems. The verb māʾas requires an object but has none, as has occurred earlier in the book; likewise, wenīhamtī ʿal may carry opposite meanings. The range of interpretation includes, among others, the following possibilities: (1) 'Therefore I despise myself and repent upon dust and ashes'; (2) 'Therefore I retract my words and repent of dust and ashes'; (3) 'Therefore I reject and forswear dust and ashes'; (4) 'Therefore I retract my words and have changed my mind concerning dust and ashes'; and (5) 'Therefore I retract my words and I am comforted concerning dust and ashes'. The first translation implies humiliation; the second and third refer to symbols of mourning; and the fourth and fifth signify the human condition (Newsom 1996: 629). Some interpreters think the remark carries heavy irony; Job conceals his rebellion to the end. Others believe that he abandons his lawsuit, acknowledges his finitude, and finds comfort in the simple fact of having come before God and survived, his own stated condition for full vindication (cf. 13:16).

The Prose Epilogue (42:7–17)

The conclusion consists of two parts: YHWH's rebuke of Job's three friends (vv. 7–9) and the restoration of Job (vv. 10–17). Astonishingly YHWH commends Job for speaking correctly about him. It is difficult to imagine Job's rebellious speeches struck YHWH as truth, so interpreters assume a different story, one that must have been removed to make room for the poetic debates. Moreover, the restoration of Job comes as something entirely unexpected after the poetic debate, which shattered the concept of a moral order. One could argue that the truth behind Job's remarks was his honesty and that the restoration is an act of grace, but significant problems remain. This suggests that irony lies at the heart of the book. The happy ending uses the rare Hebrew word šibʿānā, which the LXX takes as a doubling, to specify the number of Job's sons. If this is correct, the narrative subtly indicts YHWH for criminal action, for which twofold restoration was mandated (cf. Ex 22:4, 7, 9 (MT 3, 6, 8)). YHWH's treatment of Job's friends on the basis of the retributive principle adds further irony. How can an arbitrary deity who treats Job in the manner described in the prose and poetry be the source of moral order? Furthermore, the happy ending confirms the truth of what Job's friends predicted. Repentance brought restoration in the end. Job completes his life surrounded by a wife, fourteen (or seven) sons, three beautiful daughters, and plenty. In favour with God and people, he lives two additional lifespans and sees four generations of descendants. Like the patriarchs, he dies 'old and full of days'. A moral order is alive and well, at least for the author of the prose. Or is it? Those who have read the poetic debate can no longer be content with such a simple answer to life's deepest enigma. Divine mystery remains, along with a human inability to comprehend the suffering of innocents. Job has succeeded, however, in that the Deus absconditus has become the Deus revelatus (the hidden God has become manifest).

18. Psalms

C. S. RODD

INTRODUCTION

A. Problems of Interpretation. 1. Interpretation of the Psalms is not simple. This will surprise many people, for some of the psalms are the best loved parts of the OT. Poetry in every language, however, is less easily understood than prose. The formalized structure, the use of rare words, the many metaphors and other figures of speech, all contribute to the difficulty. The problems are increased when the language is not one's mother tongue, and it is not possible to be immediately aware of overtones of emotion and fine nuances of meaning in words and phrases. With the Psalms these difficulties become even more severe because of the nature of the Hebrew language and the forms of Hebrew poetry.

2. If several English translations of the psalms are compared, differences, sometimes quite startling, will quickly be found, and the reader may well wonder how learned scholars can arrive at such different interpretations of the meaning. NRSV translates Ps 12:4: 'our lips are our own—who is our master?' (cf. GNB: 'We will say what we wish, and no one can stop us'), and REB: 'With words as our ally, who can master us?', but NIV marg., rather startlingly offers: 'our lips are our ploughshares'. Instead of NRSV's version of Ps 58:7: 'like grass let them be trodden down and wither', REB provides: 'may he aim his arrows, may they perish by them', and NIV: 'when they draw the bow, let their arrows be blunted'. In Ps 77:4 NRSV reads: 'You keep my eyelids from closing (cf. GNB's banal: 'You keep me awake all night'), while REB has 'My eyelids are tightly closed'.

3. Like English, Hebrew possesses no case endings. In prose the word order and a particle which marks the object of the verb normally make the sense entirely clear. Hebrew poetry, on the other hand, is highly compressed. The poetic lines are short. The sign of the object is rarely used. Word order is varied. It means that often the three or four words in a line can be construed in more than one way. In Ps 143:10 the problem lies in knowing what is the relation between 'your spirit' and 'good', and what is the subject of the verb 'leads me'. If the Hebrew accents are followed the meaning is probably as RV: 'Thy spirit is good; lead me . . .'. To take the words as 'Your good spirit' involves unusual Hebrew syntax. The verb can either be the third person, 'she will lead (she leads, may she lead) me', or second person, 'lead me'. Hence NRSV translates the phrase: 'Let your good spirit lead me on a level path' (following a few Heb. MSS in the last word rather than the main MT tradition), REB has: 'by your gracious spirit guide me on level ground', and GNB offers the paraphrase: 'Be good to me, and guide me on a safe path'.

4. The meaning of some of the words which the poets use is occasionally uncertain. There are three aspects of this. First, some words appear only once in the whole Hebrew Bible. When this occurs it is not possible to compare different contexts in order to gain an insight into the exact meaning of the word, and recourse has to be had to such things as similar words in other related languages (Akkadian, Aramaic, Ugaritic, and Arabic are the main ones), how the ancient versions understood the word, and the meaning in Jewish tradition. In Ps 58:8 NRSV offers 'snail' for a word that is found only here in the OT, but REB derives it differently as meaning 'an abortive birth', which is certainly a better parallel to 'stillborn child' in the second line. Secondly, there are a large number of homonyms in Hebrew (words in the same form but with different meaning). Scholars are sometimes not sure which of two or more possible words was intended by the poet. Sometimes, indeed, a rare word may be the same in form and sound as a fairly common word, and the common word has driven out the rarer one. Only careful study of the related languages and the versions enables scholars to recover the lost meaning. The word which NRSV translates 'company' in Ps 24:6 is the normal word for 'generation'. REB takes it to be a homonym with the meaning 'fortune'. One reason why NEB contains so many novel translations is that a large number of new meanings of Hebrew words was adopted, many of them rejected by REB. Thirdly, no word has exactly the same meaning in any two languages. At most there is only a large area of overlap. This means that often a range of English words may be needed to express what the poet intended, and it is impossible to be absolutely certain that the correct one has been selected. When the poet uses the verb 'to judge', is the sense to pass a sentence on someone who is accused, or to vindicate him? NRSV translates it by 'vindicate' in three psalms (Ps 26:1; 35:24; 43:1), and in Ps 72:4 has 'may he defend the cause of the poor', but elsewhere it sticks to 'judge', 'pass judgment', 'do justice' or 'try'. The other modern versions offer a somewhat wider range of translations. In each case the translators had to decide what the nuances of the verb were in each context, and they may have been right or they may have been wrong. 'Righteousness' is even more difficult, since it is almost entirely a churchy word in modern English. Although NRSV retains 'righteousness' in many places, REB prefers 'justice' and NJB has a number of synonyms, including 'right' and 'upright'. Sometimes, however, the Hebrew word has a bias in favour of the helpless (Snaith 1944: 68–74; in post-biblical Hebrew it came to mean 'almsgiving, benevolence'), and translators have tried to capture this. Hence Ps 65:5: 'deliverance' and 35:28: 'saving power', REB. Moreover, the meaning of the word also approached ideas of victory (cf. Isa 41:2), and NRSV translates it in this way in Ps 48:10 (REB adds Ps 65:5; 118:19; 119:123). Further the familiar 'sacrifices of righteousness' (Ps 4:5; 51:21) probably does not mean offering righteousness as a sacrifice and in place of an animal offering but sacrifices offered with the correct ritual or in the right spirit, or even such sacrifices as are YHWH's due, as most modern translations recognize. And the overtones of goodness must probably go from Ps 23:3: the 'paths of righteousness' are simply 'right paths' by which the shepherd leads the flock to pasture.

5. The Psalms have been copied and recopied over the centuries, and although very great care was taken by the later Jewish scribes (the Masoretes) to ensure the absolute accuracy of the scrolls, errors had crept in earlier. Such textual corruptions sometimes make it impossible to determine the poet's meaning, and occasionally the Hebrew defies translation. At one time scholars resorted to wide-scale emendation of the text. Today this is much rarer, and normally support from the ancient versions is demanded for any changes that are made. Few would deny that some emendation is necessary, however, but all such changes introduce some uncertainty as to the poet's meaning. A stock example is Ps 49:11, where all modern translations present the sense of NRSV: 'Their graves are their homes for ever' (transposing two Heb. letters), instead of the AV 'Their inward thought is, that their houses shall continue for ever' (the italics reveal how much had to be read into that translation). Usually the Eng. versions inform the reader that the text has been altered, and supply the support from the ancient versions, but not always (cf. Ps 27:8, where NRSV makes several changes to produce: "'Come," my heart says, "seek his face"', without any footnote; the Heb. appears to be lit. 'To you (masc. sing.) my heart said, "Seek (masc. plur.) my face"'). Some passages are so corrupt that it is impossible to obtain any sense without emendation, and even then the meaning is doubtful.

6. Hebrew letters express only the consonants: the vowels are represented by various signs placed round or in the letters, and these vowel signs came in fairly late in the history of the text, although they express the traditional pronunciation. It is not always certain that the vowels were those intended by the poet, and alternative vowels can often produce a better sense. NRSV frequently makes such changes without drawing attention in a footnote and GNB hardly ever tells the reader.

7. An even greater difficulty in many of the psalms is the tense of the verbs. English possesses a very large number of tenses, simple and compound, most of which indicate the time when the action takes place, though some point to additional features, such as whether the action occurs only once at a single point in time or is continuous. Even in English, however, tenses do not always express the time or the aspect of the action that they appear to. The verb in 'I am going to Scotland on Wednesday' is present continuous, but means something like, 'Next Wednesday I shall go to Scotland' (or even 'I intend to go'). Hebrew possesses only two main forms of the verb, which primarily express aspect rather than tense. The verbal system is highly complex, however, and no one would profess to understand it completely. In prose the context makes the sense relatively clear. This is far from the case in poetry. One of the most striking differences between the English translations of the Psalms is the way the verbs are translated. Is Ps 63:9–10 an expression of the psalmist's confidence in future destruction of his enemies, or a prayer (contrast NRSV/NIV and REB/NJB)? Should the verbs in 67:7 be past (NRSV/REB/NJB), future (NIV), or is the verse perhaps a prayer? Is Ps 120:1–2 a description of a prayer for divine help in the past (so REB), or part of the present petition (as NRSV/NIV)? On one view of the tenses Ps 8:5–6 should be translated: 'But you have made him a little less than God, | and you will crown him with glory and honor | You will make him master over the work of your hands; | you have set everything beneath his feet' (Craigie 1983: 105).

This is possibly the most serious difficulty in interpreting the psalms. (For a brief account of the issues see ibid. 110–12.)

8. But no translation exists on its own. The translation is linked inextricably with the way the translator understands the whole background of the psalm—when it was written, how and where it was sung, whether it formed part of a cultic activity or was the work of a solitary poet, who it is written for or about, and many other questions. There is never a translation that is not at the same time an interpretation, and a large part of that interpretation depends upon the wider view of the place of the psalm in the life of ancient Israel. Indeed, translation and understanding of the entire religious life of ancient Israel are intertwined so intimately that they cannot be separated.

9. One further feature of modern translations should be noted. Every translation loses part of the richness of the original, but increasingly modern translations have sloughed off vital details. Hebrew verbs express gender as well as number and person. No English translation can represent this for the second person, since 'you' is used for both singular and plural, masculine and feminine, and this disguises important distinctions and changes of person in the Hebrew Psalms. Further, the attempts by NJB, NRSV, REB, and NIV Inclusive Language Edition to avoid sexist language have introduced a wide range of paraphrases which remove the reader even further from the original poet. Thus masculine singulars are very frequently translated by plurals, and even by 'we' or even more extensive modifications. Sometimes it is of little moment, as in Ps 1 where 'those' replaces 'the man', although it obscures the patriarchal society in which the psalm was written. Often, however, such rewriting distorts the original psalm. Most people today accept that women are fully equal to men, and that language can reflect and reinforce a male domination. What is more contentious is whether the Scriptures should be rewritten in order to eliminate such language. Ancient Israelite society was plainly patriarchal, despite the presence of some forceful women. In this it was even more extreme than some of the surrounding countries. For example, all the other law codes from the ancient Middle East that have been discovered include arrangements for inheritance of the property by widows. In ancient Israel widows could not inherit property from their husbands, and daughters could only do so if there were no sons. Within the Psalter, in Ps 45 the king's bride is told that her husband is her master and she must bow down to him. The masculine language found in all the psalms is a feature of that society. Sometimes, of course, male terms are used to include both men and women, as was common in English until recently, and in such places modern English requires the removal of purely masculine forms. On the other hand, most of the references to men were intended to apply to men alone, and a proper understanding of the psalms in their original context requires the retention of male terms there (cf. Gerstenberger 1988: 32). The use of patriarchal texts in modern worship is a quite different issue, and cannot be discussed here, vitally important though it is.

B. History of Interpretation. 1. Over the centuries the way Christians have used, studied, and interpreted the Psalms has changed.

2. Prophecy. The first Christians regarded the Psalms as prophecy, and searched for phrases and verses which foretold events in the life of Jesus. This can be seen in the NT itself. Indeed, some scholars have suggested that the passion narrative has been moulded by reference particularly to Ps 22 and 69. In the second century Justin Martyr argued for the truth of the Christian faith on the grounds that the Messiah had been foretold many centuries before the time of Jesus, and this interpretation persisted up to modern times. It is reflected in the description of several Psalms as 'messianic' (e.g. Ps 2; 101; 110).

3. Allegory and Typology. A somewhat modified form of this view of the relation between the OT and the NT is found in allegorical interpretations and typology. Allegory need not be totally uncontrolled, and rules were developed about the various levels of meaning of the text: literal, moral, allegorical, and anagogical (see Ps 114). Often the Psalms retained their spiritual value for those Christians who sang them because they were allegorized. Typology became another method for relating the Testaments, and again, OT figures and ideas were perceived as types of later Christian characters and thought.

4. Historical Interpretation. These approaches existed alongside historical interpretations, and one of the 'senses' which Scripture was believed to possess was the historical, even when greater value was placed upon the other interpretations. Attempts at providing historical occasions for the creation of the psalms, often in the life of David, can be seen in the headings of many of them. It is probable that these are not original but were added later (the LXX contains headings which are absent from the Heb., or additions to headings, in some forty-four psalms: e.g. Ps 70 (MT 71): 'Of (by) David, of the sons of Jonadab, and of the first who were taken captive', and Ps 143 (MT 144): 'Of (by) David, concerning Goliath'). Some of the traditions found in these titles are echoed in the Mishnah (e.g. M. Tamid 7.4 sets out the seven psalms which 'the levites used to sing in the Temple' on each of the days of the week: Ps 24 (LXX 'A psalm of (by) David on the first day of the week'); 48 (LXX 'on the second day of the week'); 82; 94 (LXX 'on the fourth day of the week'); 81 (the Old Latin has 'fifth day of the week'); 93 (LXX 'on the day before the sabbath when the earth was inhabited; praise of a song of David'); 92, where the MT has 'A Song for the Sabbath Day', showing that they are genuinely Jewish and not peculiar to the Old Greek version. When, according to Mark, Jesus quoted Ps 110 (Mk 12:36), both he and his hearers accepted that David had written the psalm and that its meaning was to be found in that context. The historical interpretation came to the forefront of psalm study from the time of the Enlightenment, and much modern study has been devoted to determining the date and authorship of individual psalms. Conservative scholars presented arguments for Davidic authorship, while liberal ones proposed a wide range of datings, some as late as the second century BCE.

5. Form Criticism. It is now generally agreed that it is possible to determine the historical origin of very few of the psalms because of the lack of evidence—who, after all, would be able to discover when and by whom a nineteenth-century hymn was written simply from the hymn itself? A new approach was needed, and a decisive step in the study of the psalms came with the work of Hermann Gunkel (Gunkel and Begrich 1933), who is generally regarded as the father of form criticism. First classifying the psalms according to their type or genre, he then looked for the ways the various types of psalm were used in ancient Israel (see § below for the main types of psalm). Gunkel argued that the original psalms were hymns that were sung in Israelite worship, although he regarded the psalms in the OT as written by poets in imitation of these earlier psalms. Later scholars have tended to limit their attention to the formal structure of the psalms, but Gunkel himself had a sensitive appreciation of Hebrew literature and paid attention to such features as mood and content as well.

6. The Cult. The next important stage in the interpretation of the psalms was taken by Sigmund Mowinckel (1921–4), who argued that the OT psalms were in fact cultic hymns, and on this basis set out to reconstruct the festivals at which they were sung. But as with the earlier approaches, the evidence has proved insufficient for this to be carried through convincingly. It is highly probable that many, perhaps most, of the psalms belong to Israelite worship rather than being compositions of individual 'romantic' poets, but the rubrics are lacking, and the other books of the OT provide few glimpses of how they were used. The historical books might be thought to favour a historical interpretation (see e.g. 2 Sam 22, where Ps 18 has been inserted into the text, and the catena of psalm quotations in 1 Chr 16). On this view the titles provide a context within which the psalms can be read, while the psalms offer personal responses by David that can be taken into the narratives, somewhat like the speeches that Greek historians inserted into their narratives.

7. Literary Approaches. In the light of the failure of these attempts to interpret the psalms within historical Israel, it is no surprise that some scholars today, influenced by movements in general literary studies, have virtually abandoned the quest and have treated each individual psalm as a literary artefact in its own right. The particular interpretation varies, whether structuralism, rhetorical criticism, reader-response criticism, deconstruction, or other methods that have become fashionable. Emphasis has been placed upon the structure and wording of the psalms, and often little attention is paid to the cultural context of ancient Israel. Jonathan Magonet (1994) has pointed out that such an approach has antecedents in rabbinic study. (For a study of Ps 18 which incorporates textual, form-critical, rhetorical, and reader-oriented approaches see Berry (1993); cf. Mays's similar exposition of Ps 3 (Mays, Petersen, and Richards 1995: 147–56).)

8. Canonical Criticism. In stark contrast to the atomistic approach of much literary analysis of the psalms, some scholars have emphasized that the only reason why the OT has been preserved and is still read and studied is because it is canonical Scripture. No interpretation, therefore, is valid which does not take this into account. The emphasis is placed upon the completed book of Psalms and their use in other parts of the Bible, including the NT. Indeed, the key to the interpretation of any passage is found in this 'final form' of the writing. Brevard S. Childs (1979: 504–23) stresses this. He argues that the placing of Ps 1 as the introduction to the Psalter leads to the psalms, which originally were human songs and prayers, being taken as God's word itself. The compilation of psalms (e.g. in Ps 108) is a factor in their movement from a cultic setting towards their apprehension as sacred Scripture. Similarly the fact that the royal psalms are scattered throughout the Psalter, with special prominence given to Ps 2, is a transformation of cultic psalms into messianic ones, and the increased eschatological emphasis in many of the psalms is another mark of this changing theology. Most interestingly, he finds in the relating of thirteen psalms to specific incidents in the life of David a shift of emphasis from the original cultic function to understanding the king as a human being who has the same troubles and joys as ordinary people, thus enabling all kinds of people to relate to them. (For an assessment of Childs's work see Noble 1995.)

9. Each of these stages has importance for an appreciation of the psalms.

10. Prophecy. While most Christians outside the conservative evangelical, pentecostal, and charismatic groups no longer accept that the truth of their religion is confirmed by OT predictions of incidents in the life of Jesus, they accept that the God of the NT is the same God as that of the OT. It might be expected, therefore, that there will be a certain congruence between the Testaments. This is what lies behind typology. Moreover, whenever Christians spiritualize such features of the psalms as the condemnation of enemies or the calls for support in war, features which have now become morally unacceptable, this is akin to the earlier allegorizing, though now no longer with an explicit raison d'être. It might even be argued that without such spiritualizing it would be impossible to continue to use the psalms within Christian worship. Many of the hymns of Watts and the Wesleys explicitly reinterpret the psalms in a Christian sense, as, for example, Charles Wesley's fine hymn based on Ps 45, 'My heart is full of Christ, and longs | Its glorious matter to declare'.

11. Cultural Setting. Everyone today is strongly influenced by the historical awareness which is one of the major gifts of the Enlightenment. Today it is often claimed that the meaning of a historical text cannot be limited to the meaning which its author intended and some would go further and argue that the author's intentions are both impossible to discover and irrelevant to the meaning. While the author's meaning may seem central to the understanding of some kinds of literature, with the psalms authorship is of less importance, and it is no devastating loss if we are unable to identify the writers. What is important is that the cultural setting is recognized. Here historical criticism and form criticism meet. Both direct the reader's attention to the original setting of the psalms, although travelling to that point by different routes. It is now fully recognized that simply to repeat words in a different historical situation (and twenty-first century Europe or North America is far removed from ancient Israel) is to say something vastly different from the psalmist's original meaning. The modern congregation comes to the Psalter with its own presuppositions, attitudes, memories, and emotions, and the psalm, sung to Anglican or Gregorian chant, in the Gelineau version or as a metrical psalm, will resonate in very different ways from those which the Israelite attending worship at the Jerusalem temple experienced. Historical criticism, therefore, is vital, not because it alone provides the key to the 'real' meaning of the text, but because it provides another way of reading the psalms and enables modern readers to move to and fro between the world of ancient Israel and the culture of today, expanding their vision of God.

12. Modern Translations. Modern, and modernizing, translations of the Psalms become a hindrance here, for they give the impression to the reader that the words of the psalms are immediately related to present Western society. The removal of much masculine-oriented language from NRSV tends to obscure the fact that ancient Israel was a patriarchal society, and the paraphrasing interpretation of GNB destroys much of the poetic imagery. These translations may be more accessible to the hearers, but they imprison them in a twenty-first-century world, when what the Psalms (and indeed all Scripture) should be doing, among other things, is to open up spiritual and moral dimensions of life which the modern world has crippled or destroyed.

13. Literary Approaches. What then of literary criticism? The presence of eight acrostic psalms within the Psalter (E.14) is an indication that some, perhaps all, of the psalms are self-conscious poetic creations. Certainly an awareness of the skill of the poet will add to our appreciation of the psalms. There is, nevertheless, a danger that modern conventions and fashions will misrepresent the intentions and art of the poet. Once again we are faced with the 'then' and the 'now', and every literary approach needs to be tempered with a sense of the historical.

14. It will be seen that the demands made upon the commentary writer are immense. Certainly it is quite impossible to include all the methods that have been outlined. No single approach applied to all the psalms will be attempted here, although some emphasis will be placed upon genre and setting, since only if we know what kind of text we are reading can we grasp its meaning. In this commentary each psalm will be discussed on its own, using whatever approach appears to offer the greatest insight into its meaning, but always with an awareness that we are reading poetry written in a foreign language and coming from an alien culture and a distant time.

C. The Titles of the Psalms and Selâ. 1. Although the titles of the psalms are not part of the original poems, they are important as revealing some of the earliest interpretations, and NEB was mistaken in omitting them (REB has put them back; GNB includes abbreviated, and misleading, forms of the titles as footnotes). The main details supplied by the titles are names (David, Solomon, Moses, Asaph, the sons of Korah, Heman the Ezrahite, Ethan the Ezrahite, and perhaps Jeduthun), situations in the life of David, descriptions of the type of psalm (psalm, song, prayer, song of ascents, maskil, miktām), an expression of unknown meaning which NRSV translates as 'To the leader', and a number of varied words and phrases which are usually thought to be the titles of the tunes to which the psalms were sung (e.g. 'the Dove of the Dawn'), or the accompanying instruments (e.g. 'with stringed instruments', 'for the flutes') (Anderson 1972: 43–51, Mowinckel 1962: ch. 23, and Kraus 1988: i. 21–32 provide good surveys).

2. The titles probably have little historical value. The phrase translated 'of David' (lēdāwid) almost certainly intends authorship, despite claims that it means 'on behalf of' or 'for' David (i.e. dedicated to the Davidic king at the time) or 'belonging to the Davidic collection of songs'. (For the tradition of David as a musician and author of psalms see 1 Sam 16:15–16, 23; 2 Sam 11:17–27; 3:33; 6:5; 23:1–7; 1 Chr 23:5; Am 6:5; Sir 47:8–10; 2 Sam 22 ascribes Ps 18 to David; in the Mishnah a casual reference speaks of the 'Book of Psalms by David' (m. 'Abot 6.9), and the same belief is reflected in Mk 12:36–7; Rom 4:6–7; 11:9–10. According to 1 Chr 6:39; 15:17; 16:5–6; 2 Chr 5:12 Asaph was one of David's chief musicians, a further example of the Davidic tradition.) Since, however, nothing is known about David outside the OT, there is no way of determining whether he wrote any of the psalms, and, indeed, the date of most of them is unknown. The editors of the Psalter appear to have searched the books of Samuel and Chronicles for suitable occasions in which to place the psalms, and added such references to thirteen psalms (Ps 3; 7; 18; 34; 51; 52; 54; 56; 57; 59; 60; 63; 142: only one title (Ps 7) cannot be readily linked with the biblical narratives).

3. Within the length of this commentary it is not possible to comment on all the terms found in the titles, but the following brief notes discuss some of them. Where a word or phrase occurs only once it is noted in the commentary.

4. Psalm (mizmôr), found in the titles of fifty-seven psalms, occurs only in the Psalter and probably denotes a religious song accompanied by harp or other stringed instruments. The LXX translated it by psalmos, hence our word.

5. Song (šîr) (Ps 18; 30; 46; 48; 65–8; 75; 76; 83; 87; 88; 92; 108) is the normal word for religious and secular songs. It occurs with 'psalm' in all but two psalms (Ps 18; 46), and the difference between the two terms is unknown.

6. Prayer (tēpillā) (Ps 17; 86; 90; 102; 142; in the rubric in Ps 72:20, and in Hab 3:1) is the normal Hebrew word for prayer. It has been suggested that it denotes laments, although there are far more laments in the Psalter than those with the title.

7. Miktām is found in Ps 16; 56–60. The meaning is unknown. The LXX and Targum translated it by 'pillar inscription'. Luther's 'golden jewel' linked it with the Hebrew word for gold. Mowinckel (1962: ii. 209) connected it with atonement.

8. Maskil occurs in the titles of Ps 32; 42; 44; 45; 52–5; 74; 78; 88; 89; 142, and Ps 47:7; 2 Chr 30:22). The Hebrew root from which this word comes is usually taken to mean 'to have insight, to teach, to prosper', and hence 'efficacious song', 'didactic song', 'meditation', 'artistic song' have been suggested.

9. A Song of Ascents (šîr hamma'ālôt). This is usually held to indicate a pilgrim psalm, but some think (improbably) that it refers to their 'step-like' structure, others connect the fifteen psalms with a reference in the Mishnah (m. Middot 2.5) to the fifteen steps from the court of the women to the court of Israel in the temple and infer that this is where they were sung, although the Mishnah does not say that they were, and others again take it to refer more generally to festal processions.

10. For the leader (lammēnaṣṣēah) is the NRSV and REB translation of a term of very uncertain meaning, found in the titles of fifty-five psalms and also in Hab 3:19. The LXX appears not to have known what it meant and rendered it 'To (for) the end'. The Targum offers 'for praise'. Mowinckel (1962: ii. 212) proposed 'for the merciful disposition (of YHWH)', 'to dispose YHWH for mercy', or even 'for homage (to YHWH)', linking the word with a verb in 1 Chr 15:21, but the meaning there is probably 'to make music'. Possibly the meaning is 'for musical performance'. RSV has 'To the Choirmaster', as does NJB, and NIV's 'For the director of music' gives the same sense, all linking the word with a verb meaning 'to excel, lead, be at the head, direct' in 1 Chr 23:4 and 2 Chr 2:2. The meaning is really unknown.

11. To (according to) Jeduthun (lîdūtûn) (Ps 39; 62; 77). Jeduthun is the name of one of David's musicians in 1 Chr 16:41, and while it may refer to him in the psalm titles it has also been proposed that the word signifies 'confession'.

12. For the memorial offering (lēhazkîr) (Ps 38 and 70). Mowinckel (1962: ii. 212) thinks the psalm is to 'remind' YHWH of the psalmist's distress, and it may be linked with the memorial sacrifice (Lev 2:2; 5:12).

13. With stringed instruments (binēginôt) (Ps 4; 6; 54; 55; 61; 67; 76) refers to accompaniment with harp and lyre, probably in contrast with other noisier instruments.

14. The Gittith ('al-haggittî) (Ps 8; 81; 84) is of unknown meaning. The LXX translated it 'for the wine-press'. Other suggestions are 'a vintage melody', 'according to the Gittite melody', 'with the Gittite lyre', and even that it refers to Obededom, the Gittite (2 Sam 6:10–11), and hence is related to a procession with the ark.

15. Do not destroy ('al-tašhēt) (Ps 57–9; 75). Mowinckel (1962: ii. 214) notes that all four psalms contain references to pagan oppressors and suggests that it may refer to some rite which the psalm accompanied. It is often supposed that it is the name of a tune (cf. Isa 65:8).

16. Selâ is found within the body of thirty-nine psalms, seventy-one times in the MT and ninety-two in the LXX (details in Kraus 1988: 29). Outside the Psalter it is found in the psalm in Hab 3:3, 9, 13. The meaning is totally unknown, but various guesses have been made. Aquila, Jerome, and the Targum translated it 'always, for ever', and the LXX diapsalma (presumably, 'interlude'). If it comes from a verb meaning 'to lift up', it might refer to 'lifting up' one's voice ('sing louder'), 'lifting up' one's eyes ('repeat the verse'), or 'lifting up' the music (with loud instruments or an instrumental interlude). An alternative derivation suggests that it indicated points when the congregation fell prostrate in worship. Kraus (1988: 28) draws attention to the LXX translation of Ps 9:16, 'song of diapsalma', which seems to suggest the 'singing' or 'sounding' of the 'interlude' and may point to a musical intermezzo or a doxology.

D. The Development of the Psalter. 1. While the titles provide little historical information about the individual psalms, they are important evidence for the development of the Psalter as a collection.

2. The division into five books (Ps 1–41; 42–72; 73–89; 90–106; 107–50) could hardly have been made before the collection was complete. If, however, Ps 41:13, 72:18–19, 89:52, and 106:48 are doxologies inserted when the arrangement was made, this must have been before the time of the Chronicler, since 1 Chr 16:36 includes Ps 106:48 in the quotation of part of that psalm.

3. Before this fivefold arrangement was made (possibly in imitation of the five books of the Torah) some smaller collections of psalms were already in existence. The most obvious of these is Ps 120–34 which all have the title 'A Song of Ascents'.

4. Eleven psalms are attributed to 'the sons of Korah' (Ps 42; 44–9; 84–5; 87–8) and twelve to Asaph (Ps 50; 73–83), and these were probably separate collections. Why some of the psalms became separated in the completed Psalter is unknown. 'The prayers of David son of Jesse are ended' (Ps 72:20) seems to have stood at the end of a collection of Davidic psalms. In the present form of the Psalter the psalms ascribed to him are not so neatly arranged. 'Of David' is found in the MT titles of Ps 3–9; 11–32; 34–41; 51–65; 68–70; 86; 101; 103; 108–10; 122; 124; 131; 133; 138–45, and in a further fifteen psalms in the LXX. It is commonly supposed that two main collections of Davidic psalms consisted of Ps 3–41 (probably without 33), and 51–71 (possibly even including the Solomonic Ps 72). Whether all the Davidic psalms originally formed a single collection is uncertain, and the titles of these psalms after Ps 72 may be due to the tendency to ascribe ever more psalms to David. There seem to have been smaller collections or groupings of maskil and miktām Davidic psalms in Ps 52–5; 56–60. Cutting across these collections, however, are Ps 42–83, the so-called Elohistic Psalter, in which YHWH is found relatively seldom and the Hebrew word for God ('ēlōhīm) much more frequently, almost certainly due to the work of an editor (cf. Ps 53 where 'God' has been substituted for the YHWH of Ps 14, and the curious 'I am God, your God' in Ps 50:7, where the original would appear to have been 'YHWH, your God').

5. Whether it is possible to discover the principles upon which the Psalter was put together is doubtful. Delitzsch (1887) suggested that catchwords (e.g. 'shall never (not) be moved', Ps 15; 16), similarities of theme (Ps 50; 51 both think sacrifice of little value; Ps 12–14 are lamentations, general—personal—general), psalm pairs (e.g. Ps 3–4, morning and evening prayers), or the grouping of similar psalms, such as the 'Hallelujah' psalms (Ps 111–13; 146–50), could explain the ordering, but this is a piecemeal approach. The psalms in praise of the law (Ps 1; 19; 119) have been seen as markers of one stage in the growth of the Psalter. Wilson (1985) points to the presence of royal psalms at the main divisions of the first three books (Ps 2; 72; 89), and traces an overarching scheme of YHWH's covenant with David (bks. 1–2), the failure of that covenant (bk. 3), and the answer to this in the kingship of YHWH (bk. 4), with book 5 as an answer to the plea for restoration from exile in Ps 106:47. To combine form-critical criteria with ancient Israelite intentions appears rash. (For details of other attempts to identify small collections within the Psalter and to account for its growth see Day 1990: 109–22; Gillingham 1994: 232–55, McCann 1993b.)

6. It must be concluded that it is impossible to trace the development of the Psalter, although there is clear evidence of smaller collections that may have existed independently at some stage, and there is a general movement from laments, which dominate the first two books, to praises at the end of the Psalter. Such ignorance is not unexpected, given the long period of use and reuse of the psalms and the wide range of situations in which they have been sung and prayed.

E. Classifying the Psalms. 1. Despite some scepticism as to the value of classifying the psalms and then attempting to determine the original situations in which the types of psalm were sung (cf. Rogerson and McKay 1977: 8), no study can neglect this approach. The evidence is quite insufficient for us to discover the original historical contexts (even such an apparently clear reference to the Exile as Ps 137 is not unambiguous), and similarities in structure, content, and mood between groups of psalms immediately suggests that classifying by the type of psalm may be a valuable way of treating them. This does not mean that there were any rigid structures to which each type of psalm had to conform, and those textbooks which set out the supposed forms are liable to mislead. Few psalms manifest the ideal structure of the types which scholars have proposed. Gunkel was right to adopt a more flexible approach than some later advocates of form criticism. Moreover the types are not rigidly distinct, and it is less than helpful to suppose that any development from 'pure' forms to 'mixed' ones occurred. In this commentary the types will be treated very generally.

2. Laments of an Individual. These form the largest class of psalms. Similarities with the Laments of the Community (E. 6) have led some scholars to group both types as Laments or Complaints. The worshipper is in distress and calls on God for deliverance. Usually the suffering is described in very general terms, and often different kinds of trouble are included in the same psalm. Illness (e.g. Ps 6; 22; 38; 88) and attacks from enemies (e.g. Ps 3; 5; 17; 109) are frequently mentioned. Who the 'enemies' are is uncertain (see G.2). It has been suggested that some of these laments were prayers by those who had been unjustly accused of some offence, were appealing to a higher court, perhaps the temple priesthood, or were awaiting an ordeal to test their guilt (e.g. 7; 26; 27). In some of these psalms the tone changes dramatically towards the end, and the psalmist affirms his confidence that God has heard his prayer (e.g. Ps 6:8–10; 13:5–6; 31:19–24). This has been interpreted in four ways: (1) it may be that a fragment from a different psalm has been attached to the lament; (2) it may be the prayer of the psalmist after his prayer has been answered; (3) it may reflect the alternating moods of the sufferer; or (4) between the two parts of the psalm the psalmist may have received a sign that his prayer had been heard, perhaps through an oracle by a cult prophet, or some indication that his sacrifice had been accepted by God. In some psalms the note of confidence is extended so greatly that the psalm may really be a prayer of thanksgiving, in which the psalmist recalls his suffering and his earlier prayer. Confidence dominates a few psalms (e.g. Ps 11; 23; 62; 131), and here it hardly seems correct to count them as laments: some treat them as a separate type of psalm.

3. Thanksgiving by an Individual. When the psalmist received an answer from God or was delivered from his distress, he would offer thanksgiving, often accompanied by a sacrifice. Such psalms sometimes contain an account of the distress from which the psalmist has been saved, and it is often not easy to determine to which of the two types a psalm belongs (e.g. Ps 30; 32; 34; 66; 116).

4. Hymns. These normally consist of a call to praise YHWH, followed by an account of the reasons for worshipping him, usually introduced by 'for' or 'because' (e.g. Ps 29; 33; 100; 103; 104; 117; 145–50). There seems no need to distinguish between those psalms which describe YHWH's character (e.g. Ps 33:4–5) and those which relate his actions in creating the world or saving his people Israel (e.g. Ps 136:4–25). The hymn often ends with a renewed call to offer praise. Some of these hymns have similarities with Canaanite religion (see Ps 29) or Egyptian hymns (see Ps 104).

5. Within this general class two groups of psalms have been singled out, and have led to striking proposals for reconstructing the worship of the Jerusalem temple:

a. Songs of Zion, where the main theme is YHWH's deliverance and protection of Jerusalem (Ps 46; 48; 76; 84; 87; 122). Opinion is divided over whether these psalms belong to the Jerusalem cult and express a faith in divine protection of the city, possibly as part of a cultic drama, or were occasioned by a spectacular deliverance of the city, perhaps at the time of Sennacherib's siege (2 Kings 18:13–19:36; Isa 36–7).

b. Enthronement Psalms which are characterized by a phrase which has been variously translated as 'The LORD is king', 'The LORD reigns', 'The LORD reigns (now)', and 'The LORD has become king' (Ps 47; 93; 96–9). The different translations reflect different interpretations. Some follow Mowinkel in positing a great New Year Festival in the autumn as part of the Feast of Tabernacles (Ingathering) in which the kingship of YHWH was celebrated and he was enthroned anew. Others question whether such a festival existed in Israel, and argue that to assert that YHWH became king implies that he had ceased to be king, rather like the dying and rising gods of other cultures in the ancient Middle East. But to say that his enthronement was celebrated annually need not imply this, and the psalms certainly gain in vividness if some such annual celebration is imagined.

6. Laments of the Community. When famine or defeat in war threatened the nation, a fast would be called and the people would express their grief and call upon YHWH for help (cf. 1 Kings 8:33–40). Ps 44; 74; 79; 80 are examples of the prayers that would be offered. Whether these were general petitions or were evoked by specific historical events, such as the fall of Jerusalem in 586, is impossible to determine.

7. Royal Psalms. These are psalms of various forms which have the king as the central figure, either as the one for whom the prayer is offered or the one who makes the prayer. There is intense debate about the number of such psalms. The absolute minimum number is Gunkel's list of Ps 2; 18; 20; 21; 45; 72; 101; 110; 132; 144:1–11, with doubts expressed about 89:47–52 (Gunkel and Begrich 1933: 140). At the other extreme Eaton (1986) argues that in principle all the Davidic psalms belong to this group, which are characterized by 'royal' language and motifs, are in first-person form (or use the third person rather like the royal 'we'), and combine individual and corporate features, indicating that the psalmist is in some way the representative of the community. He supports this by stressing the importance of the king in ancient Israelite society. On this understanding a large number of psalms are held to be certainly royal psalms, with others probably belonging to this category. It is difficult to decide between these two positions. Not all of Eaton's arguments are equally convincing, such as the claim that the enemies are always foreigners or Israelite rebels or that there was a distinctive royal style, and a decision ultimately depends on whether the reader is convinced by the reconstruction of the cultic worship into which the psalms are fitted. (See F for a discussion of the New Year Festival.)

8. Smaller Classes of Psalms. Besides these main types of psalm a number of smaller classes have been posited.

9. Wisdom Psalms have similarities with the wisdom writings in the OT (Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Sirach) and those from Egypt and Babylon. The exact number of psalms to be included in this category depends upon what criteria are used to define wisdom. Many accept Ps 1; 37; 49; 73; 112; 127; 128; 133. Like the wisdom writings they fall into two main types, collections of proverbs, mainly optimistic and expressing a philosophy that goodness will be rewarded and evil punished (e.g. Ps 1; 112), and meditations on what may be termed the problem of theodicy (cf. Job; Ps 49; 73. Ps 37 is more like the first group but recognizes that life does not always work out neatly).

10. Torah Psalms. The great psalm in praise of the law is Ps 119, an elaborate acrostic, each of its twenty-two stanzas consists of eight lines, each line beginning with the appropriate letter of the alphabet. The law is referred to under eight synonyms. Ps 19:7–11 (or 7–14), which may be a separate psalm or psalm fragment, also praises the law under a range of expressions. Ps 1 is often placed in this category rather than among the wisdom psalms.

11. Entrance Liturgies. The question and answer in Ps 15; 24:3–6 suggests that these two psalms may have been the catechism of pilgrims as they approach the temple, whether on an ordinary occasion or, perhaps more probably, for one of the great annual festivals. Isa 33:13–16 has similarities with these liturgies.

12. Pilgrimage Psalms. It is commonly accepted that the title 'Song of Ascents' in Ps 120–34 indicates psalms which pilgrims sang as they made their way to Jerusalem. Possibly Ps 84 and 122 also belong to this type, although Ps 84 has some of the features of an entrance liturgy and a hymn of Zion, and Ps 122 seems clearly related to the latter.

13. History Psalms. Accounts of events in Israel's history play such a large part in Ps 78; 105; 106 that they are often described as history psalms. Each, however, has its own features. Ps 78 has some of the characteristics of wisdom, Ps 105 is a hymn of praise, and the stress on the past sins of Israel in Ps 106 makes it a corporate confession. There is considerable debate as to whether these psalms (or any of them) are dependent on the narratives of the Pentateuch. In the past they were regarded as examples of 'salvation history' theology, but some scholars now question whether this is an adequate term, regarding it as ambiguous and meaning nothing more than that Israel survived when the historical circumstances made it unlikely. It is better to refer simply to Israel's history.

14. Acrostics. Eight psalms are acrostics, each line or verse beginning with the letters of the Hebrew alphabet in correct sequence (Ps 9–10; 25; 34; 37; 111; 112; 119; 145). This is difficult to reproduce in translation, but NJB has followed the letters of the English alphabet in the initial words of each verse of Ps 25, beginning with 'Adoration I offer, Yahweh' and ending with the additional v. 22, 'Ransom Israel, O God'. Of the most recent translations only NJB indicates the Hebrew letters in all eight, though NIV does so in Ps 119. The purpose of the acrostic form is debated. It is unlikely that it was an aid to the memory, or had magical significance. An attractive suggestion is that it expressed completeness, the A to Z, as it were, of the theme. Alternatively it may simply be an artistic device. Acrostics are found both in OT writings outside the Psalter (e.g. in Lam 1–4 and Prov 31:10–31) and in Babylon (though these are not alphabetic since cuneiform is syllabic). Moreover, there is evidence of deliberate art in the construction of many of the other psalms. This, therefore, seems to be the most likely explanation.

F. The Pre-exilic New Year Festival. 1. It is quite impossible to reconstruct the rites and liturgy of the worship in the pre-exilic temple. The Torah is largely limited to sacrificial practice and the broad outline of the main pilgrimage feasts, and the psalms neither reveal whether they formed part of the worship nor give sufficient details to enable that worship to be recovered. Nevertheless, the work of Mowinckel (1962), Johnson (1967; 1979) and Eaton (1976/1986) has produced an attractive picture of a cultic drama involving the king and celebrating the enthronement of YHWH, which may also have had an eschatological aspect within it, or alternatively have been essentially sacramental. The main difficulties with such reconstructions lie in the sparsity of corroborative evidence outside the psalms themselves, and the circular argument of reconstructing the cultic drama from the psalms and then fitting the psalms into that worship. On the other hand it has to be admitted that the hypothesis has succeeded in bringing the psalms to life in a vivid way, which few other proposals have managed to do. (For an excellent discussion of the issues see Day 1990: 67–108.) Here only the broadest outline of the rites and some of the evidence which has been drawn upon will be set out.

2. New Year Festival. It is clear from Ex 23:16; 34:22; Deut 16:13; Lev 23:34–43; 1 Kings 8:2; 12:32 that the most important feast at the time of the monarchy was Ingathering. It took place at the 'going out' (Ex 23:16) or the 'turn' (Ex 34:22) of the year, and these terms, plus the later links with the horn-blowing of New Year (Lev 23:24–5; Num 29:1–6) suggest that part of the festival may have been the celebration of the New Year. The late passage in Zech 14:16–17 links the coming of the autumn rains and the kingship of YHWH, and may provide some support for the connection of the enthronement psalms with the festival.

3. YHWH as Lord of Nature. The main celebration appears to have been the worship of YHWH as the Lord of nature, the one who secured the autumn rains and hence prosperity for the coming year. This is described in Ps 29; 93; and 95 in terms of his victory over the cosmic sea and his being proclaimed as king.

4. Procession with the Ark. A prominent feature in the ceremonies seems to have been a procession in which the ark, symbol of YHWH's presence, was carried up the hill of Zion to the temple, and YHWH entered his temple as victor over his foes (Ps 24; 47).

5. Ritual Combat. At some unknown point in the festival there was a ritual combat in which YHWH defeated his enemies, pictured both as the cosmic forces of chaos and the enemies of Israel (Ps 46:8–11; 48:8–9; 149:5–9).

6. YHWH as Lord of Morality. YHWH was also worshipped as Lord of universal morality. This is presented in two ways: he saves his people only as they are loyal to his covenant, and at the festival they renew their vows (Ps 24:1–6; 95:7–11; 97).

7. Defeat of the Gods. YHWH's victory over the kings of the nations has its counterpart in heaven. The gods of the nations have been guilty of rebellious misrule, but YHWH will subdue them and himself take over the rule over the world (Ps 82), leading to universal peace (Ps 46:8–10; 98).

8. The King. The Davidic king played a central part in this celebration. The historical books portray the king, God's anointed, as sacrosanct and the representative of the nation, the welfare of which depends upon his righteousness (1 Sam 9:16; 10:1; 24:6; 26:9; 2 Sam 1:14; 21:1; 24; 1 Kings 18:18). The covenant between YHWH and the Davidic monarchy (2 Sam 23:5; Ps 89:28–37; 132:11–18) was described as 'everlasting', and the king is sometimes referred to as the (adopted) son of God (Ps 2:7; 89:26–7), revealing the lofty place the king held in Israelite thought.

9. Humiliation and Rescue. Like the Babylonian king at the Akitu festival, it has been suggested that the Israelite king was almost defeated by his 'enemies' and ritually humiliated, before being saved by YHWH on account of his loyalty and faithfulness to the covenant (cf. Ps 89:38–51; 18; 118). After his vindication the king seems to have been proclaimed as the adopted son of YHWH and enthroned supreme over his enemies to rule them as God's vicegerent (Ps 2; 21; 110).

G. Concepts from a Different Culture. 1. If the culture of Israelite society and the meaning of some common terms used by the psalmists are not appreciated, there is a danger that the psalms will be misread. Out of a large number of words and concepts which might be considered, three are of special importance: enemies, the poor, and life after death.

2. Enemies. No reader of the psalms can fail to notice how often the psalmists complain to God about their enemies. Several different Hebrew words are used, as well as longer descriptions of their actions. A term found in thirteen psalms (Ps 5:5; 6:8; 14:4; 28:3; 36:12; 53:4; 59:2; 64:2; 92:7, 9; 94:4, 16; 101:8; 125:5; 141:4, 9) was formerly translated 'workers of iniquity' but modern translations favour 'evildoers'. Outside the Psalter it is limited to Isaiah, Hosea, Job, and Proverbs. Mowinckel (1921; 1962) argued that it referred to sorcerers, but few have followed him completely, although several accept that in some of the psalms this may be the connotation.

3. To understand why there should be so many references to enemies and who these enemies are is difficult. A useful approach is to note where the terms occur.

4. In hymns, laments, and other psalms of the community the enemies are obviously foreign nations or kings (e.g. Ps 44:10; 74:3–8). In royal psalms the enemies are the king's foes, either actual or ritual (e.g. Ps 2:1–3; 45:5; 110:1, 5–6; some think that 21:8–10 is addressed to the king rather than to YHWH), and since the king is the representative of his people, his enemies are also the nation's.

5. In some psalms the enemies are described as the enemies of YHWH (e.g. 66:3; 83:2; 92:9), and are linked with mythological actions (e.g. 89:10; cf. 74:12–17).

6. The majority of references to enemies, however, are found in individual laments and thanksgivings, and this causes the greatest difficulty. Those who attribute many of the individual laments to the king naturally treat the enemies as foreign nations or rebels within the king's own people. This is supported by the fact that in some psalms of the individual (e.g. 3:6; 27:3; 55:18; 56:1; 59:3; 62:3) they are depicted as an attacking army, but this is not totally convincing for all the psalms that have been claimed as 'royal'.

7. If some of the psalms are prayers by men who believe themselves to be wrongly accused, the 'enemies' will be their accusers.

8. A group of psalms remains, however, where sickness and enemies occur together. Here the enemies might be those whom the psalmist believes to have resorted to sorcery. Alternatively, or perhaps in different psalms, the enemies may be those who condemn the psalmist as a sinner and hold that his illness is God's punishment for his sin. Even so the vehemence of the psalmist's reaction to his enemies seems extreme, the way he describes them as actively attacking him rather than engaged in a whispering campaign, or refusing to consort with him, and many of the metaphors which are used to describe the actions of the enemies (laying snares, lying in wait, attacking him like dogs and wild animals, sharpening their teeth) hardly seem suitable to apply to those who, after all, are only expressing the orthodox belief in the connection between sin and suffering.

9. Perhaps, therefore, these psalms are intended for use by many different individuals, and the troubles from which they seek God's deliverance are deliberately expressed in general terms that can be applied to a variety of situations. Even so, the wide extent of the references to enemies (they are absent from relatively few psalms), and the presence of illness and enemies in many psalms, is curious. (DCH provides an analysis of ōyēb and 'doers of iniquity'; Kraus 1988: 95–9 has a good discussion of 'enemies'.)

10. The Poor. The psalmists frequently refer to themselves as 'poor'. Several different Hebrew words are used for the poor, translated with various English synonyms (four of them occur in Ps 82:3–4: 'weak', 'lowly', 'destitute', and 'needy'; for 'lowly' REB substitutes 'afflicted', and NJB 'wretched'; NIV has 'weak', 'poor', 'oppressed', and 'needy'). The Hebrew word used most frequently in the Psalter for 'poor' possesses active and passive forms, but whether these signify any distinction between 'humble' and 'humbled, oppressed' is doubtful. Even if it does, the text is ambiguous in many places, and sometimes the qere and kētib record the active and passive forms.

11. There has been much debate about the meaning of these terms. Outside the Psalter they normally refer to those materially poor, who, in the same way as widows and the fatherless, are likely to be oppressed by wealthy and more powerful members of the village society (cf. Am 2:6; 4:1; 8:4, 6). This may be the meaning in many of the psalms (e.g. Ps 112:9), especially when they are found together with widows, the fatherless, and the resident alien (Ps 94:6, cf. 10:17–18), but the interpretation is complicated by two things: the poor are commonly regarded as 'righteous' (even in Am 2:6), and there is evidence both in the OT and in the other countries of the ancient Middle East that 'poor' possessed overtones of 'pious'. Thus an Egyptian votive stele describes the god Amun as 'lord of the humble man' who listens to the voice of the 'poor', and a Hittite king prays to the god Telepinus as father and mother of the oppressed and the lowly.

12. Certainly YHWH is expected to protect the poor and defend the oppressed (e.g. Ps 140:12), and the king, as his vicegerent, does the same (e.g. Ps 72:2–4, 12–14). But equally it has to be kept in mind that 'poor', and even 'oppressed' may be part of the language of piety, without any implications that the psalmist is destitute (e.g. Ps 37:14 places side by side the 'poor and needy' and 'those who walk uprightly'; while Ps 40:17; 86:1, and many other psalms use 'poor and needy' much as in the Egyptian prayers). In ancient Israel the poor would also be illiterate; it is surely doubtful whether those who composed and wrote down the psalms intended them as the prayers of those who were destitute. If many of the laments are the king's prayers the language is even more likely to refer to religious piety rather than economic poverty. On the other hand, there are those who remain firmly confident that the poor in the psalms are indeed the poor (Kraus 1988: 92–5).

13. Life after Death. Despite the weakening of classical culture upon modern society, most people today probably think of human beings either as no different from the animals or as possessing a material body and a spiritual 'soul'. Ancient Israel was closer to the first than the second. Human beings were seen as animated bodies, physical beings into whom God breathed life (cf. Gen 2:7–8). At death the unit of life was broken up and the individual became 'like water spilled on the ground, which cannot be gathered up' (2 Sam 14:14). Although a few scholars (Schofield 1951; Dahood 1966–70) have argued otherwise, it seems almost certain that for most of the period of the OT no happy life after death was envisaged. It was only with the Maccabean martyrs and the apocalypses that hopes of a resurrection appeared (cf. Dan 12:2). Certainly within the Psalter the normal belief was that the shades of the dead went down to Sheol (corresponding to the Greek Hades, and Babylonian concepts of the 'land of no return', cf. Job 8:9–10; 10:21; 16:22). This was pictured as a cavern under the earth, or more exactly under the waters beneath the earth, which stood upon pillars (Ps 18:4–5, 69:1–2, 14–15; Jon 2:2–9; for the cosmology see Ps 24:2; 75:3; 136:6). There the dead continued a weak existence in a region of darkness, dust, silence, and forgetfulness, unable to praise God, and beyond his power (Ps 6:5; 88:3–6, 10–12; 94:17; 115:17; Job 3:13–19. Ps 139:8 does not necessarily contradict this view of Sheol, since it may be a figure of speech describing the power of YHWH and his care for the psalmist.). Three other terms are found for this land of the dead, all translated in NRSV by 'the pit' (Ps 28:1; 30:3; 40:2; 88:4, 6; 143:7; 16:10; 30:9; 55:23; and 69:15). This is the background to all the psalms. It is possible that occasional leaps of faith in a future life are found in Ps 16:9–11; 49:15; 73:24, but these do not constitute an established belief and their interpretation is uncertain.

14. This comes as a shock to many Christians, who have taken it for granted that the Bible teaches life after death. The dominance of the resurrection of Jesus in the NT has often made it difficult to realize that Israelite worshippers of YHWH had a very different belief. The limitation of life to this world was probably one reason for the importance of retribution being worked out before death and the devising of a satisfactory theodicy. Christian use of the psalms, of course, has imposed Christian ideas upon them, so that beside the messianic interpretations have come readings which see in many phrases beliefs in resurrection, immortality, and life after death, while 'soul' came to be understood in the Graeco-Christian sense of that part of the human being which survived death (cf. Peter's quotation of Ps 16:8–11 in Acts 2:24–32).

15. Soul. As has been mentioned, alongside these beliefs about life and death went a particular understanding of human personality. The older translations, with their frequent mention of 'soul', give the impression that the Israelites thought in terms of body and soul. This is plainly incorrect, as Gen 2:7 shows: when God breathed life into the little clay man that he had made, the man 'became a living being' (Heb. nepeš). Often 'soul' (nepeš) is used for a person's inner being or vitality, virtually the equivalent of 'life' or 'individual'. Commonly 'my soul' is a way of saying 'I myself'. The Hebrew word nepeš can also express emotions, such as greed, desire, and courage. In addition, many think that in a few places it carries the physical meaning of 'neck, throat', as the cognate word does in Akkadian, and this has been adopted by most modern translations in Ps 69:1; 105:18, and by REB in 7:2 (and 31:9 marg.) in addition. It may have this meaning in Ps 63:5; 107:9, 18 and a few other places. (For a full discussion see Johnson 1964.)

16. NRSV often retains 'soul', especially when it is the subject of a verb or is in the vocative (cf. Ps 42:1–2; 103:1–2). REB has 'soul' in only seven psalms, presumably where the English would otherwise be awkward or synonyms for parallel words needed to be found (Ps 19:7; 42:4; 74:19; 103:1, 2, 22; 104:1, 35; 130:6, 146:1). Various methods are adopted by modern translations to avoid using 'soul'. The most common is to have the simple pronoun (e.g. Ps 3:2 'to me'; 124:7 'we have escaped'; the practice is much more common in REB than in NRSV). Alternative concepts are sometimes adopted, such as 'life' (e.g. Ps 35:4; 38:12); 'heart' (Ps 10:3; 78:18); and 'will' (Ps 27:12, where REB has 'greed' and NIV 'desire'; 41:2). Short phrases sometimes represent the sense, again more often in REB (Ps 35:25 'we have got our wish' REB; 105:22 'at his pleasure'; 107:26 'courage'; 138:3 'bold and strong' REB). This is to return to the meanings which the psalms had in ancient Israel. Whether Christians are justified in retaining the 'soul' of AV and BCP in their use of the psalms in worship, interpreting it as the immortal part of the individual, is another question.

H. Imagery in the Psalms. 1. As has been seen, poetry is always seasick when it is ferried to another country. Translation cannot convey the rhythms, overtones, resonances, sounds, alliteration, and plays on words in the original. Metaphor and simile play a very large part in the appeal of the psalms, and the ultimate horror of the ability of translation to destroy the poetry is seen in GNB. 'Steps' and 'path' are frequent metaphors for life and conduct. The psalmist says that the 'law of his God' is in the good man's heart and 'their [Hebrew 'his'] steps do not slip' (Ps 37:31; they 'never depart from it' GNB). For 'nor have our steps departed from your way', GNB has 'we have not disobeyed your commands' (Ps 44:18; cf. also 56:6; 73:2). The vivid concrete metaphor of Ps 73: 'But as for me, my feet had almost stumbled, my steps had nearly slipped', is replaced in GNB by abstract nouns: 'But I had nearly lost confidence, my faith was almost gone'. The accusation against the wicked that 'their throats are open graves; they flatter with their tongues' is rendered 'Their words are flattering and smooth, but full of deadly deceit' (Ps 5:9), and the picture of God gathering the waters of the sea 'as in a bottle' becomes 'into one place' (Ps 33:7).

2. Animal Imagery. One of the delightful features of the psalms is the very large number of references to animals. Not only are they God's creatures, who offer to him their own praise (cf. Ps 104; 149), but they provide images for many different human and divine characteristics and actions. God is pictured as a mother bird, sheltering his worshippers under his wings (Ps 17:8; 36:7; 57:1; 61:4; 63:7; 91:4). The psalmist wishes he were a sparrow or swallow nesting within the temple (Ps 84:3). In his distress he likens himself to an owl in the wilderness, and a lonely bird on the housetop (Ps 102:6–7), and longs for wings like a dove to escape (Ps 55:6–8). God's goodness and forgiveness renews his youth 'like the eagle's' (Ps 103:5). His longing for God is like the deer's longing for flowing streams (Ps 42:1), and he urges his fellows to walk in God's way, and not to be like horses and mules which are restrained only with bit and bridle (Ps 32:8–9). Some of the most vivid similes are reserved for the psalmist's enemies. They attack him like lions (Ps 7:2; 10:9; 17:12; 22:13, 21; 57:4) and he asks God to tear out their fangs (Ps 58:6). They are like bulls (Ps 22:12) and the wild ox (Ps 22:21), like snakes, venomous and deaf (Ps 58:4–5; 140:3) and dogs (Ps 22:16, 20; 59:6, 14), and he wishes that they would dissolve into slime like snails (Ps 58:8, if that is the meaning). The king, if it be the king, describes himself as surrounded by foreign nations as if by bees (Ps 118:12). In an elaborate simile which compares Israel to a vine, its attackers are compared to the wild boar (Ps 80:13). In a different image, the mountains skip like rams and lambs before YHWH's theophany (Ps 114:4).

3. Hunting. A favourite way of depicting the enemies' actions is hunting. In Sumerian the sign for the hunt signified an enclosed space and originally meant 'to surround'. Hunting in the OT was mainly practised with traps and snares. Frequently the psalmists speak of traps, nets, and pits (Ps 9:15–16; 31:4; 35:7–8; 57:6; 64:5; 69:22; 141:9–10; 142:3). In Ps 124:7 the Israelites describe their rescue from their enemies who 'would have swallowed up us alive' in the image of a bird escaping from a broken snare. Keel (1978) illustrates many of these similes from reliefs from the ancient Middle East.

4. Images of YHWH: Shepherd. YHWH is described under a wide range of metaphors and similes. Despite the familiar 'The Lord is my shepherd', the image of a shepherd occurs only in Ps 23 and 80:1, although his worshippers are referred to as sheep in a number of other places (Ps 74:1; 78:52; 79:13; 95:7; 100:3). Sheep also represent the weakness of the psalmists in face of their enemies (Ps 44:11, 22). The psalmist declares that he has gone astray 'like a lost sheep'

(Ps 119:176), while in Ps 49:14 the shepherd is death, in grim contrast to Ps 23.

5. Father, Rock, Fortress. Not unexpectedly YHWH is never described as the mother of his people, but it is perhaps surprising that he is only rarely called father (Ps 68:5; 89:26; 103:13), though the king is his adopted son (Ps 2:7). More common metaphors are rock (Ps 18:2, 31, 46; 61:2; 71:3; 89:26; 144:1–2), fortress, strong tower, or stronghold (Ps 9:9; 18:2; 31:2; 61:3; 71:3; 91:2; 144:2), and shield (Ps 3:3; 28:7; 33:20; 59:11; 115:9, 10, 11; 144:2). YHWH is a warrior (Ps 24:8; 78:65–6), who takes up his shield (Ps 35:2) and fights for his people. Vivid imagery describes the theophany (Ps 18:7–15; 77:16–20; 97:2–5; 98:7–8). While not exactly a metaphor, the title ‘YHWH of hosts’ (Ps 24:10; 46:7; 48:8; 69:6; 84:3, 12; cf. ‘YHWH, God of hosts’, 59:5; 80:4, 19; 84:8, 89:8), is often linked with military language, although there is debate as to whether the ‘hosts’ are Israel’s armies or the heavenly host (the stars). It seems to have been a special title given to YHWH in the Jerusalem cult.

6. The Righteous and the Wicked. Other metaphors light up the character of the righteous and the wicked. The good man is like a flourishing tree (Ps 1:3; 52:8; 92:12), and Israel is depicted as a vine (Ps 80:8–13), while the wicked are like chaff which is blown away (Ps 1:4; 35:5; 83:13; two different Heb. words are used). The shortness of human life is but ‘a few handbreadths’ (Ps 39:5). The sick man shrivels as quickly as grass (Ps 90:5–6; 102:4; 103:15–16); the image is used as a curse on the psalmist’s enemies (Ps 129:6). The days of human beings drift away like smoke (Ps 102:3), and their life is poured out like water (Ps 22:14; 58:7). The wicked are depicted as wearing their evil devices and dishonour like clothes (Ps 73:6; 109:18–19, 29).

7. Wife and Sons. Finally in this selection of images, a man’s wife, like Israel, is pictured as a fruitful vine, his children as olive shoots (Ps 128:3), while sons are like arrows in the hand of a warrior (Ps 127:4–5; providing Anthony Trollope with Mr Quiverful!).

I. The Theology of the Psalms. 1. Most commentaries include a discussion of the theology of the Psalter and whole books have been written on the subject (e.g. Gunn 1956; Ringgren 1963; Kraus 1986; McCann 1993a). It is deliberately omitted here for two reasons.

2. First, there is no unitary theology of the psalms. Rather what is found is a number of different theologies and series of theologies. On the one hand, the theology of Ps 1 is very different from that of Ps 73 or 88; the universalism of some of the hymns is different from the intense nationalism of others; even the three history psalms present differing views of God’s activity in Israel’s history and Israel’s response to God. On the other hand, the interpretation of the psalms, and hence their theological teaching, has changed over the centuries. It is doubtful whether we can recover the theology of those who wrote the psalms, even if ‘theology’ is the correct term to describe their ideas about God, for practice and worship were probably more important than explicit beliefs, and each stage in the editing and compilation of the Psalter introduced fresh theological ideas. Later, the psalms have been used by Jews and Christians in different contexts and with different meanings.

3. Secondly, and even more importantly, the psalms are the poetry of prayer and praise, not the prose of dogma. The attraction and power of the psalms lies in imagery and language, rather than in a set of theological ideas. They kindle religion rather than define it. It is possible to derive a theology from liturgy and worship, but a better way is to allow the psalms to inspire and express religious devotion. But they come from a distant age, and a few problems remain.

J. Problem Features in the Psalter. 1. James Russell Lowell’s comment that ‘Time makes ancient good uncouth’, applies as much to truth as to goodness. One change of attitude in modern times, the rejection of patriarchal society and language, has already been noted (A.9). So strong are feelings about this, that the psalms have been rewritten in all the most recent translations in order that ‘masculine-oriented language should be eliminated as far as this can be done without altering passages that reflect the historical situation of ancient patriarchal culture’ (NRSV: xv). Two other features often cause distress to Christians today: attitudes towards enemies and assertions of innocence.

2. Attitudes towards ‘Enemies’. The most striking form of the hostility and even outright cruelty towards enemies is found in Ps 137:7–9 and 139:19–22, where psalms which have great appeal are wrecked by calls for vengeance (cf. Ps 104:35, with its call for the destruction of the wicked). Ps 69 and 109 contain long imprecations against the psalmist’s enemies, Ps 35 and 52 are largely taken up with an appeal to God against an enemy, Ps 58 describes the wicked in violent terms and seeks divine punishment that is even more violent, Ps 83 contains a long section seeking vengeance, and other psalms contain similar expressions. Several of these psalms also find pleasure in contemplating the punishments and disasters that befall the wicked and the enemies (e.g. Ps 52:6–7; 58:10–11). Various devices have been adopted to deal with this.

3. Editing out. Frequently in worship the offending verses (in the case of Ps 137 and 139) are deleted, or the psalm is never sung (in contrast to BCP, where the practice of singing through the whole Psalter is followed). Modern hymn-books, such as the Methodist Hymns and Psalms, severely limit the number of psalms they include, and even edit these with deletions.

4. Quotations. Some modern translations try to alleviate the difficulty by their punctuation. Thus NRSV, REB, and NJB express the view that the curses in Ps 109:6–19, or some of them, are those of the psalmist’s enemies, not his own (the first two even insert ‘They say’ at the beginning of v. 6).

5. The Nature of the Psalms. But these expedients are no answer to the problem, which concerns the way in which Scripture is understood and interpreted. Six general comments about the nature of the psalms may be made first. (1) In some psalms the words may be the defence of those maintaining their innocence against criminal charges and thus be part of the legal setting. (2) Even if ‘workers of iniquity’ is not a technical term for sorcerers, sometimes the psalmist may feel threatened by sorcery, and the curses may have the character of counter-spells. (3) If some psalms were actually composed by men who were seriously ill and not by priests for them, the mental strain of the illness must be taken into account. (4)

The easiest answer is to interpret most of the individual laments as the king's psalms, when his enemies will be the enemies of Israel and ultimately of God, so that the curses are an expression of the psalmist's opposition to evil, and part of the cultic expression of Israel's faith. (5) In the absence of any hope of a happy life after death, evil has to be defeated in the present world if right is to be triumphant. Illness and misfortune are regarded as signs of the psalmist's sin, and only restoration and the discomfiture of his 'enemies' will prove his innocence and God's just rule over the world. (6) It is sometimes also observed that the psalmists make no distinction between the sin and the sinner, whereas Christians are often taught to do so. (See Zenger 1996.)

6. Morality and the Culture. Behind these comments lies a recognition that ethical decisions cannot be made without reference to the society in which the actors live. Morality is part of the overarching culture. This means that ethical ideas change over the years as societies change, and moral judgments cannot be absolute. Even if complete relativity of morals is rejected, it can hardly be maintained that human ethical standards at any one time are the immutable will of God. This means accepting that we too are children of our age; and our consciences are also imperfect and moulded by the society in which we live. The psalmists belonged to their own age, and part of the problem of Scripture lies in the fact that it is the very human word of very frail and sinful human beings. No longer is it possible to defend a view of biblical authority which sees it as the infallible word of God, and attempts to do so lead to grotesque apologetics (see Kaiser 1983: 292–7, with its conclusion that 'neither Ps 137 nor any of the other seventeen imprecatory psalms present a sub-Christian ... ethic').

7. Assertions of Innocence. An older and more morally sensitive age was troubled by the way in which many of the psalmists claimed that they were righteous, and demanded divine support on this ground (cf. Ps 7:8; 17:1–5; 18:20–4; 26). Now, in an age of advertising, self-assertion, and the ubiquitous curriculum vitae, perhaps this is viewed less harshly—indeed, it may even pass unnoticed. Yet it stands in stark contrast to the humility and recognition of human sinfulness that the NT and much of the OT teaches.

8. One answer lies along the lines of the previous section. In some psalms the plaintiff may be presenting a legal case that he is innocent of some particular charge, and the declarations of innocence are not to be taken as assertions of complete sinlessness. Or the king may be confessing his loyalty to the covenant and seeking God's help in the ritual combat with his (and God's) enemies. Moreover, the underlying belief that reward and punishment have to be worked out in this life increases the urgency of the plea.

9. Confession and the Penitential Psalms. It has to be admitted that the psalms are rather short on confession. Of the church's seven 'penitential psalms', only two (Ps 32; 51) clearly express a sense of the psalmist's own sin, with brief glimpses in Ps 130:3–4; and 143:2, and less certainly than NRSV suggests in Ps 38:18. They are mostly to do with the afflicted ones, rather than with those confessing their sins (Snaith 1964: 12). All the psalmists are much more ready to impute evil to their enemies and to castigate 'the wicked'. That we expect to find all the religious emotions in the Psalter is perhaps an inheritance from an age when the Psalter was sung in its entirety as the centre of monastic prayer (Bradshaw 1995).

K. The Numbering of the Psalms. 1. The numbering of the psalms differs between the Protestant and Catholic/Orthodox traditions. The reason is that the LXX combined Ps 9 and 10 as a single psalm, Ps 9 (probably correctly), joined 115 to 114 (as Ps 113), and divided Ps 116 into Ps 114 (= vv. 1–9) and Ps 115 (= vv. 10–19), and Ps 147 into Ps 146 (= vv. 1–11) and Ps 147 (= vv. 12–20). It inserts 'Alleluia' before Ps 116:10, and repeats its expanded form of the title to Ps 147 before v. 12. This means that for most of the Psalter the psalm numbers in the LXX and the Vulgate, and hence the Catholic English versions (Douai and Ronald Knox) are one behind those of the Hebrew/Protestant text. JB and NJB, however, follow the Hebrew numbering.

2. In the Hebrew the titles of the psalms are treated as part of the text. This means that where the title is longer than a few words it is counted as a separate verse (or even two verses in Ps 51; 52; 54; 60). For many of the psalms, therefore, the Hebrew verse numbers differ from the English translations. Some commentaries give both numbers, but in this commentary the English numbering is followed.

COMMENTARY

Psalm 1 The first two psalms lack titles, which is unusual in Book 1 of the Psalter, and it is probable that they provide an introduction to the whole book of Psalms. Whether they originally formed a single psalm is very doubtful, however, in spite of an ancient Jewish saying that the first psalm begins and ends with a beatitude (v. 1 and 2:11). A few manuscripts of Acts 13:33 refer to Ps 2 as the 'first' psalm, which suggests that among some Christians either the two psalms were combined or they knew of texts which began with the present Ps 2. Certainly it seems likely that Ps 1 was placed here after Book 1 or the entire Psalter was completed.

It is similar to Ps 19:7–14 and 119 in its delight in the 'law', and probably is post-exilic. Whether it is correctly termed a 'wisdom' psalm, and whether it was intended for use in the cult are both uncertain. Perhaps it is best understood as a poem to encourage faithfulness to the religion of the Torah. Although often described as 'The Two Ways' (cf. v. 6) its tone is set by the initial, 'Happy are those ...'. The poet is convinced that the way of goodness is an attractive way, and it would be wrong to regard it as presenting a moralistic religion in which goodness is pursued for reward.

The structure is clear: vv. 1–3 describe the righteous, closing with the simile of a tree planted beside an irrigation canal, a comparison found in ancient Egypt and in pictures from the ancient Middle East. Although the phrases in v. 1 might ascend to a climax ('walk', 'stand', 'sit', 'wicked', 'sinners', 'scoffers') they may be simple poetic parallels. If the psalm is post-exilic, the reference to the 'law' may be to the written Pentateuch. The picture is of the pious reader speaking the words of the law half aloud until they become part of his being, rather than of silent and passive meditation. The point of the tree simile is that it flourishes, not that the fruit is a 'reward', despite the last line of v. 3, which speaks of the prosperity of the good man.

The wicked are described more briefly in vv. 4–5: the godly man is described in detail; the side glance at the wicked is but to light up the blessing of his life by contrast. The picture is of winnowing the corn, throwing it up into the air after it has been threshed by a flail or a threshing sledge, so that the wind will blow away the straw and the husks and allow the heavier grains to fall to the ground. v. 5 is uncertain. Most translations render the verbs as futures, although they do not differ from the form of many of the verbs earlier in the psalm, implying that the judgement is a future judgement by God. Some early Christian commentators saw a reference to the resurrection by translating the verb as ‘rise up’, perhaps influenced by the LXX. Since the general OT belief was that the dead went to Sheol and remained there (see Ps G.13), this is unlikely unless the psalm were very late indeed. The reference appears to be to day-by-day judgements either by the elders in the gate, or possibly by God himself, and continues the description of the two types of people. This would form a better parallel to ‘nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous’. The verb translated ‘watches over’ in v. 6 is ‘knows’, with the sense of ‘takes care of’: other psalmists and the writer of Job will have to question whether life is always as simple as this.

Psalm 2 The first Christians interpreted this psalm as messianic prophecy and v. 7 is quoted in Acts 13:33 and Heb 1:5; 5:5 as referring to Jesus, reflected in the capital letters for ‘Anointed One’, ‘King’, and ‘Son’ in NIV. The older critical scholars connected it with an Israelite king who had recently ascended the throne, and discussed the claims of David, Solomon, or some other king. Form criticism classifies it as a ‘royal psalm’, but there is no agreement as to the way in which it may have been used in ancient Israel—at the Davidic king’s enthronement, or at an annual celebration of his accession, as the new king’s first proclamation to his subjects, or spoken by a cultic prophet. Many set it within a cultic drama, in which the king is attacked by his (and God’s) enemies and finally is delivered by God. Those more attracted to literary and canonical interpretations point to the concluding beatitude which forms an inclusio with that in Ps 1:1, and to the repetition of some words, such as ‘meditate’ (1:2) and ‘plot’ (2:1, the same Hebrew verb), and suggest that the two psalms form a double introduction to the Psalter and represent two ways of understanding it, as teaching and as Davidic or messianic. Following the approach adopted in this commentary, the psalm will be interpreted as a poem in its own right.

The psalm falls into four sections: vv. 1–3 describe the rebellion of the ‘kings of the earth’ against YHWH and his anointed king; vv. 4–6 depict God’s mockery and support of his king with a bold anthropomorphism; in vv. 7–9 the king sets out the divine proclamation which established him as God’s adopted son and promised him victory over his enemies; and vv. 10–12 give a final warning to the hostile kings to submit to YHWH. The closing benediction stands apart from the rest of the psalm and some have suggested that it is an addition, fitting the psalm into later worship.

Two verses present difficulties of translation. The ‘decree’ in v. 7 probably declares what YHWH is performing—the act of making the king his son—and should be translated: ‘I myself beget you today’ (cf. REB, ‘this day I become your father’). The sonship is through adoption: unlike other monarchs in the ancient world, the Israelite king was not regarded as descended from God. In the Hebrew the emphasis is upon ‘I myself’ rather than ‘this day’ as Eng. versions.

NRSV follows a common conjectural emendation in vv. 11–12. The Hebrew appears to mean literally: ‘and rejoice with trembling. Kiss a (the) son lest he should be angry and you perish with regard to the way’ (i.e. the way you are behaving). Apart from the word for ‘son’ being Aramaic (the Hebrew word is used in v. 7) this makes tolerable sense, kissing the king being understood as an act of homage. Kissing the feet would be an even humbler grovelling, and accords with a practice well known in the ancient world. The LXX had a different text: ‘and rejoice for him in trembling. Take hold of instruction (or chastisement, correction) lest the Lord should ever become angry and you perish from a (the) righteous way.’ Some of the ancient versions understood the word translated ‘son’ to be a different word meaning ‘pure’ or ‘purity’, hence ‘worship in purity’. The pronouns also present problems if ‘kiss the son’ is abandoned, for it becomes uncertain who the subject of the verbs in v. 12 is. NRSV apparently accepts the very striking metaphor of kissing God’s feet. Some adopt a change of reference: Serve YHWH, kiss (the king’s) feet, lest YHWH be angry. Probably the original text and meaning are irrevocably lost and all that remains certain is that the rebellious kings are warned to submit to God and his representative, the Israelite king.

Psalm 3 The psalm is a prayer to God for help against enemies, with a strong expression of confidence in his protection (vv. 3–6). vv. 1–2 describe the psalmist’s situation, v. 7 is the call to God for help (probably the whole verse should be translated as a plea, ‘Rise up . . . Deliver me . . . Strike all my enemies . . . break the teeth . . .’, cf. NIV). The final verse widens the perspective to the whole congregation or nation. The introductory verses are held together by a threefold ‘many’, and three words derived from the same Hebrew root, ‘help’, ‘deliver’, and ‘deliverance’ link the first and last sections of the psalm.

So much is clear. Problems begin when we ask who the psalmist and the enemies might be. If the enemies are military foes, it is natural to see the Israelite (Davidic) king as the one who is appealing to God. If the title is not allowed to influence the reader, the psalmist may be an Israelite who faces attacks by fellow Israelites, a man who has been (falsely) accused of some crime (with the enemies as his accusers), or even a sufferer who regards his illness as owing to attacks by enemies, although the last interpretation is less likely. In any case there is poetic exaggeration in the ‘ten thousands of people who have set themselves against me all around’ (v. 6).

Less certain is the situation. If the psalm is taken as a royal psalm, it is still impossible to decide whether the psalm was composed in (or perhaps more probably, for) an actual battle or whether the attacks are part of a ritual combat in a cultic drama. If it was originally a cultic prayer for those suffering from hostility from other people, v. 5 might refer to spending the night in a sanctuary in order to receive a divine oracle, though the more natural way of taking the verse is as a mark of such total trust in God that the psalmist can sleep without fear. The early Christians found a reference to the resurrection of Jesus in the sleep and awakening. Later liturgical use has treated it as a morning psalm.

The title probably comes from a scribe who has searched through the books of Samuel for a suitable occasion in David's life in which to place the psalm, and came up with his flight from his son Absalom (see 2 Sam 15–17, esp. 15:12, 14). Certainly there is much that fits the account in Samuel, and it might even be that the psalm was composed by a scribe as a literary response to the narrative, although the general view is that the titles were added to existing psalms rather than indicating the inspiration of them. Or it may have been written for any of the kings of Judah. The date is less certain on more general interpretations of the psalm.

From a literary perspective attention may be drawn to the threefold reiteration of 'many' in vv. 1–2, and the theme of 'help', 'deliver', 'deliverance' (the same Heb. root) in vv. 2, 7, 8.

Psalms 4 At first sight this is a happy, confident little evening psalm. The many small differences among the main translations and the wide range of interpretations offered by commentators show that it is difficult to be certain about how it should be read. It offers few clues as to the speaker, the persons addressed, and the occasion on which it was spoken or sung, and although there are not a great number of textual problems, the exact meaning of several phrases is not clear.

Some see it as a companion to Ps 3: a king's psalm, which the older scholars placed in the time of Absalom's rebellion and explained as expressing David's faith in YHWH and a rallying call to his dispirited followers. There is little firm evidence to support this. More recent royal interpretations prefer a cultic interpretation, with YHWH's anointed king and representative addressing his opponents and proclaiming his glory over against those who worship false gods. The reference to harvest fits this theme, since the faithfulness of the king is linked with the prosperity of the land (cf. Ps 72). Others, however, find little evidence to refer the psalm to the king, and suggest that it belongs to rulers in general, whether secular or priestly, and see the occasion as a time of drought or bad harvest. Yet others see in it confidence in the face of false accusations or the vicissitudes of life. Even form criticism is uncertain whether the dominant theme is lament or confidence. Repetitions of words ('call', vv. 1, 3; 'right', vv. 1, 5; 'hear' vv. 1, 3; 'heart' vv. 4 (NRSV 'ponder', lit. 'say in your heart'), 7; 'bed'/'lie down' (related words in Heb.), vv. 4, 8; 'trust'/'in safety' (verb and noun), vv. 5, 8; and 'many'/'abound' (noun and verb), vv. 6, 7) point to literary skill but are less helpful in revealing the structure of the psalm. vv. 2–5 stand out as addressed to an opposing group, while vv. 1, 6–8 are a prayer to God. Possibly, like many Christian hymns, the very ambiguity and lack of definite allusions make it more possible for many different people to make its confident appeal to God their own.

In v. 1 the middle line either expresses the confidence upon which the two petitions are based (as most translations) or the Hebrew should be taken as a further petition ('give me relief from my distress', NIV). v. 2 appears to refer to the respect due to the psalmist within the community, although some take it to be a reference to God ('how long will you dishonour my glorious one', REB, cf. NIV marg.), who is dishonoured by worship offered to other gods. The meaning of the Hebrew in v. 3a is very uncertain (cf. the variety of modern translations); perhaps it should be read, with a small emendation, 'Know that YHWH has shown me his marvellous love' (cf. NEB). 'Right sacrifices' (v. 5, literally 'sacrifices of righteousness') are probably sacrifices offered with correct rites or in a right spirit, although some regard them as sacrifices which acknowledge YHWH's justice, and a very ancient Christian interpretation thought of righteousness itself as a metaphorical sacrifice.

Psalms 5 Usually defined as an individual lament, this psalm is clearly a petition to God. Uncertainties about the status of the psalmist, the nature of the enemies, and precisely what the psalmist is presenting 'in the morning', make it difficult to be certain about its origins and use in ancient Israel.

The title probably intends to ascribe it to David, and some scholars interpret it as a royal psalm, sung in a cultic rite. This is held to fit the identification of the enemies as also rebels against God. Those who find no evidence of authorship or original usage in the titles of the psalms commonly see it as the prayer of someone faced with false accusations, the enemies being the hostile and vindictive accusers. The situation might then be either a prayer for a just outcome to a forthcoming 'trial', or an appeal to God for a verdict (perhaps through a priestly oracle) at a hearing in the temple.

The reference to the 'morning' in v. 3 has led to the psalm being used as a morning hymn. While the references to the morning are clear, it is uncertain what action is being performed. The Hebrew has no object to the verb 'set in order, arrange'. The older English versions (and NIV) supplied 'my prayer', 'my requests', but this is unlikely since the verb is never linked with prayer in the OT. It is regularly used for presenting a case in a lawsuit and for ordering a sacrifice, hence NRSV's 'plead my case' and REB's 'prepare a morning sacrifice'.

The mention of the temple in v. 7 is equally ambiguous. It might refer to any of the local sanctuaries, but most probably is the Jerusalem temple. This is partly supported by the psalmist's address to God as 'my King', which has been widely seen as a characteristic of the Jerusalem cult. Whether the psalmist is actually present at the morning worship or describes his intention to present his case or offer sacrifice there cannot be determined.

The structure of the psalm may be analysed in several different ways. If NRSV is followed, vv. 1–3 are the invocation to God and statement of the psalmist's intention, vv. 4–6 describe God's character, vv. 7–8 express the psalmist's confident approach to God, vv. 9–10 set out the wickedness of the enemies and call upon God to condemn and destroy them, and vv. 11–12 form a concluding invitation to the righteous to rejoice. Possibly the final verse should be taken as a call to God to give his blessing and defend them.

In the title, 'for the flutes' is the most probable interpretation of a phrase that is unique here, and presumably intends the psalm to be accompanied by flutes. The Babylonians had a special kind of lament called 'flute psalms of lamentation'. The LXX referred it to a different Hebrew word and translates 'concerning her that inherits'. It is possible, though unlikely, that it was the name of a melody, 'To "Inheritance"'.

Psalms 6 That the psalmist is gravely ill appears obvious. Less certain is the relation of the illness to the 'enemies'. It has been suggested that it was the enemies who brought about the psalmist's illness, perhaps through sorcery, but few accept this explanation, partly because the usual Hebrew word for sorcery does not occur in any of the psalms, chiefly because the psalmists regularly, as here, see God as the cause of their suffering. The suggestion that the term 'workers of evil' (v. 8) refers to sorcerers has slight support. Usually, therefore, the enemies are regarded as members of the psalmist's community who interpret his illness as divine punishment for wrongdoing, much as Job's friends did (e.g. Job 11:6; 15:4–6; 22:5–11), and by their hostility increase his sufferings. Even so the psalmist's reaction in v. 10 strikes modern readers as extreme. Might it not be that, with the illogicality to which we are all prone, the psalmist accepts both that the illness has been inflicted by God and also that the enemies are responsible for it?

Two features in this psalm are notable. First, the psalmist fears that he is near to death. Sheol is the abode of the dead, who live on in a feeble and miserable existence in the land of no return, outside of the reach of God's love, a land of dust and darkness and silence (for other descriptions of Sheol see Ps 30:9; 88:6–12; 94:17; 115:17; Ps G.13). It seems that in ancient Israel all sickness was seen as a form of 'death', and the psalmist probably regarded himself as partly in Sheol already—hence his anguish.

Second, there is a marked change of tone at v. 8. This has been called the 'certainty of hearing', and has been variously interpreted. Some suggest that vv. 8–10 are the real heart of the psalm, the earlier part recounting the suffering from which the psalmist has been delivered and now expresses his thanksgiving. The balance of the psalm hardly supports this. Others suppose that the psalmist's thanksgiving after he had been healed has been attached to the earlier petition, but there is no evidence for this. There is equally little evidence to support the claim that two separate psalm fragments have been combined in the one psalm, although Ps 40 (vv. 13–17 = Ps 70); Ps 108 (vv. 1–5 = Ps 57:7–11; vv. 6–11 = Ps 60:5–12) shows that this could occur. A popular theory is that a temple prophet or a priest uttered an oracle of assurance between the two parts of the psalm. Such oracles are found in Isa 40–55, often beginning, 'Fear not...', and cf. Ps 12:5. Possibly the change in mood is produced by the prayer itself: having uttered his plea the psalmist becomes confident that God has heard it and will answer his request. This would be the most likely view if it is thought that the psalmist is too ill to go to the temple to make his prayer to God. The answer has not yet been fulfilled, however, for the shaming of the enemies lies still in the future.

The psalm is one of the seven 'penitential psalms' of the church (the others are 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, and 143; Ps J.9), although there is no confession of sin but rather an appeal from frailty and humility. The reliance upon God's 'steadfast love' (v. 4) should be noted.

'According to The Sheminith' in the title is found only here and in Ps 12 (cf. 1 Chr 15:21). The meaning is unknown. The term is usually linked with the word for 'eight'. Some have proposed that it refers to singing in octaves (but the octave does not seem to have been known in ancient Israel) or by male voices. Other suggestions are that it refers to some element in the ritual, perhaps an eighth stage, or to an instrument with eight strings.

Psalm 7 The title describes this psalm as a 'Shiggaion of David' and links it with 'Cush, a Benjaminite'. The meaning of 'Shiggaion', found only here and in a different form in Hab 3:1, is unknown. Scholarly guesses as to its meaning include a song of irregular form or varied mood, and a psalm of lamentation. One suggestion is that the word is a corruption of 'Higgaion' (Ps 9:16; 92:3), perhaps 'melody' (as NRSV in Ps 92:3) or 'meditation'. The LXX has simply 'a psalm'. The author of the title seems to have linked it with the Cushite of 2 Sam 18:19–33, or one of David's Benjaminite enemies such as Shimei (2 Sam 16:5–14; 19:16–23, 1 Kings 2:36–46). This is the only reference in the psalm titles which cannot be traced to the biblical narratives about David, but it seems unlikely that he drew upon lost traditions in just one psalm.

The psalm belongs generally to the class of individual laments. Greater precision depends upon the interpretation placed upon three features, the references to enemies, who are described with animal metaphors (vv. 1–2, 5, 6), the oath of innocence (vv. 3–5), and the ascription of vv. 12–16, which NRSV divides between God (simply 'he' in the Hebrew) and the wicked (shown by the use of the plural, although the Hebrew has singulars throughout). Those favouring royal origins note the military references in vv. 4, 10, 12–13, and regard the enemies as national enemies of the Israelite king, possibly being portrayed in the cult, while those who place greatest emphasis upon the oath and the description of God as judge (vv. 6, 11) interpret the psalm as the plea of someone accused of some crime, possibly coming to the temple for a divine verdict through priestly decision, prophetic oracle, or an ordeal, or as a court of appeal (cf. 1 Kings 8:31–2). Some think that v. 1 shows that he sought asylum there, but in the biblical narratives asylum is sought only in cases of manslaughter and this does not seem to be the accusation in the psalm. Later use of the psalm will have separated it from the temple and generalized it into a plea for help in time of distress.

The structure is well set out in NRSV, apart from vv. 12–16, where God has been gratuitously introduced, changing the meaning—the whole section should probably be referred to the psalmist's enemy or read as a general description of the wicked. After a call to God for help (vv. 1–2), the psalmist protests his innocence (vv. 3–5; for the form of the oath cf. Job 31), repeats his call to God and seeks divine judgement, (vv. 6–8 and 9–11, perhaps to be taken as a single section with hymnic descriptions of God in vv. 8 and 9c–11), sets out his conviction that evil rebounds upon the wicked (vv. 12–16), and concludes with thanksgiving (v. 17). Whether the thanksgiving is the result of a successful verdict or is a vow to offer praise when his innocence is declared is impossible to determine.

Psalm 8 This well-known and greatly loved psalm presents several exegetical problems. It is usually classified as a hymn, but it is unusual in having no initial call to worship God and in containing features, such as the question, 'What are human beings that you are mindful of them?' which are akin to wisdom teaching (cf. Job 7:17; 15:14, though some see the Job passages as a bitter parody of the psalm, and the book of Job itself has close links with psalmic forms). The first person passages are also unusual in hymns and are somewhat reminiscent of individual laments. It is difficult, however, not to regard it as essentially a hymn that opens with the actual praise of YHWH.

There is a textual difficulty in v. 1c, which NRSV has solved by emendation. An alternative suggestion is that the Hebrew letters should be read as: 'I will serve [worship] your glory'. This problem is linked with the question of the correct sentence division. The NRSV apparently takes v. 2 to mean that God is so powerful that the words of children are sufficient as a rampart of defence, but the meaning is not clear. Perhaps the difficult Hebrew verb should be taken as in REB, with different phrasing: 'Your majesty is praised as high as the heavens, from the mouths of babes and infants at the breast'. This has the advantage of making sense of the reference to the 'bulwark' (usually 'strength'), but at the cost of an uncertain rendering of the Hebrew verb as 'is praised'. The LXX translated v. 2: 'from the mouth of babes and sucklings you prepared praise for yourself', hence the form of the quotation in Mt 21:16.

In v. 5 the LXX translated the Hebrew word 'ēlōhīm, which means either 'God' or 'gods', as 'angels', possibly to avoid the idea that human beings are almost equal to almighty God. Scholars are divided as to whether the Hebrew means 'God' or 'the gods' as members of his heavenly court.

The structure is transparent: The shout of praise, addressing God by his name, YHWH, envelops the psalm (vv. 1 and 9): vv. 1c–2 enlarge upon the majesty of God; and in vv. 3–8 the psalmist expresses his wonder that creatures as insignificant as human beings should have been given dominion over all the rest of creation (cf. Gen 1:26–8).

The quoting of verses from the psalm in the NT (Mt 21:16; 1 Cor 15:27; Eph 1:22; Heb 2:6–8) reveals that it was interpreted as messianic, but this was hardly its original meaning. Some have regarded it as a royal psalm, seeing the king beneath the references to 'man'. At the other extreme are those who find it difficult to relate the psalm to the worship of the Jerusalem temple, and see in it marks of scribes and rabbis in the post-exilic community.

Psalm 9–10 These two psalms are combined as a single psalm in the LXX and the Vulgate, which accounts for the differences in the numbering from Ps 10 to Ps 148 between the Protestant and Catholic/Orthodox traditions, the latter following the LXX. Despite some differences in the type and emphasis between the two parts of the psalm it was probably originally a single psalm. This is supported by LXX, the acrostic form, the lack of title to Ps 10 (rare in Book 1 of the Psalter), the śēlā in 9:20, which never elsewhere comes at the end of a psalm, and a number of unusual words common to both psalms. A few Hebrew MSS also treat the psalms as a single poem.

The acrostic is incomplete. The main pattern is to start each two verses with the appropriate letter of the Hebrew alphabet, but the d verse is missing, and the regular pattern is disturbed at the end of Ps 9 and the first eleven verses of Ps 10, being resumed only with q (Ps 10:12), when it continues perfectly until the end of the psalm. Strikingly each halfline in 9:1–2 begins with the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Since difficulties in some verses show that textual corruption has occurred, and small changes in the verse division restore some of the missing letters, it seems likely that originally the acrostic was complete; but it cannot now be recovered.

Ps 9 is predominantly thanksgiving by an individual while Ps 10 is closer to individual laments. Possibly due to the acrostic form, there is no clear development of thought. Leading ideas are the call to thanksgiving, YHWH as judge of the nations and of the wicked and defender of the oppressed, and pleas for deliverance from enemies and the wicked.

The setting of the psalm is equally uncertain. Those who hold that many of the psalms are to be linked with the Jerusalem king see in the references to the 'nations' (Ps 9:5, 15, 17, 19, 20; 10:16), who appear as the psalmist's enemies (cf. Ps 9:3, 6), support for their interpretation. Other evidence for this view is the care of the orphan and the oppressed (Ps 9:18; 10:14, 18), a duty of the king as God's representative, and God's universal judgement (Ps 9:7–8, 12; 10:15, 17, 18), claimed to be a feature of the Jerusalem cult. At the other extreme, the psalm has been linked to the post-exilic synagogue as the prayer of the oppressed congregation, but there is little firm evidence for this, especially as the extent to which the synagogue was a place of worship rather than teaching and meeting is contested (McKay 1994). Certain links with wisdom teaching on the retribution coming to the wicked, together with the acrostic form, may indicate that it is a late psalm, possibly written as an art form or for instruction.

One of the main words for 'the poor' in the Psalter occurs here for the first time (Ps 9:12, 18; 10:2, 9, 12; Ps 10–12). The psalmists join with the prophets in asserting that God will defend the poor, and this is one of the duties of the king (cf. Ps 72).

'Muth-labben' means literally 'Death to [of] the son'. Most regard it as the title of the melody to which the psalm was sung. The LXX, with a slight change in the text, has 'For the secrets of the son', and it has been suggested that this might refer to a royal ritual. Alternatively it might be a corruption of 'According to Alamothe' (see Ps 46).

Psalm 11 This psalm is usually classified as a psalm of confidence. YHWH is not addressed in prayer but spoken of in the third person. vv. 1–3 set the scene, and vv. 4–7 express the psalmist's trust in God. It is not easy, however, to discover a more precise setting.

Those who try to link it with the life of David point to his flight from Saul or the time of Absalom's rebellion. Others see it as a royal psalm, noting the psalmist's sense of authority, his claim to be 'righteous', and the threat of enemies, and either set it within the Jerusalem temple worship or find a reference to a foreign invasion. Yet others describe it as the plea of one falsely accused, despite the lack of direct prayer, seeing the psalmist as seeking refuge in the temple (v. 1) and trusting in God to defend him. Confidence is largely restricted to the second part of the psalm (vv. 4–7) and this has suggested to some that a prophet or priest declared YHWH's acquittal of the psalmist at this point. The fact is, we simply do not know. How the psalm is interpreted largely depends on the reader's view of the historical and social background into which the psalms are to be placed.

Despite the surface clarity of NRSV there are some uncertainties. Does the speech in v. 1 continue to the end of v. 3 (as most translations, regarding vv. 2–3 as the reason the speakers give for flight), or is it limited to v. 1b, with vv. 2–3 as the psalmist's response as he rejects the call to flee, or does the speech consist of vv. 1b–2 (as REB)? Is the temple in v. 4 the Jerusalem temple, so that YHWH is depicted as present with his people and also the transcendent God, or it is a reference to heaven? Should we press the form of the Hebrew verb in v. 5 and translate, 'May the Lord test the righteous', thus introducing the element of prayer? And is the final clause to be constructed as, 'He [lit. 'his face'] beholds the upright', i.e. accepts the upright with his favour, rather than being taken as referring to the psalmist's experience of God? NRSV has tacitly emended the text in v. 6, where the Hebrew has 'snares, fire' (see RV) instead of 'coals of fire'.

Psalm 12 Prayers both by an individual and the community appear in this psalm, and it is uncertain which predominates. The divine promise in v. 5 suggests that perhaps those are right who call it a prophetic liturgy: opening with petition, having at its centre the comforting words of the prophet, to which the congregation responds with the note of certainty in vv. 6–7. If this is so it may have had its origin in some temple rite. Beyond this it is impossible to go with any assurance. Perhaps the emphasis upon words, both of human beings (vv. 2–4) and YHWH (vv. 5–6), has led some to imagine the psalmist as the target of malicious comments, possibly even of threats and curses (which were thought to have their own power to effect the evil they declared). The psalm may come from a time of moral decadence, when honesty and truthfulness were no longer regarded as the basis of social life.

The structure is fairly clear: appeal to God, with an account of the evil from which the psalmist seeks deliverance (vv. 1–2); plea for divine judgement on the speakers of lies and flattery (vv. 3–4); divine oracle of salvation (v. 5, 'safety' is related etymologically to the verb 'help' in v. 1); an expression of confidence in God's protection (v. 7); and a reiteration of the evil situation in which the psalmist is placed (v. 8), possibly set as a foil to the protection God gives, unless v. 7 is to be taken as a return to petition: 'Do thou, Lord, protect us and guard us...' (NEB, cf. RSV).

Psalm 13 The fourfold 'How long?' is striking. A feature of both individual and communal laments (Ps 6:3; 74:10; 79:5; 80:4; 90:13; 94:3), it is also found in Babylonian prayers, such as a remarkably similar prayer to Ishtar: 'How long, O my Lady, wilt thou be angered so that thy face is turned away? How long, O my Lady, wilt thou be infuriated so that thy spirit is enraged?' The psalmist appears to be ill (cf. v. 3 with its fear of death), but his main emotion is anguish because he feels abandoned by God.

In spite of a Jewish tradition that the psalm describes Israel's suffering at the hands of hostile neighbours, the intensely personal tone has convinced most commentators that it is the lament or prayer of an individual. The enemies will then not be national foes or the king's enemies, but fellow Israelites who see in the psalmist's illness divine punishment. Probably the alternation between a singular 'enemy' and the plural 'foes' (vv. 2, 4) is stylistic, though it has been suggested that in v. 2 the enemy is death. The book of Job perhaps provides the best commentary on this psalm, with the psalmist's deep sense of loss in the face of God's silence.

For the change of tone from urgent petition to confident trust and rejoicing at v. 5 see ps 6. Was an oracle spoken by a temple prophet at this point? Or has the outpouring of prayer in itself led to a sense of calm joy?

The LXX has a different text at two points: in v. 2 it reads 'day and night' (adopted by NEB), and adds at the end of the psalm: 'I will sing to the name of the Lord, the most high'.

Psalm 14 This psalm must have been widely popular, for it was included in the first Davidic collection (Ps 1–41) and the Elohist collection (Ps 42–83). The differences between the two versions are relatively minor apart from 14:5–6/53:5. It is usually supposed that both go back to a single original and the differences are due to textual corruption or editorial changes. If they spring from variant traditions, it may be that the evildoers in Ps 14 are Israelites while those in Ps 53 are foreigners. v. 7 was commonly supposed to be post-exilic when the phrase which is correctly rendered 'restores the fortunes' in NRSV was held to mean 'brings back the captivity [captives]'; some still find it distinct in tone and theme and treat it as a liturgical addition.

Even if the psalm was well loved in ancient Israel, the present-day reader finds great difficulty in knowing how it should be read. It has been described variously as a prophetic liturgy, a mixture of prophetic and wisdom literature, a wisdom psalm, communal instruction, perhaps even an early synagogue speech, and an individual lament. Medieval Jewish interpreters saw it as reflecting Jewish national sufferings. Certainly the first phrase is reminiscent of the wisdom writings, where several different words for 'fool' occur, all referring to moral depravity rather than intellectual feebleness or folly, alongside 'any who are wise' (v. 2), a word commonly used in this sense in Proverbs. On the other hand the prediction of coming terror in v. 5 has the ring of a prophetic denunciation of those who oppress the poor. With such a range of possible genres to choose from, it is little wonder that there is no agreement on how it was used in ancient Israel. If it is instruction it fits naturally with Proverbs, but since there is no certainty about the existence of scribal schools in Israel or the position and function of 'the wise', this gives little help. Its presence in two collections of psalms, which presumably were connected with the temple, perhaps points to a cultic prophet uttering his oracle in some rite. If Ps 53 is a prophetic taunt song against foreigners it might have its place during some hostile attack on Jerusalem, but it is by no means certain that the two traditions are to be separated so widely.

The structure at least is clear. vv. 1–3 describe the universal godlessness and wickedness, vv. 4–6 present a threat of punishment, and v. 7 is a wish for the restoration of the nation's prosperity.

It is almost a commonplace to stress that the 'atheism' of the 'fool' is practical—he acts as if God did not exist—and not religious or philosophical, on the grounds that pure atheism would have been impossible in Israelite society, and that the psalmist stresses the moral faults of 'fools'. But how different is 'practical atheism' from a denial of the existence of God?

Paul quotes vv. 1–3 in Rom 3:10–18 in an abbreviated form, followed by a series of quotations from other verses from the OT. At some point these additions found their way into the LXX and from there into the Vulgate. Curiously the catena is also found in two Hebrew MSS.

Psalm 15 This psalm is similar to Ps 24, and also Isa 33:14–16, while listings of sins and virtues are found in Jer 7:5–7, Ezek 18:5–9, and Mic 6:6–8. It may be that the words of the prophets were modelled on psalms such as this. To call it a ‘torah psalm’, however, adds little to our understanding, and even if ten moral requirements are found in it, it is not closely similar to the Decalogue. It is commonly described as an ‘entrance liturgy’, with the worshipper’s question in v. 1, followed by the conditions for entering the sanctuary in vv. 2–5b (presumably spoken by a priest), and a closing promise in v. 5c. Elsewhere in the ancient Middle East temple inscriptions set out similar demands, but the two OT psalms differ in that they include no ritual requirements. Another suggestion is that the psalm sets out the conditions for those seeking asylum in the sanctuary, but this seems unlikely in view of the apparent limitation of asylum in the OT to unpremeditated homicide.

The meaning is plain apart from two phrases in v. 4. ‘In whose eyes the wicked are despised’, imports too strong a sense into a word which means ‘despised, rejected’. Possibly the sense is ‘the one rejected by God’, but the Targum rendered it: ‘He is despised in his own eyes, and rejected’, hence the Prayer Book’s ‘He that setteth not by himself, but is lowly in his own eyes’. At the end of the verse the NRSV’s ‘who stand by their oath even to their hurt’ involves a forcing of the Hebrew, which is literally: ‘he swears to do evil and does not change’, a meaning that is hardly possible, despite Lev 5:4. It has been suggested that the Hebrew has a negative sense, ‘he swears not to do evil’, but this does not seem likely. The LXX (apparently reading lēhāra as lēhārēa) has: ‘who swears to his neighbour and does not set it aside’, which is attractive.

Psalm 16 This is a good example of the extreme difficulty in discovering the original use and meaning of many psalms. vv. 8–11 in the LXX version are quoted by Peter in Acts 2:25–8, who interprets the psalm as messianic prophecy, fulfilled in the resurrection of Jesus. Few today would accept this as the psalmist’s own intention, and most classify it as a psalm of confidence, but then unanimity fails. Is it a royal psalm, expressing the Israelite king’s confidence that God protects him? Or does the reference to the allotment of land in vv. 5–6 point to the psalmist as a Levite of whom it was said that YHWH is their inheritance (Deut 10:9)? But it might be the whole land that is intended, and hence the psalm would belong to the whole people of Israel. Or might it be the confession of an individual worshipper? Even the description as a psalm of confidence is not quite certain, since the petition of the first verse is closer to laments. Is the psalmist looking back on a past deliverance, and praying for God’s continuing protection, or is the danger still threatening? Interpretation is not assisted by the chaotic state of the text in vv. 2–4, and occasionally later in the psalm, where emendation is inevitable. So obscure are these verses that some have found traces of dialogue, or a quotation from the words of a fellow Israelite, who worships other gods as well as YHWH. The psalmist himself is utterly devoted to God.

The meaning of vv. 10–11 is disputed. While some find a reference to life after death, others believe that such a belief was alien to most of the OT, and see only confidence that God will protect the psalmist until his death at the end of a long life. Perhaps here is a leap of faith. The psalmist holds the bleak Sheol belief with his mind, but his delight in his fellowship with God moves beyond this to the hope that such intimacy cannot be ended by death.

Psalm 17 The structure of this psalm is relatively clear, although the text is uncertain in a number of places, making the exact meaning doubtful. vv. 1–2 are an appeal to YHWH; in 3–5 the psalmist protests his innocence; 6–12 is a further prayer, especially referring to the psalmist’s enemies, against whom he seeks YHWH’s help in 13–14; a final note of confidence is expressed in v. 15.

The way the enemies are described raises difficulties for a more precise interpretation than the general ascription as a ‘declaration of innocence’. The psalmist may be making an appeal to the supreme tribunal in the temple (cf. Deut 17:8–13), or the background may be an ordeal (see ABD v. 40–2; the only description of an ordeal is Num 5:11–31, however, and despite the widespread use of ordeals in the ancient Middle East, it is uncertain how far it was a normal practice in Israel). On either view the enemies of the psalmist would be those who accuse him of some wrong—falsely, as he claims. vv. 3 and 15 possibly indicate that the psalmist spent the night in the sanctuary awaiting God’s verdict. Christian tradition saw in the final verse a foreshadowing of the believer’s resurrection, the sleep being the sleep of death, but this was hardly the psalmist’s own meaning.

The severe punishments which are invoked against the enemies appear extreme if they are simply those presenting a legal case against the psalmist, and it has been suggested that this, together with the heading, points to its being the prayer of a king faced with a military invasion, possibly a punitive expedition on the grounds of some accusation of disloyalty or a wrong committed against another state.

Psalm 18 The outline of this long psalm is relatively clear. vv. 1–3: praise of YHWH; 4–6: the distress which has befallen the psalmist; 7–19: a great theophany in which God comes to save his servant; 20–4: the ground of this salvation, the ‘righteousness’ of the psalmist; 25–30: a wisdom type generalization that God saves those who trust him; 31–45: God has saved (or will save) the psalmist from the attacks of his enemies who will be defeated; 46–50: concluding praise of YHWH. The explicit reference to the king, YHWH’s anointed, in v. 50 has convinced most commentators that this is a royal psalm, but there agreement ends. Differences between the sections suggest to some that at least two psalms have been combined, only vv. 31–50 clearly referring to the king. Others suggest that the theophany may have been separate originally. The wisdom features of vv. 25–30 also mark this section off from the myth of the theophany and the defeat of the king’s enemies. And as so often the tenses present a problem, as can be seen in the past description of NRSV in vv. 32–48, the present and past tenses of NIV, the predominant presents of GNB, and the presents and futures of NEB and REB.

A cultic interpretation manages to include most of the features of the psalm. The king is supposed to be the main actor in a ritual drama, in which he is almost defeated, cries out to YHWH for help on the grounds of his faithfulness and righteousness, and is both delivered and secures a crushing victory over his enemies. The mythic features are readily accommodated into this pre-exilic worship, since the theophany is central to Israelite faith (cf. Ex 19), while the extravagance of the triumph over the king's enemies fits more easily into a rite than as a reflection of some historical victory. The wisdom expressions of vv. 25–30 fit less easily into this interpretation, but they can be viewed either as a reminder to the listening people that the lesson is for them as well, or as a later transformation of a psalm that originally referred to the king into a more general thanksgiving. There seems no need to regard the whole psalm as coming from the post-exilic synagogue, an expression of hope and encouragement, drawing on past expressions of faith and worship.

The complete psalm is found in 2 Sam 22, with only minor textual differences, an indication of the way the psalms and the life of David were linked by later editors, the psalms expressing the emotions of the king and the narrative providing a setting within which they could be interpreted.

Psalm 19 Is this one psalm or two? The subject-matter, form, and metre mark off vv. 7–14 from 1–6, and Ps 108 shows that portions of psalms were joined together (108:1–5 = 57:7–11; 108:6–13 = 60:5–12) in the Psalter. It may be that the first section of the psalm is part of a hymn praising God as creator, and the second is a prayer to YHWH with wisdom features, centred on the law, which is referred to under six synonyms in vv. 7–9. Support for this is found in the contrasting names for God (El and YHWH) in the two parts of the psalm, and the possibility that the first part is very ancient while the second part may reflect post-exilic piety. (The sun was worshipped in the ancient Middle East as a god, and even in Israel there are hints of this, see 2 Kings 23:5, 11; Jer 8:2; Ezek 8:16, although in this psalm its 'tent' has been set in the sky by God, who is unambiguously the creator of the universe.)

On the other hand modern emphasis upon the completed text of the Bible would suggest that even if the sections of the psalm were originally independent, a unity has been imposed upon them. Nature and law are both needed for a full revelation of God. Indeed, some believe that the psalm was a unity from the first, the psalmist adding his own prayer to a fragment of an ancient hymn. Some find a link between the sections in the fact that the sun was regarded in the ancient world as the giver and sustainer of justice, thus pointing forward to the law, but there is no hint of this in the text of the psalm. It is strange that there is no call to praise, the psalm opening immediately with a description of the praise uttered by the dome of the sky and by the day and the night. In the second part contemplation of the law leads the psalmist to confess his sins and pray that his words and meditation may be acceptable to God. (Some regard vv. 12–14 as an independent prayer.)

In v. 4 REB and NJB retain the uncertain Hebrew word qawwām (which seems to mean lit. 'their string, line'), translating it as 'their sign' and 'the design'. NRSV and NIV adopt a common emendation qôlām, 'their voice', making a parallel to 'their words' (see HALOT (1996), iii. 1081 for other proposals). The paradox of silent speech is unique in the OT.

NRSV interprets v. 13 as a reference to 'the insolent' rather than the familiar 'presumptuous sins' (cf. marg. 'from proud thoughts')—the word elsewhere refers to people. The psalmist may be referring to those whose self-confidence might shake his faith, but the switch to persons is rather abrupt.

'Redeemer' (v. 14) has special overtones for the Christian. In Israel it referred to the next of kin who had the duty to protect any member of the family in trouble, avenging wrongs, giving support in time of poverty, and buying back the relative from slavery (see Lev 25:25, 47–9; Num 35:19–28). YHWH as redeemer is a favourite theme of Deutero-Isaiah (see ISA A.1, 11; Isa 41:14; 43:14; 44:6, 24; 47:4; 48:17).

Psalm 20 The mention of 'his anointed' and 'the king' (vv. 6, 9) have convinced most commentators that this is a royal psalm, and the references to victory (vv. 5, 6; in Hebrew the words are 'salvation' and 'save', but these often refer to victory in war) suggest that it is a prayer that accompanied sacrifice before battle. The only disagreement is whether it is a real battle (see e.g. 1 Sam 7:9; 13:9–12; 1 Kings 8:44–5; 2 Chr 20:1–19) or part of a cultic drama, and there appears to be no way of deciding between the two. Perhaps there is not so much difference between them, since the offering of prayer would be within the setting of worship, while if the psalm was part of a cultic drama, that itself was performed in the expectation that God would save his anointed in actual war in the same way that he was depicted as saving him in the ritual. The change to confidence in v. 6 is probably the result of some expression that God has heard the prayer, either through some symbol or the words of a cultic prophet (cf. ps 6).

Psalm 21 The references to the king in vv. 1 and 7 lead most to treat this as a royal psalm, but the situation to which it refers is not clear. It may be before battle (as Ps 20, pointing to the hope of future victories in vv. 8–12), after victory (with emphasis upon the confidence in v. 1–7), at the king's coronation (cf. v. 3), or at an annual celebration of his accession (noting the reference to the king's trust in YHWH and the mention of God's 'steadfast love', v. 7). Since the rites performed at the Autumn Festival are unknown, it is impossible to determine more precisely the way the psalm was used.

To whom vv. 8–12 are addressed is a major problem of interpretation—is it God or the king? Possibly these are the words of a prophet who gives this promise to the king during the liturgy. If YHWH is the subject, the reference may be to covenant curses directed against the king's (and Israel's) enemies.

The Hebrew word 'to save', which was translated as 'victory' by NRSV in Ps 20 is here rendered 'help', but REB has 'victory' in both psalms. The salvation which God gives the king is primarily the conquest of his enemies.

The Aramaic version of the psalm rendered 'king' by 'king Messiah', treating it as messianic prophecy, but this is unlikely to have been its original meaning.

Psalm 22 The many quotations from this psalm in the New Testament, especially within the passion narratives, show that the early church regarded it as messianic prophecy (see Mt 27:39 || Mk 15:29 (v. 7); Mt 27:43 (v. 8); Mt 27:35 || Mk 15:24 || Lk 23:34 || Jn 19:24 (v. 18); Heb 2:12 (v. 22); Jesus may have been quoting from this psalm in his cry from the cross, Mt 27:46 || Mk 15:34).

Jewish tradition read the psalm as a reflection of the experience of Queen Esther, who is likened to the 'hind of the dawn' in the title, the Midrash suggesting that 'When the dawn awakes the stars set, and so in the court of Ahasuerus, as Esther awakened the stars of Haman and his sons set' (though this might have been adopted to counter Christian use of the psalm, see Magonet 1994: 111).

Those who adopt a wide view of royal psalms ascribe the psalm to the king, usually in the setting of the rites of the annual festival, but others restricting such psalms to a minimum identify the psalmist as a sufferer who is ill and near to death. A royal interpretation permits the scope to be extended to include the Israelite people whose representative the king is.

There is a marked change of tone from petition to thanksgiving at v. 22 (or 21b if the NRSV is followed—the Hebrew is ambiguous and possibly corrupt). Have two psalms been combined? Does this represent the 'certainty of hearing', which perhaps followed a prophetic oracle or some symbolic action, or even a direct divine revelation? Or is it the words of the psalmist's vow? Verbal links and the many changes of mood and style throughout the psalms are commonly seen as evidence that the psalm is a liturgy.

As often we do not know how the psalm was originally used or in what context, and therefore what its original meaning was. It is, however, the greatest of the laments within the Psalter, akin to the book of Job. More than most psalms the sense of personal experience floods through it. Despair almost drives out hope, yet two things support the psalmist: he remembers that God saved his people, and he looks back on the way God cared for him from his birth.

The structure is relatively plain: in the first part prayer and complaint alternate with expressions of confidence (vv. 1–2, 3–5, 6–8, 9–10, 11–21), and in the second vows (vv. 22, 25) mingle with hymns of thanksgiving and praise.

The animals in vv. 12, 16, 21 may be the psalmist's enemies (if he is the king, the enemies of Israel), but some regard them as demons, as in Babylon, where sickness is often attributed to demons pictured in the form of animals. The last line of v. 16 is difficult. The familiar 'They have pierced my hands and my feet' (retained by NIV) comes from the LXX. The Hebrew is literally: 'like a lion my hands and my feet'. Instead of the NRSV's 'My hands and feet have shrivelled' REB reads 'they have bound me hand and foot'. Curiously the verse, which many see fitting the crucifixion of Jesus perfectly, is not quoted in the New Testament.

The title may refer to the morning sacrifice, although the LXX translated 'the hind of the morning' as 'the help [which comes at] morning' (picking up 'help' in v. 19). But it may be the name of the melody to which it was sung.

Psalm 23 The happy confidence of this psalm, coupled with the comfort that it has given to those in 'the valley of the shadow of death' (v. 4, AV), have made it the best known and best loved of all the psalms. Later usage has taken over from the original meaning, which is clouded in uncertainty.

The most obvious structure divides the psalm at v. 5, making the depiction of God as shepherd and host. The two ideas do not easily sit side by side, however, and (unsuccessful) attempts have been made to retain the pastoral metaphor throughout the psalm, usually by emending 'table' (v. 5) into some kind of weapon. Another proposal finds three metaphors, with YHWH as guide of a wanderer in vv. 3–4. It may be that the 'paths of righteousness' should be seen as processions to the temple, 'table' as a symbol of the covenant, and 'goodness and mercy' as referring to the qualities of God's reign.

Royal maximalists see the psalm as the prayer of the king, pointing to the metaphor of God as shepherd which normally relates to the nation in the OT, and would be more appropriate in the mouth of the king as representative of the nation, and the royal implications of God's protecting his vassal against his enemies. The psalm is thought to have been used either in cultic ritual or in an act of worship reflecting the king's confidence. But the evidence is far from clear, and it is not legitimate to see in the anointing in v. 5 an allusion to the anointing of the king, since a different word is used.

Alternative interpretations range from regarding the psalm as the (non-cultic) prayer of a pious Jew to ascribing it to the nation in exile in Babylon. There are also differences of opinion about the banquet, some regarding it as metaphorical, others as a reference to a literal sacrificial meal. Even the classification as a psalm of confidence has been challenged, and it has been interpreted as the psalmist's thanksgiving after he has been 'delivered' from his enemies or even acquitted from false accusations.

In fact the original meaning and setting of the psalm are completely unknown, and we are left with hypotheses and the more certain later use by Jews and Christians.

Two translation difficulties may be noted. The traditional 'valley of the shadow of death' assumes the existence of a rather unusual Hebrew word. Many change the vowels and produce 'valley of darkness' (cf. NRSV). In v. 6 'and I shall dwell' follows the LXX and Syriac versions. The Hebrew appears to mean 'and I shall return', possibly a vow or a hope that the psalmist will be able to keep on coming to the temple to worship rather than remaining there permanently for the rest of this life.

Psalm 24 The structure of this psalm is beautifully clear. vv. 1–2 are hymnic, declaring that the world was created by God; vv. 3–6 is an 'entrance liturgy', similar to Ps 15 and Isa 33:14–16; and vv. 7–10 contain a dialogue at the gates of the city or temple, repeated, as often in liturgies, and reaching a climax with the declaration of YHWH as 'YHWH of hosts', 'the king of glory'. While some believe that the three parts were originally separate, the whole fits together easily into a single liturgical movement.

The LXX adds 'of [for] the first day of the week' to the title, reflecting later Jewish usage, which linked the psalm to the story of creation in Gen 1. Those who try to set it within the life of David connect it with the bringing of the ark into Jerusalem (2 Sam 6). Within the worship of the pre-exilic temple it may have been used during the annual Autumn Festival, with the celebration of YHWH as creator, and as warrior who returns to his temple in triumph after the defeat of the powers of chaos (possibly with the ark symbolizing his presence carried in a procession, although there is no explicit mention of the ark). If the psalm is post-exilic it may be a hymn which reflects features from earlier rituals. Paul quotes v. 1 to defend the eating of meat that had been sacrificed to idols (1 Cor 10:26), and later Christian tradition linked the entrance of 'the Lord of hosts' through the gates with the entrance of Christ into heaven at the ascension. In such varied ways was this psalm reused and reinterpreted.

v. 6 is textually difficult. On its own the Hebrew would be most naturally translated: 'those who seek thy face, Jacob', but this seems impossible. The LXX apparently read: 'those who seek the face of the God of Jacob', hence NRSV.

Psalm 25 The acrostic form of this psalm is well preserved, although there are a few irregularities. In v. 2 NRSV follows the verse division of the Hebrew, but 'O my God' should be taken with v. 1 to enable v. 2 to begin with the letter b. The w verse is missing, but is easily restored by inserting 'and' before 'for you I wait' (v. 5; there may be a further corruption since vv. 5 and 7 consist of three lines, while the restored w verse would possess only one). There are two r verses (18 and 19); perhaps the first originally began with a q word, but it is possible now only to guess what it might have been. An additional p verse stands at the end. There are two striking similarities with Ps 34, which also lacks a w verse and concludes with an extra p verse. Some suggest that both psalms come from the same writer.

The acrostic form tends to isolate the individual verses, and an overall structure is difficult to discern. Broadly, vv. 1–7 are a prayer for help, guidance, and forgiveness; vv. 8–15 reflections on the character of God and the blessedness of those who serve him; and vv. 16–21 further prayers for deliverance, with v. 22 expanding the mainly individual lament into a prayer for the nation. While some regard this verse as a late addition to fit the psalm for congregational worship, the similar feature in Ps 34 suggests that it may well have been original.

Confession of sin is rare in the Psalter, and this makes the confession in vv. 7 and 11 the more notable.

Psalm 26 The psalmist protests his innocence and asks God to examine his integrity. The precise occasion for reciting this psalm, however, is far from clear. A common view points to similarities with Ps 7 and 17, and posits an appeal to a temple court or an ordeal. The doubts expressed in the notes on those psalms apply equally here. Those who link a majority of the psalms with the king, find here a royal psalm of confidence, but despite the stress upon 'steadfast love' and 'faithfulness', armed enemies are lacking and the general mood would seem more suited to an ordinary Israelite. The declaration in vv. 4–5 recalls Ps 1, and it has been suggested that the psalm stands closer to Ps 15 and 24 than to 7 and 17. To see it as the worshipper's declaration as he seeks entry into the temple and faces the priest's questioning, may provide the best guide to the spirit of the psalm, with praise and worship dominating over legal declarations, and the hand-washing (cf. Deut 21:6) and procession round the altar reflecting ritual actions (cf. Ps 118:27).

The themes of innocence, prayer, and confidence in God are intertwined and it is not easy to analyse the psalm rigidly; none of the Eng. versions offers a convincing structure.

'Vindicate' (v. 1) is perhaps too strong in the light of v. 2 and while 'judge' may not express the psalmist's confidence that when God examines him he will find that he is innocent, the psalmist's plea is for a hearing. NRSV takes 'faithfulness' in v. 3 to be that of the psalmist, but the parallel line suggests that REB represents the sense better by referring to God's faithfulness which sustains his worshippers. The 'bloodthirsty' (v. 9) is literally 'men of blood', i.e. murderers (cf. 2 Sam 16:7–8).

Psalm 27 This seemingly simple and confident psalm presents the interpreter with three problems: is it a unity? who is the speaker? and how are the Hebrew tenses to be translated?

vv. 1–6 speak about YHWH as if addressing an audience, expressing confidence in his protection from future dangers, or possibly thankfulness for past deliverance. In vv. 7–12 the psalmist addresses YHWH directly with a plea not to reject him or abandon him to his enemies, but the psalm ends with a renewal of confidence (v. 13, the Heb. is difficult, however, and the translation of NRSV involves either emendation or paraphrase) and a call to wait for God's deliverance in hope (v. 14).

Those who accept that some psalms have been wrongly separated (cf. Ps 9–10 and 42–3) and others deliberately combined (Ps 19, 108: the LXX also combines 114 and 115) solve the problems of the differences in tone and address by treating the two parts independently, as a psalm of confident trust and a prayer for help. Those who prefer to keep to the present text explain the changes of tone and form as derived from liturgy: by expressing trust in God before offering his urgent prayer, the psalmist makes it more difficult for God to refuse his request.

Royal maximalists see the speaker as the king, pointing to the references to battle in vv. 2–3, treating v. 10 as an allusion to the king's adoption by God, and regarding the overall style as 'royal'. The setting will then be in worship, either as part of the ritual at a festival or in response to the attacks by national enemies. Others take the military allusions to be metaphorical, and interpret the psalm as spoken by an ordinary Israelite, possibly facing accusations (cf. v. 12) and seeing the action of the psalmist's parents as their rejection of a son they hold to be guilty.

In a striking metaphor YHWH is described as 'my light' (v. 1), a phrase found only here in the OT, although in Isa 10:17 he is the 'light of Israel' and in Isa 60:19, 20 he is the 'everlasting light' of his people.

NRSV has adopted a common emendation in v. 8 without comment. The Hebrew seems to be literally: 'To thee my heart has said, "Seek [plural] my face"', although it has been suggested that it could mean: 'From thee my heart conveys the message "Seek my face"' (Eaton 1986: 176).

Psalm 28 The psalm falls into three distinct sections. In vv. 1–5 the psalmist utters a passionate plea to God to hear his prayer and not remain silent and unresponsive, but rather punish the wicked. NRSV shifts to a future tense in v. 5*cd*, but the plea may continue: 'may he strike them down' as REB (the LXX has 'you (sing.) will pull them down and not build them up'). The tone changes to 'certainty of hearing' (cf. vs 6), or possibly thanksgiving at v. 6. vv. 8–9 return to prayer, but now for the king and the nation. While some regard the third part as an addition to an original psalm by an individual, the whole may be a liturgical unity, with petition followed by two responses, as the psalmist both expresses his own confidence and includes his people in his prayer.

To define the setting more closely is difficult. Some hold that the psalmist is the king, interpreting the enemies as rebels or even foreigners, and placing the psalm within the temple ritual. The reference to God's 'anointed' (v. 8, almost certainly the king rather than the post-exilic high priest), however, does not require that this is a royal psalm, since the individual may well have included king and people together in his final prayer. The distress of the psalmist is, as often, vague and complex. Is the psalmist ill and near to death? Has plague broken out, affecting both good and evil people, and he fears it may strike him? Or is his suffering largely caused by hostile and deceitful neighbours? The suggestion that the 'workers of evil' (v. 3) are sorcerers has been generally abandoned, but given the nature of small-scale societies the possibility that the psalmist fears that his illness is caused by sorcery should not be completely ruled out.

Psalm 29 This is a majestic hymn of praise to YHWH, the God of the thunderstorm. After an initial call to the 'sons of gods', the lesser gods who are members of YHWH's court (vv. 1–2, cf. Ps 82, Job 1:6; 2:1), the main body of the psalm echoes with the voice of YHWH, repeated seven times, as he thunders against (rather than 'over') the primeval waters, breaks the cedars, makes the mountains quake, flashes flames of fire, shakes the wilderness, and strips the forest bare (vv. 3–9). The conclusion probably describes his enthronement as king over the flood, and as the protector of his people (vv. 10–11).

Less certain are the date and original occasion of the psalm, and the precise meaning of the beginning and the end.

Similarities with Ugaritic poems have led some to date the psalm very early in the history of Israel, possibly as an adaptation of a hymn to Baal or Hadad, the storm god. At the other extreme, by taking the final verse as a petition on behalf of Israel, it has been suggested that, at least in its present form, the psalm is a congregational hymn, possibly quite late in Israel's history. The psalm may have been sung in the Autumn Festival, as the LXX addition to the title, 'at the closing festival of tabernacles' indicates. Later Jewish tradition linked it with the Feast of Weeks. If the Autumn Festival included the celebration of YHWH's enthronement, this may be reflected in v. 10.

'In holy splendour' (NRSV) or 'in holy attire', may seem a disappointment after the AV's 'in the beauty of holiness'. The splendour is probably God's, the attire that of the worshippers. But perhaps the Hebrew word is connected with a Ugaritic word meaning 'vision' and hence a reference to the 'theophany'. The LXX has 'in his holy court', but there is little other evidence for this text. Sirion (v. 6) is Mount Hermon, to the north of Israel.

The tenses in the last verse present a problem. NRSV takes them as an invocation of blessing. The REB's futures make the verse an expression of confidence that the majestic God who is now enthroned as king will protect his people. NIV continues the descriptive present tenses of the previous verses. It is difficult to decide between these three interpretations.

Psalm 30 There is fairly general agreement that this is the thanksgiving of a man who has recovered from a serious illness. The Israelites thought of illness as sinking into Sheol, and this is the image behind v. 3. vv. 6–10 are best seen as a flashback to the time of the psalmist's distress, rather than a present prayer, and the note of joyous thanksgiving sounds out clearly in the two final verses. Although some have attempted to draw this psalm into their group of royal psalms, most find here words said by an individual Israelite.

With such a strong sense of individuality, it is strange to find 'a song of [at] the dedication of the house [temple]' in the title. Most probably it was added at a late date when the psalm was linked with the rededication of the temple in December 164, after it had been desecrated by the Greek king Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc 4:42–59), and the festival of Hanukkah ('dedication') was inaugurated. Alternative suggestions of the dedication of David's palace or the dedication of the rebuilt temple in the time of Haggai and Zechariah are less probable. The major difficulty lies in understanding how such an individualistic psalm could be applied to a public ceremony. Perhaps the strong note of thanksgiving and the psalmist's call to the congregation to join in praise led to its use.

In v. 3b the NRSV text and margin represent two Hebrew traditional readings. The stress in v. 5 is upon the merciful favour of God rather than the brevity of his anger. The Hebrew is extremely terse, and REB's 'In his anger is distress, in his favour there is life' is a possible way of taking the words.

Psalm 31 Although rich in isolated spiritual phrases, when viewed as a whole this psalm presents grave difficulties. Urgent prayer for deliverance from a variety of troubles, quiet trust in YHWH, and glad thanksgiving mingle in what may be a many-layered liturgy. On the other hand two, three, or even four psalms may have been combined (vv. 1–8 and 9–24, or 19–24 may be divided off as a separate thanksgiving, or three laments may be distinguished: vv. 1–8, 9–12, and 13–18). The distress from which the psalmist seeks deliverance is equally uncertain, and illness, unjust accusations, and the attacks of enemies have all been proposed. Since illness was commonly seen in ancient Israel as divine punishment, it is possible that this is the background to the whole psalm, explaining the whispers and ostracism to which the psalmist is subjected (vv. 13–15) and even the 'lying lips' of v. 18. The address to the 'saints', those in a covenant relation with God, in vv. 23–4 indicates that the prayer was offered publicly within an act of worship, although not necessarily in the Jerusalem temple. The striking change to confident thanksgiving at v. 19 may be a further example of the 'certainty of hearing' which followed the giving of a favourable sign or prophetic oracle, but some interpret the whole psalm as a thanksgiving, the apparent prayers for deliverance being descriptions of the dangers from which the psalmist has been saved. Those favouring psychological interpretations see the wavering between petition, complaint, and confidence as varying emotional moods. In the MT the psalmist confesses his 'iniquity' in v. 10 (cf. NRSV marg.), but since this is the only mention of sin in the psalm and the LXX has 'destitution', most make the small emendation adopted by NRSV.

Those who posit a royal background to most of the individual laments ascribe this psalm also to the king, pointing to the psalmist's strong sense of privileged position before God, the stress on the covenant relationship, the covenant virtues of faithfulness, righteousness, and 'steadfast love', and the designation of the psalmist as YHWH's 'servant' (v. 16). 'I was beset as a city under siege' (v. 21), usually taken metaphorically, is treated as an actual attack by foreign enemies.

According to Lk 23:46 (= v. 5), 'Into your hand I commit my spirit' were the last words of Jesus on the cross, a further example of the way the psalms were linked with the passion narrative in Christian tradition.

Psalm 32 The structure and general sense of this psalm of joyous thanksgiving for healing and sin forgiven are clear, even though the text is in disarray in several places (cf. NRSV marg. at vv. 4, 6). The psalm opens with a twofold beatitude (vv. 1–2), followed by a description of illness, seen as divine punishment (vv. 3–4), and an account of the psalmist's confession (v. 5). In v. 6 the psalmist addresses the assembled congregation and in the following verse reverts to his own thanksgiving. It is not clear who the speaker in vv. 8–9 is: if it is not the psalmist, these verses may contain divine teaching, perhaps through a prophet or, more in accord with the style, one of the 'wise' teachers. The final two verses (perhaps to be taken with vv. 8–9) express the common idea of retribution, and call the righteous to rejoice in YHWH.

The date and original setting of the psalm are difficult to determine. The wisdom style in vv. 1–2 and 8–9 may point to a post-exilic date, and it has been suggested that the whole psalm fits synagogue practice better than pre-exilic worship in the temple. But it is not impossible that the psalm was intended to accompany the sin or guilt offering.

To be noted are the three words for sin in vv. 1–2, etymologically derived from rebellion, missing the way, and crookedness, combined with three words for forgiveness, lifting the sin from the sinner, covering it up, and no longer accounting the sinner as guilty. But etymologies are fascinatingly deceptive, and use is a better guide to the meaning of words than derivations. Above all the repetitions reveal the psalmist's horror of his sin and underline his happiness.

In Christian tradition this is one of the seven penitential psalms, though it is really thanksgiving for sin forgiven.

Psalm 33 Apart from Ps 10, this is the only psalm in the set of Davidic psalms 3–41 lacking a title. The LXX has 'To David', and Qumran evidence suggests the longer, 'To David, a song, a psalm'. A few MSS join it to Ps 32, but the form of these two psalms makes it certain that they are separate poems, in spite of a few common features.

This is a good example of the hymn form. vv. 1–3 contain the call to praise; 'For' in v. 4 introduces the central section (vv. 4–19), setting out the motivation for offering praise and declaring the greatness of God; and vv. 20–2 express the response of the congregation. The psalm contains the same number of verses as the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, and although it is not an acrostic, this probably is more than chance (cf. Lam 5). The kinship with acrostics is further seen in the great regularity in the length and metre of the verses of the psalm, and the lack of clear structure, reflected in the considerable variation in the way it has been set out (contrast NRSV, REB, and NIV). Instruction, exhortation, and beatitude mingle with the descriptions of God as creator and defender of his people (cf. vv. 8, 10–11, 12, 16–17 with 4–7, 9, 13–15, 18–19). God watches over those who trust in his love—the psalmist thinks of safety from death and famine. As with most of the psalms, the original setting is uncertain. The pre-exilic New Year Festival, worship in the second temple, and late synagogue worship have all been suggested.

The 'new song' (v. 3, cf. 96:1; 98:1; 149:1) hardly means that it was specially composed for this occasion. Perhaps it refers to the 'renewal' of the covenant, or the 'new' creation celebrated at the beginning of the year. Less probably it looks forward to the future age when God works 'new things' (Isa 42:10). More generally the praises of the eternal God are timelessly new. The seer picked up the phrase in Rev 5:9.

Psalm 34 This is another acrostic psalm. Two peculiarities link it with 25: both psalms lack a w verse and both end with an additional p verse. Despite the constraints of the acrostic, it has a clear structure: vv. 1–3 are a call to praise, vv. 4–10 express the psalmist's thanksgiving, and vv. 11–21 are closer to wisdom instruction.

The heading presents problems. If the reference to the incident in David's life recorded in 1 Sam 21:10–15 was added by a later editor it is odd that the name of the Philistine king is given as Abimelech and not Achish. Attempts at an explanation include the unlikely suggestions that Abimelech was the dynastic name, a royal title, or the Semitic name for Achish. The error is surely too blatant to be a simple scribal error, though it is surprising that it was not corrected later. Content of the psalm has little connection with the Achish incident, and some see the reason for the ascription in the occurrence of two similar Hebrew words in 1 Sam 21:13 (HB 21:14) (ta'mô 'behaviour') and the psalm (ta'āmū, v. 8, 'taste').

The central problem lies in the twin notes of thanksgiving and instruction, and decisions about its origin depend on which is taken as dominant. If thanksgiving, then some liturgical setting is required, though whether the links with wisdom place it within synagogue worship may be questioned. On the other hand, if the wisdom element is stressed it may be that a scribe took a thanksgiving psalm as the basis for his teaching.

It is easy to value the psalm lightly as expressing a superficial view of retribution. If, however, stress is placed upon the distress from which the psalmist has been delivered, it gives the psalmist authority to utter his teaching about God's goodness.

Psalm 35 Three times the psalmist utters a prayer for help (vv. 1–10, 11–18, 19–28), each time concluding with a vow to praise God. While some find here three originally separate psalms, the changes may reflect liturgical movement, and other analyses of the structure are possible. More difficult is to determine the occasion of the psalm and the identity of the 'enemies', and, as often, the presuppositions of the interpreter determine the interpretation. Some point to the military phraseology in vv. 1–3 and find here a king's prayer against his enemies, perhaps vassals who have supporters among the king's own people. Others note the allusions to witnesses, defence, and judgement in vv. 11, 23–4, 27 and describe the psalm as the petition of the falsely accused. Others again regard all such language as metaphorical, and prefer to take the psalm as a more general prayer to be used by any upon whom trouble has fallen, whether illness or more general misfortune (it is difficult to be more precise). In this case the enemies would be those within the village community who see the disasters that have befallen the psalmist as evidence that he has been abandoned by God, and an occasion to mock and take advantage of him.

Several features of the psalm are striking. 'I am your salvation' (v. 3) might be the type of priestly or prophetic oracle that many believe was given to the sufferer when he came to the sanctuary to pray. The appeals to God to help (vv. 1–3, 17, 22–4) are very forthright and strongly expressed, with bold, almost irreverent, imperatives. And the promises to offer thanksgiving and praise are both part of the appeal to God and an expression of the psalmist's own confidence.

Psalm 36 The divisions into which this psalm falls are strikingly clear: vv. 1–4 are a wisdom-type description of the wicked, vv. 5–9 praise God in a hymn, and vv. 10–12 are a prayer for help against evildoers. Some think that the sections are so distinct that three separate psalms have been combined. Others, noting the reference to the wicked in the first and last sections (although the only common term for those who are evil is 'wicked') take the whole psalm to be an individual lament, with the hymnic section as part of the appeal to God by stressing his faithfulness and righteousness. Those who link many of the psalms with the king, find here another of the royal psalms, though with somewhat less confidence than with many other psalms. The sparse use of the first person singular (only in v. 11; the Heb. has 'my heart' in v. 1, but most follow a few Heb. MSS and the Syriac to read 'his', cf. NRSV 'their') has led some to give the psalm a communal reference, taking it as a national prayer, a view which links easily with the king as representative of the nation. How the psalm originated and in what situation it was used is quite uncertain. This, however, does not impair its religious value.

The text in several sections is corrupt. v. 1 begins with the noun nē 'um that is frequently found at the end of oracles in the books of the prophets, where it is conventionally translated 'says the LORD' (e.g. Am 1:15). It is linked with transgression only here. (Is the idea that rebellion, personified, speaks to the wicked as YHWH speaks to the prophets?) Hence the emendation 'Transgression is pleasant to the wicked' has been proposed. The different translations of vv. 3 and 6–7 among the Eng. versions indicate the difficulty in interpreting the Hebrew words. NRSV has taken 'mountains of God' in v. 6 as 'mighty mountains', but since 'the great deep' is the primeval ocean in Gen 7:11 the psalmist may be using mythological ideas to stress the greatness of God's righteousness.

Psalm 37 The acrostic in this psalm has been preserved almost perfectly. In v. 28c the "ayin" verse is easily restored with the help of the LXX as 'The unrighteous will perish for ever' (cf. REB; NRSV has inserted an interpretative 'the righteous' absent from the Heb., contrast NIV). Since the pattern is two double-line (stich) verses to each letter of the alphabet, the longer vv. 14 and 20 are suspect, but there is no textual evidence to support deleting a line.

All agree that the psalm is related to wisdom teaching, some classifying it as a wisdom psalm which has no connection with the cult, others rejecting that it is by an individual and relating it in some way to liturgy, possibly, it has been suggested, within the synagogue (although those who make this connection usually date the rise of synagogues earlier than is often allowed now). The acrostic form tends to produce poems without any obvious structure, and the lack of agreement about how it is to be divided (vv. 1–7a, 7b–11, 12–15, 16–26, 27–33, 34–40, and 1–11, 12–20, 21–31, 32–40 are two proposals) indicates how difficult it is to find any progression of thought. Five themes may be singled out: a warning against envying the prosperity of the wicked, certainty that the good prosper and the wicked will soon suffer disaster, faith that God is active in his world, the conviction that goodness is valuable in itself, and the practical aim of persuading the hearers to commit themselves to God. Especially striking are the frequent imperatives (vv. 1, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 27, 34, 37). While v. 25 might imply a superficial confidence in exactly proportioned reward and punishment, the fact that the psalmist feels a need to expound this teaching may point to the beginning of doubt, such as appears more strongly in Ps 49 and 73.

Psalm 38 Illness, sin, divine punishment, and the hostility of enemies and former friends dominate this psalm, which is one of the traditional penitential psalms of the Christian church. Confession is neither as central as that tradition suggests nor as plain as the NRSV translation 'I am sorry for my sin' (v. 18) appears to say (the verb means 'I am anxious, troubled', cf. REB, NIV). Nevertheless, sickness and sin are clearly related, as in the book of Job, and this sufferer accepts that he has sinned and that his illness is divine punishment.

The intensely personal tone has convinced many that this is the prayer of an individual sufferer. Others set it within the cult or some healing rite. If cultic the prayer may have been offered in the sanctuary by a friend or representative of the sufferer rather than in person; if a healing rite it may have been performed at home, perhaps in the presence of some religious expert.

The psalmist's friends, companions, and neighbours who distance themselves from him (v. 11) probably see his suffering as a proof that he has sinned. Who those are who seek his life (v. 12) is not clear. Perhaps they are only those who demand that he should be punished for the wrong he has done rather than 'enemies', although later the psalmist is more bitter against them (vv. 19–20; the emendation adopted by NRSV and REB is very plausible). Whether the psalmist's deafness and silence (vv. 13–14) are his refusal to answer the accusations of his enemies or represent his humility before God is uncertain.

'For the memorial offering' in the title is a possible interpretation of the Hebrew which is more literally 'to call to remembrance' and has been taken as 'to confess one's sins'. The Targum supports the reference to an offering; the LXX adds '[for remembrance] concerning sabbath'.

Psalm 39 To understand this poignant psalm it is necessary to remember the basic convictions of the psalmist. He believes that sickness is divine punishment for sin, and he has no hope of any life beyond the grave.

NRSV takes vv. 1–3 as the psalmist's musings—he tries to keep silent and avoid questioning God, but he finds no relief. At v. 4 he begins his prayer. It is unusual in individual laments to find wisdom-type references to the brevity of human life in general; here the psalmist's pessimism approaches that of Qoheleth. In vv. 7–10 he affirms his trust in God and reiterates his refusal to question him before making his plea for healing. Then after a renewed acceptance of retribution, he utters a further passionate prayer (vv. 11–13).

In v. 12 the psalmist describes himself as God's 'passing guest' and 'an alien' (NRSV). The translation carries false overtones. The Hebrew word, rendered 'sojourner' by the older translations in many of the legal passages (e.g. Deut 24:17–22), refers to the non-Israelite who has settled in the land. Lacking the protection of the head of the family, he was liable to be taken advantage of and oppressed. The laws single out the ‘sojourner’ as enjoying God’s special protection, alongside other vulnerable persons, such as the fatherless and widows, and call upon the full members of the Israelite community to love them as themselves, remembering that they were ‘sojourners’ in Egypt (Lev 19:33–4; Deut 24:18, 22). The psalmist is putting himself under God’s protection rather than stressing the brevity of his life.

As with Ps 38, the intensely personal character of this psalm has led some to regard a cultic setting as impossible. Those who think all the psalms have liturgical use compare somewhat similar laments in other countries of the ancient Middle East. Ultimately it has to be admitted that the origins of this psalm are lost to us.

Psalms 40 vv. 13–17 of this psalm recur as Ps 70. This, together with the sharp difference between the thanksgiving for deliverance in the first part of the psalm (vv. 1–10) and the plea for help in the second (vv. 11–17) suggests to many that two psalms have been combined. Others, however, treat the psalm as a unity, the thanksgiving leading into the petition. In support of this they point out that there are links in vocabulary between the two parts (cf. ‘steadfast love’ and ‘faithfulness’ in vv. 10 and 11), and that the division in Ps 40 does not coincide with the beginning of Ps 70, which looks like a fragment (‘Be pleased’, v. 13, is missing from the Heb. of Ps 70:1).

Royal maximalists include this psalm among the royal psalms, interpreting the ethical stress in vv. 6–8 as fitting an annual festival or an enthronement ceremony. The lament following expressions of God’s favour would equally well suit a royal prayer in time of national distress, perhaps the attack of an enemy. Even if the psalm is taken as the prayer of an individual Israelite, a cultic background seems assured from the references to the ‘great congregation’ (vv. 9–10), the tone of bearing witness to past help from God, and the more general declaration of divine support for those who trust in YHWH, in the thanksgiving section.

The early Christians understood the psalm as messianic prophecy. vv. 6–8 are quoted in Heb 10:5–7 in the LXX version where the somewhat curious Hebrew ‘ears you have dug for me’ (NRSV ‘you have given me an open ear’) is replaced by ‘you have prepared a body for me’, which was then taken to be a reference to the incarnation. The origin of the LXX phrase is uncertain; it may have been internal Greek corruption (the Gk. words for ‘ears’ and ‘body’ are not too dissimilar, but could hardly have been confused except in a damaged MS) or a part of the body (‘ears’) may have been taken to represent the whole.

The apparent rejection of sacrifice in v. 6 is in line with some prophetic words (cf. Am 5:21–4), but the intention is probably to stress the greater importance of ethical obedience. The identification of ‘the scroll of the book’ (v. 7) is uncertain and suggestions are linked with the general view of the psalm that is taken: the document of the covenant demands presented to the king at his enthronement, the Torah with its laws that the individual accepts, and the heavenly record of the psalmist’s deeds have been proposed.

Psalms 41 Sickness and enemies lie behind this psalm. Beyond this, interpretations vary widely. Although complaint and lament have a large place, some classify it as the thanksgiving of the individual, treating vv. 4–10 as a description of the illness from which the psalmist has been healed by God. Others hold that it is a prayer for healing; the confidence in vv. 1–3 expresses the psalmist’s faith in wisdom-style language, and the concluding vv. 11–12 the ‘certainty of hearing’ found in several laments (e.g. Ps 6:8–10).

The setting of the psalm is equally debated. Royal maximalists ascribe it to the king. The care of the poor (v. 1) is a standard duty of the king, when the king is ill his enemies, even courtiers (‘who ate of my bread’, v. 9), are likely to plot against him, and the revenge of v. 10 is the common sequel to the defeat of such plots. Care of the destitute and orphans and the accusation that those who ate the writer’s food raised up troops against him is found in the Egyptian Instruction of Amen-em-het. Others, however, see here family or village services in the home for those who are ill, the enemies being those friends and neighbours who regard the psalmist’s illness as divine punishment. In vv. 7–8 there may even be a hint of sorcery and the belief that the psalmist is subject to a curse.

It is very probable that v. 13 is the closing doxology to the first book of the Psalter.

Psalms 42–3 This was almost certainly a single psalm, despite its division into two by both MT and LXX. Some Hebrew MSS join them together, although a few others add the title ‘Of David’ to Ps 43, where the LXX has ‘A psalm of David’. The refrain (42:5, 11; 43:5: NRSV has slightly modified the end of Ps 42:5 to agree with the later forms, probably rightly), and similarities of thought and language across both psalms confirm their original unity.

Opinions on the nature of the psalm and the psalmist differ widely. The intensely personal descriptions, mood, and petitions persuade some that it comes from an individual Israelite poet, expressing his inner thoughts and feelings. Ps 42:6 has often been taken to show that the psalmist was living in the north of Israel, perhaps in exile, perhaps at home but too far from Jerusalem to go frequently to the temple. The references to the psalmist leading the festal procession in the temple (42:4) suggest to others that it is a royal psalm, sung either when the court was absent from Jerusalem, perhaps on a military campaign, or when the king was on the way to pay tribute to his overlord. If the references in 42:7 are mythical and the descent into Sheol figurative (the repetition of the exact phrase in Jon 2:3 points to this), the king may be seriously ill. Yet others place the psalm in the worship of post-exilic Israel, as the Jews, suffering in the midst of a pagan empire, seek comfort and reassurance in a congregational liturgy. Whichever interpretation is adopted, the psalmist’s eager longing for God, expressed in the simile of a deer searching for water in a barren desert (42:1–2), his memories of happier days in the past (42:4), and his delight in the temple worship (42:2, 4; 43:4) are plain to see. Like other psalmists he is not afraid to accuse God of forgetting him (42:9) and abandoning him (43:2). Yet hope remains and becomes the refrain. He prays that the day will come when he can once again worship God in Jerusalem (43:3–4).

Psalms 44 The kind of occasion on which this communal lament may have been sung can be found in 2 Chr 20. Israel has been defeated in battle. The people come to the temple in great distress, unable to understand why God has not given them victory and beseeching him to help them.

The first part of the prayer is almost a hymn (vv. 1–8), recalling the way God had defeated the Canaanites and given his people the land of Israel. The people proclaim their trust in God and not in their armies and their own weapons. The tone changes completely at v. 9. God has allowed them to be defeated, even to be killed and taken prisoner. Neighbouring peoples scoff at their humiliation. They reiterate their trust in God and deny that the defeat is punishment for any sin. With great boldness they call upon God to awake from sleep and save them.

The occasional singular verses (4, 6, 15) may indicate that this is another royal psalm, the king being the leader and representative of the nation. Some of the Church Fathers took the psalm to be messianic prophecy, and v. 22 is quoted in Rom 8:36.

Psalm 45 Although some have interpreted this as a popular wedding song in which the bridegroom and bride are addressed as king and queen, and others treat it as referring to YHWH's 'marriage' with Israel (cf. Isa 62:4–5), it is most probably a psalm for a royal wedding. Because 'the daughter of Tyre' in v. 12 was taken to refer to a Tyrian princess, some have linked it with Ahab's marriage to Jezebel (1 Kings 16:31) and seen it as a northern Israelite psalm, but the phrase may refer to the 'people of Tyre', as NRSV. It may, therefore, have been used regularly at royal weddings. Less likely is the suggestion that it is evidence for a 'sacred marriage' in the annual festivals at Jerusalem.

After an introduction (v. 1), the poet addresses first the king (vv. 2–9) and then the princess (vv. 10–15), finally promising to the king both sons who will become princely rulers, and world-wide fame (vv. 16–17).

From early times the psalm was regarded as messianic prophecy. The Targum paraphrased v. 2 as 'Thy beauty, O King Messiah, exceeds that of the children of men', and the writer to the Hebrews quotes vv. 6–7 to show the superiority of Jesus over the angels (Heb 1:8–9). In Christian liturgical tradition it is sung on Christmas Day.

The text is in disorder in a number of places, hence the different renderings by modern Eng. versions. The meaning of v. 6 has been hotly debated. The most natural way of taking the Hebrew is as NRSV, with the king addressed as God. Because this would be unique in the OT (although the future king of Isa 9:6 is called 'mighty god'), alternative ways of interpreting the Hebrew have been sought. The NRSV marg. is one possibility, another is 'Your throne is everlasting like that of God'.

Psalm 46 Three stanzas, each ending with a refrain (vv. 7, 11; it seems to have fallen out after v. 3) and 'Selā', give this psalm a clear structure. Each section is marked by mythological features: the shaking of the earth, the river (akin to the river of Eden), YHWH as warrior. The divine name 'the Most High', probably rooted in Canaanite mythology (for the title 'the Lord of hosts', see ps H.5). There is no river in Jerusalem, only the spring of Gihon, but the idea, expressing the life-giving presence of God, was picked up frequently in the OT (cf. Isa 33:21; Ezek 47; Zech 14:8).

The psalm has been understood in four ways. (1) Historically, it has been linked with the failure of Sennacherib to capture Jerusalem in 701 BCE (2 Kings 18:9–19:36). (2) As cultic, it has been seen as part of the Jerusalem New Year Festival (v. 8 may call the worshippers to see the ritual drama). (3) Eschatologically, it has been treated as prophecy, looking forward to God's final salvation of Israel. (4) Liturgically it has been understood as part of the worship of post-exilic Judaism, the divine protection of Zion in past history or mythology providing assurance in the present. Of these the second seems most likely. There is insufficient detail to link it with any historical event, and while Zech 14 points to the use of cultic mythology in prophetic vision, it is more natural to see in the psalm the cult behind the prophecy rather than prophecy itself. The psalm has provided reassurance to anxious worshippers in the period after the Exile and beyond (Luther's great Reformation hymn, 'A safe stronghold our God is still', is based upon it), but this does not determine its origin.

NRSV has retained the traditional 'a very present help in trouble' (v. 1). The meaning is more probably, 'a well-proved help'. In v. 9 'shields' involves a change in the Hebrew vowels, and is widely accepted. MT has 'carts, wagons', a word which is never used of war-chariots.

The meaning of 'To Alamoth' in the title is completely unknown. Aquila and Jerome took it as 'young women', hence as sung by sopranos. The LXX has 'hidden things', i.e. religious mysteries. Another suggestion is that it is the name of the tune to which it was sung. In 1 Chr 15:20 the harpists play 'according to Alamoth'.

Psalm 47 This is the first of the 'enthronement psalms' (47; 93; 96–9; see ps E.5b, F.4). Its interpretation depends upon general conclusions about the existence of a New Year Festival at which YHWH was annually enthroned, the relation of this group of psalms to Deutero-Isaiah, the precise translation of the phrase 'God is king', whether a procession carrying the ark, symbol of YHWH, into the temple is implied by v. 5, the extent to which the allusion to the conquest of Canaan in vv. 3–4 emphasizes the covenant and controls the meaning rather than ideas of YHWH's enthronement, and how far ideas of a future divine rule are present. The dominant view today is that the psalm celebrates God's kingship at the New Year Festival, but there is less assurance that he was annually enthroned. In Christian tradition the psalm was linked to the celebration of the ascension, owing to v. 5 being taken as an ascent to heaven.

The structure is not entirely clear. NRSV accepts the 'Selā' as marking a major break, and introduces another break at v. 7. Alternatively the renewed call to praise in v. 6 may be the beginning of the second section of the psalm.

The translation 'with a psalm' (v. 7) takes the word maskil to be the same as that found in several psalm titles (e.g. Ps 32). Alternatively it may be verbal: 'to him who deals wisely', referring to God.

Psalm 48 This is the second of the Zion psalms (ps E.5a) and forms a pair with 46, praising God for his defence of Jerusalem. The main interpretations take it either historically, as the thanksgiving after the lifting of a siege by Israel's enemies, or within the cult, most probably as part of the New Year Festival. A few hold that it belongs to the worship of post-exilic Judaism.

vv. 1–3 express the praises of God and of his city, Jerusalem. The assembly, attack, and flight of the hostile kings who have come to seize the city is described in vv. 4–7. In vv. 8–9 the worshippers recall the deliverance they have witnessed and God's 'steadfast love' which secured it. Praise is again taken up in vv. 10–11, followed by a call to take good note of Zion so that the divine deliverance may be reported to future generations (vv. 12–14).

Probably 'in the far north' (v. 2) is mythological (cf. NIV 'Like the utmost heights of Zaphon'). At Ugarit šāpôn was the sacred mountain, the dwelling-place of the gods. The word does mean 'north' in Hebrew, but it is difficult to extract a satisfactory sense from it, despite attempts to show that Jerusalem was most beautiful when viewed from the north, that the psalm is really northern and does not refer to Jerusalem, or that it comes from the far south of Judah, from where Jerusalem would be in the north. Possibly the difficult closing words of the psalm express the same mythological ideas. NRSV has altered the vowels of MT to produce 'forever'. Others, with a small emendation, read 'According to Alamothe' (see the title of Ps 46), and take it as part of the title of Ps 49. With other vowels it may mean that YHWH is his people's leader and protector 'against Mot (death)', Baal's enemy in Ugaritic myths. Such use of mythology, together with what is apparently a religious procession in v. 12, and the claim to have 'pondered' (perhaps 'pictured', 'seen portrayed') these events within the temple, support the cultic interpretation of the psalm. No occasion when an enemy was defeated inside the city is known, and on a historical interpretation the procession would seem to be a tour of inspection after the enemy had retreated. The reference to the destruction of the 'ships of Tarshish' (probably Tartessus in Spain) may be a further indication that the ideas were taken over from Ugarit.

The LXX adds 'for the second day of the week' to the title, presumably indicating its place in the worship of the Jews in Egypt.

Psalm 49 This is usually described as a wisdom psalm, and there are similarities with the wisdom books both in theme and vocabulary. Nevertheless, it is included within the Psalter and may have been sung within the liturgy in post-exilic times. The imagery, e.g. death the shepherd (v. 14), and the contrast between the inability of humans to ransom their life and the divine ransom (vv. 6–7, 15), is striking.

The text is difficult and certainly corrupt in places (hence the many footnotes in all the Eng. versions). vv. 12 and 20 look like a refrain, but there are significant differences, retained only in NIV among recent translations. NRSV assimilates both to the form in v. 12, without a footnote, while REB emends both verses. The LXX reads both as: 'Man being in honour does not understand; he is compared to senseless animals and is like them.'

The poem consists of three parts: vv. 1–4: introduction; vv. 5–12: musing on universal death of rich as well as poor; vv. 13–20: confidence in divine 'ransom' from Sheol despite universal human mortality. If the differences between vv. 12 and 20 are significant, the second part of the psalm becomes yet more positive, distinguishing those with religious understanding from the impious rich.

The meaning of v. 15 is uncertain. Possibly the psalmist accepts the general OT belief that there is no life beyond death, and looks simply for God's protection from premature death. The overall sense of the psalm, however, with its contrast between the wealthy oppressors who are unable to 'ransom' their 'brother's' life, or perhaps their own (v. 7), and the divine 'ransom' suggests that here is a leap of faith: God will 'receive' the psalmist, perhaps in the same way that he 'took' (the same Heb. word) Enoch (Gen 5:24; cf. Elijah in 2 Kings 2).

Psalm 50 The links with prophecy are clear (see the judgement scene in Isa 1:2; Mic 1:2–4; 6:1–2; the teaching about sacrifice in Isa 1:10–15; Am 5:21–5; Mic 6:6–8; and the demands for righteousness in Isa 1:16–17, 21–6; Hos 4:1–3; Am 2:6–16; 5:24), suggesting to some that this psalm should be termed a 'prophetic liturgy', coming from a prophet within the regular cultic worship. Others propose a setting within the New Year Festival or posit a festival for the renewal of the covenant (cf. vv. 5, 16). Another view places the psalm in post-exilic Israel and terms it a levitical sermon.

The introduction depicts God coming in a majestic theophany, reminiscent of the appearance on Sinai (Ex 19:16–20), though now coming from the temple in Zion, and calling heaven and earth as witnesses in his lawsuit against his people Israel (vv. 1–6). The rest of the psalm falls into two parts. vv. 7–15 proclaim, with mocking irony, that God rejects sacrifice that is not offered in the right spirit. It is unlikely that ideas of sacrifice as food for the gods still survived openly in Israel, but the psalmist recalls the people to more spiritual ideas: the call in v. 14 is probably to offer a 'thanksgiving sacrifice', rather than to substitute thanksgiving for animal offerings. vv. 16–21 move on to a demand for righteousness. Stealing, adultery, and slander in vv. 18–19 bring to mind the Ten Commandments, but the phrasing is different and it is unlikely that they are a direct call to obey the Decalogue. The two final verses are akin to the curses and blessings found e.g. in Deut 28. v. 23 must express the same sense as v. 14: 'He who sacrifices thank-offerings honours me', NIV.

Running right through the psalm is a sense of the majesty of God, from the initial piling up of 'The mighty one, God, YHWH' (the Heb. could be equally well rendered 'YHWH, the greatest God'), through the imagery of the theophany and God's power as creator and owner of the universe, to the final threat of punishment and promise of salvation.

Psalm 51 The title links this, the greatest of the penitential psalms of the church, with the David and Bathsheba story (2 Sam 11–12). Although some attempt to justify this ascription, and others think that it was composed with David's sin in mind, it is more probable that the editor was led to make the connection because he thought it was generally suitable and noted certain similarities of language. Proposed settings for the psalm include penitential rites within the Jerusalem New Year Festival performed by the king as representative of the nation, corporate confession by survivors of the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 BCE, and early synagogue worship. The use of 'your holy spirit' and priestly sin and atonement language perhaps point to a date after the Exile.

Appeals for divine forgiveness, cleansing, and renewal (vv. 1–2, 6–12) lead into confession (vv. 3–5), joyful thanksgiving (v. 8, cf. v. 12), vows (vv. 13–15), and the acknowledgment that God desires contrition rather than sacrifice (vv. 16–17). vv. 18–19, with their prayer to God to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem and, in an apparent reversal of vv. 16–17, declaration that God will then delight in animal sacrifices, are often considered a later addition to the psalm. Some of those who link it with the pre-exilic temple cult accept an original unity, treating the rebuilding of the walls as simply strengthening them and interpreting vv. 16–17 as asserting no more than that God does not accept sacrifice without true penitence as sufficient in itself for atonement; once the people are penitent God will again delight in their offerings.

The psalm is notable for its deep understanding of sin and forgiveness. The psalmist realizes that all wrongdoing is sin against God and that the most serious consequence of sin is alienation from him, not any punishment that the sinner may receive. He knows that repentance requires not only knowledge of wrongdoing but also knowledge of God's grace (v. 1). Then repentance will not be a gloomy thing but full of gladness.

v. 5 has had a long, unhappy history of misunderstanding as providing evidence for original sin and the 'sinfulness' or impurity of sexual intercourse. Since ancient Israel rejoiced in marriage and the birth of children, this is hardly likely to be the true meaning. Rather the psalmist acknowledges that he belongs to a sinful race, and confesses the depth of the sinfulness he feels.

Psalm 52 The genre and background of this psalm are uncertain, and the text in vv. 1–2, 7, 9 is difficult. The title, with its reference to 1 Sam 22:9, is an example of the way the editor has searched the stories about David in the books of Samuel to discover suitable occasions for the composition of a number of the Davidic psalms. The psalm fits the narrative badly, since Doeg is an informer rather than a liar.

vv. 1–4 address the evildoer, v. 5 appears to express confidence that God will punish him, though it can be read as a prayer, and this confidence is continued in vv. 6–7. In vv. 8–9 the psalmist expresses his trust in God's steadfast love and concludes with a vow.

Those adopting a maximalist position on royal psalms explain this psalm as the king's speech to a powerful enemy, perhaps in the style of mockery before the actual combat. The 'righteous' and 'faithful' in vv. 6 and 9 may be the king's supporters. Others describe it as the prayer of a man accused by a perjured witness, even as a curse uttered against the wicked man before he is expelled from the community. Yet others link it with wisdom teaching, and see it as communal instruction. The denunciation is similar to that of the prophets (cf. Isa 22:15–19), and the psalm may have come from one of the prophets employed in the temple. If the main emphasis is placed upon vv. 5–9 the psalm may be taken as a thanksgiving after a slanderer has been discovered and condemned. With such obscurity about its nature and origins, the psalm may belong to any period of Israelite history.

The attitudes of the psalmist are hardly fitting for Christian worship, yet the psalm expresses divine judgement upon evil, bears witness against the sins of lying and slander, and is suffused with trust in God.

Psalm 53 This psalm appears to be a variant of Ps 14. The general interpretation is given there, but a few additional points need to be added.

Two extra phrases appear in the title: 'A Maskil [of David]', found in the group of psalms 52–5 and 'according to Mahalath', which may refer to a flute accompaniment or a flute-playing ceremony, or be the name of a melody. Another suggestion is that it is a reference to illness. Mahalath occurs only here and in Ps 88 (as Mahalath Leannoth, perhaps meaning 'to humiliate', i.e. for penitence), and while illness is appropriate there, it is not in Ps 53.

The differences in the text between the two psalms are relatively small, apart from the substitution of 'Elohim' for YHWH (a feature of this group of Elohist psalms), and v. 6, where Ps 14 reads: 'There they shall be in great terror, | for God is with the company of the righteous. | You would confound the plans of the poor, | but God is their refuge.' The attention is focused on the destruction of the wicked in Ps 53, but on God's protection of the poor in Ps 14. This suggests that the two traditions developed independently and that different factors influenced them. If the differences are purely textual, the state of the Hebrew text in the Psalter is worse than is commonly supposed.

Psalm 54 Here, as with Ps 52, the close resemblance of the historical part of the title to 1 Sam 23:19—almost a direct quotation—points to an editor searching through the historical books for a suitable setting for the psalm.

Here, as always, the interpreter's presuppositions determine the description of the psalm. Those who believe that a number of psalms were prayers against false accusations, perhaps linked with an ordeal, the taking of an oath, or an appeal to the 'higher court' of the temple, find support in v. 1 with its 'vindicate me'. A royal perspective finds foreign enemies or cultic opponents in the 'strangers' (v. 3; NRSV emends to 'the insolent'), 'the ruthless' (v. 3), and 'enemies' (v. 5), and supports this as the prayer of the king before battle or in a cultic drama by the appeal to God as personal saviour, and the covenant 'faithfulness' (v. 5). Others more generally describe it as the lament, prayer, or complaint of an individual.

From appeal (vv. 1–2) the psalmist moves to description of the danger facing him (v. 3), and on to confidence in God (vv. 4–5). Finally the psalmist promises to sacrifice a free-will offering, the one sacrifice which expressed the voluntary gratitude of a thankful heart (vv. 6–7, another example of the 'certainty of hearing').

Psalm 55 Several unique words of uncertain meaning, textual problems, doubt about the tenses in some verses, sudden changes of thought, and an alternation between a single enemy and groups of oppressors (somewhat obscured in NRSV) make this a difficult psalm to understand. It is commonly taken to be the prayer of an individual. Those attracted to royal interpretations ascribe it to the king, beset by foreign enemies and hostility within his own city, and with the head of a neighbouring state now become his adversary. The wider corruption depicted in the psalm may indicate that it is a prayer for the community, but the intense individuality found especially in vv. 4–8, 12–14 makes this less likely.

After an appeal to be heard (vv. 1–2a), the psalmist describes his anguish (vv. 2b–5; the verse division of NRSV is probably right). He has contemplated flight (vv. 6–8), for the city is full of violence, and he utters a curse (vv. 9–11: it may be that poetically ‘violence and strife’ are depicted as going round the walls, whether as watchmen or demons, but the subject of the verb may revert to the evildoers). Even his close friend has turned against him (vv. 12–14), and the psalmist utters a renewed curse (v. 15). Taking up his complaint, this time with greater confidence (vv. 16–19), he once again reverts to the treachery of his friend (vv. 20–1). In v. 22 he may recall the assurance of a temple prophet, and he closes the psalm with fresh trust in God who will destroy his enemies (v. 23).

Verses of great beauty (cf. 6–7, 16, 22) may appear to be immersed within desires for vindictive revenge, but the psalmist is concerned for righteousness and faithfulness, and it is this which determines the overall tone of the psalm.

Psalm 56 This is another prayer for help against enemies. Beyond that little can be said for certain. There seems small reason to class it with the prayers of those falsely accused, though some have proposed this. Those who ascribe many psalms to royal rites interpret the ‘peoples’ of v. 7 as foreign enemies, find references to national war in vv. 1–2, 9, and regard the vows and thank-offerings (v. 12) as particularly suitable for the king. They link the references to ‘death’ and the ‘light of life’ (v. 13) to royal imagery, perhaps related to a cultic drama. Alternatively it has been suggested that the psalm comes from one of the Jews of the dispersion who had to face anti-Semitism.

The similarities between vv. 4 and 10–11 may point to a division into two stanzas, with a concluding section vv. 12–13. But the certainty of hearing seems to begin at v. 9, which cuts across this scheme.

Special interest attaches to the title. The editor who linked Davidic authorship with events recorded in the historical books related the psalm to David’s flight to Gath in 1 Sam 21:10–15. NRSV’s ‘according to The Dove on Far-off Terebinths’ involves a change in the vowels of MT, which appears to mean ‘a dove of silence, distant ones’. The phrase is a reference to a melody, although it has been explained as a reference to a dove sent into the distant desert, rather like the scapegoat of Lev 16:20–2. The LXX has ‘for the people far off from the holy places (or holy people)’, while the Targum reads ‘concerning the congregation of Israel, which is compared to a silent dove at the time when they were far from their cities, and turned again and praised the Lord of the world’. Both of these show that in later tradition the psalm was treated as a national psalm spoken by the personified people.

Psalm 57 vv. 7–11 recur in Ps 108:1–5, and this, together with the change of theme between vv. 1–6 (a prayer for deliverance from enemies) and 7–11 (a confident thanksgiving which almost turns into a hymn), has suggested to some that two psalms have been combined. Against this is the refrain in vv. 5 and 11, and the probability that Ps 108 is a liturgical combination of psalmic pieces (108:6–13/Ps 60:5–12).

Some interpret this psalm as an individual lament (with the certainty of hearing having a more prominent place than usual), an individual thanksgiving (the first part describing the dangers from which the psalmist has been saved), or the prayer of a man falsely accused (who may have spent the night in the temple precincts while awaiting the decision on his case, cf. ‘I will awake the dawn’, v. 8). Others see it as a royal psalm, the shelter of God’s ‘wings’ (v. 1) and the divine title ‘elyôn (‘God Most High’, v. 2) linking it with the Jerusalem temple, while ‘steadfast love’ and ‘faithfulness’ (vv. 3, 10) reflect God’s covenant with the king. On this last view the reference to the king’s ‘glory’ (v. 8; NRSV translates as ‘my soul’) perhaps indicates casting off his ritual humiliation. The title shows that the editor linked the psalm with the stories in 1 Sam 22–4.

Psalm 58 This psalm does not easily fit into any of the main categories. The dominant theme is confidence that YHWH’s justice will prevail over present evil. An obscure text, which is probably corrupt (all the modern translations introduce some emendations) makes the details uncertain. A major difficulty is a word in v. 1 which appears to mean ‘silence’ (cf. RV ‘Do you indeed in silence speak righteousness’, apparently meaning that the judges or rulers fail to maintain justice). The LXX and Jerome read it as ‘but’, hardly possible in the context. Most change the vowels to read ‘gods’ (cf. Ps 82), either the lesser gods charged by YHWH with maintaining justice in the world, or the rulers, who are acting wickedly instead of upholding the law. The psalm is commonly regarded as a communal lament, but it is unusual to begin with an address to those who are causing the evils to which the righteous are being subjected. The description of the wicked in vv. 3–5 has suggested to some that it is instruction, perhaps given in the synagogue alongside the reading of the law, but there is little evidence for this. The calls for fierce punishment in vv. 6–9 (akin to the prophetic invective of Ps 52) and the rejoicing of the righteous when they see vengeance being taken (vv. 10–11) strike the modern reader as brutal. Attempts to soften the harshness include stressing the social situation where evil appears to call into question God’s authority and justice, the need in ancient Israel for justice to be vindicated in the present world, the danger of divine punishment on the covenant community when the covenant laws are flagrantly broken, and the use of curses as a protection and a way of affirming the covenant demands (see ps 1.2–8).

Psalm 59 This vigorous plea for the destruction of the psalmist’s enemies has been interpreted in several different ways. The least likely is that it is the prayer of the man who has been accused of some wrong, despite the protests of innocence in vv. 3–4. The clear references to foreign enemies (the word translated ‘nations’ in v. 5 is rarely used of Israel) and the general impression of hostile attacks in war possibly point to national prayer. This could be incorporated in a royal psalm, where the king is the leader and representative of his people and the one against whom the enemy’s attacks are primarily directed. Royal covenant ideas, such as steadfast love and fidelity (vv. 10, 16, 17), are noted by those who champion this interpretation.

The structure is not clear. What might appear as two refrains (vv. 6–7, 14–15, and 9, 17) have differences in wording that are hardly textual errors, and they do not divide up the psalm in any very obvious way, as an outline reveals: petition (vv. 1–2), description of the ambush (v. 3*ab*), declaration of innocence (vv. 3*c*–4*a*), renewed appeal (vv. 4*b*–5), comparison of the enemies as scavenging dogs (vv. 6–7), declaration of confidence that God will give victory over the enemies whom he holds in derision (vv. 8–10), plea for the destruction of the enemies (vv. 11–13, with some ambiguity as to whether the enemies are to be totally destroyed or simply weakened), repeated refrain (vv. 14–15), and a vow to offer praise or a closing thanksgiving (vv. 16–17).

The editor perhaps linked the psalm to the incident in 1 Sam 19:11–17 (part of v. 11 is quoted in the title) because the psalmist says he is surrounded by enemies who lie in wait for him.

Psalm 60 Although part of this psalm (vv. 5–12) is repeated in Ps 108:6–13, there is no reason to suppose that it is not a unity. It is usually classed as a corporate lament. The Israelites have been defeated in battle, and they express their complaint to God and pray for future victory in vv. 1–5. Then the divine promise of conquests is expressed, perhaps by a prophet, a section notable for the listing of parts of Israel and neighbouring lands over which God is to be sovereign (vv. 6–8). Complaint and petition are resumed in vv. 9–11, and the psalm ends with an expression of confidence that God will give his people victory (v. 12). The belief that military defeat was due to God's anger or rejection was common in the ancient world: King Mesha of Moab expresses similar sentiments on the Moabite stone: 'Chemosh [the Moabite god] was angry with his land' and allowed Omri to oppress Moab.

The title links it with 2 Sam 8:3–14 (cf. 10:6–14) but the details differ and since the account in 2 Samuel describes only victories the ascription is hardly apt, unless a previous defeat is assumed. The places mentioned in vv. 6–7 lie mainly, though not exclusively, in the area of northern Israel (Ephraim and Manasseh were the chief tribes). Moab, Edom, and the Philistines (vv. 8–9) were Israel's traditional enemies, who had been defeated by David. Hostility towards Edom increased after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 BCE, when the Edomites encroached on Israelite territory, hence many place the psalm after that date. 'Lily of the Covenant' (or 'Lily of Testimony') is probably the name of the melody to which the psalm is to be sung, though it has been suggested that it refers to using lilies as a means of divination.

Psalm 61 Despite the explicit reference to the king in vv. 6–7 those who restrict the number of royal psalms to a minimum regard this as the prayer of an individual Israelite, who includes among his petitions a plea on behalf of the king, such as is found in some Babylonian prayers. (There is little reason to suppose that the verses are a later interpolation.) Royal maximalists describe it as the king's psalm, and explain the reference to the king in the third person by pointing to similar changes from first to third persons in an inscription from King Yehawmilk of Byblos, arguing that the manner of speech is a way of stressing the privileges granted to the king, here long life and perhaps continued prosperity for his dynasty ('to all generations').

Despite some difficulties in the Hebrew text, the general sense is fairly clear. A plea to God for protection is linked with a promise to sing continual praise and pay daily vows. Unusually there is little indication of the dangers from which the psalmist is seeking deliverance. 'From the end of the earth' (v. 2) has been variously interpreted as showing that the psalmist was an exile, that the king was on a distant campaign, or even that the writer of the psalm depicted himself as at the entrance of Sheol. The references to God's 'tent' and the 'shelter of your wings' (v. 4) may refer to the Jerusalem temple.

Psalm 62 Royal maximalists treat this as a king's psalm, pointing to the references to God as 'my rock', 'my salvation', and 'my fortress' (vv. 2, 6), seeing in v. 3 a warning by the king, noting the exhortations to the people in vv. 8–10, and finding behind vv. 11–12 a divine oracle given to him. Others classify it as a psalm of confidence, even one of the clearest examples of this genre, with trust in God expressed in vv. 1–2, 5–8, 11–12; they explain the remaining verses, which describe attacks by enemies and teach the insignificance of human power and wealth, as a foil to this assured faith. The suggestion that the psalmist has taken refuge from his enemies in the temple, which some infer from vv. 2, 6, 7, seems rather precarious.

The almost exact repetition of vv. 1–2 in 5–6 sounds like a refrain. It has been suggested that it marks off the first, more personal, part of the psalm (vv. 1–7); 'Selâ' would then be misplaced, and vv. 8–12 would form the second part, which adopts a more direct teaching stance and contains language and ideas that are akin to wisdom. This does not mean that two psalms have been combined, for the note of trust is maintained throughout.

Psalm 63 Although confidence appears to dominate this psalm, most class it as an individual lament, largely due to the opening verses. Who the psalmist is and what called forth his prayer are far from certain. The reference to the sanctuary (v. 2) and to the liars who seek his life (vv. 9, 11) may point to criminal accusations from which the psalmist seeks to clear himself by an appeal to the higher court, through an ordeal, by uttering an oath of innocence, or by a divine oracle. The mention of the king in v. 11 does not necessarily make it a royal psalm, for the psalmist may include the king in his prayer (cf. Ps 61:6), but some features support this interpretation: the opening words may indicate the close covenant relationship with God that the king enjoys, vv. 9–10 perhaps refer to a battle with the slain left to be eaten by jackals, and the confident language, including references to God's steadfast love and protection, are thought by some to be more suitable in the mouth of a king than of an ordinary Israelite.

Tenses present some uncertainties, as variations between the Eng. versions show. Are vv. 9–10 an expression of what will happen to the enemies or should they be taken as a prayer (so REB)?

What incident in the life of David the editor had in mind is less clear than in some other psalms. 'When he was in the Wilderness of Judah' may refer to David's flight from Absalom (2 Sam 15–16), but the time when Saul was pursuing David has also been suggested (1 Sam 23:14; 24:2).

Psalm 64 Problems with the tenses in vv. 7–9 make the interpretation of this psalm difficult. The verbs would normally be translated as a description of past events. If this is adopted, the whole of vv. 2–9 is an account of the actions of the evildoers and the punishment which God has inflicted on them, and the psalm would be an individual thanksgiving, or a testimony to divine judgement. v. 1, however, looks like the introduction to a lament. If the psalm is treated as such a prayer for deliverance from the enemies, it would be most natural to see vv. 7–9 as an expression of confidence in the protection which God is going to give to the psalmist, and to translate the verbs as future (so NRSV; REB gives the same sense with presents and futures), either treating the tense as 'perfect of certainty' or making slight changes in the vowels. A third possibility is to regard the verbs as expressing a wish or prayer ('precativ perfect'), in which case the petition of v. 1 is picked up at the end of the psalm, after the description of the activities of the psalmist's enemies.

The metaphors in vv. 2–5 appear to point to slander, false accusations, or, possibly, curses or spells. They hardly refer to foreign enemies, and it is unlikely that they are to be taken literally, as if the psalmist's enemies were planning to mug him. This does not make their attacks any less fearsome, however, since the ancient Israelites regarded words as possessing their own power to achieve what was spoken (Isaac could not recall or alter the blessings which he had mistakenly pronounced upon Jacob, Gen 27).

Psalm 65 This psalm is commonly associated with harvest thanksgiving, possibly due to the overtones which 'you crown the year' (v. 11) has in English and the references to the flocks and grain in v. 13. It may have been a hymn of praise sung at the Feast of Booths (Tabernacles), but the emphasis upon the rains (though a feature of the Autumn Festival) may indicate that it belonged earlier in the agricultural year, perhaps at the beginning of the barley harvest (at the Feast of Unleavened Bread), or simply looking forward to the promise of a future plenty now that the rains have come. Others have suggested that it was intended as thanksgiving after a time of drought when the crops had begun to grow again (cf. 1 Kings 8:35–6; the linking of lack of rain and sin may be reflected in v. 3).

The three sections of the psalm are clearly defined: vv. 1–4, praise to God who answers prayer and forgives sin; vv. 5–8, a hymn to God, the mighty creator, which is rich in mythological ideas; and vv. 9–13, containing references to the rains and the harvest. The verbs, especially in vv. 11–13, present difficulties. The Eng. versions use English present tenses, describing the rains and the fruitfulness which God has given. The LXX took many of the verbs as imperatives and others as futures, thus making the psalm a prayer for forgiveness and a good harvest.

There seems no reason to think that the sections form separate psalms, as some have supposed. Praise, forgiveness, creation, and present providence fit easily together, especially when it is remembered that in ancient Israel creation was viewed as a recurring annual event, when God once again overcame the raging waters and secured the order of the world for another year.

Psalm 66 This psalm divides into three sections: vv. 1–7 are a hymn of praise to God in which the crossing of the Red Sea and the Jordan are referred to (v. 6; if 'the river' is parallel to 'the sea' the whole verse speaks of the Exodus deliverance); vv. 8–12 are a national thanksgiving for some more recent deliverance from foreign conquest; and vv. 13–20 are in the form of the thanksgiving of an individual, coming to the temple with sacrifices in payment of vows he had made when he was in distress.

Several different interpretations have been offered. (1) It may be that an editor has combined three originally separate psalms (or two, if vv. 1–12 originally formed one hymn of national thanksgiving). (2) An individual psalmist may have prefaced his own thanksgiving with hymns drawn from the temple worship, or the first two parts come from a temple festival within which the individual's thanksgiving was recited. (3) The whole psalm is national, the 'I' of the last part being Israel. (4) It is a royal psalm, in which the communal hymn and thanksgiving finds its focus in the king's thanksgiving. The last of these reconstructions has the advantage of explaining the large number of sacrifices offered, which otherwise has to be regarded as poetic exaggeration (v. 15), as well as providing a setting for the whole psalm taken as a unity, but it still leaves unresolved whether the psalm was originally sung at some festival commemorating the Exodus and Conquest, perhaps at Gilgal, was part of the annual New Year Festival, or was a liturgy of thanksgiving after victory against foreign enemies.

Psalm 67 The meaning of the Hebrew tenses presents great difficulties for the interpretation of this psalm, as a glance at the ways the Eng. versions translate v. 6 shows. NRSV takes the first Hebrew verb in its natural sense: 'The earth has yielded its increase'. On this view the psalm is a thanksgiving for the harvest. The verb in the second line of the verse, however, would not normally be translated 'God has blessed us' (NRSV), but rather as 'God will bless us' or 'may God bless us'. Moreover, exactly the same verb is used in v. 7a, so that there is little justification for the NRSV's 'May God continue to bless us' there, and the verbs in the rest of the psalm are most naturally taken as expressing prayers or wishes.

The refrain in vv. 3 and 5 divides the psalm into three sections, the first two being broadly parallel, seeking God's favour and salvation, leading to joy among all the nations as they see God's blessing—a universalism that is somewhat rare in the Psalter. It is against this background that the two final verses have to be interpreted. It would produce consistency if the anomalous verb were taken as a petition, 'May the earth yield its harvest', a possible sense for this tense. An alternative view is that it expresses a repeated experience, represented by a present tense in English, 'The earth yields its increase', forming the basis for the petitions in vv. 6b, 7a, which should be taken as 'May God continue to bless us'. NIV treats all the verbs in vv. 6, 7 as future, with 'has yielded' taken as a 'prophetic perfect' and expressing confidence that the prayer of the earlier sections of the psalm will be answered. This is possibly best of all.

Psalm 68 This is the most difficult of the psalms and the space available here is quite insufficient to offer a detailed discussion. The problems arise from the large number of words which are found only here in the OT, the difficulties in determining the meaning of the tenses, probable textual corruption in many verses, the lack of clear structure and sequence of thought, uncertainty as to the meaning of some phrases even where the words and surface translation are fairly obvious, and ignorance of the way the psalm was used in ancient Israel. A comparison between the Eng. versions shows up the difficulty of understanding the meaning very clearly.

The first words appear to be a quotation from Num 10:35, though not exact, and some believe that the author of Numbers used cultic material such as is found in the psalm. Here they can be translated in at least four ways: 'O that God would arise and his enemies be scattered', 'God will arise...', 'God arises...', 'When God arises his enemies are [or will be] scattered'. The similarities with Num 10:35, together with the vivid account of 'solemn processions' in vv. 24–5, have often been taken to show that the psalm accompanied a procession carrying the ark in the Autumn Festival. Other possible settings are as a battle song, or a ritual at Gihon or Mount Tabor. The disjointed nature of the psalm, however, has led others to suppose that several different psalm fragments have been combined, even that it is a kind of index in which the opening verses of a large number of poems are listed. Many of the ideas reflect the myths of other religions in the ancient Middle East, such as the accounts of YHWH riding on the clouds, as Baal did, the giving of rains, the defeat of 'Death', and battle scenes (at Ugarit the goddess Anat waded in the blood of her defeated enemies). These are intertwined with themes derived from the historical traditions of Israel: the Sinai theophany, the wilderness wanderings, victories over Israel's enemies, and the confederation of tribes (though only four are named in v. 27).

If an attempt is made to treat the psalm as a unity, it may be divided into eight sections: vv. 1–3, God victorious over his enemies; vv. 4–6 God, the protector of the needy; vv. 7–14, God's victory (with reminiscences of the Song of Deborah in Judg 5); vv. 15–18 (or 20), YHWH's choice of Zion as his dwelling; vv. 19 (21)–23, God's victory brings salvation to his people; vv. 24–7, a description of the procession; vv. 28–31, the subject peoples bring gifts and submit to YHWH; vv. 32–5, a triumphant hymn of praise to God.

Psalm 69 This psalm has some similarities with Ps 22, and both are quoted frequently in the NT (cf. Jn 15:25 (v. 4); Jn 2:17; Rom 15:3 (v. 9); Jn 19:28–9 (v. 21); Rom 11:9–10 (vv. 22–3); Acts 1:20 (v. 25)). vv. 1–29 are a plea for help, while vv. 30–6 read like a hymn of thanksgiving and praise. The change of tone and form is often regarded as indicating the expression of a favourable oracle or some other sign that God has heard the psalmist's prayer, but some see the final verses as an attempt to fit an earlier psalm into the post-exilic situation.

The background to the psalm is uncertain. The reference to the waters reaching up to the psalmist's neck (v. 1, cf. 14–15) probably indicates severe illness in which he feels that he has almost sunk down into Sheol. More prominent are the accounts of enemies (vv. 4, 9–12, 14, 18, 19–21; even his family are estranged, 8), followed by the psalmist's curses on them (vv. 22–8). Perhaps they believe that he is being punished by God. It may be, therefore, that this is the prayer composed for those who are sick, to be offered by the sufferer, or on his behalf, in the temple. Those who believe that many of the psalms are to be ascribed to the king point to communal aspects, the lofty position which the psalmist appears to hold, and the psalmist's plea as that of the nation's representative. The curses are felt to be appropriate to the royal office. To regard restoring what he did not steal (v. 4) as a reference to the payment of reparations after military defeat seems to be going beyond the natural sense of the verse: the enemies are more naturally taken as fellow Israelites, most probably members of the psalmist's own village or small town. Others include the psalm among the prayers of those accused of some crime, connected with an ordeal, an appeal to the higher court in the temple, or part of an oath ceremony, but this does not seem to fit the overall mood of the psalm.

It is impossible to explain the curses in vv. 22–8 as a quotation of the words of the psalmist's opponents, since they are addressed to more than one person, and they have to be accepted with their full force as what the psalmist wished upon his enemies (see ps 1.2–8).

Psalm 70 This psalm repeats Ps 40:13–17, and most treat it simply as a doublet, the minor differences in the text being due either to corruption or deliberate alteration. Opinion is divided between taking Ps 70 as the original, which has been combined with another psalm to form a liturgy in Ps 40, and treating Ps 40 as the earlier psalm, possibly a royal psalm, vv. 13–17 here being offered as a short plea for the use of ordinary Israelites. The lack of 'Be pleased' in Ps 70:1 (NRSV adds it) perhaps favours the second view, but it is possible that 'make haste' serves both halves of the verse (as REB and NIV, despite their different renderings in the two parts, 'Make haste'/'Hasten' and 'come quickly'). The LXX takes the first line as part of the title, rendering it very literally, 'that the Lord may save me'.

As it stands, Ps 70 is a terse and urgent prayer for God's help to save the psalmist from enemies who wish to harm, even kill him.

Psalm 71 In the first two books of the Psalter there are four psalms which lack a title, this being one. Of the others the LXX joins 9 and 10, which the acrostic confirms, and the refrain links 42 and 43. Whether 70 and 71 were treated as one psalm is uncertain. Some Hebrew MSS join the two psalms, but the LXX provides a title for Ps 71: 'By David, of the sons of Jonadab and the first ones taken captive'.

vv. 9, 17–18 suggest that the psalmist is an old man. The distress from which he seeks relief may be severe illness and the approach of death (v. 20), and, as so often in the psalms, his 'enemies' assert that God has abandoned him (v. 11). He speaks of the faith in God which has sustained him all his life (vv. 5–6, cf. 17), prays that God will not reject him (v. 9), and asks for renewed health (vv. 20–1) and the discrediting of his enemies (v. 13, cf. v. 4). Then he will renew his praises (vv. 14–16, 22–4).

Royal maximalists interpret it as the king's psalm, perhaps towards the end of his reign, when there are attempts to supplant him. They point to the close relationship with God that the psalmist affirms, and see royal declarations in his witness to God's salvation (vv. 15, 18) and his praises. Other speculations are that the psalm is a call for protection from impending danger, the prayer of one who has fled to the sanctuary (cf. vv. 1–3), and a plea by faithful Israelites in the post-exilic community. If, however, the references to old age are given primary emphasis, the psalm appears to be much more the work of an individual poet than a liturgical piece for repeated use.

A feature of the psalm is the frequent allusion to other psalms, even almost direct quotation (e.g. vv. 1–3/Ps 31:1–3; vv. 5–6/Ps 22:9–10; v. 11 (NRSV reverses the clauses)/Ps 22:1; vv. 12–13/Ps 35:22; 38:21; 40:13–14; v. 24/Ps 35:4, 26; 40:14). Might it be that the elderly psalmist strengthens his faith and expresses his petition through well-known and greatly loved psalms?

Psalm 72 The obvious reference to the king secures agreement among the commentators that this is a royal psalm. Differences appear only when the original setting is considered. The marked idealism suggests to many that it is appropriate for the king's coronation or enthronement, though it may have been sung at the annual celebration of his accession. Key themes are the just rule which the king will exert, especially in his care for the poor and oppressed (vv. 1–2, 4, 12–14), and the prosperity which his righteousness will bring to his people (vv. 3, 6–7, 16), together with the submission of foreign nations, who will bring tribute (vv. 8–11, 15).

As with many psalms, the tenses prove troublesome. The LXX treats them all as future apart from vv. 3a, 17a. NRSV and REB regard vv. 2–11, 15–17 as prayers or wishes, with vv. 12–14 as descriptive and providing the grounds for the favour which God shows to him and his people, and this may well be right. NIV keeps futures apart from vv. 15–17a, perhaps from conservatism, since AV has future tenses throughout, but possibly because it takes the psalm as messianic prophecy. It was treated as messianic in Jewish and early Christian tradition, the Targum paraphrasing v. 1 as 'O God, give the precepts of thy judgement to King Messiah, and thy righteousness to the son of king David', and v. 17 as 'His name shall be remembered for ever; and before the sun existed his name was prepared; and all peoples shall be blessed in his merits'. It is never quoted in the NT, however, though at an early period it was adopted as the special psalm for Epiphany.

The ascription to Solomon in the title, found also in Ps 127, may have been suggested to the editor by vv. 1, 10, 15 (cf. 1 Kings 10:1–10, 22). In the LXX the form is different from the common 'Of David' normally expressed, and possibly 'for Solomon' rather than 'by Solomon' was intended—a Davidic psalm which he composed for Solomon.

It is generally agreed that vv. 18–19 are a doxology at the end of Book 2 of the Psalter and are not an integral part of the psalm. For v. 20 see ps D.4.

Psalm 73 This psalm has some affinities with the wisdom writings, but its strongly personal tone and references to the temple have led many to hesitate about classing it simply as a wisdom psalm. Possible genres range from an individual lament or thanksgiving, a meditation or psalm of confidence, to a royal psalm. While a case can be made out for the last (Israel is mentioned in v. 1 (NRSV emends), v. 15 seems to imply that the speaker is someone in authority, the intimate trust in God is suitable for a king, the evildoers, probably apostate Israelites, might just possibly be foreign oppressors, and the psalmist's loss of faith would fit the king's humiliation in the cult) most think that its intensely individualistic stance, coupled with the wisdom elements, make it unlikely. Form-critical approaches are less helpful than concentrating on its thought.

The psalmist declares that he almost lost his faith in God when he saw how prosperous the wicked were, and he wondered whether his hard struggle to maintain his personal integrity was worthwhile. His first bulwark against apostasy is the effect that such unbelief would have on others (vv. 15–16). But the turning-point in his experience was a visit to the temple (v. 17). There an oracle, taking part in religious rites, or an experience of God's presence, restored his faith. He realizes that evildoers will meet sudden divine judgement (vv. 18–20) and finds the blessing of knowing God (vv. 21–6), and the psalm ends, as it began, with the supreme 'good' (v. 28).

Some verses appear to be corrupt, and others are difficult to interpret, reflected in the considerable variations between the Eng. versions. In v. 1 NRSV and REB divide the Hebrew letters differently to produce '[good] to the upright'. This provides a good parallel to 'pure in heart', but lacks any textual support, and 'to Israel' should probably be retained. In v. 4 whether the wicked avoid suffering during their lifetime or at the moment of death is uncertain. v. 10 seems to be beyond recall. The meaning of the important v. 24 is uncertain not because of a corrupt text but because the meaning of several words is ambiguous. The issues are: (1) does 'afterwards' refer to the psalmist's present troubles or to death? (2) what connotation should be given to 'glory'—'with honour' or the glory of God's presence? and (3) does 'you will receive' relate to the experience of Enoch and Elijah, who were 'received, taken up' by God, presumably to be with him for ever, or is it divine acceptance in this life? The general lack of any belief in an afterlife throughout the OT except in the very latest writings makes it uncertain whether the psalmist envisages a happy life after death. But the hope seems so important in the thought of the psalm that perhaps it should be seen as a leap of faith.

Psalm 74 Although it has been suggested that this psalm has no historical links but belongs to a ritual desecration of the temple in the cult, almost everyone agrees that it celebrates the destruction of the temple by the Babylonians in 586 BCE. This is the only occasion when the temple was actually burned, and similarities with the poems in Lamentations which commemorate the event provide support. Whether it was composed soon after the events it describes or later, perhaps as part of an annual remembrance of the destruction, is less easy to decide. On the other hand the reference to the enemy having 'burned all the meeting places of God in the land' (v. 8) has sometimes been seen as a reference to synagogues (so Aquila and Symmachus), and the psalm has been interpreted as a reaction to the desecration of the temple by Antiochus Epiphanes in 167 BCE. The Targum paraphrased 'the impious' (v. 22) as 'this mad king', apparently thinking of Antiochus Epiphanes, who was nicknamed by his enemies 'Epimanes', 'madman', which possibly indicates that the psalm was used later to commemorate the Greek desecration of the temple. It may even be that it was modified at that time, but the description in the psalm fits the Babylonian attack more closely than any other. It is very uncertain whether synagogues were built as early as the Maccabean period, and the LXX reads 'Come, let us abolish the feasts of the Lord from the land' in v. 8, as do the Targum, Syriac, and Vulgate.

The main structure of the psalm is clear: vv. 1–11 and 18–23 are prayers to God to come to the people's aid, while vv. 12–17 recall the power of God in creation in hymnic fashion, using mythical ideas similar to those in Ugarit and Babylon (some find a reference to the Exodus in this section, and the NRSV may intend to support this with its translations 'You divided the sea' and 'creatures of the wilderness', but the whole passage more naturally refers to the divine battle that preceded creation). It has been suggested that the verbs show that the psalm has a more elaborate, chiastic form: vv. 2–3 being matched by 18–23 (imperatives), 4–9 by 12–17 (perfects), and 10–11 (imperfects) forming the central section, with v. 1 as an introduction. Other word-plays, matching words, and the sevenfold repeated ‘You’ in vv. 12–17 reveal the artistry behind the poetry.

Psalm 75 The rapid changes of speech and style make it difficult to fit this psalm into any of the main categories. It begins as a thanksgiving by the community (v. 1). vv. 2–5 in the first person have been described as a prophetic oracle or the words of the king, declaring divine judgement on the wicked. God is the Creator who established the foundations of the world and maintains justice. The next section (vv. 6–8) describes the future judgement, of which the ‘cup of foaming wine’ is a symbol, perhaps taken from the old ordeal in which the accused was made to drink a potion that would prove poisonous only to the wicked (for the figure cf. Ps 11:6; Isa 51:17). In v. 9 the psalmist (individual, king, or the community) vows to utter praise to God, and the psalm ends with a renewed promise, in a divine oracle or the words of the king, to destroy the power of the wicked (v. 10).

The psalm fits naturally into some cultic festival. Those who treat a maximum number of psalms as royal regard this also as the king’s psalm. Others note the oracles and describe it as a prophetic liturgy. Whether it ever had a historical background such as the failure of Sennacherib to capture Jerusalem (2 Kings 18–19, cf. 19:35) is doubtful, as is the suggestion that it looks forward to the last judgement.

Psalm 76 This psalm has similarities with Ps 46 and 48, and like them has been interpreted as the celebration of some Israelite victory over their enemies, as part of the New Year Festival in Jerusalem, as a prophecy of God’s future victory, and more generally as post-exilic praise. The addition to the title in the LXX, ‘to (concerning) the Assyrian’ indicates that the first of these was adopted in some Jewish traditions, and the psalm related to Sennacherib’s attack and defeat as described in 2 Kings 18–19. REB adopts a common emendation of v. 10 (‘Edom, for all his fury, will praise you | and the remnant left in Hamath will dance in worship’), finding in the verse an allusion to David’s victories, but some who accept the change of text reject a historical interpretation. Linking it with the pre-exilic Jerusalem Autumn Festival is probably more likely, though its presence in the Psalter shows that it continued to be sung in later worship.

NRSV follows the usual division of the text: vv. 1–3 praise God who chose Zion as his dwelling and defended his city; vv. 4–6 describe that victory in more detail; vv. 7–9 change the metaphor into that of judge who saves the humble; and the final section, vv. 10–12, which is less of a unity, declares that human beings will worship YHWH, even those most hostile to him, and calls on them to perform their vows. The ‘Selâ’ in vv. 3 and 9 adopts a threefold structure by treating the middle sections as a description of God.

Psalm 77 Difficulties in understanding the tenses in vv. 1–12 make the interpretation of this psalm uncertain (contrast NRSV’s present tenses with the predominantly past tenses of REB and NIV). Is it the anguished prayer of an individual in distress that is made greater by his nation’s suffering? On this view vv. 11–20 sustain the psalmist by recalling God’s power as the Creator (or perhaps as the God who saved Israel at the Red Sea (Ex 14:10–31) at the time of the Exodus). Or is it a psalm of thanksgiving which also recounts the troubles from which the psalmist has been delivered? The contrast between vv. 1–10 and 11–20 has suggested to some that two psalms have been combined, a lament and a hymn of praise, the abrupt end in v. 20 possibly indicating that the second part is only a fragment of the original hymn. Yet there are striking similarities of vocabulary between the two parts, and indeed it has been suggested that there are deliberate parallels forming an inclusio, e.g. ‘voice’ of lament in v. 1 (‘aloud’) and ‘voice’ of God’s thunder in v. 17, the ‘hand’ of the psalmist (v. 2), the ‘hand’ of Moses and Aaron (v. 20), and ‘remember’ in vv. 3 (‘think’), 5, 11. However the psalm is understood, the urgent questions in vv. 7–9 lie at its heart.

Taken as a unity, the psalm has been classified in many different ways: the prayer of an Israelite (possibly from the northern kingdom, if any weight is to be placed on ‘Jacob and Joseph’ in v. 15); a national lament; communal thanksgiving for deliverance from some national distress; a royal psalm in which the king is representative of his people, bearing the nation’s suffering, and offers his intercession for the nation, with the final verse perhaps pointing to the king’s office as shepherd of his people. It has even been suggested, rather improbably, that this is another of the prayers by a man falsely accused of some wrong.

In the absence of much secure evidence, this is an excellent example of the way interpretation is controlled by the presuppositions that are brought to the psalm.

Psalm 78 This is the first of the three great history psalms (Ps 124). The writer begins like one of the wisdom teachers (‘teaching’, ‘parable’, and ‘dark sayings’ are wisdom vocabulary, and the emphasis on teaching the next generation reflects the aims of the wise men). But unlike Proverbs or Job, this writer chooses to express his teaching by recounting incidents in Israel’s history. The broad structure is clear. The history is worked over twice, first concentrating on events during the period of the wilderness wanderings (vv. 12–41), then pointing more directly to the Exodus (vv. 42–53), but continuing the history up to the time of David (vv. 54–72). The emphasis is upon God’s continuing protection and forgiveness of Israel, contrasted with Israel’s constant rebellion and lack of trust. Past failures are told in order to urge the people to remember God’s goodness and obey him. How far the introduction extends is not obvious: a narrow view limits it to vv. 1–4, but since the survey of history begins at v. 9 (or even 12), it may extend to v. 8.

Whether it is profitable to attempt to fit the psalm into any of the major categories is doubtful. It is not obviously either a hymn or a confession, and the sharp differences which mark it off from the wisdom books of the Old Testament make its description as a wisdom psalm unsafe, though it is plainly didactic.

Many attempts at dating the psalm have been made. The chief pieces of evidence that have been drawn upon are: the mention of the destruction of Shiloh, the ending of the history with David, the criticisms of the northern kingdom without any reference to its destruction in 722; the apparent existence of the Jerusalem temple, comparisons of the plagues with the lists in the 'sources' of the Pentateuch, and similarities with the Deuteronomistic interpretation of history. Most arguments are indecisive, and while very early dates have been suggested (the time of David or Solomon), and many are willing to concede a pre-exilic date, in a sense all the psalms are post-exilic since this is the period in which they were edited and collected.

Whether the psalm was used in worship is equally uncertain. Some have suggested that it was sung at the Autumn Festival as an expression of salvation history that formed part of the covenant renewal. Various speakers at such a celebration have been proposed: the king, a Levite, or a prophet. The general didactic tone of the psalm, however, may mean that it was never linked with worship.

Psalm 79 Everyone agrees that this is a communal lament, and most accept the early Jewish tradition that it refers to the fall of Jerusalem in 586 and the destruction of the temple, even though the language is so allusive that other historical incidents might be suggested. It may well have been recited on the fast day that commemorated that event (cf. Zech 7:3, 5; 8:19, and Ps 74 for a similar lament).

Complaint at God's inaction, urgent prayer, confession, and imprecations on the enemies of Israel are interwoven so that it is difficult to produce a clear structure for the psalm. vv. 1-4 describe the disaster, and the petition of the worshippers follows in vv. 5-12, the psalm concluding with a vow to offer thanksgiving and praise (v. 13).

If the prayers for vengeance offend modern sensitivities, we should perhaps be less ready to find relief in the (correct) assertion of earlier scholars that the psalmists saw the defeat of his people as an insult to God himself, now that we are aware of the ease with which religion adds to the evils of war.

Psalm 80 This is another communal lament. It is unusual in having a refrain (vv. 3, 7, 19), and having northern Israel as its main concern. An addition to the title in the LXX referred it to the Assyrian attacks, and it has been suggested that this is correct and that the period towards the end of the northern kingdom, perhaps in 733, is the subject of the plea to God. Alternatively it may come from Judah (the cherubim (v. 1) are usually associated with the Jerusalem temple) and there are some links with Isaiah, who uses a similar image of a vineyard whose wall God breaks down (Isa 5:1-7), while Jeremiah and Ezekiel both refer to YHWH as shepherd, although the exact phrase 'Shepherd of Israel' is unique here, and both show an interest in the northern kingdom. It is impossible to be certain, however, and it has been argued that the psalm is post-exilic and has picked up earlier traditions in a renewed lament.

A refrain (vv. 3, 7) marks off the first two sections of the psalm: vv. 1-2, a call to God for help; vv. 4-6, an urgent plea and complaint at God's treatment of his people. The rest of the psalm then forms a final section, describing God's past care of Israel, referring in the figure of the vine to the Exodus and conquest, and the present distress (vv. 8-13, did the refrain originally follow v. 13 as well?). Petition is renewed in vv. 14-17, with a vow to return to God in v. 18, and a repetition of the refrain in the last verse.

Psalm 81 A reference to the renewal of the covenant has often been found in this psalm (cf. v. 7b, possibly an allusion to Sinai, and the similarities of vv. 9-10 with the beginning of the Decalogue, Ex 20:2-5, together with the kind of teaching found in Deut 4:1; 5:1; 6:4; 9:1, and the reference to a seven-yearly ceremony of covenant renewal in Deut 31:9-13). Whether such a ceremony was part of the New Year Festival has been questioned; the reference to the new moon and full moon in v. 3 and the blowing of the trumpet perhaps reflect the celebration of New Year and Tabernacles. Although the teaching of vv. 9-10 are similar to the Decalogue, the words for 'strange' god and 'foreign' god are different from the 'other gods' of Ex 20 and Deut 5, as is the verb 'brought [you] up', and the order of the phrases is reversed.

The psalm begins like a hymn (vv. 1-5b), and this is followed by an oracle (vv. 5c-16). This is probably a feature of the liturgy and does not indicate that two separate psalm fragments have been combined, although that may be how the liturgy was developed. vv. 6-10 describe God's deliverance of his people from Egypt, while vv. 11-16 remind them of their past disobedience and promise victory over their enemies if they obey him. v. 10c fits oddly and has often been transposed to follow v. 5c as the announcement to the prophet of the oracle that God is giving him. Some see in the changes between third and second person (note NRSV marg. in v. 6) an indication of further disarrangement, the two oracles being vv. 6, 11-16 and 7-10.

Psalm 82 Jewish tradition, seen in the Targum and reflected in Jn 10:34-6, interpreted this psalm as the condemnation of the human rulers of Israel, similar to Isa 3:13-15, but v. 7 makes no sense on this interpretation and it is almost universally accepted today that the picture is of YHWH's heavenly court (cf. 1 Kings 22:19-22; Job 1:6-12; 2:1-7), similar to the pantheons of other nations, with YHWH presiding as Marduk or El did. The gods were apparently charged with maintaining justice in their client kingdoms, but they have shown partiality to the wicked and have not defended those who are exposed to oppression, orphans and the poor. vv. 2-4, 6-7 set out YHWH's judgement. His sentence is that the gods will die like human beings. v. 5 may refer either to the wicked or the gods. The verse stands out within the divine judgement, and some have suggested that the psalm is in chiasmic form:

The psalm ends with a prayer that YHWH will undertake universal rule and bring in universal righteousness. This has suggested to some that rather than a prophetic oracle or vision the psalm is really a lament, but it is possible to regard the verse as an exclamation, as in Isa 21:5 and Mic 4:13.

Psalm 83 The extended list of enemies who have leagued themselves together against Israel (vv. 6-8) has given rise to many attempts at dating. Theodore of Mopsuestia (350-427 CE) suggested the time of the Maccabees (cf. 1 Macc 5). Other dates range from pre-exilic times (the reign of Jehoshaphat, cf. 2 Chr 20) to after the Return (cf. Neh 4). The list contains ten names, which perhaps indicates that it is symbolic and that the psalm is a cultic lament (cf. Ps 2:1–3; 46:6; 48:4–8).

After calling upon God to remain inactive no longer (v. 1), the onslaught of the enemies is described (vv. 2–8). The rest of the psalm is an appeal to God to destroy these enemies, and the victories of Deborah and Barak over the Canaanite leader Sisera (Judg 4–5) and of Gideon over the Midianites Oreb and Zeeb, and Zebah and Zalmunna (Judg 7:25; 8:13–21) are recalled as examples. Those looking for literary patterns point to the chiasmic arrangement of vv. 3–6, with the enemies of Israel flanked by the enemies of God.

Psalm 84 This is usually termed a pilgrim psalm, and the happiness which the godly Israelite finds as he makes his way to the temple for the Autumn Festival shines through. Other suggestions are that it is an entrance liturgy or simply a hymn of Zion. Several different types of prayer appear in it: expressions of joy and confidence that would fit a hymn of praise (vv. 1, 10, 12), longing, rather in the style of a lament (2, cf. 10a), prayer for the king (vv. 8–9; ‘our shield’ refers to the king), and a description of the pilgrimage as the autumn rains are falling (vv. 5–7). The whole psalm is bound together by the first and last verses, both addressing ‘YHWH of hosts’ and expressing delight and happiness. Most—even of those who find a maximum number of royal psalms—draw back from ascribing this psalm to the king himself, preferring to think of a cultic soloist.

In v. 7 the MT seems to mean: ‘he appears before God in Zion’ (cf. RV); NRSV follows the LXX. Behind the psalm may be worship in which God was represented by an image which the worshippers ‘saw’ in the temple. No image of YHWH existed in Israel, but the phrase may have taken this over conservatively in the liturgy. Later scribes, anxious about orthodoxy and reverence, altered the verb into ‘appear before’.

Psalm 85 The surface structure of this psalm is clearer than its exact interpretation. vv. 1–3 describe a past forgiveness and salvation; vv. 4–7 are in the form of a communal lament, a prayer for an end to God’s anger and renewed deliverance; in vv. 8–13 a prophet tenses himself to hear God’s word and proclaims the promise of rich spiritual and material blessing.

Problems of the meaning of the Hebrew tenses, coupled with uncertainty about the date of the psalm and hence its historical or cultic background, make interpretation difficult. There are three main ways of interpreting the psalm.

Some place it in the period after the Exile, perhaps later than the time of Haggai and Zechariah. vv. 1–3 express the same sentiments as Isa 40–55, while the next section reflects the hardships which the returned exiles experienced, so different from their hopes. They still need the promise of vv. 8–13.

Others think that it belongs to the pre-exilic temple worship, the first section referring to the Exodus salvation, and the emphasis on righteousness suiting their understanding of the thrust of the New Year Festival, or perhaps v. 11 contains the hint of a bad harvest as the disaster from which God’s help is sought.

Rather differently, others, sensitive to the contrast between the joyful account of an apparently past deliverance and the following prayer, take the Hebrew tenses in vv. 1–3 either as prophetic, the whole psalm then becoming confident prophecy, or as petition, which turns the whole psalm into a lament, perhaps ending with the certainty of hearing.

Psalm 86 All agree that this is the prayer of an individual, and many describe it as almost a mosaic of quotations. The ‘quotations’, however, may simply be traditional phrases which the psalmist is reusing. There is less unanimity about the identity of the psalmist. The maximalists hold that it is a royal psalm, probably linked with the ritual humiliation of the king in the cult. They point to the extravagance of v. 9 which seems to go beyond what could be expected from an ordinary Israelite, and note the attacks by the enemies, the association of divine power with the king as YHWH’s servant, and the stress on God’s faithfulness and his great name, ideas that are linked elsewhere with kingship. On the other hand, some include it among the pleas of those unjustly accused or seeking divine acquittal, but there seem to be few grounds for this proposal. Perhaps it is a post-exilic psalm based on early traditional phrases, possibly taking over some features that previously belonged to royal psalms. The psalmist says so little about the distress from which he seeks God’s rescue that it is difficult to determine what it is: enemies, false accusations, illness, even sin, are all hinted at.

The three-part structure is transparent: vv. 1–7, a plea for help, based on the psalmist’s piety (vv. 1–4) and the character of God (vv. 5–7); vv. 8–13, a hymn-like section, interrupted by a call on God to teach the psalmist (v. 11) and ending with thankful confidence that his prayer is answered, or a vow to offer praise, perhaps even to sacrifice a thank-offering (vv. 12–13); vv. 14–17, renewed prayer, ending with a request for a ‘sign’, either some ritual or an oracle, or the salvation itself.

Frequent parallels and repetitions, such as an eightfold ‘for’ in vv. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 10, 13, the repeated ‘Lord’ (vv. 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 11, 12, 15, 17), and the description of the psalmist as YHWH’s ‘servant’ (vv. 2, 4, 16), have led some to look for literary patterns. A chiasmic structure, with v. 11 in the centre receiving the main stress, has been detected.

Psalm 87 This short psalm is one of the most difficult in the Psalter. Short phrases and possible textual corruption, together with lack of clear sequence of thought have led to widespread emendation and rearrangement of the verses (cf. NEB). The only safe approach, however, is to retain the MT (REB has reversed many of the changes in NEB), even if this is not as the poet intended.

To classify it as one of the Songs of Zion takes the interpretation only a small way. The date and original setting are completely uncertain. The reference to dancing in v. 7 perhaps indicates that it was linked with a festal procession. The difficult middle section (vv. 4–6) may be taken in many different ways: as looking to the future when Jerusalem would be the centre of universal worship; as listing some of the nations from which Jewish proselytes have come to the festival; as a reference to Jews who come from different countries in the dispersion. The universal perspective may point to a post-exilic date, but it is impossible to be sure. The other countries might simply be a foil to YHWH's choice of Jerusalem.

'Rahab' (v. 4), the primeval monster quelled by YHWH in ancient story (cf. Ps 89:10), represents Egypt. The 'springs' (v. 7) may symbolize divine blessing, or Zion may be thought of as the source of the streams of Paradise.

Psalm 88 This is the bleakest of all the individual laments. The last word expresses its mood. The wonder is that the psalmist prays at all.

The full horror of Sheol is found here. After death there is nothing but the land of darkness and forgetfulness, beyond God's care, outside the reach of his salvation, where the shades no longer offer praise (vv. 5, 10–12, cf. Ps 6:5; 30:9; 115:17; Job 7:8–10; 10:21–2; see PS G.13). The only spark of faith which glimmers through the darkness is v. 1: 'O LORD, God of my salvation'. Three times he makes his plea to God (vv. 1–2, 9, 13), but always he is met with silence; the final line of the psalm should perhaps be translated as REB, 'Darkness is now my only companion.' We are reminded of Job.

The structure of the psalm is not clear. The three appeals to God mark some divisions. The descriptions of the psalmist's afflictions mark others: so ill that it seems he draws near to Sheol (vv. 3–7); rejected with horror by his friends (v. 8); an account of Sheol (vv. 10–12); seriously ill from his youth he is abandoned by God, subject to his wrath; and once again God seems to have caused his friends to shun him (vv. 15–18). And the psalm breaks off in darkness, the mystery of suffering unsolved, the silence of God unexplained. Traditionally the psalm has been read on Good Friday.

Psalm 89 After an introduction (vv. 1–4), this long psalm falls into three easily discerned sections. vv. 5–18 are a hymn of praise to YHWH, proclaiming his greatness among the gods, his power as creator, and his righteous rule; happy are his covenant people. It ends with a reference to the Israelite king, the nation's 'horn' and 'shield'. vv. 19–37 tell of YHWH's covenant with David and appear to be related in some way to Nathan's prophecy in 2 Sam 7:1–17; most probably both go back to traditions with a long history behind them and perhaps influenced each other. The final section of the psalm (vv. 38–51) is a lament. The king had been defeated and humiliated: he may even have lost his life (cf. v. 45), although the plea in vv. 46–8, if by the king himself, would imply that he was only gravely threatened.

With so many clear references to the king, it is strange that Gunkel (id. and Begrich 1933: 140) is hesitant about including it among his ten royal psalms. He regarded the combination of forms as pointing to a late date and reflecting the fall of the Davidic dynasty in 586. Some think it is a combination of separate psalms, but the overall unity seems assured, as is its being a king's psalm.

It is possible that it is related to some historical defeat, and the death of Josiah (2 Kings 23:29–30) or the Exile and imprisonment of Jehoiachin (2 Kings 24:8–17) have been proposed. Another suggestion places it after 520 BCE, at a time when hopes of the restoration of the Davidic monarchy were current (cf. Zech 4:6–14). On a cultic interpretation the psalm would accompany the ritual humiliation of the king, somewhat similar to that known in Babylon. To see it as part of an annual covenant festival is less likely. If used in a ritual it must have been followed by the king's salvation by God.

Christian tradition has linked it with Christmas, God's covenant promise being fulfilled in Jesus. Typology might find parallels between the king's humiliation and Christ's humble birth, death, and final triumph.

v. 52 is the doxology at the end of Book 3 of the Psalter (ps D.2).

Psalm 90 This is the only psalm ascribed to Moses, and while no one today would accept that Moses was the author, possible reasons for the title can be discovered. There are certain similarities with the Song of Moses (Deut 32), and only Moses calls on God to 'repent' (the word translated 'have compassion on' in v. 13; Ex 32:12).

The psalm does not fit easily into any of the standard categories. It is often classed as a communal lament, but this suits only vv. 13–17. The teaching in vv. 3–12 has many wisdom features, though the main wisdom writings, apart from Job, do not address God in this way, and at v. 7 features of a lament appear (God's anger, references to sin, and the call 'How long?'). The psalm opens like a hymn of praise (vv. 1–2). To divide it into two, or even three, separate psalms, however, is a counsel of despair. While it is possible that a post-exilic scribe compiled the psalm, using some earlier psalmic fragments and other material, what was produced is a single poem which deserves to be treated as a whole. Like Ps 73 it begins with a statement of faith—YHWH has proved himself the security and support of each generation. vv. 3–12 emphasize the brevity of human life, made more bitter by toil and grief. 'How long?' (v. 13) is the familiar cry of lament (cf. Ps 6:3; 74:10; 79:5; 80:4; 94:3); the only ground for prayer is God's unwavering love (vv. 13–17). In this way the eternity of God (v. 2) is contrasted with the fleeting life of human beings (v. 10), and our sin (v. 8) is answered by divine love (vv. 14, 17). Perhaps the scribe wished to compose a psalm that could be used in services of prayer and penitence (cf. Jdt 4:9–12), or even for private devotion.

Psalm 91 Many and varied are the interpretations of this psalm. Royal maximalists find in the assurances given to the psalmist decisive evidence: the king alone can be the recipient of such divine protection. Other suggestions range from a form of entrance liturgy spoken by the priest to the worshipper at the temple, to part of the rites for a convert, who now sets himself under the protection of YHWH. The LXX added a title ascribing the psalm to David, while the Targum found in it a dialogue between David and Solomon. Similarities with Job 5:19–24 have led to proposals to link the psalm with wisdom writings, but Job itself may have been influenced by psalm forms. Reading 'pestilence' (v. 3) as 'word' (i.e. spell, rather than slander) and 'that wastes' (v. 6) as 'and a demon', the LXX reflects the interpretation of the psalm at the time of the translators as a defence against spells and demons. If it is a royal psalm it might have been recited before the king went out to battle, unless it formed part of temple ritual. The quotation of vv. 11–12 in the temptations narrative (Mt 4:6; Lk 4:10–11) may reflect messianic interpretations of the psalm.

The structure of the psalm is more complicated than appears from the NRSV's emendations and rewriting (see RV for a more literal translation). The main sections are vv. 1–13, 14–16, the latter being in the form of an oracle. Whether there is a dialogue in the first part is uncertain, but changes of person and exclamations interrupt the flow of the narrative.

Psalm 92 Although this psalm begins with thanksgiving, its form is not entirely clear. Teaching, akin to that found in the wisdom writings (vv. 6–7), and individual thanksgiving (vv. 10–11) are also found. Royal maximalists ascribe it to the king, pointing out that the psalmist's victory is also God's, that he is anointed, and that the community flourishes alongside the king. The title presents it as a sabbath psalm, and the Talmud states that it was sung at the offering of wine that accompanied the first sacrifice of a lamb (Num 28:9–10), while the Targum renders the title: 'a psalm of praise and song which the first man uttered upon the day of the Sabbath'.

Those looking for literary patterns find an elaborate chiasmus, with v. 8 at its centre:

parts of which are more convincing than others. It requires that the ignorance of the 'dullard' (v. 6; all the Eng. versions fail to represent the overtones of evil that are part of the meaning of the Heb. word) refers backwards to v. 5, rather than forwards to vv. 7–8 or 7–9 (as Eng. versions apart from JB and NJB). If this is rejected as too fanciful, a somewhat complicated structure may be seen as: a call to praise God in the form of a reflection on the way such praise is morally good or fits the divine plan for human beings (vv. 1–3); the grounds for this praise (vv. 4–5); a wisdom-type section of teaching, with hymnic elements (vv. 6–8); thanksgiving for deliverance from enemies (vv. 9–11); the blessedness of the righteous (vv. 12–15).

Psalm 93 For a discussion of the enthronement psalms (47; 93; 96–9) see ps 15b. This psalm celebrates YHWH's kingship, creation, his power over the primeval waters, and his ethical decrees (v. 5), which were probably related to the covenant (cf. Ps 99:7; 132:12).

There is no title in the MT, and some argue that this shows that the editor linked it closely with Ps 92, and also with Ps 94. Despite some common features, this appears unlikely. The LXX provides the title: 'For the day before the Sabbath, when the earth was inhabited; a psalm, a song of David'. This tradition, with its allusion to Gen 1:24–31, is also found in the Mishnah (m. Tamid 7.4).

Psalm 94 Although some divide this psalm into just two sections (vv. 1–15, 16–23, or 1–11, 12–23), holding the first to be a communal lament and the second the prayer of an individual, it appears to be more complex than this. vv. 1–7 are a prayer for the punishment of the wicked, whose crimes strike at the heart of the Israelite ethic of care for the poor and oppressed; vv. 8–11 are akin to wisdom teaching, and use the wisdom vocabulary of 'fool', 'teach', and 'an empty breath'; vv. 12–15 are a blessing on the righteous; and vv. 16–23 are either an individual lament or the thanksgiving of an individual, according to how the tenses in vv. 22–3 are understood. This does not mean that fragments from different psalms have been combined, since it is possible to find an overall unity in the theme of divine vengeance on the wicked, and there are similarities in vocabulary between the parts of the psalm (e.g. 'heritage', vv. 5, 14; 'discipline' and 'teach', vv. 10, 12; 'turn back', vv. 2 ('give'), 15 ('return'), 23 ('repay'), the same Heb. word). Maximalists include the psalm among the king's psalms, claiming that it reflects 'royal' language, and finding the reference to the individual and the nation most suitable for the king who is the representative of his people. It was the king's duty to care for widows, the fatherless, and other oppressed members of society, including resident aliens (cf. Ps 72:2–4, 12–14).

The LXX adds the title: 'A psalm of David, for the fourth day of the week', a tradition which accords with the Mishnah's allocation of psalms for each day of the week (m. Tamid 7.4).

Its position in the Psalter is odd, since it appears to break a sequence of enthronement psalms. Some have noted eight terms common to Ps 93 and 94, suggesting close links between them, but some are very common words and others (e.g. 'majesty' (Ps 93:1)/'proud' (Ps 94:2), and 'roaring' (Ps 93:3/'crush' (Ps 94:5), although the same roots, are not very convincing). It would, however, be less out of place if it were a royal psalm.

Psalm 95 The striking difference between vv. 1–7c and 7d–11 led some commentators to hold that two separate psalms have been combined. While this is not impossible, most today treat the psalm as a unified 'prophetic liturgy' (cf. Ps 81). In the first part a call to praise is sounded twice, first based on the kingship of God as the great creator (vv. 1–5), then as the shepherd of his people Israel (vv. 6–7c). Some have pointed to an additional call in v. 2, and have suggested three stages in a movement of the worshippers into the temple. In the second part a prophet speaks, uttering a warning from YHWH himself to remember the disobedience of their ancestors (Ex 17:1–7; Num 20:2–13; Meribah means 'strife', 'dispute', and Massah 'testing') and to obey him 'today'. It may have been connected with Tabernacles or the New Year Festival (note the themes of creation and the kingship of YHWH).

In Jewish tradition the psalm was linked with sabbath worship (b. Sabb. 119a). From early times it has been sung as an invitation to worship in the Christian church. Athanasius tells of this practice in Constantinople, Benedict directed that the whole monastery should sing it when they first arose from sleep, and it has been included in Anglican mattins since 1549. The modern practice of omitting the second part removes God's moral demands and presents an inauthentic picture of God.

Psalm 96 For the 'enthronement psalms' (47; 93; 96–9) see ps 15b. This psalm reiterates the central themes of this group of psalms, with special stress on YHWH's universal sovereignty over the nations and his righteous judgement of the whole world. vv. 1–3 sound the call to praise God. The reasons for offering praise are set out in vv. 4–6, and this is followed by a renewed call to worship God in vv. 7–10. In the final section of the psalm (vv. 11–13) the whole of creation is summoned to rejoice before YHWH, who comes as righteous judge. ‘Worship the Lord in holy splendour’ (v. 9) see ps 29:2; ‘new song’ (v. 1) see ps 33.

The LXX’s title, ‘When the house was built after the exile; a hymn of David’, indicates the tradition that the psalm was written by David and used later to celebrate the rebuilding of the temple. It forms part of a composite psalm inserted into 1 Chr 16 for the bringing of the ark into Jerusalem by David. A notable Christian gloss in the Old Latin translation produced ‘The Lord has reigned from the tree’ in v. 10, and many of the Church Fathers from the time of Tertullian and Justin Martyr regarded the psalm as a prophecy of the cross, an interpretation reflected in the hymn Vexilla regis.

Psalm 97 Many of the features common to the ‘enthronement psalms’ (Ps 47; 93; 96–9, ps 15b) recur here, especially YHWH’s kingship as universal lord, upholder of ‘righteousness’, and saviour of his faithful followers. The most striking feature is the theophany in vv. 2–5, which may reflect the appearance of God on Sinai (Ex 19), although similar phenomena revealing his appearance are found elsewhere in the OT, e.g. Hab 3. It has been suggested that if the psalm was part of the temple worship, features of the theophany may have been experienced in the smoke of incense and the sacrifices accompanied by the blowing of the ram’s horn, but there is no reason to treat the imagery so literally.

Many phrases in the psalm are found elsewhere in the Psalter and the prophetic books, leading some to see it as the work of a post-exilic poet who formed it from earlier traditions, but there seems to be no need to deny that it could be earlier. The LXX title, ‘By David, when his land was established’ reflects the editor’s view, though it has been interpreted, like the title to Ps 96, as indicating two traditions, that it goes back to David and that it was used after the Exile to celebrate the restoration of the Jews to their land.

Psalm 98 This psalm begins and ends like Ps 96, and contains many features common to the ‘enthronement psalms’ (47; 93; 96–9, ps 15b). It has been suggested that this tremendous hymn marked the climax of the festival, but nothing is really known about its origins or use. A call to praise YHWH for his ‘salvation’ (vv. 1–3, NRSV ‘victory’, see ps 124) is followed by a second call to ‘all the earth’, first from the people and then from the primeval deep, the mountains, and all the inhabitants of the world because he is coming to exert his just rule (vv. 4–9). For ‘a new song’ see ps 33.

It is the only psalm with just ‘A psalm’ as the title. The LXX adds ‘of David’, and the Syriac translation relates it to the deliverance from Egypt. In Anglican tradition it has been sung as an alternative to the Magnificat in Evensong, seeing Christ as the Lord who comes with salvation.

Psalm 99 The last of the ‘enthronement psalms’ (47; 93; 96–9; ps 15b), begins with the familiar cry, ‘YHWH is king’. It contains references to justice and righteousness (v. 4), and perhaps the covenant, with its moral demands (vv. 4, 7), and is centred upon Zion (v. 2; cf. ‘his holy mountain’, v. 9), yet it stands somewhat apart from the others in this group by having few similarities with Deutero-Isaiah, by calling on the foreign nations to tremble before God instead of joining in his praise, and by directly naming Moses, Aaron, and Samuel, the three great intercessors (cf. Ex 32:11–14, 31–4; Num 12:13; 14:13–19; 16:44–8; 1 Sam 7:7–11).

The text may be corrupt in places and the structure is not clear. vv. 5 and 9 form a kind of refrain, although the wording is not exactly the same, but the threefold ‘Holy’ (vv. 3, 5, 9), an outstanding feature of this psalm, may equally well mark the intended divisions. God’s ‘footstool’ (v. 5) reflects a feature of ancient Middle-Eastern royalty; the ark (1 Chr 28:2), the temple, Jerusalem (Lam 2:1), or the whole earth (Isa 66:1) may be intended by the term.

The LXX provides a title: ‘A psalm of David’.

Psalm 100 This hymn of praise is marked by its seven imperative verbs (‘make a joyful noise’, ‘worship’, ‘come’, ‘know’, ‘enter’, ‘give thanks’, ‘bless’). Similar to Ps 95, it is often held to have been sung at the entrance to the temple. The structure is transparent: the call to offer praise to God is made twice (vv. 1–2, 4), each time followed by the motivation, first because YHWH is creator and shepherd of his people, then because of his goodness, love, and faithfulness, the last two words having strong associations with the covenant (vv. 3, 5).

In v. 3b the text and margin of NRSV represent two traditions retained in the MT and reflected in the ancient versions. The Hebrew words ‘his’ (lit. ‘to him’) and ‘not’ are identical in sound but differ in spelling. Aquila, the Targum, and Jerome have ‘his’, as do all the most recent English translations, while the LXX, Symmachus, and the Syriac follow the alternative meaning, ‘and not we ourselves’, made familiar through the AV and BCP. A modern proposal is to take the word as a note of emphasis, producing: ‘and we are indeed his people’.

Psalm 101 The declaration of the psalmist that he will destroy all evildoers from the land, and especially from YHWH’s city (v. 8), has convinced most commentators that this is a king’s psalm, even though there is no specific mention of the king in it. Beyond this, however, there is little consensus. Some regard it as an expression of the king’s vows at his enthronement, a view supported by the translation of the verbs as future (as in NRSV). This would not exclude its repetition on the annual celebration of his accession. Others point to the cry ‘Oh when wilt thou come to me?’ (v. 2 RSV; NRSV interprets the phrase differently, against most modern translations), and the metre, which is often used in laments, arguing that the psalm belonged to the New Year Festival in which, they believe, the king played a central part. He was ritually humiliated, like the king in Babylon, and appealed to God for deliverance on the basis of his righteousness and his just rule. The Babylonian king also confessed his innocence and declared that he had removed evildoers from his land. Whether this was depicted in terms of a battle is doubtful: there is no hint of such a conflict in this psalm. Even on this interpretation it is possible to see a future reference, the king vowing to continue his past practice.

The structure of the psalm is not immediately apparent, although repetitions of words and phrases suggest that it was carefully crafted. The simplest outline is to divide the psalm at v. 5, vv. 2–4 setting out the king’s own righteousness and vv. 5–8 his rule over his people. v. 1 (or possibly vv. 1–2a, if the Heb. verb translated ‘I will study’ is really ‘I will make my theme’ or ‘I will sing a maskil psalm’) forms the introduction. Phrases which may point to more elaborate structuring are ‘within[in] my house’ (vv. 2, 7, the same Heb. phrase), ‘the way that is blameless’ (vv. 2, 6); ‘before my eyes’, ‘in my presence’ (vv. 3, 7, identical Heb.), ‘I will destroy’ (vv. 5, 8). Similar but not exact parallels are ‘the faithful in the land’ and ‘the wicked in the land’ (vv. 6, 8), and ‘integrity of heart’, ‘perverseness of heart’, and ‘an arrogant heart’ (vv. 2, 4, 5). Whether these form two sets of inclusio, or some other pattern, is difficult to determine.

Psalm 102 The urgent prayer of an individual, hymn, and prophecy intermingle in this psalm. Some have held that two psalms have been combined, though there is some uncertainty about the precise extent of each (perhaps vv. 1–11 with 23–4 and 12–22 with 25–8). Less drastic is the view that an earlier lament was adapted into a community prayer, maybe during the Exile. Royal maximalists wonder whether it might not be a king’s psalm, the communal aspects showing the king as representative of the nation, and the hymnic features being part of the Autumn Festival. Others who retain the unity of the psalm ascribe the communal features to the use of the psalm within the temple worship or suppose that the psalmist adopted elements of praise from the cult. The final section has been seen as an alternative to the common vow to offer praise that is a feature of many individual laments.

Those who look for patterns within the structure of the psalms note examples of inclusio and word plays: ‘my days’ (vv. 3, 11), ‘withered like grass’ (vv. 4, 11), the collection of similes (vv. 3, 4, 6, 7, 9, 11) within vv. 3–11; and, less convincingly, within vv. 12–22 the sixfold repetition of YHWH plus one mention of YH (vv. 12, 15, 16, 19, 21, 22, and 18), ‘name’ (vv. 12, 15, 21, although in v. 12 the word translated ‘name’ is more literally ‘memorial’), Zion (vv. 13, 16, 21), ‘servants’ and ‘to worship’ (vv. 14, 22, the same Hebrew verb), and ‘generation’ (vv. 12, 18). The final sections of the psalm appear to be linked to the two earlier parts by vocabulary: ‘your years’ (vv. 24, 27), ‘long ago’ and ‘in your presence’ (vv. 25, 28, the same Heb. word, slightly modified), ‘my days’ (vv. 23, 24 (‘at the mid-point of my life’, lit. ‘in the half of my days’, cf. 3, 11), ‘He has broken’ (v. 23) is a homonym of ‘answer’ (v. 2) in the Hebrew; ‘your servants’ (vv. 14, 28), ‘heaven’ (vv. 19, 25), ‘to/throughout all generations’ (vv. 12, 24), and the similes in v. 26 recall those in vv. 3–11. Some of these features are more convincing than others, but they suggest that the psalm was carefully crafted as a unity.

The psalmist appears to be gravely ill (the suggestion that this is the prayer of one unjustly accused, which some propose, appears unlikely), and the ‘enemies’ seem to be those who regard his disease as punishment for sin. This is confirmed by the unusual title. Jewish tradition linked the psalm with the days of fasting (m. Ta’an. 2.3), and in Christian tradition it is one of the seven penitential psalms, perhaps seeing in the reference to God’s anger (v. 10) an implicit expression of penitence, for there is no open confession.

Psalm 103 Although this psalm is often described as a hymn of praise, it differs from many other hymns in the intensely personal character of its opening, and it might well be treated as the thanksgiving of an individual, possibly after recovery from some illness (cf. vv. 3–4) unless this is simply part of a general description of God’s goodness.

The main divisions are vv. 1–5, a self-exhortation by the psalmist to praise YHWH, vv. 6–18, a description of YHWH’s character and goodness, notable for the stress on divine forgiveness, compassion, and faithful love, and vv. 19–22, a renewed call to praise, now directed to the heavenly beings and the whole of creation. (v. 19 may belong to the middle section, instead of providing the basis for the final call to praise.) In the second part of the psalm the singular subject of the opening is replaced by the plural ‘us’, and the tone becomes didactic and reminiscent of wisdom teaching, although the characterization of YHWH has parallels in the Torah and the prophets (cf. v. 8 with Ex 34:6; Num 14:18; Joel 2:13; Jon 4:2; v. 5 with Isa 40:31; and v. 11 with Isa 55:9), as well as in other psalms. Whether the psalm was sung within pre-exilic cultic worship, or comes from the time after the Exile within a circle of the pious who ‘fear God’ (vv. 11, 13, 17) is uncertain.

Those favouring a literary approach note several verbal links: ‘benefits’/‘deal’ (vv. 2, 10, the same Heb. root), ‘your/our iniquity/iniquities’ (vv. 3, 10), ‘steadfast love’ and ‘mercy’ (vv. 4, 8, 11, 13, 17), but these form no clear pattern and may be unintentional repetitions.

Psalm 104 This great hymn praising the creator God is remarkable for its similarities with Gen 1 and an Egyptian hymn to Aten, the sun’s disc, by the Pharaoh Akhenaten in the fourteenth century BCE. The similarities with Gen 1 include the general order of creation and vocabulary (with some unusual Heb. forms). Yet there are differences, the most notable of which is the lack of some of the psalm’s mythological features in Genesis, such as traces of YHWH’s conflict with the waters (vv. 6–9), direct mention of the sun and moon (v. 19; they are ‘lights’ in Gen 1:14–18), and the naming of Leviathan (v. 26; ‘sea-monsters’ in Gen 1:21). Moreover the psalm ranges more widely in its description of the world. Examples of similarities with the Egyptian hymn are lions roaming at night, the provision of pasture for the animals, ships sailing up and down, and the god as creator, but again there are differences: night is more sinister in the Aten hymn; several features, such as care of the foetus in the womb and the chicken in the egg, are absent from the psalm; and above all it is YHWH who exercises providential care in the Israelite poem, not the sun. Whether there has been direct contact between Ps 104 and either Gen 1 or the Aten hymn must be regarded as doubtful, though all three may have been influenced by common ideas and even traditions, and it is not impossible that the writer of Gen 1 knew the psalm.

The structure of the psalm can be set out as: vv. 1–4, the introductory self-exhortation of praise, beginning like Ps 103:1; vv. 5–9, YHWH as creator; vv. 10–18, YHWH’s care of all creatures; vv. 19–23, moon and sun, and their influence; vv. 24–30, a further account of God’s providence, upon which life itself depends; vv. 31–5, a renewed call to praise, including a prayer for sinners to be destroyed, and ending with a repetition of the opening exhortation. The call that sinners be consumed offends many today, but it has been suggested that ‘No one who has reckoned with the evil which man has wreaked on animals, trees and waters could think this prayer superfluous—it is indeed an essential part of the psalm that ‘the spoilers should be brought to the end of their existence as spoilers’ (Eaton 1995: 73).

The verb ‘to make’ and the noun ‘work’ occur at strategic places in the psalm (vv. 4, 13, 19, 24, 31), and it may be that beside the inclusio of vv. 1a and 35c (‘Hallelujah’ in 35d stands outside the psalm itself), there is a concentric structure of vv. 1–4, 5–13, 14–23, 24–30, 31–5, with vv. 14–23 forming the centre.

The theme of the psalm may connect it with the Autumn New Year Festival, but there can be no certainty, as is shown by such diverse suggestions as that it originated at the dedication of Solomon’s temple and that it is post-exilic. In the end the origins matter little for an appreciation of the magnificent hymn.

Psalm 105 This is the second of the three great history psalms (Ps 78; 105; 106; Ps E.13). The tone throughout is of praise, and it is usually regarded as a hymn, but with such an extended historical section form-critical considerations break down.

Date and original setting are uncertain. The inclusion of vv. 1–15 in the composite poem which the Chronicler has inserted at 1 Chr 16:7 fixes the relative date for its completion and may indicate an original cultic use, although it provides no evidence for linking the psalm with the time of David. The Chronicler was probably influenced by the liturgical practice of his own day or he may have introduced the psalm for literary reasons. Some note the references to the covenant and suggest that the psalm was related to its renewal at an annual festival. Much depends upon the relation of the psalm to the Pentateuchal narratives. Some argue that the historical allusions are derived from the completed Pentateuch, and that the psalm is therefore post-exilic. If so it might be non-cultic, possibly related to wisdom writings. The psalm differs from Exodus, however, in several respects, particularly the number and order of the plagues, and the omission of any reference to Sinai, leading others to claim that similarities with the Old Testament narratives are due to both drawing on common traditions rather than to literary borrowing.

Most base their analysis of the structure of the psalm on the historical sequence, with vv. 7–41 set between an extended call to praise (vv. 1–6) and a concluding section which expounds the covenant faith and calls for Israel’s ethical response to election and deliverance (vv. 42–5). The central section is often divided into vv. 7–11, 12–15, 16–23, 24–36(38), 36(39)–41, in a sequence of historical allusions. Those looking for literary devices point to elaborate inclusio (e.g. the covenant with Abraham in vv. 9, 42, and ‘strangers’/‘alien’ in vv. 12, 23) and chiasmus (e.g. in vv. 2–5: ‘wonderful works’, ‘seek’, YHWH: YHWH, ‘seek’, ‘wonderful works’).

Psalm 106 The third of the great history psalms takes a very different view of Israel’s history from the other two psalms. The stress now is upon Israel’s faithlessness and disobedience, despite the persistent grace and forgiveness of YHWH. Form-critical classifications are uncertain. The opening verses read like a hymn of praise (vv. 1–3), but swiftly turn into the style of an individual lament (vv. 4–5), and then from v. 6 corporate confession dominates, though mixed with hymnic accounts of God’s salvation, ending with a vow to offer praise (v. 47). v. 48 is usually regarded as the doxology at the end of Book 4 of the Psalter, but it is included in the extracts from the psalm which the Chronicler quotes in 1 Chr 16:34–6, and it is somewhat bold to claim that the Psalter was complete and divided into five books by that time. To relieve sharply contrasting forms within the psalm, it has been suggested that vv. 1–3 are the conclusion of Ps 105, but this is unnecessary, given the style of many of the psalms, and Ps 105:45 forms a fully satisfactory end to that psalm.

It is widely accepted that vv. 27 and 47 refer to the Exile and the dispersion, and provide a means for dating the psalm. This would not preclude an early form, however, and some are prepared to set it in the pre-exilic period, perhaps as part of a covenant renewal ceremony at New Year. It is intriguing that a ceremony at the Feast of Weeks included recitations of the righteous acts of God by the priests and of Israel’s sins by the Levites (1QS 1:21, 23). Perhaps more lies behind the juxtaposition of Ps 105 and 106 than simply the fact that they are history psalms.

Psalm 107 This appealing psalm is unique among the thanksgiving psalms. The central part (vv. 4–32) consists of four sections in which different groups of those who have been rescued by YHWH are called upon to thank him. There are two refrains. The first in vv. 6, 13, 19, 28, which has slight variations, describes the way the unfortunates ‘cried to’ YHWH, who then ‘delivered’ (v. 6) or ‘saved’ (vv. 13, 19) them, or ‘brought them out’ (v. 28), while the second in vv. 8, 15, 21, 31 urges them to offer thanks, the first two followed by different motivations suited to the trouble into which they had fallen, the last two with extended exhortations (vv. 22, 32). The introductory call to give thanks (v. 1) is followed by what appears to be a reference to the returning exiles (vv. 2–3). vv. 33–43 form a hymn praising God who controls nature and maintains justice among human beings, ending with a wisdom-style admonition.

Not unnaturally many suppose that two separate psalms have been combined, some also regarding vv. 2–3 as a post-exilic adaptation of an earlier psalm (cf. Isa 43:5; 49:12). Since such composite psalms are found both in the Psalter (e.g. Ps 108) and in the historical books (e.g. 1 Chr 16), this is not out of the question. It is possible, however, to read the psalm as a liturgy of thanksgiving, the final hymn summing up the congregation’s praise.

How the psalm might have been used is unknown. It has been suggested that it might have had its origin at a mass thanksgiving festival, and was picked up later and slightly modified by pilgrims from the Diaspora. There is also disagreement about the nature of the dangers from which the worshippers have been saved, some taking the language literally and seeing actual travellers, prisoners, sick persons, and sailors, others treating the whole as allegorical of the nation, freed from bondage in Egypt and Babylon, restored to new life and health, and delivered from the ‘stormy’ attacks of foreign nations.

Psalm 108 This psalm has been formed by combining 57:7–11 and 60:6–12 with only very minor differences in the text. But rather than simply referring to the comments on these two psalms, it is worth looking carefully at the new psalm which has been created, for the thrust and mood have been radically altered.

Ps 57 begins with urgent petition by an individual, and the section which has been taken up in Ps 108 is the concluding expression of confidence that the prayer has been heard and self-exhortation to offer praise. Ps 60 also begins with a complaint against God, because he has rejected his people, but the editor of Ps 108 omits this part of the psalm, takes up the divine promise to give Israel victory over the surrounding nations, especially over Edom, the call for help, and the final note of certainty that God will enable the Israelites to defeat their enemies. Thus the tone of Ps 108 is more assured and joy predominates. The combination of individual and communal prayers presents the psalmist as the representative of the nation (royal maximalists suggest that this is a king's psalm). If the sources are disregarded the structure of the psalm now appears as vv. 1–4, a vow to praise God or the expression of that praise; vv. 5–9, prayers for help linked to the divine promise (perhaps a prophetic oracle); and vv. 10–13, a further appeal, ending in an expression of trust or confidence that God will support his people. Throughout the emphasis is upon the steadfast love, faithfulness, and promises of God. Whether it reflects the experiences of the Exile and Return cannot be determined, but it is a fine example of the way that past liturgies continue to live on into a later age.

Psalm 109 This appeal to God is notable for the comprehensive curse in vv. 6–19. It is probably the prayer of an individual, who is perhaps a man who has been falsely accused, or who is making an appeal to the temple authorities, or who is having to undergo an ordeal, although some find national overtones and link it with the king's psalms. The psalmist makes his plea in vv. 1–5, and this is followed by the extensive imprecation (vv. 6–19, concluded or summed up in v. 20). Pleading is renewed at v. 21, with appeals on the grounds of YHWH's steadfast love, the psalmist's misery, and the attacks and curses of the enemies. The lament ends with the vow to offer praise, so common in this type of psalm (vv. 30–1).

NRSV and REB insert 'They say' in v. 6, taking the following words as a quotation of the enemies' curse, while NJB adopts the same interpretation by the use of quotation marks. NJB continues the quotation to the end of v. 15, and NRSV to v. 19, but REB holds that only v. 6 is the word of the enemy, the rest of the imprecation being uttered by the psalmist against the perjured accuser put up by the enemies. NIV and GNB give no indication of any change of speaker in the text, although NIV offers a marginal alternative similar to NRSV.

Although there seem to be quotations in other psalms (e.g. Ps 52:7), the quotation of such a lengthy imprecation appears unlikely, since the psalmist utters a curse in v. 29, and would surely have been fearful of repeating his enemies' curse in such detail. In support of the theory it is pointed out that outside these verses the enemies are spoken of in the plural (but the imprecation may be against their leader), that the psalmist states that they resorted to curses (v. 28), and that v. 21 may signal the return to the psalmist's own plea. It is doubtful whether the psalm was ever part of normal worship, although if it was a royal psalm it may have been.

Psalm 110 This is one of the irreducible minimum of royal psalms and because of the divine oracle in v. 1 has often been assigned to the king's coronation (cf. Ps 2). The first words of the psalm are found very often in the prophetic books, where they usually come at the end of an oracle and are commonly translated 'says the LORD'. They are found only here in the Psalter (but cf. 'Transgression speaks', Ps 36:1). A further oracle is given in v. 4, where the king is also declared a priest. Melchizedek was the king-priest of Jebusite Jerusalem in Gen 14:18–20, and it has been suggested that when David captured the city he took over many features of the old Canaanite religion. Although NRSV does not insert quotation marks, v. 2b may be a further divine promise.

Unfortunately the text is difficult and almost certainly corrupt in several verses (cf. the varied translations of v. 3 in the Eng. versions), possibly an indication of the great age of the psalm, and its reuse in different situations across the centuries. Some accept that it goes back to the time of David, others relate it to the New Year Festival, either at the beginning, when it is part of the king's preparation for the ritual battle with his enemies, or after his humiliation and victory. The speaker may have been a temple prophet. The mysterious v. 3 may refer to an enacted 'rebirth' within the ritual. Alternative suggestions link it with Solomon's coronation, or the time of Josiah. Others take the military language literally and relate the psalm to actual battles.

Christian interpretation, going back to the first century and building on Jewish tradition, regarded it as messianic, and vv. 1 and 4 are frequently quoted in the NT, where they support the belief in the reign of Christ after the resurrection and ascension (cf. Mk 12:36; Acts 2:34–5; Heb 1:13; 5:6; 7:17, 21).

Psalm 111 This and Ps 112 form a pair of acrostics, each having twenty-two short lines beginning with the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. The present psalm has the features of a hymn of praise or thanksgiving. Whether it was intended to be sung in worship (cf. v. 1) or was a poetic meditation on such worship is impossible to decide. The main themes relate to the Exodus deliverance, possibly linked even more closely to Ex 34 (cf. v. 4b with Ex 34:6, and other similarities of vocabulary with Ex 34:5, 10, 11).

How far the acrostic hinders logical development of the ideas is much debated. Some find reiterated thoughts on the covenant God. Others detect two strophes, vv. 2–7a fastening on YHWH's saving deeds, and vv. 7b–10 on covenant and law. Whether more intricate word patterns are visible as some have claimed, seems doubtful. Certainly this is no drab exercise but a vibrant account of the saving God to whom Israel responds with thanksgiving, reverence, and obedience, for the psalmist is confident that the everlasting graciousness of God will be matched by everlasting praise.

Psalm 112 This psalm is either by the same author as Ps 111 or was modelled on it, as the acrostic form and similarities of vocabulary suggest, but here the poet speaks more like one of the wise men, telling of the blessing which comes to the godly man, rather like Ps 1, though with only a glance at the fate of the wicked in the final verse. The tightly compressed style makes the translation of some verses uncertain, e.g. is the subject of v. 4 light, God, or the righteous man? All the words are singular (the 'they' of NRSV is accommodation to inclusive language). LXX inserted 'the Lord' to make the meaning clear, cf. RSV, probably wrongly in view of the general tenor of the psalm.

A striking feature of this psalm is the way virtues ascribed to YHWH in Ps 111 are transferred to the good man: like YHWH he is gracious and compassionate and his righteousness is of the same nature as God's. Although the psalm lacks a logical structure, the psalmist pointing to many different ways in which goodness leads to prosperity, its attractiveness lies in its portrait of the righteous man, giving to the poor, always ready to lend to the needy, governed by absolute integrity, and with a life based on trust in God, in whose law he delights.

Psalm 113 Ps 113–18 form the 'Hallel' ('Praise', cf. the frequent 'Hallelujah', 'Praise Yah') or the 'Egyptian Hallel' (cf. Ps 114:1) to distinguish it from the 'Great Hallel' (Ps 136, or 120–36, or 135–6; the name was also given in Jewish tradition to Ps 146–50). These six psalms were the only ones sung at the great festivals, according to the earliest sources. At Passover Ps 113–14 were sung before the meal and 115–18 after it (m. Pesah. 10:6, 7, cf. Mk 14:26).

Ps 113 is a hymn of praise. It opens with a thrice-repeated imperative, and this is followed by ascriptions of praise to YHWH (vv. 2–3) and further descriptions of his greatness and goodness (vv. 4–9). v. 9 may have been intended literally of a childless woman; later Judaism found in it a reference to Zion (cf. Isa 54:1–8), and the Targum paraphrased the verse: 'Who makes the congregation of Israel, which was like a barren woman mourning for the men of her household, to be full of crowds, like a mother who rejoices over sons.' Whether the psalm was sung antiphonally, a leader shouting the call to praise and the congregation, or another choir, responding with vv. 2–9, is conjecture.

Psalm 114 Despite the narrative form, this psalm is usually classed as a hymn of praise, in stanzas of two verses, the inner two (vv. 3–4, 5–6) matching each other. Incidents in the account of the Exodus and Conquest are referred to: God's choice of Israel, crossing the Red Sea and Jordan, the provision of water in the desert, and the Sinai law-giving (though some see either parallels to creation myths or a specific reference to creation). Changes of verbal forms have led NRSV and NJB to introduce vivid present tenses in vv. 5–6. The LXX moves 'Praise the LORD' from the end of Ps 113 to the head of this psalm, perhaps rightly, since it then provides an antecedent for 'his' (NRSV 'God's') in v. 2.

In Dante's Divine Comedy the spirits sing this psalm as they draw near to the island on which the mountain of purgatory stands. In another place Dante explains the medieval method of exegesis: 'If we regard the letter alone, what is set before us is the exodus of the Children of Israel from Egypt in the days of Moses; if the allegory, our redemption wrought by Christ; if the moral sense, we are shown the conversion of the soul from the grief and wretchedness of sin to the state of grace; if the anagogical, we are shown the departure of the holy soul from the thrall of this corruption to the liberty of eternal glory.' It was on such grounds that the psalm has been used both on Easter Day and at the burial of the dead. While such interpretations may appear far removed from the 'real' meaning of the psalm, modern literary theory warns against supposing that meaning is limited to the author's intention.

Psalm 115 vv. 4–11 recur as Ps 135:15–20, with some differences in the text; many Hebrew MSS, including the Leningrad codex, the LXX, Syriac, and Jerome join the psalm to Ps 114; and many Hebrew MSS begin a new psalm at v. 12. This confusion is increased by the inclusion of the psalm within the Hallel, for it begins like a lament rather than a hymn of praise. It will never be possible to trace its past history, and it is best to try to understand the meaning of the completed psalm on its own.

vv. 1–2 is a cry for deliverance, at a time when God appears to have deserted Israel and his people and foreigners ask for proof of his activity. The next section (vv. 3–8) is a hymn, in which the power of YHWH is contrasted with the impotence of idols. A threefold call to Israel, priests ('Aaron'), and those who 'fear the LORD' (possibly proselytes, but more probably a comprehensive term for all the faithful) to trust in YHWH follows (REB, hardly correctly, follows the LXX, Syriac, and Jerome in taking the verbs as indicative). At this point a prophet or priest confidently affirms that God will bless his people (vv. 12–13) and a priest gives a blessing (vv. 14–15). The liturgy ends with a vow to praise YHWH (vv. 16–18).

Presumably the psalm was intended for worship, and if it reflects the teaching of Deutero-Isaiah it belongs to the time of the second temple.

Psalm 116 This psalm has often been seen as a textbook example of the individual thanksgiving psalms. vv. 1–2 express the psalmist's love of God because he has saved him (other thanksgiving psalms begin with a call to give thanks); a narrative follows (vv. 3–11), in which the psalmist recounts his past distress and describes how God delivered him; and the psalm ends with the repayment of the vows which the psalmist made and the psalmist offers a thanksgiving sacrifice (vv. 12–19; unless this is a vow promising to do all these things).

The trouble from which the psalmist was saved was most probably serious illness: he feels that he had almost entered into Sheol, its cords had gripped him and he felt he would be swept away to destruction. v. 11 does not seem sufficient evidence for supposing that this is another psalm of one falsely accused, and the 'cup of salvation' is more probably a libation accompanying the sacrifice than an ordeal (cf. Num 5:15–28). Royal maximalists take it as the king's psalm, holding that he would be the most likely person to offer sacrifices in the temple and finding a parallel to the libation in a stele of Yehawmilk of Byblos on which the king is depicted standing before the goddess Ba'alat, cup in hand, and uttering his prayer. It is held to be especially appropriate for the king to call himself YHWH's servant (v. 16), and the occasional plurals may show that the royal psalmist is the nation's representative. Aramaisms in the language may point to a post-exilic date, however, and the psalm was perhaps intended for use by any Israelite who came to the sanctuary to offer his thanksgiving.

The LXX begins a new psalm, with a fresh heading of 'Alleluia', at v. 10, but there is no reason to suppose that two psalms have been combined. The tradition in this part of the Psalter appears to have been uncertain about the psalm divisions generally.

Psalm 117 This tiny psalm expresses the perfect form of a hymn of praise, with the call to praise (v. 1), the motivation for that praise, introduced by 'for' (v. 2*ab*), and a repeated call to praise (v. 2*c*). The universalist invitation to the (foreign) nations to worship YHWH, a couple of Aramaisms, and possibly the influence of Deutero-Isaiah, have suggested a post-exilic date. Paul quotes v. 1 in support of his belief that God's loving purpose reaches out to the Gentiles (Rom 15:11). It is not impossible, however, that the psalmist thought of the nations as coming in subservience to Israel's God.

The uncertainty about the psalm divisions continues, many Hebrew MSS joining this psalm to Ps 116 (which royal maximalists find appropriate as the conclusion of the king's psalm), and other MSS taking it as the beginning of Ps 118. But Ps 116 is complete in itself, and Ps 118 opens in a different style, so that the tradition of the LXX, and the majority of Hebrew MSS, which treats it as a separate psalm is probably correct.

Psalm 118 The interchange between singular and plural, and apparent dialogue, coupled with apparent references to the temple gates and a procession, suggest that this is a liturgy. In vv. 1–4 the community is called to offer thanksgiving. An individual appears at v. 5 and describes the way YHWH has saved him (vv. 5–18). The call to open the gates (v. 19) with a response in v. 20 is similar to Ps 24:7–10, and has led some to see in the psalm an 'entrance liturgy'. The final verses contain varied elements: thanksgiving (v. 21), possibly in response to the opening of the gates, a proverbial statement (v. 22), praise of YHWH (vv. 23–4), a plea for salvation (v. 25), a blessing, probably by a priest (v. 26), a call to join in the procession round the altar (v. 27), and a vow to praise God (v. 28). The psalm ends, as it began, with a call to thanksgiving (v. 28).

Interpretations vary. Many believe that it is a royal psalm, either after actual victory in war, or as part of the temple ritual, when the king was attacked by his enemies and almost defeated before being 'saved' by YHWH. Some argue that the phrase 'house of Aaron' points to the time after the Exile when this was how the priesthood was known, while 'those who fear the LORD' were proselytes; they refer the psalm to a national leader, or even to the whole nation. Jewish tradition linked it with the feast of Tabernacles, and the Mishnah (m. Sukk. 3:9; 4:5) records that the lûlâb (bunch of palm, myrtle, and willow branches) was shaken at the beginning and end of the recital of the psalm, and that willow branches were set up over the altar.

The psalm was regarded as messianic in early Christian circles and is quoted extensively in the NT (Heb 13:6 (v. 6); Mk 12:10–11; Acts 4:11; 1 Pet 2:7 (vv. 22–3); Mk 11:9 (v. 26)), but whether this interpretation had Jewish antecedents is uncertain.

Psalm 119 This great acrostic consists of twenty-two stanzas of eight lines, each line beginning with the appropriate letter of the Hebrew alphabet (cf. Lam 3). While the stanzas are separated in most English versions, only NIV and NJB mark the Hebrew letters as AV and RV did. GNB is misleading in suggesting that each stanza expresses a special theme. In addition to the alphabetic structure the writer uses eight words to represent the law, visible in most modern translations (cf. NRSV: 'law', 'promise', 'word', 'statutes', 'commandments', 'ordinances', 'decrees', 'precepts', but with occasionally different renderings), although GNB varies the translations of all the words apart from 'law' with a wanton promiscuity. It has been suggested that originally all eight words were included in each stanza, and some scholars have emended the text to secure this, but there is so little obvious corruption that it is most unlikely that this is right. Most of the words are found in all the stanzas but only four contain all eight used once each (vv. 57–64, 73–80, 81–8, 129–36). Although the words have different connotations, differences of meaning are hardly important in this psalm, where the psalmist ponders the divine teaching, eagerly looking for it to mould his life. It was a happy chance that the word expressing beatitude begins with the first letter of the alphabet: it is found in the first two verses of the psalm.

Each verse expresses an independent idea, although there is some grouping (e.g. vv. 98–100) and features from different types of psalm appear within the poem: hymn of praise (e.g. vv. 89–91, 172), thanksgiving (e.g. v. 7), lament (e.g. vv. 107, 153–60), references to enemies (e.g. vv. 23, 51, 86–7, 95, 157), confession and assertion of innocence (e.g. vv. 11, 30–2, 97–104, 163), vow (v. 33), wisdom saying (e.g. vv. 9, 130). Although it is difficult to imagine a setting in Israelite worship for this amalgam, the psalmist is deeply versed in the hymns of the temple, and other OT writings, especially Deuteronomy, Proverbs, and Jeremiah.

While it is often described as a Torah psalm, apart from vv. 1–3 and 115 every verse is addressed to God. Perhaps it would be better to regard it as a meditation in the form of a prayer to God (somewhat like Augustine's Confessions). If the beginning and end mark his intention, the psalmist wished to stress the happiness that comes from following YHWH's teaching and to 'walk in his ways', and, despite some assertions of his own righteousness, he seeks the divine help which he knows is necessary if he is to obey God's law.

Psalm 120 The tenses in v. 1 present the main difficulty in the interpretation of this psalm. NRSV changes the pointing and treats the verse as the opening of a prayer for deliverance. The MT should be translated as REB: 'I called to the LORD in my distress, and he answered me'. If this is correct, the psalm would appear to be a thanksgiving which includes the prayer which the psalmist offered and the distress from which he has been delivered. The psalm seems very fragmented, with v. 2 as the actual prayer, v. 3 a rhetorical question answered in v. 4, vv. 5–7 an account of the enemies who refuse appeals for peace.

The dangers besetting the psalmist are uncertain. It might be the prayer of one falsely accused, making his appeal in the temple, the references to warfare being metaphorical. Royal maximalists treat it as the prayer of the king, attacked by enemies, and possibly the victim of the breaking of an alliance ('lying lips'). Meshech and Kedar refer to a country or people near the Black Sea and a tribe in the Syro-Arabian desert, places so far apart that the names are often taken metaphorically to represent bitter and implacable foes rather than the actual exile of the psalmist. If 'Song of Ascents' is a reference to pilgrimage (see Ps c.9, E.12), the names may have been understood as areas from which the pilgrims have come.

Psalm 121 This psalm is in the form of a dialogue. Unless 'my help' (v. 2) is arbitrarily emended to 'help' or 'your help', the response to the question in v. 1 begins at v. 3. But then v. 2 rather hangs in the air, since it would imply that the questioner offered his own answer before receiving the assurance of vv. 3–8 (probably by a priest). It is just possible that v. 2 as it stands is the beginning of the priest's assurance, expressing his own experience. The AV followed Jerome and Luther in wrongly taking 'from where' (v. 1) as a relative.

The situation in which the psalm may have been recited is uncertain. A cultic setting is more probable than that the psalmist converses with himself, or a father with his son. Some have taken 'your going out and your coming in' (v. 8) as indicating the priest's blessing to pilgrims as they leave the temple after one of the festivals and look to their return for the next, but the phrase is used of the ordinary activities of daily life (cf. Deut 28:6; 1 Kings 3:7) and this seems to be its meaning here. The reference to the Keeper of Israel in v. 4, has convinced others that the promise is given to the king as representative of Israel, who has YHWH at his right hand, with the going out and coming in referring to his leadership in war (cf. Josh 14:11; 1 Sam 18:16).

Psalm 122 It is difficult to decide whether this pilgrim song, which is related to the songs of Zion (Ps 46; 48; 76; 84; 87), was sung when the pilgrims had just arrived in Jerusalem or were preparing to leave after the festival. Whichever it was, the psalmist expresses the great joy he had felt as he set out in the company of others to come up to Jerusalem (vv. 1–2; 'when they said to me' involves a change in the vowels; NIV keeps closer to the MT: 'I rejoiced with those who said to me'). After praising the holy city (vv. 3–5), he prays for its welfare (vv. 6–8; 'peace' is more than just absence of war), and concludes the psalm with a vow (v. 9). There is probably a play on the name Jerusalem, the name of which probably means 'the foundation of Salem', a god's name related to šālôm ('prosperity', 'peace'; the word occurs three times in these verses).

'Of David' is added to 'A Song of Ascents' in the title of this psalm, as also in Ps 124; 131. GNB marg. is misleading in making no reference to the title in Ps 120–34, apart from 'HEBREW TITLE: By David' in these two psalms. 'Of David' is omitted by two Hebrew MSS, LXX MSS, and the Targum. It is another example of the extension of Davidic psalms in later editing.

Psalm 123 Despite the title and its position within the Psalter, this is probably not a pilgrim psalm. Rather a group of persecuted Jews plead for help. The singular of v. 1 may indicate antiphonal chanting, with a representative of the community speaking first. vv. 1–2 express confidence in God (some find a chiasmic structure, a b b' a'), while vv. 3–4 are the prayer, supported by a description of the contempt which is shown them. In v. 2 'hand' may represent the master's power, or the sense may be that the servants watch their master's hand so that they can obey every gesture.

The last line has been taken to be either dittography or (following the gere, 'proudest oppressors' or even 'proudest Greeks') a gloss from the Greek period. There seems no reason for rejecting the ketib; the verse may have three lines.

Psalm 124 This communal or national thanksgiving opens with strong emphasis upon the fact that it was YHWH who was on his people's side (vv. 1–5). Had he not been they would have been overwhelmed by the danger, depicted as the attack of a savage animal or a devastating torrent. 'Let Israel now say' (v. 1b) is probably a call to the assembled people to take up the theme. In v. 2 the Hebrew word behind 'enemies' normally refers to humanity in general (e.g. the word is translated 'human beings' in Ps 8:4), but here it appears to be used to contrast the weakness of human enemies compared with the power of YHWH. vv. 6–7 praise God who has delivered his people, and the final verse expresses confidence in YHWH, the great creator.

Certain peculiarities in the Hebrew may point to a late date, but it is impossible to fasten upon any historical situation which called forth the psalm.

Psalm 125 Uncertainty about the verb 'will lead away' in v. 5 partly affects the classification of this psalm. If it is to be translated as a future (so NRSV, NIV) it reiterates the confidence of vv. 1–3, and the psalm appears to be a national psalm of trust in YHWH. If, however, it is taken as expressing a wish (cf. REB: 'may the Lord make them go the way of evildoers'; NJB and GNB render with an imperative) the psalm looks much more like a national lament, the initial expressions of confidence leading up to urgent prayer for help. Most Eng. versions smooth out v. 2, but NJB expresses the vigour of the Hebrew: 'Jerusalem! The mountains encircle her: so [Heb. "and"] Yahweh encircles his people.'

It appears that the Jews are oppressed in their own land by foreigners (cf. v. 3) and most place it in the post-exilic period, during the Persian (or even Greek) empire.

Psalm 126 Four uncertainties in meaning make this apparently simple little psalm one of the most difficult.

1. The opening phrase is now usually translated as NRSV: 'When the Lord restored the fortunes of Zion', rather than as the margin: 'brought back those who returned to Zion', and does not unambiguously refer to the return from exile. Its relation to v. 4, however, remains uncertain. In v. 4 the verb is an imperative, opening up alternative possibilities for the relation of this verse to v. 1. Probably v. 4 is a prayer for a further deliverance (only NJB takes it as a release from captivity, though NIV and GNB offer this as an alternative, both reversing text and margin from v. 1 and presumably taking v. 1 as a reference to the return from exile and v. 4 as a later deliverance), or vv. 1–3 might be a meditation on the future.

2. The tenses in vv. 1–3 are uncertain, as is the meaning of 'we were like those who dream'. If that phrase is interpreted in a modern sense of being almost unbelievable (cf. GNB: 'it was like a dream'), the whole section probably refers to the past (as most Eng. versions). On the other hand, the verbs in v. 2 might refer to a hypothetical future, the sense being that when (almost 'if') God restores Jerusalem's fortunes, the people would be filled with joy, but it is only a dream. On this view 'we are like dreamers' is a parenthesis. The difficulty with this interpretation, however, is that v. 3 appears to refer to YHWH's past actions (unless the verbs are taken as 'prophetic' perfects or as a petition).

3. But 'dreamers' may not be the correct meaning of the Hebrew. The LXX's 'we became as those comforted', the Syriac 'as those who rejoice' and the Targum's 'like sick people who are cured', point to a different tradition, probably supported by a Qumran text (cf. REB: 'people renewed in health', cf. NIV marg.).

4. The meaning of vv. 5–6 is also uncertain. They look like proverbial statements, but may go back to ideas of a dying and rising god, symbolized by the sowing of seed (his burial) and its growth (his resurrection). Here they appear to be a promise uttered by a prophet or a declaration of confidence (cf. Ps 85). NRSV, however, regards v. 5 as a continuation of the petition in v. 4, and only v. 6 as expressing a note of confidence.

The psalm may belong to the Autumn Festival (cf. God's salvation, reference to rain, and sowing and reaping), and be a prayer for blessing on the coming agricultural year. On the other hand, it might have a historical setting, possibly during the distress that followed the return from exile.

Psalm 127 The wisdom features of this psalm are clear, and it is unlikely that it was related to the cult, although some have associated it with the Feast of Tabernacles, the rededication of the temple, or the birth of a son (later Christian tradition used it in the service of thanksgiving for women after childbirth). The different themes in vv. 1–2 and 3–5 have led to the suggestion that two separate psalm fragments have been combined, but a Sumerian poem also combines the gift of palace, city, and children. This makes it unnecessary to take 'house' (v. 1) as 'household, family'. Sons were important for building up the power and prestige of the family, and v. 5 refers to their support in lawsuits which were judged in the city gate. Sons of a man's youth (v. 4) would be in their prime when he came to rely on their support.

The meaning of 'he gives sleep to his beloved' (v. 2) is very uncertain. The NRSV marg. 'he provides for his beloved during sleep' is doubtfully possible as a translation, since 'gives' requires an object, but neither is particularly suitable in a wisdom context, with its warnings against sleep (cf. Prov 6:6–11; 20:13). Hence other meanings for the word have been sought, such as 'prosperity' or 'honour', but the ancient versions support 'he gives sleep'.

An editor searching for allusions in the historical books ascribed the psalm to Solomon in the title (absent from some LXX MSS), probably through taking the 'house' as the temple, relating 'beloved' with Solomon's other name, Jedidiah (2 Sam 12:25), and maybe seeing in 'sleep' an allusion to Solomon's dream (1 Kings 3:10–15).

Psalm 128 This happy psalm begins with a beatitude and ends with a benediction. Usually classed as a wisdom psalm, from the language and sentiments, it is not impossible that it was used in the worship, perhaps to welcome pilgrims or to bless them as they depart from the temple. The stress on fertility may point to the Autumn Festival. Even these are guesses; still more precarious are suggestions that it is the blessing given to a host at the door of his house, and Luther's description of a 'marriage song'.

It is in two parts, but whether the division is after v. 3 or v. 4 is uncertain. v. 4 could round off the first part or introduce the second. Notable is the combining of prosperity for the pious man and the welfare of Jerusalem.

Psalm 129 The two parts of this psalm stand out fairly clearly. In vv. 1–4 Israel is called upon to affirm YHWH's continual protection against its enemies from the time of the Exodus ('my youth', cf. Hos 11:1). vv. 5–8 are an imprecation on Israel's enemies. It is possible that v. 4 belongs with the second part of the psalm, and that the verb should be taken as precativ: 'may he cut', but this is less likely. v. 8c may be an independent blessing, this time invoked on 'those who pass by' or the worshippers who recite the psalm.

Type and setting are quite uncertain, although it seems very probable that the psalm was used in the cult. Classifications include communal psalm of confidence, communal thanksgiving, communal lament, or a mixture of forms: national thanksgiving and psalm of revenge or judgement. Perhaps it is best to admit that it does not fit easily into preconceived categories. The opening and much of the subject-matter link it with Ps 124.

Psalm 130 This is commonly regarded as a lament, although the usual account of the distress of the supplicant is lacking, possibly replaced by the indirect confession of sin (vv. 3–4). For this interpretation the verbs in vv. 1 and 5 need to be translated as present (as NRSV). They may, however, indicate the psalmist's actions in the past ('I have called', REB), when the psalm would more naturally be seen as a thanksgiving which looked back to the earlier distress and prayer. The call to Israel (vv. 7–8) is perhaps odd in the petition of an individual. Some regard it as a later addition to adjust the psalm to the community. Others propose that a priest at this point addressed the assembled worshippers, among whom the individual psalmist had come to the temple.

The depths are the watery deeps, and probably indicate that the psalmist is gravely ill and feels he has sunk into the underworld of death (cf. ps G.13); illness and sin go together, as often in the OT. The watchmen (v. 6) may be military sentinels, but the Targum identifies them as Levites who watch for the first moment of the dawn to offer the morning sacrifice.

A few claim it as a royal psalm, but there is little to support this. While most assume that it was sung within the cultic worship, this also is uncertain. Some view it as a personal prayer, unconnected with the cult, but whether such poems were composed in ancient Israel, even after the Exile, is unknown. It is one of the seven penitential psalms of the church, and was an especial favourite of Luther, who called it one of the 'Pauline psalms' and based his great hymn 'Out of the depths I cry to Thee' on it.

Psalm 131 The brevity of this psalm makes interpretation difficult. It is usually regarded as a psalm of confidence by an individual, v. 3 being either an addition to fit it for corporate worship (cf. Ps 130:7–8), or the widening of the psalmist's devotion to include the community. Even maximalists shrink from suggesting that it is a royal psalm, despite 'Of David' in the title (omitted by some LXX MSS), though this has been proposed, royal traits being found in the references to pride and similarities with Ps 62:1, 5. Other suggestions are that it was a form of entrance liturgy (cf. Ps 15; 24), that the speaker was a teacher in the temple addressing an assembly of Israel, even that it was sung by a woman pilgrim carrying her child. The exact meaning of 'weaned child' is not clear; possibly the weaned child was less fretful than the child just before it was weaned, when its mother's milk was drying up. Whatever the precise meaning and origins, the psalm expresses a quiet confidence in God.

Psalm 132 This is among the essential group of royal psalms. It falls into two clear sections: vv. 1–10 are a prayer for God's blessing on the Davidic king, vv. 11–18 an affirmation of God's promises to David and an assurance that YHWH will remain faithful to his covenant with David and grant blessings on Jerusalem; David's descendants ('one of the sons of your body', 'a horn to sprout up', vv. 11, 17) will enjoy prosperity and will triumph over their enemies. Vocabulary and ideas link the two parts closely together: e.g. 'turn away/back' (vv. 10, 11); 'anointed one' (vv. 10, 17); the clothing of the priests with righteousness/salvation (vv. 9, 16); Jerusalem as God's dwelling-place (vv. 7–8, 13, although the Heb. words are different); the correspondence between David's oath and YHWH's (vv. 2, 11); vv. 13–16 form the response to vv. 6–9. The psalm is commonly described as a liturgy in which king and prophet take part. The linking of Zion (vv. 5, 13–15), the ark (v. 8, and probably v. 6: REB boldly identifies 'it' as the ark), and the Davidic dynasty would all be suitable to the New Year Festival.

There is clearly some connection with the account of David's bringing of the ark into Jerusalem and Nathan's oracle in 2 Sam 6–7. Some accept that the narrative in Samuel is historical, and see in the psalm later cultic celebration. Others regard the psalm and the accompanying cultic worship as primary, the writer of the history having filled out his narrative from the ritual of his own day. This appears to have happened in 2 Chr 6, where the writer concludes his version of the story he has taken from Samuel with vv. 8–10 of this psalm.

Ephrathah (v. 6) probably refers to Bethlehem, where David came from. Unless 'fields of Jaar' is really 'fields of the forest, woodland', it is apparently a reference to Kiriath-jearim from where David brought the ark into Jerusalem (1 Sam 7:1–2; 2 Sam 6:2), and it has been suggested (less probably) that Ephrathah referred to the same area.

Psalm 133 To most people the first line of this psalm is appealing, but to some the second verse may seem grotesque—which shows how difficult it is to enter into the culture and emotions of ancient Israel.

Three main interpretations are generally offered. (1) It is a wisdom psalm concerned with family life, which has been adapted to cultic use by the addition of references to Aaron and Zion. (2) It has a historical setting and perhaps comes from a post-exilic time when attempts were being made to unite the Jews in Judah. (3) It belongs to one of the festivals and sees in the worship of YHWH the true unity of the nation. None of these is particularly convincing, and we have to confess that the psalm is so foreign that we cannot guess at its true meaning.

The dew of Hermon in Syria falling on Jerusalem is a strange concept. Perhaps 'dew of Hermon' was a phrase for heavy dew. Some emend Zion to 'dry', but this is simply to rewrite the psalm. The oil is probably the sacred oil of consecration. It may be that it is not the oil which runs down on the collar but Aaron's long beard, which 'flows' down.

There are carefully crafted repetitions and plays on words in the Hebrew: 'running down' in vv. 2 and 3 ('falls' is the same word); Zion and 'ordained' (vv. 3, 4); and 'brothers (NRSV 'kindred') and 'life' (vv. 1, 3) have a similar sound.

MT has 'Of David' in the title (as REB, NIV), but one LXX MS, the Coptic, and the Targum, as well as two Hebrew MSS omit the phrase (so NRSV, NJB), perhaps sensing its incongruity. Some think it has been misplaced from Ps 132.

Psalm 134 Ignorance about the worship in ancient Israel makes it difficult to reconstruct the way this psalm was sung. Are there two voices, or one? Are vv. 1–2 addressed to the priests or the laity? Were they actually 'standing in the temple' at the time the psalm was sung, or are they 'attendants' in the temple? What were the night-time practices? (There appear to have been nocturnal rites at the Feast of Tabernacles.) The opening is curious: literally 'Behold, bless YHWH', a unique phrase in the OT—the 'Come' of NRSV, REB, and NJB is not a legitimate translation—and 'Behold' may be wrongly repeated from Ps 133.

While the details are obscure, the general sense is plain: a call to worship God is followed by a priestly blessing. Blessing, indeed, controls the psalm: 'Bless YHWH' opens and closes the first part, and is picked up at the beginning of the last verse.

Psalm 135 Many allusions to other psalms and OT passages (e.g. Ps 134 in vv. 2, 21; Deut 32:36 in v. 14; Ex 19:5 and Deut 7:6 in v. 4), and a close similarity between vv. 15–20 and Ps 115:4–11, suggest that the psalmist either drew his inspiration (and some phrases) from earlier liturgical pieces, or was deeply attuned to living tradition. Perhaps because of this the structure is somewhat complex: vv. 1–4 are hymnic, with calls to praise and motivations introduced with 'for'; vv. 5–7 and 8–12 proclaim YHWH's greatness, first as Lord of nature, then as deliverer of Israel from Egypt and the one who gave the promised land to Israel; vv. 13–14 form another hymnic section, first addressed to YHWH and then describing his protection of Israel; vv. 15–20, apparently drawn from Ps 115:4–11, but with some differences, repudiate idols and call on Israel, priests, Levites, and those who reverence YHWH to praise him; and the concluding verse, possibly a later addition, praises YHWH as the God whose earthly home is Jerusalem.

It is better to try to understand the completed psalm than to worry about the sources from which it has been drawn. The changes of form and address possibly point to antiphonal singing, although it is not easy to determine which verses to ascribe to two or more voices. The tone throughout is of ardent and confident praise. It is apparently post-exilic. Whether it was intended for cultic singing is uncertain: Tabernacles and Passover have both been suggested as suitable occasions for its use.

Psalm 136 The reiterated refrain sounds monotonous to us. It probably points to antiphonal chanting, either between soloist and choir, or priest and people. Possibly it was added to an original psalm which consisted only of the first line of each verse (cf. the additions made to Ps 145 in the Qumran MS).

The form is a hymn. vv. 1–3 are a call to give thanks to YHWH; vv. 4–9 offer praise of YHWH as creator; vv. 10–22 praise YHWH as the one who delivered his people from Egypt and gave them the promised land; vv. 23–5 express a more general praise for God's deliverance of his people, perhaps in the present, and his care of all creation, introduced differently from the earlier part of the psalm; v. 26 is a renewed call to praise YHWH. The psalm forms a companion to Ps 135, and although both are often described as history psalms, both are really hymns (note especially vv. 1–3, 23–5). ‘O give thanks’ is assumed before vv. 4, 5, 6, 7, 10, 13, 16, 17. The dependence on Gen 1 (cf. vv. 7–9; Gen 1:14–18) makes a post-exilic date almost certain.

Psalm 137 ‘The tender pathos of the opening verses enlists our sympathy: the crash of bitter denunciation in the closing stanza shocks and repels’ (Kirkpatrick 1901: iii. 779). The date of the psalm is variously taken to be during the Exile, when the mockery of vv. 1–3 were a present experience, or soon after the return from exile when the psalmist looked back on past suffering. The key issue is whether v. 6 implies that Jerusalem is restored or faith is holding on to a ruin. Usually described as a communal lament or complaint, the emphasis on Zion is reminiscent of the Songs of Zion, and it may be that the psalmist is reusing features from those songs in a new way. Similarly he expresses his curse on Babylon in the form of a beatitude. The structure is either as in NRSV (vv. 1–3, 4–6, 7–9) or v. 4 belongs to the first stanza, and the rest of the psalm divides into 5–6, 7, 8–9.

History may help us to understand, if not to condone, the final curses. Edom was the traditional enemy of Israel, and at the time of the Exile the Edomites pressed into Judah, and brought upon themselves the undying hatred of Israel (cf. Isa 34; 63:1–6; Lam 4:21–2; Ezek 25:12–14; Ob). On one level it represents the ordinary features of ancient warfare; on another, the Babylonians were accounted the enemies of YHWH and not just of Israel, for they had destroyed his city and his temple.

The LXX gives ‘Of David’ as a title, and one LXX textual tradition added ‘through Jeremiah’, possibly noting similarities with Jer 49:7–22; 50:1–51:58, and the verbs ‘pay back’ and ‘dash’ (vv. 8–9) in Jer 51:20–4.

Psalm 138 The structure of this psalm is clearer than its type. vv. 1–3 express thanksgiving for answered prayer, vv. 4–6 call on the kings to praise YHWH, and vv. 7–8 conclude the psalm with confidence in YHWH’s steadfast love. Perhaps the most natural understanding is that this is an individual thanksgiving, but the universal reference in the middle section has convinced some that it is a royal psalm, offered by the king either when absent from Jerusalem or, more probably, from within the temple court and facing the temple itself. Others propose that it is corporate, the ‘I’ being either a representative of the nation or symbolizing it. Support can be found for each of these interpretations, but this only reinforces the uncertainty. For example, the call to the foreign kings fits a royal psalm, but might equally be a late ‘democratizing’ of the style when it was taken over by individuals. In the same way ‘lowly’ in v. 6 can be understood as a mark of an ordinary Jewish worshipper, but kings, both within Israel and in other countries of the ancient Middle East, described themselves as poor and lowly. Moreover, while there are some resemblances to Deutero-Isaiah (e.g. cf. v. 6 with Isa 57:15) these are hardly close enough to prove dependence on the prophet, and both may well have been calling upon traditional liturgical language. Some LXX MSS add ‘of Zechariah’ to the title, perhaps finding similarities between the message of this prophet and vv. 4–6. Finally, the tenses in vv. 4–5 present some difficulties. NRSV takes the verbs as future, declaring the homage that the kings will offer, but it is unusual to find such hymnic descriptions directly addressed to God, and it may be that the verbs should be taken as modal (‘Let all the kings of the earth praise you’, REB; NIV also takes the verbs as modal).

All in all we are left with a somewhat elusive psalm of thanksgiving, which nevertheless expresses as attractive a joyful thanksgiving and trust as any in the Psalter.

Psalm 139 The uncertain meaning and probable corruption of several verses in this psalm, coupled with uncertainties about its type, make interpretation very difficult. No space is available to discuss individual verses, but the wide differences between the chief modern translations, especially in vv. 11, 14, 16–18, 20 should be noted. The original text and meaning of these verses is probably beyond recovery.

The structure of the psalm as set out in NRSV is accepted by many. In vv. 1–6 the psalmist recognizes God’s intimate knowledge of all his actions and thoughts. He then confesses God’s omnipresence through rhetorical questions showing that nowhere could he escape from God’s presence (vv. 7–12, contrast Jonah). The next section (vv. 13–16) refers either to divine foreknowledge of the psalmist, even before he was born, or draws on mythological ideas about the creation of the first man from the womb of the earth; vv. 17–18 are a more general sense of wonder at God’s omniscience. The prayer against the wicked and expression of the psalmist’s hatred of those who oppose God in vv. 19–22 strike a harsh and possibly alien note, but the opening call for God to examine his thoughts and actions is picked up in the two concluding verses.

A decision about whether vv. 19–24 (or 19–22) are part of a separate psalm is not easy. The echo ‘you have searched’—‘search me’ (vv. 1, 23) is a strong pointer to unity, the sudden imprecation on the wicked and the difference between the types (they appear to be an individual thanksgiving, rather akin to a hymn, and a lament) speak for two separate psalms or parts of psalms.

Royal maximalists, who regard this as a royal psalm, see vv. 19–24 as the goal of a prayer in which the king invites God to search his inner being and prays for the slaughter of his enemies. (Many readers wish that vv. 19–22 were not there, and it is important to remember that for the psalmist the wicked were God’s enemies and that for him God’s honour was at stake; see rs 1.2–8.) An alternative interpretation ascribes the psalm to a man who has been acquitted of the charges made against him (God has already searched out his thoughts and deeds, vv. 1–3), and offers his thanksgiving. This is preferable to taking it as the prayer of one who has been accused and awaits judgement, a view that involves seeing vv. 1–18 as a kind of ‘negative oath’, akin to Job 31. All these interpretations assume that the psalm belongs to cultic worship, but some think it is too personal for this, and, pointing to wisdom features, regard it as a meditative poem.

The date of the psalm cannot be determined, but does not matter for an appreciation of the reverence before the mighty God which shines out.

Psalm 140 This appears to be the prayer of a man accused by slanderers, whose attacks are described under a variety of metaphors: war, snake poison, setting traps, and plots. The difficulties of knowing whether the situation is an appeal to a higher court, an ordeal, a counter-curse against sorcery, or a plea for direct divine aid and a right judgement are the same as in all similar psalms. A few attribute the psalm to the king (largely on the grounds of the references to war in vv. 2, 7, which most treat as part of the figurative language). The text is almost certainly corrupt in vv. 8–9, and the Eng. versions make various attempts to arrive at some sense.

The structure is not entirely clear. vv. 6–7, 12–13 are somewhat parallel in expressing confidence in God, most obviously in 12–13, which may be a response to a priestly or prophetic assurance that the prayer has been heard. This leaves vv. 1–5 as a prayer for help and vv. 8–11 as an imprecation against the enemies.

Psalm 141 vv. 5–7 of this psalm are so corrupt that it seems impossible to gain any certain sense (cf. the differences in the Eng. versions). In the psalm as a whole the psalmist prays that he may be delivered from the enticements and the oppression of the wicked, and seeks divine support to live a sinless life. Royal maximalists take it to be the king's psalm, perhaps offered during a military campaign far away from Jerusalem (v. 2 is taken to mean that he cannot offer sacrifice in the temple, while v. 7 is seen as a lament over battle losses). More probably it is a prayer of an ordinary worshipper, even a prayer outside cultic worship altogether, although most question whether v. 2 implies the substitution of prayer for sacrifice. While vv. 8–10 express the common plea for help against enemies who are persecuting the psalmist, in terms similar to Ps 140 (cf. 35:8), other parts of the psalm are closer to wisdom teaching, especially the request for help against wrong speech (v. 3) and to be kept away from bad company (v. 4, cf. Ps 1). The structure of the psalm is difficult to determine owing to uncertainties about the text. The NRSV divisions are probably as good as any: an opening call to God to hear his prayer (vv. 1–2), a petition to be enabled to avoid sin and sinners (vv. 3–4), and two sets of petitions against the enemies (vv. 5–7, 8–10), but v. 5 may belong to the second section.

Psalm 142 The title, references to enemies, the psalmist's close bond with YHWH, and the celebration of the people around him, perhaps even crowning him (v. 7, cf. REB: 'The righteous will place a crown on me') have led royal maximalists to include this as one of the king's psalms. On the other hand if 'prison' (v. 7) is taken literally, it will be more naturally regarded as the prayer of a man awaiting the divine decision as to his guilt (cf. Lev 24:12; Num 15:34). It may, however, be figurative, either for distress, or, less probably, for exile, turning the psalm into a prayer for Israel.

The simplest structuring of the psalm is to divide it into two strophes, vv. 1–4, 5–7, although the smaller divisions of NRSV point to further developments in the thought: the opening call to YHWH, a description of the distress, and renewed prayers, coupled with expression of trust in God and a final vow to offer thanksgiving for the deliverance.

The title reveals the way the editor searched the historical books for a suitable setting for the psalm. The cave may be that at Adullam or En-gedi (1 Sam 22:1; 24:3). It has been pointed out that he may have found links with the former in the references to 'refuge' (v. 5) and 'stronghold' (1 Sam 22:4), and to the latter through three words in v. 7 and 1 Sam 24:17–18 from the same Hebrew roots, though this is not apparent in the English: 'prison' (YHWH 'put me [shut me up] into your hands'); 'righteous'; and 'deal bountifully' ('repaid').

Psalm 143 This psalm is clearly the prayer of an individual, but who the psalmist might be is uncertain. Royal maximalists include it among the king's psalms, pointing to the title, the language, references to enemies, including possibly death as the supreme enemy, and similarities with the previous psalms, which are also regarded as royal. Others include it among the psalms of those falsely accused, pointing to its legal phraseology (e.g. vv. 1–2), seeing in v. 3 a reference to imprisonment while awaiting a decision, and relating v. 8 to the divine decision at dawn; the lack of the usual protestations of innocence perhaps counts against this interpretation. On either view, it is more likely that v. 5 refers to YHWH's deliverance of Israel rather than his past dealings with the psalmist. As with many of these individual laments, most of the allusions are too general to make any reconstruction fully convincing. One of the most striking characteristics of this psalm is the writer's eager longing for God himself and not just his gifts (v. 6), and his prayer to be enabled to obey him (vv. 8, 10).

The structure is not entirely clear because of the repetition of some of the ideas. Most simply it can be divided into an introduction (vv. 1–2), a description of his troubles (vv. 3–6), and further petitions (vv. 7–12), but within the second section there are references to enemies, the psalmist's own depression, a memory of the past, and a longing for God, while in the third death seems imminent, and the psalmist makes several requests for God's steadfast love and divine instruction, as well as deliverance from enemies, and their destruction.

Within Christian tradition this is one of the seven penitential psalms, Paul quoted v. 2 in Rom 3:20 to show universal sinfulness. The LXX's enlargement of the title with 'when his son (one MSS adds Absalom) pursued him' (cf. 2 Sam 15–18) shows how later editors looked for incidents in the books of Samuel with which to link the psalms, in this way providing an interpretation both of the narratives and the psalms.

Psalm 144 At least vv. 1–11 of this psalm are a king's prayer and must be included in the irreducible minimum of royal psalms. vv. 12–15, however, with their plural 'our' and theme of fertility and prosperity, are commonly held to be a fragment of a different psalm. The unity of the psalm can be maintained if it is taken to be liturgical, part of the ritual drama of the humiliation and restoration of the king, rather than a prayer before battle. The celebration of prosperity is the expected consequence of YHWH's salvation of his anointed servant and viceroy (cf. Ps 72). vv. 1–11 contain many reminiscences of other psalms, Ps 18 especially, but also Ps 8 and 33. This may indicate a late date, but the similarities might equally be the result of common liturgical language.

The meaning of v. 14 is uncertain. NRSV takes the first line as a continuation of the agricultural scene in the previous verse, with a change to an attack by a foreign enemy and exile in the second line (cf. NIV). REB, however, makes the whole verse refer to fertility among the animals.

To the Davidic title the LXX adds, 'concerning Goliath' (cf. 1 Sam 17), a further example of a late editorial ascription to David.

Psalm 145 This psalm is an acrostic, each verse beginning with the appropriate letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The n verse is missing from the MT, but is supplied by the Qumran scroll and the LXX and Syriac versions. It is included after v. 13 in all the modern Eng. versions.

Despite the limitations which the form imposes on the writer, the psalmist has produced a hymn with a firm structure. Three times the invocation to worship YHWH is followed by descriptions of his power and goodness (vv. 1–2 + 3; 4–7 + 8–9; 10–12 + 13–20), and the psalm ends with a renewed call to worship which links the individual and ‘all flesh’ (v. 21). If this is the correct analysis, the verbs in vv. 4–7 and 10–12 should be treated as modal, ‘May one generation laud your works to another...’, not recognized by modern translations (unless the ‘shall’ of NRSV is intended to express this sense).

The psalm is notable for reminiscences of other psalms; e.g. v. 3/Ps 96:4; and vv. 15–16/Ps 104:27–8. The description of YHWH in v. 8 is found in Ps 103:8 and Ex 34:6, while individual phrases occur elsewhere. It is possible that such phrases are derived from a common liturgical tradition rather than by direct borrowing, although the change of person in vv. 15–16 favours close contact between the two psalms.

Whether the psalm was ever part of cultic worship is uncertain, although the addition in the Qumran MS of ‘Blessed is YHWH, and blessed is his name for ever and ever’ after each verse may show that it was sung with a congregational response in late Jewish liturgy. The early church sang it at the midday meal, while Chrysostom associates it with the eucharist because of vv. 15–16. Some, however, regard acrostics as purely poetic, or as wisdom exercises which have no connection with the cult.

Psalm 146 Usually described as a hymn of praise, this psalm has several unusual features. It is by an individual. Instead of the call to praise (vv. 1–2) leading into a description of YHWH’s greatness, the psalmist introduces a wisdom-style warning against reliance on human aid (vv. 3–4). This is followed by a beatitude (v. 5) which opens out into the expected description of YHWH as creator and protector of the oppressed (vv. 6–9). Striking in this section are a series of relative clauses setting out the character of God and a group of five sentences each beginning with the name YHWH. The psalm ends with YHWH’s reign as king of Zion (v. 10), akin to the Zion hymns (cf. also v. 5). As in Ps 145, phrases from other psalms or from liturgical tradition are taken up and adapted for new use.

The LXX title ascribes this psalm, as well as Ps 147 (divided into two, each with the same title), to Haggai and Zechariah, without any obvious reason. Most regard it as post-exilic, however, on the grounds of its apparent use of other psalms and its language.

Psalm 147 This psalm consists of three sections, each of which is in the form of a complete hymn of praise, with call to worship and description of YHWH’s character and deeds upon which that praise is based (vv. 1–6, 7–11, 12–20). He is worshipped as the God of Israel who has restored Jerusalem after the Exile (vv. 2, 13), has shown himself as the mighty creator who controls the stars and the forces of nature, especially the winter frost and snow (vv. 4, 8, 16–18), provides food for human beings and animals (vv. 9, 14), and cares for the brokenhearted (v. 3) and the oppressed (v. 6). This raises the question of the unity of the psalm, doubts about which are increased by the LXX’s division into two psalms, vv. 1–11, 12–20. While some accept this, or even argue for a combination of three separate psalms, similarities of vocabulary and themes across the whole psalm, and possible structural patterns, such as the mention of Israel at the beginning and end, have convinced others that the MT tradition is the correct one.

The LXX adds to the title ‘of Haggai and Zechariah’, as in Ps 146, and inserts this full title before v. 12. Possibly the references to the restoration after the Exile are responsible for this, although it is difficult to determine what controlled its decision. In a further departure from the MT, the LXX adds a second ‘Praise the Lord’ in v. 1 (in these last five psalms in the Psalter ‘Hallelujah’ stands outside the main poem), which would make the rest of the verse into the ‘for’ clause of hymns.

Psalm 148 The structure of this hymn is interesting. The call to praise is expressed with imperatives in vv. 1–4, 7, and with jussives (‘let them praise’) in vv. 5a, 13a, while what is normally the main content of hymns of praise, the description of YHWH’s nature and deeds, introduced with ‘for’, is limited to vv. 5b–6 and 13b–14a. Moreover, in vv. 1–4 the imperative ‘praise him’ begins every line, whereas in vv. 7–12 the opening verb is followed by a series of vocatives. The unity is confirmed by the careful construction, which moves from the heavenly bodies (possibly thought of in mythological terms rather than merely poetic imagery), to features of the earth (natural forces, plants and animals, human beings), and finally to what is almost a little hymn to God in itself. v. 14bc is rather awkward and it has been suggested that it is an editorial footnote stating that this is a hymn of praise.

The listing of the various parts of the natural world have been compared to Egyptian lists, but these are longer and the psalm sounds more like a hymn than a scribal collection of animals. Others point to the hymnic tradition from Babylon as well as Egypt. There seems no need to go outside the OT, however, for the closest similarities are with Gen 1, even down to some items of vocabulary.

The ‘Song of the Three Young Men’ (an addition to Daniel inserted between Dan 3:23, 24 in the Gk. and Lat. versions), and the Cantemus Cuncti are further developments of this kind of hymn. Job 38, with which it is also often compared, is less close.

Psalm 149 Some divide this hymn into two sections, vv. 1–4, 5–9, others into three, vv. 1–3, 4–6, 7–9. In favour of a twofold structure is the call to praise followed by the grounds for this praise (introduced by ‘for’) in the first part, and the call to the people to execute divine vengeance in the second. Support for a three-part division is seen primarily in the triad of infinitives, in vv. 7–9, which marks off these verses; its weakness lies in the rather motley collection of themes in the middle part.

The psalm is marked by the martial tone and the look towards the future, and various situations have been proposed for it. The description of YHWH as king (v. 2) suggests that it may be one of the ‘new songs’ of the Autumn Festival (cf. Ps 96), the battle being cultic, and the eschatology part of the New Year rites. Others suggest an actual battle situation, the psalm being either a hymn of victory that looks forward to still greater triumphs, or as a prayer sung while preparing for the fight.

Many are appalled at the way this psalm has been used to stir up martial passions in the past. It may alleviate their distress to remember that Israel's enemies were also those of YHWH. On the other hand that may be seen to intensify hatred of the nation's enemies.

Psalm 150 This expansion of the cry, 'Praise the Lord', forms a noble conclusion to the book of the praises of Israel. Ten times the cry 'Praise him' (once 'Praise God') rings out. This may be accidental, or it may reflect the ten words of creation in Gen 1 (cf. m. 'Abot 5.1: 'By ten sayings was the world created'). These forge the psalm into a unity and it is unnecessary to try to divide it into stanzas, such as vv. 1–2, 3–4, 5–6, or, more realistically, vv. 1–2 expressing where and for what God is to be praised (by 'the sanctuary' is probably meant both the Jerusalem temple and God's heavenly dwelling), vv. 3–5 listing the various musical instruments (presumably those played in temple worship), and v. 6 uttering a final call to all living things to praise YHWH.

The psalm is often regarded as an extended doxology at the end of the Psalter, corresponding to the doxologies which mark each of the first four books. It is, however, a joyful hymn in its own right, distinguished by the dominance of the call to praise, and lacking the 'for' clauses that describe God's greatness (the brief motivation in v. 2 is a different construction in the Heb.).

19. Proverbs

K. T. AITKEN

INTRODUCTION

A. The book and its background. 1. The book of Proverbs presents itself as a textbook designed to educate humans in general and the young in particular in wise living (1:2–7). It divides into two main parts: a series of didactic discourses comprising parental instructions and speeches by personified

Wisdom in chs. 1–9, and collections of chiefly short proverbial sayings in chs. 10–31. The discourses in 1–9 serve as an extended introduction to the collections that follow. The major theme of these chapters is the surpassing value of wisdom and it is in them that the theological character of wisdom is most pronounced. Wisdom is founded on the 'fear of the LORD' (1:7; 9:10), and is the gift of God (2:6). Through its personification, wisdom is also presented as mediating God's revelation in creation to humankind (8:22–31). The question of how far the theological aspects of wisdom in the book represent a later religious or 'Yahwistic' reinterpretation of an earlier 'secular' wisdom has been the subject of much debate (see Wilson 1987: 313–33).

2. The similarity between the instructions in Proverbs and Egyptian texts used in the education of royal princes and state officials (see PROV 1:8–16; 22:17–24:22) has often been observed. It has been argued that court schools also existed in Israel and that Proverbs has its roots in these schools as an adaptation of Egyptian wisdom and its educational context (McKane 1970). But while the book contains observations on kings and royal officials, the majority of its sayings deal with everyday matters of family, community life, and personal relationships. Others have therefore stressed the importance of the family and community as settings for the instruction of the young and the transmission of proverbial sayings, maintaining that the book has its origins in a more popular oral tradition predating the monarchy (Westermann 1995). None the less, the court was evidently an important setting in the course of the literary development of the book (cf. 25:1). Given the variety in the contents of the book and the nature of the wisdom it inculcates, it seems reasonable to think that wisdom flourished in various settings in Israel and had a corresponding variety of exponents—all of which have left their imprint on the book.

B. Date and Authorship. 1. The book comprises a number of separate collections each of which, save the last one, is introduced by its own heading (see the outline below). The heading in 1:1 may be intended to refer to the book as a whole and Solomon is traditionally regarded as its author. But while its major collections are assigned either directly (10:1) or indirectly (25:1) to him, the remaining collections are ascribed to other 'authors'. It is also clear that the book can be no older than the time of Hezekiah (25:1). If the Solomonic origin of some sayings should not be excluded, neither can it be demonstrated. The headings are best seen as a reflection of the association of wisdom with the royal court in pre-exilic times (cf. 25:1), together with the tradition of Solomon as the paradigm of the wise king (1 Kings 4:29–34).

2. The dates of the individual collections are difficult to determine. It is likely that chs. 10–31 largely emerged during the pre-exilic period. Chs. 1–9 are commonly regarded as the latest section of the book. They may have been put together and edited to form an extended introduction to chs. 10–31, and it was probably in the post-exilic period that the book received its final shape.

COMMENTARY

Didactic Discourses (1:1–9:18)

(1:1–7) Introduction These verses state the purpose and value of the book and the basis upon which its teaching rests. 'Wisdom' basically means 'skill, ability'. The term is used, for example, of the manual skills of craftsmen (Ex 35:35; cf. Isa 40:20) and the navigational skills of sailors (Ezek 27:8). To learn about (lit. know) wisdom means to become equipped with the skills necessary to live a good and successful life. 'Instruction' (lit. discipline) often refers to the training received in wise living under the authority of a parent or teacher (e.g. 4:1–5). Here it means 'disciplined living' as the outcome of this training. The good and successful life is the disciplined life (cf. 25:28).

Wisdom promotes 'righteousness, justice, and equity'—i.e. right conduct and right relationships—within the community (v. 3). It equally promotes 'shrewdness' and 'prudence' based on a practical knowledge of the ways of the world (v. 4). A related form of the word 'shrewdness' is used pejoratively of the craftiness of the serpent (Gen 3:1; cf. Josh 9:4). Its good sense is captured in Mt 10:16. Those most in need of this wisdom are the 'simple', i.e. uninstructed youth. The word derives from a root meaning 'to be open'. As portrayed in Proverbs, the simple are 'open' to persuasion, and so easily manipulated (cf. 14:15). They are accordingly the primary targets for the beckoning of Folly (9:16; cf. 7:7, 21).

Following a parenthetical observation that through attending to Proverbs the wise can become wiser, v. 6 highlights the importance of an understanding of the literary forms in which wisdom is expressed. This includes not only intellectual penetration but also the ability to apply the right saying at the right time (cf. 26:7). A 'proverb' (māšāl) may originally have meant a short saying drawing a comparison, later extended to include other kinds of 'artistic' sayings (e.g. prophetic discourse, Num 23:7; allegory, Ezek 17:2; taunt song, Isa 14:4). In 1:1 it embraces the varied literary contents of Proverbs. A 'figure' is an enigmatic saying whose meaning lies beneath the surface and has to be teased out.

In v. 7 'fear of the Lord' is presented as the prerequisite of true wisdom. The verse is repeated in 9:10 by way of a literary inclusion for chs. 1–9, and forms a central theme of the book. Fear of the Lord embraces both reverence for God (cf. Isa 8:13) and obedience to him (cf. Deut 10:12–13; Eccl 12:13). 'Beginning' may imply first in order (Gen 1:1), or importance (Am 6:1), or the 'best part' (Am 6:6).

(1:8–19) Avoid Evil Men! This is the first of several instructions addressed by a father to his son in this section of the book. The characteristic features of the instruction are: an appeal for attentiveness (cf. v. 8); the directive expressed as a command or prohibition (cf. vv. 10b, 15), and motivation clauses explaining why the directive should be heeded (cf. v. 9, 16–19). The address by a teacher to his pupils as a father to his sons was a common practice in the wisdom schools of Egypt and Babylonia. However, the parallelism between father and mother (v. 8) suggests that the instructions in Proverbs may reflect the less formal setting of parental instruction within the home.

To 'hear' (v. 8) implies both to listen and to obey (cf. Isa 1:19). Obedience will adorn the child's life and character with charm and beauty (v. 9; cf. 4:9). Though invoking parental authority, the motivation clauses show that the instruction appeals as much to the child's good sense as its duty to obey its parents.

The child is warned against joining in the activities of a professional gang of robbers and murderers. 'Entice' (v. 10) comes from the same Hebrew root as the 'simple' (v. 4), and the passage illustrates the dangers of their 'openness' to persuasion. The gang holds out to the young person the attractions of a life of adventure, comradeship, and easy money. In v. 12 they liken themselves to Sheol swallowing its victims whole. The imagery of Sheol—the abode of the dead—as a devouring monster with an insatiable appetite for human victims (cf. also 27:20; 30:15–16; Isa 5:14; Hab 2:5) probably derives from the depiction of the god Mot (Death) within Canaanite mythology. Their appetite for violence and murder cannot be satisfied and they destroy their victims just as ruthlessly.

vv. 16–19 explain why the child should avoid such companions: they are evil (v. 16 = Isa 59:7a) and foolish (vv. 17–19). Their crimes are self-destructive and they are their own victims. Like a senseless bird that swoops down to the baited trap, these men are oblivious to all signs of their own danger and plunge mindlessly to their destruction. To join in their company is to share in their fate. The passage concludes with a summary statement of the operative principle of retribution (v. 19).

(1:21–31) Wisdom's First Speech In this passage wisdom (a fem. noun in Heb.) is personified as a woman. Though here Wisdom appears to be essentially a dramatization of the wisdom taught by the father, reinforcing the appeal to heed his instruction, she speaks not only like a wisdom teacher but also like a prophet. This implies that Wisdom speaks with a divine authority. To reject her is to reject the fear of the Lord (v. 29). The basis of her authority is expounded in 8:22–31.

Like a prophet, Wisdom takes her stand in public places and cries out to passers-by to accept her counsel and reproach.

Street corners, squares, and the city gates were the centres of the juridical, business, and social life of the city and form an appropriate setting for Wisdom to make herself heard. Wisdom bears on all human activity and has to compete not only with cynicism and wilful folly but also with the distractions of everyday life. 'Give heed' (v. 23) is literally 'turn'. The same word is used in prophetic exhortations to (re)turn to God (cf. Isa 44:22; Jer 3:22; Hos 6:1). The translation of Hebrew rûah by 'thoughts' (cf. Ezek 20:32, 'mind') rather than the more usual 'spirit' is supported by its poetic parallelism with 'words' in the next line.

There is an awkward transition between the exhortation in v. 23 and the reproach and threat in vv. 24–8, and this has led some to construe v. 23 as also condemnatory (cf. Murphy 1998: 7, 10). The reproach centres on the continued spurning of Wisdom's counsel (cf. 'how long', v. 22). The language has close parallels in prophetic indictments (cf. Isa 65:1–2, 12; Jer 6:19). The consequences of rejecting Wisdom are spelled out in vv. 26–8. The imagery of the storm or whirlwind is a common metaphor of judgement (Isa 17:13; Am 1:14), particularly in connection with a divine theophany (Ps 18:7–15; Nah 1:3–5). 'Panic' describes the 'terror' evoked by the day of the Lord in Isa 2:10–21. Wisdom's role will be simply that of an amused onlooker (v. 26; cf. Ps 2:4; 59:8). Too late they will realize the folly of spurning her and will be spurned by her. The repetition 'cry/call out' points the irony (vv. 21, 28). The same motif of futile entreaty occurs in the prophets (Isa 1:15; Hos 5:6).

The note of reproach is resumed in vv. 29–30. Echoing the motto in 1:7, v. 29 makes clear that the rejection of Wisdom is tantamount to rejection of the fear of the Lord. The announcement of doom represents the fate of the foolish as the natural outflow of their own folly: the boomerang of their own waywardness and complacency. 'Waywardness' evokes a contrast with 'give heed'. It derives from the same Hebrew root and likewise has echoes in prophetic passages, where it is used of Israel's backsliding and apostasy from God (Jer 8:5; Hos 11:7).

The concluding promise (v. 33) contrasts the security and peace of mind enjoyed by those who pay heed to Wisdom (cf. 3:21–6). This serves to temper the note of doom in the preceding verses, so that the passage as a whole functions as a warning to embrace Wisdom before it is too late.

(2:1–22) Wisdom as Guard and Guide This instruction presents wisdom as a human quest (vv. 1–5) and a divine gift (vv. 6–8), which guards its recipients from the way of evil men and loose women (vv. 9–19), and guides them in the way of good men (vv. 20–2). The alphabetizing shape of the passage, together with its rehearsal of themes developed in later instructions, suggests that it has a deliberate, programmatic character (cf. Skehan 1972: 9–10).

Wisdom must be pursued with diligence. The first step is to be attentive to the father's words and to 'incline the heart' (i.e. 'mind') to understanding wisdom (vv. 1–2). The dual application of ears and heart is reflected in Solomon's prayer for a 'listening heart' (1 Kings 3:9; NRSV 'understanding mind'). There must also be a fervent desire to find wisdom (v. 3), matching the fervency of Wisdom's desire to be found (cf. 1:20); and it must be pursued with the strenuousness and perseverance of miners tunnelling for precious ores (v. 4; cf. Job 28). For wisdom seeker and miner alike, the prize is worth the toil (v. 5). The quest for wisdom is a quest for knowledge of God and his ways, and fear of the Lord is not only the beginning of wisdom (1:7) but also its ripest fruit.

The seeker finds wisdom given by God himself (v. 6). Solomon's prayer (1 Kings 3:7–9) came to typify the prayerful attitude required of the wisdom seeker (cf. Wis 8:18, 21; 9:4). The present passage calls rather for concerted intellectual and moral application. vv. 7–8 characterize the wisdom God gives as 'sound wisdom', i.e. effective. It maintains God's moral order ('paths of justice') by preserving the upright from the pitfalls and snares of evil. The 'shield' may either be 'God' (NRSV) or 'sound wisdom' (NEB 'as a shield'). The upright are God's 'faithful ones' (hāsīdīm). This is the only occurrence of this term in Proverbs. It refers to those who are loyal to God and his covenant (cf. Ps 31:23; 37:28; 97:10). The wisdom God gives conserves the right ordering of his people.

Echoing the introduction in 1:2–7, vv. 9–11 elaborate on wisdom as a guide and a guard, and this is applied in vv. 12–19 to two particular cases: evil men and loose women. Evil men (vv. 12–15) are perverted characters who invert the moral order (cf. Isa 5:20). They abandon straight and level paths for ways of darkness, and they go about their evil for profit and for pleasure (v. 14). More dangerous than what they do is what they say (v. 12), for by their words they seek to entice others in the moral chaos of their ways. The instruction in 1:8–19 serves as a parade example of such men, and illustrates both the wickedness of their conduct and their enticement to evil.

The theme of the loose woman (vv. 16–19) is developed at length in 5:1–14, 6:20–35, and 7:1–27. The words translated 'loose woman' and 'adulteress' are literally 'strange woman' and 'foreign woman', neither of which are the normal terms for an adulteress or prostitute. Various explanations of her 'foreignness' have been given—both literal and metaphorical—sometimes linked to participation in the sexual rites of fertility cults. Camp (1985: 116) suggests that the figure functions symbolically for 'the attractions and dangers of any and every sexually liminal woman'. Warning against illicit sexual entanglements was a standard topic within Egyptian wisdom instruction. But whereas the Egyptian sages warned that it could ruin a promising career, here the seductress is a threat to life itself. 'Death' (v. 18) is a further allusion to the Canaanite god Mot and 'shades' (rēpā'im, a term for the departed, cf. Isa 26:14; Ps 88:10) to the Repha'im, the underworld deities and minions of Mot. The house of the seductress is as the mouth of the god (cf. 1:12).

(3:1–12) Trust in God Among the instructions in chs. 1–9, this passage stands out by reason of its pronounced religious tone. It may be seen to develop the motto of the book (1:7). Wisdom consists in complete trust in and submission to the Lord. It is introduced by the customary appeal to obey the father's teaching and a statement of the benefits that obedience brings (vv. 1–4; cf. 1:8–9). 'Teaching' (cf. 1:9) translates Hebrew tôrâ (lit. guidance, direction), in parallelism with 'commandments'. Both terms commonly refer to God's law but are equally at home in wisdom instruction (cf. 'my teaching'). 'Loyalty and faithfulness' can refer to relationships between human beings and God (cf. Jer 2:2; Hos 6:4) or to human relationships (cf. Ps 109:16; Hos 4:1; Mic 6:8). Both may be intended. They are to be worn as an adornment around the neck (cf. 1:9; Deut 6:8; 11:18) and written on the heart (cf. Jer 31:33).

vv. 5–8 form the kernel of the instruction. They contrast trust in God with self-reliance. The Hebrew word 'trust' is related to the words rendered 'securely' in 3:23 (cf. 1:33) and 'confidence' in 14:26. At stake is the basis for security in life, with the confidence to walk boldly without anxiety between the pitfalls and snares that lurk at every step. For this, complete commitment and submission to God ('all your ways') is the key. The medicinal analogy of healing and health to the benefits of wisdom (v. 8) recurs elsewhere in Proverbs (cf. 15:30; 16:24; 17:22).

The admonitions to honour God with the first fruits (vv. 9–10) and to submit to his discipline (vv. 11–12) exemplify trust in God in the contrasting situations of prosperity and adversity. The offering of first fruits was an expression of dependence on and gratitude to God for the gift of the land and its harvests (cf. Deut 26:1–11). But even those who honour God may sometimes suffer adversity. This should be accepted as a divine chastisement and a proof of God's fatherly love (cf. Job 5:17–18; 33:14–30; Heb 12:5–6).

(3:13–18) Wisdom's Benediction These verses form a hymnic celebration of the 'happiness' of those who find wisdom. While Wisdom is again personified (cf. 1:20–33), the hymn takes up and reinforces the benefits claimed for obedience to the father's instructions (cf. 1:8; 3:1–4) and serves the didactic purpose of commending his teaching.

To find Wisdom is to possess an asset of great value. Wisdom unfailingly pays a higher dividend than silver or gold (v. 14), and is a rare and priceless treasure beyond comparison (v. 15). Wisdom also bestows long life, riches, and honour on her devotees (v. 16) and leads them along pleasant and peaceful paths (v. 17). v. 16 probably owes something to depictions of the Egyptian goddess Ma'at, the goddess of truth and justice, who is portrayed with a symbol of long life in one hand and a sceptre symbolizing wealth and honour in her other. The 'long life' bestowed by Wisdom implies not only longevity but also quality of life. This is expressed in the metaphor of 'the tree of life' in v. 18: Wisdom is the vital source that nourishes growth and fruitfulness and promotes fullness of life (cf. 11:30; 13:12; 15:4). The expression recalls the tree of life in the garden of Eden (Gen 2–3).

(3:19–20) Wisdom and Creation In their present context, vv. 19–20 present the credentials for the claims made by Wisdom in the preceding verses. The wisdom by which humans are blessed is the wisdom by which the world was created and is sustained (cf. 8:22–31). The water imagery is suggestive of wisdom as fructifying life.

(3:27–35) Kindness and Neighbourliness The final section returns to the form of instruction and brings together a number of topics. The theme of vv. 21–6 is the secure and tranquil lives of those who hold fast to wisdom (v. 21) and trust in God (v. 26; cf. vv. 5–8). vv. 27–30 inculcate kindness and neighbourliness, with the avoidance of malicious actions and unnecessary quarrels. vv. 31–5 warn against envy of evil men and the imitation of their ways. God's judgement ('curse', cf. Deut 27:15–26) rests on their house and they will be utterly disgraced, while the upright will enjoy divine blessing.

(4:1–9) Get Wisdom! This short passage centres on the value of wisdom and the need to acquire it at all costs (v. 7). The father reinforces the appeal to his children (vv. 1–2) by recounting his own experience as a child when he was taught the lesson by his own parents (vv. 3–4). Here the importance of the home as a setting for wisdom as an educational discipline (cf. Ex 12:26–7; Deut 6:6–7, 20–5), together with its transmission from one generation to the next, is particularly well illustrated. His precepts are 'good' (RSV 'sound', v. 2) because they have been proved by experience, but each new generation must choose to receive them and prove them for themselves.

In vv. 6–9 wisdom is personified as a bride to be wooed, and who will in return love and honour those who embrace her. The garlanding (v. 9) may be an allusion to a wedding feast. This portrayal of Wisdom is evidently intended to counter the spurious love and deadly embrace of the seductress. According to McKane (1970: 306), the representation is rather of Wisdom as an influential patron offering protection and preferment to her protégés.

(4:10–27) The Two Ways The metaphor of life as a road with two ways plays an important role in the teaching of Proverbs. It has already occurred a number of times (cf. 1:15, 19; 2:8–22; 3:17, 23, etc.). In vv. 10–19 it becomes the main theme of the instruction as the father counsels his child to adhere to the way of wisdom and avoid the path of the wicked. 'Paths of uprightness' (v. 11) implies not only paths that are morally upright, but also paths that are straight and level (cf. 3:6). Hence the way of wisdom is not only the good path (cf. 2:9) through life but also the secure path (cf. 3:23). It is a road along which the traveller can progress with firm, measured strides and even run without fear of stumbling (v. 12; cf. Ps 18:36). A further reason why it is the secure path is that it is brightly illuminated. In v. 18 it is compared with the steady increase of brightness from the first flickers of dawn to the full splendour of the noonday sun. No loose stones or potholes can lurk in the shadows to catch the traveller unawares.

The contrasting description of the path of the wicked recalls the description of their activities in 1:8–19 and of their twisted paths in 2:12–15. Wrongdoing and violence come as naturally to them as eating and drinking (v. 7). Their path is shrouded in 'deep darkness' (v. 19). The term is used of the plague of darkness that enveloped Egypt (Ex 10:22), and also recurs in descriptions of the consequences of the day of the Lord (e.g. Joel 2:2; Am 5:20). It suggests the extent of their moral blindness, but more especially it points to the inevitable consequence of walking along a treacherous, twisting path in utter darkness. Intent on the destruction of others ('cause to stumble', v. 16) they make victims out of themselves ('stumble', v. 19). In the darkness of their deeds, they will not even see what their feet strike on that final, fatal step (cf. Job 18:7–12; Jer 13:16; 23:12).

The final paragraph (vv. 20–7) resumes the appeal (v. 10) to accept the father's words, since they are 'life' and 'healing' (cf. 3:8). To walk in the way of wisdom (cf. vv. 26–7) requires constant vigilance, self-discipline, and singleness of mind and purpose. This is set out in a review of parts of the body: the heart, mouth, eyes, and feet. These may be sources of evil and death (cf. 6:16–18) or sources of goodness and life. If they are healthy, the whole body is healthy.

(5:1–22) Avoid the Seductress This instruction continues the warning against the loose woman introduced in 2:16–19 (see also 6:20–35; 7:1–27). It begins with a typical appeal to the child to listen carefully to the warning so that he might receive the prudence and knowledge necessary to avoid entanglement with her (vv. 1–2).

The danger posed by the loose woman is compounded by her seductive wiles. While making use of her natural sex appeal (cf. 6:25), it is on her seductive speech that she relies most (cf. 7:14–20). Her words are like honey and are smoother than oil (v. 8). Honey was proverbial for its sweetness (cf. 16:24; Judg 14:8, 14). The figure is used in Song 4:11 of the bride's kisses. Smoothness can denote flattery (cf. 29:5) and hypocrisy (cf. Ps 5:9). The seductress thus holds out promise of pleasure and enjoyment. But the reality is quite different ('in the end'). This is brought out by the contrast in vv. 3–4 between honey and wormwood and between smooth and sharp. Wormwood was equally proverbial for its bitterness (cf. Jer 9:15; Am 5:7). Her honeyed words leave a bitter taste and her smooth words are as the thrusts of a double-edged sword (cf. Ps 55:21). Disregarding the path of life, the seductress travels the path to Sheol (v. 5; cf. 2:18–19; 7:27) with the unsteady steps of a drunkard ('wander'; cf. Isa 28:7) as she staggers from one lover to another unmindful of the harm she brings either on herself or on her victims (cf. 7:21–7; 30:20).

Following the resumptive appeal for attentiveness and obedience (v. 7), the father offers the same succinct advice as in 1:15 (cf. 4:15), here emphasized by a wordplay between 'far' and 'near' (v. 8). This advice is then reinforced by spelling out the consequences of liaison with her (vv. 9–14): the loss of dignity and honour (v. 9), of hard-earned wealth (v. 10), and of vigour and health (v. 11). This is the antithesis of Wisdom's benediction in 3:13–18. The phrase 'your years to the merciless' (v. 9) is obscure. The Hebrew word 'years' may rather be connected with an Arabic word meaning 'honour, dignity'. This gives a good parallel to the first line. 'Merciless' is masc. sing. and could be an allusion to Death as the cruel, merciless one. With the support of the LXX, it is sometimes emended to the plural, which might then be a reference to the seductress and her associates. 'At the end of your life' is literally 'at the end'. It echoes v. 4 and more probably means 'afterwards', i.e. when the effects of vv. 9–10 are felt. The lament of the victim in vv. 12–14 illustrates the theme of rejecting wise counsel and learning the lesson too late (cf. 1:24–8). The reference to ruin before the public assembly (v. 14) might be a specific reference to punishment meted out by the lawcourt or may refer more generally to public denunciation and disgrace. Possibly behind the scene is the woman's husband (cf. 6:34–5), denouncing the offender in public (v. 14) and pressing for compensation (v. 10).

Whereas the preceding verses primarily have in view young unmarried men, vv. 15–21 address the married man. They counsel that the best way of avoiding the temptation of the seductress is that he remain in love with his wife and derive sexual satisfaction from her. Drawing on imagery of water and its sources (cf. Song 4:15), v. 15 expresses the pleasure which a man should obtain through sexual intercourse with his wife. In v. 16 the 'springs' and 'streams' could allude to the waste that results from extramarital affairs or to the encouragement of the wife to infidelity through neglect. The image of the wife as a 'graceful doe' is symbolic of her beauty (v. 18; cf. Song 2:7), with which the husband should be intoxicated.

Reinforcing the appeals for a prudent weighing up of the consequences of liaison with the seductress, in v. 21 appeal is made to the scrutinizing eyes of the Lord (cf. 15:3; Job 31:4; 34:21) and his guardianship of the moral order. None the less, the concluding summary of the consequence of such indiscretion and folly is again expressed in terms of reaping what has been sown (cf. 1:19; 2:20–2). 'Toils' is literally 'cords'. By threading a path to folly's door, a man is threading a noose around his own neck, like a senseless bird weaving the net that will ensnare it (cf. 1:17–19).

(6:1–19) Four Warnings The four miscellaneous sayings in these verses are more reminiscent of the proverbial sayings in chs. 10–31 than the discourses in chs. 1–9. Though the form of instruction is reflected in the first, it lacks the characteristic parental appeal for attentiveness.

vv. 1–5 warn against acting as guarantor for debts. 'Neighbour' and 'stranger' (v. 1; cf. NSRV fn.) perhaps refer to the friend on whose behalf security is pledged and to the creditor, respectively. The expression 'to give a pledge' is literally 'to strike hands' (cf. 2 Kings 10:15). If a pledge has been given, no time should be lost and no effort spared in seeking to be released from it. Not only penury (cf. 22:26–7) but also slavery threatened the unwise guarantor (cf. 2 Kings 4:1–7; Neh 5:1–8).

vv. 6–11 warn against laziness and encourage diligence. The drawing of analogies with the natural world was common in wisdom circles (cf. 30:15–16, 24–31). The ant is a model of diligence and foresight in that it prepares its food for winter without having to be goaded. Wedded to slumber and indolence, the lazy person makes no such provision (cf. 20:4) and will suffer poverty and want. v. 11 should perhaps be rendered like a 'vagrant' and a 'beggar'.

The description of the scoundrel (vv. 12–15) recalls the evil men in 2:12–16. 'Scoundrel' is literally 'man of bēliya'al' (from which comes 'Belial') (cf. 16:27; 19:28). The derivation of the word is obscure. It may be a compound word meaning 'worthless' (lit. not-profit), or may derive from a verb meaning 'swallow, engulf' or the like. The scoundrel is characterized by his malicious undermining of harmonious relations within the community (v. 14). v. 13 may imply the casting of magic spells to accomplish his evil designs (McKane 1970: 325) or may simply refer to the covert way he and his associates go about their business.

vv. 16–19 form a graded numerical saying of a type common in the HB (cf. 30:15–31; Job 5:19; Am 1:3) and in the literature of the ancient Near East. It was particularly useful within wisdom circles, both as a means of classification and as an aid to memorization. The saying complements vv. 12–15 by listing different kinds of malicious and disruptive activity through a review of the unhealthy body: 'eyes... tongue... hands... heart... feet' (contrast 4:23–7). The 'false witness' and 'one who stirs up strife' complete the seven items.

(6:20–35) The Price of Adultery This passage returns to the form of instruction and to the theme of the seductress. vv. 20–4 emphasize the need to hold fast to parental teachings: they are light and life and will protect against her enticements. Though the reference is to parental teaching, vv. 21–2 closely echo the role of divine teaching in Deuteronomy 6:6–8 (cf. 3:3, 24). In v. 24 'wife of another' rests on a change on the vocalization of Hebrew 'evil women' following the LXX and v. 29. Here the seductress is explicitly a married woman. Alongside her seductive speech (24; cf. 5:3), warning is given against being captivated by her eye make-up and inviting glances (cf. Sir 26:9). 'Desire' is the word translated 'covet' in the tenth commandment (Ex 20:17).

In vv. 26–33 the case against the adulteress is closely argued through comparison with a prostitute, fire, and a thief. The Hebrew text of v. 26a is obscure. The English versions are divided between the sense that a prostitute costs only the price of her fee (cf. NSRV; NEB) and that a prostitute brings a man to poverty (NIV). In either case the point is that the adulteress exacts a heavy price: 'a man's very life'. vv. 26–7 appear to be popular maxims. The point of the comparison is reinforced by a wordplay in Hebrew between 'wife' ('ēšet) and 'fire' ('ēš). v. 30 may be construed either as a question (RSV; NEB) or as a statement (NRSV; NIV). In the former case, the point of vv. 30–3 appears to be: how much more will the adulterer be despised than the thief and how much more dearly will he have to pay since he has no excuse? In the latter case, the cost to the adulterer is the same, but it would be contrasted with the lenient view taken of a thief in these circumstances. The concluding verses (vv. 34–5) envisage a jealous and enraged husband seeking revenge and demanding a higher price than money.

(7:1–21) The Wiles of the Adulteress The body of this passage is formed by an example story on the wiles of the adulteress (vv. 6–23). It is enclosed by parental instruction to accept teaching (vv. 1–5) and avoid the adulteress (vv. 24–7). The appeal to the child in vv. 1–5 closely echoes 6:20–4. In v. 4 'sister' probably means 'bride' (cf. Song 4:9–10), again presenting Wisdom as a counter-attraction to the adulteress for the love and fidelity of the child (cf. 4:6–9).

The story is cast in the form of the personal reminiscence of what the narrator observed through the lattice of his window. In the LXX it is the woman who looks out of the window seeking her prey, and this reading has been preferred by some scholars. The story unfolds with a young man making his way through darkening streets towards the house of the adulteress (vv. 6–9). The impending darkness becomes symbolic for the story as a whole. He is accosted by a woman dressed like a prostitute and practised in the art of seduction (vv. 10–13). vv. 14–20 illustrate the 'smoothness' of her words (v. 5)—the chief weapon in her arsenal (cf. 2:16; 5:3; 6:24). She flatters him and invites him to spend a night of sexual pleasure with her, reassuring him it is perfectly safe since her husband is away on a business trip. The significance of the cultic reference in v. 14 and its function in the seduction scene are quite unclear (cf. Murphy 1998: 43–4). In any case, unable to resist her advances and oblivious to the real cost he will have to pay, the young man follows her: one more beast to the slaughter; one more bird caught in her snare (vv. 21–3). The final paragraph (vv. 24–7) reinforces the lesson by exhorting the child to avoid the paths of the adulteress and warning of the deadly effects of consorting with her. Her house is the vestibule to Sheol and leads down to death (cf. 2:18–19; 5:8).

(8:1–36) Wisdom's Second Speech Personified Wisdom again takes her stand in public places and invites all who would learn from her to receive her instruction. In vv. 1–11 she assumes the role of a wisdom teacher. The prophetic note of reproach and threat characteristic of her first speech (1:20–33) is lacking. The setting in vv. 2–3 is reminiscent of the 'patch' of the seductress in 7:11–12. It has emerged that Wisdom has to compete not only with the distractions of everyday life and wilful folly (1:20–33) but also with the enticements of the seductress. The emphasis on the character of Wisdom's words in vv. 6–9 can be seen in this light. While the words of the seductress are marked by duplicity and fraudulence, the words of Wisdom are marked by candour and integrity. Wisdom speaks in plain language, which is intelligible to all who find her (v. 9). vv. 10–11 are very similar to 3:14–15.

In vv. 12–21 she extols her providential role in the good and orderly government of the world (vv. 12–16) and as the giver of wealth (vv. 17–21). vv. 12–14 closely echo the language of the prologue (1:2–7). The terms 'advice' and 'strength', however, anticipate the manifestation of the various qualities of wisdom in the government of kings and rulers (cf. Isa 11:2). The role claimed by Wisdom is comparable to that of a royal counsellor (cf. 2 Sam 16:23) and even to God himself (1 Kings 3:1–15). vv. 17–21 (cf. vv. 10–11) are a variation on the theme of 3:13–18. Wisdom bestows not only the intimacy of her embrace but also wealth and prosperity upon her lovers. The connection between vv. 12 and 14 is interrupted by v. 13 and it should perhaps be transposed to vv. 6–9.

The hymn of self-praise by Wisdom in vv. 22–31 falls into two parts: Wisdom's origins before creation (vv. 22–6), and her place at creation (vv. 27–31). As rendered by the NRSV, Wisdom variously describes herself as created by God (v. 22), set up or installed (v. 23; with royal overtones, cf. Ps 2:6) and as born (vv. 24–5). However, the significance of the first two terms in the Hebrew is disputed. The first translates Hebrew qānāh, which besides 'create' (cf. Gen 14:19, 22) could also mean 'procreate' (cf. Gen 4:1). Likewise the second term, of uncertain derivation, may be connected with a root meaning 'to be fashioned [in the womb]' (cf. Job 10:11; Ps 139:13). Hence Wisdom may be consistently representing herself as a child of God. None the less, the emphasis of the verses is not the manner of Wisdom's origins but her priority over the created world. Although v. 22 alludes to the creation narrative in Genesis ('beginning'), the language of the passage stands closer to hymnic celebrations of creation (cf. e.g. Ps 104:5–13; Job 38:4–18).

During the creation of the world, Wisdom was 'there' (v. 27), 'beside' God (v. 30). The particular part she played is obscured by the uncertainty of the meaning of Hebrew ʾāmôn in v. 30. The translation 'master workman' (NRSV) is based on Jer 52:15 and has the support of the LXX. In this case, Wisdom actively participated in the design and construction of the world. The apocryphal Wisdom of Solomon explicitly represents Wisdom as 'the fashioner of all things' (7:1). Alternatively, the word may mean 'little child', connected with 'those reared' in Lam 4:5. This suits the metaphor of birth in the preceding verses, while vv. 30–1 read more like a child at play than a craftsman at work. 'Rejoicing' is elsewhere used of children playing in the street (Zech 8:5). The picture is of Wisdom playing at her father's feet and bringing him pleasure and then making the world her playground. As her ways brought pleasure to God, so they now bring pleasure to humankind.

The final vv. 32–6 form a resumptive conclusion looking back to the appeal in vv. 3–4. The 'happiness' of the man who finds wisdom recalls the theme of 3:13–18. To neglect and miss Wisdom spells injury and death.

The identity of the Woman Wisdom in chs. 1–9 and especially in 8:22–31 has been extensively debated (see Camp 1985: 23–70). While some view the figure as a personification or hypostatization of a divine attribute, others find her origins in goddess figures within the ancient Near East or within Israel itself. Von Rad (1975: 148) argued rather that she was an attribute of the world, signifying 'something like the "meaning" implanted by God in creation'. Certainly, she is an ambivalent and enigmatic figure. She belongs at God's side, but she is also at home in the world (8:31–3). This ambivalence conceals her identity as much as it reveals her place as the link between heaven and earth and the mediatrix of divine revelation and divine blessing.

(9:1–18) The Two Banquets In the first and last sections of this chapter, Wisdom and Folly are contrasted as rival hostesses inviting the simple to enter their house and dine with them (vv. 1–6, 13–18). Though Folly is portrayed in terms of the seductress, her description as 'woman of foolishness' (v. 13) implies that she personifies every kind of folly. Hence, the contrast reinforces not so much the earlier warnings against adultery as the teaching on the two ways (cf. 4:10–27).

The significance of Wisdom's seven-pillared house is uncertain. Among other things, it has been taken to symbolize the world as fashioned by Wisdom; the cosmic temple of Wisdom (Perdue 1994: 94–7), or to be simply a stately mansion. Correspondingly, the pillars have been thought to have cosmic or mythological significance; to reflect temple architecture, or to indicate that Wisdom's house is a rather splendid one which can accommodate all who accept her invitation. The invitation of Wisdom (vv. 3–4) echoes her earlier appeals (cf. 1:20–1; 8:1–5). It is addressed to the 'simple', i.e. to those who most need to dine with Wisdom but who can be most easily induced to dine with Folly (cf. 1:4). In v. 5 food and drink is used figuratively of Wisdom's instruction (cf. Isa 55:1–3; Sir 15:3; 24:19–21). 'Bread' may be better translated 'meat' (cf. v. 2).

The brash manner in which Folly invites the simple to her house (vv. 13–16) recalls the solicitations of the seductress (7:11–12) and contrasts with the formality and decorum of Wisdom's invitation. That the provision of Folly is water and bread (v. 17) may be intended to compare unfavourably with the sumptuousness of Wisdom's spread. However, it is likely that Folly is citing a popular proverb on the magnetic power of forbidden fruit. Whereas the banquet of Wisdom promotes and celebrates life (v. 6), to dine with Folly is to banquet with the 'dead' in Sheol (cf. 2:18–19; 5:5–6; 7:27).

The middle section (vv. 7–12) is digressive and is regarded by some commentators as a later intrusion. In its present context it may be intended to contrast two different responses to Wisdom's invitation—the one represented by the scoffer (cf. 15:12; 21:24) and the wicked, and the other by the wise and the righteous. It is those who are responsive to discipline and who fear the Lord who will partake of Wisdom's banquet.

The First 'Solomonic' Collection (10:1–22:16)

This is the largest collection of proverbial sayings within the book—some 375 in all. Differences between chs. 10–15 and 16:1–22:16 have often been observed. Most notably, while the vast majority of sayings in chs. 10–15 are in the form of antithetic parallelism, in 16–31 other kinds of poetic verse forms predominate. Chs. 10–15 also have a certain coherence through the prevalence of sayings on the righteous and the wicked. This section of the book may therefore have arisen through the combination of two originally independent collections.

For the most part sayings appear to be randomly organized with only the occasional small topical grouping. Recent studies have suggested the significance of catchwords, sounds, and various other rhetorical devices in the formation of sub-units within the collection, which provide a context for the individual saying. However, it is seldom evident that such sub-units display a corresponding thematic coherence, and the individual saying still seems to be the significant unit (Martin 1995: 54–61).

(10:1–32) Wise and foolish children. Following the parental appeals in chs. 1–9, this section appropriately begins with a proverb observing the effect on parents of the wisdom or folly of their child (v. 1; cf. 15:20; 17:21, 25). Not only is the joy or sorrow of parents at stake, but also the family's reputation (cf. 28:7) and its prosperity (cf. 29:3).

The righteous and the wicked. The sayings on the righteous and the wicked in this part of the book reinforce the earlier teaching of the two ways and the theory of retribution on which it rests (cf. esp. 2:9–22; 4:10–19). In some sayings retribution is presented as part of the natural order of the world (e.g. 11:5–6), while in others God himself acts to uphold his moral order by punishing the wicked and rewarding the righteous (e.g. 10:29; 12:2).

The righteous will enjoy a long and fulfilled life with the satisfaction of their needs and desires, while the wicked will be frustrated at every turn and will in the end meet with an untimely death (vv. 3, 24, 27–8). The 'dread' of the wicked (v. 24) may refer to divine punishment or reflect a basic sense of insecurity—fearing the worst (cf. 25). It contrasts with 'fear' of the Lord (v. 27). After their deaths, the reputation of the righteous will live on and be prized by the community, while the name of the wicked will rot with their bones (v. 7).

Several sayings centre on the difference between the speech of the two groups. The words of the righteous are of great value (v. 20) and win acceptance (v. 32), for they are characterized by wisdom (v. 31), bring nourishment (v. 21), and promote life (v. 11). On the other hand, the wicked have nothing of value to say (v. 20) and what they do say is characterized by perversity (v. 32) and duplicity, concealing their malicious intent to cause harm (v. 11b; cf. v. 6b). By their words, therefore, the righteous contribute to the well-being of the community, whereas the speech of the wicked undermines it. On a more general note, vv. 14 and 19 imply that the words of the wise and righteous will be few (cf. 13:3; 21:23). Garrulosity is a hallmark of the fool (v. 8).

Poverty and wealth. v. 15 contrasts an advantage of wealth with a disadvantage of poverty. Wealth provides protection and security against the vicissitudes of life (cf. 18:11), whereas the poor have no resources to fall back on. For this the poor may sometimes have only themselves to blame (v. 4). But not all wealth is advantageous. How it is acquired is the test of whether it is an asset or a liability (v. 2). The instruction in 1:8–19 illustrates the liability of ill-gotten gain (cf. also 20:17; 21:6; 28:20). By contrast, the wealth that accrues through 'righteousness', i.e. honesty and integrity, is a mark of divine blessing and provides for a long, secure, and anxiety-free life (v. 22; cf. 11:4).

Hatred and strife. v. 12 observes the disruptive effect of hatred on social relationships. The 'covering' of offences by love is commensurate with forgiveness (cf. Jas 5:20). In v. 18a the LXX reads 'Righteous lips conceal hatred', which gives a contrast with 18b (cf. NEB). If the Hebrew text is retained, the thought is either that the ill-will concealed through lies is as bad as open slander, or that lies and slander are both expressions of a deep-seated hatred (cf. 6b).

(11:1–31) Commercial malpractice. The use of false weights and measures (v. 1, cf. 16:11; 20:10, 23) is condemned in the law (Deut 25:13–16) and the prophets (Am 8:5; Mic 6:11). Ancient Near-Eastern law codes also prescribed against it. 'An abomination to the Lord' conveys the strongest possible displeasure (cf. 6:16). v. 26 appears to have in view traders who stockpile grain in times of scarcity to force up the prices and increase their profit. Their selfishness invites a curse upon their heads from their customers.

Pride and humility. v. 2 observes that pride goes before a fall (cf. 16:18; 18:12; 29:23) and commends the wisdom of humility. 'Disgrace' is literally 'lightness' and suggests both the contempt for and the lack of importance people of good sense will attach to the self-important. 'Humble' is a rare word. It is found again (as a verb) only in Mic 6:8 of 'walking humbly' with God.

The righteous and the wicked. Several sayings in the chapter are further variations on the theme of the fate of the righteous and the wicked. vv. 3, 5–6, recall the benefits of wisdom as a guide and guard in 2:8–11. While the righteous walk securely along straight paths, the wicked become victims of their own Machiavellian schemes and devices (cf. 2:12–15). vv. 4, 28, are further reflections on the profitlessness of wealth without righteousness (cf. 10:2). v. 7 is difficult. Following the LXX, it has been proposed to emend the first line to read 'when the righteous die their hope does not perish'. If this were to be the correct reading, the notion of an afterlife need not be implied (see 10:7). v. 9 returns to the malicious and destructive speech of the wicked (cf. 10:6). It is unclear whether gb means that the righteous will be delivered from their malevolence or will deliver others from it (cf. NEB). The social consequences of the words (and deeds) of the righteous and wicked for the body politic are summed up in v. 11—making v. 10 self-evident. For the metaphor of the ‘tree of life’ (v. 30) see PROV 3:18.

Gossip. Those who speak disparagingly of a neighbour show a lack of sense (v. 12), and those who betray his confidence a lack of trustworthiness (v. 13). Both disrupt good relations between friends and neighbours, and as ‘whisperers’ are close companions of the perverse man who spreads strife (16:28).

A gracious woman. In v. 16 the NRSV adopts the longer text of the LXX. The Hebrew text contains only the first and last lines (cf. RSV). The saying seems to contrast the honour that a woman obtains through her natural disposition with the effort men must expend to acquire wealth (McKane 1970: 431). With a humorous note, v. 22 observes the incongruity of the beauty of a woman who lacks ‘sense’ (lit. taste).

Generosity. v. 24 points to the paradox between generosity and enrichment and miserliness and impoverishment. In v. 25 ‘enriched’ is literally ‘made fat’, a figure for abundance and prosperity (cf. Deut 32:15). The sayings may have giving to the poor in view (cf. 28:27).

(12:1–28) The fool. The sayings in vv. 1, 15–16, 23, reflect on central characteristics of the fool as portrayed in Proverbs. By reason of his innate stupidity and self-conceit, the fool is as impervious to a word of advice as to a word of rebuke (vv. 1, 15; cf. 18:2; 28:26). The sense to recognize sound advice and to act upon it—not least by those used to giving it (v. 26)—is a mark of wisdom. The fool also lacks self-control, both of his temper (v. 16; cf. 14:17, 29; 29:11) and his tongue (23; cf. 10:14; 15:2; 18:6–7). The eagerness with which he speaks his mind and offers his opinions (cf. 18:2) advertises his folly, and contrasts with the disciplined, restrained speech of the wise (‘conceals knowledge’) (cf. 10:19; 17:28).

The good wife. ‘Good’ (v. 4) is literally ‘strong, firm’. It is the word that occurs in the expression ‘men of valour’ (e.g. Josh 1:14). In Ruth 3:11 it describes the heroine. Here it means strength and nobility of character, embracing both her capabilities as a housewife (cf. NEB) and her integrity (cf. NIV). This is a wife who enhances her husband’s honour and reputation (cf. 31:10–31). Her opposite is a wife whose behaviour brings her husband into disrepute and saps his energy like a wasting bone disease.

Slander. The metaphor of the words of the wicked as ‘a deadly ambush’ (lit. ambush of blood, v. 6) echoes the words of the robbers and murderers in 1:11. Here, the reference is to their false and slanderous accusations. Through their wisdom and knowledge, the righteous have the verbal skills to defend themselves—or perhaps to defend others (‘them’)—against their attacks (cf. 11:9). Going a step further, v. 13 observes that the words of evil men weave a web of intrigue in which they themselves will be ensnared (cf. 1:18; 11:6).

Rash words. Potentially just as dangerous and destructive are rash words (v. 18; cf. 29:20). However well intended, words hastily spoken are apt to wound. It is the judicious, considered speech of the wise that brings healing in a difficult situation. The healing property of a well-chosen word is also remarked in v. 25 (cf. 16:24).

Lying. As already in 6:17, ‘lying’ is condemned as an ‘abomination to the Lord’ (v. 22). The thought of v. 19 is not so much that the liar will be quickly found out and punished, but that lies are short-lived and ephemeral since they have no basis in reality. Only the truth endures.

False witnesses. v. 17 is the first of a number of sayings on giving false witness (cf. 14:5, 25; 19:5, 9, 28; 25:18). Perjury is the sin condemned in the ninth commandment (Ex 20:16). It is the worst form of lying, since it mocks (19:28) and defeats the ends of justice (25:18).

Laziness. Diligence is the path to the top of the social ladder and laziness the path to the bottom (v. 24). ‘Forced labour’ is possibly a reference to debt slavery (cf. Deut 15:12; Lev 25:39–40). The sense of v. 27 is uncertain. Drawing on the imagery of hunting, it may be a comment on the inability of a lazy person to carry a project through to its successful completion (cf. 19:24). Again diligence is the path to success.

(13:1–25) Parental discipline. The expression ‘loves discipline’ (v. 1) rests on an emendation of the Hebrew ‘instruction of [his] father’. The Hebrew text lacks a verb and possibly ‘heeds’ should rather be supplied as understood from its occurrence in the parallel line. The verse reinforces the parental appeals of chs. 1–9. Refusal to heed correction places wisdom beyond reach of the ‘scoffer’ (cf. 9:7–8; 14:6; 15:12). Though always having more to do with a listening ear, the word ‘discipline’ is also used of physical chastisement (v. 24), which is viewed as an essential component in the upbringing of a child. The contrast between ‘hate’ and ‘love’ underlines the importance the wise attached to it (cf. 20:30; 23:13–14).

Rash speech. v. 3 is a warning against garrulousness or rashness of speech. Not only can it be harmful to others (12:18), but also it can land the speaker in trouble (cf. 10:14; 21:23).

Poverty and wealth. The general point made by v. 7 is that appearances can be deceptive. Behind it may lie the thought that ostentation is as reprehensible as miserliness or that true richness and poverty are not measured by a person’s possessions. The first line of v. 8 points to an advantage of wealth. A rich man has the resources to pay what is demanded when kidnappers or robbers threaten his life. The second line is literally ‘but a poor man does not heed rebuke’, which the NRSV probably rightly takes to mean that the poor are never threatened in this way, since they have nothing worth extorting. Here—but ironically—the advantage lies with the poor. In v. 11 wealth gained through manual labour is contrasted with the kind of wealth that is achieved overnight. The reference is perhaps to the returns on speculative investments in trade and commerce rather than to dishonest gain. The first kind of wealth is substantive and enduring, while the latter is fleeting and ephemeral (cf. 27:23–7). v. 18 is one of several sayings in Proverbs which view poverty as a consequence of folly (cf. 10:4; 21:17, 20). If the NRSV rendering of v. 23 is sustainable (cf. McKane 1970: 462–3), this verse observes that the poor do not always have themselves to blame. The poor may reap a good harvest from their meagre plot of land only to have it extorted by greedy, unscrupulous men (cf. 22:16; 30:14).

Desires fulfilled. v. 12 reflects on the psychology of human desire and its disappointment or realization. The thought recurs in the first line of v. 19, but the second line of this verse seems quite unconnected.

The teaching of the wise. The expression 'fountain of life' in v. 14 (cf. also 10:11; 14:27; 15:4) is perhaps a distant echo of the rivers that watered the garden of Eden (Gen 2:10–13; cf. Prov 3:18). Wisdom teaching is the source of life's vitality and growth for those who heed it (cf. v. 13). The imagery of the second line is of Death as a hunter laying traps to ensnare the unwary and uninstructed (cf. PROV 1:12).

(14:1–35) Wisdom's house. As rendered by the NRSV, v. 1 seems to be a comment on the value of the good wife as homemaker, and may be so (cf. 31:10–31). But the phrase translated 'the wise woman' raises difficulties, and 'the foolish' is literally 'folly'. The verse is most reminiscent of personified Wisdom building her house in 9:1 as the antithesis of Folly and her house in 9:14 and may be making much the same point: what Wisdom is at pains to build, Folly is at pains to demolish.

The fool. Whereas the words of fools get them into trouble, the judicious and economical speech of the wise keeps them safe (v. 3). 'Rod for their backs' is an emendation of the Hebrew 'rod of pride'—an obscure image, which, if retained, would make the first line a comment on the arrogance underlying what a fool says. The most natural sense of 'misleads' (lit. 'is deception') in v. 8 is to mislead others, but the parallelism suggests that here the word may mean to mislead oneself ('is self-deception'). By contrast, the wise give careful thought to the course of their conduct and have a clear understanding of its consequences. v. 16 draws a similar contrast between the cautious and prudent conduct of the wise and the arrogant recklessness of the fool. Since the speech of a fool is not informed by knowledge, his company should be avoided (7; cf. 13:20). The meaning of v. 9 can only be guessed (cf. the English versions).

Joy and sorrow. vv. 10, 13, are pensive reflections on joy and sorrow in human experience. Others cannot share the depths of an individual's sorrows and joys; and even the most joyous moments are clouded by sorrow with grief never far away.

The simple. v. 15 contrasts the prudent conduct of the wise (cf. v. 16) with the credulity of the simple (see PROV 1:4). Without the benefit of instruction in wisdom, the simple are on the way to becoming fools (cf. v. 18, NRSV fn.).

Anger. The antithesis between the quick-tempered and the schemer in v. 17 does not seem very apt. It is perhaps better with the RSV to follow the LXX and translate the second line 'but a man of discretion is patient'. v. 29 makes the same point (cf. 12:16). The word 'passion' in v. 30 is a fairly general word for deep emotion, including envy and jealousy (6:34; 27:4) as well as anger. This verse shows insight into the effect of the state of the mind on the health of the body (cf. 3:8).

Rich and poor. v. 20 points to a social advantage enjoyed by the rich over the poor. The saying is not a sardonic comment on the dubious value of wealth's new-found friends (cf. 19:6) but a frank comment on human nature. In v. 31 the social obligation of caring for the poor (cf. v. 21) is grounded in the common humanity of rich and poor alike as the creatures of God. To oppress the poor is to show contempt for their creator

(cf. 17:5), while to show kindness and generosity towards them is to honour him.

(15:1–32) Words. v. 1 contrasts the conciliatory reply that soothes a situation and makes for reasoned discussion and the acrimonious reply that inflames it and makes intelligent discussion impossible. 'Gentle' (v. 4) points either to the conciliatory or to the healing quality of words. Such speech promotes life, in contrast with twisted or perverse speech, which causes injury and brings death (cf. 18:21). v. 23 expresses the satisfaction that comes from a timely word for both the one who gives it and the one who receives it. Out of 'season' the best of words are ineffective and counter-productive. In v. 26 'pure' expresses God's approval of gracious words, i.e. words spoken to promote harmony and well-being, over against his abhorrence of evil and malicious schemes. The second line is often emended to read 'but the words of the pure are pleasing to him' (so RSV; cf. NIV).

God's scrutiny. Echoing 5:21, the theme of v. 3 is the all-seeing eye of God, from which nothing can be hidden. The implication is that the good will receive his blessing and the evil will be condemned and punished (cf. 22:12). v. 11 makes much the same point. 'Abaddon' (lit. destruction) is a poetic synonym for Sheol. If the depths of Sheol are 'naked' before God (cf. Job 26:6), how much more are the thoughts, motives, and intentions of the human heart exposed to divine scrutiny (cf. Ps 44:21).

Prayer and sacrifice. v. 8 is one of the few sayings in Proverbs that deal with cultic practice. The point is not the superiority of prayer, but that only sacrifices offered in sincerity are acceptable to God. So in v. 29 the prayer of the wicked likewise falls on deaf ears. Though v. 8 closely echoes prophetic passages on the theme (e.g. Isa 1:10–17), it also has parallels in Egyptian wisdom literature.

Joy and sorrow. vv. 13, 15, are further comments on joy and sorrow (cf. 14:10, 13). The first contrasts the inner joyfulness that makes for a healthy body and a glowing complexion (cf. 17:22) with the sorrow (lit. painfulness of heart) that debilitates the body and leaves its etchings on the face. v. 15 comments on the inner happiness that can overcome adversity.

True enrichment. While wealth may be good and advantageous in many respects, it can lead to 'turmoil' and breed moral and spiritual blindness (cf. 11:28; 30:8–9). Fear of the Lord (v. 16), righteousness (16:8) and a good name (22:1) are better things—things that truly enrich.

Planning and counsel. v. 22 states the principle that the key to a successful venture is sound planning and wide consultation. The saying most of all has in view the rulers and leaders of the nation. In 11:14 it is applied to affairs of state, and in 20:18 to the conduct of war.

Divine justice. God champions the cause of the widow by protecting her boundaries and breaking down the house of the proud (v. 25). Here the proud are those whose estates have been built up through their appropriation of the property of the poor and needy. Removing the landmarks marking the boundaries of the family inheritance was a serious offence (Deut 19:14; 27:17; cf. Prov 22:28; 23:10–11).

(16:1–33) God's purposes. vv. 1–9 (except v. 8) form a small group of sayings dealing with divine providence over human affairs. Over against sayings commending careful planning as the key to successful undertakings (e.g. 15:22; 20:18; 21:5), vv. 1, 9, observe its limitations along the lines: 'Man proposes, but God disposes'. Only plans which coincide with God's purposes will succeed (v. 3; cf. 19:21). The prevailing of God's purposes is also the theme of v. 33. The reference is to the casting of the sacred lot (cf. 1 Sam 10:20–1) perhaps in the settlement of legal disputes (cf. 18:18). The saying asserts that though men cast the lot—and however much a matter of chance the procedure may appear—it is God who makes the decision (lit. judgement).

v. 2 observes the defective evaluation people make of themselves. They are unable to penetrate their deepest motives and have a capacity for self-deception. God alone can properly evaluate and judge ('weigh') a person's character and conduct (cf. 21:2; 15:11). The word translated 'weigh', however, could also mean 'fix to a standard' (cf. NEB). In that case the point of the saying would be the poor standards by which men evaluate themselves. The meaning of v. 4 is obscured by the ambiguity of the expression 'for its/his purpose' (lit. answer, response). The expression might be better rendered 'with its counterpart'. The saying asserts a divinely created order in which actions and their consequences have been made to correspond. The day of trouble is the appropriate counterpart to the wicked person. Alternatively, it could mean that even the punishment of the wicked is part of the divine plan. v. 6 implies that atonement for sin is not a matter of sacrifice but of 'loyalty and faithfulness' towards God (cf. Hos 6:6). In the second line 'avoids evil' could refer either to doing evil (cf. 8:13) or to suffering harm.

The king. vv. 10–15 (except v. 11) form another small group of sayings dealing with the king. The word translated 'inspired decisions' (v. 10) is elsewhere used only in the bad sense of 'divination, soothsaying'. Here it points to the uncanny perceptiveness underlying the king's legal pronouncements—as though they were divine oracles (cf. 2 Sam 14:17, 20). The first line of v. 12 might better be translated 'Kings detest wrongdoing' (NIV), the reference being to wickedness by the king's subjects, which, left unchecked, will undermine the stability of his throne (cf. 25:4–5). vv. 14–15 contrast the king's displeasure with his favour. They may have originally been sayings advising royal officials and courtiers of the hazards and rewards of employment in the king's service. The hazards are illustrated by the stories of Joseph (Gen 39–50), Daniel (Dan 1–6), and Esther (cf. also 1 Kings 2).

Pleasant speech. In vv. 21, 23, 'persuasiveness' is literally 'learning'. The wise teacher speaks in a pleasant and judicious manner, which enhances the appropriation of his teaching by his pupils. In so doing, he will also enhance his reputation for perceptiveness. The sweetness and health-giving properties of pleasant words (v. 24) evoke a contrast particularly with the seductive words of loose women (cf. 5:3–4).

Evil and slanderous speech. The sayings in vv. 27–30 give particular emphasis to slanderous speech. On the 'scoundrel' (v. 27) see 6:12–14. He 'digs up evil' (lit.) and spreads his slanders with devastating effect. v. 28 observes the strife and divisions caused by slanderers and gossips (cf. 6:14; 26:20). The wink and compressed lips (v. 30) may signify slander by insinuation (cf. 6:13) or that the facial expression betrays a malicious intent.

Old age. v. 31 reflects the thought that longevity is the reward of a righteous life. Old age is the fitting climax and fulfilment of a life well lived (cf. 17:6; 20:29).

(17:1–28) Quarrelling and strife. A modest meal with peace and harmony round the table is better than a sumptuous spread with resentments and rivalries smouldering away and breaking out into open quarrels (v. 1; cf. 15:17). 'Feasting with strife' is literally 'sacrifices of strife'. The allusion is perhaps to the 'peace offering', giving added force to the saying. The first line of v. 19 observes the disruptive effect of the quarrelsome. The meaning of the second line is unclear. It is perhaps an unrelated comment on the self-destructiveness of arrogance. Drawing on the imagery of a dam springing a leak, v. 14 advises to stop a quarrel before it gets out of control. McKane (1970: 505) suggests legal disputes are particularly in view. These should be dealt with before they go to court.

The prudent servant. Despite his lowly status, a household servant who serves his master well will disinherit a worthless child who brings disgrace (v. 2)—a happy acknowledgement that ability counts for more than privilege (cf. 27:18; see 2 Sam 16:1–4). vv. 21, 25, are further observations on the grief caused by foolish offspring (cf. 10:1).

God tests the heart. v. 3 is a companion saying to 16:2. As an assayer tests silver or gold, God 'tests' the heart to determine its genuineness and purity.

Bribes. v. 8 is one of several proverbs that remark the benefits of giving a bribe. It smooths the path to social advancement (18:16), wins friends and influences people (19:6), and extricates the giver from difficult situations (21:14). Such sayings read strangely against the condemnation of bribery in 15:27. A distinction is sometimes drawn between a bribe and a gift to explain the difference. However, while both terms are used in these sayings, no clear distinction is drawn between them. They are equated in 21:14, and the word translated 'gift' there is translated 'bribe' in 15:27. The sayings simply observe how things are and do not necessarily recommend or condone the practice. In v. 23 the 'wicked' is a corrupt judge. 'Concealed' is literally 'from the bosom', i.e. the fold in a garment at the breast, from where money could be slipped surreptitiously. The corruption of justice is also the theme of vv. 15, 26. To justify the wicked and condemn the righteous means to pronounce the guilty innocent and the innocent guilty.

Friendship. The second line of v. 9 may refer to spreading tales (lit. repeats a matter) about friends behind their backs or continually harping on to them about their shortcomings (cf. NEB). Friendship thrives on forgiveness. In v. 17 'friend' is probably equated rather than contrasted with 'brother'. It is in times of adversity that friendship and kinship are displayed.

Rebels. v. 11 is probably a warning of the consequences of plotting sedition against the king rather than of rebellion against God. The 'cruel messenger' is a reference either to the king's executioner or to death (cf. 16:14).

The fool. A few sayings centre on the inability of the fool to learn wisdom. The fool is intellectually deficient and unable to benefit from instruction (v. 16). He also lacks the concentration of mind and purpose demanded (v. 24), while even the rod makes not the slightest impression on him (v. 10).

Restraint in speech. v. 27 observes the restraint in speech and in temper of the wise. The 'cool in spirit' is the opposite of the 'hot-tempered' in 15:18. Since silence is a mark of wisdom, a fool who remains silent can conceal his folly and enjoy the esteem afforded to the wise (v. 28)—a lesson, however, that the fool seems incapable of learning (cf. 12:23; 15:2).

(18:1–24) The meaning of v. 1 is unclear. As rendered by the NRSV, it appears to be a comment on the contempt that goes hand in hand with a misanthropic isolation (lit. one separated) from society.

The law court. Partiality in judgement is condemned in v. 5. The Hebrew idiom is 'to raise the face'. This probably reflects the custom of the ruler raising the face of a prostrate subject as a sign of his favour (cf. Mal 1:8). v. 17 also seems to be concerned with the legal process. It cautions against reaching a premature verdict on the basis of the eloquence with which the case against a defendant is presented. Only when the defendant has submitted this case to careful cross-examination can a fair and balanced judgement be reached. To use the lot to settle cases the legal processes could not resolve was to submit them to divine arbitration (v. 18; cf. 16:33).

Rich and poor. v. 11 describes the security and protection provided by wealth from the point of view of the rich and need not imply that it is illusory (cf. 10:15). The juxtaposition of v. 11 with v. 10, however, underlines that the protection afforded by wealth is not absolute. It is relative to the vulnerability of the poor (cf. 11:28). In v. 28 the deferential words of the poor as they ask for charity are contrasted with the harsh reply of the rich, who have become hardened to their incessant appeals. This is expressed simply as a fact of life.

Quarrelling. The Hebrew text of v. 19 is quite obscure. The thought seems to be that the closer the relationship (ally is lit. brother), the greater the alienation a quarrel causes and the more difficult reconciliation becomes.

Words. The power of the tongue is summed up in v. 21. It may deal in death and destruction or in life and healing. The point of the second line is perhaps that those who love to talk must bear the consequences of their words for better or worse. Alternatively, the thought may be that the words of those who respect the power of the tongue and cultivate wise speech bear fruit. The satisfaction to be derived from productive and beneficial speech is stated in v. 20. v. 4 is better translated: 'the words of a man's mouth are deep waters, a flowing brook, a fountain of wisdom'—a wise man is implied. The metaphors express the profundity of his words, and the abundance and inexhaustibility of the refreshment and blessing they bring. Contrasting with the productive use of the tongue, a small group of sayings deal with destructive uses of it. Through his malicious and slanderous words, the fool creates disturbance and dissension around him and sows the seed of his own ruin (vv. 6–7). The last phrase of v. 7 could also be translated 'a snare to his life'. v. 8 comments on the fact that it is a weakness of human nature to find pleasure in listening to gossip. Already 17:4 has implied that listening to slander and gossip is as bad as spreading it. v. 2 remarks the eagerness of fools to air their ignorance. Disdainful of the opinion of others, they take every opportunity to express their own. Much the same thought underlies v. 13.

(19:1–29) Rich and poor. v. 1 is almost identical with 28:6, but there the poor are contrasted with the rich (some emend the verse accordingly, cf. NEB). Compared to the fool who has lied and cheated his way to success, the poor person who has maintained his integrity is better off (cf. 16:8). While the second line of v. 22 makes a similar contrast between the poor and the liar, the meaning of the first line and its connection with it are uncertain. Wealth attracts friends while poverty repels them (v. 4; cf. 14:20). Friendship with the poor is too demanding. While their relatives may have little choice but to support them, their friends and neighbours will do all they can to avoid them (v. 7a). The text of v. 7b is obscure and may form the remains of a separate saying (cf. NEB, following the LXX). Over against this matter of fact observation, v. 17 commends generosity to the poor. To be kind to the poor puts God into debt and he will pay his debts in full (cf. 14:31; 22:9).

Zeal without knowledge. In v. 2 'desire' connotes vitality and drive. The saying complements those that counsel careful planning (e.g. 15:22; 21:5). Zealous and impulsive activity carried out without careful forethought and a clear objective will achieve nothing.

Anger. vv. 11, 19, return to the topic of anger (cf. 14:17). The text of v. 19 is difficult, but the general sense seems to be that to bale the violent-tempered out of the consequences of their actions will be counter-productive and will only encourage them.

The king. v. 12 repeats the thought of 16:14–15 with a change of imagery.

Wives and children. v. 13 adds 'ruin' to the grief caused by a foolish child (cf. v. 26; 10:1). The second line may be tongue in cheek or from the heart. The following verse (14) is evidently placed here to contrast the nagging wife with the good wife (cf. 12:4; 18:22). The point of the saying seems to be that marriage is an uncertain affair. Whereas house and wealth inherited from parents are known quantities, a newly wed wife is not. Only time will tell whether she is a good or bad wife, and therefore whether she is from the Lord (cf. 18:22). The necessity to 'discipline' children is emphasized in v. 18. Discipline includes both 'instruction' (cf. vv. 20, 27) and the 'chastisement' of the rod (cf. 13:24). The second line of the verse means that discipline will save the child from following the paths of folly and wickedness that lead to death.

Laziness. A humorous description of a lazy person is given in v. 24. It reflects an incapacity to take in hand even the simplest of projects and carry it through to a successful end (cf. v. 15; 6:6–11).

(20:1–30) Drunkenness. Excessive drinking turns a person into a mocker and a brawler (v. 1; cf. 23: 29–35). It befuddles the senses and excites belligerence. The last phrase may mean to drink to excess is not wise or that it makes a person act unwisely.

Laziness. v. 4 shows again the inevitable step from laziness to want (cf. 12:27; 13:4). Perhaps citing the wet and the cold of autumn ('in season') as his excuse for not ploughing (cf. 26:13), the farmer foolishly expects a harvest for which he has been too lazy to work. v. 13 encapsulates the instruction in 6:6–11 (cf. 19:15; 24:30–4).

The purpose of the heart. The point of v. 5 is evidently that the deepest thoughts and intentions of the heart can be fathomed through the patient probing of the wise and discerning. Alternatively, it could mean that the wise man's skills of articulation and clarification are required before a profound plan can be carried into effect (McKane 1970: 536–7).

Loyalty. When put to the test, loyalty and faithfulness (cf. 3:3) become scarce commodities (v. 6; cf. 19:22; 25:19; Job 6:14–23).

The king. Drawing on the same imagery, vv. 8, 26, remark the king's exercise of justice. The wise king will have the discernment to see through the schemes concocted by miscreants to cloak their evil and pull the wool over his eyes, to separate truth from falsehood, and his punishment will be 'crushing'. v. 28 recalls 16:12 (cf. 25:4–5). Here, however, the reference could be to God's 'loyalty and faithfulness' as expressed in his covenant with the Davidic house (cf. 2 Sam 7:15; Ps 89:33–4).

Purity of heart. v. 9 reinforces the deficiencies of human evaluation of character and conduct when set beside God's weighing of the heart (see PROV 16:2). Against this, v. 27 seems to imply that conscience is an inner, divine illumination of the deepest motives of the heart, so that people need not be self-deceived (but cf. NEB). v. 11 makes the quite separate point that the character of the adult is already revealed in the conduct of the child.

Eyes and ears. The point of v. 12 may be either that the wisdom learned through experience is reliable, since it was God who created the eyes and the ears, or that they should be used to learn wisdom, since that was what they were created for.

A good bargain. v. 14 gives a humorous picture of the buyer who complains he is being offered inferior goods to get a reduction in the price, and then boasts about how clever he was.

Going surety. v. 16 (cf. 27:13) is perhaps an ironic warning that the guarantor need expect no mercy from the creditor if the debtor defaults. Alternatively, it may be advising the creditor to take security from the guarantor when he is underwriting the debts of a foreigner, since they are a high risk. Garments were commonly given as security for loans (cf. Ex 22:25–7; Deut 24:10–13; Am 2:8).

Acquiring wealth. v. 17 returns to the theme of ill-gotten gain (see PROV 10:2). It is not clear whether v. 21 has in view seizing the property before the proper time through fraudulent or violent means (cf. 19:26; 28:24) or illustrates the principle 'easy come, easy go' (cf. 13:11; 27:24).

Rash vows. v. 25 is a case in point of the folly of rash speaking (cf. 29:20). Failure to fulfil a vow was a serious matter (cf. Num 30:2; Deut 23:21–3), while fulfilling a rash vow could be costly (cf. Judg 11:30–40).

The rod. v. 30 provides the justification for the counsel of Proverbs not to spare the rod (cf. 13:24; 22:15; 23:13–14).

(21:1–32) God disposes. v. 1, 30–1, are further sayings on God's sovereign control of human affairs. God controls the actions and decisions of the king to achieve his own purposes (v. 1; cf. 16:1, 9)—whether as his willing (Ps 78:70) or his unwitting servant (cf. Jer 25:9). The 'streams' are irrigation channels, which can be directed to where they are needed. The best-laid human plans and intentions that do not conform to God's purposes will come to nothing (v. 30; cf. Ps 33:10–11).

Sacrifices. The priority of righteousness and justice over sacrifices (v. 3; cf. 15:8) is a common prophetic theme (see PROV 15:8; cf. Isa 1:11–17; Jer 7:21–6; Hos 6:6; Am 5:21–7; Mic 6:6–8), and is illustrated by Saul (1 Sam 15). The 'evil intent' compounding the offensiveness of the sacrifices in v. 27 is best known to the wicked.

Pride. v. 4 is a difficult text. The connection between the first and second lines is obscure. 'Lamp' follows the LXX (Heb. 'ploughing'). The general sense seems to be the sinfulness of pride (cf. 6:16–17; 16:5), complementing such sayings as 16:18 and 18:12, which underline its folly (but cf. McKane 1970: 558–9).

Wealth. Wealth obtained fraudulently is both 'fleeting' and lethal (v. 6)—in contrast with Wisdom's wealth, which is 'enduring' (8:18) and life-enhancing (3:16–18). 'Snare of death' follows the LXX. v. 20 contrasts the thrift of the wise with the profligacy of the fool, of which the extravagant self-indulgence remarked in v. 17 may serve as a case in point.

The righteous and the wicked. v. 12 is obscure, but probably means that God takes note of the house of the wicked and brings it to ruin. 'The Righteous One' occurs as a divine title in Job 34:17. If 'ransom' is taken literally, v. 18 would seem to mean that the punishment of the wicked discharges the liability of the righteous to punishment. This seems an improbable thought. The point of the saying 'remains an enigma' (Murphy 1998: 160).

Contentious wives. v. 19 suggests that the roof of the house (cf. v. 9; 25:4) is still too close for comfort! The point both sayings make is that any kind of discomfort and privation is preferable to the comforts of home where there is domestic strife (cf. 19:13; 27:15–16).

Wisdom v. strength. The superiority of wisdom over strength is the subject of the anecdote in v. 22 (cf. 24:5–6, also 16:32). The saying reinforces the advice on waging war in 20:18. The wisdom of the strategy implemented and the tactics employed secures the victory.

False witnesses. v. 28 is a further saying on the topic of false witnesses (cf. 12:17). The meaning of the second line is obscure. The Hebrew is literally 'a man who hears will speak for ever'. The English versions go different ways in wresting sense out of this as a contrast to the first line.

(22:1–16) A good reputation. In v. 1 the NRSV rightly supplies the word 'good' from the context. Behind the verse lies the thought that a name is an expression of the inner character and worth of its bearer (cf. Gen 32:28) and that it survives his or her death (cf. 10:7).

Rich and poor. v. 2 makes the observation that rich and poor are to be found side by side and that they are equally the creatures of God (cf. 29:13). No moral is drawn. Similarly, v. 7 simply notes that the poor end up as slaves of the rich because of their inability to repay their debts. v. 9 returns to the theme of showing generosity to the poor (cf. 14:31). The Hebrew of v. 16 is cryptic and its meaning elusive (cf. McKane 1970: 571–2).

Parental discipline. v. 6 emphasizes the importance of parental instruction in the home (cf. 19:18). The Hebrew simply reads 'according to his way'. This could mean the training must be tailored to the individual child, but the NRSV is doubtless correct in interpreting it as the way in which the child ought to go. v. 15 again reinforces the value of the rod in educating children (cf. 3:24).

Laziness. The lazy person's inventiveness in making excuses for doing nothing is quite remarkable (v. 13; cf. 26:13).

The seductress. v. 14 resumes a central theme of the first section of the book. 'Mouth' recalls the seductive speech of the loose woman (cf. 5:3), but in conjunction with 'pit' it may also imply the entrance to the underworld (cf. 1:12; 2:18–19; 5:5, 27).

Sayings of the Wise (22:17–24:22)

This section is primarily in the form of a series of short parental instructions (cf. 23:15, 22; 24:13, 21). It has affinities with the Egyptian Instruction of Amen-em-ope (see examples below) and is widely held to be dependent on it, with its 'thirty sayings' (22:20) modelled on the 'thirty chapters' of Amen-em-ope. However, the parallels extend only as far as 23:11 and the nature and extent of the dependence is a matter of debate. In the course of its adaptation the material has been made to serve the wider educational goals of Proverbs, including inculcation of trust in the Lord (22:19).

(22:17–29) vv. 17–21 are an introduction. The heading has been extracted from the Hebrew 'hear the words of the wise', generally assumed to have been incorporated into v. 17 by mistake for 'hear my words' (LXX). Amen-em-ope begins with a similar appeal for attentiveness: 'Give thy ears, hear what is said, Give thy heart to understand them.' There is also a striking parallel between v. 21 and the statement of the purpose of Amen-em-ope: 'to know how to return an answer to him who said it, and to direct a report to one who has sent him'. vv. 22–3 concern the oppression of the poor. They warn against using the legal system ('at the gate') as an instrument for the exploitation and oppression of the poor (cf. Isa 10:1–2; Am 5:12). God is their protector and will take up their cause (cf. Ex 22:22–4). vv. 24–5, concerning hotheads Amen-em-ope gives the same advice: 'Do not associate to thyself the heated man, Nor visit him for conversation'. It also contrasts the heated man (cf. 15:18) with the cool or silent man (cf. 17:27) in language reminiscent of Ps 1: the one will flourish like a 'tree growing in a garden' while the other will be cut down and used as firewood. The 'ways' of hotheads are strewn with snares and are ultimately the way of death.

vv. 26–7 warn that penury beckons the imprudent guarantor. See PROV 6:1–6; 20:16. v. 29, the term rendered 'skilful' means a scribe in Ps 45:1 and Ezra 7:6. The saying advises that the scribe who carries out his duties efficiently and judiciously may expect the highest promotion in the king's service. Amen-em-ope similarly observes: 'As for the scribe who is experienced in his office, He will find himself worthy to be a courtier.'

(23:1–35) vv. 1–3 give some further advice about table manners to aspiring royal employees. To 'put a knife to your throat' is a forceful expression for 'curb your appetite'. The description of the royal fare as 'deceptive food' (lit. bread of lies) may imply that an ulterior motive lies behind the king's hospitality or may simply mean that it can prove a courtier's undoing. The king will take note of the glutton and assume he is just as uncouth in carrying out his duties. vv. 4–5, to make accruing wealth the chief goal in life is to pursue a mirage: no sooner here than gone. Amen-em-ope likewise advises: 'Toil not after riches... They have made for themselves wings like geese, And have flown into the heaven.' vv. 6–8, 'the stingy' is literally 'one with an evil eye' (cf. 28:22), as contrasted with the 'generous' ('one with a good eye', 22:9). While the miser affects to be a generous host ('eat and drink') his hospitality is insincere. When his guests see through him they will 'vomit' with disgust and rue every friendly word wasted on him. The expression rendered 'like a hair in the throat' is uncertain. An alternative rendering is 'like one who is inwardly reckoning' (RSV).

vv. 10–11 warn against the appropriation of the land of the defenceless through the removal of the boundary stones (cf. 15:25; 22:28). Where there is no human kinsman to defend their rights (cf. Lev 25:25; Ruth 4), God himself will become their redeemer (cf. 22:23). Amen-em-ope likewise warns: 'Do not carry off the landmark at the boundaries of the arable land... Be not greedy after a cubit of land, Nor encroach upon the boundaries of the widow.' vv. 13–14, yet again the value of the rod in the disciplining of children is affirmed (cf. 13:24; 20:30; 22:15). That the child 'will not die' could mean that it will not suffer irreparable harm. However, the parallelism with 'Sheol' suggests it means that the rod will save the child from following the paths that lead to death and direct him along the path of life (cf. 13:14; 15:24). vv. 19–21, the child is warned to avoid the company of drunkards and gluttons. Excessive eating and drinking are marks of indiscipline and sure routes to inertia and ultimately to poverty.

vv. 26–8, once again warning is given against the seductress. She is portrayed both as a huntress who traps her victims (cf. 7:22–3) and as a robber who lies in wait for them (cf. 7:12). The depth and narrowness of the 'pit' ensures her victims will be well and truly caught (cf. Jer 38:6–13). The pit probably also represents the gateway to Sheol (cf. 2:18–19; 5:5, 27; 22:14). vv. 29–35 give a portrait of the drunkard comparable in its vividness to the portrait of the seductress in chs. 1–9. 'Sparkles' (v. 31) is literally 'gives its eye'. The 'eye' and 'smoothness' (cf. Song 7:9) of wine has the same seductive power to bewitch and captivate as the glances and smooth words of the seductress (cf. 6:24–5). In both cases the reality belies the promise of pleasure and enjoyment ('at the last', v. 32; 'in the end', 5:4). vv. 29, 33–5, describe the degenerative effects—both physical and mental—on its victims.

(24:1–22) vv. 3–4 echo the building of the house by the woman Wisdom in 9:1. While the primary meaning of the saying is that wisdom is the key to the prosperity of the family, it might also imply that it is the key to healthy and harmonious family relationships. vv. 5–6 compare wisdom and strength. See PROV 21:22; cf. also 20:18. v. 7 observes an occasion when the silence of fools is indicative of their character (cf. 17:28). At assemblies to debate the affairs of the community the fool is out of his depth, with nothing of value to contribute. So he keeps silent.

vv. 11–12 speak of divine scrutiny. The situation envisaged in v. 11 is not altogether clear (cf. McKane 1970: 400–2). The reference may be to prisoners who have been wrongfully condemned to death. Every effort should be made to secure their release. Feigning ignorance of their plight will be exposed as callous indifference under the scrutiny of the one 'who weighs the heart' and judges accordingly (cf. 16:2; 21:2). If v. 10 belongs with vv. 11–12—as presupposed by the NRSV—then neither would the claim to be powerless to intervene bear examination. However, it is more likely that this is a separate saying counselling perseverance in adversity. vv. 13–14, the eating of honey is commended for its sweetness and health-giving properties and then becomes an analogy for the pleasure and benefits of wisdom (cf. 16:24; contrast 5:3). vv. 15–16, this instruction recalls 1:8–19. Violence against the righteous is self-destructive. While the righteous may fall down any number of times under the onslaughts of the wicked, they will always recover. The wicked will not (cf. vv. 19–20). vv. 17–18 warn against gloating when misfortune befalls an enemy. This is as displeasing to God as their enmity and may provoke God to divert his anger from the enemy to the one who gloats. vv. 21–2, the final saying counsels respect for God and king. In 21b the NRSV follows the LXX. The Hebrew text reads 'do not associate with those who change', where 'to change' may have the sense of advocating change. It may therefore be a warning not to take part in conspiracies against the king. The LXX contains a further five verses mainly on the wrath of the king.

Further Sayings of the Wise (24:23–34)

This short collection evidently forms an appendix to 22:17–24:22, though in the LXX the sayings of Agur in 30:1–14 come between vv. 22 and 23.

Judges and witnesses. vv. 23–5, 28, warn against the corruption of justice through the partiality of the judges (cf. 18:5; 28:21) or the false testimony of witnesses. The expression 'without cause' (v. 28) could mean 'without necessity' (mischievously) or 'without grounds' (falsely). Either way it amounts to perjury (v. 28b). v. 29 may be an independent saying on taking revenge (cf. 20:22) or may uncover the motive for the perjury. v. 27 advises the young farmer to ensure that he is financially secure before he begins to build a house and raise a family. The advice is widely applicable. vv. 30–4 form an example story (cf. 7:6–23) reinforcing the lesson drawn from the industry of the ant in 6:10–11. They also provide a good example of how instruction may be received through the eye as well as the ear ('saw... considered... received instruction', v. 32).

The Second 'Solomonic' Collection (25:1–29:27)

According to the heading in 25:1, these chapters form a further collection of Solomonic proverbs, transmitted and edited by royal scribes (if that is what the rather vague 'copied by the men' implies) during the reign of Hezekiah. As with the first collection in 10:1–22:16, differences in style and subject-matter suggest it may have been compiled from two originally separate collections: chs. 25–7 and chs. 28–9. The first part is characterized by its many similes—often drawing comparisons with nature—and its 'earthy' tone. Antithetic parallelism is rare. The second part contains a high proportion of antithetical sayings and is predominantly moral and religious in tone after the manner of chs. 10–15. The question concerning the context of individual sayings raised in connection with 10:1–22:16 arises here also, though topical or thematic groupings are now more evident, especially in chs. 25–6.

(25:1–28) vv. 2–7 form a short series of sayings centred on the king (cf. 16:9–15). While God is appropriately surrounded in mysteries no one can fathom, the king must take steps to investigate all that goes on in his kingdom (v. 2; cf. 2 Sam 14:20). v. 3 points to the profundity of the king's mind and so to the unpredictability of his decisions—which enhance his power and authority. The next saying (vv. 4–5) reiterates the point of 16:12 through a comparison between refining silver and rooting out the wicked. Further advice is given to royal officials in vv. 6–7a (cf. 23:1–3). On state occasions, the best strategy is that they take their place with the lower ranks, for then they may receive a public acknowledgement of their worth to the king if they are asked to join the higher ranks (cf. Lk 14:7–11). v. 15 probably has in view royal counsellors. Gentle but persistent persuasion will break down even the hardest resistance to their advice.

vv. 7b–8 warn against impetuous litigation. It is not clear whether vv. 9–10 also refer to litigation or to pursuing a quarrel in public through slanderous accusations and breaches of confidence. This will earn the culprit a bad reputation as one who is disloyal and untrustworthy. The wise course is to keep a quarrel private and to settle it in private. A word 'fitly spoken'—i.e. well expressed and well timed—is a product of great artistry, beauty, and value (v. 11; cf. 15:23). The artistic design envisaged is unclear. In v. 12 a similar comparison is made with the marriage between a wise rebuke and a listening ear. An 'earring' is perhaps meant. v. 16, even healthy things (cf. 24:13) in excess can become harmful. The application of the imagery in v. 27 is obscure. The NRSV assumes a slight emendation of the Hebrew text, which makes little sense as it stands ('searching out their honour is honour'). Too much honour can also be too much of a good thing. v. 17, a neighbour's hospitality should not be abused. The Instruction of Ani likewise counsels, 'Do not go freely to your neighbour's house, but enter it only when you are invited.'

The significance of the 'coals of fire' in v. 22 is unclear. It may reflect an Egyptian ritual practice in which a brazier of burning charcoal was held on the head as a sign of shame and remorse. In any event the point of the saying is probably that by meeting hostility with kindness (v. 21) the enemy will have a change of heart and be reconciled (cf. 16:7) and not that it will heap punishment upon them. Cf. Amen-em-ope: Fill his belly with bread of yours, so that he shall be satisfied and ashamed' (cf. Rom 12:20–1). v. 25 reflects on the refreshment and revitalization that comes with the receipt of good news (cf. 15:30; Gen 45:25–8). In 13:12 the 'healing' brought about by a faithful messenger (cf. v. 13) is contrasted with trouble caused by a bad messenger.

(26:1–28) The first twelve verses (except v. 2) form a series of sayings on the 'fool'. vv. 1, 8, probably have in view the promotion of the fool to a position of public responsibility in the community. This is a gross distortion of what is right and proper (v. 1) and utterly absurd (v. 8), for fools are neither worthy of such honour nor capable of discharging their duties responsibly. vv. 4–5 point to the dilemma of how best to respond to a fool. To speak up runs the risk of descending to his level (v. 4), while to keep silent means their conceit will go unchecked (v. 5). It is a test of wisdom to know whether silence or reprimand is the lesser of two evils in the circumstances. To send a message with a fool is counter-productive (v. 6). Instead of receiving the help of their legs, it is like cutting off one's own legs and will have harmful consequences. While the text of v. 10 is difficult, it too appears to warn of the dangers of employing a fool, comparing the damage the fool will do to that of an archer firing arrows indiscriminately. Both vv. 7 and 9 make the point that the fool is incapable of the effective use of proverbs. The proverb will invariably be misapplied or mistimed, and fall 'limp' to the ground. The imagery of v. 9 is less clear. The rendering of the NRSV implies that the fool's proverb wreaks havoc and causes injury. Alternatively, the point may be that the proverb makes not the slightest impact—any more than a drunkard feels a thorn piercing his hand (cf. RSV).

The law made provision for the pronouncing of curses, particularly in cases where the guilty might escape detection (Deut 27:15–26). v. 2 adds that a malicious curse targeting an innocent victim will fly harmlessly past.

vv. 13–16 centre on lazy people, sketching with humour their attachment to their beds, the preposterous excuses they make for doing nothing, and their inability to finish what they started—while all the time deluding themselves that they are wiser than any number of intelligent people. The 'meddler' in v. 17 is probably not a well-intending peacemaker but the quarreller of v. 21. To 'meddle' is literally 'become excited'. This kind of person thrives on strife and enjoys pouring fuel on quarrels—whether those of their own making or by interfering in the quarrels of others. v. 20 observes the role of talebearing in fuelling and perpetuating a quarrel (cf. v. 22). In v. 23 'smooth lips' follows the reading of the LXX, referring to flattery (cf. 28; 29:5). The Hebrew reads 'burning lips', perhaps meaning warm protestations of friendship. Either way it is speech that lacks honesty and cloaks malice. Thus, vv. 24–6 warn against the kind of enemy (lit. one who hates) who conceals his malice behind a veneer of friendly words. 'Seven abominations' may look back to 6:16–19, but more likely it means that the enemy harbours any number of malicious thoughts and intentions. Sooner or later, however, the duplicity and treachery will be publicly exposed.

(27:1–27) v. 1 is directed against an arrogant confidence in one's ability to control the future, and so reinforces the theme of the limitations of human planning (cf. 16:9; 19:21). Amen-em-ope expresses a similar thought: 'Man knoweth not what the morrow will be, The events of the morrow are in the hands of God.' Jealousy is more overwhelming and destructive than anger (v. 4; cf. 6:34–5). The image is of floodwaters sweeping all before it (lit. a flood of anger; cf. Isa 28:2).

In vv. 5–6 a frank and sharp word of censure, however hurtful at the time, is contrasted with a misguided love which turns a blind eye to the faults of others (cf. 10:10; 28:23), and with hypocritical expressions of affection, however profuse. 'Well meant' might be better rendered 'trustworthy' (cf. NIV, 'can be trusted') as compared to the deceitful kisses of a Judas. The second line of v. 9 is difficult: literally, 'the sweetness of his friend from the counsel of the soul', which may mean that the counsel of a friend sweetens the soul. The NRSV follows the LXX, making it a reflection along the lines of 15:13. v. 10 is another difficult verse, seeming to contain three sayings. The second is at odds with 17:17. The sense may be 'don't pester them with your problems' (cf. 25:17). The NEB omits the line. The loud and untimely greeting in v. 14 could be a mark of inconsiderateness, but it is more probably of insincerity—akin to the profuse kisses of v. 6. v. 17 observes the necessity and value of social interaction with friends and adversaries alike to sharpen the mind and shape the character (lit. face).

v. 15 repeats the thought of 19:13b. With most modern versions, the translation of v. 16 in the NRSV is an attempt to wrest sense out of a difficult Hebrew text—which is probably meaningless as it stands—on the assumption that it is connected with the preceding verse. Such a wife is as uncontrollable as a gust of wind or oil grasped in the hand. As construed by the NRSV, the point of v. 19 seems to be that knowledge of one's character comes through observing the character of others. The Hebrew is enigmatic, however, and could equally mean that the heart reflects the character or that self-knowledge comes through self-examination. The image in v. 20 is of Sheol as a monster with a voracious appetite for human victims (cf. 1:12; 30:16). Human desires and ambition are just as insatiable. It may also be implied they are just as ruthless. Just as the value of silver or gold is tested in the crucible, so the worth of a person's character is tested by their reputation (v. 21; cf. v. 2). The instruction in vv. 23–7 commends the pastoral life as providing the best and most enduring kind of wealth. Whereas riches are fickle and fleeting (cf. 23:4–5), flocks are assets which do not dwindle but are renewed each spring at the lambing season, and they will provide for all the household needs. According to Van Leeuwen (1988: 137), the instruction is 'addressed to the king (and his court) as "shepherd" of his people'.

(28:1–28) v. 1 takes up the theme of the confidence of the righteous to walk securely through life with unfaltering step in contrast with the fearfulness of the wicked, who are weighed down by a guilty conscience and dread of the inevitable punishment (cf. vv. 10, 18). In v. 14 the contrast may be between those who 'fear' the Lord and the impious or wicked (cf. RSV), though a different Hebrew word for 'fear' is used. The NEB renders 'scrupulous in conduct', which may imply fear of sin and its consequences. The theme of vv. 12, 28, is the consequences for good or ill within the body politic when either the righteous or the wicked hold the reins of power (cf. 11:10–11). The verb translated 'go into hiding' in v. 12 is literally 'are sought out', which probably means 'are hunted down', providing the reason why they hide themselves (v. 28).

The Hebrew text of v. 2 is obscure, especially the second line. As translated by the NRSV it compares the political instability of the land during times of rebellion—with its succession of rulers and different factions vying for power—and its stability under a good and capable ruler. The NEB follows the LXX in making it a saying about quarrelling. In

v. 3 'ruler' rests on a slight emendation of the Hebrew for 'a poor person', which makes better sense. v. 15 makes the same point with different imagery, while v. 16 observes that rulers who abuse their power in this way will be as short-lived as they are short-sighted. Poverty with integrity is preferable to riches with perversity (v. 6; cf. 15:16; 16:8; 22:1; see also 19:1). The rich may be inflated by a sense of their own importance, but a poor person with intelligence will see through their pretension (v. 11).

The charging of interest (v. 8) on loans to fellow Israelites was condemned in the law (cf. Ex 22:25; Lev 25:36–7). 'Exorbitant interest' is literally 'interest and increase', the former indicating interest deducted from the loan and the latter interest added to the loan. The saying asserts that the wealth thereby amassed will pass to a kind person, who will share it among those from whom it was taken. vv. 20, 22, are directed against those who 'hasten to be rich'. The 'miser' is literally 'one with an evil eye' (v. 22; cf. 23:6). The phrase probably implies not only their greed and selfishness but also their lack of moral scruples in their pursuit of wealth. It is the 'faithful' (v. 20) who will be blessed with wealth, while they will be punished (cf. also v. 25). In v. 9 'law' probably refers to the divine law rather than the teaching of wisdom (cf. v. 4). God will turn a deaf ear to the prayers of those who turn a deaf ear to him (cf. 15:8, 29). The person who confesses and repents of their sins will receive divine mercy and forgiveness (v. 13). The verse is unique in Proverbs.

(29:1–27) When the wicked are in power, the people groan under an intolerable burden as injustice and violence flourish unchecked (vv. 2, 16). But righteousness will in the end prevail (cf. 11:10–11; 28:12, 28). v. 6 is a further reflection on the confidence of the righteous in contrast with the snares the wicked weave for themselves through their evil activities. In a similar vein, v. 25 contrasts the snare of 'fear of others'—which breeds anxiety and may also breed wrongdoing—with the security to be found in trusting God (cf. 3:5–8). To 'know the rights of the poor' (v. 7) means to actively promote justice for the poor. The wicked care nothing about their rights. The 'men of blood' (v. 10) recalls the robbers and murderers of 1:8–19. The 'blameless' may be their innocent victims (cf. 1:11) but more probably those who oppose them and seek to bring them to justice. The English versions go different ways in making appropriate sense of the second line (lit. and the upright seek his life). The Hebrew implies an antithesis, so that here, unusually, to 'seek his life' may mean to 'seek to preserve his life' or to 'seek his well-being'.

Justice is the key to the stability of the king's throne and of his kingdom (vv. 4, 14). The king whose main preoccupation is to build up and enhance the splendour of his kingdom through crippling taxation sows the seeds of its dissolution (cf. 1 Sam 8:11–18; 1 Kings 12). The king who listens to lies will be quickly surrounded by corrupt officials (v. 12)—and his throne will be equally undermined (cf. 16:12; 25:5). The first line of v. 26 may refer to currying royal 'favours' (lit. face) or to seeking an audience for a legal decision. In the latter case, the second line either reaffirms that God's decisions underlie those of the king (cf. 16:10; 21:10) or reflects that kings are not always just: God alone is the unfailing source of justice. 'Flatters' (v. 5) is literally 'makes smooth'. The flatterer's words are in the same debased currency of deceit and duplicity as the words of the seductress (cf. 2:16; 5:3; 26:23, 28).

To enter into litigation with a fool is not worth the trouble (v. 9). A fool is incapable of calm and reasoned debate and it is not likely that the matter will be satisfactorily resolved (cf. 26:4–5). v. 13 is a variant on 22:2. The first line of v. 18 affirms that without prophecy (lit. (prophetic) vision) social anarchy prevails, and the second line pronounces blessing on those who obey the law of God. Divine revelation through prophecy and law is essential to the harmony and well-being of society and of individuals within it. McKane (1970: 640–1) suggests the saying proposes obedience to the law as the solution to the indiscipline resulting from the cessation of the age of prophecy. v. 24 deals with the failure of a person to step forward as a witness when publicly adjured (lit. hears the curse, as in Lev 5:1) because they are an accomplice of the thief and will only implicate themselves. In this way they bring the 'curse' on their own heads.

The Sayings of Agur (30:1–33)

This collection is ascribed to an otherwise unknown sage. In the heading, the word 'oracle' translates Hebrew maššā'. While this could describe the sayings as a prophetic type 'revelation' (cf. Hab 1:1) it is more likely that it designates the tribe or place of Massa in northern Arabia (Gen 25:14) to which Agur belonged (RSV). In that case, Proverbs has preserved the sayings of a non-Israelite sage (cf. also 31:1). It is possible that Agur's sayings do not extend beyond v. 14. These verses are separate from vv. 15–33 in the LXX—vv. 1–14 following 24:22 and vv. 15–33 following 24:34. Opinion is divided on whether they end before v. 14 (at vv. 4, 6, or 9).

v. 1b in the Hebrew is very cryptic and obscure. However, the rendering of the NRSV is preferable to the RSV ('The man says to Ithiel, to Ithiel and Ucal'—presumably his sons or disciples). In vv. 2–3 Agur confesses his lack of knowledge of God and his lack of wisdom. While 'holy ones' could refer to the divine council (cf. Ps 89:5–7), it is better taken as a reference to God himself, the Holy One (cf. 9:10). Agur's words may be in part ironic, directed against the wise who professed a deep understanding of God and his ways (cf. Eccl 8:17). The rhetorical questions in v. 4, like those in Job 38–41, emphasize the inscrutability of God's ways. To ascend and descend to and from the heavens is a biblical and ancient Near-Eastern motif for the arrogant attempt to attain knowledge of eternal truth and become like the gods (cf. Perdue 1994: 117–19). The ironic challenge at the end of v. 4 is to produce such a person. God alone has the power and wisdom to rule his creation and is enveloped in mystery which human wisdom is unable to fathom. While it is not clear whether vv. 5–6 originally belonged with the preceding verses, they give reassurance that God has made himself known through his 'word'. This may refer to the canonical Scriptures. The term rendered 'proves true' is used of refining metals (Ps 12:6) and means that God's word is unalloyed or that it has stood the test. The warning not to add to or subtract from it echoes Deut 4:2; 12:32 (cf. Rev 22:18–19). In the form of a prayer (unique in Proverbs), vv. 7–9 counsel contentment with God's provision of the basic necessities of life. Wealth can lead to self-sufficiency and the denial of God, while poverty is just as likely to lead to stealing and the profanation of God's name. vv. 15–16 contain two related sayings on unsatisfied desires. The first (15a) is a comment on human greed. That might also be the point of the second saying or it may be a comment on the barren womb. Like the desire of Sheol for human victims (cf. 1:12), the earth for water, and the fire for fuel, the desire of barren women for children is never satisfied. It is not clear what the 'way' of the eagle, the snake, and the ship on the high seas have in common with one another, and even less clear what the 'way' of a man with a woman has in common with them (vv. 18–19). That human sexuality is mysterious and marvelous may dilute the point. vv. 21–3 describe as earth-shattering events four inversions of the social order. The point could be that people who experience a dramatic change in fortune become unbearable or that social upheaval threatens cosmic order. The general theme of vv. 24–8 is 'small but wise'. Ants are commended for foresight (cf. 6:6–8); badgers for ingenuity; locusts for discipline; and the lizard for adeptness at getting into places. Wisdom and not strength is the key to success (cf. 16:32). vv. 29–31 evidently compare the majestic bearing of a king in procession with the proud gait of the lion, the strut of the rooster and the he-goat. The second animal is literally 'one girt of loins', i.e. 'the strutter', usually taken with the LXX as referring to the cock, though other animals such as the warhorse have been proposed. The Hebrew text of the last line (v. 31b) is obscure.

The Words of Lemuel (31:1–9)

In this passage the queen-mother instructs her son on his duty to administer justice. King Lemuel is otherwise unknown. As in 30:1, 'oracle' translates Hebrew maššā and may designate a tribe or region in northern Arabia. This gains some added support by the presence of Aramaic words in the text (e.g. bar, 'son', for Heb. ben). Although the role of the queen-mother is unusual, the vocational intent of the passage brings it particularly close to Egyptian instruction, especially those concerned with the training of future monarchs (e.g. the Instruction of Merikare).

Appealing to his filial respect as a son for his mother and his birth as an answer to prayer (v. 2; cf. 1 Sam 1:11), the queen-mother warns her son against sexual promiscuity and drunkenness (vv. 3–5). One will sap the strength and the other will anaesthetize the mind, rendering the king physically and morally incapable of administering justice. While the wretched seek oblivion in alcohol (vv. 6–7), a king cannot afford to become oblivious to their wretchedness. Rather he must speak on behalf of the 'dumb', i.e. those unable to make their own voice heard in defence of their legal rights: the poor and needy and the destitute (vv. 8–9).

The Good Wife (31:10–31)

These verses are in the form of an acrostic poem, in which each one begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. As characterized in the poem, the good wife is an industrious housewife; a shrewd businesswoman; an enterprising trader; a generous benefactor (v. 20); and a wise teacher (v. 26). Her husband has complete confidence in her, since he knows that his wealth and his reputation are safe in her hands (vv. 11–12; cf. 23). The key to her industry, acumen, kindness, and wisdom is that she 'fears the Lord' (v. 30). Like Wisdom herself, such a wife is a priceless treasure who is worthy of praise (vv. 10, 28–31; cf. 3:13–18).

In view of the emphasis given to the dangers of loose women in chs. 1–9, it would be fitting for the book to end by directing the attention of prospective bridegrooms to the ideal wife. Certainly, to have such a wife would be a gift from God (18:22)! It is probable, however, that the passage does not merely sum up the ideal wife but also the ideals of wisdom. The good wife may be a final personification of Wisdom, completing the portrait of the woman Wisdom as house-builder in 9:1–6: 'In chapter 31 Wisdom is a faithful wife and skilled mistress of her household, finally settled down with her own' (McCreesh 1985: 46).

20. Ecclesiastes

STUART WEEKS

INTRODUCTION

A. Author and Date. Most of this book takes the form of a monologue, spoken by a character called '(the) Qoheleth' ('the Teacher'): its author has adopted the common ancient habit of setting philosophical discussion within speeches, and he probably comments on his own character's words in 12:9–10. We know little about this author, but the book's language does include a number of Aramaic terms and loanwords from Persian, and has certain characteristics which are more common in post-biblical Hebrew than in the Bible. Despite some attempts to explain these as dialectal, it is widely agreed that they point to a late date of composition. Since the work seems to have been known by Ben Sira, a date between about the fifth and second centuries BCE seems probable, and it is most likely to have been composed in the latter part of this period. The lack of an ancient Septuagint version may be telling in this respect: the Greek 'Ecclesiastes' is probably the work of Aquila or his followers. The Greek title reflects an early attempt to translate 'Qoheleth': the original meaning of this name or title is uncertain, although it may be connected with ideas of 'summoning' or 'gathering'.

B. Content. Qoheleth's ideas are notoriously confusing and contradictory, but some continuity is visible across the book. Qoheleth views the world as changeless, with humans unable to comprehend its workings or to make any lasting impact upon it; within their society, moreover, injustice is rampant and the future unpredictable. All this is attributed to God's deliberate design, but leads Qoheleth to ask just what humans should do to get the best from life in such a world. His answer, after reflection on his own experiences, is that humans should simply enjoy what they have: they are in no position to seek more, and greater comprehension is a source only of unhappiness.

Set against all this, though, is an attempt to justify God, and to affirm the reality of divine judgement. This sits uncomfortably beside the book's other assertions, leading many scholars to suspect either that the book has undergone secondary editing by a more orthodox writer, or that the views of others are being quoted. Either is possible, but it is no less likely that this disharmony is original, and it is explicable in two ways. First, several ancient works show a strong interest in inconsistency as a phenomenon: the demotic instruction on Papyrus Insinger, most famously, juxtaposes contradictory 'truths' to argue, like Qoheleth, that divine power is supreme and unknowable. Secondly, Qoheleth's monologue is presented as the conclusions of a wise man reflecting on his experience, but the book seems suspicious of such claims to wisdom: self-contradiction is, therefore, embedded at its deepest level, and the work's aims may include a critical, ironic look at the limitations and contradictions of wisdom represented by Qoheleth and his speech.

In his commentary upon the world and his own observations, Qoheleth resorts frequently to a single word, hebel.

Conventionally translated 'vanity', the literal sense of this term is probably 'a breath of wind', but it is more often used metaphorically, to suggest transience, uselessness, or deceptiveness. No single implication seems to suit all its occurrences in this book, where it is closely associated with another expression: rē'ūt rūah (1:14, 2:11, 17, 26; 4:4, 6; 6:9; cf. the similar rā'yôn rūah in 1:17; 4:16). A comparable phrase in Hos 12:1 suggests that this latter means 'pursuing the wind', and it is probably used here to evoke the sense of frustration inherent in attempts to achieve the impossible (cf. Fox 1989).

COMMENTARY

'All is Vanity' (1:1–11)

(1:1) Qoheleth is described as a Davidic king, and this is picked up in 1:12, which claims that he ruled Israel from Jerusalem: if the term 'Israel' here is meant to include the northern kingdom, then, since the only descendants of David to rule it were Solomon and the far-from-wise Rehoboam, a claim to Solomonic authorship is apparently intended, though never stated outright. However, sometimes Judah is referred to as 'Israel'.

(1:2) The motto, 'vanity of vanities', appears again in 12:8, at the end of the teaching, while the key term 'vanity' (hebel) recurs frequently as a comment on situations described in the book.

(1:3–11) The rhetorical question in v. 3 picks up the claim that all is hebel, and the poem that follows portrays a world which is impervious to human effort. While human generations each pass into oblivion, nature continues regardless, and itself reaches no fruition or consummation. Without change, there is no novelty, and without effect, no satisfaction. Qoheleth describes a world without progress or culmination, where everything has been done before, but, unremembered, will be done again. This is not an assertion that the world follows cycles or patterns: although the sun, rather comically, hurries panting back to its starting place, the other phenomena are not cyclical, merely ceaseless. v. 8 suggests the inadequacy of human speech and senses for any comprehension of this endlessness: 'All words are exhausted: a person will never manage to speak [of it], an eye will never see enough, and an ear will never be filled as it listens' (my tr.). Qoheleth rejects not only any actual human progress in innovation and understanding, but the very possibility of such progress.

Memoir (1:12–2:26)

This fictional memoir describes Qoheleth's own, futile quest for understanding, which leads him to conclude that humans can do no more than enjoy what they have been given. The generalities of the introductory section now give way to a style more characteristic of the book as a whole, in which Qoheleth takes claims of personal experience as the context or basis for his assertions. He begins by associating himself with the famously wise and wealthy Solomon, which allows him to claim that he had the power and resources necessary for the subsequent experiments. We hear no more of this royal status after the device has served its purpose, but the equally implausible claim in 1:14, that Qoheleth has seen 'all the deeds that are done under the sun', is echoed several times in the book.

(1:12–18) The section begins with a pair of units, in each of which Qoheleth presents his credentials for undertaking a specific enquiry, then summarizes the result of that enquiry before finishing with a short aphorism. In the first he sets out to observe all that is done in the world, using his wisdom, and concludes that all is hebel and rē'ūt rūah. The unit finishes with an aphorism which again denies any human ability to affect the world. In the Egyptian Instruction of Ani, which includes a debate about the efficacy of education, the principal character asserts that a crooked stick can be straightened: any direct reference to that text here is unlikely, but it does emphasize Qoheleth's distance from more optimistic ideas of human effectiveness. The second line of the aphorism seems so patently obvious that some scholars have suggested emendation, but it does sum up Qoheleth's enquiry: he searches out all deeds, but finds nothing to measure. The unit vv. 16–18 follows the same pattern as vv. 12–15, but Qoheleth's enquiry is now into wisdom itself, which was the tool he used in the first enquiry, and into its opposites. His conclusion is again pessimistic: wisdom and knowledge merely enhance vexation and sorrow.

(2:1–11) After this presentation of results, the section moves on to a more detailed memoir. Disappointed by wisdom, Qoheleth decides to sample pleasure, and tells himself to have a good time. Ever the intellectual, though, he finds laughter irrational and pleasure useless, and puzzles over how to become drunk while staying wise, and over how to become foolish. He does succeed, though, in building an establishment geared to beauty and sensual pleasure, becoming great and retaining his wisdom while indulging himself unstintingly. This brings him to a crucial observation: his efforts are rewarded by the irrational pleasure that he gains from them, even though, on consideration, they seem still to be hebel, and a chasing after wind.

(2:12–21) As in 1:17, Qoheleth now turns to wisdom, madness, and folly. His initial conclusion seems conventional, and is in line with ideas found elsewhere (e.g. Prov 4:18–19). It immediately becomes clear, though, that the saying in v. 14 has a double edge: the ability of the wise to see where they are going does not affect their route; they are going the same way as the fools, and are merely more aware of it. Both the wise and the foolish, Qoheleth realizes, are doomed to oblivion, and this realization causes him to hate life, exemplifying the conclusion in v. 18. With the wisdom to look forward, Qoheleth also realizes that all he has worked for will be left in the hands of another, who may be wise or foolish, and who will have done no work for it. This leads him, retrospectively, to hate his own efforts.

(2:22–6) As the section nears its conclusion, Qoheleth echoes the question originally asked in 1:3, adding emphasis by the observation that humans suffer for their work. Now he offers an answer of sorts: all that he has found rewarding is pleasure in work, and he proposes that mortals can do no better than to eat, drink, and enjoy what they do. At this point, though, he attempts to explore a theological justification for his carpe diem conclusion: the ability to enjoy life, or perhaps the ability to know that one should enjoy life, is a divine dispensation granted only to those who please God; those who do not are condemned to toil on their behalf. That implies, though, a social analysis with which Qoheleth later shows himself to be uncomfortable: those who are suffering and working on behalf of others are the sinners, and those who enjoy themselves, while others work for them, are the righteous.

'Everything Suitable for its Time' (3:1–15)

After his foray into kingship, Qoheleth now returns to the ideas of 1:3–11, but retains the interest in divine action found at the end of the last section. A poem in vv. 2–8 illustrates the claim of v. 1, that every action or event will come to pass, and v. 11 further explains that God has made each 'suitable for its time'. Although the poem is often taken as a celebration of this fact, with each and every action given its own appropriate hour, the context suggests that, for Qoheleth, it is more a source of resignation. In vv. 14–15, the point originally made in 1:9–10 is picked up: what has happened will happen again, and there can be no innovation. Now, though, this situation is explicitly attributed to divine action, with God creating and maintaining a sealed system, in which nothing has a beginning or an end, but everything has its day. It is against this background that Qoheleth repeats his now familiar question: 'what gain have the workers from their toil?' God has given humans business to do, and a sense of past and future, but they lack any ability to comprehend the divine activity. Again, then, the best that they can do is to enjoy life, and the ability to do so is made available to all by God. Upon the world itself, though, they can make no impact: its unchangeability is a deliberate device that ensures that humans will stand in awe of God (1:14).

Wickedness and Oppression (3:16–4:3)

Such a perception of the world raises an obvious problem: despite the divine jurisdiction, wickedness seems to triumph over justice and righteousness. Qoheleth tackles the problem of theodicy with reference to the ideas that he has put forward already, and declares his belief in some ultimate judgement on the basis that, since there is a divinely appointed time for everything, there must be a time for divine judgement. The Hebrew of 3:18 is very obscure, and the text may be corrupt; the gist of 3:18–21 seems to be, though, that God permits humans no understanding of their eventual fate that would allow them to distinguish themselves from animals. Their inability to comprehend, or to foresee the future, leads, again, to the conclusion that the best they can do is to enjoy their work. Qoheleth seems to be claiming, then, that there are grounds for believing in some sort of judgement after death, but that this is deliberately hidden by God, who prevents human comprehension of the world. The argument is followed, in 4:1–3, by a more emotional reaction to the seemingly perverted nature of the world, as Qoheleth declares it better to be dead or unborn than to have to experience the horror of oppression. He emphasizes the lack of any comfort for the oppressed, and the passage as a whole seems to react against the preceding argument: the obscurity of the divine purpose is all very well, but offers little solace to the oppressed, who are in no position to enjoy themselves.

'All their Toil' (4:4–12)

The loneliness of the oppressed provides a transition to Qoheleth's next, rather different topic. He begins with the observation that competition is the sole motive for work and skill, a fact which is hebel and a chasing after wind. He then presents, in v. 5, an aphorism suggesting that laziness is the vice and the downfall of fools, leading them to eat themselves instead of their produce; folding of the hands is elsewhere associated with sloth (cf. Prov 6:10; 24:33), and the saying may be a conventional one. A second aphorism, in v. 6, is set against this, suggesting that rest is better than toil, and establishes the first of the two themes in this section: a condemnation of pointless greed. The second theme, that co-operation is better than competition, sits alongside this in vv. 7–8, and is further elaborated in vv. 9–12. The discussion finishes with a further saying, about the strength of a plaited cord, which resembles an ancient proverb found in the Epic of Gilgamesh.

Wise Youth, Foolish King (4:13–16)

The meaning and relevance of this next section are quite obscure, and there have been many attempts to identify a particular historical situation to which it might refer. The principal problems are a certain ambiguity in the syntax, and the possibility that the 'second' youth of v. 15 is simply the same youth as in v. 13. It seems probable that Qoheleth is again setting one idea off against another: a wise youth is better than a foolish king, whatever his background, but that youth will be followed by another and ultimately forgotten. Gordis (1968) interprets the term that NRSV paraphrases as 'whom he led' in a temporal sense, so that v. 16 places the fragment of succession illustrated here in a much broader context: these characters were preceded by a whole host of others, and will be forgotten by those who follow. In any case, Qoheleth seems to be drawing out an implication of 1:11, that what seems true and important at a particular moment will only be swallowed up in the forgetfulness and repetition of time.

Fear of God (5:1–9)

(5:1–7) Moving to a quite different theme again, Qoheleth advocates caution in dealings with God, emphasizing the risks rather than the benefits of such dealings: 'fear of God' often has a more general implication of piety and fairness in the OT, but in v. 7 its sense is literal. The particular risks here involve speech: hasty words and unfulfilled vows may both incur divine displeasure, and there is specific reference to the Torah (v. 4 is a paraphrase of Deut 23:21–3, and 'mistake' in v. 6 is a technical term for an unwitting sin). Such speech may lead to the divine destruction of one's work. In vv. 3, 7, a plethora of words is associated with dreaming. The former is a straightforward comparison, probably suggesting that a fool's voice is as much a product of too much speech as dreams are of too many cares. The syntax and meaning of the latter, though, are very obscure. v. 6 mentions a 'messenger', and the reference is probably to an angel. The particularly literal Septuagint rendering, though, has 'God', and this is likely to be the original reading (cf. Fox 1989).

(5:8–9) This passage is notoriously difficult, and no very satisfactory interpretation has yet been proposed. The first verse probably explains oppression either in terms of the protection offered to each level of officials by their superiors, or else as a result of the demands made by such a vast bureaucracy. Just conceivably, though, it is suggesting that one should not be too concerned by such oppression, as God is in a higher position than the officials (Ogden 1987). The sense and relevance of the second verse are all but impenetrable; it might possibly be an ironic comment on the hierarchical system, which gives every field a ruler. Some scholars take these comments to have been inspired by experience of a particular historical bureaucracy, perhaps that of Ptolemaic Egypt.

The Problems and Inadequacies of Wealth (5:10–6:12)

(5:10–20) vv. 10–12 make three concise points about financial greed: those who love money never have enough; financial commitments grow in proportion to resources; too much wealth, without compensating work, makes for indigestion. vv. 13–17 point out the potential ephemerality of wealth: those who have refused to spend it may yet lose it, making all they have been and done pointless. In vv. 18–20 Qoheleth reiterates his earlier conclusion about the importance of enjoyment. God gives not only wealth, but the capacity for its enjoyment, which enables humans to focus on pleasure.

(6:1–9) vv. 1–6 elaborate on the theme, highlighting the case of those to whom God gives wealth and its trappings, without the capacity for enjoyment; they may live long and have much, but it is someone else who will ultimately enjoy their riches. They themselves are worse off than the stillborn child, which at least finds rest. vv. 7–9 close the discussion, but the place and meaning of v. 8 are unclear. The verse may be simply parenthetical (cf. Fox 1989), but it is possible to take it as a continuation of the point in v. 7, if nepeš there means something more than physical appetite. Qoheleth would then be arguing that humans are left unsatisfied because there are important questions to be answered: what is the point of wisdom, and what reason is there for the poor to find a role in life? It seems more likely that v. 9 condemns the desire to go beyond what one already sees, than that it is a further affirmation of death over life (cf. Whybray 1989), and in the section as a whole, then, Qoheleth acknowledges the human desire to answer questions that go beyond the obvious, but sees it as hebel.

(6:10–12) This point is explained in a summary passage that picks up earlier themes and provides a transition to the next main section. Since everything has been defined, humans are known to be inherently incapable of pleading or contesting a cause with whoever is stronger than they. Words, therefore, are futile: no one can tell mortals what they should do in their brief lives, or what will follow them.

Collection of Aphorisms (7:1–14)

The style of this section imitates that of the ‘sentence literature’ collections (e.g. Prov 10:1–22:16), and the sayings are linked, as normally in such collections, by catchwords and thematic links with their predecessors. The overall theme is broadly temporal: wisdom is associated with the need to look forward rather than focusing upon the good or bad times along the way. v. 14 sets this point in context: God has made bad times as well as good, to prevent humans from knowing what will follow them.

vv. 1–4 begin with a stylish play on words, but then present death and mourning as better than life and celebration. vv. 5–7 pick up the wise/foolish contrast and the rejection of celebration, with a comment on the transience of fools’ laughter (again involving a play on words), but this is itself rejected as hebel, with a comment on the potential impermanence of wisdom. vv. 8–10 deal with the need to take a long-term view of life when reacting to adversity: it is not wise to react quickly or to question the passing of prosperity. vv. 11–12 commend wisdom as a source of protection, presumably taking it in the sense outlined above. The ideas are reminiscent of Prov 8, where wisdom, better than gold, promises life. Given Qoheleth’s earlier comments on the insecurity of wealth, this is a two-edged commendation. v. 13 is similar to 1:15, and again emphasizes the impossibility of human influence on the world. Its expression, though, is more daring, with ‘crookedness’ directly identified as the work of God. v. 14 gives a general conclusion, but its affirmation of joy in times of prosperity seems to contradict vv. 1–4. Qoheleth advocates an approach that incorporates wisdom’s long-term view when contemplating adversity, but rejects it for those times in which one can rejoice. The view of divine action picks up his earlier conclusions.

Neither Too Wise nor Too Foolish (7:15–22)

(7:15–20) This advice, to adopt some parts of wisdom but not others, is now generalized and made explicit. The best course is to be neither too wise and righteous, nor too foolish and wicked, but to be a bit of both; whoever fears God will succeed in both (or escape the consequences of doing neither: the Heb. is ambiguous, but the basic meaning clear). These remarkable assertions do need to be put in context: they arise not only from the observations of the previous section, but from the experiences asserted in v. 15, and so there is, perhaps, a wry or bitter edge to them.

(7:19–22) These three sayings are puzzling. The second clearly relates to the theme of 7:15–18, and the third may be an attempt to illustrate its point. Fox (1989) and others reposition the first after 7:12, which is drastic, but reflects the difficulty of finding a context for it here. The intention, however, is possibly another ironic comment on wisdom, exaggerating the idea in such sayings as Prov 24:5–6: to have ten rulers is to have nine too many, just as wisdom itself goes too far.

The Search for Integrity (7:23–8:1)

The key problem here is to reconcile what Qoheleth claims to have found with his claims to be seeking wisdom, a knowledge of folly and wickedness, and, above all, a hešbôn—an accounting or reckoning. In this quest for the abstract, all he finds, though, are people: the dangerous woman of 7:26, the one man in a thousand of 7:28, and the human behaviour described in 7:29. As it stands, furthermore, 7:28 is absurd: the traditional interpretation, that Qoheleth found no ‘good’ or ‘wise’ women, has no basis in the text, but, equally, he can hardly be claiming that he encountered no women at all. It may be helpful to think in terms of the influential personifications of wisdom and folly as women in Prov 1–9, not least because the woman in 7:26 here is strongly reminiscent of wisdom’s dangerous counterpart in that work. His discovery of this woman therefore satisfies the second part of Qoheleth’s stated quest, the recognition of folly, leaving him to find wisdom and the hešbôn (the sum); in 7:29 he recognizes the human capacity to create heššēbônôt (schemes), which is probably a play on hešbôn (reckoning). Only wisdom is left, then, and 7:28 may be an acknowledgement of Qoheleth’s failure to find her. The section as a whole, then, suggests that it is not so easy to find either wisdom or any definitive explanation of the world.

8:1a may be a gloss, if it is not the author’s or Qoheleth’s own ironic commentary. The term pēšer refers, in late Hebrew and Aramaic, to the interpretation of texts and dreams, and the line effectively doubts that anyone is wise enough to interpret what has been said; the secondary Hos 14:9 is a similar, though more positive comment. 8:1b has no obvious relevance to what precedes, or, despite Fox (1989), to what follows. Elsewhere, the shining of a face expresses contentment or favour, not intelligence, and is used of God (e.g. Num 6:26), while the LXX legitimately understands the second clause to mean ‘and the man shameless in his face will be hated’. If the saying originally followed straight after 7:29, we might read: ‘A human’s wisdom makes him (God) favourable, but the impudent will be hated.’

Human and Divine Authority (8:2–9)

Qoheleth uses conclusions drawn from the observation of human authority as the basis for an understanding of divine authority. There are several difficulties in the first two verses, and the sentence division is unclear. The sense may be that one should watch out for royal anger, and flee as soon as it happens, or, more probably, that one should avoid both hurrying to leave the king and joining conspiracies against him (cf. Whybray 1989). The key point is in v. 5: it can do no harm to obey a command, while the wise mind will be aware that a reckoning is coming (mišpāṭ means ‘justice’ or ‘judgement’ rather than ‘way’ here); the thought is similar to that of 3:17. Qoheleth once again stresses, though, the impossibility for humans of knowing outcomes: there is no one to tell them. Equally, no human has control over the wind (or ‘spirit’) or over his or her death. There is no release from the situation in which people find themselves: v. 8 probably means that battle offers no more possibility of deliverance than does wickedness. Qoheleth, then, restates his views on human ignorance and impotence, but commends obedience to a secular ruler as the safest course.

Fear of God is the Wisest Course (8:10–17)

This idea is now applied in the religious context, in a passage which echoes the thoughts of 3:16–17. The lack of any immediate punishment of the wicked, along with their apparent prosperity, leads others to follow their example. But Qoheleth affirms again that the appearance is deceptive: it is still safer to 'stand in fear before God'. He goes on further to note, though, that the righteous are sometimes treated as though they were wicked and vice versa, a hebel which drives him again to commend enjoyment. He finishes by once more claiming that human comprehension of the world is deliberately prevented by God, and he now explicitly rejects the claims of the wise to know such matters.

(8:10) is difficult. Most commentators emend qēburīm, 'buried', to qērēbīm, 'draw near', and see a reference to worship; Fox (1989) retains the idea of burial, and envisages burial processions from the temple or synagogue. 'Praised' reflects an alternative reading in some MSS and versions: MT has 'forgotten', suggesting that the second part compares the more forgetful attitude towards those who have done good.

(8:13) uses ambiguous imagery: 'like a shadow' refers either to the transience of the wicked, or to the stretching out of their lives.

(8:16) does not make clear whether the sleepless eyes are a part of the general human business, or a parenthetical exclamation, referring to Qoheleth's endless observation.

The Common Destiny (9:1–10)

The theme continues. The righteous and wise are under God's control, but even they cannot know his attitude towards them; all that is obvious is that the same end seems to come to all, whatever their behaviour or religious conscientiousness. This again drives humans to evil and to madness. In 3:16–4:3 such ideas led to the conclusion that it was better to be dead or unborn, but Qoheleth's thought has moved on: the living still have some knowledge—if only the knowledge that they will die. The dead can take nothing more from the world, and what they gave is now gone. The section ends with Qoheleth's fullest expression of his exhortation to enjoy life to the full, while it is still possible to do so.

(9:1–2) is difficult in MT, and the NRSV translation reflects a common emendation. Some scholars (e.g. Gordis 1968; Crenshaw 1988) retain MT and understand 'everything is before them, everything the same for everybody'. The reference is probably to what they can observe. In v. 2, 'and the evil' is lacking in the Hebrew, but its presence in the LXX suggests that it is original.

(9:4) probably refers not to 'hope' as such, but to the confident knowledge outlined in the next verse. Dogs are not highly regarded in most ancient literature, and it is interesting to note the use of 'dead dog' in expressions of self-abasement or insult (e.g. 2 Sam 9:8; 16:9).

(9:7–9) resembles a number of passages in ancient texts, but has particularly close links with the imagery of a passage in the Epic of Gilgamesh, where the hero is advised to abandon his quest for immortality. A direct dependence on this text is possible, but indirect knowledge of it, through other sources, is at least as likely. Such behaviour is here justified as something pre-ordained by God.

(9:10) refers to Sheol, the underworld, to which all humans were believed to descend after death. Biblical descriptions envisage it as a place of weakness (e.g. Isa 14:9–11), and as a leveller of the dead (Ezek 32:17–31). The shades who dwell there are impotent, miserable creatures.

Unpredictability and Injustice (9:11–16)

(9:11–12) After stressing death's lack of discrimination, Qoheleth turns briefly to its unpredictability. Those who should win or gain things have no control over them, but are at the mercy of events. Humans can no more foresee disaster than can animals foresee the traps in which they are caught. There is no suggestion that this is a matter of random misfortune, though: 'time and chance' is a hendiadys, meaning something like 'the turn of events', and the point is not that humans are lucky or unlucky, but that they cannot know what will happen.

(9:13–16) Qoheleth now returns to the theme of wisdom, and this will remain his principal topic until 11:6. He begins with a short anecdote, the point of which is unclear: many commentators think it tells the story of a wise man who could have saved a town had he been heeded, but the Hebrew reads more naturally as a claim that he really did save the town. The various elements are best explained on the assumption that he saved it, but that his contribution went unrecognized. The role of this anecdote is also difficult to pin down. Described as a 'great example' of wisdom, it lacks both the detail that would make it convincing evidence, and the symbolic aspect that would encourage us to view it as a parable. It seems most likely, then, that Qoheleth is summarizing a story familiar to his readers. He picks up the story's intended message, that wisdom is superior to might, but then puzzles over the failure to respect the poor man's wisdom.

Sayings and Counter-Sayings (9:17–11:6)

The issue raised in Qoheleth's mind by the story leads on to the book's most curious section. In 7:1–13, Qoheleth employed the sentence-literature style to make some key points of his own. Now he uses it as, effectively, a witness against itself. How far he is citing sayings that already existed is unclear: he may simply be inventing new sayings with the right style and tone. In any case, the basic technique is to set sayings together in such a way that they are undermined or reduced to absurdity. So 9:17–10:1 follows the story by initially proclaiming wisdom's superiority, but ends with the observation that it is outweighed by even a little folly. In 10:3, the metaphorical imagery of the saying in 10:2 is taken literally, to conjure up the comic image of fools walking differently from everyone else. The career-orientated advice in 10:4 is set against the observation in the next verse of a society in which rank has no basis in reason. The dangers and difficulties in 10:8–10b can patently not be overcome by wisdom, as 10:10c asserts, even if there were any chance to apply it in time (10:11). The claim in 10:12, that fools will be consumed by their speech, is enlarged upon in 10:13, but abruptly deflated in 10:14 by the observation that, nevertheless, they talk on and on; Qoheleth draws out the implication that the future is simply unpredictable, before recalling the comic image of the fools on the road. In 10:16–20, condemnations of revelry, drunkenness, and sloth are met by the claim that the first two are good things, while the third is no problem if one has money. The very notion of criticizing the rich and powerful in this way is itself condemned by the flight of fancy in 10:20, which would seem to have its tongue firmly in its cheek. 11:1–2 again stresses Qoheleth's concern with the impossibility of knowing the future. Finally, 11:3–6 sums up his point: the phenomena in 11:3 are not only absurdly obvious, but inevitable and uncontrollable; instead of wasting time watching for such things, which are beyond one's comprehension, it is better to get on with one's work, and to cover one's bases. Inherent in this is a more general criticism of any endeavour to comprehend the world through wisdom: it is not only foredoomed, but a waste of valuable time.

(9:18) contrasts wisdom with the hōtē, 'bungler' in NRSV, but more literally 'sinner'. Given the usage of this term elsewhere in the book, it is unlikely to be devoid of moral or religious connotations here.

(10:1–2) v. 1 presents several problems. 'Flies of death' is a curious way to say 'dead flies': it might mean 'dying flies', but it is best to follow an old suggestion, and redivide the text to read 'a fly dies' (cf. Fox 1989). NRSV leaves untranslated a reference to the flies making the ointment 'bubble', or 'ferment'; this might be a gloss, or a corruption of some term meaning 'preparation' or 'container' (cf. LXX). For 'wisdom and honour' (lit. weight) we should read 'a great weight of wisdom'. v. 2 assumes the common metaphor of a 'way' through life, which the next verse takes literally; right and left have moral connotations in later Jewish literature.

(10:4–7) v. 4 probably commends 'soothing' rather than 'calmness'. vv. 5–7 are strongly reminiscent of a theme popular in some much earlier Egyptian literature: the topsy-turvy society brought about by a failure of leadership. The error in v. 5 is probably ascribed to the ruler, not just compared with a ruler's error.

(10:10) is notorious for its obscurity. The form shows that it is paired with v. 11, while the theme links it to the preceding sayings: 'iron' is a cutting instrument or axe (cf. 2 Kings 6:5). The sense 'edge' for pānīm is improbable: we should probably emend lō' pānīm to lēpānīm, point qlq as passive, and read: 'If the axe is blunt but is sharpened beforehand, then it increases in strength.' The syntax of the second part is difficult, but most commentators agree that it refers to wisdom being advantageous. The saying refers, then, to the benefits of wisdom in forearming one: a claim undermined by the next verse's observation that that is not always possible.

(11:1) is similar to a saying in the late Egyptian Instruction of Onchsheshonqy (19.10), where a good deed is to be thrown in the water and recovered when dry: it may have been a familiar metaphor. As in the next verse, the issue is cautious preparation for the uncertain times ahead.

Youth and Age (11:7–12:8)

The end of Qoheleth's monologue offers a summary of his advice: life is good and to be enjoyed, especially by the young who can enjoy it best. Against that enjoyment, though, must be set the recollection that darkness is to follow, and that deeds will be judged: to remember one's creator is also to remember one's judge. Although these two ideas seem very different, there is no real contradiction here. Qoheleth has already rejected any idea that humans can know the criteria against which they will be judged, and so his advice to bear in mind the coming judgement is not an exhortation to behave in a particular way. Rather, it is both a simple warning, on which one cannot act to any effect, and a spur to proper enjoyment of what one has now. In 12:1, this requirement to enjoy oneself is again picked up, but now with an emphasis upon one's inability to do so in old age.

(12:2–5) has been taken by most ancient and modern commentators to contain a series of symbolic, metaphorical descriptions of the physical degeneration which accompanies old age. This interpretation is not without its problems, and there is some disagreement about details, but it remains more persuasive than alternative readings (e.g. Fox 1989). It is bolstered, furthermore, by the existence of a Sumerian poem that applies the same technique to the same theme, albeit in a more obvious way: this supplies an analogy and suggests, perhaps, that the poem belongs to a particular genre. In any case, the symbolic interpretation should not be rejected because the symbolism is sometimes obscure: the passage has an enigmatic character, which may be as deliberate as in a riddle. Taking this approach, v. 2 refers to growing blindness, and v. 3 to trembling limbs, a bent back, the loss of teeth, and poor sight. v. 4 presents greater problems: we should translate 'Doors are shut on the street when the sound of the mill grows low, but it rises to the sound of a bird while all the song-notes are brought down'; the references may then be to the ears and voice: hearing fades as the voice grows quiet, and the latter rises to the pitch of bird-song, though that can no longer be heard. v. 5 begins with the frailty of the old, for whom falling and going out become more dangerous. The second half is more obscure: the almond tree blossoms, the grasshopper 'makes itself heavy', and the caper (which NRSV misleadingly translates as 'desire') either fails or bears fruit (depending on the derivation of the verb). These may be references to nature's ability to renew itself, in contrast to the inevitability of human death (cf. Job 14:7–10), but the locust would be an odd component for such an image, while the caper is not known for its fruit (the 'capers' used in cookery are pickled buds from the bush). If they continue the symbolism of old age, then the almond tree may be the whitening of the hair, and the grasshopper the impotent penis (as suggested in early rabbinic exegesis); the symbolism of the caper is obscure, although it, too, has white flowers. v. 5b returns to Qoheleth's initial point, that death is coming, at the end of old age.

(12:6–7) vv. 6–7 pick up the 'remember... before...' structure of 12:1–2, and this marks them as a separate subsection. The imagery in v. 6 is usually taken to refer to death, but conceivably we have moved back to old age here, and the reference is again to parts of the body, perhaps the genitals and bladder. In any case, v. 7 certainly concerns death, and seems to have in mind the ideas of Gen 2:7 and 3:19. The breath here is not a 'spirit', but the animating breath lent to humans for the duration of their lifetime. v. 8, the monologue closes with an echo of the motto which began it, in 1:2.

Epilogue (12:9–14)

The book finishes with an epilogue attached to Qoheleth's speech, which is probably the work of the author rather than a secondary addition. This falls into three parts: a brief description of Qoheleth's work (vv. 9–10), a comment on study

(vv. 11–12), and a closing admonition (vv. 13–14). In the first, the emphasis is on Qoheleth's literary activity, and he is portrayed as a collector and arranger of sayings. The second is more obscure, but it seems to compare such sayings to goads—which leads to the mischievous suggestion that too much study wears out one's flesh. The final admonition seems to draw on some of Qoheleth's conclusions—that one should fear God, and that there will be a judgement (cf. esp. 11:9). The advice to obey God's commandments, however, lends the saying an orthodox tone which is quite absent in the monologue.

(12:11–13) v. 11 uses a double comparison: the sayings are like ox-goads, and the individual parts of a collection like the nails stuck in a stick by a shepherd. The shepherd is not God, nor is there any admonition to heed only one writer—'one' here is simply an indefinite article. v. 12 is an additional comment: we should translate 'furthermore', rather than 'beyond these'. For the first and only time, the writer uses the address 'my son', which is common in the instructional literature of Proverbs. v. 13 does not describe keeping God's commandments as the 'whole duty' of everyone, but as something applicable to everyone.

21. The Song of Solomon

ATHALYA BRENNER

A. Introduction. 1. The Song of Songs, as the first two words of its superscription (1:1) imply, is lyrical poetry (Heb. sing. šir: song, poem; pl. hāššīrīm: of songs, of poems), originally intended to be performed, i.e. sung to music, on suitable occasions. The meaning of the name is variously explained further as 'the most sublime', the 'best' song (a superlative construction) or collection of songs (one song or poem constructed of a plurality of poems). On the rest of the superscription, 'of', 'by', 'for', or '[dedicated] to' Solomon, see below (B.2).

2. The second verse (1:2) conveys the subject-matter: 'Let him kiss me from the kisses of his mouth! For your love is better than wine.' ('From' is the literal meaning of the Heb. text, rather than NRSV 'with'.) The songs/poems are secular love poems about heterosexual, erotic, passionate relationships. Indeed, the songs celebrate love between unmarried, seemingly young, female and male lovers. The form is, mostly, that of monologues, dialogues, and chorus rejoinders delivered in the first person mode: the voice of the narrator(s) per se is not directly heard. The predominant speaking voice is female. There are no direct references to religious, ethical, or national values. YHWH is never mentioned (although some interpreters find a reference to him in the component -yā, added to the Heb. word for 'flame', in 8:6). The geographical settings vary, as do the implied economic and social settings. Urban, sophisticated backgrounds interchange with nature and natural and rural settings. Imagery of food, drink, flora and fauna interchanges with metaphors of fortifications and military phenomena. In short, and in spite of the mention of place-names (such as Jerusalem, Tirzah, Gilead, Lebanon, Hermon), the universal phenomenon of erotic love is communicated in a largely universal manner, hence its appeal.

B. Place in the Hebrew Canon, Date, and Text. 1. The Song is one of the Five Scrolls, a collection of short texts (also Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther) placed within the third and latest division of the HB (the kētūbīm: Writings). These texts are called 'scrolls' since, in this form, they are used for reading as part of the liturgy of various holy days. In the case of the Song it is read on Passover, either in the synagogue or as part of the family ritual, in accordance with the customs of the Jewish community concerned.

2. The placing of the Song in the Hebrew canon testifies to its lateness: the mention of Solomon in the superscription, as well as in other passages of the book (1:5; 3:7–11; 8:12), is ambiguous. It does not necessarily uphold the traditional Jewish view, probably shared by the editor who added the superscription, that King Solomon was the author of the book. The language, which is varied and sometimes contains Aramaisms, is relatively late biblical Hebrew. This points to a date of composition, or at least collection and editorship of the final text, not earlier than the Second Temple era. Therefore few modern scholars, with the notable exception of Rabin (1973–4), argue for a tenth-century (possibly Solomonic) date. On the other hand, the attribution to Solomon was probably influential enough for accepting the Song as a canonical text. Discussions in Jewish sources (m. Yad. 3:5; ʿAbot R. Nat. 1; t. Yad. 2:4; Sanh. 12:10; b. B. Bat. 14–15; Sanh. 101a) show that acceptance of the Song as a sacred text was problematic and largely conditioned by two factors: its acceptance by Rabbi Aqiba and the Hillel school; and its understanding not as secular erotic lyrics, but as an allegory of the historical love between God and his people, the Jewish nation. This allegorical understanding, which completely disregards God's absence from the Song by way of positing it as its hidden but true subject, is already fully developed in the Aramaic Targum of the Song and was subsequently taken up by all mainstream Jewish commentators (see Song Rab., and Rashi, for instance), to be further elaborated in mystical works (cf. the Zohar and Hekhalot literature). Christianity took the allegorical principle in different directions, first Christological (an allegory for the relationship between Christ and the individual believer's soul, or Christ and the church) and later Mariological (between Mary and the believer, or Mary and the church community). Works on the Song by Christian mystics such as Teresa of Avila, St John of the Cross, Bernard of Clairvaux, and Gregory of Nyasa, continue to witness its evocative power, interpreted as a celebration of mystical divine-human union rather than human erotic love.

3. At any rate, it is clear that, through divorcing the Song from its original setting and understanding it as religious poetry, a trend which has continued until modern times, both the emerging Judaism and Christianity of the second century CE had already accepted it as sacred literature. But the text's popularity is attested as earlier by its existence among the Qumran MSS. Four MSS of the Song were found in Qumran, three in Cave 4 and one in Cave 6.4. The first three (4QCant^a, 4QCant^b, 4QCant^c) contain larger or smaller fragments of Song 2:1–5:1. The fourth MS (6QCant) contains verses of ch. 1. The Qumran texts are somewhat shorter than the MT texts: Tov (1995: 89) defines them (at least the first three) as abbreviated texts, based on one similar to or identical with the MT. If Tov's position is accepted, the Song already existed as a well-formed text quite early, in the second century BCE. Given the nature of the Qumran community, the Qumran Song texts perhaps also attest to its popularity even then as a secretive religious text. (In addition to the Jewish sources mentioned, see also the indirect evidence of 1st-cent. CE 4 Ezra 4:24, 26, and the Ta'anit scroll.)

C. Style and Structure. 1. The Song is best viewed not as one single poem but a collection. To begin with, there is no unified style. Conventional poetic devices are certainly much in evidence. Parallelisms, refrains, alliteration, word- and sound-play, puns and repetitions are rife, but not in any way that could be considered typical to the Song. Metaphors and symbols derived from many areas of human experience are heavily used in a combination of conventionality and originality but, once more, it is difficult to attribute any specificity of single authorship, place, and time to this variety. In addition, while a structural unity is discernible, no narrative plot sequence—in the sense of a story, a linear trajectory leading from beginning through to end—is obtainable. In short, the Song is best viewed as an anthology of love lyrics. This is the position adopted here, although from ancient times until this century, many exegetes and scholars (Exum 1973; Goulder 1986; Landy 1983) have preferred to view the Song as a unified composition containing a single, ongoing love story.

2. Even so, some problems remain concerning the boundaries of individual songs—there are no rhymes and, in most MSS and printed editions, no indications of lines. Change of speaker, from female to male or vice versa, do not necessarily constitute a departure or a new unit. Neither do changes of settings, places, times, and so on. In short, the principles of unit boundaries and organization as well as the organization of the whole are not easy to uncover. The fact that some passages are repeated verbatim or almost so (cf. 3:1–4 with 5:6–7, or 4:1–3 with 6:5b–7) is best interpreted as a structural (editorial) device, rather than a repeated stage in a plot sequence. Nevertheless, some songs do combine, by verbal and narrative association, into a larger mini-story—such as the sequence beginning in 5:2: a woman refuses to admit her lover; he departs and she seeks him, without success (5:2–7); she asks the daughters of Jerusalem to find him (5:8), they want his description (v. 9), she complies (vv. 9–16); they agree to look for him (6:1) but, by that time, the lovers are reunited (6:2–3).

3. At the beginning of the Song, 1:2–8, it is clearly a woman's or women's voice that we predominantly hear.

Possibly, there are three songs strung together here. The first (vv. 2–4) sets out the subject: the love of a woman for a man. In the second (vv. 5–6) a woman defiantly explains that she is 'dark and [or: but] beautiful' (NRSV: 'black and beautiful') as a result of being assigned to outdoor occupations by her maternal brothers, presumably in a vain effort to preserve her sexual modesty. In the third we watch her search for her male lover (v. 7), who—and this is the first male voice we hear—teases her to try and find him (v. 8). Exactly at the collection's centre, 4:8 (HB 4:9)–5:1, a seduction scene takes place. It is metaphorical, gentle, and polite. Unmistakably, though, at its end a young man has obtained a young woman's consent to have sexual relations. Consummation is followed by a celebration, with food and drink. At the end of the collection, ch. 8, maternal brothers set out their concern for their sister's chastity, and the means they will employ to preserve it when that becomes necessary (vv. 8–9). A woman's voice responds, defiantly (v. 10 or vv. 10–12). After an unclear interlude (v. 13) the book ends when a woman's voice sings to her lover: run away, jump like a deer on the fragrant mountains (v. 14). Thus, at the end of the Song readers, and lovers, are precisely where they were at its beginning. Although a poignant personal credo of what love is about is voiced by a female to a male, and is placed in 8:6–7, it does not end the whole. At the end lovers are, once more, apart. They look, search, depart and go—especially the female lovers, who are more active than the males. And yet, a clear act of consummation has occurred in the exact quantitative centre of the book. The collection's movement, then, is not linear (as in a regular narrative plot) but circular, with its presumed climax situated at its middle rather than at its end. This, and the fact that parallels are chiastically placed on either side of the climactic 4:8 (HB 4:9)–5:1 passage, once again signify editorial rather than authorial intent. In other words, the cyclical 'plot' seems to be the result of a plan to unify the whole by means of its structure.

D. Contents and Set of Characters. 1. In attempting to divide the Song into individual songs, let us remember that boundaries between individual pieces are fluid and also blurred; and that many passages have been artfully organized, so that they run into each other and form larger sequences. The following, therefore, is a feasible division only: other divisions are conceivable. The songs will be labelled 'female' or 'male' if the speaker is clearly one or the other. 'Dialogue' is between female and male lovers unless otherwise indicated.

(1:1) Superscription.

(1:2–6) Two female songs (see above).

(1:7–8) Dialogue: female searches for male, he teases.

(1:9–17) Male praises female; dialogue; seem to be meeting in the open air.

(2:1–3) Dialogue, in the open air.

(2:4–17) Several female poems, 'reciting' embedded male voices. Main imagery is again of flora and fauna. Includes the first appeal for help to the 'daughters of Jerusalem', for the speaker is lovesick.

(3:1–5) A tightly constructed female song: she looks for her lover in the city streets, at night (or in a dream), is not helped by the city guards but manages to find him and bring him to her 'mother's house'. Second appeal to the 'daughters'.

(3:6–11) One or two poems describing King Solomon's train, and bed or palanquin, coming out of the desert surrounded by his mighty men; and his wedding, at which his mother is present but not his father. The speaker's gender is unclear.

(4:1–7) (cf. 6:3b–7); a male's wasf (see SONG E.1) describing his female lover from head to breasts. Imagery mainly of flora and fauna, also of fortifications and military weapons.

(4:8–5:1) A dialogue, the 'seduction and consummation' scene (see SONG C.3). Male seduces female, with extravagant images of food and aromatic herbs and flowers; she consents; the male closure (5:1) and the call to eat and drink imply consummation.

(5:2–9) (cf. 3:1–5); female refuses to welcome male into her room at night (in reality or a dream); when she changes her mind he disappears. She looks for him in the city and the guards beat her up. She appeals to the daughters of Jerusalem to help her lovesick condition.

(5:9–6:2) The daughters want to know what the male lover looks like. A female lover describes him in a wasf, from head to toe. The imagery is of fauna and flora for the head; minerals, metals and precious stones for the rest of his body. The daughters agree to look for him but, meanwhile, he is found and seems to be enjoying his 'garden' again (see SONG E.3). If 6:3 belongs here, it contains a female affirmation of her love.

(6:4–9) A male song of praise for a female lover, partly parallel (vv. 5b–7) to the wasf of ch. 4.

(6:10–12) Either a male monologue—male praises female in a garden—or a dialogue, with a questionable voice attribution for v. 11 and the difficult v. 12.

(7:1–10) Wasf, probably in a male voice, calling to a female (the Shulamite) to dance and then describing her body from toe to head (vv. 2–7). A response indicating male desire (vv. 8–9), perhaps followed by a female retort (v. 10) rounds off this passage.

(7:11–14) One song, or several songs in a female voice, seductively inviting a male lover to go outdoors where she will give herself to him (cf. 4:9–14).

(8:1–7) A female passage, again probably or possibly more than a single song: a woman would like her lover to be her brother, so that they can be together in her 'mother's house' (vv. 1–2; cf. 3:4); they embrace (v. 3; cf. 2:6); another appeal to the daughters of Jerusalem (v. 4); two fragments (v. 5; cf. 3:6a, 2:3). vv. 6–7 are, once again, in a female voice:

Set me as a seal upon your heart, | as a seal upon your arm; | for love is strong as death, | passion fierce as the grave. | Its flashes are flashes of fire, | a raging flame. | Many waters cannot quench love; | neither can floods drown it. | If one offered for love | all the wealth of one's house, | it would be utterly scorned.

This declaration, surely, might have constituted a suitable end for the whole book. Nevertheless,

(8:8–14) (see SONG C.3); maternal brothers decide how to keep their sister's virginity, when necessary (vv. 8–9). She answers mockingly (v. 10 or 10–12; cf. 1:5–6). An unclear verse is followed by the very last verse: a female voice calls to her male lover to run away, like a gazelle or deer, to the distant never-never land of the perfume hills. Thus, love's game can begin afresh, suspended in timelessness and moving cyclically.

2. This survey shows that the Song can be understood as a collection of love lyrics, performed by one couple and two choruses ('daughters' and 'maternal brothers'). However, variety and the repetitions point in the direction of multiplicity of settings, backgrounds, moods—and cast of characters. That is, if we agree that a structural 'plot' only is in evidence, then there is no reason to assign all female lines to a single female textual speaker, or all male lines to a single textual male speaker. This has been done in some older translations, dividing the lines between 'bride' and 'bridegroom', or some similar arrangement. However, notwithstanding a description (3:9–11) of Solomon's wedding (which might be a satire or parody, see Whedbee 1993), nothing in the Song points to a marital setting or conclusion for lovers, as we have seen. Furthermore, there is no compelling reason to assume that one couple only is reflected in the Song, or even a love triangle (as in some older scholarship, where a triangle of Solomon–Shulamite–shepherd lover is found). Rather, a multiplicity of voices is heard in the Song, as befits such an anthology on a universal topic. Looking for a comprehensive, all-embracing interpretation for the book may form a link with allegorical renderings of it (since those depend on a comprehensive reading, with a single, well-defined pair of lovers), but seems unwarranted by the text itself.

3. Clearly, though, the female voices far outstrip the male voices in the Song. Female voices search; male voices tease and escape. Females become lovesick; males allow themselves to be found and led to the 'mother's house' (fathers are as absent from the Song as the figure of a God.) Females are articulate (they have almost two-thirds of the text!), unconventional, risk-takers. Males are loving but less adventurous. Therefore, whereas Tribble (1978) maintains gender equality in the Song, perhaps we should do better to recognize female superiority in it. Whether this signifies female authorship, or an original background of female performance, remains uncertain (see Goitein 1988 for female authorship and performance). At any rate, also from this perspective of gender affairs, the Song is an exception in the HB. Although traces of a patriarchal framework are apparent in it (the brothers' role as custodians of female sexual modesty; the guards' beating up of a woman searching at night), nowhere else in the HB do women roam and make love so freely, outside the framework of marriage, in the open, without chaperones. Nowhere are 'they' allowed such outspoken voices on erotic love and desire (as is the case in other ancient cultures too; and see SONG C). It is perhaps worthwhile, therefore, to read the Song as if it contained traces of female voices (Brenner and van Dijk-Hemmes 1993), not just as if it contained male voices (which is the biblical norm).

4. What, then, can we say about the kinds of love described and celebrated in the Song? Erotic yearnings are complementary, never in contrast, to emotions and feelings. In a sense, love in the Song is unproblematic: although pre- or non-marital, no complications of unwanted pregnancies result from sexual relations. Joy and exaltation indeed interface with heart-sickness and despondency: much depends on lovers' availability for each other. High seriousness interchanges with humour (3:7–11; 7:1–10). Passion can be painful as well as uplifting. Socio-moral norms prohibiting non-marital sexual unions are ignored or disregarded. Lovers exist in a world of their own creation, as they would. One spectrum of emotion and behaviour is conspicuous by its absence, however. Jealousy, betrayal, violence borne out of frustration, infidelity—the negative facets of love are simply not in evidence. Idealization? Perhaps, although not fully, when the suffering and difficulties recounted (especially for female lovers) are noticed.

E. Poetics, Forms, Imagery. 1. As noted at SONG A.2, the Song is composed of monologues (or soliloquies), dialogues, and choruses. These are sometimes combined into composite poems (5:2–6:2; and see Falk 1982). A special poetic genre is the wasf (from Arabic: description). In this type of song the lover's body, be it a male's (5:10–16) or a female's (4:1–7 with a partial parallel in 6:3–7; 7:1–7 MT), is referred to by means of a series of delightful and sensuous images and in a certain order: from head to toe in chs. 4 and 5, and from toe to head in ch. 7. Pope (1977) cites many examples of wasf-type parallels from Arab and other sources.

2. The imagery of the Song draws on many areas of human experience: natural phenomena, zoology, botany, agriculture, art, trade, precious materials, architecture, and much more. It appeals to all senses, even floods them. A recurrent, deceptively simple simile/metaphor, 'your eyes are doves' (1:15; 4:1) invokes a synesthetic response of sight, sound, and emotive content—as does the more explicit elaboration of this metaphor in 5:12, 'His eyes are like doves'. Or the praise, 'your breasts are like young twin gazelles' (4:5; 7:4), that signifies colour, movement, size, texture, shape, perhaps smell—all of these, or at least several. Translations of the Song that attempt to convey this sensuous imagery, together with the rhythm and spirit of its poetry, are no simple tasks. Two such recent translations, by Falk (1982) and by Bloch and Bloch (1995), are recommended for their poetic quality.

3. Perhaps the most astounding and complex are metaphors relating to nature, especially as it reawakens in spring-time. The image of the orchard, or garden, will serve as an example. On the first level, much of the action in the Song—lovers meeting, lovers departing, lovers talking—happens outdoors. The garden or orchard, then, is the natural backdrop, and represents realism as well as an optimistic setting for love meetings. On the second level, gardens and orchards—especially in spring—symbolize an option of love's flowering and growth. On the indexical level, their flowering and fruitfulness are akin to sexuality in the human world. Ultimately, then, the garden/orchard are metaphorized into human sexuality (fourth level). And finally, by way of specification, the garden/orchard stand for female sexuality, especially female erogenous zones: in other words, on the fifth level of meaning (or signification) female sexuality is metaphorized into a garden/orchard. This symbol/image/indexical notion/metaphor is sensuously rich: it appeals to sight, sound, smell, touch, and taste. The richness is especially apparent when a perfume garden is invoked, as in the central seduction scene of 4:9–5:1. There, by naming plants and gardens and foodstuff and aromatics, a male lover manages to talk his female lover into having sexual relations—without ever speaking directly. 'They' are in a physical garden (outside), they are a garden, love is a garden, the woman is a garden, her anatomy is a perfumed garden. And when the male lover receives the woman's permission to enter 'his garden' and eat its fruit (4:16; cf., more articulately, 7:13–14), it is quite obvious what transpires through the use of garden/orchard/aromatics imagery.

F. Ancient Extrabiblical Parallels. Pope (1977) supplies exhaustive lists of Song parallels in the ancient and pre-modern world, especially the Mesopotamian, Indian, and Islamic worlds. Fox (1985) does the same with Egyptian love poetry. Rabin (1973–4) and others draw attention to parallels in Tamil. A curious feature is that, in most if not all parallels, women's voices are quite pronounced in the context of pre-marital love poetry (in distinction from their situation in marital contexts). However, the subject-matter and experience of heterosexual love and passion is so universal as to render the parallels less significant than they would otherwise have been.

G. Biblical Intertexts. 1. In prophetic books such as Hosea, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah 40 ff, and Malachi there obtains a metaphor of divine-human marriage covenant. The male partner is YHWH; his wife is variously Jerusalem (or Samaria, or both cities), the land of Israel, or the Israelite or Judahite people. The divine husband is presented as constantly and ceaselessly loyal to his spouse, of whom he takes care. The wife is presented as a creature who is adulterous, fickle, and prostitutes herself, and who keeps looking for fresh lovers and fresh sexual sensations (in the plural). The husband punishes his wife, who stands accused but mostly does not get a chance to defend herself.

2. When the Song is interpreted allegorically, the situation is reversed. Here it is clear that the woman searches for her man and remains faithful to him. This reversal, theologically interpreted, is significant: for theological thinking, it might afford hope to the post-Roman conquest nation. It might have provided at least part of the motivation to interpret the Song as religious rather than secular love poetry—despite the fact that such allegories require sacralization of a secular text and its transformation by interpretation into a comprehensive unit focused on only one male and one female lover. It also requires a displacement of the female lover to a secondary position relative to the male's (now divine) position, and an introduction of the missing divine element into the Song in the guise of a divine (male) lover. The early Jewish allegories which, in turn, mutated into Christian allegories, are thus rooted not only in practical theology (a response to the politically troubled times of the Roman conquest and the loss of land, political organization, and autonomy) but also in biblical intertextuality.

H. Epilogue: Directions for Reinterpretation. 1. In contemporary scholarship various trends can be discerned. Some scholars re-examine the possibility of an early, perhaps even Solomonic, provenance for the Song in the light of extrabiblical parallels (Rabin 1973–4; Fox 1985). Others attempt to reconcile allegorical and surface (Heb. pēšat: simple) meanings. According to Rabin, Murphy (1990), and others, the possibility that the Song was, from its very inception, a double-tiered composition relating to both human love and divine-human love should be explored. Yet other scholars, such as Pope, look for a goddess in the Song, again an allegory, if of a modern kind.

2. Feminist critics have paid a lot of attention to the predominance of female voices in the Song. Understanding this phenomenon and its implications, even though it reflects similar phenomena in the love lyrics of cognate cultures, requires further deliberation. Already there is a backlash against feminist appropriation of female voices by way of reclaiming male authorship for the Song (Clines 1995).

3. Ultimately, it is the sheer beauty of the poems, the unadulterated strength of the lyrics and imagery, that keeps it so attractive, be its interpretation secular or religious. Regrettably, part of the experience, the musical aspect of the performance—for songs are there to be performed to music rather than merely recited—is lost to us. Fortunately, in the newly minted traditions of Zionism and modern Israel, many of the songs of the Song have been set to music afresh. I grew up on this music, these lyrics: for me they are inseparable—and intrinsically secular.

22. Isaiah

R. COGGINS

INTRODUCTION

Overview. 1. It may come as a surprise to some readers to discover that the whole book of Isaiah is being dealt with in one article. One of the success stories of the historical-critical method of biblical study has been to establish that the 66 chapters of the book come from a variety of backgrounds, and the custom has been to treat chs. 40–66 independently of the earlier part of the book. These chapters are said to come from 'Deutero'- or 'Second Isaiah' (40–55), usually with chs. 56–66 further isolated and ascribed to 'Trito'- or 'Third Isaiah'. It is argued that historical references and stylistic features alike enable them to be distinguished from the Isaiah of the earlier chapters, and it might seem perversely old-fashioned to go back to treating the whole book as a unity.

2. It may be helpful to rehearse briefly the relevant findings of historical criticism with regard to the different elements in the book. Broadly speaking they fall into three categories: historical, stylistic, and theological.

3. Historical. Many references in the early part of the book (e.g. ch. 7, chs. 36–9) as well as places in 2 Kings where Isaiah is mentioned by name (e.g. 19:2) make it clear that the prophet's life and activity were envisaged as taking place during the last third of the eighth century BCE, when Judah was under threat, first from its Northern neighbours, Israel and Damascus, and then from the Assyrians. But from ch. 40 all this has changed; the people addressed are pictured as being in Babylon, and Cyrus of Persia, who overthrew the Babylonian empire, is mentioned by name (44:28; 45:1). Cyrus became king in 550 BCE, and if we are to use any of the normal criteria of historical assessment the words referring to him must have been written after that date. It is generally agreed, therefore, that chs. 40–55 come from a Babylonian setting and should be dated in the 540s. Chs. 56–66 offer fewer clear indications of date, but the general consensus has been to place these chapters later still, perhaps in Jerusalem in the time when the work of restoration was going slowly forward in a disillusioned and demoralized community.

4. Literary. In terms both of detailed vocabulary and more generally of style there are important differences which come over clearly even in translation. Numerous phrases and expressions characteristic of the earlier chapters ('briers and thorns', 'remnant') are not found in the later sections, whereas such terms as 'create' and 'redeem' are peculiar to the later chapters. Again, there are marked stylistic differences, the sharp, brief, and often bitterly condemnatory oracles of the early chapters (e.g. the 'woes' of 5:8–23) contrasting markedly with the repetitive, dignified style of 40–55, where many Psalm-like passages are addressed to God rather than to a human audience.

5. Theological. From ch. 40 onwards major theological themes emerge which have played little or no part earlier: concern with the Exodus and wilderness deliverance, clearly pictured as the model for a new return from exile to the promised land (40:3–5); the restoration of a destroyed Jerusalem as a symbol of renewed divine favour (ch. 52); the concentration on creation, with the use of the distinctive Hebrew verb bārā, used in Gen 1 but rare elsewhere, to speak of divine creative action; the concern with the role of a servant. All these themes have no obvious parallel in the earlier chapters.

6. Until a decade or so ago these considerations were generally regarded as sufficient to justify treating the book of Isaiah as two, or three, separate and unconnected blocks of material. Some of the points made by historical critics may be less securely based than might at first sight appear; in particular their tendency to treat poetry as if it had precise reference to historical events can give a false sense of security. We shall note this particularly when we look at the 'Babylonian' chapters, 40–55. Nevertheless the substance of their work has not been challenged. Yet despite this, the agenda of Isaiah studies has changed dramatically, so that a recent survey of such studies can speak of 'the current focus' of scholarly attention being 'the final form of the book of Isaiah as a whole' (Sweeney 1993: 141), an issue barely touched on in most historical-critical work.

7. A number of reasons for this shift can be put forward, but it may be helpful at the very outset to distinguish between two basic approaches, each concerned with the final form of the book. One approach looks for its unity in and through the circumstances in which it developed. It will envisage an Isaiah 'tradition' or a 'school', and seek to discern some basic elements holding the whole block of material together through differing historical circumstances. The other regards the concerns of this kind of historical approach as largely illusory; what we have is a book, so let us treat it as a book, regardless of the particular circumstances which are alleged to have led to its composition. We read and can appreciate a classic novel without enquiring into the background of its composition; similarly, it is argued, Isaiah can be read as a whole without exploring what are regarded as irrelevant details. There are obvious differences, for Isaiah is mainly poetry, without any storyline. Nevertheless certain basic themes run through the whole book which are of intrinsic importance.

8. The two approaches to which we have referred may for convenience, though with some ambiguity, be described as 'historical' and 'literary'. They seem to be radically different; whether they can be reconciled to one another, as some have claimed, must remain doubtful. In the commentary which follows more attention will be paid to the second approach, partly because it has been less prominent in commentaries on Isaiah. It is hoped, however, that the important concerns of the first approach have not been ignored.

9. There are some issues which the two views have in common. We may accept that the various parts of the book of Isaiah are diverse in their origin. What next should be examined is the fact that this heterogeneous material has been brought together into one book. In this connection we must first of all remember the unanimous testimony of the ancient witnesses to the unity of Isaiah. The book of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus), in the Apocrypha, refers to Isaiah in an eighth-century context, but also ascribes to him the theme of comforting 'those who mourned' (Sir 48:24), a clear reference to Isa 40, i.e. the later part of the book. The chronological problem is resolved by the supposition that the prophet himself 'saw the future'. That evidence comes from the second century BCE. From roughly the same period the scrolls of Isaiah from Qumran, among the earliest found and best preserved of the Dead Sea scrolls, do not reflect any division between chs. 39 and 40. From a somewhat later period it is clear that the New Testament regards Isaiah as one book. Among many passages which could be quoted, perhaps the most striking is Jn 12: 38–41, because of the way in which it links material from different parts of the book of Isaiah.

10. All the ancient testimony, therefore, points to Isaiah as being one book. It seems improbable, though the possibility cannot be totally ruled out, that that oneness consists simply in the bringing together of wholly disparate blocks of material, a merely accidental juxtaposition. Again, such theories as those which propose that the shortage of material in exile led to the reuse of existing scrolls, or that the prophet called Deutero-Isaiah was actually named Isaiah, and so had his work linked with that of his illustrious forebear and namesake, reflect more on the ingenuity of those who propose them than on any historical likelihood. There are, indeed, certain features which recur throughout the whole book of Isaiah (the characteristic description of God as 'the Holy One of Israel' is a case in point), which also make any suggestion of mere accidental linkage a most unlikely one. We are left with the conclusion that, though an authorial unity of the book of Isaiah, in the sense of it all going back to one individual, is most unlikely, there is a real sense in which we may view it as a redactional unity, that is, a work which has been brought together as a deliberately structured whole. It is to the nature and purpose of that redaction that much recent scholarly attention has been devoted.

11. Was there a School of Disciples? One theory which has been a good deal discussed in recent years is that Isaiah's own words were gathered together and handed down by his disciples over a period of perhaps two or three centuries. Some of those disciples, it is argued, were among those exiled to Babylon, and they included among them the great poet who came to be known as Deutero-Isaiah, who was responsible for chs. 40–55 of our present book. There are certain clues which seem to favour this line of interpretation. 8:16 is a difficult verse, but a typical translation is that of NRSV 'Bind up the testimony, seal the teaching among my disciples.' (For other ways of understanding this verse, see the commentary.) Various scholars have supposed that this is an indication of the beginning of a process that lasted at least 200 years. Eaton, for example, detects a 'definite connection of master and disciples with the centre of worship (i.e. Jerusalem), yielding a disciplined succession into and beyond the exile' (Eaton 1982: 59). On this view there was a clearly structured tradition, owing its origin to the historical Isaiah of the eighth century (sometimes rather misleadingly described as 'Isaiah of Jerusalem'), closely linked in its concerns and manner of expression with the worship of the Jerusalem temple, and reaching new theological and liturgical insights as its conviction grew that the days of exile were coming to an end (Eaton 1979. Albertz 1990: 253–5 recognizes the force of these links, but notes also that the later stages of the Isaianic tradition drew on sources other than words attributable to Isaiah himself).

12. The existence of such a school is certainly possible, but other scholars have not been slow to point out some of the difficulties of this view. Clements, for example, notes that we know little of how such a school of authors (for whose existence there is, in any case, no certain testimony in the book of Isaiah and no independent evidence from other sources) would have evolved, or what kind of connection between different parts of the book is implied. His own proposal is that the material in chs. 40–55 was ‘intended to develop and enlarge upon prophetic sayings from Isaiah of Jerusalem’ (Clements 1985: 101). He then illustrates this point by drawing attention to a number of themes which are common to different parts of the book, in which it is possible to see a development throughout. We are in the world of redaction criticism; less interested in authors and precise historical circumstances, more concerned with the way in which particular themes and motifs developed within a specific literary tradition.

13. One important element in this development has its roots in the work of the historical critics. As we have seen, the conventional division was between chs. 1–39 and what followed, with 1–39 described as ‘Isaiah of Jerusalem’. But it has long been recognized that a large part of chs. 1–39 could not simply be ascribed to the eighth-century Isaiah. Much in the foreign nations oracles (13–23) seemed to come from a period later than that of Isaiah. Chs. 24–7 betray some of the features of the apocalypses, and have usually been thought of as the latest part of the whole book. Chs. 33–4 have characteristics which again suggest a late date, while 35 has so much in common with 40–55 that it has sometimes been attributed to Deutero-Isaiah. Chs. 36–9 are substantially identical with 2 Kings 18–20, and the dependence has usually been held to be on the side of Isaiah. Detailed critical study, therefore, has found material going back to Isaiah himself only in chs. 1–12 and 28–32.

14. Even in those chapters, however, the tendency has been to discern a radical process of development. Kaiser at the outset of his commentary makes it clear that only ‘the earliest prophecies, contained in chs. 28–31, should be identified with sayings of Isaiah’ (Kaiser 1983: 2). The remainder of this material only began to be collected in the fifth century, that is, at a time later than the traditional date for Deutero-Isaiah! Vermeylen engaged in a detailed study of the stages by which the book reached its present form, and suggested that the influence of those responsible for chs. 56–66 can also be traced in 1–39, again reversing the conventional order of composition (Vermeylen 1977–8: 757). The subtitle of Vermeylen’s work gives a good indication of his view of the process of composition: ‘Isaïe I–XXXV, miroir d’un demi-millénaire d’expérience religieuse en Israël’. An analogous approach is that of Ackroyd (1987), who examines some of the issues involved in the gradual development of the complete book of Isaiah, and then goes on to look in greater detail at chs. 1–12, in which he is able to discern ‘the presentation of a prophet’—the reflection of a later generation on how the ideal prophetic figure should be delineated.

15. The above studies, and others that could be listed, retain something of a historical concern, but with a difference. Whereas in earlier writings questions of historicity related to the amount of material which could plausibly be traced back to Isaiah himself and the circumstances of the eighth century, now the historical concerns are those relating to the process of redaction and editing. Kaiser, for example, sees much of Isa 1–39 as an attempt to come to terms with and offer a satisfactory explanation for the downfall of Judah and the exile of its leading citizens in the sixth century. In a comparable way

Vermeylen claims that one redactional ‘layer’ was a process of anti-Samaritan polemic which cannot be dated earlier than the fourth century.

16. More recently, however, a number of studies have rejected this historical concern out of hand. These represent what we have already referred to as a ‘literary’ rather than a ‘historical’ standpoint. In this approach what we have is a piece of literature, which should be read and appreciated like other pieces of literature, without constantly breaking off to speculate about the historical circumstances from which its elements emerge, either in their original form or in the process of editing. The title of Conrad’s book (1991) is significant: Reading Isaiah. ‘Isaiah’ here clearly refers to the book; now only minimal attention is paid to the ‘historical Isaiah’, the eighth-century figure of whom we can in any case know very little. Indeed there is a real sense in which Isaiah becomes a fictional figure. We need not doubt that such a person did indeed exist, but it would be misleading to suppose that the book gives us access to his actual words and thoughts. But the other word in his title is also highly significant: it is the reading, and the reader who engages in that exercise, that take centre stage. For an approach of this kind it is a book to read, to savour as a piece of literature, to reflect upon its message. But this scarcely says enough. ‘To reflect upon its message’ may imply that there is an objective ‘message’ there, equally accessible to all. Much traditional interpretation of Scripture has indeed claimed just that, that it refers to something beyond itself. The emphasis on the reader, to which reference has been made, is inevitably much more subjective. For a start, it will ask: Who is the reader? Is it a man or a woman? There is much feminine imagery in Isaiah, some of it dismissive (3:16–4:1) but some of it much more positive. Sawyer (1989) offers an interesting and illuminating comparison between the ‘servant of the Lord’ and the ‘daughter of Zion’ imagery in the second half of the book. Or again: From what social and economic background does the reader come? The book speaks harshly against those who ‘join house to house...until there is no more room’ (5:8). One’s attitude to that might differ according to whether one were involved in the property market, or were anxious to alleviate a housing shortage. Or again: What is the reader’s attitude towards religious practice? Many readers of the Bible might be thought to be favourably disposed towards it; how then will they react to the fierce criticism of religious practice in 1:11–15?

17. In this kind of reading of the text not only the concerns of historical criticism, but also those of redaction criticism, are now dismissed as of no more than marginal relevance. Such an approach is a far cry from that of most traditional commentaries upon Isaiah. It is too early as yet to say whether it will become the norm, or whether it will itself be regarded as a curious sidetrack. Unclear also is the extent to which the historical and the literary approaches are totally independent of, and perhaps even hostile to, one another.

18. However that may be, it will be clear from the above brief survey that many of the questions habitually raised in introductions of this kind no longer seem to be as central as once they were. As recently as 1989, the excellent commentary by J. Jensen and W. H. Irwin on Isa 1–39 in the NJBC began with a section devoted to 'The Prophet and his Times', outlining the history of Judah in the last third of the eighth century and placing the activity and oracles of Isaiah within that context. Such an approach has become steadily more difficult, and will not be attempted here. It is likely that the final redactors of the book of Isaiah drew on something akin to our present 2 Kings as one of their sources, and the modern reader who wishes to find out how much we can know about Judah in the second half of the eighth century BCE must do the same. By the time that Isaiah reached its final form the time of the monarchy, the pre-exilic period, was a distant memory.

19. That is not to say that little or nothing of what has been preserved for us in the final form of the book goes back to Isaiah himself. Rather, it implies that the process of editing and shaping the collection of material, and then the composition of a completed book, gives us a different perspective, one which stretches over several centuries of the growth and development of the Jerusalem community. It has the simple practical consequence for this commentary that the word 'Isaiah' will, unless otherwise stated, refer to the book rather than to the figure of an individual. (Indeed the paucity of references to Isaiah as an individual within his book is striking; there are 16 such references, compared with more than 130 to Jeremiah in the book that bears his name (Conrad 1991: 34). It also means that more attention than has been usual will be paid to linkages within the whole of Isaiah, the sense in which the whole book is a unity. As has already been made clear, that need not have any implication that the individual Isaiah son of Amoz was not himself responsible for particular sayings; it does emphasize the clearly patterned overall structure of the book. For believers in particular the question may become acute. Is their concern as they approach the book of Isaiah a desire to find out the underlying historical circumstances of each part of the book, and to discover a specific point of reference—historical, doctrinal, ethical—in each passage? Or is it rather to come to the text as literature and let it speak to them as a 'holy text'?

20. It is appropriate to end this introduction with an outline of what we shall be studying. It is a book, mostly of poetry, which begins by warning a religious community of the dangers inherent in its failures, dangers which must lead to punishment. These warnings occupy much of chs. 1–33. There follows the triumphant proclamation that the time of punishment is now over, and that the way to restoration lies ahead; this theme is found in chs. 34–5, and clearly underlies the stories in chs. 36–9, chapters which function as a hinge upon which the whole book turns. As has long been recognized, the announcement of restoration predominates in chs. 40–55. But the book ends with renewed notes of warning; the community must not suppose that in future 'anything goes'. There are still dangers to be guarded against, patterns of behaviour which are incompatible with their religious claims. These warning signs are prominent in chs. 56–66. Sometimes there are clues which suggest a particular historical background for particular passages, but they are subsidiary to the main thrust of the book and liable to misinterpretation. We may be wiser to read Isaiah as a structured collection of religious verse, keeping this broad thematic progression in mind.

COMMENTARY

(Ch. 1) provides a good illustration of the way in which interest in the literary structure of the whole has replaced some of the older historical questions. It concludes (v. 31) with a reference to the burning of those who trust in their own strength, in a fire which cannot be 'quenched' (Heb. root: k-b-h). This relatively rare word is also found in the last verse of the whole book (66:24: 'their fire shall not be quenched'), linking together beginning and ending of the book. But it is also used of the servant in 42:3, of whom it is said, by contrast, that 'a dimly burning wick he will not quench'. Again, the fire devouring Edom will be quenched (34:10), and those who oppose the LORD's path are 'quenched like a wick' (43:17). It is obviously possible that these uses are coincidental, but even if that were true the reader is surely invited to see and reflect upon this linkage. It will be noted, of course, that the five examples which have been given take in all three of the parts into which Isaiah has customarily been divided.

Other links between ch. 1 and the last part of the book have been noted. Clements (1980a: 28) expressed this as 'a selection of the prophet's sayings in order to provide a general preface and guide to his teaching', but it may be more appropriate to envisage this 'selection' in terms of an introduction to some of the main themes of the whole book. The issues of sin, judgement, and hoped-for restoration are those with which the community of Israel as a whole and the prophetic writings were deeply concerned, and they form the overarching structure of the book of Isaiah.

(1:1) The introductory verse is closely comparable to the opening of the books of Jeremiah, Hosea, Amos, Micah, and Zephaniah. It is sometimes supposed that all ancient Israelites were necessarily expert in knowing which king reigned when, in the way in which children of an earlier generation were required to learn lists of the kings of Judah and Israel. Much more probably this is a literary device at one stage in the editorial process of the Isaiah collection, linking it with the account of the people's history given in the books of Kings. Since those books are usually described as part of the Deuteronomistic History this verse is then regarded as evidence for one of the redactions of Isaiah's words being Deuteronomistic. (Kaiser 1983: 1–2 suggests that this implies a fifth-century date, but there is little unambiguous evidence for dating.) It is not even possible to offer exact dates for the kings listed, but they all ruled in the second half of the eighth century BCE. What follows is described as 'a vision which (Isaiah) saw'. Part of the reference here must surely be to the great vision in ch. 6, but we should also bear in mind that vision (what we might describe as 'second sight' or 'insight') was an important element in the prophetic role. Another way of describing prophets was as 'seers', and the two terms seem in practice to have been synonymous. Indeed, from the visions of Amos onwards the prophetic collections emphasize the importance of visions, and the books of Obadiah, Habakkuk, and Nahum, like that of Isaiah, are described in their opening verse as 'visions'. The distinction between words and visions, which to us may appear fundamental, may not have seemed so basic to the compilers of these oracles. Perhaps this is a pointer, one of many we shall notice, that much of what follows is poetry, and is not to be treated in the precise manner in which we approach prose.

(1:2) The form used here appears to be that of a lawsuit, with witnesses being summoned. We have no means of knowing how closely the book's language is based on actual legal practice; some may feel that poetry and legal usage are at opposite ends of the spectrum. Indeed no legal system could tolerate the duplication of roles here envisaged, for YHWH speaks both as prosecuting counsel, here summoning his witnesses, and as judge, whose verdict, though implicit, is inevitable (Nielsen 1978: 27–9, though her reading of a covenant context underlying the lawsuit seems doubtful—the idea of 'covenant' is not prominent in the early chapters of Isaiah). It seems clear that 'heavens' and 'earth' are envisaged as a totality; the whole created order is summoned to witness the verdict that God is about to announce. 'I reared children': this is the first example of what will become a frequent and increasingly explicit feature of Isaiah, the picture of God as parent (both father and mother) of wayward children. The language may be that of adoption rather than of direct parentage (Melnik 1993: 252), but we know too little of adoption procedures in ancient Israel to be certain of this.

(1:3) This verse has played an important part in Christian tradition. Much of Isaiah came to be regarded as pointing forward to the time of Christ, and the reference here to the ox and the ass recognizing God's presence came to be interpreted in connection with the stories of the birth of Jesus. The animals in the Christmas crib are not a biblical tradition, but are first mentioned in the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew, thought to date from the eighth or ninth century CE, where it is said that Mary 'put her child in a manger, and an ox and an ass worshipped him. Then was fulfilled that which was spoken through the prophet Isaiah: "The ox knows his owner and the ass his master's crib"' (Hennecke 1963: 410). It is interesting that the Hebrew word translated 'master' is ba'al, the same word as is used elsewhere of a god regarded as a rival to YHWH. There is no suggestion of a rival deity here, or any feeling that the use of this word posed problems.

The same theme, of animals recognizing what is hidden from God's own people, is found again in Jer 8:7, but the 'stork, turtledove, swallow and [?]crane' of that verse might not seem so appropriate to a Christmas crib. The remainder of the verse introduces themes basic to Isaiah. The people are described as 'Israel'. But Israel in the time of the prophet Isaiah meant the northern kingdom, which was absorbed into the Assyrian Empire around 722 BCE. It is likely that the use of the term in a religious sense, to describe the worshippers of YHWH, only became predominant at a later period. The expression 'my people' is also used, here in a strongly condemnatory sense. There is a clear cross-reference here with the usage in 40:1, with its cry to 'comfort my people'. In this opening chapter the people's sins are described in detail and the inevitability of punishment spelt out; in ch. 40 it is made clear that the punishment, though thoroughly deserved, had now been completed and that the people might now contemplate restoration.

(1:4) The section from v. 2 onwards is rightly set out in most modern translations as poetry, and one of the characteristics of Hebrew poetry is parallelism: the repetition in slightly different words in the second line of what has already been said in the first. Often such parallelism is described as 'synonymous', with the implication that there is no additional nuance of meaning to be discerned in the second line. But this conflicts with a deeply held traditional Jewish belief, shared also by some Christians, that every word of Scripture must have its own in-built significance. This verse provides a good example of the tension. Are 'children' and 'deal corruptly' simply synonyms of 'offspring' and 'do evil', or do they add details which might otherwise be overlooked? The usual view in modern scholarship has been that they are no more than synonyms, but the other view has been vigorously upheld by some scholars (Kugel 1981: 289–92). Similarly with the words gôy and 'am', translated 'nation' and 'people'. These can certainly be understood as synonyms; but it is also possible to suppose that the wickedness of YHWH's own 'am' is somehow more culpable than that associated with a gôy, a term used of any nation.

The verse begins with the characteristic Isaianic word hôy, translated 'Ah', but in reality somewhat stronger than that implies: 'Alas!' It is followed by a characteristic reproach, a form in which the reasons for God's condemnation of the people are set out. The third-person usage in the second half of the verse is somewhat unexpected, and has led some commentators (Kaiser 1983) to regard it as a later clarification; without it the whole section to v. 7 can be taken as a direct address of condemnation. The point is of some importance for our understanding of Isaianic usage, because this part of the verse contains the first instance of the designation of God as 'the Holy One of Israel', an expression found 28 times in all parts of the book of Isaiah, but rare elsewhere, only 5 occurrences in the rest of the HB (van Selms 1982). 'Israel', as we have already seen, came to be used as an overall term for the worshippers of YHWH, but it is disputed whether the term was already in use in that sense in pre-exilic times (when it also designated the northern kingdom) or, as is perhaps more probable, only developed at a later time. If the latter view is correct, the term 'Holy One of Israel' may be seen as a characteristic marker of a fairly late stage in the redaction of the Isaiah material. Holiness, which at an earlier stage meant that which is separate, set apart, has now come to be an appropriate designation of God.

(1:5–7) These verses illustrate well the perils inherent in trying to interpret poetry in a precise historical fashion. In vv. 5–6 it is clear that a vivid metaphor is being used, with the people's condition set out in terms of a desperately sick body. The language here used of the community will be picked up again in the description of the suffering of the servant in ch. 53; the rather rare word hābûrâ (bruise) is found in Isaiah only here and at 53:5. In v. 7 the metaphor changes, to that of a land lying desolate, and many interpreters have attempted to discover some precise historical 'reality' underlying this description. There has been discussion about whether the devastation of Sennacherib and the Assyrians in 701 BCE is the setting, or whether only the even greater devastation of the Babylonian armies in the early sixth century was in mind. We may be wiser to take this description, like that of the sick body in the preceding verses, as a vivid way of describing the general punishment inflicted on a people who are perceived to have abandoned the right way.

(1:8) The phrase bat šřyyôn has traditionally been translated 'daughter of Zion', but NRSV is surely right in its rendering 'daughter Zion'. It is Zion itself whose fate is here being described, not its daughter (however that expression may be understood). In the social world of ancient Israel daughters were pictured as their father's possession, and so to describe the city as a 'daughter' implies that it was God's possession. Sometimes in the ancient Near East cities were pictured as being married to their gods, but that particular mode of expression is not often found of Jerusalem and YHWH (though cf. 54:5 and 62:1–5) (Pfisterer Darr 1994).

The verse also brings out another characteristic theme of Isaiah: that of the remnant. There is an inherent ambiguity in this theme: it may be a means of expressing vividly the magnitude of a disaster. Only a remnant is left. Indeed, sometimes the scale of a disaster can only be grasped by the fact that there are a few survivors, as is recognized nowadays by the media when they heighten their account of an earthquake, an aeroplane crash, or a fire, by letting the few survivors tell their story. But a remnant can also be a hopeful sign; there are those who have lived to tell the tale, and on them a better future can be built. Both usages of the theme are found in Isaiah, sometimes in close relation to one another (see 10:20–3 and commentary), but here there is no doubt that the underlying notion is of disaster. There has been much discussion as to which of the two ideas inherent in the theme of remnant is primary, a commonly held view being that 'remnant as threat' goes back to Isaiah himself, while 'remnant as promise' is secondary. It may be more appropriate to understand the whole motif as a theodicy: the community in the Second Temple period were very aware of themselves as a remnant, those who had survived great disasters. But those disasters had been part of God's purpose for his people, who might, as a purified remnant, look forward to a more confident future under his guidance.

The word mēlūnâ, here translated 'shelter', occurs in only one other place in the HB: Isa 24:20 (NRSV: 'hut'). The idea is very much that of a temporary and insecure place of refuge. Less certain is the meaning of nešūrâ. NRSV's 'besieged' is doubtful as a rendering of the word and is in any case scarcely appropriate for the context. Kaiser (1983) deletes the reference to a 'city', to obtain the meaning 'like a refuge in the sheepfold', but this seems purely speculative. REB's 'beleaguered' may bring out the sense, but it seems doubtful whether we should follow the example of many commentators (most recently Stacey 1993) in claiming that the language here 'changes abruptly from image to harsh reality'.

(1:9) The community's self-recognition as a remnant is now brought out. The use of 'we' suggests the existence of a group with which the prophetic tradition could identify which regarded itself as the surviving remnant. The image of Sodom and Gomorrah is based on Gen 19, with special emphasis on the totality of destruction; in the next verse the same image will be used in a rather different sense.

(1:10) The theme of Sodom and Gomorrah is now used to emphasize the wickedness of the community as a whole, and of its leaders in particular. They have become totally alienated from 'the word of the LORD', and from his 'teaching'. This represents Hebrew tôrâ, the term which came ultimately to be used for the gathered collection of Scripture. It scarcely has that formal sense here, but already we can see that a body of teaching is envisaged which the community could be expected to recognize and adhere to. The roots of tôrâ may be in the wisdom tradition (Jensen 1973), but its usage in the final form of the book goes significantly beyond that base.

(1:11–15) There follows a fierce denunciation of wrong ritual practice, comparable to other such attacks in the prophetic books (Am 5:18–24; Hos 6:6; Mic 6:6–8). Some modern writers have claimed that this indicates a complete 'rejection of the sacrificial cult, a momentous break with the past' on the part of the prophet (Heaton 1994: 96). There are difficulties with this view. First, it imposes a very modern, Western approach on an ancient text. Secondly, it ignores the fact that in the sweeping denunciations used here the actual terminology of the sacrificial cult seems not to be employed, as we should expect if the practices laid down in e.g. Leviticus were here being condemned. More probably we should discern a twofold purpose underlying these words. On the one hand the community needed to be warned against complacency; even the glories of the Jerusalem cult-tradition, amply illustrated in Isaiah, cannot be taken as a guarantee of worship acceptable to God. On the other hand there were dangers inherent in a false understanding of what worship could achieve. To set these out offers the beginning of an explanation of the humiliations which the community had experienced.

In what way should we understand these condemnations? Some have simply taken them at face value, and supposed that the whole cultic structure had become decadent. But we need to remember that there is no polemic as bitter and violent as religious polemic, and it may well be that this passage illustrates rivalries within the Jerusalem community, of which there is a good deal of evidence scattered through Isaiah, illustrated in particular in chs. 56–66.

One way in which this condemnation is more all-embracing than the comparable passages in the other prophetic collections is that all forms of religious activity are here condemned; even prayer (v. 15). There is no sense here of private religious observance being acceptable and the condemnation being limited to public worship. The development within the passage is also striking. From v. 11 it would appear that it is sacrificial worship of any kind which is rejected, but in the following verses the words 'you' and 'your' become increasingly prominent, so that the climax in v. 15 is a clear condemnation of the offerers rather than of their practice in itself: 'Your hands are full of blood'.

This in turn raises important interpretative questions. Those being condemned are apparently those in positions of authority; they are the 'rulers of Sodom'. At one level, therefore, Isaiah is condemning the community's leaders. At another level, however, the book claims authority for itself; 'the vision' mentioned in 1:1 is clearly a vision of God, empowering the prophetic group. This tension, whereby Isaiah both condemns the rulers and claims authority for itself, runs all through the book and is especially prominent in chs. 56–66. It is a tension still characteristic of modern religious leaders, who both exercise positions of authority and feel free to condemn those in authority.

(1:16–17) It is important to recognize that what has preceded leads directly into these verses. Until the commands set out here are observed there can be no true worship. The commands here may be understood as a tôrâ, the term understood now in a slightly different sense. Here it implies a set of commands, comparable to the Ten Commandments (though those here are all positive) or the briefer statement in Mic 6:8. The material itself is part of the common stock of ancient Near-Eastern texts. It is sometimes supposed that concern for the oppressed, the orphan, and the widow was peculiar to Israel, but exhortations of this kind were widespread. Thus in the Aqhat epic from Ugarit, the achievement of Dan'el as ruler was that 'he judged the cause of the widow and tried the case of the orphan' (Gibson 1978: 107). This Canaanite evidence should remind us that it was not Israel alone in the ancient world that had an awareness of justice.

(1:18–20) We return now to the language of the lawsuit. The people are summoned; their offences are set out; and the alternative possibilities laid down ('If you are willing...'; 'if you refuse...'). Clearly repentance is envisaged as a possibility. Repentance is not a prominent theme in the eighth-century prophets such as Amos, but it later came to be of major importance, e.g. in Jeremiah. This may be an indication that this passage is a relatively late element in the complete collection.

(1:21–3) This passage is usually characterized as a lament. The metre, at least at the beginning of the poem, has three stresses in the first part of the line and two in the second, as is usual in such laments. Some scholars wish to delete 'but now murderers' to preserve the form throughout the verse, but we do not know enough of the details of Hebrew poetry to be confident in doing so. The opening word 'êkâ (how) is also typical of the lament (cf. 2 Sam 1:19, 25, for one of the most famous laments, that of David over Saul and Jonathan). Jerusalem is not named in the Hebrew text, but it is clearly the subject here, as is made explicit by the Greek translation, and this concern with Jerusalem, both its great potential and its wickedness in practice, will run throughout the whole book. Mišpāt (justice) and šedeq (righteousness) should have characterized the city and especially its rulers, but they are nowhere to be seen. The passage ends with further reference to the orphan and the widow (cf. v. 17), as those in whose interest justice and righteousness should in particular be exercised. The theme of the corruption of justice is one which runs through the whole prophetic tradition, but is specially characteristic of Isaiah, and is one of the elements which hold the whole book together.

(1:24–5) These verses comprise one unit with what has preceded; they are introduced by the characteristic 'therefore' of judgement. The wrongs which have been outlined in the previous verses here have their inevitable consequences spelt out, and metaphors based on metallurgy provide a link between vv. 22 and 25. God is here described as 'the Mighty One of Israel', a term distinct from but closely related to the more usual Isaianic term, 'the Holy One of Israel'; the present phrase is not found elsewhere but the almost identical 'mighty One of Jacob' occurs at 49:26; 60:16. The piling up of divine titles here is in general more characteristic of the second part of the book.

(1:26) But the picture is not all of gloom; the punishment is to be followed by restoration. The phrase 'faithful city' provides an inclusio (that is, the repetition of an opening word or phrase at the end of a section) with v. 21, where that status had been lost, and the use of šedeq not only offers a link with v. 21, but also gives a reminder of the importance of this š-d-q root in Jerusalem's tradition. Perhaps originally concealing a divine name, it reminds us of Melchizedek in Gen 14 and of Zadok the priest in the story of David, and of the frequent use of the root in the Psalms.

We are here introduced to a theme which has caused much discussion: that of the 'inviolability of Zion'. It has been widely held that there was an ancient tradition, traces of which can be found for example in Ps 2, that Zion was impregnable and could not be captured by its enemies. On the other hand Clements (1980b) has argued strongly that the tradition found its origin in the interpretation in Isaiah and elsewhere of the Assyrian king Sennacherib's failure to capture the city in 701 BCE. However that may be, it proved to be a powerful theme, being retained often in the teeth of historical evidence to the contrary.

(1:27–8) Religious polemic is clearly again at work here. Those of whom the writer approved are offered sweeping promises; there are others whose behaviour leads them to be condemned as forsaking the Lord. This is very reminiscent of the divisions highlighted in chs. 56–66. Various attempts have been made (notably by Hanson 1979) more precisely to identify different groups within the Second Temple community, but they founder for lack of sufficiently detailed knowledge.

(1:29–31) Reasons for the rejection of one group are now offered, and they are to be found in some form of idolatrous practice the details of which are not clear to us. The closest links are again with chs. 56–66. In addition to the link between v. 31 and 66:24 already noticed, we may see in particular the reference to the 'oaks' in 57:5 and to the 'gardens' in 65:3. What is here condemned seems to be some form of pagan worship; it is apparently quite different from the misuse of the temple referred to earlier in the chapter. The variety of condemnations and of hopes expressed in this first chapter have led a number of scholars to see in it a summary of the message of the book as a whole (Fohrer 1967). One must not push this idea too far—there are important elements in the book which are not reflected here—but in general terms it is a valuable concept, particularly if it is divorced from largely sterile debate about how much of its contents can plausibly be said to go back to Isaiah himself.

(Chs. 2–4) The majority of commentators have seen these chapters as consisting of a variety of short and largely unrelated oracles but the attempt has been made to discern in them 'a coherent and functional literary unit' (Wiklander 1984, p. ix) a theory based on an elaborate text-linguistic foundation. On this reading the basic theme is the 'restoration of the covenant by means of a lawsuit involving Yhwh, Judah and the nations' (ibid. 114). It is an interesting theory which anticipates some more recent literary readings, but suffers from the serious weakness that the word covenant does not occur in these chapters! Nevertheless the theory that a unifying structure can be discerned in this material, beginning (2:2–4) and ending (4:2–6) with a vision of a glorious future for Jerusalem, is a valuable one.

(2:1) Somewhat unexpectedly a new superscription is introduced here. Various suggestions have been made to account for this unique feature. It might wish to stress that the following oracle, found also in Micah, is genuinely Isaian; if ch. 1 is seen as a later summary of the book as a whole this could be seen as the original introduction to the oracles of Isaiah himself; it may be intended as an introduction to chs. 2–12 (NB the comparable introduction to the 'foreign nations' section at 13:1), or to chs. 2–4 on the view outlined above.

(2:2–4) The most remarkable feature of these verses is that they are also found in Mic 4:1–3, with very minor internal differences and a different conclusion. It is obviously possible that one prophet, or the collector of his oracles, borrowed from the other; if this is so, there are no certain criteria for deciding on which side the dependence lay. But it may also be that there has been a tendency to lay too much stress on the supposed 'originality' of prophets. As we work through the whole Isaiah collection we shall come across a number of places where there are very close similarities with material found in other prophetic books. The present example is a well-known one and has therefore attracted much attention; the others are mostly in the foreign nations oracles which have been the subject of less attention. The use and reuse of existing prophetic oracles may be a subject which deserves more attention than has customarily been devoted to it. Whatever its origin, the striking feature of this oracle is the glorious future held out for Jerusalem, in stark contrast to what has preceded in ch. 1. The vision is to be fulfilled 'in days to come'. Later in this chapter we shall find frequent references to the day of the Lord, pictured as a day of disaster. This oracle, in common with much else in Isaiah, seems to be saying that beyond the disaster there will be a genuine hope of restoration and new prosperity. 'The highest of the mountains': the theme of the 'cosmic mountain' is a widespread one in the ancient Near East and in the Hebrew Bible in particular (Clifford 1972 offers a useful survey of the main relevant texts). The theme is frequent in the Psalms (cf. e.g. Ps 48:1–3; 68:15–16), and both in this passage and in the Psalms the claim is made that Mount Zion, in fact not at all a spectacular mountain, will be established as 'the highest of the mountains'. The mythical features of this picture show us that this is theological geography. It is also noteworthy that, despite the importance for much of Israel's tradition of Mount Sinai and the Torah given there, in the Isaiah tradition the 'holy mountain' is consistently Mount Zion.

Remarkable also in view of later developments within the book is the place here given to 'the nations'. Elsewhere, especially in chs. 13–23, they are presented as the recipients of the judgement of YHWH. Here, a much more positive future is held out for them. It is in the light of this passage, the first dealing with foreign nations, that later judgements will naturally be read. (Davies 1989 makes an interesting comparison between this passage near the beginning of the whole book and 66:18–24, which rounds it off.)

(2:3) A particular concern of the Second Temple community was the position of the worshippers of YHWH vis-à-vis those who worshipped other gods (cf. Zech 8:20–3; 14:16). That concern is very prominent in Isaiah, and a variety of attitudes can be found, ranging from the extraordinary openness of 19:24–5 to the bitterness of some of the foreign nations material and the opposition to Edom in ch. 34 and elsewhere. Here a measure of openness can be seen, but it is clear that Israel is envisaged as playing a superior role as the nation from which others might profitably learn.

It is striking that here tôrâ (law) and 'word of the Lord' are treated as synonymous. The word of the Lord is characteristically that which was uttered through prophetic mouthpieces; tôrâ, as we have seen, had a variety of meanings, but here it may be comparable to the kind of summary of divine guidance found in 1:16–17.

(2:4) Ancient Israel lived in a world where war was a fact of life. The vision of the cessation of war in this verse is a remarkable one, and it is perhaps not surprising that it proved too remarkable for a later prophetic voice. In Joel 3:10 we find the vision being reversed; there ploughshares and pruning hooks are to become swords and spears, in recognition of the need for continued conflict.

(2:5) This brief appeal has no equivalent in Micah. It is an exhortation of the kind more commonly found in Deuteronomy, inviting the community to amendment. It is couched in the first person plural (cf. 1:9), suggesting the identity of a group to whom Isaiah is making special appeal.

(2:6–21) An extended passage, the precise meaning of whose details is not always clear owing to textual uncertainties, is devoted to the 'day of the Lord' theme. The Hebrew word kî, with which it begins, can indeed mean 'for' as in the NRSV translation, but it is more likely here to be asseverative, that is making an assertion rather than spelling out a condition, and should be translated 'surely'. It is a new start, not a direct continuation of v. 5, to which it is linked only by the phrase 'house of Jacob'. Already there is a difficulty in the condemnation here: the word translated 'of diviners' is missing in the Hebrew text, and is supplied from a later tradition, which presumably already felt that the gap needed to be filled. In any case the idea seems to be another condemnation of false worship comparable to that found in 1:29–31. There is no other evidence that the Philistines were especially gifted as 'soothsayers'. The point of the address to YHWH is that intercession is useless; doom is inevitable. The condemnation is largely formulaic, with two refrain-like phrases giving a structural unity to the whole. One is found in vv. 9, 11, and 17, and speaks of humanity being humbled; the other in vv. 10, 19, and 21 pictures those who are left hiding among the rocks in the hope that they might thereby escape God's anger. As can readily be seen the two sets of passages are not identical, as a modern refrain would be; this may imply that the poem is not a unity but has been developed over an extended period (Vermeylen 1977–8), but it may also be a characteristic of Hebrew poetry to tolerate greater variation than would be acceptable in most modern Western traditions. The passage as a whole brings together two basic Isaianic themes: the vanity of human self-confidence and the folly of worshipping false gods.

(2:11) The poem reaches a climax with the assertion of God's sole power 'in that day'. Here the way in which the 'day' is spoken of differs sharply from the picture of the latter 'days' in v. 2. There it was a time of the vindication of Zion and its worshippers, here it is an occasion of unmitigated disaster.

(2:12–19) The idea of a 'day of YHWH' when his enemies would experience his power seems to have been a common one. Am 5:18 presents the idea of the 'day of YHWH' as one to which the people looked forward in eager anticipation. In this Isaiah passage the idea that YHWH will indeed have a day of punishment of his enemies is again set out, but with the disturbing difference that the enemies are now pictured as those who claimed to be his worshippers. In particular, as frequently in Isaiah, the most severe condemnations are reserved for those who trust in their own strength. The imagery used is not always clear, but an important place is found for the storm-wind, a recurring image of divine power in the HB, from the description of Mount Sinai down to the apocalyptic writings.

(2:22) This last verse is missing from the Greek translation (LXX). Its presence illustrates the way in which the tradition developed. It functions as a kind of brief sermon to the readers of the final form of the book, warning them of the dire consequences of the kind of behaviour outlined above.

(3:1–5) As at 2:6 the word kî, translated 'for' in NRSV and elsewhere, is really asseverative: 'Surely'. What is sure is the complete break-up of the established structure of society. Among the prophets it is Jeremiah who is often pictured as endangering the very basis of the society in which he lived, but this charge is less often brought against Isaiah. Here, however, it is clear that the whole established order is at risk. The words translated 'support and staff' in NRSV function in two different ways within the announcement of judgement. They refer to the structure of the society without which there would be chaos. But they also refer to the need for sustenance: bread and water. (NEB/REB omit the reference to bread and water as a later gloss, but this kind of double allusion seems well suited to the basic Isaiah tradition.) The list of leaders of society undergoes an interesting development. At first it appears as purely neutral description ('warrior', 'soldier', and so forth); but as it develops it becomes steadily more derogatory ('skilful magician', 'expert enchanter'). It is an entirely male-dominated structure, and age is also regarded as an important prerequisite for ability to rule. Notice particularly in this respect v. 5, where the parallelism suggests that 'youth' is equivalent to 'base' and 'elder' to 'honourable'.

(3:6–9a) NRSV makes the section end at v. 8, but it may be better to take the first part of v. 9 (down to 'do not hide it') with what precedes. This brings out more clearly the link, already familiar to us from ch. 1, of Jerusalem with Sodom, regarded as a gloss by BHS and Vermeylen (1977–8), but quite understandable in the larger context of the book.

(3:9b–11) These rather generalizing verses have often been regarded as additions to the original context, but if we pay less attention to which words may be original to the prophet Isaiah himself, we can see that this section fits well as an overall verdict on different kinds of behaviour, and the rewards that each brings. The word 'verdict' is deliberately chosen, for the legal context is clear to see.

(3:12) The whole section ends with a statement of a society in confusion, expressed in a way which shows all too clearly the values of ancient Israelite society. It is regarded as a sign of disaster that children or women, bracketed together in the parallelism, should be in positions of authority. It will be for the reader to decide whether he or she can accept the prophet's assessment in such a matter.

(3:13–15) In these verses we return to the lawsuit language already found in ch. 1, and the problem already expressed there returns even more clearly. Here YHWH is both the prosecuting counsel (v. 13) and the judge (v. 14). Whatever we may think about the legal proprieties of such a situation the prophet's intention is clear; he continues his attack upon the leaders of the community, regarding them as the real perverters of justice through the oppression of the weaker members of society. The section ends with the messenger formula ('says the Lord God of hosts') showing the prophet's claim to divine authorization.

(3:16–23) There follows an extraordinary male chauvinist attack upon the women of Jerusalem. There were women prophets in ancient Israel (e.g. Huldah, 2 Kings 22), but those prophets whose words have been handed down in written form seem for the most part strongly misogynistic (Hos 1 and 3; Am 4, as well as this passage and Isa 32: 9–11). Whether this tells us more about the women of the time or about the prophets to whom such words are attributed must be left open. The form of 16–17 is a reproach, describing female behaviour from a male point of view; it leads into a prose expansion, vv. 18–23, which reads like a catalogue from some ancient fashion store. Several of the terms are found only here, and not all of them can be identified; the larger commentaries must be consulted for fuller details (Wildberger 1972: 135–45).

(3:24–4:1) In one sense this is a reversion to the reproach of 3:16–17, but there is a shift of emphasis. Instead of the attack upon the women of Jerusalem the stress shifts so that the reference is to Jerusalem itself, pictured, as cities often were, in feminine terms. The 'sitting on the ground' as a symbol of mourning undergone here by Jerusalem will be used in the same way of Babylon in 47:1. But the passage reverts at its close to the picture of individual women, eagerly seeking the respectability which being called by a man's name promises.

(4:2–6) The degradation and desolation of Jerusalem might appear to be complete, yet it is now contradicted by the great hope expressed in these verses. In historical-critical terms it is certainly a late addition, and has been disparagingly described as a 'mosaic of clichés from different sources' (Bentzen 1957: ii. 108); in the context of the book as a whole, however, it functions as showing that the ordeal suffered by Jerusalem at the hands of its enemies was not the whole story. There was a glorious future to look forward to. Remarkable, too, is the transformation of the 'on that day' theme, so negative in ch. 2, such a powerful symbol of hope here. The use of šemah, 'branch', here introduces a term which elsewhere (Jer 23:5; Zech 3:8; 6:12) is associated with a hoped-for figure in terms that can be called messianic. (In Isa 11:1 the word rendered 'branch' in NRSV is a different Heb. word.) Another theme, rare in these early chapters of the book, introduced here is that of the Exodus and the wilderness journey, evoked in v. 5 by the 'cloud by day and smoke and the shining of a flaming fire by night' (Sweeney 1988a: 18–19). This forms an important link with the later part of the book. We also note in this passage a positive use of the theme of the remnant: those who are left are to be 'recorded for life'.

(5:1–7) Though the literary form is very different the thrust of this passage is essentially that of the kind of lawsuit of which we have already seen examples: the evidence, in the form of God's kindness to his people, is set out in vv. 1–4; the verdict—guilty—is assumed and punishment follows in vv. 5–6. Then v. 7 supplies a kind of key to the dramatic personae of the story, offering the opportunity for a characteristic play on words. In form it may be regarded as a parable, a rare literary form in the prophetic writings, though some prophetic actions can certainly be regarded as parabolic: Isa 8:1–4 offers an example (Westermann 1967: 201–2). The parable may itself be based on a vintage-song, though we know too little of these to be confident. It would be unwise to interpret the details of the action described in an allegorical fashion, with specific meanings being given to watchtower, wine vat, and so on, though this kind of literary reading, so much despised by historical critics, has had something of a renaissance in recent years. v. 1 is one of the places where NRSV has modified the RSV translation, rendering 'my' rather than 'a' love-song. If this is correct, vv. 1–2 could be seen as providing the setting, with the song actually starting in v. 3 (Petersen and Richards 1992: 82–3). The more usual view is that the song is found in vv. 1b–2, with 3–6 providing the reflections of the owner of the vineyard (Emerton 1992, who also suggests rendering v. 1 'a song about my friend'), v. 2, 'wild grapes'. Literally 'stinkers'! v. 4 at first looks like the defence to the lawsuit. It takes the form of two questions. The first simply invites a sympathetic answer; the second expresses bewilderment at the unforeseen and unwanted harvest. But then we realize that it is not really a defence at all, for the 'I' of this verse continues to speak in v. 5, now passing judgement. In v. 7 'house of Israel' and 'people of Judah' are treated as synonymous. This may be a pointer to a late date for the final form of this parable, when Israel referred to the whole religious community, not simply the northern kingdom. The passage closes with the kind of wordplay that defies acceptable rendering in English. God looked for mišpāṭ (justice) but found mišpāḥ (bloodshed), for šēdāqā (righteousness) but found šā'āqā (a cry). The parable, having begun with the prophet himself as speaker, ends with proclamation from YHWH.

(5:8) A new section begins here; this is not made very clear in many editions of NRSV. We have a series of woes, introduced by the word hōy (cf. 1:4). For a reason which is not clear NRSV here translates this word with the very neutral 'Ah', whereas in a similar series in Amos 'Alas' is used. Whether the origin be in a mourning-cry or in some form of cultic usage its impact is powerful. Sometimes the punishment is implicit in the woe itself, sometimes a threat is added, introduced by the word 'therefore'. There is a link between the series of woes here and that which follows in 9:8–10:4, best illustrated by the common refrain found in 5:25 and several times in the later passage. This initial verse illustrates a common characteristic of this section; it is complete in itself, but has probably been elaborated in the course of transmission to emphasize the point being made. In itself the point of v. 8 seems to be that land is to be held in trust, and encroachment by enlarging it infringes that principle. The story of Naboth in 1 Kings 21 may illustrate the same point.

(5:9–10) The image here is of the prophet being admitted to the heavenly council (cf. Jer 23:18, 22) to hear the divine verdict on unacceptable behaviour. An ephah is one-tenth of a homer (de Vaux 1961: 199–200), and so the point of the decision seems to be that in future those condemned will harvest only a tenth of what they sow—a less severe threat than one might have anticipated.

(5:11–17) vv. 11–12, the condemnation of excessive drinking, with the picture of the accompanying merriment, is reminiscent of Am 8. Were the prophets somewhat Puritan in their approach, or was the excess of some people's behaviour an open scandal? v. 13, 'therefore' is a characteristic word of threat, binding this spelling out of the consequences to the woe which has preceded. The tense of the verb 'go into exile' would normally be rendered by an English past, and this makes good sense in the final form of the book: its compilers knew what their community's history had been, and interpreted it as divine punishment. The reason for the exile is striking: NRSV 'without knowledge' might imply mere ignorance, but the Hebrew really means 'for lack of knowledge'—a failure to grasp what God really wanted of his people. v. 14, the threat is elaborated with another 'therefore'. Sheol, the place of the dead from which there was no return, eagerly awaited the offenders—the rulers of Jerusalem, so frequently condemned in these opening chapters. v. 15 is almost identical with 2:9 and functions in a way similarly dismissive of human aspirations. v. 16 is a key text for the appreciation of much of Isaiah. It brings together three key terms: the holiness of God, which will play an important part in the vision of ch. 6; and the qualities of mišpāṭ (justice) and šēdāqā (righteousness), which are claimed as characteristic of divine action and are required of God's worshippers also. One of the most important features of the teaching of the Israelite prophets is this claim that divine characteristics and human behaviour should in some way reflect one another. Where justice and righteousness are lacking the whole of society, from the leaders down, is at risk.

(5:18–25) The series of woes continues, rounded off with a threat. The basic charge is that those condemned are imposing their own standards of right and wrong (v. 20), corrupting the legal structure (v. 23), and confident that God is either ignorant of or uninterested in their behaviour (v. 19). In the light of these sweeping condemnations the charge of drunkenness (v. 22) seems a relatively trifling matter. It is disputed whether the references to wisdom in v. 21 imply any specific link with a wisdom movement in Israel, as proposed by McKane (1965: 65–7). Speculation about Isaiah himself having once been a member of such a wisdom movement is probably best avoided (Whybray 1974); to be 'wise in one's own eyes' means that one is conceited or a fool, and has nothing to do with membership of a wisdom group. All we can say with fair confidence is that these passages are aimed against the policy-makers who were convinced, as is not unknown with politicians, that they were the special recipients of wisdom. By contrast, as the threat in v. 24 makes clear, the Isaiah tradition regards them as having rejected the tôrâ (instruction) of the Lord. This whole section brings out very clearly the tension between those who rely upon human political skills and those who seek a superior religious authority.

v. 25 provides a second threat, and here we are confronted with a methodological problem. Those who have attempted to trace the redactional process underlying the book have noted the identity of the last part of this verse ('For all this his anger...') with the conclusion of each section of 9:8–10:4, and have concluded that some displacement, deliberate or accidental, has led to this arrangement (NEB placed 5:24–5 after 10:4 but REB reverts to the order of MT). Some scholars (Clements 1980a: 66) have regarded the displacement as intentional, whereas older commentators supposed an accidental dislocation. But as we saw in the introduction there is a strong case for the view that it is the book of Isaiah as it has been handed down to us that is the subject of attention, and that we should not attempt rearrangement to conform with an original authorial or redactional intention which is no longer accessible to us. As it stands, therefore, this warning of God's continuing anger forms an important frame to the passages dealing with the hope of a glorious royal figure who features in chs. 7–9. The destruction envisaged here is cosmic in scope.

(5:26–30) The approach of an oppressing army is vividly portrayed, but perhaps the most important point comes at the outset: this oppressor has been summoned by God himself, in terms of signalling to the nations, a metaphor which will be used again in 11:12 and 49:22. (The Heb. here has 'nations', though NRSV has changed it to the singular 'nation', without note, in view of the context.) Here it connotes threat; in the later passages the signal will herald deliverance. What follows is a conventional description of an army on the march, and it would be unwise to limit its applicability to the Assyrians or any other enemy force. Its universal reference is shown most clearly at v. 30, where the devastation is directly linked back to the 'on that day' language of ch. 2 and elsewhere.

(Ch. 6) With this chapter, one of the best-known in the whole book, acute differences of interpretation arise. Clements summarized a widely held view of the whole of the following section when he wrote, 'Undoubtedly we have in 6:1–8:18 a memoir written by the prophet himself' (Clements 1980a: 70). On this view ch. 6 is autobiographical: the prophet's own account of his calling, precisely dated and vividly set out in the context of the worship of the Jerusalem temple. More recently, however, a number of scholars have been much more cautious. They note the increasing tendency within the prophetic tradition to personalize the experience of individuals by attributing first-person accounts to them, and see this as idealizing by a later generation rather than a reliable guide to personal experience. (Such an approach is characteristic of the work of R. P. Carroll on Jeremiah; it has not yet been applied in so systematic a way to Isaiah, but the principles laid down are very similar, and were indeed outlined by Carroll himself in an earlier work. See Carroll (1979) for basic discussion.) It may be appropriate to see in this chapter part of the 'presentation of a prophet' (Ackroyd 1987) rather than an item from an autobiography. In particular the disasters that the community had experienced since the time of Isaiah himself are shown in this chapter to have been inevitable, having already been spelt out in his very call. The point is clearly put by Kaiser (1983: 115): 'The first-person account serves to transpose the narrative fictitiously into the time of Isaiah, using his ministry to reflect the fact that Yahweh was also present beforehand in the history of disaster... and therefore to make clear and credible his abiding power over the future of this people.'

The other question often asked concerning this vision, whether or not it should be regarded as inaugurating Isaiah's ministry, loses much of its force if the whole passage is seen as a literary device. It is nevertheless worth bearing in mind that this account does bear striking similarities in its overall shape with those in Jer 1 and Ezek 1. In each case a specific date is given. There follows an account of the divine presence with the prophet, a theophany. This leads the prophet to acknowledge his unworthiness, from which he is purified and then given a commission. The accounts end with an indication of the content of the message that the prophet is to deliver. There are minor differences of order and of degree of elaboration, but the similarities are so great as to raise the possibility that the accounts are based on some known form of commissioning.

(6:1) 'In the year that king Uzziah died'. The year of death of Uzziah (known also as Azariah) is unknown, but a date around 740 BCE is likely. More striking is the manner of describing the year. Why is the accession of the new king not mentioned? It is possible that this is a way of dismissing Ahaz, who for the Isaiah tradition, as for the Chronicler, embodies all that could go wrong with the Davidic dynasty. In any case, as the following words make clear, it is the Lord himself who is the real king. He wears a šul, a robe elsewhere associated with the priestly garments (Ex 28:33–4).

(6:2) There have been many conjectures concerning the seraphim, who are here pictured as messengers in the divine council. The root š-r-p might make it appropriate to think of them as 'burning ones'. Alternatively they have been likened to snakes; but when one notes that they had wings and genitalia (here euphemistically 'feet'), could call out, and could carry things the similarities diminish. There are no real biblical parallels; the same root is used in Isaiah at 14:29 and 30:6, but these links do not seem to shed much light on this passage. With visionary language of this kind, attempts at precise description, or at finding a specific cultic context, are likely to be misguided.

(6:3) This is the only direct example in the HB of the Trisagion, the threefold cry of 'Holy'. It has, of course, been taken up in almost all Christian eucharistic liturgies as the Sanctus. One of the nearest parallels to it in the HB is Ps 99:3, 5 with its cry of 'Holy is he!' There (v. 1) cherubim rather than seraphim were the divine attendants. We are not sure of the difference. God is here described as 'the LORD of Hosts'; it can be taken in this context simply as a divine title, whether its origin is to be sought among the hosts of heaven or in some kind of military usage. It is striking as the only context in which the divine name is used in a genitival ('YHWH of...') relation with another noun; the HB was very dismissive of the Baals of this place and that.

'The whole earth is full of his glory': is this a claim to universalism, or would 'land' be a better translation than

'earth'? Whatever the original intention, the larger claim soon came to be established. Kābôd (glory) is also a significant word, being closely associated with the Jerusalem temple and its worship: 'in his temple all say "Glory"' (Ps 29:9; cf. 72:19).

(6:4-7) v. 4, the language here is very characteristic of the theophany, the manifestation of the divine presence to humanity: the shaking, the smoke. v. 5, appropriate to the theophany, too, is the human response, expressing fear and inadequacy in the divine presence: cf. Moses in Ex 3:33, Samson's parents in Judg 13. Both points are brought out in 'my eyes have seen the king': human limitations in the presence of the divine, but also fear, since to be brought into the presence of any king might be a situation of danger. The literary input becomes clear with the reference to 'a people of unclean lips'. The prophet himself will have his uncleanness purged, but in this vision at least there is no such reprieve for the people. It needs the whole book, and the promise of the end of punishment in ch. 40 in particular, to bring about any such remission. vv. 6-7, there follows the rite of purification. Though the details of the language and actions described are quite different, there are similarities here with the accounts of the call of Jeremiah and of Ezekiel. No particular theory of atonement for sin is here implied; it is the fact of such cleansing that is all-important.

(6:8-10) Here we see a difference from Jeremiah and Ezekiel; they express reluctance, whereas here the prophet is pictured as actively volunteering. There is an obvious link with another passage describing the divine council, 1 Kings 22 with its volunteering spirit, and this similarity extends to the content of the message. In the 1 Kings passage the recipients are misled because the spirit is lying; here again the messenger is to prevent the people from receiving the true import of the message. If this passage were autobiographical we should have to suppose that the prophet was speaking with heavy irony; much more likely these are the reflections of a later editor, seeking to find a possible explanation for an otherwise incomprehensible series of events leading to the exile and accompanying disasters. So v. 10 emphasizes that every possible way by which 'this people' (here, as often, used in a dismissive way) could have grasped the message has been blocked. There was then no way in which disaster could be avoided. But that is, of course, not the end of the story: in 43:8 and elsewhere in the latter part of the book we shall hear of a glorious future for this people who are so blind and deaf.

(6:11-12) To use a further question is a frequent stylistic device (cf. Moses in Ex 3), here used less as a request for information than as a way of stressing the totality of the inevitable disaster. The form of the question, 'how long', reminds us of the lament Psalms (e.g. Ps 79:5), as the community begins to realize the full impact of the disaster. The reference to exile, implicit in what has preceded, becomes explicit with v. 12. As in 2 Chr 36 the exile is here pictured as total, with 'emptiness in the midst of the land'. This is a poetic way of expressing the seriousness of what occurred rather than a precise statement of prosaic fact.

(6:13) This verse presents a major textual problem which cannot be dealt with in detail here (see Emerton 1982 for a 34-page study of this one verse which apologizes for its super-ficiality). The problem is not just a modern one, for the last part of the verse is omitted by the ancient Greek translation, the Septuagint, and interpreters through the ages, including modern translations, have differed sharply in their understanding. (NEB bracketed part of the verse and omitted the last phrase entirely.) In the first part of the verse it seems as if the disaster outlined in the preceding verses is intensified: even if a tenth survived they would be subject to further destruction. The last phrase introduces a note of hope for the 'holy seed'. Though no doubt a later addition this chimes in well with the hopefulness of the final form of the book as a whole.

(7:1-9) The difference between commentators, already noted at the beginning of ch. 6, continues here. Whereas this narrative account has traditionally been seen as part of the Isaiah Denkschrift, or memorial, deriving substantially from the prophet himself, others have seen here a late narrative, dependent on 2 Kings for its outline, and part of an Isaiah 'legend' found also in chs. 20; 36-9. Its particular concern is to show Ahaz as an unworthy member of the Davidic line in sharp contrast to his much more worthy son and successor Hezekiah.

v. 1, the reference to the attack by foreign kings on Jerusalem is based on 2 Kings 16:5; the episode is often referred to as the 'Syro-Ephraimite war'. It is often supposed that the objective of the two kings was to draw Judah into a coalition which might resist the Assyrian threat, but this remains speculative—there is little direct evidence in support of this interpretation (Tomes 1993). In the last phrase the Hebrew actually says 'he [i.e. presumably Ahaz] could not fight for it', which might imply that Jerusalem had been captured, but the Dead Sea scrolls Isaiah and most of the versions read 'they could not fight against it', bringing out the idea that Jerusalem was inviolable. v. 2, there are difficulties in translation also with this verse. 'Allied itself with' is not at all the normal meaning of Hebrew nāḥâ (guide), and most translations have been shaped by their general sense of the overall context. There is actually no reference to Ahaz in this verse; it is the 'house of David' whose heart shook. v. 3, 'Shear-jashub' means 'a remnant shall return', an expression found also in 10:21. The name is significant as showing that there will be those who survive the inevitable disaster. It is striking that the encounter with Ahaz takes place at exactly the same spot as that with Hezekiah in 36:2. While it is obviously possible that this was a recognized place for diplomatic business to be carried out, it seems much more likely that the link was a literary one, aimed at bringing out the contrast in subsequent behaviour between Ahaz and Hezekiah.

vv. 4-6, the message 'be quiet, do not fear' in many ways encapsulates the Isaianic message; cf. 30:15, where the same word for 'quietness' is used. It is making religious claims, as against the 'evil plotting' of the community's enemies. Pekah is referred to dismissively as 'the son of Remaliah' and not given his own name: perhaps a sign of southern hostility to northern pretensions. We know nothing for certain of 'the son of Tabeel', but it is at least possible that he was a member of the Tobiad family, referred to in various post-exilic texts (cf. Neh 2:10) and known as rivals of the Jerusalem establishment (Mazar 1957). The original form of this pretender's name is uncertain (perhaps Tab-el, 'God is good'), but it is—surely deliberately?—misspelt in the MT to mean 'son of a no-good'.

vv. 7–9, the poetic oracle in v. 7 is so generally worded as to be applicable to a variety of situations, and the particular point of the passages naming the 'head' of the different countries is not clear, though it is surely derogatory. Inserted in the middle is what is usually taken to be a prose gloss, alluding to an event which took place 65 years after the Syro-Ephraimite war. Possibly the reference is to the campaigns in Palestine of Esar-haddon of Assyria c.669 BCE (cf. Ezra 4:2). An alternative understanding of this and other passages that specify a period of time for their fulfilment (e.g. 7:16; 8:4) is to note their similarity with the Mesopotamian divinatory texts known as adannus. These laid down a period of time during which the 'prophecy' could be regarded as valid (Cryer 1994: 293).

The obscurities of the first part of these verses suddenly clear away with the categorical statement in v. 9. The Hebrew is even more dramatic than an English translation can be, with a wordplay which NRSV does hint at. The verb (the same in each clause) translated 'stand firm' and 'stand at all' is that from which the word 'Amen' derives: 'If you will not be firm, you will not be confirmed.' The sentence is taken up by the Chronicler and made the basis for a sermon (2 Chr 20:20).

(7:10–17) Here we have a new section in which Isaiah is not mentioned by name at all. NRSV refers to him at v. 13, but as the margin makes clear he is not named in the Hebrew text; the 'he' of that verse is YHWH. The whole of this section, together with vv. 18–25, is a reflection on a common theme rather than a continuous narrative. v. 11, if a link with vv. 1–9 is intended the sign envisaged will have been something to show the discomfiture of the two kings. The biblical use of 'signs' is a complex one: they are sometimes regarded as an important way of showing the divine intention, whereas at other times (not least in the NT) they are regarded with suspicion (Mt 12:39!). Zechariah asks for a sign (Lk 1) and is struck dumb for it. v. 12, Ahaz's answer here appears to be wholly admirable; one might expect that Hezekiah would be condemned for asking for a sign (38:22) yet his action is apparently commendable. Quasi-psychological explanations claiming that Ahaz had the wrong mental attitude are not based on anything in the text. The whole episode is extremely artificial in historical terms. It is, as it were, pre-determined that Ahaz's attitude will be wrong.

vv. 13–14a, the strongly negative wording in this section prepares us for as strongly threatening a sign: the condemnation of the 'house of David' (cf. v. 2); the 'wearying' of God, with the implication that the divine patience will soon run out; the 'therefore', often used to introduce a threat. All these features suggest that a negative outcome will follow. v. 14b, in line with what has just been said some scholars have attempted to construe the original meaning of the sign in negative terms. The name Immanuel could be translated 'May God be with us', a prayer for deliverance; and the food ('curds and honey') be taken to imply all that was available in a devastated land. Overwhelmingly, however, the interpretative tradition has taken this sign as one of promise and hope for the future, and it is that tradition that will be followed here. (Werlitz 1992: 241, lists 29 different issues which have divided critical scholars in their interpretation of this verse, and that is quite apart from the division between conservative and critical scholars which is here very deep-seated.)

If the passage is seen as a contemporary memoir, then it would most naturally refer to a young woman who was pregnant at the time it was uttered, and this in effect means the wife of either the prophet (so Clements 1980a) or the king, with the possibility that Hezekiah, as the child to be born, is being alluded to. If, as is suggested here, the passage originates from a later period, then precise reference to a particular young woman is not required, and it may be better to translate 'a young woman' with the sense of 'any young woman'. The word 'almâ' may well have reference to the social status of the woman referred to, but it does not imply virginity. The Greek translation of Isaiah, for reasons which are still unknown, here used the word parthenos, which does mean 'a virgin', and it was that tradition which was followed by Mt 1:23, and has been of enormous importance in the Christian interpretative tradition; its use in countless Christmas services still attests its evocative power. If historical-critical criteria are to be paramount this should be regarded as a mis-interpretation; if a reader-response approach is accepted it is presumably a perfectly proper way to read the text.

vv. 15–17, 'curds and honey' could imply a desperate search for food in a devastated land, but they could be royal food (as is perhaps better implied by the 'butter and honey' of AV) (Ringgren 1956: 27 for the idea of this as food of the gods in Babylonian texts). v. 16 is difficult, and it looks as if in part at least an addition has been made to provide an explicit link with the Syro-Ephraimite conflict. There is no obvious sense in which the two kings could be said to have 'a' land. In v. 17, too, there has been elaboration, particularly in the abrupt reference to the king of Assyria. We can see in these verses a tension between a historicizing approach, wishing to give the section a specific rooting in the events of the eighth century, and a thematic understanding more concerned with the hope for the future of the community.

(7:18–25) These four short oracles bring back the 'in that day' theme, but our approach to it is inevitably affected by the context. The 'day' is no longer simply the unpredictable 'day of the LORD' of ch. 2. Now the understanding is shaped by, on the one hand, the threat posed by Assyria and other foreign enemies, and on the other by the hopes expressed through the birth of the child. But the predominant note is one of threat. v. 18 envisages threats from both Assyria and Egypt—the latter, often a hoped-for ally, is unexpected in the context. The verse should be read in the light of the much more optimistic picture in 19:23–5. It has been suggested (Matthews and Benjamin 1993: 104) that the reference to shaving the 'hair of the feet' (i.e. genitalia) (v. 20) is a euphemism for castration. There is irony in the suggestion that Assyria, traditionally hired as Ahaz's protector (2 Kings 16:7) should treat its dependant thus. vv. 21–2 offer the possibility of reading either a threat or a promise; 'curds and honey' reflects back to the similar ambiguity of v. 15, and the remnant theme could be either hopeful or threatening. But there is no ambiguity in vv. 23–5: general dereliction is inevitable. We are reminded of the 'briers and thorns' of 5:6, and recognize that the passage offers its fullest sense in the context of the devastation of the exile.

(8:1–4) We revert here to the first-person material, found in ch. 6 but not in 7. The general sense of the requirement here is clear, though the detail is obscure. The expression translated ‘in common characters’ is literally ‘with the pen of a man’ (thus AV, RV). It may imply ordinary human writing, or a very slight emendation would give ‘unerasable writing’ (DCH 344). Of the two cited as witnesses Uriah is mentioned also in 2 Kings 16:10, Zechariah is more confusing. The same parentage is attributed to the prophet Zechariah (1:1, 7) and to the Zechariah referred to in the NT as an innocent martyr (Mt 23:35). The present passage may be the historical original, or itself part of the literary development. vv. 3–4 show striking similarities with 7:14–15, so much so that it has been argued that this is a variant version of the same story. But the heavily symbolic name given to the unsuspecting child has markedly different overtones: ‘the spoil speeds, the prey hastens’.

(8:5–8) What follows is printed in prose in NRSV but as poetry in REB and some other translations. This has two implications. We are reminded of the uncertainty of our criteria for determining poetry. Perhaps more important, our approach may be different; we expect factual information from prose, whereas poetry is recognized as allusive and opaque. This passage starts with the idea of rejection, though it is not made clear in what sense the people have rejected Shiloah, the local Jerusalem stream. But ‘melt in fear’ depends on an emendation of the Hebrew text, which has ‘re-joice in’ (so RSV; NRSV rather disingenuously has ‘Meaning of Hebrew uncertain’). Perhaps the condemnation is of those in Jerusalem (dismissively ‘this people’) who believe that political solutions of their problems are feasible. But with v. 7 we find the contrast between the gentle stream and God’s judgement pictured as a mighty river, destroying all before it. The metaphor becomes a mixed one as the river turns into a bird with wings, and the section ends with a puzzling reference to Immanuel. Whatever its original force the term here has connotations of judgement.

(8:9–15) vv. 9–10 (poetry in NRSV as well as in other versions) scarcely fit the context; they are an oracle of judgement warning all those who conspire against the community that the presence of Immanuel (‘God is with us’) will overthrow their plans. vv. 11–15, the theme of conspiracy is taken further, but this time it is addressed against the community itself (or at least some element within it). Though there are details in the passage which are obscure, the general thrust is clear. Political solutions to the community’s problems are no solutions; they are to trust in YHWH. ‘Let him be your fear, and let him be your dread.’

(8:16–18) These verses have played an important part in shaping theories about the composition of Isaiah; indeed they have been required to bear more weight than they can legitimately stand. They have been read as requiring the ‘sealing’ of the prophet’s words among his disciples, with the implication that they were to guard them and in due course publish them. Isaiah himself, it is argued, withdrew from public ministry, committing his testimony to his followers. Even where so sweeping a conclusion as this has been avoided, it has still been customary to see here the end of the supposed autobiographical Denkschrift which extended from 6:1. Such interpretations seem to read too much into the material. In the context of claims to political solutions to the community’s problems the Isaiah tradition is maintaining that the prophetic testimony and teaching (tôrâ) will in God’s good time be seen as offering the true solution to problems, even if it is necessary to wait for and hope in the Lord, whose presence seems to be hidden. This theme of the hiddenness of God as compatible with saving power will be taken further at 45:15, but remains a problem for the faithful community throughout the book (64:5). Meanwhile, both the prophet himself and the children who have been referred to (Shear-jashub; Maher-shalal-hash-baz; perhaps also Immanuel) are clear signs that God’s presence remains in Jerusalem. This fairly standard religious message may be less exciting than the elaborate compositional theories, but seems better to express what is actually said. It also fits the context of the following verses better; there is no need to take 8:18 as a major closure.

(8:19–22) This passage serves as a kind of appendix to the main unit just completed, expressing in new language the familiar Isaianic theme of the right resources to use to ensure God’s favour. Ruled out here is any kind of necromancy, magical practices which claimed that the dead could somehow give them solutions to the uncertainties of life. The last part of v. 19 can be seen as a continuing search by the people for answers by turning to false gods, or it may be part of the answer, in which case we should read ‘God’ for ‘gods’. However that may be it is clear that the answer is found in v. 21: it is in the tôrâ and the instruction of the prophetic tradition (cf. v. 16) that God’s will can be found. An awkward transition leads into a warning: nowhere else can deliverance be found. The climax of the threat, in v. 22b, is very similar to that already expressed in 5:30.

(9:1) is 8:23 in the Hebrew; the natural division comes within this verse. Its first part (down to ‘anguish’) relates to the threat that has preceded. But the difficulty with this verse is in what follows. Some contrast is clearly implied between ‘former’ and ‘latter’ time. One understanding that has been very influential (Alt 1953) is that this was an introduction to the poetry that follows. Where once Zebulun and Naphtali, in the north of Israel, had been oppressed, soon there would be a glorious deliverance. Whether so precise a historical reconstruction is feasible must remain doubtful (Kaiser 1983). Part of the problem arises from the fact that the two verbs (‘brought into contempt’, ‘will make glorious’) could be understood quite differently, because the basic meaning of the second verb (k-b-d) is to ‘make heavy’, and so it would be possible to read this verse as saying that the burden already imposed on the far north will become even heavier as it spreads south, into the ‘way of the Sea’, Transjordan, and Galilee. These names may be those of Assyrian provincial districts. If that reading is right the transformation from threat to glorious promise does not begin until v. 2.

(9:2–7) How much of this Psalm-like poem refers to earlier passages must remain doubtful. Are the ‘people who walked in darkness’ those described in 9:1? Does the child bear any relation to the one mentioned in 7:14? What is certain is that this is a psalm of thanksgiving, closely comparable to such a poem as Ps 2. v. 2, ‘deep darkness’; the Hebrew word(s) šal māwet are the same as are found in Ps 23 and traditionally translated ‘shadow of death’. ‘Death’ should probably not be taken literally; the expression is a kind of superlative, meaning 'deepest shadow'. v. 3, this is one of the most famous 'mis-translations' of the older versions, which introduced a misleading negative: 'and not increased the joy'. This nonsensical reading can still commonly be heard in Christmas services, though all later translations, such as NRSV, have followed the alternative form of Hebrew which is literally 'increased joy to it'. A successful harvest and the time of dividing the spoil after a battle had been won were the traditional times of rejoicing.

vv. 4–5 are printed as poetry but may rather be a prosaic addition, linking the scenes of joy in the poem with comparable occasions from the people's history. 'The day of Midian' is most probably a reference to the story of Gideon in Judg 6–8, a rare example for Isaiah of such a cross-reference. Though the joy has been compared to the gaining of booty, this verse somewhat illogically looks for an end to any such fighting in the future.

v. 6, here is the climax of the Psalm. If, as is quite likely, God is the speaker, then what seems like an announcement of a birth may more properly be understood as a coronation or enthronement of an earthly king (cf. Ps 2:7), where the king is proclaimed as God's son. What follows is a series of titles, possibly comparable to the titles given to Egyptian pharaohs (von Rad 1966a). Four throne-names are given to the newly crowned ruler: 'Wonderful Counsellor' speaks of the potential achievements of the king; the word translated 'wonderful' comes from the same root as that regularly used of God's mighty deliverance at the Exodus. 'Mighty God' may imply divine kingship, for which there is some evidence in ancient Israel (cf. Ps 45:6), or 'God' here may be a kind of superlative: 'Divine Warrior'. 'Everlasting Father' brings out the theme of the king as protector, 'father', of his people; and 'Prince of Peace' implies both freedom from war and the prosperity implicit in šālôm. In traditional Judaism, these oracles were applied to Hezekiah, around whom an elaborate series of legends developed. In Christianity, the belief of the early followers of Jesus concerning his status made it natural for these words to be applied to him also, though NT allusions are only implicit (Jacob 1987: 141).

v. 7, the Egyptian titles comparable to this were usually fivefold, and the unusual form of the Hebrew words at the beginning of this verse has led some scholars to suppose that there are traces of a fifth title here, which has been lost either accidentally or through deliberate rearrangement. In any case the Davidic link, hitherto implicit, is now brought out clearly. There are close links with 2 Sam 7, emphasizing the permanence of the covenant with David's house and with Ps 72:1, where justice and righteousness are stressed as royal qualities. The last phrase in the verse is found again at 37:32, surely a deliberate cross-reference emphasizing the certainty of God's protection of his chosen ones against enemy assault.

(9:8–12) The tone changes dramatically as we return to a passage of threat similar to those found in ch. 5; indeed, it has often been held that 6:1–9:7 is to be seen as an insertion into a series of threats. The refrain at v. 12 has already occurred at 5:25. This section seems to use the fate of the northern kingdom of Israel as an awful warning to the south. It looks as if the basic poetry of the oracle, which could apply to a variety of situations, has been made more explicit by a number of specific additions, referring to the north ('Ephraim and the inhabitants of Samaria') as the victims and the Arameans and Philistines as the attackers. At a later stage a redactor has linked this with the preceding passage by referring to the enemies of Rezin of Damascus, but NRSV dismisses this part of the text to the margin.

(9:13–17) Another oracle, closely related to what has preceded, sets out one view of the reasons for disaster. The people did not 'turn' (the same root šûb, as is used of the child Shear-jashub, 7:3) and therefore the whole structure of society was at risk. A particular concern was the danger from prophets; with conflicting messages, all claiming prophetic inspiration, whom was one to believe? The hostile way in which prophets are referred to here (and cf. 28:7) must make it questionable whether the individual Isaiah was himself a prophet. Would he have spoken so slightly of a group to which he himself belonged? Perhaps it was only later, possibly Deuteronomistic, shaping which brought all the great figures together under the heading 'prophets' (Carroll 1992: 90–1).

(9:18–21) The briers and thorns, so frequent as an Isaianic image of desolation, are recalled here, though this time they are themselves consumed rather than symbolizing the destruction of others. v. 21 might refer to some specific historical event in the former northern kingdom, but seems more likely to be a general picture of the kind of anarchy portrayed throughout this section.

(10:1–4) This section functions as a bridge between the series of passages ending with the same refrain (here in v. 4), and the attack on Assyria, with which it shares an introduction (NRSV, rather blandly, 'Ah'). As so often in these early chapters of the book, it is the deprivation of justice and of mīšpāṭ (here 'right') that is the main gravamen of the prophetic condemnation.

(10:5–11) A new section, which stretches throughout the chapter, is here introduced. All the major prophetic books are concerned not only with Israel but also with the surrounding nations, and Isaiah is no exception. The book is anxious to establish the point that the downfall of Israel and Judah does not thereby validate Assyrian or Babylonian claims. They are no more than the rod used by YHWH in his anger. Whereas other prophets, such as Amos, referred in general terms to the inevitability of destruction, Isaiah is quite specific in its reference to Assyria. vv. 5–7 bring out the double point that Israel fully deserved her punishment as a godless nation, and that this was inflicted by Assyria as God's own instrument. The 'spoil' and 'plunder' of v. 6 remind us of the child Maher-shalal-hash-baz in 8:1–4, where the same words are used. But from v. 8 the fairly standard form of invective takes a new direction. This is not just another attack on YHWH's own people; instead it is the Assyrian who is to be condemned out of his own mouth. vv. 8–11 picture the Assyrian plans to 'cut off nations not a few', and a list is provided climaxing in Samaria and Jerusalem, yet with the Assyrians themselves imagining that the nations they have already conquered (Calno, Carchemish, and the rest, all cities in northern Syria) are more significant than Samaria and Jerusalem. This type of comparison is an important theme in the Isaiah tradition, with its great esteem for Jerusalem; it will recur again in another 'Assyrian' speech at 37:15. In effect a double charge is aimed against the Assyrians. Their boasting is what the Greeks would call hubris, a falsely based pride in one's own capacity. To it is added blasphemy, the supposition that Jerusalem has nothing more than idols. (Unless, of course, this is to be seen as an Isaianic dig against false worship in Jerusalem.)

(10:12–15) The two speeches by the Assyrian are linked by v. 12, which serves to remind the reader that there is a deeper purpose underlying the devastation which Jerusalem has undergone. The claim in vv. 13–14 is close to the claims actually made in Assyrian victory-inscriptions; it is turned upside-down by the saying in v. 15, a close parallel to which, in both form and substance, is found in a widespread collection of wisdom-sayings known as the sayings of Ahiqar, warning against the danger involved in human pride (ANET 429a). Though the Assyrian reference is not lost, the next section develops it in different ways. A continuation of the present theme is found in 14:24–7.

(10:16–19) In its present context this threat, introduced by the characteristic 'therefore', has to be understood as directed against Assyria. But there is little specific to Assyria in it, and it may have originated as another of Isaiah's many threats against Judah, and been transformed at a later stage (Eissfeldt 1965: 312). Alternatively, the sheer scope of destruction here gives the passage an eschatological dimension which some will see as a late development within the tradition. There is clearly little room for hope in the picture of a remnant with which the passage ends.

(10:20–3) But as we have already seen the notion of a remnant can be interpreted in more than one way, and this passage provides the classic example of such a double reading. In 20–1 there is clearly a note of hope, and the passage is linked in a way that is not immediately obvious from the English translation to the hopes expressed in the Immanuel section. 'A remnant will return' is Shear-jashub, as in 7:3; 'the mighty God' is El Gibbor, one of the titles given to the newly crowned king in 9:6. Historical-critical interpreters have been very aware of the tension between the two parts of this passage, the hope of 20–1 being directly followed by the dire threat of 22–3, and have felt it necessary to dismiss one part (usually the first) as a late, secondary addition. But a reading of the book as a whole may not be so disconcerted by this tension. A remnant could imply both destruction and a hope beyond that destruction; this was an important message for the Second Temple community.

(10:24–7a) This prose passage links back both to the Assyrian theme of 10:5–15 and to 9:2–7, with its reference to Midian and the throwing off of the yoke (cf. 9:4). The introductory 'therefore' on this occasion does not herald a threat; rather the people are told not to be afraid. The Hebrew phrase is identical with that used to Ahaz in 7:4 (who rejected the opportunity) and to Hezekiah in 37:6 (who will be more responsive). We find a reminder of the deliverance at the Exodus (a rare allusion in the early chapters of Isaiah) as a paradigm for what the community can expect when present, temporary afflictions are past.

(10:27b–32) v. 27 is very difficult to follow in the Hebrew, and the division proposed by NRSV offers as likely a solution as any. It takes the first part as the conclusion of the preceding prose, the last phrase as an introduction to the following poem, though the reference to Rimmon is entirely conjectural. The poem is a vivid account of the supposed progress of an army attacking Judah from the north; how the foe 'from the north' of Jer 4 and elsewhere might actually manifest itself. It would be unwise to base military strategy on such a list of names, some of which are chosen for their sound and opportunities for word-play rather than their strategic significance. For this reason the discussions in some commentaries as to whose campaign is here described should be treated with scepticism. The shaking of the aggressor's fist (v. 32) is, perhaps deliberately, ambiguous. It is certainly a threat, but may also be understood as a gesture of frustration because of inability to capture the holy city.

(10:33–4) Many passages in Isaiah depend for their understanding upon the context in which they are found, and this is one such. Placed elsewhere it could readily have been understood as a condemnation of the community's own leaders with their arrogant pretensions (cf. 2:13, where this same comparison with trees is made, the word there translated 'lofty' being here rendered 'tallest'). Following the account of an enemy army it is much more natural to read it as a warning to that enemy, that its failure was determined. It will be disturbing for ecologists to find this destruction of trees attributed to God's own action.

(11:1–9) A third passage, following 7:14 and 9:2–7, which has been interpreted messianically, and which certainly speaks of aspirations for the future of the Davidic line. We know little of such aspirations in the Second Temple period, but this passage seems to come from that time, with its reference to the cut-down stump of Jesse most likely implying the end of the monarchy in 587 BCE. In any case the poem as a whole draws out the ideal characteristics to be envisaged in a royal figure. vv. 1–3a, as indicated the most natural reading of the 'shoot from the stump' is that the Davidic line had been cut down, presumably at the exile, but that some among the community were convinced that that was not the end of the story. The child to be born would be imbued with God's spirit, as was David himself in 1 Sam 16:13. The Christian tradition has spoken of 'sevenfold gifts of the Spirit' and used vv. 2–3a as a basis, but only six gifts are in fact mentioned here. They are the characteristic charismatic qualities of the king, and of all those pictured as being especially close to YHWH (e.g. Moses and the elders, Num 11:25–30; Elijah and Elisha, 2 Kings 2:15). There are also close links with the wisdom tradition, shown not only by the use of the word 'wisdom' itself but also by 'understanding', 'counsel', and 'fear of the Lord'—all terms particularly associated with, for example, Proverbs. But here they are God's direct gift, not dependent on the skills of human counsellors. vv. 3b–5, what is meant by being endowed with the divine spirit is then spelt out. As often in Isaiah there are close links with the royal Psalms. The stress on just judgement, with particular concern for the poor and meek, and the display of sedeq (righteousness) and ēmûnâ (faithfulness) are characteristic both of the Isaiah tradition and of such a Psalm as 72:12–14. In v. 4 a very minor emendation, adopted by REB but not NRSV, would give 'smite the ruthless' ('ārîš) for 'strike the earth' ('ereš), and this would both improve the parallelism (with 'kill the wicked') and give better general sense. vv. 6–9, but the just rule of YHWH goes further than the establishment of true Davidic rule in Jerusalem. There follows an eschatological picture, looking forward to a restoration of paradise conditions in which the primeval way of life would be restored. There are important links here with 65:25, showing how these aspirations draw the whole book together. The ancient Israelites come down to us in their writings as pretty hard-headed people, but such passages as this show that they had the capacity to dream of a better world, and this capacity is particularly illustrated by the prophets. In addition to various passages in Isaiah, Hos 2:18 and Am 9:13 breathe something of the same spirit. Murray (1992: 103–14) offers a sensitive spelling out of the implications of this passage, both in its larger biblical context and in terms of human duties towards animals. He notes the link with the creation stories of Genesis provided by the vegetarian habits of the lion (v. 7), and the way in which the passage brings out both peace from the threat of wild animals and the prospect of living at peace with animals.

(11:10) 'On that day' language is again used, but now in a hopeful sense. The 'root of Jesse' figure, thought of in vv. 1–9 as imminent, will be part of the manifestation of the great day of YHWH.

(11:11–16) This passage displays close links with chs. 40–55, with the raising of a signal to the nations (cf. 49:22 and also 5:25) and the more general theme of the gathering of dispersed exiles (Williamson 1994). The reference to the 'coastlands' and the expression 'outcasts of Israel' are also reminiscent of the later chapters of the book. Here exile is no longer a threat but a reality, and it can be seen as a prelude to future promise of restoration. As in Ezek 37, part of the promise for the future is the removal of hostility between north (Ephraim) and south (Judah). The theme of a highway linking the lands where the people had been scattered is an important one throughout Isaiah (cf. 19:23; 49:11), and is a valuable illustration, not only of the unity of the whole book, but also of the way in which what had once been a threat—a means of deportation—can be transformed into a promise of peace between formerly rival nations. The word here used for a 'highway', mēšillā, is especially used of religious, processional ways.

(Ch. 12) This brief chapter consists of one, or possibly two, short psalms which round off the first part of the book. Much of the language used is that typical of the Psalms, with their emphasis on giving thanks to and praising God. But v. 2 deserves special attention for its similarity to Ex 15:2, the Song of the Sea. Just as that poem rounded off the account of God's salvation of his people at the Exodus, so here the first part of the story is rounded off. And the word 'salvation' (yěšū'ā) is striking, because of its close similarity to the name Isaiah (yěša'yāhū). The words of Isaiah are potentially words of salvation. (Ackroyd 1987: 94–7, rightly characterizes this as part of the 'portrait of a prophet'.) In addition some have seen links with the royal material earlier in these chapters by claiming this section as part of an enthronement ceremony. However that may be, the links between prophetism and the cult, once thought of as bitterly opposed, are clearly brought out.

(Chs. 13–26) The theme of YHWH's dealings with his own people, in terms both of punishment and of salvation, is now set aside, and a fresh section dealing with other nations begins with the formal introduction in 13:1. Each of the major prophetic collections in the HB has a group of 'Oracles against Foreign Nations', traditionally the most neglected part of those collections. To some extent this neglect is understandable—not everyone will want to explore the history of Moab in the eighth century BCE—but it has unfortunate consequences. It overlooks what must have been perceived as an important element in the prophetic vocation, most clearly expressed in Jeremiah when he was appointed a 'prophet to the nations' (Jer 1:5), and it also fails to recognize that these oracles contain major themes (not always very palatable ones) in the understanding of God and his relation not only to Israel, but to the world beyond the nation's boundaries. The origin of such passages may lie in ritual curses against enemies in times of war, but that context has been largely overlaid, and the oracles against the nations now fulfil a predominantly literary function. (Davies 1989 offers a useful discussion of these oracles, considering their place within Isaiah and their larger significance.)

(13:1) This formal introduction, though it might refer only to chs. 13–14, is almost certainly intended to relate to the whole section to ch. 23. It is described as an oracle (maššā'), a term used several times in these chapters to introduce passages relating to the different nations (e.g. 15:1; 17:1). It is striking that this first and much the longest passage relates to Babylon. Some have maintained that material originally relating to Assyria has been reapplied to Babylon, for in the eighth century Babylon was a potential ally rather than a threat, and it was only later that it became the great enemy. But if literary rather than historical considerations are introduced the significance of this title within the book as a whole becomes apparent; in chs. 40–55, the climax of the book, Babylon was indeed the great enemy, and here we are being introduced to that point in the very beginning of the material dealing with foreign nations. It is striking also that Babylon seems already to have been taking on symbolic significance as the representative enemy, in a way that Nineveh, the Assyrian capital, did not, except in Jonah.

(13:2–22) There seems to be nothing specific to Babylon in the opening section, vv. 2–5, or indeed through much of this chapter. There are numerous similarities between this section and Jer 50–1, and it has been suggested that each of these sections functions as a general expression of divine judgement alongside the more specific accompanying oracles against particular nations (Vermeulen 1989: 31–2). This might help to explain the relation between this general passage and the more specific oracle concerning Babylon in ch. 21. The point is stressed that war is inevitable, and that God himself is involved. The picture of universal destruction is that associated with the apocalypses, and many have therefore argued that this is a very late passage, from the time when apocalyptic language was becoming widespread. Certainly this passage is not concerned with any empirical Babylon; it has become the symbol of human pride and imperialism (Gosse 1988: 167). The passage reaches its climax with the destruction of 'the whole earth'. vv. 6–16, the nature of the destruction is now spelt out in greater detail. First, it is associated with the 'day of the Lord', a theme already often found in chs. 2–11. The form of words seems to have been widely used, for the same expression is found at Joel 1:15 and (partially) at Ezek 30:3 and Zeph 1:7. A rich variety of expressions is then used to describe the destruction regarded as inevitable; it would be rash indeed to try to tie them to any specific historical circumstances. At the end of this section we come across a ghastly image familiar from another part of the Bible: the ‘dashing in pieces’ of the infants (v. 16) is reminiscent of Ps 137:9: different verb, same appalling sentiments.

vv. 17–22, this last part of the chapter contains expressions making the reference to Babylon more specific. The Medes played an important part in the overthrow of the Assyrian Empire in the late seventh century BCE and were a powerful force in warfare and politics until the rise of Cyrus c.550 BCE. At some point in the Isaiah tradition it was envisaged that the Medes would be more important in the overthrow of Babylon than in fact proved to be the case. The legend of ‘Darius the Mede’ as victorious over Babylon in Dan 5:31 may owe its origin to this passage. It is possible that the references in the later part of the book of Isaiah to things prophesied in ‘former times’ and ‘long ago’ are to passages of this kind (North 1964: 161, makes this suggestion with regard to Isa 45:21). The dramatic tension of the book is increased by the likening of Babylon’s fate to that of Sodom and Gomorrah. Previously (1:9–10) it was Jerusalem that had been compared with Sodom and Gomorrah; now that fate, symbolic of total destruction, is transferred to Babylon, as the implications of God’s ‘day’ are more widely realized. Babylon did eventually become desolate, but not until much later than any possible dating for Isaiah. During much of the Second Temple period it remained an important, though no longer a capital, city. The imagery of vv. 20–2 should be recognized as such, without any attempt to relate it to historical developments.

(14:1–2) A prose passage takes the opportunity to give encouragement to Israel by contrasting its fate with that just described as awaiting Babylon. This is a passage comparable to the more nationalistic sections of chs. 40–55 (e.g. 49:22–6), which gloat over the expected doom of the oppressors.

(14:3–4a) Still in prose, this section invites Israel to take up a māšāl (taunt) against Babylon, and more specifically its king. A māšāl is a poem setting out ‘some form of retribution which will make the person concerned an object-lesson in the abuse of power’ (A. R. Johnson 1955: 166). It is basically a prophetic form, warning of the inevitability of disaster; only by concentrating on the effect rather than the purpose can it legitimately be described as a taunt. The basic theme in the poem which follows is a common one, both in the HB and in the ancient world more generally: the attempt of a human being, often as here an enemy king, to make himself like God, and the inevitable fate which attends such presumption. Ezek 28 and 31 are variants on the same theme, found also in prose form in the story of Nebuchadnezzar’s madness in Dan 4. It has sometimes been suggested that a similar theme underlies the Garden of Eden story in Gen 3.

(14:4b–21) The word ‘insolence’ provides a good example of the way in which the Dead Sea scrolls have helped in the interpretation of Isaiah. The Hebrew text gives no clear meaning, and older English versions had ‘golden city’ here. But a slight change, already suggested by some scholars and supported by the Dead Sea scrolls, offers an excellent parallel. In the following description of the fate which awaits the fallen ruler it would be unwise to try to offer any link with particular individuals; this is what is in store for all who make such arrogant claims. Sheol (v. 9) is the place of the dead. It is not in itself a place of punishment, though it is striking that in the HB it is most commonly those who are disapproved of who are described as coming to Sheol (Barr 1992: 29). Here all earthly distinctions are ironed out. Part of the taunt is that the rēpa‘im, the ‘shades’, can treat the king of Babylon as on a level with themselves. The inhabitants of Sheol are clearly not extinct; they are fully conscious of what is happening and are able to taunt the fallen king.

v. 12 has played an important part in the history of interpretation, being understood as an illustration of the theme of Lucifer, the fallen angel. (The theme actually owes more to the influence of Milton’s Paradise Lost than to any direct biblical references.) The whole passage, vv. 12–21, has a widespread mythological background, reflecting stories about Venus, the ‘day-star’, visible just before dawn, and driven away by the power of the rising sun. The ‘heights of Zaphon’ is the holy mountain mentioned also in the Ugaritic texts as the assembling-place of the gods. In Ps 48:2 the same words are used to identify Mount Zion as the true divine dwelling-place. The ‘Most High’ of v. 14 is ‘ēlyōn, a divine title also claimed by the HB as appropriate for YHWH (Gen 14:18; Ps 91:1). These pretensions are then contrasted with the certain fate of Babylon, which will not even be granted proper burial-rites (v. 20), a matter of very deep concern in the ancient world.

(14:22–3) This brief prose note is usually taken with what precedes, underlining the point that the poem has been addressed to Babylon. It is possible, however, that it is placed here as a deliberate link between the known fate of Assyria, the subject of the following verses, and the still future threat against Babylon (Clements 1989).

(14:24–7) Assyria is now mentioned, though the bulk of this extended section has related to Babylon. Assyrian power will be broken: v. 25b has a clear allusion to the breaking of the yoke from the shoulders as in 9:4 and 10:27. But ‘all the nations’ (v. 26) are under threat. The picture is of the prophet ‘overhearing’ what YHWH has decreed. This is one of a number of passages which have been described as ‘summary-appraisals’ (Childs 1967), offering an outline, in didactic fashion, of YHWH’s intended purpose (‘This is the plan...’).

(14:28) The reference to the death of Ahaz (which should be retained in the text, despite the proposals of many scholars to emend it) is reminiscent of that to the death of Uzziah in 6:1. The date of Ahaz’s death is unknown, but it may be significant that he was succeeded by Hezekiah, in whom such great hopes were placed. It is not easy to see any link between the māšāl (oracle) announced here and the passage which follows.

(14:29–32) The Philistines were ancient enemies of Israel from the time of Saul and David, but little is known of their later history. Here an unknown occasion of rejoicing is said to be only transitory; worse troubles will come, and Judah should avoid becoming entangled with the Philistines. v. 32 looks like a later addition, stressing in psalm-like fashion the inviolability of Zion as a sure refuge (cf. Ps 132:13–15).

(15:1–16:12) These two chapters are directed against Moab, Judah's neighbour east of the Dead Sea, and they pose problems for the interpreter of Isaiah because much of the material in them is found again, with minor variations, in the comparable oracles against foreign nations in Jeremiah: specifically Jer 48. It raises the question of whether much material of this kind was used as required in the Jerusalem cult and could be taken up into different prophetic collections as 'independent adaptation of traditional material' (Jenkins 1989). Much of it reads like a gazetteer of contemporary Moab, but many of the place-names are chosen to bring out specific wordplays. Many of the places referred to are of uncertain location; those seeking more precise details must refer to the larger commentaries (Wildberger 1978: 604 ff.). In comparison with the gloating over the anticipated fate of Babylon in 13–14 here a note of sympathy can be found (15:5; 16:11), alongside a recognition that even worse disasters may be anticipated (15:9). The most striking section in the passage is one which has no parallel in Jeremiah: another messianic passage (16:4b–5) looking forward to a time when devastation will have ceased and a ruler concerned with mišpāt (justice) and sedeq (right), those two key Isaianic terms, will rule 'in the tent of David', an expression without exact parallel elsewhere in Isaiah. Moab's worship is condemned (16:12), but less harshly than the false worship of Israel itself (1:12–17).

(16:13–14) This postscript to the Moab oracles illustrates the development of the tradition. Earlier material was indeed valid, but in a later situation a further devastation of Moab could be anticipated. We have no means of precise dating; we do not know to what the 'three years' refers, though this could be an adannu of the kind we noted as a possibility for 7:8. The same phrase, referring to 'the years of a hired worker' is found in a similar context at 21:16.

(17:1–3) The introductory maššā refers only to Damascus, but the following threat takes in the area of northern Israel also; we are back in the hostilities typified by the Syro-Ephraimite conflict of ch. 7. Indeed if the Hebrew is followed there is a link also with Moab, but 'Aroer' in v. 2, a place in Moab, is usually emended, as by NRSV. It is not clear why some of Israel's neighbours are referred to by the country's name (e.g. Moab), whereas for others the capital is seen as personifying the country (as here, Damascus, the capital of the Aramean kingdom). Damascus fell to the Assyrians in 732 BCE, and many commentators see in this oracle a genuine survival from the eighth century. But Kaiser (1974) points out that it was equally applicable to the condition of Damascus in the fourth century, possibly an earlier nucleus has been reapplied and expanded. The difficult phrase in v. 3 may be intended ironically; the Arameans will be reduced to a remnant (and here surely the theme implies a threat) comparable to the once glorious northern kingdom of Israel.

(17:4–11) There is no further reference to Damascus; instead, the theme of 'that day' is reintroduced, linked with what precedes by the reference to 'glory'. There will be a rich harvest, but the people are at risk of not benefiting from it. The 'Valley of Rephaim' is known from 2 Sam 5:18 as a place near Jerusalem, but the name may be deliberately chosen here: rephaim is the word translated 'shades' in 14:9, and it may be implied that the people will be no better off than the shades. Deut 24:19–20 paints a beautifully generous picture of harvest and gleaning, with the alien, the orphan, and the widow allowed to join in; one may doubt whether such idealism normally prevailed. A further 'in that day' passage, this time in prose, brings out the theme of idolatry, with the hope that in due course the attractions of rival worship will be set aside. The terms used are all part of the standard vocabulary for attacks upon false worship. The 'sacred poles', Heb. āšērīm, will have been wooden representations of the goddess Asherah. In v. 9 the Hebrew text is very uncertain, as can be seen by comparing the text of NRSV with the footnote. NRSV follows the Greek, which may itself have been trying to make sense of a difficult form. However that may be, the section ends by recalling once again the twin themes of a harvest which cannot be shared and of idolatrous worship.

(17:12–14) A fresh oracle on a new theme. The repetition of the last part of 12 at the beginning of 13 may be for emphasis, but is more likely to be an erroneous repetition, and some translations (e.g. REB) omit it. This is a vision of an eschatological battle, comparable to that fought against Gog of Magog in Ezek 38–9, with emphasis on the inviolability of Zion. The passage ends with another summary-appraisal of the type already noted in 14:26. It rounds off the section dealing with Israel's neighbours with an assurance that God would protect his people against those who had plundered them.

(Ch. 18) This chapter lacks the usual introduction, but its application soon becomes clear. Ethiopian dynasties ruled in Egypt from time to time, and this passage concerns them. It is highly artificial: the messengers are apparently from the Ethiopians themselves, but it is odd to describe a people to their own messengers, and no indication is given of the contents of the message or of how it might be answered. Ethiopia was a symbol of distance and strangeness (Am 9:7), and that may well be part of the point here. The passage quickly becomes an oracle of judgement, threatening destruction on a scale usually reserved for the Babylonians and Assyrians. But the chapter ends with a prose addition, picturing the distant Ethiopians acknowledging the supremacy of YHWH on Zion. This theme is found several times in the prophets; we may compare Zech 8:23, and the more specific application to Egypt in Zeph 3:10 and Zech 14:18, and also Ps 68:31. The bringing of gifts from afar is also reminiscent of Isa 60:5–7. During the Second Temple period we know of links between the Jerusalem community and the Jewish colony at Elephantine on the Nile—such links may underlie passages such as this and the others noted.

(Ch. 19) contains some of the most remarkable and neglected material in the whole book of Isaiah. It well illustrates the development of the tradition, from the essentially negative picture found in the opening verses to a remarkably positive assertion concerning both Egypt and Assyria in the conclusion.

(19:1–4) There is no hint of any positive development in this opening oracle. Egypt's idolatrous practice is condemned in terms very similar to those used against Israel (8:19). The Egyptians were famous for their skill in wisdom and counsel; here by contrast they are reduced to internal division and desperate measures to find out what action to take. The 'hard master' and 'fierce king' of v. 4 may well be a reference to the protracted claims to rule over Egypt by the Persian rulers. A striking omission throughout this section is of any reference to the Exodus tradition. As we have seen (e.g. 4:5; 12:2) this was not totally ignored in the first part of Isaiah, but it is not as prominent as it becomes in the latter part of the book, and here, where allusions might have been expected, there appears to be nothing of the kind.

(19:5–15) vv. 5–10 are much more specific than other passages depicting future desolation. Here the applicability of the threats to the civilization which was so heavily dependent upon the Nile for many aspects of its life is abundantly clear. The Nile would dry up, and daily life would be thrown into chaos. The implication is certainly that YHWH was regarded as the effective ruler of Egypt; the Egyptian gods themselves were envisaged as powerless to maintain the life of their own country. vv. 11–15, again a very specific application to Egyptian tradition is found. The 'princes' referred to here are pictured as a kind of cabinet of expert counsellors who could provide the Pharaoh with the appropriate answers to all the problems which confronted him. Despite their hereditary background and their training in wisdom techniques they are reduced to being no more than fools. Egyptian wisdom was famous and elsewhere in the HB is treated in a neutral way; here it is mocked as quite incapable of guiding those who trusted in it. In v. 15 the reference to head and tail, palm-branch and reed is a—surely deliberate—allusion to 9:14, where the same expressions are used in describing the downfall of Israel.

(19:16–25) Five short prose passages are appended, each headed 'On that day' but differing markedly from one another in content and tone. We have not attempted in this commentary to offer precise dates for most of the passages discussed, but it is striking that many commentators have seen here some of the latest material to be added to the whole book, perhaps reflecting the political situation of the Ptolemies and Seleucids of the third century BCE, after the conquests of Alexander the Great.

vv. 16–17, the theme here is fear. Whereas Israel is often encouraged not to fear, the warning is given that Egypt will have real cause for fear—even of Judah itself, by comparison apparently so insignificant.

v. 18 presumably refers to the phenomenon of the diaspora, the development whereby increasing numbers of Jews came to be settled in Egypt and other parts of the Mediterranean world. Hebrew is here called 'the language of Canaan', an important corrective to the picture found in Deuteronomy and elsewhere which pictures Israel and Canaan as bitterly opposed entities. Hebrew is a Semitic language, very close to what is known of different Canaanite dialects. There are interesting variants in the name of the city: NRSV 'City of the Sun' is the well-known Egyptian city of Heliopolis. But the Greek translation (LXX), which originated in Egypt, has 'city of righteousness', the name given to Jerusalem (1:26), and many Hebrew MSS have 'city of destruction'. We are warned that the notion of a fixed, unchanging biblical text can be illusory.

vv. 19–22, again a different stress from that characteristic of Deuteronomy is found here. Instead of the single place of sacrificial worship, understood to be the Jerusalem temple, required by the Deuteronomistic tradition, here an altar and a maššēbā (pillar) in Egypt are treated as positive signs. There was in fact a temple of YHWH at Leontopolis in Egypt in the second century BCE; whether an allusion to that is here intended cannot be certain. Just as in Gen 31:48, 52 (Jacob and Laban), the maššēbā is a 'witness' between two neighbouring and potentially rival communities. Even more remarkable is the promise that a messianic figure, a 'saviour', will be sent, whose mission extends beyond the holy land itself. There are important anticipations of some of the later chapters of the book here. The 'striking' of the Egyptians is a theme already found in the earlier passages; here, however, it is the prelude to 'healing', and we have the picture, hinted at in ch. 18, but now expressed more specifically, of Egyptians turning to the worship of YHWH and being welcomed.

vv. 23–5. These last two passages take that openness even further. In the first, Israel will live at peace with the great powers of the day: Assyria is probably here, as in Jonah, symbolic of the current Mesopotamian great power, or may stand for Syria, if the passage be dated in the Seleucid period (3rd cent.). In the second passage Israel is not only at peace with Egypt and Assyria but is regarded as their equal, and it is stressed that all are part of YHWH's favoured creation. It would be instructive to hear a contemporary exposition of this passage, but at least in the Christian tradition it is curiously neglected by most lectionary schemes.

(Ch. 20) This short prose section differs markedly from what has preceded. The link which presumably accounts for its inclusion at this point is the reference to Egypt and Assyria, but they are mentioned in a spirit very different from that of ch. 19. Commentators concerned with the historical setting of the passage differ sharply in their judgement. For some it is a primary piece of eighth-century material, reflecting a time of rebellion against Assyria when it seemed to be in difficulties elsewhere. The rebellion was brought to an abrupt end when Sargon's tartān (NRSV: 'commander-in-chief') captured Ashdod and so ended any hopes of a successful stand against Assyria by an Egyptian-led coalition. Others note that this historical reference is confined to v. 1 and that the main thrust of the episode is what can be described as the development of an Isaiah legend, the story of the prophet specially attuned to the divine will and able to interpret the signs of the times. It is noteworthy that there is no first-person material here; like ch. 7 it is a story about Isaiah rather than one directly attributed to him. As we saw in the introduction there are many fewer stories about Isaiah than about Jeremiah.

The 'sackcloth' of v. 2 appears to be characteristic prophetic clothing; this is the nearest we come to a portrait of Isaiah as a professional prophet. We need not suppose that he was literally naked; the removal of his outer garments, symbolic of his office, was sufficiently shameful for the 'sign and portent' to make their point (cf. Mic 1:8, though there in a poetic context it is difficult to know how literally the words are to be understood). The action is best seen in the context of the other symbolic actions in Isaiah, such as the naming of children. It is certainly not to be understood simply as a kind of 'teaching aid'; the sign is set out as an effective prefiguring of action which is determined by God. It is noteworthy, in view of the importance of 'servant' language in the latter part of the book, that Isaiah is here described as 'my servant'. 'Three years' is curious, not least in the way that this period is only mentioned in the subsequent explanation (Stacey 1990: 123–4). There may be a cross-reference here to the 'three years' of 16:14. It is striking, and very unusual, that the passage ends with a question; we are presumably meant to look for at least part of the answer in what follows.

(21:1–10) The reference in the body of this oracle is clearly to Babylon, but that is not indicated by the heading. Once again there are links with Jer 49, suggesting the common use of cultic material. Indeed the problems in making sense of this chapter have led one scholar to describe it as a 'palimpsest', in which 'the text has been reworked in order to make it relevant to a later situation' (Macintosh 1980: 75). Such a theory is difficult either to prove or to disprove; we may simply note that we seem once again to be in the world of 'theological geography'. Like the 'valley of vision' of 22:1, 'the wilderness of the sea' does not appear on any map. The passage is, as v. 2 makes clear, a vision of utter destruction. The prophet speaks in the first person, spelling out the anguish which his vision causes him, in a way without close parallel elsewhere in the book; little attention is normally paid in Isaiah to the psychology of the messenger, though in both Jeremiah and Ezekiel this feature is more prominent. But he has no alternative but to carry out his mission of summoning the nation to their task of destruction. Only in v. 9 is the object of this destruction made clear: Babylon. The proclamation of the fall of Babylon is found also in Jer 51:8, and is picked up in the NT by the seer of Revelation (Rev 14:8; 18:2).

v. 8 is one of several passages in the prophetic books which picture the prophet as a watchman (cf. Ezek 3:17; Hab 2:1), an important office in the ancient world, where the safety of cities might well depend upon the vigilance of their watchmen. The likening of a prophet to a watchman is a revealing one; each had to be able to make sense of and interpret correctly obscure and mysterious signs. NRSV's correction of the Hebrew 'a lion' to 'the watcher' is based on the Qumran scrolls. It is probably correct—the same letters are used but in a different order—though it entails losing a possible cross-reference to 29:1.

(21:11–12) is linked to what precedes by the watchman theme. Dumah is elsewhere linked with the Ishmaelites (Gen 25:14), but here an otherwise unknown association with Edom is supposed—'Seir' is frequently found in poetry for Edom. The message given is extremely cryptic: it looks as if the prophet has no certain answer to give to those who question him; they are to return for further guidance.

(21:13–17) Again it seems doubtful whether 'the desert plain' is an identifiable spot; this is one of the passages which is closely linked with Jeremiah (cf. Jer 49:8). The picture is of the need to give some succour to refugees from disaster, but whether this was a specific historical situation, or a more general plea, we have no means of knowing. The geographical area involved is usually thought to be Arabia, but this may be because of the symbolism involved in its remoteness and the threat implicit in the desert.

(22:1–4) Though included in the series introduced by the word 'oracle' which has mainly been concerned with foreign nations, the 'valley of vision' here must surely be Jerusalem itself. The whole theme of the book relates to the ultimate deliverance of God's people, but that deliverance must not be falsely anticipated by premature rejoicing. There must be destruction before there can be legitimate hope for restoration. (This assumes that NRSV is correct in its reference to the 'exultant town'; other translations, notably the REB, do not find such reference here.) A characteristic Isaian theme is the uselessness of the normal human agencies of self-reliance; the 'rulers' in whom trust might be put had fled ignominiously. There is ambiguity, perhaps deliberate, in the use of personal pronouns here: the 'you'/'your' clearly refers to Jerusalem and its inhabitants, but the 'I' of v. 4 can be understood either of Isaiah or of God himself.

(22:5–8a) Two themes characteristic of Isaiah are brought together here. The 'day of the Lord' may be future, but it can be prefigured by events that have already taken place. Secondly, YHWH is pictured as using foreign armies as the instruments by which he punishes his own people; so it is with two enemies from the East here, 'Elam' and 'Kir'. As elsewhere in these chapters there is evidence that material found also in Jeremiah is used here; cf. Jer 49:34 ff.

(22:8b–11) This prose passage comes somewhat unexpectedly in the middle of the series of poems, and has been much used as a basis for historical information concerning Hezekiah's attempts to render Jerusalem impregnable. The Assyrian king Sennacherib in his Annals referred to Hezekiah strengthening his city, and both 2 Chr 32:2–8 and Sir 48:17 have approving references to such work by Hezekiah. But recent archaeological and literary study has cast doubt on the extent of this work which actually goes back to Hezekiah's time—much may more properly be dated to the Hasmonean period—and these later passages may more probably be seen as part of the development of a Hezekiah legend. There is in any case no reference to Hezekiah in our passage, and the tone is sharply condemnatory as against the praise of Hezekiah in the other passages. Here by contrast we have the familiar Isaian theme of legitimate planning being a divine prerogative; whatever was done by its inhabitants to protect Jerusalem 'on that day' could have no success against God's decisions.

(22:12–14) If there was doubt whether vv. 1–4 referred to the rejoicing of the inhabitants of Jerusalem which the authors of the prophetic book regarded as inappropriate, there can be no such doubts here. v. 13b is quoted in the NT (1 Cor 15:32) and has survived into modern times as a popular proverb; its origin is unknown. It may have been coined by the redactors of Isaiah, or—more probably—already have been in widespread use.

(22:15–25) This passage is unique in Isaiah as a judgement aimed at an individual; Ahaz is treated in a somewhat similar way, but nowhere else is someone not a member of the royal family so addressed. It is also one of the most difficult passages to explain for the view taken in this commentary that in the form we have it Isaiah is essentially a poetic collection from the Second Temple period concerned with God's dealings with king and community. However, we may note first that, though NRSV prints the whole passage as prose many (e.g. REB) regard vv. 15–19 as poetry, and others (e.g. BHS) extend the poetic section to the end of v. 23, leaving only vv. 24–5 as a prose addition. Further, Kaiser has shown that its composition is a good deal more complex than a first glance might lead one to suppose (Kaiser 1974: 149–59); he concludes that we may well see here a trace of the final editor, ‘holding up the mirror to a hated contemporary’.

There is no obvious reason offered in vv. 15–19 why Shebna should be so fiercely condemned. To prepare a tomb does not seem to be a particularly heinous offence, and Abraham is praised for such foresight in Gen 23. No doubt the virulent attack is to be seen as part of a larger condemnation of human officials whose pretensions went beyond what the prophetic community regarded as acceptable. The imagery employed, of ‘hurling’ the victim into another land, is found also in Jer 22:26, where it is applied to the unfortunate king Jehoiachin (Coniah). It is noteworthy that Shebna is not named in the body of this passage (vv. 16–18), and it may be that that should be taken as a more general condemnation of human presumption, as in vv. 11–14, which has been made specific to Shebna for reasons beyond our present knowledge. Shebna is also referred to in 36:3, still in royal service. In the 1950s there was much speculation whether a tomb inscription dating from about the eighth century BCE might have referred to Shebna, but the name was not fully preserved, and this link must remain speculative. It is also possible, though again only a matter for speculation, that important offices in the community were handed down in particular families, and that descendants of Shebna (and perhaps of Eliakim also) were still in positions of power in the Second Temple period. Certainly the nepotism condemned in v. 24 would support such a view. We may compare the Tobiads, whom we met in ch. 7.

In v. 19 YHWH is pictured as speaking in the first person, and this continues in vv. 20–3, concerned with another figure mentioned also in 36:3; Eliakim, who apparently succeeded Shebna as ‘master of the household’. It is striking that he is referred to as ‘my servant’, as if we are being given various inadequate models of the servant of YHWH before the true one is described in chs. 52–3. For inadequate Eliakim is shown to be. The picture in vv. 21–4 is reminiscent of a royal accession, with the theme of the ‘key of David’ that was picked up by the author of Revelation in the NT (Rev 3:7). But Eliakim is shown to be unable to sustain the burden (v. 25). The limitations of human aspirations are once again set out.

(23:1–12) The composite nature of the material in this chapter is well illustrated by the fact that it refers sometimes to Tyre (vv. 1, 5, 8), sometimes to Sidon (vv. 2, 4, 12). But even those commentators most concerned with detailed historical analysis have recognized the difficulty of teasing out an ‘original’ nucleus from the present poem which is skilfully constructed and in no sense a mere patchwork. Tyre and Sidon, in the modern Lebanon, were trading ports on the Mediterranean, and here, as in Ezek 26–8, that is the main theme of the prophecy of lament, much of it in the distinctive form of 3 + 2 stresses often found in prophetic laments.

‘Ships of Tarshish’ are frequently referred to as sea-going vessels; it remains disputed whether the reference is to a kind of ship, or to Tarshish as their characteristic destination. The place-name seems the more natural explanation, but there is a difficulty in that sometimes such ships seem to have reached it in the Mediterranean, as here (and cf. 1 Kings 10:22), sometimes from the Red Sea (e.g. 1 Kings 22:48). In any case the main point here is the widespread nature of the trade engaged in by Tyre and Sidon and the confidence it engendered. Once again it is the ‘plan’ of YHWH (vv. 8, 9) that will be decisive against all human aspirations.

(23:13) This interesting prose note, comparable to the addition at 7:8b, gives a glimpse of the way in which the redaction of the Isaiah material developed. Assyria had never conquered Tyre; at a later period a member of the tradition was convinced that the destruction implicit in vv. 1–12 would indeed come about, but at the hand of the Chaldeans (Babylonians). In fact, as far as our knowledge goes, the Babylonian siege of Tyre was unsuccessful, and it was not until the campaigns of Alexander the Great that Tyre was captured.

(23:14) v. 1 is repeated, either as an accidental gloss, or—more likely in the context of a reading of the book in its final form—as an indication of the completion of that poem.

(23:15–18) The section is rounded off by further elaborations, mostly in prose, on the theme of ‘seventy years’, symbolic here as elsewhere in the Bible of a whole lifetime. Some older scholars tried to identify the 70-year period with some specific episodes in history, but that seems to be a false exegetical move: the arrival of a new generation seems to be the point of the usage. When that new generation arrives it will be involved in the service of YHWH, but only in a subsidiary role. The openness of 19:24–5 is scarcely present here.

(Chs. 24–7) These chapters, taken as a unit and often called ‘the Isaiah apocalypse’, have attracted much attention. They are not introduced by a separate heading, so in the present form of the book they can be taken to continue chs. 13–23, which have themselves not been devoid of features more usually associated with the apocalypses. The earlier chapters were for the most part addressed to specific nations; here their message of doom is universalized. But these chapters have enough distinctive features for it to have been widely supposed that they form a distinct block. Stress has been laid upon their eschatological concerns, their envisaging of the possibility of a future life beyond death, and their extensive use of mythological themes, to claim that the closest links of these chapters are with Daniel (dated in the 2nd cent. BCE) and with the even later apocalypses. Dates ranging from the exile (Millar 1976; D. G. Johnson 1988) down to the second century (Ludwig 1961) have been proposed, with the consensus, in so far as there is one, settling on the fourth or third centuries. Though it may indeed be appropriate to see a certain unity holding these chapters together, we should also note that they contain a variety of forms, which have usually been broken down into two main categories: lyrical, Psalm-like passages primarily addressed to God, and oracles of a prophetic or apocalyptic type concerned with the fate of the community. Another characteristic feature, present to some extent in chs. 13–23 but now carried much further, is the frequency of allusions to and sometimes direct quotations of, other biblical material, both elsewhere in the book of Isaiah and in other books. Sweeney (1988b) lists seven passages which display links with other parts of Isaiah, often being given a different sense from that in their other context, with the emphasis here more universal or even cosmic, while Day (1980) draws attention to strong thematic links between 26:13–27:9 and a passage in Hosea (13:4–14:10), which again illustrates the phenomenon of Scripture interpreting itself. Our attempt to discern overarching structures running through the whole book of Isaiah will gain important insights from these chapters, where several themes touched upon elsewhere are developed more fully.

(24:1–6) The theme of inevitable destruction comes to the fore at once. In chs. 1–12 the basic concern had been with the fate of Judah; in chs. 13–23 with that of Assyria, Babylon, and the other foreign nations. Now the destruction becomes universal, raising interesting questions about the psychology of those who were so convinced that such devastation could only be understood as an inevitable part of God's dealings with his creation (v. 3). The list of the different constituent elements of society in v. 2 is in general reminiscent of wisdom literature, with its penchant for lists, but the closest parallel is in another prophetic text, Hos 4:9, and these chapters in fact contain a number of apparent allusions to Hosea (cf. 24:4 with Hos 4:3). There is no mention here of a king, which might well be a pointer to a period when the priesthood was the leading social group. v. 5 contains a reference to 'the everlasting covenant'. 'Covenant' is not a common theme in the early chapters of Isaiah, but we may perhaps see reference here to the 'cosmic covenant' which holds together the whole order of creation and is put at risk by human behaviour (Murray 1992: 16–22; he suggests that the word in v. 5 translated 'inhabitants' by NRSV may refer to kings). The lament of vv. 4–6 is in many ways reminiscent of the communal laments in the Psalms. Devastation has struck the community in a way that has induced total bewilderment.

(24:7–13) v. 7 is also found with slight modification in Joel 1:10, 12. This provides an example of that reuse of biblical material in a new context which characterizes these chapters. Unfortunately since the dates both of Joel and of the final form of Isaiah are unclear it is not certain which text made use of the other. The theme of lack of wine is then linked with one of the recurring motifs of chs. 24–7: that of a city, usually in terms of its destruction. Historical critics have assumed that the actual ravaging of a specific city underlay these references, and have devoted much energy to identifying it: Jerusalem, destroyed in 587, or Babylon, captured by Cyrus in 539, or the overthrow of some other city to which allusion is made in our sources of ancient history? That some actual historical event has played its part in shaping the poetry need not be denied; it is much more doubtful whether it is useful to read this as a description of an actual historical event. Rather, much of the language may legitimately be taken as future (the proper rendering of Hebrew 'tenses' is a notorious difficulty), and as a reflection upon the nature of God's manifestation of power (D. G. Johnson 1988: 11–14). What had already happened had provided the stimulus to continuing reflection on God's ways, symbolized by his destructive power (Henry 1967). With those provisos it seems right to assume that the 'typical' city whose fate is here envisaged is, as so often in the book of Isaiah, Jerusalem. These chapters will offer differing perceptions of that city: here (v. 10) a 'city of chaos'; in 26:1 a 'strong city' wherein God 'sets up victory'. The passage ends with imagery already used in 17:6, an example of that reuse of the same motifs which we have found to characterize the Isaiah tradition.

(24:14–16) This section begins as another of those universalist passages of which we have already found examples scattered through the book of Isaiah. The group with which the prophet is associated (the 'we' of v. 16) hear the universal praise of God, but are far from satisfied; instead 'I pine away' because of treachery. This verse is closely linked in language to 21:2, and will be further developed in ch. 33 (Wildberger 1978: 937). As we saw there the cause of the desolation is not clear, but this passage suggests the opposition of different groups within the community, as we shall see more fully in the climax of the book, chs. 56–66.

(24:17–20) We have noticed several links with the 'foreign nations' oracles of Jer 46–51. This is one of the closest, since vv. 17–18 appear to be almost a direct quotation of Jer 49:43–4. There is an important difference; what was in Jeremiah applied specifically to Moab is now universalized into destruction for the inhabitants of the whole earth. This is expressed in particularly vivid language: pahad wāpahat wāpāh sounds even more threatening than 'terror and the pit and the snare'. Another example of universalizing earlier material may be found at v. 20. In 1:8 Zion was reduced to a mere 'shelter'; now the same word, here translated 'hut' is applied to the whole earth. Similarly Am 5:2 spoke of Israel as fallen, no more to rise; here that warning is applied to the whole earth.

(24:21–3) The 'on that day' language links this closely to the many other passages in Isaiah that begin thus. YHWH is proclaimed as king in Zion, as in many Psalms; all rival claims, whether of earthly kings or of sun and moon, will be put down. This is language which would be developed in the later apocalypses; in the HB, Dan 10, with its picture of the 'guardian angels' of different nations being overthrown, provides the closest parallel.

(25:1–5) The divisions suggested by NRSV are here followed, though many other proposals have been made. On this reading these verses form another hymnic section, a psalm-like thanksgiving. The theme is the destruction of a city. If this were prose we should be required to try to identify the city, but in a poetic passage such as this it seems legitimate to maintain that the poet sees as part of the divine purpose both the destruction of Jerusalem at the time of the exile, with the sweeping away of the corruption that had set in, and also the destruction of Babylon, symbolized as the oppressor, when it too had fallen to the Persians. Each destruction could be hymned as evidence of God's overarching power, since they presaged greater things to come. After that the picture of Zion as a refuge and a shelter, already used in 4:6, becomes appropriate.

(25:6–10a) Something of the extent of the divine victory is now spelt out. First, it will be celebrated by a banquet, a theme which may embarrass the well-fed West, but which in a subsistence economy is surely a legitimate aspiration. The theme of the banquet is often associated with judgement and victory over enemies (as in ch. 24), including death (so v. 7 here), and often (though not in this passage) features the presence of an individual who can be identified as the messiah. (See 'Messianic Banquet' in ABD iv. 787–91.) It becomes prominent in the later biblical material and in the extra-biblical apocalypses. The Feeding of the Five Thousand is a characteristic NT example (Mk 6:30–44), though with a less exotic menu than the present one.

It would be hazardous to base a specific belief in individual resurrection on the phrase 'he will swallow up death forever'. As in ancient Canaanite mythology, death (môt; here māwet) was an enemy whose overcoming was a sign of the triumph of proper order. Here the 'shroud' and 'sheet' are mourning garments, for which there will be no more need in the joy that is envisaged. The passage as a whole may properly be compared with 2:2–4, with its great anticipation for the holy mountain, and with the expectation of salvation in ch. 12.

(25:10b–12) This conclusion is unexpected, since it goes against the usual universalizing tendency of these chapters. Some commentators have seen it as a gloss, others as the historical key to the whole section. It is printed as poetry in NRSV, but it may be wiser to see it as basically prose, possibly with some poetic phrases based on the threats found in 2:9–17. It is linked thematically to chs. 15–16, but there are no obvious links of vocabulary or of geography with that passage. It may well be that some otherwise unknown episode from the time when this material reached its final form provoked this outburst against Moab, which is reminiscent of the hostility displayed in Deut 23:3, excluding Moabites from ever participating in the worship of YHWH. The book of Ruth shows that this attitude toward Moabites was not universally shared.

(26:1–6) Another Psalm-like poem follows, with the city now a matter of pride. Here there can be no doubt that a purified Jerusalem is in mind, with v. 2 reminding us of the 'entrance liturgies' found in some Psalms, where only those who are righteous are allowed through the gates to the holy place beyond (cf. Ps 15; 24). The entry may be that of the ark, symbolic of the divine presence, and it is possible to envisage this as an example of the 'divine warrior hymn' held by some to have accompanied such a procession (Millar 1976: 82–90, summarizes the issues involved). More widely it is possible to see in this one of the Songs of Zion referred to in Ps 137:3, and exemplified by Ps 48; 76. Links with the Psalms are also provided by the themes of faith and trust, šālôm (peace), and confidence in the overthrow of enemies.

(26:7–19) Again the extent of the next passage is not very clear, but it is probably artificial to attempt any division within this section, characterized as a 'community lament' (D. G. Johnson 1988). A feature of such laments is the entreaty of YHWH's favour at a time of distress (e.g. Ps 74:79) and that is certainly appropriate for the climax of the passage in vv. 16–18. The picture is of the faithful community under alien rule, but still expressing its confidence that deliverance will come. If we are strict in applying logical criteria, then further subdivision within the section will be necessary, for some verses are expressed in first person singular, some in first person plural forms. We may notice, however, that this alternation occurs elsewhere in Isaiah (e.g. 63:7—'I will recount... all that the Lord has done for us'). vv. 14–15 clearly express the conviction that though individuals die the whole community survives to glorify God. The anguish of childbirth, used as a threat against enemies in 13:8, here too symbolizes human inadequacies, but this time inadequacies which will be gloriously transformed. In the light of this poetic imagery it is probably wise not to regard the much-discussed v. 19 as a straight assertion of belief in a blessed future life, as has often been done when the verse has been taken out of context. It expresses hope in a continuing national restoration. However when the book of Isaiah had reached its final form 'this is a reference to the resurrection of the dead which no-one but a Sadducee, ancient or modern, could possibly misconstrue' (Sawyer 1973: 234). When it had achieved the status of Holy Scripture, liable to be ransacked for guidance in later problems, then its use as an affirmation of belief in resurrection was scarcely surprising—though less use was made of this particular verse than might have been expected; it is, for example, not quoted in the NT.

(26:20–1) This brief section functions as a link between the preceding lament and the more mythological material in ch. 27. Use is made of the images either of the universal flood of Genesis, or of the Exodus tradition, or both, to symbolize the totality of destruction. The shutting of the doors here may call to mind Gen 7:16 and the hiding of the Israelites behind closed doors when the angel of God passed by in Egypt (Ex 12:22–3).

(27:1) provides the clearest example of links with the ancient mythological traditions best known to us in the Ugaritic texts from Ras Shamra. Leviathan was the chaos-monster, described already at Ugarit as 'the wriggling serpent' (Gibson, 1978: 50). Creation in Genesis is pictured as a matter of no more than the divine word bringing about what is commanded, but elsewhere the theme of creation as struggle is found. Ps 74:14 provides a particularly vivid parallel to this verse; cf. also Ps 104:26. The importance of the serpent in creation accounts, familiar to us from Gen 3, also emerges here. It is an anticipation that 'on that day' there will be a new creation when the forces of chaos will be destroyed.

(27:2–6) Here a very different image of what is anticipated 'on that day' is offered. It is perhaps the clearest example from these chapters of the reuse of material found elsewhere in Isaiah—in this case the 'song of the vineyard' in 5:1–7. The theme of the vineyard (kerem) is the same; in each case briers and thorns pose a threat to the vineyard; YHWH is the protector of the vineyard, which is identified as his own people. But it is by no means a repetition of the earlier passage. Now YHWH acts as the guard who ensures that the vineyard comes to no harm, and by clinging to YHWH for protection Jacob/Israel (the juxtaposition of these two words is reminiscent of the usage in chs. 40–55) will be given a universal reward. Now, in an almost deterministic way, the possibility of the people falling away is removed. They will be protected from the briers and thorns by YHWH himself. The strongly-rooted future of the people is reminiscent of 37:31, the story of the deliverance from the Assyrian threat.

(27:7–11) This difficult passage has been very variously interpreted by different commentators (D. G. Johnson 1988: 88 summarizes the difficulties, some of which, such as the awkward shifts in tense and gender, are obscured in English translations). Many have supposed that a city other than Jerusalem (Samaria?) is referred to in v. 10, but it seems better to take the passage, with all its obscurities, as a warning that, despite the promise of better things to come for the faithful community, there are also those who can expect no mercy.

God's 'fierce blast' (v. 8) implies that he will not have compassion on them or show them favour (v. 11). Our ignorance of the divisions within the community precludes us from being more precise about who is thus excluded.

(27:12–13) This section of the book ends with another eschatological passage looking forward to 'that day'. Here the imagery is of a harvest being gathered, those exiled in the diaspora being gathered to their own land. The symbol used is that of a trumpet-blast, which would become a favoured symbol in later apocalyptic writings (cf. the trumpets of Rev 8–11), but there may be a closer link here with the trumpet blast for the Day of Atonement prescribed in Lev 25:9. In the Second Temple period this day took on increasing significance in the life of the community.

(Chs. 28–31) In this section we turn from the obscurities and allusions of chs. 24–7 to a much more straightforward series of oracles, mainly of woe against a series of offenders. As noted earlier NRSV 'Ah' at 28:1 and elsewhere is too bland a translation for the force of the Hebrew hōy. (REB has 'Alas' at 28:1 and 'Woe' in later occurrences of the same word.) For historical critics this section has been the one part of the book where a significant body of material is held to go back to Isaiah himself in the eighth century BCE, though these chapters make no direct reference to him.

There are, however, some structural problems. The difference from what precedes has to be inferred from the different content; there is no heading to indicate a fresh start. Nor is it clear how far the passage extends. Certainly chs. 28–31 belong together, but whether the section should be extended further is not clear; chs. 32, 32–3, and 32–5 have all been proposed as integral elements of this section. Nor is there any obvious reason why these chapters should be placed at just this point in the book as a whole. Both in assumed dating and in content they are close to much of the material in chs. 2–12.

One helpful way of looking at the organization of this material has been suggested by Williamson (1994: 184–7). He notes that there is no separate heading for this section, which invites us to read it as a continuation of what has preceded, and suggests that the best analogy may be, not the self-contained bodies of 'Oracles against Foreign Nations' found in Jeremiah and Ezekiel, but the collection in Am 1–2, which uses condemnation of foreign nations to lead up to even sharper condemnation of Judah and Israel. Here that final order is reversed: Israel (the northern kingdom) is condemned in 28:1–4, then follows material directed against Judah and Jerusalem.

(28:1–4) The form of this oracle is clear, with its statement of wrongdoing followed by an announcement of judgement introduced by hinnēh ('behold' in the older Eng. versions; NRSV 'see'). Less clear is the meaning of 'the proud garland of the drunkards of Ephraim'. If it is simply an accusation of drunkenness the punishment seems remarkably severe! In fact it is the garland rather than the fact of drunkenness which seems to be condemned, and there is surely some symbolism here, which largely escapes us. Kaiser (1974) suggested that the wearing of garlands was a Hellenistic custom and that we are introduced here to the tension between traditional Judaism and the spread of Hellenistic culture.

(28:5–6) Characteristic of these chapters is the interspersing of the predominant note of threat with short passages of a much more hopeful tenor. Historical critics have for the most part taken the hopeful interludes as later insertions; those concerned with the final form of the book will see this as a literary device, maintaining the tension between threat and promise so characteristic of the book of Isaiah. Here the key words from the earlier passage ('garland', 'glory', 'beauty') are picked up and applied to the faithful remnant—here clearly a hopeful symbol. The stress on 'judgement' and 'justice' (the same word, mišpāt, in the original) recalls a frequent theme of the Isaianic tradition.

(28:7–13) We return now to the announcement of judgement using language closely comparable to vv. 1–4; some commentators have seen this passage as a continuation of those verses, but they were complete in themselves. The earlier theme of drunkenness is taken up again and made the basis of a divine judgement speech condemning the nation through its leaders. Priests and prophets are condemned together. This should warn us against setting the two groups over against one another as natural opponents; as noted earlier it may suggest that at some stage in the tradition Isaiah was regarded as opposed to, rather than an integral part of, the prophetic movement. At v. 9 NRSV provides quotation-marks. This is speculative, for there is no equivalent in Hebrew, but it seems to make best sense of the passage to understand what follows as the imagined response of the priests and prophets, the 'he' being Isaiah. If this is so it is natural to see here, as often in chs. 56–66, dispute between rival claims to access to the divine will, a dispute carried on in strongly polemical terms. The 'priests and prophets' sarcastically ask whether the Isaianic group has any sure basis for imparting the wisdom of the tradition. NRSV then rightly says of v. 10 that its meaning is uncertain. It is very doubtful whether the words šaw and qaw, translated 'precept' and 'line' are intended to have any formal meaning. They may be a suggestion of drunken muttering, with the implication that Isaiah is no better than they are; or of prophetic glossolalia; or of teaching children their equivalent of the ABC, as may be implied in v. 9. If this is right, then šaw and qaw would simply be forms of successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet. If what has preceded is the challenge, v. 11 provides the Isaianic response to it. The right language has been one of the basic concerns of Judaism through history, and here an ominous challenge to that concern is set out. God's will is to be achieved through those of an 'alien tongue'. If we wish to envisage an 'original' setting for this threat, then the Assyrian invaders of the eighth century would fill the bill. But this was a threat which continued to exercise the community as it lived first in the Persian and then in the Hellenistic world (cf. Neh 13:23–5). YHWH's control of the nations might have the unpalatable consequence that the community might have to learn God's will by very strange means. But in the first instance that control has threatening implications. True rest lay in confidence and trust in YHWH, which the community had refused—hence the inevitability of desolation, spelt out in v. 13 by a repetition of the terms in v. 10. This idea of rest given by God to his people is a basic theological theme of much of the HB (von Rad 1966b).

(28:14–22) offers a very clear example of the way in which a basic message of threat has a hopeful element interwoven with it. v. 16 in that sense differs from the surrounding material, but as the passage stands it provides an important indication of a basic theme of hope beyond disaster. v. 14, the application to Jerusalem and its rulers is now made explicit. Even the word ‘scoffers’ is very similar to the name ‘Zion’ and is probably intended as a wordplay. The expression ‘this’ (rather than ‘my’) alerts us that a threat is imminent. v. 15, we have noted that specific covenant language is rare in the early chapters of Isaiah, and this verse may provide part of the reason. The only covenant that the leaders understand is actually one made with death (māwet). There was a Canaanite divinity called Mot, but such worship is probably not in mind here. Isaiah’s opponents’ words are certainly not accurately reported on this occasion, but the underlying theme seems to be of false trust; they are held to suppose that the power of death can be set to one side—Isaiah is confident that the hollowness of such claims will soon be exposed.

vv. 16–17a, into this threat has been incorporated an oracle of salvation promising YHWH’s lasting protection of Jerusalem. There is dispute whether the ‘stone’ is the foundation-stone or the headstone, but perhaps we need not suppose Isaiah to have been concerned with architectural niceties. The phrase ‘One who trusts will not panic’ is placed in quotation-marks by NRSV, and we may follow its implication that this will have been an inscription on the stone. Here as elsewhere in Isaiah we are very close to the language of the Zion Psalms (e.g. 46; 48). Those who put their trust in YHWH could be confident that Zion was a place of true safety. There is also a close link with 7:9, the words addressed to Ahaz, with the same demand for trust. The connection is closer in Hebrew than appears from NRSV, which translates the same Hebrew verb (the one from which the word ‘Amen’ is derived) as ‘stand firm’ at 7:9, but ‘trust’ here. The idea of the ‘inviolability of Zion’, if not explicit here, is clearly not far removed from the thought of the passage, which ends with a reiteration of the characteristic Isaianic themes of mišpāt and šēdāqā. A link with the previous oracle is provided by the word qaw (line). As against the false trust mockingly set out there the basis of true trust is now shown.

vv. 17b–22, the remainder of the oracle of threat spells out its implications, in the first part by making much use of the same phrases as have already been used—another characteristic Isaianic technique. The last two verses introduce new points of comparison. Two episodes from the Former Prophets are alluded to: David’s victory over the Philistines at 2 Sam 5:20, and Joshua’s defeat of the Amorites in Josh 10. Now, however, the holy war which YHWH had earlier waged on his people’s behalf will become a war against Jerusalem itself—a ‘strange’ and ‘alien’ work. This theme of YHWH as the divine warrior, normally expected to fight on Israel’s behalf against its enemies, but quite capable of turning against his own people, plays a prominent part in the Isaiah tradition. There is clearly an acute tension between that understanding and the theme of the inviolability of Zion which we found in vv. 16–17a.

(28:23–8) What follows in these verses has no close formal parallel elsewhere in the book of Isaiah. It is a kind of parable, using farming techniques as a model for bringing out the significance of God’s work in creation. There is no suggestion that it is a divine oracle; the ‘my’ of v. 23 refers to the human author. It has a markedly didactic character, which may remind us of wisdom literature rather than of the prophetic writings. While in general terms it is not difficult to see the various operations described as symbolizing God’s dealings with his people, it is less certain that each of the particular tasks is intended to relate to the varying fortunes of Israel as it experienced now success and now humiliation. Several of the agricultural terms are of uncertain meaning; what is clear is that the poem is claiming a meaningful rhythm in God’s dealings with his created world.

(28:29) Another of the summary-appraisals (Childs’s term; see above on 14:26) scattered through the book, offers a kind of reassurance that all that is being revealed is indeed in accordance with God’s overall plan.

(29:1–4) One of the most basic themes running through the whole book of Isaiah is the fate of Jerusalem, the place of greatest promise and of greatest hope. Whereas 28:16–17 envisaged Zion as inviolable, here we have a threat of utter destruction. ‘Ariel’ seems to stand for Jerusalem; the word means ‘altar-hearth’ (cf. Ezek 43:15), but, divided into two words, Ari El, it would mean ‘lion of God’, and there may well be a deliberate wordplay here, with God’s destructive power in mind. That is still further strengthened by the imagery of a siege. Jerusalem was under siege at the very beginning of the book (1:8); here it is made clear that it is YHWH himself who is besieging the city. The reference to David in v. 3 is not in the Hebrew text (cf. NRSV marg.), and REB ‘I shall encircle you with my army’ makes it more explicit that YHWH himself is the besieger. In v. 1 the allusion is to David’s capture of Jerusalem described in 2 Sam 6; now in v. 3 it is YHWH himself who is the city’s enemy, reducing its inhabitants to ghostly status.

(29:5–8) As so often in these chapters the picture is miraculously reversed. Even in these verses the theme of threat is not wholly lacking, for the theophany described in v. 6 would normally imply God’s displeasure with his people, as if he were waging war against them. But in its present context that potential threat has been overridden; it is not Jerusalem but its enemies who will be scattered like dust. As elsewhere (cf. 10:32), the passage ends with the expression of frustration by Jerusalem’s opponents. Dreams in the HB are often thought to have religious significance; v. 8 reminds us that, as in the modern world, they can be simply an illustration of frustration.

(29:9–10) It is not clear whether this passage is to be taken as self-standing, or as a continuation of the words of threat in vv. 1–4. In any case the threat is now once again directed to the community itself. The references to ‘prophets’ and ‘seers’ may well be a later addition, making the general threat of incomprehension even more specific. In any case we see once again the hostility of much of the Isaianic tradition to these religious groups.

(29:11–12) A brief prose section interrupts the sequence of poetic oracles. The breakdown of the established structures of the community is reminiscent of 4:1 and 8:16–20. Those who shaped the book of Isaiah continued to proclaim their faith in God's continuing power, but there were those in the community who either could not or would not read the signs of the times.

(29:13–16) vv. 13–14, the placing of the prose section is surely deliberate to bring out the ironic contrast with this poetic oracle. There the problem was ignorance; here it is assumed wisdom. The people claim to have access to the mind of God, with their pattern of festivals and the alleged wisdom and discernment of their 'experts'. It will all be shown to be a false claim. vv. 15–16, this theme of false claims to wisdom is carried further. Excessive self-belief has led the wise among the people, falsely so-called according to Isaiah, into turning the truth upside-down. The theme of the thing made disowning its maker occurs again in 45:9, and this verse may well underlie Paul's argument in Rom 9:19–21.

(29:17–21) In this rather fragmentary section we find another oracle of promise, very different from what has preceded. Now the picture is of a complete transformation of earthly conditions into a restoration of paradise. Not just Jerusalem, but the whole created order is here transfigured. Lebanon had previously (2:13) been regarded as the first victim of the impending 'day of YHWH'; now it will become a fruitful field. Similarly the deaf and the blind of v. 18 remind us of the deaf and blind people of 6:10. There is a hope beyond that threat. In vv. 20–1 we cannot be certain whether those condemned reflect a general aspiration towards justice, or whether particular groups in a divided society are targeted.

(29:22–4) In the Judaism of the Second Temple period the patriarchs, who played little or no part in earlier traditions, come to increasing prominence. To be children of Abraham and of Jacob was an important theological claim as is amply illustrated in the New Testament. In these verses we find a more generous hope than in the previous oracle. Even those who err and grumble may now, it is hoped, come to a true understanding.

(30:1–5) We return to another passage of threat, on a theme which may have been relevant in the eighth century BCE, and thus go back to the earliest traditions embodied in Isaiah, but which continued to raise important issues at different times in the people's history. In the face of threats from elsewhere was Egypt to be a valued resource, or was trust in Egypt no more than an illusion? vv. 1–2 are an accusation put in the mouth of YHWH himself. The plans of those who rely on Egyptian support are rebellion, a human plan which it is claimed is a vain attempt to thwart the larger divine plan. NRSV 'against my will' in v. 1 gives the sense, but obscures the fact that a more literal translation would be 'not of my spirit' (so RSV) with the sense that conformity with the spirit of YHWH is far more important than human counsel. To 'go down into Egypt' was an exact reversal of the divine action in bringing the people up out of Egypt in the Exodus. This accusation leads by way of a characteristic 'therefore' into an announcement of judgement showing that the very forces which the people hope will offer them protection will lead to their greater discomfiture. In v. 4 'Zoaan' may stand for Egypt (cf. 19:11, 13), but 'Hanes' is otherwise unknown.

(30:6–7) This passage looks to have been misplaced. Its formal structure, introduced by the word maššā' (oracle) is reminiscent of the oracles against foreign nations in chs. 13–23. The Negeb is probably not the specific area south of Judah, but rather evokes any distant and little-known southern land. The passage has presumably been placed here because of its thematic links with the preceding verses, stressing that supposed help from Egypt is useless. It brings out a theme which will be taken up again at 51:9. Egypt is identified with the chaos-monster Rahab. The exact force of the comparison is not clear, but Clements (1980a) proposes a minor emendation to the Hebrew to achieve the translation 'Rahab that is stilled', the implication being that the powers of chaos have been rendered powerless by YHWH's creative act. Ps 87:4 suggests that the identification of Egypt as Rahab was a well-known one.

(30:8–11) The next unit extends to v. 17, but is readily divisible into three smaller sections, of which this is the first. Taken as a whole it may well be one of the most important basic elements in the book. Historical-critical scholars have been almost unanimous in seeing material here which goes back to the eighth century BCE. In v. 8 there is little point in speculating what may have been inscribed on the tablet; more fruitful is a comparison with 8:16–18, which shares with this passage the concern that the words of God through his messenger should be inscribed and handed down to future generations. The theme of YHWH as 'father' of Israel, touched on in v. 1, is then further developed in a way strikingly similar to Deut 21:18–21, where a 'stubborn and rebellious (sōrēr ūmōreh: both terms used to describe Israel in this chapter) son' may receive the punishment of death (Pfisterer Darr 1994: 61). We are reminded that the situation described in 1:2 shows as yet no signs of improvement. The tôrâ (instruction) of YHWH, here as so often the touchstone of obedience, is still being ignored. As we have noted seers and particularly prophets are often condemned in Isaiah. Here the blame for their inadequacies is placed on the community as a whole.

(30:12–14) Two announcements of judgement follow, each introduced by the characteristic 'therefore'. In the first the recurring theme of trust, true and false, reappears. In the second two vivid similes are used to picture the inevitable break-up of the community: first an insecurely built wall whose weakness causes it to collapse; secondly, a pot smashed into fragments.

(30:15–17) A further accusation and announcement of judgement follows, with an important statement of a basic Isaianic theme. God had laid down how they might be saved from their troubles, and they had refused. There are two Hebrew verbs some forms of which are very similar: šûb, to turn or return; yāšab, to sit or dwell. Most translations take the verb here as the first (thus NRSV 'in returning'), but various Jewish scholars have put forward a case for supposing that it might be the second, which would involve only minor changes and give a better parallel: 'in stillness' (Uffenheimer 1994: 179). In the light of the community's failure to offer such trust the remnant theme reappears in v. 17 as an undisguised threat.

(30:18) is printed in NRSV as a poetic conclusion to what has preceded, but it can also be taken as introducing the very varied material which follows. It points forward to the latter part of the book in its emphasis on God's saving justice (mīšpāt), while the last phrase provides a link back to 25:9. These links are important warnings against dividing the book into small isolated fragments.

(30:19–26) These verses are held together by the common element of promise, but their detailed content is very varied. Vermeulen (1977–8: 418) proposes that they are intended as a ‘relecture’ of the preceding material in this chapter offering a much more hopeful future. Thus instead of blinding their seers (v. 10) the people will see for themselves (v. 20). The deafness of v. 9 will give way to the ability to hear the message in v. 21; instead of straying from the way (v. 11), they will walk securely in it (v. 21). The condemnation of idolatry is less prominent in these chapters than attacks on the false worship of YHWH, but here (v. 22) the community are assured that idols will be a thing of the past: a sharp contrast with 1:27–31 on a similar theme. The last verses of the section introduce once more the vision of ‘that day’, now expressed in eschatological terms as a restoration of paradise, when the anxieties of an agricultural community living a marginal existence will be totally dispelled. These pictures of an ideal future constantly recur throughout the book of Isaiah.

(30:27–33) There are a number of textual problems in these verses, which account for the variety within modern translations. vv. 27–8 seem to be a powerful description of a theophany, but whereas in other such passages God’s anger is directed against his own people, here ‘the nations’ and ‘the peoples’ are the victims of his anger. This is the language of YHWH as divine warrior. The prose passage that follows this warning first offers reassurance to the people of God that Zion (the ‘mountain of the Lord’) will remain inviolable, and then identifies the enemy to be overthrown as the Assyrians. It is doubtful whether we should take this as a historical reference with a specific eighth-century setting, when the Assyrians were attacking Israel and Judah; rather it should be grouped with other passages (Jon; Ezra 6:22) which see Assyria as the typical oppressive force—a role which came to be taken over by Babylon. The chapter ends with a highly unattractive, but no doubt understandable, picture of the community gloating over the ruin and degradation of a hated enemy. The picture of a triumphant cultic occasion here should dispel any notion, based on such passages as 1:10–17, that the book of Isaiah is opposed to cultic worship. v. 33 seems to embody a pun; the Assyrian king (melek) will meet his end in the Topheth, or burial place where human sacrifice was alleged to have been carried out in honour of the god mōlēk (Molech).

(31:1–3) The theme of the futility of turning to Egypt for help, found already in 30:1–5, is resumed. The reference to ‘chariots and horsemen’ is evocative of the accounts in Exodus, where ‘Pharaoh’s chariots and his army were cast into the sea’ (Ex. 15:4). v. 2 interrupts the condemnation for a brief hymnic fragment in praise of God. ‘He too is wise’ has been interpreted by some as a claim that wisdom, previously primarily understood as human shrewdness, was a characteristic that was also to be attributed to God. However that may be, the claim is clearly being made that purely human skills were not enough to see the whole truth of any situation. An idea is developed in v. 3 which was to have momentous consequences in the history of theology: the contrast between ‘flesh’ and ‘spirit’, apparently in parallelism with ‘human’ and ‘God’ in the previous line. What is stated here as simply a warning about human inadequacies came, in the New Testament and elsewhere, to be formative of a complete anthropology that is a doctrine of human nature.

(31:4–5) The thrust of this passage is difficult to determine. As translated in NRSV it is a promise, with YHWH coming down ‘to fight upon Mount Zion’, that is, on behalf of his people. But this then offers a curious set of images: YHWH is pictured as a lion fighting for his people against their shepherds. While this is not impossible—leaders as unworthy shepherds is a common idea in the HB—it is unusual, and the more natural sense of the preposition translated ‘upon’ would be adversative: ‘against’. Perhaps this passage originated as a threat, with YHWH pictured as a lion intent upon attacking his own people for their faithlessness. Only in later tradition has it been transformed to allow an element of promise, which becomes explicit in v. 5.

(31:6–9) A prose passage follows. It begins with something unexpectedly rare in the book of Isaiah: a call to repentance (‘turn back’, using the characteristic verb šûb). Then it looks forward to the destruction of all idols, as in 30:22; this is a point which will be elaborated in greater detail in the ‘Babylonian chapters’, especially 44–7. It leads into a renewed threat against the Assyrians (cf. 30:31), making clear that it is the Divine Warrior and not any human agency that overthrows alien powers.

(32:1–8) These verses return to a theme last found in ch. 11—the hope of an ideal king. Though less widely used as a messianic prophecy than the passages in chs. 7, 9, and 11, this section puts the hope of an ideal ruler in the context of other Isaianic themes. The plural ‘princes’ in v. 1 indicates that the hope is not of a specific ruler but rather an idealized picture of the true nature of monarchical rule. It embodies šedeq (righteousness) and mīšpāt (justice), two recurrent Isaianic concerns. When these are present, the ruler will provide true protection for his people (v. 2). As in 30:20–1, the blindness and deafness imposed upon the people for their stubbornness in ch. 6 and elsewhere will now be removed; a well-ordered and properly structured society will be inaugurated. There are links with the wisdom literature in the condemnation of the fool (vv. 5, 6) and the stress on proper planning (the verb yaʿaš (plan) in v. 8).

(32:9–14) Unexpectedly there follows another attack upon women. The presentation of women in those usually counted as the ‘eighth-century prophets’ (Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah) is by and large not an attractive one. In these verses the condemnation is in juridical style, inviting witnesses to come forward (cf. 1:2). But what begins as a taunt, apparently aimed against the women, gradually changes character, and the women come to be seen as examples of those who will be forced to mourn the imminent disaster. Instead of a vintage festival, rites of mourning will be the order of the day. The image of ‘thorns and briars’ (v. 13) is reminiscent of the two songs of the vineyard in 5:1–7 and 27:2–6, though the word here translated ‘thorns’ is different from that used in the other passages. As the following verses will show this is one more example of the recurrent Isaianic pattern of inevitable and imminent disaster to be followed by restoration.

(32:15–20) As so often in Isaiah words of warning suddenly give way to a promise which radically transforms the thrust of the whole passage. Conventional historical criticism has taken most of these hopeful sections to be later additions. This may be true, though we have no sure means of knowing. In any case to dismiss some material as ‘secondary’ in this way is to weaken the thrust of the message in the form in which we now have it. Here the expectation of justice and righteousness is taken up once more, as a means of transforming the desolation described in the preceding verses. Now righteousness will lead to šālôm, peace or wholeness, and a picture of paradise is offered, analogous to that found in 11:6–9. The whole passage ends with a ‘beatitude’, comparable in form with those found in the New Testament, in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5).

(Ch. 33) is one of the most disputed chapters in Isaiah. It fits into no obviously recognizable category, and has been interpreted in a variety of ways. Some have seen it as reflecting a particular historical crisis; others, following an influential article of 1924 by Gunkel, have characterized it as ‘liturgical’, though that description has itself led to further dispute as to what the term should mean. A coherent analysis on the basis of form is almost impossible. The chapter contains an initial ‘woe’, a lament by the community addressed to God in vv. 2–9, interrupted by a prophetic oracle addressed to the community in vv. 3–6. Further oracular material is in its turn interrupted by a question-and-answer passage in vv. 14–16 enquiring who may properly live in God’s presence, and offering an answer closely analogous to Ps 24:3–6. (Childs (1967) offered an analysis of the chapter in terms of a possible historical development; Murray (1982) notes previous discussions and makes his own proposals.) As elsewhere in Isaiah there are important links with the Psalms in language and theme.

(33:1–6) The introductory ‘woe’ in v. 1 is aimed at a ‘destroyer’ and a ‘treacherous one’. The two roots are each used four times in one verse: NRSV brings this out but at the expense of a very ponderous rendering (42 words in Eng. as against 16 in Heb.). The repetition may be intended as a curse-formula (Murray 1982); it is certainly powerfully allusive, though many of the allusions now escape us. We seem to be in the presence here of more than human enemies. vv. 2–6, however powerful the enemies the confidence is expressed that YHWH’s power is greater. In ‘the morning’, so often the time of hoped-for salvation from the powers of darkness, God will offer protection. The passage which follows in vv. 3–6 offers reassurance in the by-now familiar terms of justice and righteousness; these will be the basis of lasting stability.

(33:7–12) There are close similarities in vv. 7–9 with 24:4–8 (Murray 1992: 16–25). In each passage the ‘covenant’ is ‘broken’ (NRSV obscures this rare reference to bērit by translating ‘treaty’ here in v. 8); in each the inhabited land ‘mourns and languishes’; in each normal human activity has ceased (NRSV at 33:8 ‘left’ for the verb translated ‘ceased’ in 24:8). Whether or not we follow Murray’s view of the breakdown of a cosmic covenant it seems clear that the disorder here described is more than the usual damage imposed by human enemies. There are links with the Song of Deborah (Judg 5:6), a passage which celebrates the victory over Sisera but expresses in cosmic terms the threat which he posed. Here again we are confronted with a real dread of the whole inhabited order breaking down, returning to its original chaos. vv. 10–12, as in the Song of Deborah, the threatened breakdown into chaos is the preliminary to a reassertion of the exalted status of YHWH (cf. v. 5). The language used to assert the fate of all enemies seems shocking, but it may be appropriate if those condemned to destruction are envisaged as supernatural beings threatening order.

(33:13–16) The cosmological threat of the preceding verses is now applied to a more domestic situation. The community is summoned to acknowledge the effective power of YHWH. As so often in Isaiah it appears that the Jerusalem community is divided; some (‘the godless’) express their anxiety as to their fate. But the terms of admission to the true fellowship are spelt out in ways reminiscent of such Psalms as 15 and 24. Those who satisfy such terms can look forward to security and the assurance of food and drink.

(33:17–22) Another passage put in the mouth of the prophet offers reassurance to Jerusalem. The ‘king in his beauty’ might be a reference to YHWH as king, but it is also possible that there is a linkage with the ideal ruler depicted in 32:1–2. In any case the basic theme is of deliverance from oppression, symbolized by the use of an alien, barely understood language (v. 19; cf. 28:11, where the same rare root l-ʿg, translated ‘stammering’, is found; it will appear again in 37:22, there translated ‘scorns’). The passage reaches a climax with the promise of the restoration of the proper liturgical round and the assurance of continuing divine protection.

(33:23–4) v. 21 had used the image of a ship, and this brief appendix takes that image further, though in a very obscure way. The spacing in NRSV suggests a link with the following chapter, and this is possible, but it may be that the passage is misplaced (so Clements 1980a; cf. REB, which places 23a in square brackets). If this is so of 23a, the remainder of the passage may be read as a continuation of the picture of restoration set out in the preceding verses. The ‘spoil’ and ‘plundering’ remind us of the child Maher-shalal-hash-baz of 8:1–3, for the same words šālāl and baz are here used.

(Chs. 34–5) Most scholars argue that these two chapters originated as a pairing (though for a contrary view see Steck 1985). Certainly they develop a theme found several times elsewhere in the HB. The glorification of Mount Zion corresponds with the punishment of Edom. This point is made in summary form in Am 9:11–12, Ob 21, and Mal 1:2–5; it is developed more fully both in our present chapters and in Ezek 35:1–36:15. No doubt the course of historical events contributed to this theme, but it goes beyond the historical, so that Edom becomes symbolic of the enemies of God. We shall see a further development of this theme in ch. 63. In ch. 35 in particular we shall also see close links with later chapters in the book.

(34:1–7) The horrifying picture of vv. 1–4 offers no suggestion that Edom is to become the focus of attention. After an introductory summons which recalls Ps 49:1, a picture of cosmic disaster is set out in a way that has led to this chapter being described as an apocalypse. Not just the enemy nations but also the very ‘host of heaven’ and the skies themselves are to be brought to an end. In vv. 5–7 the judgement is made specific to Edom, in terms which show the bitter hatred which developed between the two communities who, according to the tradition of Gen 25:29–34, should have seen one another as brothers. Instead of the kind of banquet envisaged by God for his own people in 25:6, we have the horrors of a community described as the potential sacrificial victims. No polemic is as bitter as religious polemic.

(34:8–15) The preceding theme is now elaborated in terms of ‘day of the Lord’ language, used so often with reference to the Jerusalem community, but now gloatingly reapplied, while Zion itself is triumphantly vindicated. The Septuagint Greek translation (LXX) introduces here the idea of a ‘day of judgement’, an expression not found in the HB but characteristic of later Jewish literature, including the NT. ‘Zion’s cause’ (rib) has the same legal term which is often used against YHWH’s disloyal followers. At v. 9 the NRSV footnote should be borne in mind; there is no specific mention of Edom in the Hebrew text, and there is a sense in which the reference to Edom in vv. 5–7 is only a more specific application of the general theme of radical destruction of all alien forces. The word ‘alien’ is deliberately chosen; we are in a world comparable to that of modern science fiction, with hostile forces barely kept at bay. Thus in v. 11 ‘confusion’ and ‘chaos’ are tôhû wābôhû, the ‘formless void’ of Gen 1:2. In the same verse the animals are part of a bestiary rather than those familiar from daily encounters. There are links here with 13:21–2 where several of the same creatures were invoked in the description of the destruction of Babylon. Indeed Vermeulen (1977: 440) went further and, drawing attention to similarities of structure, suggested that this chapter is modelled on the eschatological destruction of Babylon portrayed in ch. 13. (Williamson (1994: 216–17) adds further details of linguistic similarities.) v. 14 reminds us that below the surface of belief in one God there lurked fears of demons. ‘Lilith’ seems to have been an aggressive female demon known also from Mesopotamian incantations; she was not a ‘night hag’ (so RSV, a rendering based on false etymology). She has been brought to life again in recent years in some radical feminist work.

(34:16–17) These verses are very different in tone from what has preceded, and the linkage with the rest of the chapter is widely regarded as minimal. The reference to ‘the book of the Lord’, more properly a ‘scroll’, suggests a period when the gathering of particularly valued texts had begun, a process which would lead to the formation of ‘Scripture’. The chapter ends with a word of reassurance for those for whom the divine lot had fallen favourably.

(Ch. 35) This chapter poses a major problem for the view of a threefold division of Isaiah outlined in the introduction. Though part of Isa 1–39 it displays very close links with chs. 40–55. Some have supposed that it must have originated with those chapters, became detached and ‘by some roundabout way reached the collection of First Isaiah independently’ (McKenzie 1968: 12). Others regard it as a much later development: ‘a later development, probably separated from (Deutero-Isaiah) by centuries’ (Kaiser 1974: 362). The greater concern with Isaiah as a book that we have tried to develop in this commentary means that these historical issues will be less important though they cannot be ignored. We must certainly be aware that themes and actual expressions used in this chapter will come to greater prominence in what follows. But there are important links also with earlier chapters; thus in 29:17–18 Lebanon is restored, the deaf hear, the blind see—the central motifs of vv. 2–5 here.

(35:1–4) Whereas at 33:9 Lebanon, Carmel, and Sharon had faced destruction, in vv. 1–2 they are typified as those who will see the glory of YHWH. It is important to recognize this literary link between two chapters which historical critics usually treat as quite separate. The threat posed in the preceding chapters is now to be reversed. Occasionally in the HB the wilderness is pictured as a place where Israel enjoyed a kind of honeymoon period (Hos 2:14), but the usual theme is of the wilderness as a place of threat. To transform that into fertility was a sure sign of restoration. 55:12 shares this motif, and the universal revealing of God’s glory is found also at 40:5 vv. 3–4, another theme found very frequently in chs. 40–55 is that of restoration of health and strength, though the promise of salvation is accompanied by the warning of vengeance and recompense.

(35:5–7) A riot of imagery runs through these verses. The basic concern is for restoration of wholeness, whether (5–6a) to those human beings who were deprived of the fullness of their humanity—the blind, the deaf, the lame, the speechless—or (6b–7) to those parts of the natural world which seemed comparably to be deprived. This ‘good news’ was seen by the Gospel writers as an obvious pointer to the good news which they wished to proclaim, and so it is no surprise to find that this chapter as a whole and these verses in particular are alluded to in the NT (e.g. Mt 11:5). In the Isaiah context we remember that the blind and the deaf are the community themselves (6:10), so that this section plays an important part in proclaiming the restoration of that community to full humanity.

(35:8–10) As in 40:3 and 62:10 a highway through the desert is promised. Chs. 40–55 are sometimes spoken of as ‘universalist’, but they display a strong concern for ritual purity (e.g. 52:1), and that is also expressed here. Indeed the very title ‘the Holy Way’ implies separateness from that which is unclean; it is specifically for those who are ‘redeemed’. The final verse is virtually identical with 51:11; the two uses may be seen as a kind of refrain, in each case bringing a hymn of triumph to a joyful conclusion in the restoration of Zion and its community.

(Chs. 36–9) These chapters have often been somewhat neglected in commentaries on Isaiah. They are substantially identical with 2 Kings 18–20, with one significant addition (38:9–20) and two omissions (2 Kings 18:14–16 and 20:6b–8), and the usual assumption has been that the redactors of the book of Isaiah utilized this material from 2 Kings, in which Isaiah himself is named, as an important element in the tradition about ‘their’ prophet. Only very conservative scholars, anxious to hold Isaiah himself responsible for the whole of chs. 1–66, have rejected this approach. Detailed commentary, and an exploration of the considerable historical problems here raised, has therefore usually been undertaken in the context of 2 Kings.

In recent years, however, this situation has changed, and a number of scholars have argued that these chapters were first composed within the Isaiah tradition and then taken into 2 Kings. Williamson (1994: 189–211) offers a ‘lengthy discussion’. Whatever the circumstances of composition it is clear that these chapters play a very important part in the structure of the book of Isaiah as a whole. The community was under threat. That arose first of all from the Assyrians. God in his graciousness had destroyed that threat. But that did not mean that the people were henceforth out of danger. God might raise up another and greater threat—the Babylonians. These chapters tell of the overthrow of the Assyrians and warn of the greater danger lying ahead. Chs. 38–9 can therefore legitimately be seen as, in the title of Ackroyd’s essay, ‘An Interpretation of the Babylonian Exile’ (Ackroyd 1987: 152–71).

In what follows attention will primarily be directed to that material in these chapters which seems to have played a significant role in the shaping of the Isaiah tradition. For more general considerations, see the commentary on these chapters in 2 Kings.

(36:1–3) We know of Sennacherib’s exploits from his own records, e.g. the ‘Taylor Prism’ in the British Museum (DOTT: 67); the campaign here referred to took place in 701 BCE. 2 Kings 18:14–16 describes Hezekiah’s admission of defeat and payment of substantial reparations. The absence of those verses here gives a radically different picture, both of Hezekiah himself and of the fate of the community. Hezekiah, unmentioned by name since 1:1 but perhaps hinted at in the oracles looking to an ideal Davidic ruler, will be portrayed in idealistic terms contrasting markedly with the description of Ahaz his father (Ackroyd 1987: esp. 175–6). The ‘fortified cities of Judah’ may fall and Jerusalem be confronted ‘with a great army’, but YHWH has yet to reveal his will for his own city. The confrontation takes place at the same place as that between Isaiah and Ahaz in 7:3. We are being prepared for the great contrast between the renegade behaviour of Ahaz and the appropriate response from Hezekiah.

(36:4–10) With a nice irony the Assyrian king’s envoy, the Rabshakeh, is pictured as echoing Isaiah’s words (cf. chs. 30–1): to rely on Egypt is to put one’s trust in a broken reed. There has been no reference in Isaiah to the removal of ‘high places and altars’, but it is entirely consonant both with Isaiah’s stress on Jerusalem and with the idealization of Hezekiah. Again there is irony in the words put into the Rabshakeh’s mouth, ‘The LORD said to me, Go up against this land’, for we know that Assyria is nothing more than a rod in God’s hand sent against a godless nation (10:5–6).

(36:11–12) We have seen already that the issue of proper language is a concern of the book of Isaiah (28:9–13). Aramaic and Hebrew are closely related languages, and some parts of the ‘Hebrew’ Bible, particularly of Daniel and Ezra, are written in Aramaic. If the words here quoted had actually been spoken by Eliakim it would suggest that he and his colleagues were extraordinarily poor diplomats, revealing in this way the weakness of their position. Much more likely we have here a concern that the sacred language should not be heard in the mouth of the hated Assyrians.

(36:13–21) As in ch. 10 the Assyrians do not know the real truth of the situation. Their words are a blasphemous parody of the real situation. Hezekiah will be able to deliver the city through his trust in YHWH’s deliverance. The promises of the Assyrians are a mockery of the truth. Of course the gods of the nations had not delivered their lands from the Assyrians, for they were no-gods, powerless to achieve anything. In the catalogue in vv. 18–19 the inclusion of Samaria may be a thrust against the alleged apostasy of the northern kingdom of Israel. The only appropriate response to such arrogance is silence (v. 21) (Ackroyd 1987: 112).

(37:1–4) Hezekiah’s response is a model of correctness. He acknowledges his human weakness, he enters God’s temple, he turns to the prophet of YHWH, Isaiah, asking for his prayers. The description of Isaiah as a ‘prophet’ here is the first of its kind; the few previous references in the book to prophets have been of a very disparaging nature. It may well be that Isaiah was ‘enlisted’ as a prophet only in much later tradition, when prophetic words were perceived as the way in which God guided the people.

(37:5–20) As at 7:4 the word of YHWH to the king conveyed through Isaiah is ‘Do not be afraid’ (7:4 has ‘do not fear’ for the same Heb. expression). Ahaz had failed to stand firm; Hezekiah is pictured as putting his trust in divine protection. (Conrad 1991: 36–40 draws out the parallels between the two narratives.) We need to remember, here as elsewhere, that this is the verdict of a particular religious tradition. It would not be difficult in political and historical terms to praise Ahaz for coming to a successful modus vivendi with the Assyrians and to condemn the foolhardiness of Hezekiah which led to an extended period of vassalage.

The promise in v. 7 is not taken up again until vv. 36–8, and it is often held that a second account of the same events is inserted between the promise and the account of its fulfilment. If this is correct the break comes after ‘fight against you’ in v. 9a. Childs (1967: 69–103) discusses the historical and literary problems; Clements (1980b) offers a theological appraisal of the two narratives. For discussion of the historical problems, in particular those relating to Tirhakah, see the commentary on 2 Kings. Many of the themes of the first narrative recur again in vv. 9b–20, with stronger theological emphasis. In particular Hezekiah’s prayerful response is brought out (vv. 14–20). Though it is prose it has many of the characteristics of a psalm of lament. The uniqueness and the creative power of YHWH are stressed, along with the impotence of other so-called gods, in a way that clearly anticipates chs. 40–8.

(37:21–9) Hezekiah’s prayer is followed by words put into the mouth of Isaiah, but they are scarcely an ‘answer’. Instead, they are addressed to the king of Assyria. They bear comparison with the divine response to Assyrian boasting in 10:15–19, and also (NB v. 26 in particular) with the recurrent motif in chs. 40–55 that contemporary events are the fruition of what has been the plan of YHWH for long generations.

(37:30–5) Like Ahaz (7:11), Hezekiah is offered a ‘sign’. Ahaz had refused it; that possibility is not even envisaged for Hezekiah. The land is to undergo a kind of Sabbath year (cf. Lev 25:5). Then in language closely reflecting earlier passages in the book (cf. esp. 4:2–6; 27:6 and the earlier usage of ‘remnant’ language) the survival of the city is promised. The certainty that this will happen is underlined in the same way as the enthronement oracle in 9:2–7; v. 32b is identical with 9:7b.

The ideal picture of Jerusalem's security in vv. 33–5 seems somewhat to outrun historical fact. It is by no means clear that Jerusalem was as immune from attack as is suggested here. YHWH is pictured as asserting that this is to be done 'for my own sake', a phrase characteristic of the later chapters of Isaiah (e.g. 43:25).

(37:36–8) For the historical issues arising from these verses, see the commentary on 2 Kings. In their context in Isaiah they fulfil the warnings against the proud boastings of the Assyrians in 10:5–19 and elsewhere. One threat against the community has been removed, but it is not yet the time for unthinking rejoicing. Another threat is looming.

(38:1–6) The introductory 'in those days' is very imprecise; we need not suppose that the events described in this chapter occurred later than the Assyrian attack just described. More important is the picture of Hezekiah that is conveyed. Modern ideas of modesty and self-control admired in some parts of the West should be set to one side; Hezekiah can announce his own virtues and can also weep. He asserts his own 'faithfulness', a word from the same root as the warning to Ahaz to 'stand firm' in 7:9, and in the response is recognized as a true son of David. The tradition asserts that Hezekiah reigned for 29 years (2 Kings 18:2), so that the promised addition of 15 years to his life and the promise of freedom from the Assyrian threat invite us to consider this event in close association with the deliverance already described. The relatively rare verb gānan, to defend, links v. 6 here with 31:5 (NRSV 'protect') and 37:35. (At this point there are significant differences between Isaiah and 2 Kings, both in what is contained and in the order of the material; Sweeney (1988a: 14–15) and Williamson (1994: 202–8) offer comments on these divergences.)

(38:7–8) Whereas God's own words were reported in the preceding verses, now Isaiah speaks. Once again a sign is given to Hezekiah. In 2 Kings he bargains with God for a more convincing form of the sign; here that form is directly offered. Presumably what is described was regarded as in some way remarkable or even miraculous, but problems of translation (cf. NRSV fn.) make this uncertain. The mention of Ahaz makes us wonder whether some comparison is again intended, but it seems likely that 'the dial of Ahaz' was a recognized feature of the palace–temple complex.

(38:9–20) This 'Psalm of Hezekiah' has no parallel in the 2 Kings account. It is of a form readily recognizable in the Psalms: the Individual Thanksgiving, v. 9 provides the context of recovery from illness, and this may well have been one of those settings for which Psalms of Thanksgiving were provided. vv. 10–15 are in the form of a lament, spelling out with a variety of imagery the ill fate which has befallen the psalmist. Up to that point there are close similarities with Ps 88, but that psalm has no happy ending, whereas here the plea for deliverance in v. 16 is followed by the confident cry of those who have recovered from their troubles. The assumption in v. 18 is that death cuts one off from the opportunity to praise God; Sheol and the Pit are isolated from the presence of God. This is a different picture from that which we found in chs. 25 and 26, but, like the closely related Ps 115:16–18, it makes important theological assertions about the value of this life. But this is more than a purely individual thanksgiving. The restoration can be seen as that of the whole community, able to worship once more at its holy place after the disaster of exile. 'The illness of Hezekiah and the death sentence upon him become a type of judgment and exile' (Ackroyd 1987: 165). The 'stringed instruments' of v. 20 are unexpected; such a reference is more usually found in the heading of Psalms (e.g. Ps 4:1) and may serve the same purpose here.

(38:21–2) In the 2 Kings parallel these verses, in substantially identical form, appear earlier, and REB has placed them after Isa 38:6 (cf. also BHS, which makes the same proposal). NRSV resolves the tension by translating the verbs as pluperfects ('had said'). But, awkward though it may be for translators, it is likely that the present order is intentional. Hezekiah had been shown to be faithful even before the sign of healing had taken place. The motif is similar to that expressed in the words of Jesus to Thomas (Jn 20:29). Again, Hezekiah's request for a sign that he 'may go up to the house of the Lord' relates now not to the sundial (as in 2 Kings 20) but to the hope for restoration of its true place of worship to the whole community. The king may legitimately be seen as representative of the larger community.

(39:1–4) A Babylonian theme is now introduced. Merodach-baladan (Marduk-apla-iddina) is known to have been a long-standing threat to Assyria's assured control of Babylon, but he functions here in effect as a symbolic figure. His envoys come 'from a far country, from Babylon', which is surely symbolic of the threat of exile. Similarly the emphasis on their seeing all that is in the storehouses—a quite unnecessary detail in historical terms—is a clear hint of the despoliation of palace and temple by the Babylonians.

(39:5–8) The forewarning of the exile becomes even more explicit. Hezekiah's response has often been taken as a deplorably complacent reaction, washing his hands of any responsibility for such a disaster, but it seems most unlikely that that is how we should read v. 8. It begins with the obedient king acknowledging that all that will happen is within God's providence. Then he asserts his confidence in God's šālôm (peace). It is likely that a deliberate contrast is being made here between the šālôm of Hezekiah with the repeated assertion in the following chapters (48:22; 57:21) that 'there is no peace for the wicked' (Williamson 1994: 210).

Traditionally, historical-critical studies of Isaiah have made a sharp division at this point, with commentaries often assigned to two different authors working independently. On any showing it seems an unusual place for a division, with ch. 39 ending as it does with a look forward to the threat of the Babylonian exile in the context of the book as a whole which sees hope beyond that threat.

(Chs. 40–55) In critical orthodoxy these chapters are regularly referred to as Deutero-Isaiah, with the underlying assumption that there was a prophet who could be referred to in that way who was active among a group of exiles from Judah in Babylon in the 540s BCE. Attempts have been made to reconstruct some of the obscure details of Babylonian history on the basis of these chapters (see esp. Smith 1944). In German scholarship in particular one comes across references to the 'book of Deutero-Isaiah'; thus Kratz (1991), and, regrettably, Albertz (1990) in an otherwise very perceptive article concerned with the whole book of Isaiah. Kratz is also one of several scholars who have attempted to discern different redactional levels within these chapters, so that the picture of this material as one coherent block is no longer part of the scholarly consensus. In particular, attention is paid to differences between chs. 40–8 and 49–55 (Merendino (1981); see also the notes in this commentary at the end of ch. 48).

There is certainly no book of Deutero-Isaiah, only some anonymous chapters within the larger collection which we are studying. Attempts to structure history on the basis of poetry are notoriously difficult. But does the substantive point remain? Was there really a poet-prophet among a community of Jews in Babylon in the last years before its overthrow by Cyrus? It may be so. But we should recognize that the evidence is much less secure than is often supposed. In the first place the existence of a substantial community of Jewish exiles, living and presumably worshipping together, is assumed. But it is surely a very unlikely assumption. All that we know of ancient imperial practice in such matters suggests that they would have been dispersed, particularly if they were regarded as posing any kind of threat to good order. The idea of the massive deportation of a community which was able to remain together and in due course to return together owes more to ideology than to the known facts of history.

Secondly, there are very few historical allusions in these chapters which allow us to place them with confidence. In effect they amount to the two specific references to Cyrus (44:28; 45:1), and several less certain but likely allusions to him. Cyrus is a known figure of history whose career reached its climax with the seizure of Babylon in 539 BCE. This only establishes that these chapters (if they are taken as a unity) cannot have been written before that date; they could perfectly well be later. In fact so much attention has been given to the task of showing that these chapters cannot be earlier than the sixth century that little attention has been paid to the possibility that they could be later. (Two scholars who have explored this possibility are Torrey (1928) and Simon (1953); their views have won little support among more recent studies.) This is not the context to explore in detail an alternative reading; we should at least be open to the possibility that, in the context of the whole book of Isaiah, Cyrus is mentioned in the same way as Sennacherib, as a figure from the distant past who was perceived as having played a significant role as God's will for his community took shape. Cyrus is given favourable attention in 2 Chr 36:22–3 and in Ezra 1–6; those references, or the source on which they were based, may provide the origin of the similarly favourable attention to Cyrus here. There is no independent historical evidence to support the view that Cyrus knew anything of YHWH and his worshippers, or that he singled out a Judahite group for favourable treatment. In this context it may also be worth noting that specific references to Babylon in these chapters are very few; indeed, Duhm, who did so much to establish modern study of 'Deutero-Isaiah', gave these chapters a Phoenician rather than a Babylonian setting (Schramm 1995: 22).

We shall look at these chapters as poetry which continues to explore the mystery of God's dealings with his worshippers. There are important links and parallels with what has preceded, but also some characteristic new developments, both in style and in theological viewpoint, which must not be neglected. While the historical arguments for isolating these chapters as a separate unit dating from the 540s may be less strong than has sometimes been supposed, the distinctive features which led to the postulating of a 'Deutero-Isaiah' remain and should not be ignored.

(40:1–2) The end of ch. 39 has supplied the geographical context: Babylon. The next few chapters will retain their concern for Jerusalem, as v. 2 makes clear, but the immediate setting is Jerusalem in exile. By the time that these poems were brought together it had become clear that the punishment brought about by the Babylonians, including the deportation of many of Jerusalem's leading citizens, had not been the end of the story; some at least of their descendants had been able to return. And since that return had taken place during the period of Persian rule, the Persians here as elsewhere in the HB are looked upon with favour. Presumably they were still ruling the community when this material reached its final form.

The message of comfort in these verses and the clear intimation that the time of punishment is over suggests a comparison between this chapter and ch. 6. There the prophet had been summoned to make clear the extent of forthcoming judgement; here the equivalent announcement is that the time of punishment is past. 'Double for all her sins' sounds unjust, and has often been taken as no more than a deliberate exaggeration; Phillips (1982) suggests that the 'doubling' may refer to an innocent generation of those who had undergone exile. In this way the idea of suffering on behalf of others, which plays a prominent part in these chapters, is already introduced. There are uncertainties in these first verses as to who is speaking. What begins as a divine word (v. 1) refers to YHWH in the third person in v. 2, and this uncertainty persists through much of ch. 40, beginning with the unidentified 'voice' of v. 3.

(40:3–5) Each of the first three Gospels saw in this passage a prefiguration of John the Baptist, and applied it accordingly, though at the expense of the parallelism, for they have the voice 'crying in the wilderness' (Mt 3:3; Mk 1:3; Lk 3:3). But there are also important links within Isaiah: the expression qōl qōrē (NRSV 'a voice cries out') is virtually identical with 6:4 ('the voices of those who called'). Just as in 6:3 'the whole earth is full of his glory', so here the glory of YHWH is to be revealed so that 'all people shall see it together'. As elsewhere in these chapters there is an ambiguity in the interpretation of such a phrase. It can be construed universalistically, with the God of Israel being known by all the world, and much Christian theology has favoured this understanding. But it can also be interpreted in terms of YHWH as the triumphant warrior, putting all his enemies to rout.

The transformation of the wilderness also played an important part in ch. 35. Underlying these allusions is the tradition of the Exodus and wilderness wandering, when God had led the people to the promised land. The deliverance from Babylon will frequently be pictured in these chapters as a new and greater Exodus.

(40:6–8) A further reference to a voice suggests that the setting of this whole section may be the divine council, and this would provide another link with ch. 6, a link which is still further strengthened when we note that the phrase qôl 'ômēr ('a voice says') is found in 6:8. Only here and in ch. 6 in the whole Bible are the two expressions, 'a voice cries out' and 'a voice says' juxtaposed (Williamson 1994: 38). In the light of these similarities it is natural to interpret 'the word of our God' (v. 8) as referring to the book of Isaiah itself. 'I said' might seem to contradict what has been said of the anonymity of these chapters, but (though unacknowledged by NRSV) this is an—admittedly very widely followed—emendation of the Hebrew text, which has 'and he said' (Alberty 1990: 247).

The basic theme of these verses is human transitoriness. In the Near East the summer heat quickly withers the grass, and that is the image used here. But there may also be a literary cross-reference. At 28:4 the people were described as a 'fading flower'; here an almost identical expression is used ('the flower fades') to remind the people of their parlous state before the divine rescue had been undertaken. The word translated 'constancy' is Hebrew hesed, usually 'steadfast love' or the like. There is much dispute whether that meaning is acceptable here, or whether an emendation should be made (cf. RSV 'beauty').

(40:9–11) Jerusalem is now directly addressed, a warning against giving too specifically 'Babylonian' a setting to this section. As frequently in Isaiah (and, of course, in the Psalms), Jerusalem is the place of the divine self-revelation. Though different imagery is used, this passage is strongly reminiscent of the promise to Zion in 2:2–4 and of the return of the dispersed in 11:11–12. Here it is clear that God is pictured as a conquering king; the image of the king as shepherd of his people is a common one (cf. Ps 23; 78:70–2).

(40:12–17) A series of questions follows, a form characteristic of these chapters, especially the early ones. They are legal in character, based on the questions in a trial as to the truth of a disputed issue. Each set of questions is followed by an answer. For the poet the answers are not really uncertain; the answer is of course that YHWH is responsible for the whole order of creation. This will become a fundamental claim in the chapters that follow, and provide the basis for the often-made claim that these chapters are legitimately described as 'monotheistic'. This is an issue to which we shall need to return.

In vv. 12–14 the answer to all the questions is clearly 'Nobody'. YHWH himself is responsible for the ordering of creation, seen as a supreme example of skilful planning. This concern for creation, though not absent in the earlier chapters of the book, is one of the distinctive features of this section, especially chs. 40–5. Underlying the questions may be the idea of a divine council, with the implication that YHWH, who achieves all by his own power, is superior to the Babylonian gods who needed the advice of others (Whybray 1971); as we have seen, however, the idea of a divine council in attendance upon YHWH is also found in this chapter.

The questions are rhetorical and are not directly answered, but vv. 15–17 balance them by making statements which assert that all the nations are as nothing by comparison with the power of YHWH. Lebanon may be chosen as a specific example because of its fertility and the richness of its forests, but we should also remember the reference to Lebanon when a similar but false claim was put into the mouth of the Assyrians (37:23–5).

(40:18–20) The questions continue, addressed now to a 'you' who will be identified in v. 27 as 'Jacob' and 'Israel'. They take up a theme which was already raised in the Hezekiah narrative (37:18–19) and will recur several times. Whenever these poems were composed, they have as part of their background a community tempted by the worship of human-made representations of the divine. Such 'idols' are fiercely condemned as no more than human workmanship. There is no recognition that they might stand for something greater than themselves. Given the prominence of artistic representation in the Christian tradition it is surprising that these chapters, with their harsh denigration of such representation, have been esteemed as highly as they have. vv. 19–20 have been widely held to be an interpolation (Whybray 1975: 55), but there is no textual evidence to support their omission.

(40:21–4) The address to Jacob/Israel becomes more specific, with a note of accusation. The community should have recognized the creative power and achievement of YHWH. Another motif already touched upon in 37:26 is reapplied: the mysterious and apparently meaningless development of history is in God's control. More specifically, and relevant to the overall thrust of the book, those 'princes' and 'rulers of the earth' who imagine that they control the world's destinies are 'as nothing'. v. 24 sees a reuse of the imagery already employed in v. 7.

(40:25–6) By a kind of inclusio the questions here are closely similar to those in v. 18, strongly implying that God's creative power is beyond any comparison. The use of the characteristic Isaianic phrase 'the Holy One' binds this section into the larger structure of the book. We notice also the use of the verb bārā, 'created', a word virtually confined in its usage to the divine as creator and rare outside the Priestly account of creation in Gen 1. It is used 19 times in Isa 40–66; its one usage in 1–39 (at 4:5) seems not to offer any special link.

(40:27–31) The series of questions reaches a climax, being now directly addressed to the community. The overarching power of God in no way implies that he has no concern for his own worshippers, and this is shown by the way in which the same form of question, already put to the Assyrian ruler (37:26), is used both at v. 21 and here, v. 28. The complaint of Jacob/Israel that they are neglected or ignored by God is answered with the twofold assertion, of the universal creative power of God, and of his continuing concern for the faint and powerless.

(41:1–7) These verses take up a literary form which we have seen to be characteristic of Isaiah from 1:2 onwards: the trial scene. But whereas in that first poem it was the people of YHWH who were themselves accused, now it is rival gods whose claims are under scrutiny. The trial begins with the summons to universal silence, and the invitation to the witnesses to come forward for judgement (mišpāt, a typically Isaianic word, as we have frequently seen). Then with v. 2 the first main speech, setting out YHWH's claim, begins (Schoors 1973). It has been widely supposed that there must be a specific reference to an individual in the 'victor from the east', and opinion has been divided between the traditional interpretation, which from the Targum onwards has understood this of Abraham, and the usual modern scholarly view, which sees here an implicit reference to Cyrus, who will later be mentioned by name (Jones 1971 sets out some of the strengths and weaknesses of each approach). But there is an underlying issue which has been less often addressed: how far is it proper to see specific reference to particular individuals and events in poetry of this kind? In the most general terms it is from the east (as in this verse) and the north (so v. 25) that the threats to Israel's safety emerged. What underlies this poem is the conviction that those areas of greatest danger were also those of great promise: YHWH's power was at work.

NRSV 'who has roused a victor' is rather free, and misses the point that the word translated 'victor' is actually šedeq, a frequent Isaianic word which is usually better understood as 'righteousness' or the like. Though 'victory' (so RSV) is a possible translation, the connotations are not exclusively military. v. 4 emphasizes that YHWH has been active since the very beginning, a clear allusion to his creative role. The following phrase can be literally translated 'and with the last I am he'. 'I am he' is a designation of YHWH, which may play on the form of his name and is found several times in these chapters. We are reminded that this is poetry rather than a transcript of an actual trial by the fact that the coastlands, summoned as witnesses in v. 1, are now referred to in the third person. vv. 5–7 describe one—ineffectual—human alternative to the claims made by YHWH. They suppose wrongly that diligence in the making of idols may bring them a reward.

(41:8–13) These verses serve as a contrast to what has preceded, but they also introduce a new theme which will be of great importance. The idea of a 'servant' played a small part in the earlier chapters, being used as a designation of the unworthy Eliakim in 22:20 and of the figure of David in 37:35, but it now comes to the fore as a description of major significance, the noun being used more than 20 times in chs. 40–55. Its first usage is obviously important in establishing the sense in which we are to understand it, and here it is clear that the community of Israel/Jacob is so described. We shall need to consider later, especially when the suffering of the servant is described, whether all the occurrences of the term can be so understood, but in Jewish tradition this interpretation has been the dominant one. In the present context the people are reminded that, just as YHWH has control over enemy forces from the east and north, so in the past he has brought them from distant lands.

They are bidden not to fear. This is the same expression as was used to Ahaz (7:4) and Hezekiah (37:6); it is as if the community is here addressed in the same way as kings had been, offering them assurance, setting out the reasons why their confidence is warranted, and giving them orders for their future behaviour (Conrad 1985: 104–5). Just as YHWH has called other kings from earth's farthest corners, so he has summoned his own worshippers as if they too should enjoy royal status. 'Victorious' again conceals a reference to šedeq, as in v. 2—an important reminder that victory must be accomplished by the proper ordering of the conquered world. The reference to those who 'contend with' and 'war against' the people is a further warning against interpreting the beginning of this chapter too specifically of Cyrus, who came to be perceived as a support for Israel.

(41:14–16) Another 'do not fear' oracle follows, but with an important difference in the way that it describes the community. By contrast with the exalted relation to God set out in

vv. 8–9, Jacob/Israel (there seems to be no significance in the inversion in order of the two terms) has become a 'worm' and an 'insect'. The latter description is based on an emendation (cf. RSV 'men of Israel') but is likely to be original—it may well have been too offensive for later copiers, because the Akkadian word on which the emendation is based means 'a louse'. God is again described as 'the Holy One of Israel', but a new description is also applied: Redeemer, gō'ēl. In modern usage this word has a predominantly religious sense, but in ancient Israel it was used of a kinsman who owed duty to relatives who through bereavement or other circumstances needed help. This is a strong metaphor to use of God, and bears comparison with the picture of God as mother which we also find in these chapters. The rather confused figurative language of vv. 15–16 stresses that Israel has itself an important part to play in the carrying out of God's purposes. The analogy with 'chaff' (mōš) reminds us of 29:5.

(41:17–20) But whatever part Israel had to play, the decisive acts of deliverance were those of YHWH himself. As in the story of the wandering through the wilderness in Exodus and Numbers it is YHWH himself who will supply water and make the land fruitful. The oracle is a further elaboration of the journey on which YHWH was to lead his people (40:3–5), and the consequence would be that an even wider audience ('all', v. 20) would see YHWH's mighty acts.

(41:21–4) We return to the legal language which has pervaded this chapter. The challenge is now put to other gods and their adherents in a way which will be of considerable importance for the understanding of these chapters and of the book of Isaiah as a whole. The gods are challenged to produce evidence of their capacity to predict the future or explain the past, indeed to do anything at all. It soon becomes clear that this is not a real trial; no opportunity is given for the other side to offer a defence. The poem ends with a dismissive condemnation, not only of the gods themselves but even more basically of those who trust in them.

(41:25–9) Now the contrasting position is set out: the claim made by YHWH of the effectiveness of his action. He has the capacity to summon conquerors from both north and east ('from the rising of the sun'). 'He was summoned by name' (NRSV) follows the Dead Sea scroll text, where RSV, following MT, had 'he shall call on my name'. NRSV is to be preferred; the idea of YHWH personally summoning those whom he wishes to do his will is characteristic of Isaiah. By contrast with the so-called gods, YHWH has made his purpose clear 'from the beginning' and 'beforehand'. In their present context it seems natural to read these words as referring to the earlier part of Isaiah, which has spread out YHWH's purpose in one great panorama. The theme of the 'herald of good tidings', already hinted at in 40:1–2, will be developed more explicitly in 52:7–10. The section ends with further polemic against the uselessness of other gods. This is expressed so frequently and with such vehemence in these chapters that the threat they presented must have seemed to be a real one.

(42:1–4) These verses have attracted much attention since their isolation by Duhm, more than a century ago, as one of four distinct poems known as Servant Songs. (The others are 49:1–6; 50:4–9; 52:13–53:12.) Duhm held that these poems make specific reference to a suffering individual and originate from an author different from the Deutero-Isaiah of chs. 40–55. His theory has generated a vast literature; North (1948) and Rowley (1952) offer surveys of interpretation up to the mid-century, and the spate has shown little sign of abating since. (Whybray (1983: 68–78 and bibliog.), offers a briefer outline of later views.) Several recent scholars (e.g. Mettinger 1983 and Barstad 1994) have, however, questioned the notion of a distinct collection of Servant Songs. The approach we have tried to follow here renders the notion of a distinct body of Servant Songs problematic on two accounts. First, it has not seemed possible to be specific about authorship of individual sections within the whole poetic library which we call the book of Isaiah. Secondly, the idea of particular poetic sections referring to specific individuals, in principle identifiable, has seemed a very doubtful one. Better, surely, to try to understand this poem, like the others, in the context in which we find it. If that be accepted, we shall immediately think of the servant as the community (cf. 41:8), an assumption that goes back at least as far as LXX which has ‘my servant Jacob . . . my chosen one Israel’. A further link with the earlier passage is provided by the use of the verb tāmak, ‘uphold’, both in 41:10 and in 42:1.

The community is here described in royal terms. The ‘servant of YHWH’ is an appropriate description for the king himself (e.g. Ps 89:3). As with the hoped-for king in ch. 11 the spirit of God is upon the servant; as in both chs. 9 and 11 the servant’s task is to ‘bring forth justice to the nations’. This conviction that the king would exercise world-wide justice is found also in the Psalms (e.g. 72); it would be unwise to argue from this, as is sometimes done, to a new understanding of universalism in these chapters. The importance of justice is underlined by the threefold repetition of mišpāt in the four verses. Not only is it an important part of the royal role, it also is significant in the light of the ‘trial’ speeches which have preceded this poem. Less obvious is the meaning of vv. 2 and 4; some form of ritual humiliation undergone by the king has been suggested, but there is no independent support that such a ritual was ever practised. It has been linked with the theme of suffering and this has led to the servant of these poems being described as ‘the suffering servant’, but such an association is at best only very indirect.

(42:5–9) The next oracle is introduced by what is often described as the ‘messenger formula’, ‘Thus says God, the LORD’. In some prophetic collections this leads directly into a—usually very harsh—message. Here by contrast the whole of v. 5 is given over to identifying the source of the message, and when the message itself does emerge it is largely in the form of divine self-praise. It is a literary device of which we shall see many examples in these chapters. God is the universal creator, and the breath and spirit with which the servant-community was endowed come from him. vv. 6–7 address the servant once more, first as God’s people, then ‘as a covenant to the people’ (NRSV translation, which is accompanied by the footnote, ‘Meaning of Hebrew uncertain’). The words are familiar enough; the uncertainty arises as to their precise force. One possible solution lies in the fact that the Hebrew word berit does not always have the bilateral force associated with ‘covenant’. It may sometimes denote an obligation laid upon an individual or a community. It may therefore be right to see the sense here as a reminder of the obligation laid upon Israel as God’s servant-community (so Whybray 1975: 74–5).

The phrase ‘a light to the nations’ has powerful resonances in the Christian tradition, not least from its liturgical use in the Nunc Dimittis, the evening canticle based on Lk 2:32. But it is unlikely that any ‘missionary’ requirement is here being laid upon the servant. Rather, the confident expectation is that the nations at large will come to see the work that YHWH has wrought on behalf of his own people, and realize thereby the contrast between their own ineffective gods and the capacity of YHWH. Whereas in 14:17 the now impotent earthly ruler had tried to prevent his prisoners from gaining their freedom, here prisoners will be released from captivity. That contrast may be implicit in the ‘former things’/‘new things’ comparison in v. 9.

(42:10–13) What follows is a psalm, bearing striking similarities to the Psalms in praise of YHWH as king found in Ps 93; 96–9. We are reminded once again of the close links between the poetry of this collection and what is known of the liturgical tradition of Jerusalem expressed in the Psalms. After an opening identical with Ps 96:1 and 98:1, NRSV follows a very widely favoured emendation to ‘let the sea roar’, a phrase again found in those Psalms, rather than the Hebrew ‘those who go down to the sea’, which, though found in Ps 107:23, does not give good sense here. The naming of geographical areas which follows has no precise Psalm parallel, though the theme of universal praise is a common one there. The poem ends with the assertion, again common in the Psalms, of the warlike character of YHWH. The poets of the Hebrew Bible found no difficulty in expressing their belief in this aggressive manner.

(42:14–17) The imagery of a woman about to give birth is frequent in the HB, but it usually signifies mortal fear. It is used here uniquely to describe the feelings of YHWH, and its association with the saving acts described in the following verses is a vivid simile. (Pfisterer Darr 1994: 104 argues that vv. 10–17 should be taken as one unit, which would juxtapose the themes of YHWH as warrior and as travelling mother even more powerfully.) Here again a figure of speech previously used in the oracle against Babylon is now reused and reapplied in a remarkable way.

The poem goes on to spell out God’s saving acts in a way that at first seems negative (‘lay waste’, ‘dry up’) but is rapidly transformed into a powerful picture of transformation in language filled with imagery from the description of the Exodus. All this is to be done for YHWH’s own people; the poem ends with a renewed warning against those who continue to put their trust in useless human-made images.

(42:18–25) The inherent ambiguity of the servant’s status is brought out here. We know from 6:10 and later allusions that those who are deaf and blind are the community themselves, imprisoned in their own obstinacy by divine decree. The servant is to be the means of deliverance from these afflictions (cf. v. 7), yet the servant is also the community itself—stricken with blindness and deafness. (In v. 19 the threefold repetition of ‘blind’ is unexpected, and the word translated ‘my dedicated one’ is of uncertain meaning—Westermann 1969: 108 leaves it untranslated—but the general sense is clear.)

The latter part of the poem addresses these inconsistencies. The unhappy fate to which the community had been reduced is spelt out, and it is made clear that this was all part of the divine purpose—a theme which runs right through Isaiah, and indeed through much of the HB. God's anger had been vented against his people, but they had failed to grasp the true meaning of their plight. The shift from first to third person is in places confusing, and it is not always immediately clear to whom each repetition of 'him' refers, but what has been said above seems to reflect the main thrust of the passage.

(43:1–7) An oracle of salvation follows, with the elaborate structure characteristic of these chapters. (The repetition of 'Do not fear' in vv. 1 and 5 has led some to suppose that two originally separate oracles have been joined here, but we may properly take it as one passage, with the repetition designed to emphasize the message.) The message is a very straightforward one of reassurance. There is no mention of the wrongdoing of the community, or of divine punishment. Instead YHWH is completely in charge. He had created them; he had made them part of his family (the root g²-l, as we have already seen (ISA 41:14–16) has strong family implications); in both past experience and future hope he was active in delivering them from every kind of danger. There have been a few comparable passages earlier in the book (11:11–16 is one such, Williamson 1994: 126–8), but the unconditional confidence of this passage is striking. The references to Egypt, Ethiopia, and Seba in v. 3 have been understood as allusions to the expected conquest of those lands by the Persians, but it seems more likely that they function to express distant, alien territory. Together with the four compass-points in vv. 5–6 they show the totality of YHWH's expected triumph.

(43:8–13) We return to the language of a trial with the demand for witnesses. As in 42:18 Israel itself is blind and deaf, yet it retains the capacity to bear witness to YHWH's acts on its behalf. Indeed, all the nations can offer no different witness. This concern for reliable witnesses reminds us of 8:2, and points to the internal consistency of the very diverse elements which make up Isaiah (Clements 1985: 107). Thus in these verses the three themes of the blind and deaf, the community as servant, and the need for witnesses are all interwoven, with the purpose of bringing out yet another assertion of the incomparability of YHWH. Again we may feel that the perceived need for so constantly reiterating this theme may suggest that there were many who questioned it. In particular, the reference to 'no strange god' in v. 12 may suggest that there were or had been those within the community itself who upheld the claims of gods other than YHWH.

(43:14–21) The reference of chs. 40–55 to a group exiled to Babylon has been very widely assumed, but this is the first explicit reference to Babylon in these chapters. In fact Babylon was last mentioned at ch. 39, and this passage may be taken as an indication that the triumph of the Babylonians there implied will not be a lasting one. The reference to 'lamentation' in NRSV is a speculative emendation of the text, said in the footnote to be uncertain. The Hebrew text and older translations have a reference to ships ('in ships is their rejoicing', RV); it may be the inappropriateness of this to Babylon that has led to the emendation. Perhaps it is not too fanciful here to see a link with the condemnation of false trust in ships found earlier (2:16; 23:1). It certainly offers a more natural connection to the following passage stressing the control of YHWH over the sea and the mighty waters. The command not to remember the former things is unexpected, since elsewhere that is precisely what the hearers of these oracles are commanded to do. One can only assume that the point is that former things—whether perceived as the earlier oracles in Isaiah or past deeds of history—will pale into insignificance before 'the new thing' that can be expected in the future. That is expressed once again, as in 40:3–4, in terms of 'a way in the wilderness'. In all these references there may be an allusion back to the wilderness wandering described in Exodus and Numbers, but they go beyond that; the wilderness is chaos, uncreation, all that is basically most resistant to YHWH's saving power.

(43:22–4) An unexpected development follows. There have been many passages in which the community was described as blind and deaf, and ultimately that was due to their failure (6:9–10). But for many chapters there have been no charges against the community for their limitations. Even more surprising is the nature of the accusation now made. Whereas earlier in Isaiah (1:10–17) misplaced enthusiasm for worship had been condemned in terms similar to that of the other prophetic collections (Am 5:18–24; Hos 6:6; Mic 6:6–8), here it is failure to participate in worship that is condemned. One explanation (Whybray 1975) is to stress the word 'me' (repeated 8 times in 3 verses) and to suppose that the passage is concerned with the worship of other gods. In any case this passage should serve as a warning against the supposition that chs. 40–55 have a purely Babylonian setting; presumably there would have been no opportunity there for worship of the kind whose absence is here deplored.

(43:25–8) These verses make it clear that the unexpected condemnation of Israel is to be seen in the context of the trial, no doubt in order to stress that the community must not regard itself as free from blame. Now an assurance is given that past sins will not be held against the people, despite their constant proclivity to sin. The 'first ancestor' may be Jacob, also called 'Israel' and thus in a real sense the founder of the people. If, as some have supposed, this is a reference to Adam in the Garden of Eden it would be a rare example of such an allusion in the Hebrew Bible. But it is not clear who are the recipients of the condemnation here; NRSV 'interpreters' might refer to those responsible for the tôrâ (cf. 8:20), or if RSV 'mediators' is preferred the reference might be to prophets who had failed to pass on YHWH's words with integrity. Again something more than ordinary priests seems to be implied by 'princes of the sanctuary', but the detailed nuances escape us.

(44:1–5) Though we have expressed doubts about the adequacy of the evidence to identify a prophet active among the exiled Jews of sixth-century Babylon ('Deutero-Isaiah') it seems very likely that the same poet was responsible for most of the material at least in chs. 40–5. The same themes are repeated, the same literary style used. Yet again in these verses, after an introductory summons to the servant Jacob to 'Hear', we find the assertion of the creative power of YHWH and another oracle of salvation characterized by 'Do not fear'. Again the theme which illustrates this care of YHWH for his people is the transformation of the wilderness. The metaphor is then modified, so that the people themselves are likened to a wilderness which may look forward to renewed prosperity. Jeshurun is a rare synonym for Israel, found elsewhere in the HB only in Deut 32 and 33. Unusually, v. 5 appears to envisage those not of Israelite origin claiming to join the community of Israel, and this is likely to be what underlies the reference to writing on the hand. Though it would give a misleading impression to describe these chapters or any other part of the HB as missionary-minded, there are occasional references to foreigners being so impressed by YHWH's work for his own people that they wish to join them (cf. Zech 8:20–3; 14:16–19).

(44:6–8) It is possible that this is part of a larger oracle, with its completion in vv. 21–2, the intervening prose section being regarded as an insertion. However there is no textual support for this view, and it seems best to treat the material in the form in which it has been handed down. These verses repeat forms and themes already familiar: the messenger-formula; the use of 'redeemer' language; the assertion by YHWH of his own incomparability; the demand for evidence in support of rival claims; the salvation formula 'Do not fear' (though in this case it is a different verb which is so rendered). YHWH is here (and again at 48:12) described as 'the first and the last' and Williamson (1994: 69–70) has drawn attention to the links with 9:1. The same words are there found (NRSV 'the former time'/'the latter time'), and it may be right to read this passage in the light of the claims there made for YHWH's saving power.

(44:9–20) This extended section is printed as prose by NRSV and most versions, and this is probably right, though part of it is regarded as poetry by BHS. As we have noted previously the distinction between prose and poetry in biblical Hebrew is not always a clear-cut one. However that may be, the theme is a clear and familiar one: the mockery of those engaged in the manufacture and worship of idols. The point is made in general terms in vv. 9–11, after which there follows a description of idol-making and its absurd consequences in vv. 12–17, and a conclusion poking fun at those who are so deluded as to engage in such practices in vv. 18–20. The reference to their blindness in v. 18 reminds us of previous such descriptions of the Israelite community, and suggests that that may be the intended application here. The reference to 'witnesses' in v. 9 provides a link with what has preceded. Whereas YHWH's own community were true witnesses (v. 8), these witnesses are ignorant and will be put to shame. 'The artisans are merely human' (v. 11) is a possible rendering of the Hebrew but seems odd in context: who would have supposed that workmen were anything other than human? An emendation is possible which would read 'incantations' for 'artisans', aptly bringing out the point that all the claims associated with idols are of merely human creation. This would then lead naturally into the—perhaps rather laboured—account of the actual making of the idol. How far it is possible to read these verses as a reasonably accurate description of manufacturing processes in the ancient world is disputed; vivid effect rather than precise description seems to have been the concern of the writer. In any case the point is that what is worshipped as a god is actually no more than a left-over piece of wood. If one were to say the same of a crucifix venerated by Christians great offence would be caused, but these verses seem to have been accepted without question in both the Jewish and the Christian tradition. The last three verses (18–20) sum up the points already made, emphasizing the folly of those who suppose that objects made by human hands can have saving power.

(44:21–2) Poetic forms are resumed, with this passage, as we have seen, being possibly the original completion of vv. 6–8. The emphasis is on remembrance, not a mere calling to mind of past deeds, but their application as present reality. Servant language is used, and the overall message is close to that of 40:1–2. Past wrongdoing was real enough, but its impact has now been put completely out of sight.

(44:23) A psalmlike passage comparable to 42:10–13 follows. As in that earlier passage the whole created order is summoned as witness to God's past ('has redeemed') and expected future ('will be glorified') work.

(44:24–8) The messenger-formula at the beginning leads us to expect a prophetic oracle, but there is no message in the usual sense. 'I am YHWH' in the opening verse is followed by no fewer than 14 participial clauses (in NRSV relative clauses introduced by 'who') characterizing the mighty acts of the Lord. They begin with further assertions of his creative power. More specific claims follow, with v. 25 reminding us of earlier rejection of earthly wisdom (cf. 29:14). The reference to 'his servant' in parallelism with 'his messengers' in v. 26 is unexpected, and it may be that we should follow Greek and other versions which have 'servants', a general reference to the prophetic succession. But it is also possible either to interpret 'the word of his servant' in terms of the commissioning set out in 42:1–4, or, following a suggestion of Clements (1985: 108), to see here a reference back to 6:11 which had warned of the laying waste of cities. That had taken place in accordance with the word of God's servant who had proclaimed that threat; now restoration could confidently be anticipated. v. 27 retains the cosmic note, but it is surrounded by images of restoration. Both before and after it we have a renewed promise for the future of Jerusalem; this should not be taken as implying a specific date for this passage, since we know that as late as the mid-fifth century Nehemiah still had the task of rebuilding the city's walls. Here also we find specific reference to Cyrus, king of Persia 550–529 BCE. He extended Persian rule into much of Asia Minor and the surrender of Babylon in 539 was the climax of his reign. Whether Persian rule was also effective in Palestine during his lifetime remains unknown, but there was a strong tradition that he gave permission to the Jerusalem community to restore its temple (Ezra 6:3–5), and that seems to be the picture which dominates this poem. Though never a worshipper of YHWH (despite the impression given by 2 Chr 36:23; Ezra 1:2) he became something of an idealized figure in the tradition of Israel, even to the extent of supposing that he authorized a mass return of exiles. (See Kuhrt 1983 for an account of Cyrus's policy which notes the extent of this idealization and attempts a more balanced picture of his policy.) It seems appropriate therefore to take the treatment of Cyrus here as a reflection from a later period and as the mirror-image of the account of Sennacherib in chs. 36–7. Each was equally under the control of YHWH, Sennacherib as a warning to the community of the threats involved in their sinfulness, Cyrus as the beneficent instrument through whom God's goodness to the community could be shown.

(45:1-7) The role of Cyrus as YHWH's instrument in furthering the good of the community is now developed in greater detail. His work is described in such positive terms that we might be tempted to identify him as YHWH's servant, if we did not already know that Israel was that servant, a point reiterated in v. 4. Meanwhile, just as the Assyrians had been enabled by YHWH to carry out their destructive work (ch. 10), so Cyrus is given power to restore wholeness. He is first described as the anointed one, the 'messiah' (māšîaḥ). The evocative power of this title was tragically illustrated as recently as 1993, when the leader of the Branch Davidian sect who was killed at Waco, Texas, took the name David Koresh (Koresh is the Heb. form of Cyrus) as part of his claim to divine endorsement. To those who first heard Cyrus thus described it must have seemed as astonishing a claim as that which described Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon as 'the servant of YHWH' in Jer 27:6. Yet all the military victories which tradition credited to him were simply 'for the sake of my servant Jacob'. The tradition embodied here recognizes that Cyrus knew nothing of YHWH; he was an unwitting instrument of the divine purpose, which, in a way left unspecified, would be recognized in Cyrus's achievements. The poem ends with a strong assertion of YHWH's uniqueness as creator. The poet evidently saw no problem in describing YHWH as the creator of woe; indeed it is implicit in the way that divine agency has been put forward as the reason for the people's misfortunes.

(45:8) Christian liturgical use of this verse, especially in the season of Advent, has given it an eschatological dimension. In its Isaianic context, however, it is a brief interjected hymn of praise. Righteousness (sedeq) and salvation (yeša'), those key words through so much of Isaiah, are envisaged as flowing out from God's created order.

(45:9-17) The theme of the prose section, 44:9-20, is now taken up from a different angle. There it was taken for granted that a piece of wood was available for the ironsmith and carpenter to use as they wished. Here, using a different but very popular metaphor, that of the potter, the absurd situation is envisaged of the pot arguing with its maker. NRSV obscures the link with 5:8-23 and other earlier passages by translating the same word as 'Ah' there and 'Woe' here. There are very close links also with 29:16 (and there the same introductory word in v. 15 is translated 'Ha!'). Then in v. 10 for the first time in these chapters YHWH is directly referred to as 'father'. This way of referring to God has become so basic in later Jewish and especially Christian tradition that we are apt to forget that it is a comparative rarity in the HB itself. Nearly all the texts that use the term are late ones; perhaps by the later period the danger of using obvious sexual imagery in the description of God seemed less acute. Then, even more strikingly, YHWH is referred to as a mother bearing a child. In vv. 11-13 the rather general reference of the 'woe' passages becomes specific: the community is still tempted to question YHWH's purpose and his capacity to carry out that purpose. There is no specific reference to Cyrus in v. 13 (MT has 'him'), but it is natural in this context to suppose the reference to be to Cyrus, without forgetting the larger capacity of YHWH to use any instrument deemed appropriate to carry out his will. vv. 14-17 can be seen as part of the one larger unit, but they also have their own internal coherence. The theme hinted at in 44:5, of other nations being so impressed by what YHWH has achieved for Israel that they wish to share in the benefits, is now made more specific. Both the idea expressed and the geographical allusions show links with Ps 72:8-10, and these lands have already been mentioned in 43:3. The Egyptians, the oppressors of Israel up to the Exodus, will now come as a subject people. The Sabeans were probably also an African people; in Ps 72:10 they are distinguished from 'Sheba' (whose queen was Solomon's famous visitor), but one wonders whether the difference went beyond different spellings of the same far-off and largely unknown land. In v. 15 a theme first set out in 8:17 is picked up again. There God's hiddenness was a cause of bewilderment and uncertainty, alleviated only by the 'signs' of his continuing presence. Here the 'God who hides himself' is also the Saviour. The link with vv. 16-17 is not an obvious one—these last verses return to the theme of the folly of idol-worship. It may be that in the poet's mind these foreigners were associated with such false worship.

(45:18-19) The section extending to the end of the chapter has been understood as another of the trial-scenes found in these chapters (Schoors 1973: 233-8). As so often the messenger-formula is used, but there is no real message. Instead we have words put into the mouth of YHWH asserting once again his incomparable status as creator, carrying out creative acts with a deliberate purpose of overthrowing chaos and establishing a properly inhabited land. In a characteristically Isaianic way this is specified as sedeq (NRSV 'the truth').

(45:20-1) Witnesses are now invited to challenge this claim, but before they can do so they are dismissed as ignorant worshippers of false idols. Once again we are reminded that this is religious polemic, not an attempt to arrive at some impartial, balanced judgement. 'Who told this long ago?' may well here, as in other comparable rhetorical questions in this part of the book, represent a claim that the warnings made in the earlier part of Isaiah had been vindicated. This leads to the assertion of YHWH's uniqueness; he alone is šaddîq ('righteous').

(45:22-3) The trial is in effect over; what hope is there for the nations who have been found guilty of worshipping false gods? The answer given in v. 22 has been interpreted in very different ways. Many Christian commentators have seen this as a message of universal salvation offered to all people and have built elaborate doctrinal structures on such a basis, but there seems little justification for this in the main thrust of the book of Isaiah. Others have seen here an invitation to the dispersed Jews, exiled to distant parts of the world, to return to the true centre of the worship of YHWH. This is not impossible, but such a meaning owes much to imaginative reconstruction. More probably 'all the ends of the earth' is to be understood cosmically; the whole created order will recognize YHWH as having vindicated his people (Whybray 1975: 112). The same phrase is found at 52:10, where this cosmic understanding comes over more clearly. 'Vindicated' is a less theologically charged translation than 'saved'; the English versions have been produced under strong universalist influence' (Snaith 1967: 160). The passage is quoted in Rom 14:11 and alluded to in Phil 2:10, in senses that seem far removed from their understanding in their present context.

(45:24–5) The final and predictable verdict of the trial is now announced. Once again ‘righteousness’ (this time in the curious plural form šēdāqôt, possibly suggesting the translation ‘victory/ies’), is to be ascribed to YHWH.

(46:1–2) We shall divide this chapter according to the paragraphs of NRSV, but there is a real sense in which it forms a unity. The condemnations of idols, previously very generalized, now become more specific. Bel, the Akkadian equivalent of Baal, was another title regularly applied to Marduk the chief Babylonian god. Nebo was another Babylonian god, particularly honoured in the sixth century, whose name can be seen as an integral part of the imperial names Nebu-chadrezzar and Nabonidus. The processions in their honour are here mocked. Those who associate these chapters with a specific prophet active among the exiles in Babylon (Deutero-Isaiah) have to suppose that this part of the prophecy was an underground satire (ABD i. 653); a more natural view is that this poem originates from a later period, when the veneration of these gods was a thing of the past. Cyrus attributed his victories to Marduk, but among his successors Zoroastrianism took hold, and against that religious belief there is no satire in the HB. As elsewhere (cf. 40:19) it is simply assumed that the idols are the gods. There is no victory for them; instead of bearing their worshippers’ burden, they themselves become that burden.

(46:3–4) The use of remnant language, rare in these later chapters, offers a direct link back to the beginning of the book. The element of threat in the idea of remnant found in some passages (e.g. 10:22–3) is now completely overlaid by the notion of the vindicated remnant. Where Bel and Nebo were totally incapable of bearing any burden, YHWH will do this throughout their lives. The word ‘bear’ here is from the same root as ‘burden’ in v. 2.

(46:5–7) The comparison thus made leads into a rehearsal of some familiar themes: the incomparability of YHWH, and the folly of trusting in human-made idols. There are close similarities both of theme and of language between v. 5 and 40:18 and between vv. 6–7 and parts of 44:9–20. The poet(s) of these chapters certainly believed that the message needed to be hammered home.

(46:8–11) v. 8 is suspect textually, as the verb translated ‘and consider’ is of uncertain meaning, and it is not clear who the ‘transgressors’ are who are addressed at its end (though cf. v. 12). The remainder of the passage has similarities with 44:21–8, beginning with the summons to ‘remember’, then spelling out the incomparability of YHWH, and concluding with a reference to the summoning of those who will carry out the divine purpose. In ch. 44 that was specifically identified with Cyrus; here no specific reference is made, though ‘bird of prey’ is a regular metaphor for military conquerors, and there is no difficulty in identifying ‘the man for my purpose from a far country’ with Cyrus. It is all to be understood as part of God’s purpose.

(46:12–13) So far the community has been addressed as those who needed persuasion of YHWH’s ability; here (and possibly in v. 8 above) their attitude seems more negative. They are ‘stubborn of heart’, refusing to believe that YHWH’s deliverance (or ‘victory’; once again the word is šēdāqâ) could be imminent. It is obviously possible that this refers to the release of Babylonian exiles, but the reference to ‘salvation in Zion’ makes it more natural to think of a community established in Jerusalem but still uncertain of the carrying out of YHWH’s promises spelt out in the whole book of Isaiah.

(47:1–4) There has already been one taunt directed against Babylon, in chs. 13–14. The mockery there was mainly of the king of Babylon; here the city itself is the victim. As Begg (1989: 124) notes, chs. 14 and 47 reflect the same gloating over the fate of Babylon, a fact which is the more remarkable in that in some other parts of the HB the presentation of Babylon is neutral or even positive. Here, just as daughter Zion had once been apparently abandoned to its fate (1:8), so now daughter Babylon will be put to shame. Daughter Zion was restored (37:22); no such hope can be entertained by Babylon. De-meaning labour and sexual humiliation is to be its fate. Though the exact meaning of ‘I will spare no one’ is uncertain, the overall picture is clear, of gloating revenge against oppressors, for which the credit is to be given to the ‘Holy One of Israel’. The title is another link with the earlier chapters of the book.

(47:5–7) The following sections elaborate further on the miserable fate awaiting Babylon. Just as YHWH delivered his own people from darkness (42:7), so Babylon would be cast into darkness. It had not recognized that its success had been due to YHWH’s own decree; its cruelty and pride would now reap their own reward.

(47:8–9) The image of the city as a ‘daughter’ is now taken further by picturing the greatest losses which could come upon a woman: widowhood, and the loss of children. It was an inevitable fate, for Babylon had made claims which were proper only to YHWH (cf. the ‘I am’ saying here with 43:11). This picture is linked in a somewhat arbitrary way with renewed condemnation of false religious practice. Though in line with the condemnations of idolatry in earlier chapters, there has been no specific reference previously to ‘sorceries and . . . enchantments’.

(47:10–11) Confidence in human wisdom is once more condemned, and associated with the same blasphemous claim as was found in v. 8. Babylonian expertise in magical arts is useless; they have failed to foresee the inevitable disaster.

(47:12–13) The tone turns to mockery, analogous to the way in which Elijah mocked the prophets of Baal (1 Kings 18:27). But the ‘perhaps’ is heavily ironical; there is no doubt at all in the poet’s mind—all the supposed expertise of the Babylonians will in fact be useless. The point has been reiterated that gods other than YHWH cannot tell what will happen, and so attempts to predict the future by means of heavenly observations will achieve nothing. (The expertise of the Babylonians in astronomy was in fact considerable, but that is another story which cannot be pursued here.)

(47:14–15) With a reference back to the (mis)use of wood in ch. 44, and the implication that Babylon might be destroyed by burning, the mockery reaches its climax. This marks the end of an important element in Isaiah: the words directed against foreign nations. They have played a prominent part from ch. 10 onwards. There will be virtually no further concern for nations other than Israel in the latter part of the book. (An apparent exception to this, the references to Edom in ch. 63, is not a true exception, as we shall hope to show when we reach that point in the commentary.) One obstacle in the way of the community has been removed; the remaining difficulties in its becoming the true people of God are internal.

(48:1-2) The next development is an unexpected one, so much so that many commentators in the historical-critical tradition have doubted whether the whole of this chapter can originate from 'Deutero-Isaiah'. From ch. 40 on the tone in address to the community has been one of comfort. There have been several trial scenes in these chapters; perhaps the poet was anxious to avoid giving the impression that Israel was never more than an innocent victim and witness. Here, in a way reminiscent of the earlier part of the book, the community is itself accused of falsity in their commitment to YHWH. False trust, a theme often mentioned in the earlier chapters, appears to be the cause of complaint here.

(48:3-5) A familiar mode of address, stressing YHWH's control of 'former things' is here put to new use: as an attack on the community itself. They themselves are guilty of the kind of idolatry which has been so harshly condemned in other nations. It is scarcely possible to engage in detailed sociological analysis in a commentary of this nature, but it may well be that we have one of those pointers to divisions within the community which called itself Israel, signs of which become more marked in chs. 56-66.

(48:6-8) Themes characteristic of the preceding chapters are again used here but with very different emphases. At one level it would be possible to take the openings of vv. 6 and 8 as flatly contradicting one another and to decide that one must be a later insertion. But that only raises the question of why a later inserter should have produced this contradiction. Better to see here a poetic technique analogous to that used in ch. 6, where the people's initial failure to hear had led to their consequent inability to do so. We should also remember that the servant-community was described as deaf and blind in 42:18-25, yet that did not exclude its use as God's instrument.

(48:9-11) The stress in this section is on what is done 'for my name's sake'. 'Name' may simply stand for nature or character, as it appears to do in Ezekiel, where this imagery is frequently found. But it is also possible that there is reference to the use and abuse of the divine name YHWH, again with different groups claiming to be his true worshippers. One could envisage, though there is no proof, that this was the kind of situation which led in the later biblical period to the abandonment of use of the name itself.

(48:12-13) A fresh summons to attention, again using the language of the lawcourt, reminds the hearers of YHWH's incomparability and his creative power.

(48:14-16) This reads like a reminder of some of the themes in the preceding chapters. It is natural to read the 'him' of vv. 14-15 as referring to Cyrus; Babylon's overthrow is reasserted; and the whole series of events is claimed to be in accordance with the divine plan.

(48:17-19) A different strand of thought is introduced. YHWH is here pictured as bewailing the people's stubbornness, in a form of words ('O that...') more usually put into human mouths as a prayer imploring YHWH himself to take action (cf. 64:1). Whereas in vv. 9-11 the imperishable name of YHWH himself had been at the centre of concern, now it is that of the people. Their folly had led to the real possibility that they would no longer be remembered.

(48:20-1) We return to more characteristic modes of expression, with the hope for a return from exile in Babylon comparable with the Exodus from Egypt. It is dangerous to mistake these prophetic longings for a statement of historical fact; there is no independent evidence, and little inherent likelihood, that such a return ever did take place. In poetic form, however, this section forms an inclusio with 40:1-5, the redemption of God's servant pictured in terms of the wasteland being made fertile and prosperous.

(48:22) This verse may be regarded as a kind of editorial comment. It serves at least two purposes. First, it warns against any complacency that the promises spelt out in the preceding chapters might have induced. Secondly, it has an important structural function. It is repeated in almost identical words at 57:21, and, as we noted at 39:8, has an important link with Hezekiah's confident expectation of šālôm. This has the result of inviting us to see chs. 40-8 and 49-57 as blocks of material with their own integrity, even though important cross-references to other parts of the book are by no means to be excluded.

(Chs. 49-55) As we have just noted, there are indications within the book itself that the next section to be considered should be chs. 49-57. Historical-critical scholarship, however, has often regarded 49-55 as the next unit. It is usually regarded as part of Deutero-Isaiah, even though there are important differences from 40-8: for example, no more references to Cyrus or the supposed historical situation of the exiles, and much less use of 'new Exodus' language. The speeches of judgement against the gods play no significant further part, and there are also some noteworthy stylistic differences (Merendino 1981: 2-9). From now on Jerusalem rather than Babylon becomes the centre of attention.

(49:1-4) The first six verses of this chapter were identified by Duhm and those who have followed him as the second of the Servant Songs. We look first at vv. 1-4, not only because of the NRSV paragraphing, but also because there is an inherent tension between v. 3 and v. 5 in the matter of the relation of Israel to the servant. The servant has previously been described in the third person; here words are put into his mouth, a literary device which has certainly strengthened the impression that an individual is being spoken about. The first two verses certainly lend support; the claim that the call of YHWH went back to the time before birth is strongly reminiscent of accounts of a prophetic call; NB particularly Jer 1:5. This impression is strengthened by the reference to 'my mouth' in v. 2, for the prophet was essentially a speaker. Yet in v. 3 we find the unambiguous identification of the servant with Israel. Textual criticism is normally thought of as a strictly objective exercise, but it has been employed here in a very dubious fashion to get rid of the word Israel, either by claiming that it is superfluous to the metre (a notoriously uncertain guide) or by following a single manuscript, otherwise of no special importance, which omits the word. On all normal criteria, 'Israel' must be accepted as a defining part of the text in the account of the servant. (For a contrary view, persuasively set out though in my judgement not finally convincing, see Whybray (1983: 71–2).) It is by means of what God has accomplished in and through Israel that he will be glorified. We have seen various occasions (e.g. in ch. 48) when God's dissatisfaction with Israel was expressed; here, correspondingly, the servant's own dissatisfaction is put into words. All the loyal service which Israel claims to have offered to its God seems to have been in vain, nothing better than chaos (tôhû; NRSV 'for nothing'). But the passage ends with the expression of confidence that despite outward appearances the servant's mîšpāt (NRSV 'cause'; notice the use once again of legal language) is in God's care.

(49:5–6) An additional reason for dividing these verses from what precedes is that they are presented as a divine answer to the servant's plea. Here, by contrast to v. 3, a distinction seems clearly to be made between the servant and Israel, since the servant apparently has a mission to Israel. This may well be a further pointer, in addition to those already noted, towards divisions within the community. The author(s) of these poems saw it as part of the servant's role to restore all Israel to what was perceived to be the true service of YHWH. As in 42:6 what God has achieved through his victory (which may give the sense better than NRSV 'salvation') will be seen as a light by distant nations, even to what was poetically described as 'the end of the earth'.

(49:7) The theme of the previous verse is here developed. Westermann (1969) and other commentators have proposed elaborate rearrangements of this and the following verses to provide an overall structure which may indeed seem more logical to us, but does not necessarily reflect the less tidy literary views of the original author(s). This verse starts from the 'despised' and 'abhorred' state to which Israel had been reduced. Its 'servant' status meant simply doing the bidding of other rulers. NRSV stresses this by translating 'ebed here as 'slave', but it is the same word as that regularly rendered 'servant' and it is better with RSV to retain that translation here. By contrast to that status the saving acts of YHWH will lead to the rulers of the nations acknowledging Israel as their superior.

(49:8–12) There are striking similarities between this poem and 42:5–9, and links also with those other passages which have envisaged the transformation of the wilderness (cf. 40:3; 41:18). The most striking new development occurs in v. 12, where we find references to the gathering together of those of the community who had been dispersed to distant lands. MT sînim was taken in traditional interpretation as a reference to China (Skinner 1910: 93), but the Dead Sea scroll has given added weight to an old hypothesis that we should read here sēwēnim, that is 'Syene', modern Aswan in Egypt—a less romantic but much more plausible identification. There is evidence of Jewish groups in Egypt from the sixth century onwards.

(49:13) The technique, already employed at 42:10 and 44:23, of interjecting a brief psalm-like passage into the series of oracles, is here used again. In terms very close to 44:23 heavens and earth are called upon to witness God's concern for his people.

(49:14–18) A different literary form is now employed: the lament of Zion is quoted with the divine response following. Closely analogous forms will be found in vv. 21 and 24. Laments in the Psalms and in Lamentations frequently call upon God to 'remember' (Ps 74:2; Lam 5:1); here is expressed the obvious corollary, that in the past he has forgotten (cf. Ps 42:9; Lam 5:20). Ancient Israelites were more prepared to make direct accusations against God than are most modern believers, especially in the Christian tradition. The charge of forgetfulness is indignantly denied in words which many will recall from their use in Cowper's hymn 'Hark, my soul, it is the Lord'. The metaphor of Zion as inscribed on the palms of God's hands has no obvious parallel elsewhere in Isaiah, but we should probably see a link with 54:11–13, and both passages may be linked with the idea that a God might be 'crowned' by the walls of his own favoured city (Pfisterer Darr 1994: 200–2). In v. 17 NRSV has 'builders' (bōnayik) for the 'sons' (bānayik) of the Hebrew text; this gives a better contrast with 'destroyers', but the idea of the children of the city, already referred to in v. 15, being under the divine protection is also appropriate. Perhaps we have here a deliberate wordplay. The command to 'lift up your eyes and see' is found again at 60:4. As we near the end of the book greater emphasis comes to be placed upon the unfolding of God's work to human vision.

(49:19–21) The transformation theme, found frequently in these chapters, is developed further. The land was reduced to desolation, Israel itself bereaved and separated from its homeland, yet now the very first command of the Bible, to 'Be fruitful and multiply' (Gen 1:28) has been fulfilled in an unbelievable way. It would probably be a misreading of a poetic passage to see behind the 'too crowded' language of these verses disputes about land rights between those who had been in exile and those whose forebears had never left Israel and Judah. More natural is to see in these verses the reversal of the threat in 6:12. There the emptiness was 'vast' and the inhabitants of the land were sent 'far away'. Now the land is crowded and it is the destroyers who are sent 'far away' (Williamson 1994: 53–4, who also draws attention to links with 5:8–10).

(49:22–3) Again it is natural to read this passage as a deliberate reversal of a threat found earlier in the book. At 5:26 God had raised a signal to a distant nation, calling it to carry off Israel like prey. The promise of a reversal of that threat, already implicit at 11:12, is now carried a stage further—instead of acting as oppressors, foreign rulers are now to grovel before Israel. There is no universalism here; the once enemy nations are to be reduced to impotence. Such a vision has never been achieved historically; we are moving into the kind of visionary language which can be called eschatological.

(49:24–6) This vision is taken a stage further. The theme of prey, already used at 5:29 (though with a different Heb. word; cf. Davies 1989: 115), is reused to show the magnitude of YHWH's achievement. Most translations, including NRSV, follow the Dead Sea scroll Isaiah and many ancient versions in reading 'tyrant' for the 'righteous one' of the Hebrew text. This makes a natural balance with v. 25, where 'tyrant' is found in all forms of the text, but MT is also possible, with YHWH himself being regarded as the mighty and righteous one whose captives cannot be taken away. The chapter ends with a revolting picture of cannibalism, a desperate way of declaring the saving and redeeming power of YHWH.

(50:1-3) Though this reads like a new start it can also be seen as a continuation of what has preceded. YHWH speaks as if to answer a legal challenge against him. The 'children' of Zion are addressed; they, not he, have been responsible for the 'divorce' of their mother. Their own sinful behaviour had led to the parting, but the power of YHWH brings about restoration, pictured once again in language appropriate to a new Exodus deliverance.

(50:4-6) The passage extending usually to v. 9, sometimes to v. 11, has regularly been characterized as another Servant Song. The word 'servant' is not used, but there are obvious similarities in presentation with 49:1-6, so that for those who maintain the theory of a distinct collection of songs, it is a natural inference to include this passage within it. But it is also perfectly possible to continue to take Israel, or some constituent part of Israel, as the servant (the links with ch. 49 are valid, and justify us in seeing implicit reference to the 'servant' here) and to see these verses as setting out the community's understanding of its situation before God. There is tension in much of the Hebrew Bible between the sense that the people were themselves responsible for their own unhappy history because of their sins (thus the Deuteronomistic History, Joshua-2 Kings), and the feeling that they had been unjustly used through no fault of their own (thus many Psalms and the book of Lamentations). Each side of that tension is represented in Isaiah; the preceding verses have stressed 'sins' and 'transgressions'; here innocence is affirmed. The servant has been punished as a means of increasing his awareness of God's redemptive activity. Whether or not NRSV is right in correcting the first 'those who are taught' to 'a teacher', the phrase occurs again at the end of the verse, and provides a link back with 8:16. We saw then (see isa 8:16-18) the hope that in God's good time solutions to the anxieties facing the community would be revealed; now that conclusion has come a significant stage nearer. Again, in 8:17 the complaint was that God had hidden his face; here the servant avows that he has not hidden his face, even though the exposure subjected him to 'shame and spitting'. Language of this kind may well reflect the experience of an individual who had been the subject of insulting treatment; that does not preclude its applicability to a larger group. This may be strengthened by the contrast drawn between the 'rebellious people' of 30:9 and the claim here that the servant was not rebellious. There is much repetition in these verses, and it is difficult to know to what extent that is intended as a deliberate poetic device, and how far errors have crept into the text.

(50:7-9) But the servant's obedience in the face of insult is not to be understood apart from the aid provided by YHWH. These verses are clear assertions of the confidence that such aid will be forthcoming; they are less clear in specifying how it will take place. Perhaps that is not surprising in view of the rich imagery used in the surrounding chapters to describe the saving work of YHWH. We may note only that the series of rhetorical questions and the use of such words as 'adversaries' suggest that the context is still the lawsuit.

(50:10-11) Reference to the servant, implicit in vv. 4-9, now becomes explicit. Here, more clearly than previously, divisions within the community are indicated. The difficulty in interpretation rests largely in knowing who is addressed as 'you'. Two groups seem to be envisaged. One is the god-fearers, identifiable as the servant community, trusting in God despite the lack of present light. The other is condemned in general terms in v. 11. They have lit a fire which will in fact destroy themselves. Whether some specific point of dispute underlies this metaphor, or whether it is better understood in more general terms as rival views of the community's standing, cannot be established on such slender evidence. We have a pointer forward to the last chapters of the book where this rivalry between different groups will become still more acute.

(Ch. 51) There is dispute here as to the extent of the units. Kuntz (1982) has made a persuasive case for seeing vv. 1-16 as a complete unit, but that involves calling vv. 9-11 an 'interlude'. There is also a sense in which the natural unit is vv. 1-8, a structured poem with three parallel introductions in vv. 1, 4, and 7, though what follows is certainly closely linked. We shall follow the NRSV divisions.

(51:1-3) This is not regarded as a Servant Song but the introductions are strikingly similar to 49:1, which is so reckoned. Within this larger framework we may look at each element separately. Summons to recall the past are common in the prophets; much rarer are specific references to individuals as here in v. 2. The recall of Abraham features prominently in the NT; much less so in the HB outside Genesis. Perhaps the Abraham stories did not reach their normative form until the Second Temple period. Divine blessing and the hope of progeny were the basis of the Abraham story (Gen 12:1-3) and so they can be the basis for restoration as envisaged here (Van Seters (1975: 275-6), though he makes nothing of the remarkable fact that Sarah is also specifically mentioned here). The 'making many' of Abraham was obviously an important element in the tradition concerning him; it is also picked up, negatively, in Ezek 33:24. The use of Genesis themes goes further with the reference to Eden; there is an increasing sense, strengthened by the references to the Exodus, of a body of sacred traditions to which the poet could allude.

(51:4-6) 'Listen' in v. 4 is a different word (NRSV translates it 'pay attention' in 49:1), but the form is the same. Here once again is the theme of YHWH's deliverance being recognized by 'the peoples' (cf. 42:4, 6), but it is placed in an eschatological context. The existing order may come to an end, but God's salvation has no end.

(51:7-8) This brief strophe aptly rounds off what has preceded, with a number of phrases and themes repeated from the earlier verses. The one different element is the metaphor of the moth and the worm, but the first has already been used in 50:9. The word sās, translated 'worm', is of uncertain meaning and occurs in the HB only here.

(51:9-11) The passage begins with a double imperative; this stylistic feature is characteristic of this part of the book (cf.

v. 17, and 52:1, 11). Once more we have the recall of God's saving activity as the clue to the confident expectation of his continuing power to save. We last met Rahab in 30:7, where Egypt was mocked for its incapacity. That reference is now taken up into a much larger context. The overthrow of Egypt is linked not only with the Exodus but with the whole act of creation. It is quite impossible to decide whether the 'waters of the great deep' refer to primordial chaos or to the waters of the sea in which the Egyptians were drowned; both pictures are present. We have seen that these later chapters of Isaiah stress YHWH's activity as creator; here that is pictured, as in some Psalms (e.g. 74:12–17, where the same word tannin, 'dragon', is used) as a victorious struggle against evil monsters. The theme is the same as that of Gen 1; the way in which it is expressed differs greatly. All this is translated in NRSV with past tenses, and that may be inevitable in English. But it is noteworthy that the verbs are participles, as if YHWH is envisaged as continuing to carry out these saving acts. In any case they are seen as a foretaste of the anticipated act of salvation: the pilgrimage to Zion of those who have been ransomed by God. This theme which has run right through the book from 2:2–4 onwards here reaches its climax.

(51:12–16) God is now pictured as speaking to his people, but in terms different from those we have experienced so far. He offers encouragement in their anxieties with words of 'comfort' (cf. 40:1). The people's enemies, the 'oppressor bent on destruction' are no more than mere mortals, just as was the Assyrian in ch. 10. The creative power of YHWH is not something abstract; it is integrally bound up with his commitment to his own people.

(51:17–20) Another double imperative introduces the next divine word, addressed directly to Jerusalem, but in significantly different terms from what has preceded. What was briefly expressed in ch. 12, of comfort following divine anger, is now elaborated more fully. God's anger is often regarded as the result of human sin, but that element is not prominent here; it is regarded as an unpredictable burden which human beings, Israel not excepted, may have to bear. The image used is that of the 'cup of wrath', a theme found elsewhere (e.g. Zech 12:2) as a warning against Jerusalem itself, but here applied to its enemies.

(51:21–3) Divine anger does not disappear, but it may be transferred. In the legal case which is again alluded to here God and Israel are on the same side; God's anger will therefore be transferred from his own people to those who have been their tormentors. They will have to experience the punishment they have inflicted upon Israel.

(52:1–2) Yet another double imperative, a feminine form of the same verb ʾûr, to awake or be roused, as was used in 51:9, 17, is addressed to Zion. The exclusion of the uncircumcised and the unclean warns us that we should not stress too greatly the supposed universalism of this part of Isaiah. The Judaism of the Second Temple period laid much stress on the need for circumcision as a distinctive feature of the holy people; and the exclusion of the unclean is strongly reminiscent of Leviticus. If in v. 2 the Hebrew is followed (see NRSV fn.) it will consist of an invitation to Jerusalem to be enthroned.

(52:3–6) This brief prose passage, with its fourfold use of 'says the LORD' (in two slightly different Heb. forms), is unusual in this overwhelmingly poetic block of material. Whereas previously Zion was addressed in the feminine, here 'you' is masculine. The passage links Egypt and Assyria in a manner found in 11:15–16 but rarely elsewhere. Assyrian oppression is a frequent theme in the earlier part of the book (e.g. ch. 10), though there it was made clear that there was indeed 'cause' for the Assyrian invasion: the sin of the people. That is now treated as a matter of the past. The reference to the rulers howling has not been satisfactorily explained. REB understands it as illustrating the misery of those carried into exile; others have supposed that it is the Babylonian rulers who are here referred to.

(52:7–10) This hymnic passage is strongly reminiscent of Nahum 1:15 (MT 2:1), where its cultic context emerges even more markedly. As in the parallels with Micah in ch. 2 and those with Jeremiah in ch. 15 and elsewhere, so this passage reminds us that there must have existed bodies of traditional material which could be taken up and used as appropriate in different prophetic collections. The messenger announces YHWH's entry into his holy place, thus symbolizing the downfall of Assyria. The cry of triumph, 'Your God reigns' also reminds us of those Psalms (93; 96–9) which proclaim the kingship of YHWH; the word mālak, here translated 'reigns', is found in the Psalms as 'is king'. The whole passage is a song proclaiming the victory achieved by YHWH. Read in the context of the book as a whole, it asserts that the redemption of Jerusalem, adumbrated as early as 1:27, is now being achieved.

(52:11–12) Yet another repeated imperative pictures God as the protector of the purified community in its 'going out'. If these chapters are regarded specifically as composed by an exiled Deutero-Isaiah it will be natural to see them as envisaging return from Babylon. In a larger Second Temple setting the whole theme of a diaspora one day being able to join together in Jerusalem will commend itself.

(52:13–53:12) No passage in Isaiah, or indeed the whole HB, has attracted more attention than this the fourth and last of Duhm's Servant Songs. It is disputed to what extent it was the subject of speculation and interpretation within Judaism before the Common Era. Certainly the portrayal of the servant here was applied to Jesus within the NT, most notably in Acts (cf. 8:32–5) and in 1 Peter (e.g. 2:22), and probably in many other places as well; in view of what we have said in the introduction about the importance of the reader, it would be quite wrong to dismiss such understandings as illegitimate. This is what the Christian reader may well discern in these verses. Characteristically Jewish tradition has given a corporate interpretation to this poem, seeing it as prefiguring the persecution undergone by the Jewish community. Until the last century Christians in general followed the NT in applying it to Jesus. The rise of critical scholarship has led to an enormous variety of suggested 'identifications' of the servant (North 1948 and Rowley 1952 offer surveys of scholarship). More recently the tendency has been to suggest that 'historical-critical scholarship is bound to mistreat a cryptic poetic text when it regards it as a puzzle to be solved' (Clines 1976: 25). In its place different literary readings have been proposed.

As we shall see these have particular value in recognizing the ambiguity of much of the language: questions such as 'Who is the servant? Did he die?' and still more such loaded theological issues as 'Should the suffering be seen as atoning for the sins of others?' may not be as readily susceptible of an unambiguous answer as interpreters have often supposed. In particular we need to consider the placing of this poem within the book as a whole. Unless Isaiah is seen as a completely random anthology there will be significance in its present placing within the book. But here more than anywhere else in Isaiah one must acknowledge that space limitations exclude many considerations one would like to pursue. A century ago a great scholar, S. R. Driver, abandoned his commentary on Isaiah, not just for space reasons but 'because this part of his subject overwhelmed him' (North 1948: 1). The problems in question on these verses have not diminished since then.

(52:13–53:3) Some scholars (e.g. Whybray 1975) have regarded 52:13–15 as distinct from the 'song of thanksgiving' which follows, but the majority view has been to see a larger unity. The specific reference to the 'servant' at 52:13 seems to be balanced by the only other such reference, at the climax of the poem, in 53:11. At the outset the established identity of the servant with Israel poses no problems; the theme of the restoration of Israel following humiliation is a familiar one in these chapters. v. 15 makes it clear that recognition of what is being achieved by and through the servant extends well beyond the community ('many nations', 'kings'), but this theme has been implicit in much of Isaiah and explicit in references such as those to Cyrus. The verb translated 'startle' in NRSV has been rendered in many different ways: the traditional 'sprinkle' (so KJV) seems unlikely and the most probable meaning is that conveyed by LXX: 'many nations shall be astonished at him'.

The following verses take further the theme of the servant and the unpromising circumstances of his rearing. The language used is vividly personal, but does not prevent its application to the community. We need to remember that this is poetry, and that precise reference is not to be expected. In one sense 53:1–3 does clearly differ from what has preceded; there is now reference to a 'we', a group reflecting on the significance of the experiences of the servant. They have been very variously identified: the disciples of the prophet; a group of faithful Israelites; and so on. But perhaps the traditional interpretation should not be neglected—the nations and kings who were so amazed by what was referred to in 52:15 are now given voice. The language used is that of the Psalms, in particular the 'individual Psalm of Thanksgiving' (Whybray 1978: 109 ff.), in which a description of suffering and rejection is followed by a cry of thanksgiving for God's restorative power. As in the Psalms it is difficult to decide how far the description of sickness and rejection is to be taken literally, and how far it is figurative language, regularly employed in this particular literary genre.

(53:4–6) Here there arises the question of vicarious suffering. These verses have played a prominent part in Christian expositions of doctrine, applying the sufferings of the servant to Jesus, and understanding his sufferings as effective for the whole range of human sin. For many who may not themselves be committed Christians the use of vv. 3–6 in Handel's Messiah will still have familiarized them with such an interpretation. In its original context, however, mundane as this may seem, a less exalted interpretation may be appropriate. As Whybray (1978: 58) has noted, the words translated 'infirmities' and 'diseases' are 'eminently suitable to express the broken state of the nation after the destruction of Jerusalem in 587 BC'. Indeed, as he points out, the word hōlî, here 'infirmities', was already found in 1:5 in the description of the ravaged state of the community: 'the whole head is sick (hōlî)'. The servant at one level was the suffering community; at another level the figure was used of that part of the community which was being restored through God's saving power. The poet goes well beyond literal attention to detail in his fancy that Gentile observers would picture themselves as sheep going astray, but here, just as in the references to the supposedly God-fearing Cyrus, we are reminded of the power of poetry to stretch the imagination in ways it had never previously considered.

(53:7–9) The picture in these verses is clearly of the death of the servant, and the appropriateness of the NT application to Jesus is clear enough, given the presuppositions of its writers. Less impressive have been the efforts of historical-critical scholars in their arguments as to whether or not someone's literal death is here implied. Too often they have tried to ignore the poetic context and to make the lines refer to some, in principle, identifiable individual. In any case as Whybray (1978: esp. 92–106) has shown, much of the language here used is that found in Psalms of Thanksgiving as a means of expressing the desperate plight of the sufferer before God's saving action became apparent. Indeed such expressions as 'they made his grave with the wicked' tell us more about the expectations of the servant's enemies in plotting his death than about the 'actual' fate of the servant.

(53:10–12) Finally we reach the point of the thanksgiving: God's wonderful deliverance of the faithful servant. Comparison is appropriate with another individual Psalm of Thanksgiving embodied in Isaiah: the Psalm of Hezekiah in 38:9–20. That was expressed in the first person, being placed in the mouth of Hezekiah, against the third-person usage here. But the sentiments, of the wonderful providence of YHWH in delivering his servant from the power of death, are basically similar. In this passage, however, the language used is wider-ranging. The servant is likened to an 'āšām (offering for sin), a term most frequently found in Leviticus, though it should be noted that the text here has often been thought to be corrupt (Whybray 1978: 63–6; cf. BHS and NRSV marg., noting the uncertainty of the meaning). If it is accepted as it stands the poetic fancy of the writer envisages the suffering of the servant as comparable to that of a blameless animal victim, like the lamb of v. 7.

There are again textual uncertainties in v. 11, but the striking point here is in the use of the root š-d-q, 'righteous'. In the first part of the book this theme was overwhelmingly used as a requirement of human behaviour, whereas from ch. 40 onwards it has been descriptive of God's action (Rendtorff 1994: 162–4). Here the two are combined: God's righteousness is now to be a characteristic of the whole community. This whole section needs to be seen as a dramatic reversal of the state of affairs described in 1:4. There the people were 'laden with iniquity' (āwôn); now the servant will 'bear their iniquities' (āwōnōtām). There are other correspondences with earlier material which repay detailed study, such as the 'division of the spoil' motif found in v. 12 and in the Davidic oracle of 9:3. Whatever the historical origin of this poem, at a literary level it fulfils a very important function in the development of the book of Isaiah as a whole. One might indeed suppose that such a note of triumph would make an appropriate point at which to complete the book (the four Gospels would provide an obvious parallel to such a structure), but the remaining chapters make it clear that warnings must continue to be intermingled with the note of confidence.

(54:1-3) This is the beginning of a poem, perhaps extending to v. 10, with a feminine subject corresponding to the masculine servant. (Sawyer 1989 offers some reflections upon this juxtaposition as well as a more detailed discussion of this poem.) Barrenness was a cause of shame in ancient Israel, and so many stories, in Genesis and elsewhere, focus on this theme; indeed the word ʾāqārā, 'barren one' is never found elsewhere in the Prophets, but is used to describe Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, Manoah's wife (Judg 13), and Hannah (Pfisterer Darr 1994: 179). Here the poem offers hope for the barren one, just as the suffering of the servant had not been the end of his story. As elsewhere in these chapters the community is to look forward to a time when the alien nations will be part of their own possession—again a warning against too readily seeing an undifferentiated universalism here.

(54:4-8) Here some remarkable claims are made. For YHWH of hosts to be called the people's 'maker' and 'redeemer' is not unexpected; more striking is his description as 'husband'. It is probably right to see an implied reference to Zion or to the community at large, but in the first instance, as in the servant poems, the language is individual, and here clearly refers to a woman. Still more astonishing is the assertion that the troubles which have befallen her are the result of YHWH casting her off, abandoning her, hiding his face from her. Frequently in the Psalms the claim is made that YHWH has neglected his people's plight; here such an acknowledgement is both expressed in more personal terms and put into the mouth of God himself.

(54:9-10) The poem ends with another of the allusions to earlier traditions, now probably regarded as what would later be called Scripture, which are characteristic of this part of the book (cf. 51:2). Here the comparison is with the great flood and more specifically with Noah, but it is made in a way which significantly changes the emphasis from that found in Genesis. The focus here is on the postscript to the Genesis story, the promise that there would never again be such a flood. Admittedly this impression is strengthened by an unacknowledged emendation in the NRSV text, which reads 'days of Noah' where the Hebrew twice has 'waters of Noah'. The flood itself is regarded as no more than the occasion for God to promise the continuance of his steadfast love (hesed) and of peace (šālôm).

(54:11-17) Whereas in the previous poem the reference to Zion was allusive, here the address is more directly to the city. So far the city is 'not comforted', but that will now be put right. The theme of glorious restoration, touched on in 33:20-2, is now elaborated; the 'righteousness' which had once lodged in her (1:21), will be restored once more. Links with the servant poems are provided by the description of the city as 'afflicted' (v. 11; cf. 53:4), and by the theme of those who are taught (v. 13; cf. 50:4). Another familiar theme is picked up in vv. 16-17: that of YHWH as the ultimate creator, whose power lies behind all human creating. Whereas earlier the stress had been on the creation of idols, here it is weapons that are fashioned by human hands. They will be of no use against God's community. The chapter ends with a summary reminiscent of those we have noted in 14:26 and elsewhere. Unusually here the reference is to the plural 'servants of the Lord'. š-d-q language is again used, but is somewhat obscured in NRSV by the translation 'vindication' for the word rendered 'righteousness' in v. 14.

(55:1-5) This section of the book concludes with a poem which is formally unique in Isaiah. It has been compared with the cry of the water-seller, or perhaps more plausibly with the invitation of Woman Wisdom in Prov 9:1-6 (Whybray 1975: 190). At first it would seem as if the invitation is to all and sundry, but as the poem proceeds it becomes clearer that it is specifically addressed to the Israelite community. A characteristic theme in the prophetic literature of the exilic and Second Temple periods was the assurance of a new or renewed covenant (Jer 31:31-4; Ezek 34:23-31). In literary terms it is noteworthy that these promises occur at very similar points in the overall structure of the prophetic book. They are united also by the fact that in each case there is a strong Davidic link. (In Jeremiah this is found in the fuller development of the covenant theme in ch. 33.) Here the point had already been mentioned in 54:10; now it is taken further. NRSV, like most modern translations, makes the Hebrew expression hasdē Dāwīd refer to God's love for David, but it could equally mean (and the Hebrew usage would be more natural) the mercies of David. In any case it appears as if the covenant with David, described for example in Ps 89, will now be extended to the whole community (Eissfeldt 1962). This 'democratization' (Williamson 1994: 112) is a characteristic theme of Isaiah, with its concern for the community, but it does not necessarily exclude hopes centred in the Davidic line as well. If we are to read the book as a whole we shall need to see this in the light of 9:2-7. In the present context, however, the main stress is the summons to the community to fulfil a role comparable with that which God had allotted to David.

(55:6-9) The basic notion of 'seeking' and 'calling upon' YHWH implied engaging in the appropriate cultic worship. Some, emphasizing the links between Isaiah and the Jerusalem cult, would suppose that is the underlying meaning of v. 6; others would see a more generalized sense. In this unit it is still assumed that the wicked and the unrighteous, perceived as such by the prophetic author, may change their pattern of belief and behaviour. In the last chapters of the book that hope seems to fade away, and those from whom the prophet differed are more harshly rejected.

(55:10-11) The theological reflection begun in vv. 8-9 is here continued, with special emphasis on the word of YHWH. An obvious way to understand this is to take it as a claim by the prophetic author to be the recipient of God's word. However that may be, we have here the beginnings of what seems to have been a new understanding of God's word, which would assume major importance in later writings such as the prologue to the Gospel of John. The theme of these verses is closely comparable to 40:8, and in so far as chs. 40–55 form a distinct unit within the whole book, these two sections form an inclusio, the end matching the beginning.

(55:12–13) A recurring theme running throughout the book of Isaiah is that of paradise regained (Whybray 1975: 195). In 11:6–9 it was animal life that was transformed; here we are reminded of the 'briers and thorns' of the early chapters (5:6 and elsewhere), though the actual words used here are different. In the present vision such threats to agriculture will be replaced by cypress and myrtle, symbols of God's transformation of the wilderness (41:19). Then, in a way which contributed to the vision of St Francis, the trees can join mountains and hills in praise of God. Not all apocalyptic visions are as attractive as this.

(56:1) Though conventionally regarded as the beginning of 'Trito-Isaiah' there are few signs of a new start here. The summons to maintain justice (mišpāt) and do right (šēdāqā) are reminiscent of the early chapters of the book, where the lack of these qualities had led to the city's degradation (1:21). But there is an important linkage here which is very difficult to bring out in translation. The word translated 'my deliverance' in NRSV is šidqātī—the same word but now used, as for example in 46:12–13, in the sense of YHWH's saving power. Such a wordplay is surely not accidental. Here, more clearly than anywhere else in the book šēdāqā as a human requirement, parallel with mišpāt (justice), and as a divine blessing, parallel with yěšū'ā (salvation), are brought together (Rendtorff 1994: 185–9).

(56:2) After the theological heights of the first verse this may seem to be something of a let-down. The only specific example offered of the ideal behaviour demanded is to keep the sabbath. Very clearly the sabbath was an important identifying mark for Second Temple Judaism, and the solemnity of Jeremiah's 'Confessions' is similarly broken with a bitter attack on those who fail to keep the sabbath (Jer 17:19–27).

(56:3–5) In fact, of course, for members of a specific religious grouping within which the Isaiah tradition was handed down, the issue of who were legitimate members of that community was a sensitive one. Sabbath-keeping was one marker; now the issue arises of the status of eunuchs and foreigners. First mentioned is 'the foreigner joined to the LORD', presumably forerunners of the Godfearers of later times, but reflection on the status of foreigners comes in the next stanza. Here the concern is with eunuchs. According to Deut 23:1 they were to be excluded from the covenant community, but here they are envisaged as being able to keep the covenant, pictured once again primarily in terms of sabbath observance. The reference to 'house' and 'walls' may imply the existence of the Second Temple, but as we have seen throughout Isaiah it is dangerous to base dating on allusions in poetry. Clearer perhaps is the link between v. 5 and 55:13; the hope for the eunuchs is comparable to the paradise picture set out in the earlier passage.

(56:6–8) Attention now turns to the status of foreigners. Down to the exile Israel and Judah had been nation-states among other like states, but in the later period their descendants were essentially a religious community, bound by the laws of membership of that community. What was to be the attitude to those from outside? The literature of Second Temple Judaism offers the whole spectrum of answers to that question; here is one of the most open and affirmative responses. It is possible for foreigners to be the 'servants' of YHWH, an important acknowledgement in view of the status of the servant set out in earlier chapters. They must of course keep the sabbath, but they are thereby rendered able to maintain the covenant. In these circumstances they can bring offerings for sacrifice in the same way as native-born Israelites. The passage reaches a climax with the promise of the availability of the temple to those from any nation. Quotation of this passage is of course attributed to Jesus in his dispute with the temple authorities of his time (Mk 11:17). The bringing in of foreigners is pictured as being on a par with the restoration of exiled Israelites.

(56:9–12) This passage comes as something of a shock after the edifying sentiments which have preceded it. This bitter condemnation of the inadequacies of the community's leaders reminds us of the attack on the rulers in ch. 1, and some scholars have thought it likely that this oracle originated in pre-exilic days (see the discussion in Emmerson (1992: esp. 16, 21)). The leaders are likened to watchmen ('sentinels'), a term most commonly used of prophets, who were expected to warn the people of imminent dangers, and to shepherds, applied to political leaders in Ezek 34 and elsewhere. The point seems to be that the hope for deliverance and salvation must not obscure the need for proper leadership.

(57:1–10) NRSV here departs from its usual practice and prints an extended section as a single paragraph. In fact vv. 1–2 are extremely difficult, with awkward shifts between singular and plural, largely masked by the NRSV translation. It seems that a contrast is being drawn between a group of whom the prophetic tradition approves and others who are strongly condemned. The word šaddiq, righteous, comes from the same š-d-q root as we have been considering; at a later stage it was used of particular strictly observant religious groups; whether that is the case here cannot certainly be established. But this group is in any case mentioned only briefly; as is usual with religious polemic, those being attacked receive far more detailed attention, and their evil practices are now spelt out at length and in unattractive terms. Their parentage is attacked (v. 3); then they are accused of apparently childish behaviour (v. 4); finally unspecified sexual offences and even child-sacrifice are attributed to them (v. 5). Not surprisingly Hanson (1979: 186) headlines his discussion of this passage 'The Conflict grows acrimonious!' It seems unlikely that we can gain any objective picture of those being attacked; these are the standard terms of religious abuse. It looks as if the following verses may yield more sense, but this hope proves unwarranted when we discover that the 'you' of NRSV is sometimes masculine plural and sometimes feminine singular. All we can say is that various practices were regarded as idolatrous by those from whom these oracles originate, and that in the structure of the book as a whole we are reminded that the prostitution of the city described in 1:21–3 is a continuing danger. The promise of divine deliverance so vividly set out in the preceding chapters is not unconditional.

(57:11–13) These verses seem to continue the preceding condemnation. v. 12 must surely be ironic, a point rather obscured by NRSV ‘concede’ for RSV ‘tell of’. ‘Concede’ suggests a genuine lawsuit, but the poet can scarcely have seriously accepted the šēdāqā (righteousness) of those who have just been condemned so bitterly. The poem ends with a mockery of idols reminiscent of chs. 44 and 45, and an assertion of the impregnable position of those who take refuge in YHWH. The ‘holy mountain’ reminds us not only of 56:7, with its aspirations for the temple, but also of 11:9, with its picture of paradise restored.

(57:14–21) The double imperative reminds us of the series of such usages found in chs. 49–55, and this stylistic indication of a new start is borne out by the consoling contents of this passage, a strong contrast with what has preceded. The ‘high and lofty one . . . whose name is Holy’ offers an obvious link with 6:1–3, and there follows an assurance of God’s continuing presence with the contrite and humble. This positive approach to the humble is somewhat unexpected; the root involved, š-p-l, has been used several times in Isaiah but always previously in the negative sense of being humbled (e.g. 2:9). The theme will recur again (cf. 66:2); some scholars would see in it a pointer to the socially excluded status of those responsible for this part of the book (Hanson 1979: 78–9). The most natural reading of the following verses is to suppose that those now being praised had turned from unacceptable ways, rather than that a different group is spoken of in v. 17. But in vv. 19–20 a clear contrast is made between those accepted by God and ‘the wicked’, and in this context the refrain, encountered already at 48:22, fits naturally into its context. (See the comment on 48:22 for the function of this refrain.)

(58:1–5) We have seen that proper observance of the sabbath was important for the Isaiah community. Another characteristic religious observance, fasting, receives a more qualified endorsement. It is most conspicuously practised by those described in 57:20 as wicked, and in these verses their devotion—to outward appearance at least—seems manifest. It seems unlikely, therefore, that they should simply be identified with the idolaters of 57:3–10, unless, as some scholars have supposed, relations between two groups which were at first no worse than strained deteriorated rapidly so that all kinds of attacks could be launched. There is evidence from Zech 7–8, Joel, and Ezra that the desirability of fasting was an issue in the early Second Temple period (and many have supposed that this part of Isaiah originated at that time). Joel 1:14 and Ezra 8:21 approve of fasting, whereas as in Zech 8:19 fasting is apparently rejected. So here fasting is seen as too readily accompanied by unacceptable behaviour.

v. 3 raises two important points. First, this passage stands within the prophetic tradition, best known from Amos but well exemplified as a major theme in Isaiah (cf. 1:10–17), which warns that religious practice is worse than useless if not accompanied by true social justice. Secondly we are reminded that prophetic words were characteristically addressed to the upper strata of society—presumably those who had sufficient leisure to attend to them: it is the one who oppresses the workers rather than the workers themselves who is addressed.

(58:6–9a) Fasting is no longer the subject of concern. Instead, the theme of social justice is taken a stage further, in a passage which has become a classic as an expression of one vital side of the prophetic movement. Not least among its attractions for religious people down the ages is the fact that it is couched in the form of an exhortation, with a powerful promise attached, rather than in terms of condemnation. Again it is clear that it is the upper strata of society who are being addressed; those who have bread and a house, as against the hungry and the homeless poor.

(58:9b–12) This and the following passage (vv. 13–14) are similar in form: a series of conditions followed by a spelling out of the results which will follow obedience to those conditions. The contents, however, differ. Here we have a continuation of the promise already made in vv. 6–9a. Active concern for the needs of others will ensure that God’s saving activity becomes available. It is doubtful how far the language of restoration in v. 12 is to be applied literally, for example as picturing the restoration of ruined Jerusalem. It is at least as likely that this is a metaphor for the renewal of the community, a theme which runs through so much of Isaiah.

(58:13–14) It might seem logical that, having rejected the need for fasting, sabbath-observance could also be considered otiose. But poetry and religious practice have a habit of resisting logical demands. As in ch. 56, sabbath-keeping is to be an essential feature of the community. It is the ‘holy day of YHWH’, and we have seen enough of the importance of holiness in Isaiah to know that this is a guarantee of its status.

(59:1–8) After the encouragement implicit in the exhortations of ch. 58 the harsh condemnations of these verses provide a striking contrast. The theme of YHWH as saviour, implicit already in the name Isaiah itself, has run right through the book from ch. 12 onwards, yet salvation still seems afar off. This is not due to any lack of capacity on YHWH’s part. It is the result of the iniquities (once again the word used is ‘āwôn) of the community, or at least of those opposed by the Isaiah group. A whole catalogue of wrongdoing follows. For some of the items a literal understanding is possible, though not required (false dealings in the law-courts, v. 4). Other accusations defy precise interpretation (‘They hatch adders’ eggs and weave the spider’s web’, v. 5).

vv. 7–8 are quoted by Paul in Rom 3:15–27, following a quotation from Ps 14, and then by a curious error these verses came to be incorporated in the Book of Common Prayer version of Ps 14, with which they have no original connection.

(59:9–15a) A lament follows. It is not easy to decide whether we are to envisage the ‘they’ of v. 8 as now speaking in the first person, or whether this reflects tensions within the community. The latter is perhaps easier: the lack of mišpāt (justice) among those condemned has had an invasive effect, and this leads to the true worshippers feeling themselves to be deprived of mišpāt and šēdāqā. In the Psalms most laments are in effect protestations of innocence, with the fault for present troubles lying elsewhere. Here, by contrast, there is a confession of sin (vv. 12–13).

(59:15b–19) YHWH's response to these troubles is now set out. This describes YHWH as the Divine Warrior, an image running through much of the HB from Ex 15:3 on, and frequently used in Isaiah (e.g. 51:9–11). Here the conflict is spelt out in greater detail. The threat to peace is found in the lack of justice; there is no one else to intervene, so YHWH himself, pictured as clad like a warrior, brings a retribution which will be acknowledged in world-wide terms (Hanson 1979: 124). The wording provided the author of Ephesians with the basis for his picture of the Christian's warfare, but it is a theme which was to have an ominous future in the history of religion, as various fanatical groups have identified themselves with God's supposedly warlike purposes.

(59:20–1) The first verse is better seen as the climax of the preceding poem, stressing that Zion, so prominent in the Isaiah tradition, will be the locale of the divine triumph manifested to those who 'turn from transgression'. It is not specified who is involved here. The following verse, one of the rare prose elements in this part of the book, seems unrelated to its context. It is not clear who is being addressed; it may be an assertion of the lasting validity of the words of YHWH spoken through prophets, and the promise of the spirit provides a link with 61:1.

(60:1–3) Chs. 60–2 are often regarded as the high point of the last part of Isaiah, providing many links back with 40–55. Certainly we shall see themes here which encourage us in our reading of the book as a whole. The promise of salvation, muted in chs. 56–9, now comes strongly to the fore once again, not least in these opening verses. In some ways it almost seems as if the vision in ch. 6 undergoes significant modification. There the whole earth was full of the glory of YHWH; here the glory appears over the saved community, whereas darkness covers the earth. We are warned against too easy a universalism; light and brightness come to other nations and kings only by way of Israel. This last theme is strikingly similar to 2:4.

(60:4–7) The gathering of the nations is now described in greater detail, though throughout this chapter it is noteworthy that the nations described are not those who had ruled over Israel (Assyria, Babylon, Persia), but those referred to in its traditions, especially Genesis. Within Isaiah itself there are literary links, first between v. 4a and 49:18, which are identical, and then more generally with such passages as 49:22, spelling out the privileged status of the community's offspring, and also with some Psalms, notably Ps 72 with its description of the bringing of tribute. The gold and frankincense of v. 6 provide part of the literary background to the story of the wise men in Mt 2. Only in its conclusion, with its emphasis on the temple, is the stress somewhat different from the other passages.

(60:8–16) As this extended section moves forward it becomes increasingly clear that it is the holy city Zion which is being apostrophized. v. 10b could serve as a summary of a large part of the book as a whole, spelling out how God's wrath against his city and people has turned to favour. In all this foreigners, the former oppressors, have their part to play, so that v. 12 strikes an unexpectedly harsh note. It is often understood as prose (BHS), and some regard it as 'a secondary interpolation' (so Emerson 1992: 42), but it does represent one strand in the book which speaks of divine vengeance on enemies (cf. 63:1–6). The remainder of the present passage, however, is more concerned with spelling out the exalted state of Zion than with the fate of its enemies. It is unwise to try to use poetry of this kind as a guide to the rebuilding of Jerusalem after its destruction; Williamson (1989: 149) has noted that v. 13 has been used as a proof that the temple both has been and has not been built. In a vivid figure of speech at the climax (v. 16) Zion is pictured as a suckling infant—a remarkable transformation of the whore of 1:21. But though still at the breast (of kings!) Zion is mature enough to know what 'the Mighty One of Jacob' has done for her. The verse is clearly meant to be read with 49:26. What had there been shown to 'all flesh' is now perceived by Zion herself.

(60:17–22) šālôm and šēdāqâ, such prominent terms throughout Isaiah, are now pictured as in full control, guiding the fortunes of the restored city. With such overseers and taskmasters oppression is far away and yěšū'â ('salvation', another constantly recurring expression) and tēhillâ ('praise', a much less frequently found term, though cf. 42:10, 12; notice also that the Hebrew name for the Psalms, with which Isaiah has so much in common, is tēhillîm) will become the basis of trust. It is clear that here a tendency already implicit in what has preceded is taken further: we are moving into the world of apocalyptic imagery, in which the realities of daily living are swept up into a vision of divine possibilities. In 65:17 this is taken even further into the thought of new heavens and a new earth. Perhaps equally visionary and removed from everyday reality is the hope that 'your people shall all be righteous (šāddiqîm)', but the prophetic vision extends even to this possibility. Finally, in words reminiscent of Gen 12:2, a population explosion is envisaged. What might today seem a threat was in the ancient world an occasion of joy.

(61:1–4) 11:2 had promised that 'the spirit of the LORD' would come upon God's chosen one; here in language reminiscent of the servant passages in chs. 40–55 the claim is made to indwelling by that spirit and through God's anointing—mā-šah, the word from which 'messiah' is derived. Not surprisingly, therefore, the figure here depicted has been understood as an ideal king (Eaton 1979: 90), though the bringing of good news suggests that prophetic elements are also present. As in 11:4 the role of this spirit-filled figure is to bring about justice, particularly to those most liable to be the victims of injustice. It was natural that Luke should find this an appropriate passage on which to base his presentation of the ministry of Jesus (4:18–19). The themes of 'release' and of a particular 'year of favour' recall the Jubilee described in Lev 25, whereas 'the day of vengeance' has already been mentioned in Isaiah (34:8). But whereas the earlier passage described that vengeance in gruesome detail, here it is no more than a passing allusion, perhaps introduced as a wordplay with the following promise of comfort. (The words for 'vengeance', nāqam, and 'comfort', nāham, are very similar in Heb.) The comforting provides a link with 40:1, and it is then elaborated using a variety of metaphors. The destruction which has played so prominent a part early on in the book will now be restored.

(61:5–7) The ambivalent attitude to foreigners which has run through the whole book is found again. Here strangers and foreigners are welcome, but only in a subordinate role; it is the community itself which will enjoy the wealth and riches of other nations. The community itself is to be given priestly status; and here difficulties of interpretation arise. Is this to be taken literally, for example as providing scriptural warrant for the belief held by some Christian bodies in the 'priesthood of all believers'? Or is a sociological reading appropriate, so that the thrust of this passage is against those who claimed an exclusive priestly status in Second Temple Israel? Or is it better simply to see here a metaphor, comparable to many others in these chapters, a way of expressing the favoured status of the true community? v. 7 is difficult; there seems to be a link with 40:2 (which would argue against the NRSV emendation of Heb. 'your' to 'their'), but the exact force of the language is not easy to capture ('quite unintelligible', Whybray 1975: 243).

(61:8–11) v. 8 is put into the mouth of YHWH himself, but in the rest of the section the 'I' is the prophetic voice. The need for justice (mišpāt) is again reaffirmed. NRSV then follows some ancient versions and the majority of modern commentators in reading 'robbery and wrongdoing', and this may be right. But MT 'robbery with a burnt offering' is not to be ruled out; it would tie in well with 1:11, and serve as a warning to the community that justice must accompany their sacrifices. The covenant theme is then picked up from 55:3. As in v. 5 foreigners have a subordinate position, as those who will acknowledge Israel's blessed condition. The chapter ends with the Zion community expressing its thanksgiving to God in psalm-like language and with very varied metaphors for the blessings that have been promised.

(62:1–3) There has been much dispute as to the identity of the 'I' in v. 1: is it a prophetic voice or YHWH himself? The same problem arises later in the chapter (Emmerson (1992: 76–8) provides a brief survey). We must ask, however, whether we should expect poetry to yield an objective answer to such a question. Clearly the poem sees as essential to the divine plan the 'vindication' (šedeq once again) and 'salvation' (yš'ûā) of Zion. Here the nations are no more than witnesses of the astonishing transformation that is envisaged. A series of blessings for Zion is spelt out: a new name and royal status. The first of these will be spelt out more fully in the next oracle.

(62:4–9) The giving of a new name did not necessarily mean the abandonment of the old one; Jacob was called Israel (Gen 32:28; 35:10), but still continued to be known as Jacob. The destruction of Jerusalem in 587 seems to have led all the main prophetic traditions to envisage a new name for the restored city (Jer 33:16; Ezek 48:35), and the renaming here is in line with that pattern (Pfisterer Darr 1994: 198–200). The 'desolate' land described in 1:7 is now transformed. Here, perhaps more clearly than anywhere else in the book, the picture of YHWH as the marriage-partner of the city emerges. With v. 6 the imagery changes once more to that of a city and its inhabitants (and the issue of the first-person reference emerges again). Now the foreigners are no more than witnesses of all that YHWH is achieving for his own community.

(62:10–12) We return to the double imperatives which have been a marked feature of the book from ch. 40 onwards. The link with ch. 40 is strengthened by the building of the highway, the processional way leading up to the restored city, and by the identity of the last part of v. 11 with 40:10. The restoration proclaimed as it were from a distance in the earlier chapter is now coming more sharply into focus. This is emphasized by the names given to the community in v. 12. The transformation begun in v. 4 is complete; what once was called 'forsaken' shall be so no longer.

(63:1–6) From these rarefied heights it seems a steep descent to the bloodthirsty language of this passage. The nineteenth-century hymn-writer may have found himself able to read these verses in terms of Christ's passion ('Who is this with garments gory | Triumphant from Bozrah's way?'), but such an understanding is alien to a natural reading of the passage. (The poem also underlies the American 'Battle Hymn of the Republic', which links it with Christ's triumph, but in terms closer to the original: 'Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord; | He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored'.) The poem portrays YHWH as the Divine Warrior, as does 59:15–19, with which there are several links: cf. 59:16 with v. 5 and 59:18 with vv. 4 and 6. The form used at the outset is that of the watchman demanding to know the identity of the fearsome figure approaching the city. His questions provide the opportunity for a divine warrior hymn, exulting in the victory that has been won. Edom, referred to in v. 1, was assigned typical status as the enemy in Second Temple Judaism (cf. Ps 137 and Obadiah), and later symbolized such enemies of Judaism as the Roman Empire and the Christian church (Dicou 1994: 204). In this passage the symbolic element is already present, for the hymn is concerned with any hostile nation, not just Edom. But ch. 34 has already shown that this anti-Edom strand is an important element in Isaiah, and the references to Edom and Bozrah should certainly be retained, against the widely held emendation, still suggested by BHS, to words meaning 'stained red' and 'one who treads grapes' (Whybray 1975: 253). The reply takes up once again the theme of 'vindication' (šēdāqā), thereby providing a strong link with what has preceded. The metaphor of the winepress is reused in Rev 19:15.

(63:7–9) It is widely and probably rightly held that 63:7–64:12 constitute a single extended unit, comparable to the community laments found in such Psalms as 44 and 74. We shall look at the constituent elements, while trying to bear in mind the presence of a larger context, a context which reminds us once again of the close links between the language of Isaiah and that of the Jerusalem temple. The lament begins with the characteristic recall of past times, when God had been personally active in protecting his people (cf. Ps 44:1–8). As in 61:10 the 'I' seems to denote a prophetic voice, but it plays no further part in the lament.

(63:10–19) A very characteristic feature of this and of the laments in the Psalms is the vivid description of the disasters that have befallen the community. There are links also with Lamentations, but there the disaster is largely regarded as inexplicable; here the context is immediately provided by the acknowledgement of the people's rebellion (v. 10). The usage, 'holy spirit of God' is rare in the HB, and this passage was seized upon by the writer to the Ephesians (4:30) in the development of a distinctive Christian understanding. The references to Moses are unique in Isaiah; it would be unwise to build anything on the NRSV description of Moses as 'servant'; this is based on an emendation to the Hebrew text, and a more natural modification would offer 'Moses and his people' (Hanson 1979: 84). The example of the deliverance at the Exodus is used, both because it was the paradigm of God's saving power, and also because it was so closely juxtaposed in tradition with the community's wilderness rebellion. With v. 15 we reach the next stage of the lament; the complaint that God is taking no notice of his people's fate. It is as if he has forgotten them. v. 16 has been understood by some (esp. Hanson 1979: 92–3; Achtemeier 1982: 115–18) as indicative of a division within the community, with the names 'Abraham' and 'Israel' standing for a rival group. But this is surely to read too specific a reference into allusive poetry. More naturally we may suppose that the poet is hoping that though Abraham and Israel (Jacob) are long gone, the continuing power of YHWH could and should be used on the people's behalf. In v. 18 it is natural to see a reference to the destruction of the Jerusalem temple, and to identify that with the Babylonian attack of 587/6 (2 Kings 25:9), but once again we should be aware of the danger in attempting precise cross-reference; poetic allusions and historical statements occupy different frames of reference.

(64:1–12) This extended section continues to reflect the characteristic features of the communal lament. There is a good deal of repetition, but that is not to be regarded as a weakness in this kind of poem. So v. 1 reflects 63:15; vv. 2–4 recollect God's past mighty deeds in a way analogous to 63:7–14. Then comes the renewed acknowledgement of the people's sin, now made more direct by the use of the first person plural (v. 5; cf. 63:10). This description of sin is further elaborated here, with the interesting logic in v. 7 that they have ceased calling on God because he doesn't listen. The notion of God hiding his face is most characteristic of the Psalms (cf. Ps 44:24), but we should also see a link with Isa 8:17 and with 45:15 where the 'hiddenness' of God allowed a measure of hope which is scarcely present here. But amid this despair the community still has a claim upon God as its father, recalling the theme of 63:16, and the poem ends with a final plea that God will be so moved by the unhappy state into which the places of his worship have fallen that he will stir from his apparently unending silence. Questions of God feature frequently in lament psalms, but usually in the body of the psalm (Ps 44:24; 74:10–11); here the lament ends with the question still being asked. We are warned against supposing that the confidence of many of the later chapters of the book tell the whole story.

(65:1–7) This is the first part of a longer unit, which extends to v. 16. YHWH himself is now pictured as speaking, and in that sense this provides an obvious response to the anxious pleas of the previous chapter. We are invited to see that idolatrous practices are the cause of the people's continuing rejection. In many ways, that is to say, we are back in the situation depicted in ch. 1, though with an important development. Ch. 1 seemed to offer hope to those who would mend their ways (e.g. vv. 18–20); here it seems as if that door has been closed, and there is now no alternative to punishment (Carr 1993: 73–4). However that may be, the links between these verses and ch. 1 are striking. The 'gardens' of v. 3 recall those in 1:29, a verse in which the themes of choosing and delighting are picked up here in vv. 12–13 (Sweeney 1988a: 23). This section is clearly a picture of a community rejected because of practices regarded as idolatrous. Less certain is the attempt to reconstruct what those practices actually were. We are back in the world of religious polemic, in which any practice, however appalling, can be attributed to one's enemies.

(65:8–16) Whereas the first part of the unit 1–16 was concerned only with the looked-for fate of idolaters, here a series of contrasts is drawn, introduced at vv. 8 and 13 by the prophetic messenger formula 'says the LORD'. On the one hand is the promise to those who are judged to have remained faithful (vv. 8–10); on the other further idolatrous practices are listed, ensuring the condemnation of those engaged in them (vv. 11–12). Following the second prophetic introduction the contrast becomes even sharper as it sets out the different fates awaiting 'my servants' (here regularly in the plural; a divided community cannot be addressed as 'servant') and 'you'. The third-person references of vv. 1–7 are now pictured as spoken directly to the offenders. This contrast is an important difference from the early chapters of the book, where the community as a whole was apparently condemned (though even there there were presumably those who shared the standpoint of the author of the poems and expected to escape judgement). In v. 11 NRSV translates the Hebrew words gad and meni as 'Fortune' and 'Destiny'; this is the only direct biblical reference to their worship, though Gad is frequent as one element in place names. The theme of delighting and of right and wrong choice in v. 12 provides another link with 1:29, and strengthens the impression of a deliberate rounding-off of the completed collection.

(65:17–25) The bitterness of the preceding poem gives way to a new promise. 'For' at the outset suggests a link with what has preceded, but this may be an asseverative usage: 'Surely I am!' YHWH as creator has been a recurrent theme since ch. 40, and the last two chapters of the book take this to a climax with a complete renewal of heaven and earth (cf. 66:22). The 'former things' played an important part in the lawcourt-like material of ch. 41; now, as in 43:18, they are to be set aside. The cosmic picture of v. 17 then narrows down to hopes for Jerusalem in 18–19, but perhaps in view of the way the city is idealized in Isaiah the shift is less dramatic than it seems. The blessings promised in the following verses are characteristic of the hopes of an agricultural community in the ancient world. The allusion to a tree in v. 22 may be a deliberate contrast to the rejected trees of 1:29–31, in view of other allusions to that section in these final chapters (Sweeney 1988a: 23). However that may be, it is clear that v. 25 offers deliberate allusions to 11:6–9, several phrases from which are brought together in an idealized description of Jerusalem, 'my holy mountain'. The prophetic formula is added as in vv. 8 and 12 to provide additional authenticity to the vision. It is a picture akin to, but not yet fully developed into, the apocalyptic visions of a later period.

(66:1–2) Another messenger formula introduces an oracle which begins conventionally enough, but then develops unexpectedly. Where is God's dwelling? It is natural, particularly in the light of the immediately preceding reference to 'my holy mountain' to speak of God as dwelling in heaven and not confined to an earthly house (cf. 57:15). Much more unusual is the apparent rejection of the temple at the end of v. 1. It is most unlikely that there is a reference here to a sanctuary other than the Jerusalem temple. It is possible that deliberately exaggerated language is being used, but in any case it is likely that we have a warning, comparable to 1:10–17, against excessive trust in any earthly building—even the very temple itself (Emmerson 1992: 58). That God is indeed pictured as speaking from the temple emerges clearly from v. 6. Just as the earlier passage went on to spell out what was required of God's true worshippers, so here v. 2 emphasizes what God really looks for.

(66:3–5) The dangers of false worship are now spelt out more fully, though unfortunately not more clearly. The Hebrew consists of a series of four pairs of statements, the first in each pair describing normal cultic practice, the second an offensive action. There is no indication of the connection between them. Thus 3a could be translated 'The one who slaughters an ox, the one who kills a human being'. Most ancient versions and most modern translations (e.g. NRSV) insert a comparison ('is like'), with the implication that all sacrificial worship is unacceptable. This scarcely seems likely. Perhaps more plausible is to suppose that those in charge of the cult are being condemned, their legitimate actions being no better than the grossest syncretism. (There is a helpful discussion in Schramm 1995: 166–70.) v. 5 seems to stand somewhat apart from what has preceded, and acts as a summary. It is introduced by the solemn formula 'Hear the word of the Lord' found in a similar context at 1:10. The divisions within the community seem less sharp than in the preceding verses, difficult though those are. Here those who are being opposed are still 'your own people', even if they hate and reject you.

(66:6) is taken by NRSV as an isolated verse, but it is perhaps best seen as linked with the preceding, and claiming that God will denounce from the temple those whom the poet regards as his enemies. The contrast with the doubts about the temple in v. 1 is striking.

(66:7–9) The theme of Zion as the mother of children is taken up again, as in 54:1–3. But the most striking contrast is with 37:3. There children came to the birth, but there was no strength to bring them forth. Now, by means of a rhetorical question, YHWH gives assurance that he will bring to birth (NRSV: 'open the womb', the same verb as in 37:3). By an extraordinary metaphor YHWH is pictured as a midwife—so effective in the task that there will be no labour pains.

(66:10–11) There have been many references to daughter Jerusalem in the book; now Jerusalem as mother is the centre of celebration. Whatever divisions the community may display, the holy city is pictured as the kind of faithful city envisaged at 1:26.

(66:12–16) The promise to Jerusalem is underlined by the introductory messenger formula, with a message of comfort reminiscent of ch. 40. But the comfort is not universal. As is too often the case in the ancient and the modern world, the reassurance of one group bears with it the assurance of punishment on those perceived as enemies, and the language of the last two verses, using once again the motif of the divine warrior, is as harsh as anything we have found in the whole book. It is also poetry, which reminds us that we should not take 'all flesh' literally.

(66:17) A curious prose note is inserted. Someone felt it necessary to be more explicit about what were regarded as abominable practices carried on in the 'gardens' to which 65:3 has already referred. The avoidance of food which is not kosher is a widespread religious concern.

(66:18–21) Another prose passage, but this time of a very different temper. If v. 17 stressed what seems to us a negative viewpoint, here the positive attitude to foreigners found in ch. 56 is taken further. Though the reference to the coastlands is characteristic (cf. 11:11), the actual list of foreign places in v. 19 is unexpected, owing more to Ezek 27 than to anything in Isaiah (though cf. Davies (1989: 95) for links within Isaiah). Still more astonishing is the thought, underlined as being a divine oracle, that some of these foreigners might be enrolled as priests and Levites—a far cry from what is found elsewhere in the HB, e.g. Num 18:7 (Emmerson 1992: 106).

(66:22–3) The last poem in the book takes up again the 'new heavens and new earth' theme of 65:17, linking it first with the idea of perpetuity ('shall remain'), then with the concern for new moon (not otherwise characteristic of Isaiah) and sabbath (much emphasized in 56 and 58), and finally universalizing it. In v. 16 'all flesh' was to be destroyed by the sword; here it is to come to worship. We are reminded for a last time of the dangers of too literal and referential a reading of poetry.

(66:24) The high note of v. 23 might have seemed an appropriate closure, and indeed in synagogue readings it is customary to read v. 23 again after v. 24. For in this last prose note we have a sombre warning, of the possibility of lasting judgement on the rebellious, with the same rare word 'quenched' as we found in 1:31. The HB is often thought of as harsh, so it is ironic to note that this is virtually the only passage in all its contents to speak of lasting judgement—and that it is a passage seized upon by the New Testament (Mk 9:48).

It seems appropriate as we reach the end of the book briefly to reflect upon what we have been reading. As with most collections of poetry it is inappropriate to ask for a 'meaning', but we can readily see that certain themes recur: the hope of salvation, expressed in the name 'Isaiah' (= God saves) and repeated through the book; the need for God's šedeq to be expressed in the community of his worshippers; the concern for Zion as potentially the best and too often in practice the worst of God's creation. This linkage with Zion is underlined by the many allusions to and cross-references with the Psalms. Dating of all this material is difficult, and is most unlikely to follow the order of the complete book, but a period of 200–300 years may well be implied. Within all this poetry are a number of prose passages, linking it with Isaiah and using episodes from his life as providing a structure for the whole. Some of these passages may well have been taken from 2 Kings; to what extent they enshrine reliable tradition or whether any of the poems go back to Isaiah himself we have no means of knowing. Readers will differ in their perception whether or not this uncertainty is a serious loss. What we do have is a collection of superb poems driven by their authors' conviction that God was active in all the ups and downs which the community had experienced and must continue to anticipate.

23. Jeremiah

KATHLEEN M. O'CONNOR

INTRODUCTION

A. 1. To read the book of Jeremiah is to enter a colloquy of voices. These voices contend with one another to give meaning to a national tragedy so devastating that it defies simple explanation and rational analysis. Poetry and narrative, metaphor and myth, sermonic exhortation and theological defiance converge in what can seem like a cacophony of non-melodic speech. When expectations of linear development and the search for historical origins are set aside as primary criteria of interpretation, however, a multifaceted conversation emerges from the book. By its very open-ended nature, that conversation moves towards healing and hope for a radiant future.

2. In current Jeremiah scholarship, issues of critical introduction are greatly disputed and thoroughly intertwined. Unsettled matters include aspects of the book's historical background, audience, dating, history of composition, and relationship to the historical Jeremiah. Summary discussions of these matters follow. Herrmann (1986) provides a detailed survey of introductory questions.

B. The Tragedy. 1. From the beginning to the end of its fifty-two chapters, the subject of Jeremiah is the fall of Judah to Babylon in the sixth century BCE. This national catastrophe and subsequent struggles for survival were the catalysts that produced the book, and they haunt every chapter. Events reflected here reach a climax in the siege and fall of Jerusalem in 587 BCE, but international and internal troubles afflicted the nation well before and after that defining period (Herrmann 1986: 7–27; Hayes and Miller 1986: 416–36; Ackroyd 1968: 50–61).

2. The waning of the Assyrian empire in the late seventh century BCE opened the door to competition between Egypt and the emerging neo-Babylonian (Chaldean) empire for dominance in the region. In response to international pressure, Judah divided into political factions that supported Egyptian or Babylonian alliances. Many in the Judean governing classes were pro-Egyptian, whereas Jeremiah and his followers, including some leading families, supported Babylon. A decisive victory over Egypt at Carchemish in 605 gave Babylon control of the region but did not quiet the political strife in Judah.

3. In 597, Judah revolted against Babylonian sovereignty. This resistance provoked an invasion of Jerusalem, the capital city, and led to the deportation of King Jehoiachin and other leaders, and the installation of puppet King Zedekiah upon the throne (2 Kings 24–5; Seitz 1989a). A second Judean revolt under Zedekiah caused an even more disastrous attack on Judah and Jerusalem ten years later. After a long siege, the Babylonians breached the city walls in 587/6. They burned the king's palace, destroyed the temple, and exiled more citizens to Babylon. The Babylonians then appointed Gedaliah governor of conquered Judah, but a group led by a surviving member of the royal family assassinated him and massacred his entourage. Inner anarchy triggered a third invasion and deportation in 582.

4. Historians judge that exilic life in Babylon was not as onerous by ancient standards as it might have been (Hayes and Miller 1986: 430–5). Judean exiles settled, married, and may even have engaged in business dealings with the native population. Rather than submit to Babylon, however, some Judean survivors escaped to Egypt and forced Jeremiah and his companion Baruch to accompany them (Jer 43). About life in Egypt and in occupied Judah little is known, though the book of Lamentations is traditionally ascribed to a remnant in Judah.

5. Many aspects of this version of Judah's history evoke heated debate among historians. One problem is that the chief sources of information about these events are biblical texts that receive scant corroboration from other sources and which themselves are fragmentary, contradictory, and interpretative rather than descriptive and referential. Biblical texts are not historical documents in the modern critical sense. They do not narrate events to tell precisely what happened. As theological literature, they portray events to interpret and explain them, to persuade the community to act in particular ways, to challenge and shape its identity, and to sow seeds for a new future (Perdue 1994: 7–11).

6. What this brief narrative does reveal, however, is that the book of Jeremiah emerged from perilous, chaotic, and conflictual times (Seitz 1989a). Prior to 587, Judah experienced occupation by foreign powers who interfered in internal affairs, exacted tribute and political allegiance, and created long-lasting internal divisions. The Babylonian siege of Jerusalem in 587 caused starvation and death for many, destroyed national and family life, and shook theological and political foundations of the people's identity. Survivors lost loved ones, land, and livelihood; many were deported. Beyond physical and emotional devastation, there was also symbolic wreckage. The destruction of palace and temple meant the collapse of political, ideological, and theological symbols that had long provided identity and stability for the nation (Stulman 1995). Because national identity had been linked to YHWH's promises to dwell in the temple and to protect the Davidic monarchy (2 Sam 7; Isa 1–12), the loss of these institutions and of the promised land led to profound upheaval. Nor did conflict abate after the invasion during the exilic period. Events called out for interpretation; survival of the community was in serious doubt; new leadership and symbolic understandings needed to emerge.

7. From this maelstrom of suffering and confusion came questions of ultimate meanings. Where was the covenant God who gave them land and promised to be with them? Had God abandoned them, abused them, forgotten them, or was God merely powerless to prevent the crushing of the chosen people? The book and its multiple voices compete to explain events, to argue about divine justice, and to point the way to survival.

C. Audience and Dating. 1. Various passages and blocks of material in the book addressed many different audiences in the process of its composition. The audience of the book's final form, however, was probably survivors of the Babylonian invasion, particularly exiles in Babylon (Seitz 1989a; Overholt 1988; but see Carroll 1986 and Goldman 1992). To propose the exilic community as the primary audience does not preclude later additions, nor does it deny the likelihood of an earlier audience in pre-exilic Judah. Although the historical setting of the book's final form cannot be established with certainty, a number of elements point to an exilic provenance. These include overriding concern with the nation's fall and with survival, reserve regarding restoration, vague promises of return (chs. 30–3), the absence of Cyrus and the Persians who were historical agents of the return, and the limited attention given to temple rebuilding.

2. In addition to thematic elements pointing to an exilic audience, reader-response analysis provides tools for examining the 'implied audience' dramatized in the text. The text itself provides clues about the audience it wishes to influence (Suleiman and Crosman 1980; Thompson 1980). The book's early chapters (2:1–4:2) address the children of YHWH's unfaithful wife and invite them to repent (3:14–25). With liturgical praises they confess their sins and return to YHWH in fidelity (3:21–15; Diamond and O'Connor 1996). This same first-person plural liturgical voice reappears in a number of places (10:1–25; 14:7–9; 31:18–20), suggesting that the text brings its audience in by dramatizing them in the voice of the children. The children are the survivors of YHWH's cast-aside wife (Jer 2:1–4:2). The book artfully constructs imaginative symbolic worlds that seek to elicit response and to create new worlds for the exiles. It invites them to repent by presenting models of repentance; it provides theological and political explanations of the nation's collapse; and it assures their survival and a future, if they do repent.

D. History of Interpretation. 1. Modern readers often find Jeremiah difficult. Its wide variety of literary materials, contradictory themes, and abundant imagery create the impression of chaos and dissymmetry. Poetic oracles, prose narratives, and prose sermons overlap, contradict, and interrupt one another. Chronological confusion compounds literary and thematic disarray. Although the book contains occasional headings that date events to reigns of particular kings, these dates do not follow chronological order. Modern interpretation of Jeremiah tries to make sense of these difficulties.

2. Nearly all interpretations of Jeremiah in the twentieth century begin from the work of Bernhard Duhm (1901) and Sigmund Mowinckel (1914). Good summaries of their theories appear in Stulman (1986: 7–14); Carroll (1986: 39–42); and Holladay (1989: 11–12). Duhm and Mowinckel made sense of the book by understanding it as the result of a long compositional process during which distinct written sources or traditions from different times were joined together by editors. The sources were thought to be: (1) poetic sayings from Jeremiah himself; (2) biographical prose narratives attributed to Jeremiah's scribe, Baruch; (3) prose sermons, attributed to Deuteronomistic writers; (4) salvific oracles in

chs. 30–1 and other miscellaneous blocks of material including the Oracles Against the Nations (Jer 46–51). According to this theory, literary evidence enables interpreters to separate the book's strata from one another and arrive at the earliest, most authentic layer (Rudolph 1947; Weiser 1960).

3. After nearly a century of interpretative labour, little of the Duhm–Mowinckel consensus remains though it still greatly influences the conversation (see Herrmann's 1986 discussion). Challenges have come from several directions with no new agreement yet emerging. Hyatt (1958), Nicholson (1970), Thiel (1973), and Carroll (1986), for instance, have accepted a late Deuteronomistic layer in the book, but rather than discrediting it as secondary, they have considered it to be creative theological and redactional activity with its own integrity (Goldman 1992).

4. By contrast, building on studies by Weippert and Bright, Holladay (1986) disputes Deuteronomistic influence. This line of interpretation holds that much of the prose and nearly all the poetry contains Jeremiah's own words or the gist of his message. Sharp changes in style and theme reflect changing situations in the prophet's life, not redactional activity. McConville (1993) makes a similar case for Jeremianic authorship on theological rather than linguistic and stylistic grounds. He finds crucial differences between Jeremiah and the Deuteronomistic books regarding visions of the future.

5. From yet another direction, Wanke (1971) denies the existence of a single Baruch document, finding at least three tradition complexes within the so-called Baruch material, while McKane (1986) dispenses with written sources altogether (cf. Reitzschel 1966). He proposes, instead, that an original core of Jeremiah's words generated expansions and developments over the years in an unsystematic fashion. The result was a rolling corpus that grew gradually into a complex, diffuse, and untidy book without overarching redactional intention. McKane finds little possibility of distinguishing compositional layers within the text. He argues correctly that dating of various pieces and additions cannot be easily accomplished. Carroll (1986: 50) joins him in emphasizing the complexity of the final text, although Carroll (1986) and Thiel (1973; 1982) hold to strong Deuteronomistic redactional activity.

E. Jeremiah. 1. Traditional interpretation has long held that the book contains a biographical account of Jeremiah's life and work. Many contemporary scholars still operate from this assumption and even understand the book to contain a narrative of its own historical beginnings (Jer 36). Holladay (1989), Skinner (1922), Bright (1965), and recently, Seybold (1993) and McConville (1993) view the book this way. A rising choir, however, opposes the notion that the book provides access to the historical Jeremiah at all. McKane (1980) believes it begins with a core of Jeremiah's words, but they cannot be located with reasonable certainty. Carroll (1986) doubts the prophet's historicity altogether. In his view, Jeremiah is an 'editorial link' between different parts of the tradition, that is, largely an imaginary character. Brueggemann (1988; 1991) is agnostic on the historical Jeremiah and, in agreement with Polk (1984), speaks of the literary persona rather than the historical figure. Whether the text records historical events, reflects theological and ideological imagination, or both, is simply not clear, nor have we the evidence to make it clear (Perdue 1994: 7–11).

2. A Symbolic Figure. Rather than search for the historical life of Jeremiah or for precise historical origins of the book's many elements, helpful as those approaches have been in the past, this commentary attempts to understand the book's final form. Such an interpretative procedure recognizes that the figure of Jeremiah plays a major role in the book, unlike any prophet in any other prophetic book. Although Jeremiah may not be a character in the modern literary sense, the portrait of Jeremiah presented in the book cannot be dismissed. Jeremiah appears in the call narrative of ch. 1, is the presumed or identified speaker of many oracles, sermons, and first-person prayers called 'confessions', and he is the subject of numerous narrative accounts. Impressions of his life, whether historical or imagined, are an important feature of the book and provide one key to its interpretation. Jeremiah plays a critical symbolic role in meeting the needs of the exilic audience. As symbolic and imaginative construction, Jeremiah's life is iconic of the fate of the exiles, even as he represents YHWH as the prophet who announces their fate (Polk (1984), contra Biddle 1996: 6). But YHWH, too, suffers with the people as the book progresses.

F. Synchronic Interpretation. 1. While it is evident that the book is vastly complex literature composed over a long period of time by many hands, the text's unreadability may be overstated in some theories of composition. By concentrating on origins of texts and placing greater historical and theological value on the oldest texts, interpreters often overlook theological and literary power embedded in the text as it stands. Synchronic approaches are beginning to address these issues. Brueggemann (1994); Clements (1993); Seitz (1989a); Biddle (1996); Liwak (1987); Stulman (1995); Diamond and O'Connor (1996); and Kessler (1997) are employing new approaches to investigate literary unity across many parts of the book. (See Perdue 1994 on new methods.)

2. When the search for origins of texts is set aside, the book emerges as a conversation among many voices in an open-ended structure (see also Biddle 1996). Voices overlap, echo and re-echo, debate, rage, and grow quiet. Often a narrative, symbolic logic appears in the book's circular and discordant symphony. Voices portray different characters in poetry and different narrators in prose. Unity comes from the dominance of the divine voice across the book (Biddle 1996) and from the central role given to Jeremiah. His words and actions help structure the book, create emotional and theological power, and draw readers into his struggles as both foil and mirror to their own. Synchronic interpretation attends to the unifying effects of root metaphors in poetry and prose, notices narrative devices and symbolic meanings of events and dates, and considers rhetorical functions of text.

3. Diachronic questions cannot be dismissed entirely, however. The relationship of text to historical context remains central to interpretation (Liwak 1987). Rather than seeking original contexts of small units, however, synchronic interpretation seeks to understand the relationship of the final form of the text to its audience in exile. Past, present, and future time frames criss-cross one another as if temporal boundaries were permeable. Linear chronology is absent because for exiles the pre-exilic past and hoped-for future merge with present realities as they struggle to survive.

G. The Versions. 1. A further complication in interpretation comes from differences between the Hebrew (MT) and Greek (LXX) versions of the text of Jeremiah. Reversing the usual relationship of the MT to LXX, the Hebrew text of Jeremiah is significantly longer than the Greek. It adds titles and epithets to names, makes explicit pronouns left implicit in the Greek, and adds more complex expansions (Janzen 1973: 127). In addition, the arrangement of the two texts differs significantly. The MT places the Oracles Against the Nations near the end (chs. 46–51), whereas the LXX locates them in the centre (25:14–31:44) and arranges them differently. Soderlund (1985) presents a clear discussion of theories to explain the differences between the two texts.

2. Four fragments of the text of Jeremiah were found among the Dead Sea scrolls at Qumran: from cave 4, 4Q Jer^a, 4Q Jer^b, 4Q Jer^c and from cave 2, 2Q Jer. One of these fragments (4Q Jer^b) points to a shorter Hebrew text that may have been the basis (Vorlage) for the LXX translation. Janzen (1973) (see also Cross 1964 and Tov 1976) argues that the LXX is both an older and a superior text to the MT. This view is challenged, however, by Soderlund (1985: 193–248), and Bogaert (1981). It may be argued that the LXX and MT must represent two separate recensions, arising in different circumstances to meet different communal needs. At the very least, the differences between the versions show that the text received complex and lively scribal attention, and this is testimony to the significance accorded to the Jeremiah tradition (Carroll 1986: 50–5; McKane 1986: pp. xv–xli). This commentary treats the MT as a version of Jeremiah with its own literary and theological integrity.

H. Structure. 1. Jeremiah has two major subdivisions, chs. 1–25 and 26–52.

Book One, chs. 1–25:

Cosmic Destruction (chs. 1–10)

Superscription and Call (1:1–19)

Broken Marriage (2:1–4:2)

Cosmic Battle (4:3–6:30)

Temple Sermon (7:1–8:3)

Weeping (8:4–10:25)

Covenant Destroyed (chs. 11–20)

Covenant Curse (11:1–17)

Jeremiah's Protest and God's Reply (11:17–12:25)

A Loincloth, a Winejar, and a Rape (13:1–27)

Drought (14:1–22)

No Future, Yet a Future (15:1–16:21)

Hope for Some (17:1–27)

Captivity (18:1–20:18)

Aftermath (chs. 21–5)

Siege of Jerusalem (21:1–10)

Collapse of Royal Power and Promise of Restoration (21:11–23:40)

Figs (24:1–10)

Babylon's Fall (25:1–38)

Book Two, chs. 26–52:

Blame and Hope (chs. 26–36)

Prophetic Discord (26:1–29:32)

Book of Comfort (30:1–33:26)

A Bad King and a Good Community (34:1–35:19)

Two Scrolls (36:1–32)

The 'Baruch Account' (37:1–45:5)
Oracles Against the Nations (46:6–51)
The End (ch. 52)

2. Jeremiah has the reputation of unrelenting doom, relieved only by the book of comfort buried near the centre (Jer 30–3). Such an assessment is not entirely accurate. The book does contain a river of accusation, destruction, and weeping, but across its complex literary composition there flows a steady spring of hope and renewal. Read synchronically as a document for exiles, Jeremiah is a book of life.

COMMENTARY

Cosmic Destruction (chs. 1–10)

Largely poetic in form, these chapters announce Jeremiah's commission (Jer 1) and contain accusations and judgements against Judah and Jerusalem (Jer 2–10). They progress from a description of the broken marriage between YHWH and the people to announcements of invasion by a mythic army, to massive weeping at the inevitable cosmic destruction. Amidst this material appear short liturgical expressions of repentance that symbolize the voice of the exiles and provide them with models of repentance.

(1:1–3) The superscription introduces the book by making authoritative claims for its contents. Jeremiah prophesied for forty years, from the thirteenth year of King Josiah (627 BCE) until Jerusalem's capture (587 BCE). Holladay (1989: 25–7) and Carroll (1986: 89–92) provide maximalist and minimalist historical opinions of these dates. Theologically, the superscription points to an intimate relationship between Jeremiah and YHWH who alone is the source of Jeremiah's words (1:1–2; Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard 1991: 1–2; Liwak 1987: 54–103). Politically, the superscription sets the book within the context of royal rule that is about to collapse (Brueggemann 1988: 20). Symbolically, it links Jeremiah's forty-year ministry to Moses' leadership in the wilderness. (On Jeremiah's many parallels with Moses, see Seitz 1989a.) The superscription's details, therefore, serve to persuade readers that this book comes from Jeremiah, can be trusted, and must be heeded. Such a defence suggests an audience in conflict.

(1:4–19) The Call The call account introduces Jeremiah and certifies him to be a true prophet. (For history of composition, see Rudolph 1947: 21–31 and Thiel 1973: 63–79.) The chapter divides into two scenes, poetic audition (vv. 4–10) and prose visions (vv. 11–19). Both scenes contain dialogue between prophet and deity in which Jeremiah speaks in the first person and quotes divine speech (vv. 4, 7, 9, 11, 14). Elements of the conventional call narrative appear in the text (Habel 1965), but here also are introduced major themes and motifs of chs. 1–25 (O'Connor 1988: 118–23). YHWH names Jeremiah 'prophet to the nations', warns him about the people's resistance, and promises divine assistance. YHWH also announces disaster from the north that will bring judgement upon Judah and Jerusalem. For the exilic audience, the call narrative implies that the disaster that has already befallen them was in the divine plan to 'pluck up and to pull down', and equally that YHWH can be relied upon to 'build and plant' (v. 10).

In memorable poetry, the opening scene (vv. 4–10) creates a portrait of the prophet as YHWH's indisputable agent. Jeremiah himself provides a first-person account of his dialogue with YHWH who called him before his birth (v. 5); this prenatal commission indicates that YHWH alone established him as prophet. Jeremiah resists (v. 6) with vocational hesitancy that evokes Moses' call (Ex 3:11; 4:10–11). Like Moses, Jeremiah receives divine assurance. Were there still any doubt about the source of Jeremiah's message, YHWH touches Jeremiah's mouth and puts there divine words (v. 9; McKane 1986). Creating an emphatic climax to the poem, v. 10 circles back to and expands the commission announced in v. 5c. Jeremiah's mission extends beyond Judah to include the nations in a divine plan of destruction and rebuilding, of uprooting and planting.

An astonishing theological assertion of this book is that Jeremiah is sent 'to the nations'. His mission has global significance. The God for whom he speaks governs the fall and rise of nations, a theme that receives reprises at both the middle (25:15–38) and end of the book (chs. 46–52). For an exilic audience, even the prophet's commission may intimate hope because it reveals that the nations who have destroyed Judah are also the subject of divine governance.

Prose visions (vv. 14–19) provide the content of Jeremiah's message, narrow its recipients from the nations to Judah and Jerusalem, and reassure Jeremiah that YHWH is with him to deliver him (v. 19, cf. v. 8). Dialogue predominates over vision in the narrative about the almond tree (vv. 11–12). When YHWH asks Jeremiah what he sees, Jeremiah replies literally, 'the branch of an almond tree'. YHWH, not Jeremiah, interprets the vision, playing on the Hebrew word for almond tree (šāqēd). 'I am watching (šōqēd) over my word to perform it' (v. 12). The conversation reassures both prophet and audience that the prophetic word is relentless and irreversible because its divine speaker utters it and 'does it' (la'āšōtō).

The context of the divine word is metaphorical. A boiling pot tilts 'away from the north' and from the north will come disaster upon Judah and Jerusalem for their idolatry (vv. 13–16). The northern location of the boiling pot, and later in the book of 'the foe from the north', poses interpretative difficulties because Babylon is east of Judah. Literal interpretations of this language have led to many historical identifications of the enemy, including the ancient Scythians (McKane 1986: 20). But Childs (1959) and Perdue (1994: 141–6) show that the 'foe from the north' is language that comes from a myth of a transcendent enemy who brings chaos in a great battle. Borrowed from Israel's neighbours, this language expresses the theological conviction that Israel's disaster has cosmic significance and arises from YHWH's fierce anger. The mythic foe from the north is eventually historicized in Jeremiah but not until 20:4–6 where Babylon appears by name for the first time.

The absence of a historical referent for the 'boiling pot, tilted from the north', at the beginning of the book strikes an ominous note and is all the more fearsome for its lack of specificity. The threat from the north is greater than any human enemy. Boiling, burning fluid, tipped over and uncontrolled, advances upon Judah and Jerusalem with unstoppable horror in the form of attacking tribes from unknown kingdoms. They, 'all of them', will establish hegemony over Judah for its idolatry (1:16).

YHWH speaks directly to Jeremiah to prepare him for battle (vv. 17–19). Imperatives replace dialogue. Jeremiah must gird his loins and announce everything YHWH commands. He must be implacable in face of resistance or YHWH will 'break' him. Yet Jeremiah will prevail for YHWH has already strengthened him as 'a fortified city, an iron pillar, and a bronze wall', and is with him to deliver him. This encouraging assurance is often thought to refer exclusively to the prophet and his mission, but it may also have resonances for an exilic audience. In some parts of the book Jeremiah's sufferings seem to gather up those of the community. Even as nations fight against them, YHWH is with them.

(2:1–4:2) A Broken Marriage Many interpreters find unifying thematic threads in the poetry and prose collected here (Biddle 1990: 82; McKane 1986: 82; DeRoche 1983; Carroll 1986). Study of the literary devices of direct address, grammatical gender of characters, and the nature of divine accusations reveals strong literary coherence in the material. The broken marriage of YHWH and his unfaithful wife serves as an organizing or root metaphor (Ricoeur 1975, 1976; McFague 1982) that closely unites the chapters (Diamond and O'Connor 1996; Brueggemann 1988: 46–7). In its present form, 2:1–4:2 dramatizes the ending of the marriage (2:1–3:5) and depicts its aftermath of recrimination and partial familial restoration (3:6–4:2). This metaphor functions as a second prologue to the book by providing a symbolic interpretation of the nation's fall and of the crisis facing the exiles.

Borrowed from Hosea 1–3 (see Holladay 1989: 45–7) and significantly modified (Diamond and O'Connor 1996), the marriage metaphor allows the poet to introduce YHWH's wife Judah or perhaps Jerusalem (Biddle 1990: 68–73) as a parallel persona to male Israel. Direct address alternates between the two personae in 2:1–3:5. Hebrew feminine singular grammatical forms address the wife in 2:2; 2:17–25; and 2:33–35; and masculine singular and plural forms address male Israel in 2:3; 2:4–16; and 2:26–32. At first the two personae appear to be distinct characters, but they are one entity, addressed under different guises. The opening poem (2:1–3) equates them symbolically, and 2:19–20 makes literal that identification. Both male and female personae receive the same rhetorical and thematic treatment. YHWH addresses each directly, interrogates them with similar rhetorical questions, accuses by quoting their words, and charges each with abandonment and pursuit of other allegiances.

These poetic devices in 2:1–3:5 amass legal evidence against wife/Israel. Reluctantly, husband/YHWH recognizes the hopelessness of the marriage and divorces the wife (2:1–3:5). The symbolic identity of the wife is fluid at this point in the book, though she will later be identified as Jerusalem or daughter Zion (4:31). Here, however, she represents Israel from the earliest days in the wilderness (2:2). After the divorce (3:6–4:2), the husband declares wife Judah worse than her northern sister, his first wife, whom he invites to return to him (3:6–12). The second wife, like the first, remains silent or absent, so he turns to the children and invites them to return instead (3:14–18). They accept by proclaiming repentance and return to him with a liturgical declaration of fidelity and loyalty (3:22b–25).

(2:1–3:5) The Divorce The poem that introduces the story of the marriage (2:1–3) begins with the same formula as 1:4, but here Jeremiah is commanded to proclaim the word to Jerusalem. The husband's monologue begins with direct address to his wife (2:2b, fem. sing.). Nostalgically he recalls her past devotion and loyalty in the wilderness. v. 3 explicates v. 2 (Fishbane 1985: 300), even as it shifts the subject to male Israel who is 'holy to the LORD, the first fruits of his harvest'. In this verse, wife and male Israel converge symbolically; both are 'totally devoted to' (Brueggemann 1988: 32), and exclusive property of, YHWH. Subsequent poems alternate in addressing the two personae, equally guilty of betrayal and pursuit of idols.

(2:4–16) An introductory formula, different from 2:1, opens the first poem addressed to male Israel, called here the houses of Jacob and Israel (v. 4). Some scholars explain the shift from a Judahite to an Israelite audience historically by arguing that Jeremiah originally preached on the subject of the northern kingdom that had fallen to Assyria in 721, over a century earlier than Jeremiah's own time (Holladay 1986: 68). Of more interest is the rhetorical import of address to the northern kingdom (Carroll 1986: 122). Jacob is the eponymous ancestor and unifying patriarch of all Israel (Gen 29–30), who figures here as symbol of united Israel. The poems in 2:1–4:2 accuse both north and south of heinous betrayal and envision a reunified future. They interpret theologically the fall of both kingdoms. The materials concerning the north may carry further rhetorical import for, by contrast, Judah appears far more guilty (3:6–12) and by implication, faces a similar fate (cf. 7:12–15).

Rhetorical questions (2:5, 6, 8, 11, 14) structure 2:4–16 and convey YHWH's shock at the ancestors' treatment of him (vv. 5–6), despite his generosity in bringing them into a 'plentiful land' (v. 7). Leaders fail to ask the right questions, abandon him, and pursue others (v. 8). YHWH accuses Israel of forsaking him, 'fountain of living water' (v. 13), and of substituting their own useless cisterns (v. 14). The husband invites the heavens to participate in his shock (v. 12) for this betrayal has cosmic implications. Subjugation to Egypt, identified by its cities, becomes inevitable (v. 16).

(2:17–25) Feminine singular forms appear without explanation. Accusatory questions (vv. 17, 18, 21, 23) and charges of betrayal continue from the previous poem but with a qualitative difference. Betrayal is no longer only theological, national, and cosmic; it is also intimate, domestic, sexual, pornographic (Weems 1995; O'Connor 1992). To build his case against his wife, the husband quotes her (v. 20a) and accuses her with her own words (v. 25). He describes her lewd behaviour (v. 20b), portraying her as a harlot, bestial in her sexuality, a lust-driven animal wildly out of control (vv. 23–4).

(2:26–32) Male Israel's shame, by contrast, compares to that of a captured thief and to idolators who relate to trees and stones (vv. 26–7). The male persona turns his back on YHWH and resists correction. Again YHWH quotes (vv. 27, 31) and heaps questions upon the accused (vv. 28, 29, 31, 32). The poem reeks of scorn for idols and their addle-brained devotees

(vv. 27–9) to evoke sympathy for YHWH/husband who cannot understand this treachery (v. 31).

(2:33–3:5) Formally, this section may contain two poems (2:33–7 and 3:1–5; Nicholson 1973: 40), unified by the feminine form of address and by a return to themes of adultery and promiscuity. The adulterous wife now becomes a madam of whores who teaches other women her ways (2:33). Her husband characterizes her as a murderer of the innocent poor (2:24) and quotes her declaration of innocence and false estimates of his anger (2:35). Other lovers will shame her (2:36–7). Then comes the climactic question of this account of the marriage; will a husband return to his wife after a divorce? (3:1; see Holladay 1986: 112–13 and McKane 1986: 58–9 on translation difficulties). The marriage is over. For her to return is legally impossible and would pollute the land (Deut 24:1–4).

Multiple partners compound her adultery. She lurks at roadsides in search of them (3:2). Her distorted sexuality brings barrenness upon the land (3:3). The husband quotes her misperception of his anger (3:4) and charges her with full responsibility for the marriage's failure.

(3:6–4:2) The Aftermath The subsequent collection of poetic (3:12b–14, 19–23) and prose materials (3:6–12a, 15–18, 24–5) depicts the immediate aftermath of the divorce, but the text's formal divisions no longer correspond with shifts in addressee. Direct address of female (3:12b–13, and 19) and male (3:20) continues but other characters, hardly noticed before, become important here. Jeremiah, mentioned only in 2:1, becomes part of the narrative as sympathetic friend of the husband (3:6–12). A second wife appears (3:7–10) and male children assume the climactic role in the story of this marriage (3:14–18, 21–5).

(3:6–11) In a dramatic aside, the furious husband confides to Jeremiah the story of his wife's harlotry (vv. 6–7). The passage dates to the time of Josiah, further anchoring the marriage metaphor in the history of Judah and indicating that Jeremiah's prophecy of national collapse significantly predated the event. The husband muses out loud about his past hopes for the marriage. Readers receive a shock when the husband admits he had a previous wife, Israel, sister of his second wife, who also cuckolded him. Compared to Judah, who should have learned from her sister's treachery, however, first wife Israel is less guilty. YHWH sends Jeremiah to intercede with her (vv. 8–11).

(3:12–18) To the north, Jeremiah proclaims, 'Return, faithless Israel' (v. 12). But there is a condition; she must take responsibility for the failure of the marriage by acknowledging her guilt (v. 13). The text narrates no reply from her, and a decisive shift occurs in relationships. Husband/YHWH turns attention on the children, offering them the same invitation to 'return'. The Hebrew verb šûb carries the nuance of turning from sin (Holladay 1958). For the children there are no preconditions. Instead, they are coaxed to return with promises of a splendid future in the land, joined together north and south under one shepherd after YHWH's own heart (vv. 15–18).

(3:19–20) Yet YHWH's unfaithful wife lingers in his thoughts as he muses sadly about his past plans for her and for their relationship. At this bitter moment, the divine speaker steps out of the role of husband to elucidate the meaning of the marital metaphor: 'as a faithless wife leaves her husband, so have you been . . . O house of Israel' (v. 20).

(3:21–5) A mysterious voice introduces a major motif of the book, the heartbreaking sound of children weeping (v. 21). They repent of their sins that echo their mother's; they, too, have forgotten their God (vv. 23–5). But unlike their mother whose silence implies refusal to repent, the children repent emphatically after hearing promises of healing the mother never heard (v. 22). The narrative closes in a dramatic reunion of father and children. Surprisingly, YHWH does not quote them, they speak for themselves. For the first time in the book, YHWH becomes the addressee and the speakers use liturgical prayer (Blank 1961: 102; Biddle 1996: 138). 'Here we come to you; for you are the LORD our God' (v. 22). Monologue becomes dialogue and chastised hope emerges (Diamond and O'Connor 1996).

The broken-marriage metaphor creates a highly effective introduction to Jeremiah's prophecy. Through it, the book invites readers to side with YHWH in the collapse of the nation. YHWH's portrayal as a betrayed, broken-hearted, and faithful husband creates an emotional claim upon readers that encourages them to view the marriage from the husband's perspective. What happens to wife/Israel is not YHWH's fault, but hers. The metaphor explains the fall of the nation as punishment for the infidelity of the pre-exilic generation that experienced divine rejection (ibid.). Male and female personae represent the fallen Judah and Jerusalem, and the first wife from the north represents the fallen northern kingdom. For them there is no future because they do not repent. The children in this troubled family are the implied audience, the exilic community given voice at the story's climax (vv. 22–5). The marriage metaphor spins a theological narrative that encapsulates the destruction of the two Israelite kingdoms, promises unconditional restoration to their offspring, and portrays the implied audience in the book as children of the cast-aside and abandoned wife. In miniature, 2:1–4:2 conveys the accusation, judgement, and hope of the entire book.

Despite the extraordinary artistic effectiveness of Jeremiah's version of the broken marriage, contemporary readers must approach this text with caution. The account's most rhetorically winning and theologically pregnant feature is its portrayal of God as an abandoned, heartbroken husband, betrayed by faithless, nymphomaniac wives. Readers cannot avoid taking his side. Hidden in this account, however, is a rhetoric of blaming in which the failure of the marriage is placed on the women with whom male Israel is symbolically identified. Men are dishonoured by being called faithless 'women', and the metaphor projects onto women the sins of the nation (ibid.; O'Connor 1992; Weems 1995). When viewed against cultures that subtly or blatantly vilify women and deify men, this metaphor requires careful treatment.

(4:1–4) bridges the collections of the broken marriage and the cosmic battle (4:5–6:30). Thematically, the poem reaches back to repeat the invitation to 'return' (v. 1) in the marriage (3:12–14), and it extends forwards by promising YHWH's wrathful judgement if they refuse to turn (v. 4; see 4:8, 26). The children have returned (3:21–5), but vv. 1–4 ignore the family reunion. The marriage metaphor symbolically enacts the entire course of Judah's history from the perspective of divine-human relationship. But vv. 1–4 and the chapters that follow shift the temporal perspective of the text to the pre-exilic period. The text assumes that repentance is uncertain and reissues conditions of repentance and loyalty to avoid disaster (vv. 1–2; on syntactical problems, see Holladay 1986: 122–3). The temporal shift places readers in the psychic and spiritual world of the implied audience who exist in a limbo between the nation's destruction and return from exile. Whatever their earlier functions may have been, poems of threat and warning appropriate to the pre-exilic period aid the exilic audience by interpreting their plight and underscoring the necessity of repentance and fidelity.

The consequence of Israel's hoped-for loyalty confirms the book's exilic context; its allegiance will redound to the benefit of the nations (v. 2; Carroll 1986: 156). Like Jeremiah, Israel has a mission among the nations, and like Abraham, the mission is to be a blessing (Gen 12:3). vv. 3–4 transform YHWH's conditional invitation to Israel in vv. 1–2 into a threat, addressed to Judah and Jerusalem. Circumcision of the heart must replace cultic circumcision, or divine wrath will burst forth like unquenchable fire. The text's demand for circumcision of the heart echoes Deut 10:16 (Holladay 1986: 129–30), and highlights again the text's male audience. Metaphorical interpretation of circumcision as spiritual commitment, however, makes possible the inclusion of females in the worshipping community, albeit as spiritual males (O'Connor 1992).

(4:5–6:30) Cosmic Battle No narrative unifies the poems collected here, but the metaphor of the impending cosmic battle with the mysterious 'foe from the north' looms over the chapters and grants them a unity of swirling, menacing drama (Condamin 1920: 28; Perdue 1994; Brueggemann 1988: 49–73). The voices of YHWH, Jeremiah, a narrator, the people, the northern kingdom, daughter Zion, and the foe—all announce, respond to, and dispute YHWH's role in the coming siege.

The battle poems use great artistry in portraying war. Scenes of approaching armies vividly appeal to the senses and give the suprahuman enemy from the north shape in the imagination. With a few well-chosen details of sight and sound, they transport readers into the thick of battle. 4:5–31 announces the battle's approach; 5:1–31 reveals the battle to be inevitable; 6:1–30 names Jerusalem as the place of siege (Clements 1988: 40–1). Major themes and images overlap and weave together to defend YHWH from charges of injustice and arbitrariness in the fall of the nation. The principal rhetorical purpose of these chapters is to persuade the readers that YHWH was forced to punish the people. Dissenting and interrupting voices connect the chapters to the implied audience in exile (4:27; 5:18–19). Lament themes (4:8, 19) link these chapters to 8:4–10:25, and threads from the broken-marriage metaphor (4:16–18, 29–31; 5:7–9) connect them to 2:1–4:2.

(4:5–8) Battle Announced Opening the battle sequence (4:5–6:30), this poem announces major themes to appear in the poetry of chs. 4–10. It assumes that the people have not repented (šūb) and proclaims that YHWH's anger has not 'turned' (šāb) from them (v. 8). v. 5 asserts a divine origin for the prophetic message addressed to Judah and Jerusalem. Symbols of war, details of sight and sound, evoke the terror of the impending siege. A trumpet, shouting, and the raising of the military standard imaginatively create the scene of battle and signal the urgency of seeking safety (vv. 5–6). In fierce anger (v. 8) YHWH claims sole agency for the approaching catastrophe, 'for I am bringing evil from the north' (4:6b). Reference to the mythic foe adds to the unearthly terror advancing upon the nation. The enemy is a lion, magnified into a 'destroyer of nations' (v. 7). Bourguet 1987: 117 observes that the demonic power of the enemy from the north expresses the disproportionate supernatural resources amassed against Judah. The battle is already lost, so lamentation and wailing are the only suitable response (v. 8).

(4:9–11) Interrupting prose voices indicate conflict in interpretation of the nation's fall as blame changes hands and the temporal perspective shifts to the future (vv. 9, 11). A narrator blames the leaders. Their courage will fail, implying their astonishment, and perhaps their ineptitude, and imputing to them responsibility for the disaster (v. 9, Brueggemann 1988: 51–2). In the first person Jeremiah accuses YHWH directly (v. 10): divine deception caused the catastrophe. Then YHWH speaks to defend divine action. The disaster will be total, and it is a judgement against them (v. 11).

(4:13–31) comprises four poems that employ an array of metaphors but together depict and respond to the battle announced in 4:5–8. vv. 13–18 continue to announce the coming battle, and in vv. 19–22 YHWH grieves over the battle. vv. 23–8 interpret the battle's meaning and vv. 29–31 continue to describe it. To escalate the horror of impending siege, vv. 13–18 use many speakers. A frenzied command opens the poem, 'Look, he comes up like clouds' (v. 13). In a cosmic epiphany, an unidentified, superhuman foe advances like clouds, with chariots 'like the whirlwind', and horses 'swifter than eagles'. The community voices its dismay, 'woe to us for we are ruined'. A voice from northern Israel broadcasts the siege to the nations (vv. 15–16), and YHWH speaks to Judah in feminine singular forms as to the wife who betrayed him (v. 18; cf. 2:1–3:25; Biddle 1996: 20).

(4:19–22) With poignant effect, YHWH witnesses the battle's destruction and expresses uncontrollable anguish (vv. 19–20) (contra Craigie et al. 1991: 78–9). The conventional question of the lament form, 'how long?' combines with images of standard and trumpet to set the speaker in the centre of an endless battle (v. 21). That God is the speaker becomes clear in the accusation of 'my people' who 'do not know me' (v. 22). Like the previous poem, this one also interprets the national disaster as the people's fault, but here YHWH is deeply anguished by it.

(4:23–8) Uncreation YHWH or Jeremiah describes a terrifying vision of the destruction of creation that reverses and adapts the creation account of Gen 1. Four times the speaker 'looked' and 'lo' the earth and its creatures disappear before YHWH's 'fierce anger' (vv. 23–6). YHWH interrupts the vision to announce that destruction will not be total (v. 27), but the poem continues relentlessly describing the earth's return to tōhū wābōhū, 'waste and void' (4:23; see Gen 1:2). Earth will mourn and heavens be lightless because the ineluctable divine word undoes them (v. 28).

The terrifying vision of uncreation that turns the earth into a lunar surface or a bombed city does not deviate from the cosmic battle; uncreation interprets it (Perdue 1994: 142). Theologically, politically, socially, the Babylonian invasion of Judah and Jerusalem meant the end of the world and the cessation of the created order for the community. Life in the land is over; no humans are present (v. 25); cities are in ruins (v. 26). In this mythical conception, earth, animals, and cities form an organic, interdependent whole, and their destruction by YHWH's angry decree is the result of human evil (4:22; Habel 1995: 87). The divine promise in v. 27 notto make a 'full end' addresses the implied audience who have survived the desolation.

(4:29–31) returns to the battle itself, the noise, the attack, the empty cities (v. 29), but the speaker addresses Jerusalem, personified as daughter Zion. On this poetic figure see Dobbs-Allsopp (1955). Zion is YHWH's divorced wife (2:1–3; 4:16–18) who continues to play the whore and whose predicament has worsened. Her lovers now despise her and want to kill her (v. 30). The speaker hears her 'voice' (qôl) as of a 'woman in labour'. She gasps and writhes not from giving life but in fear of death, finding her voice for the first time to bemoan her fate (v. 31; cf. 3:14).

(5:1–31) contains closely woven materials, making it difficult to distinguish literary units (Nicholson 1973: 56). In the chapter's present arrangement, it portrays YHWH's reluctance to bring judgement, explains why the cosmic battle is inevitable, and defends the Divine Warrior from charges of cruelty and arbitrariness (Carroll 1986: 174).

(5:1–17) Divine Reluctance YHWH's desire to avoid disaster dominates the opening poem. To find one just person in the city, YHWH sends Jeremiah on a search, 'so that I may pardon Jerusalem' (v. 1; for covenant lawsuit elements, see Brueggemann 1988: 59). But the people refused to turn (šûb) from their hypocritical ways (v. 3). After initial failure, Jeremiah decides he is searching among the wrong people; the poor do not know justice (mišpāt). He then searches among the rich, but they are no better. Like the adulterous wife (2:20) all break their yoke (vv. 4–5). Less successful than Abraham searching Sodom for ten just people (Gen 18:23–33), Jeremiah fails to find even one. With Jeremiah's help, YHWH did everything possible to avert punishment (Carroll 1986). Destruction by beastly enemies is a fitting result (v. 6).

(5:7–11) The rhetorical question of v. 7, addressed to a female, suggests YHWH still desires to pardon his former wife. But the adultery of her male children (v. 8) leads to a second question that brings the reader to YHWH's side of the argument. 'Shall I not punish them?' (v. 9). YHWH does not wish to punish, but how could God do otherwise? (cf. 5:29). YHWH will destroy her vineyards for both Israel and Judah have been faithless (vv. 10–11).

(5:11–17) Further accusations against Israel and Judah follow (vv. 11–13). Because of their false (v. 12) and belittling words about prophetic speech (v. 13), YHWH puts devouring fire into Jeremiah's mouth (v. 14). His prophetic counterspeech is as destructive and sweeping as fire, for it announces the coming of an unnamed nation for the cosmic battle. A suprahuman military machine will devour the nation's children, their sources of life, and their false security (vv. 15–17).

(5:18–29) YHWH speaks in prose to the implied exilic audience in a temporal shift to the future that again promises an incomplete end. YHWH then quotes the exile's most salient theological question. 'Why has the LORD our God done all these things to us?' (v. 19). YHWH's answer shows proportionate retribution and deflects blame to the people. Idolatry in their own land results in service in a foreign land. vv. 20–9 show how YHWH's reluctance to punish was overcome. Neither Jacob nor Judah sees, hears, or fears the Creator. Despite impenetrable boundaries established in the created world (vv. 20–2), the people know no boundaries in their wickedness (v. 28). The Creator questions, accuses, and quotes the people to reveal their sin (vv. 22–5). Scoundrels among them rob and trick the people and oppress the orphan and the needy, while they themselves grow sleek and fat (vv. 26–8). The refrain of 5:9 (cf. 9:9) reappears to persuade the implied audience of the necessity of the punishment (v. 29). The last two verses of the chapter act as an expansive codicil to the previous poem. Though religious leaders engage in lies, the people want it that way (vv. 30–1).

(6:1–30) Attack on Daughter Zion This chapter gathers metaphors of the cosmic battle, the foe from the north, and Daughter Zion into a collection of poems from a chorus of speakers. The mythic nature of the battle sharpens when the text identifies daughter Zion as the object of attack. A ferocious military nation wages war against Jerusalem portrayed as a weak, wanton woman, defenceless in the face of her foe. From the viewpoint of the ancients, the feminine character of the city heightens its weakness and the hopelessness of resistance (Bourguet 1987: 117).

vv. 1–9, the first-person speaker in this poem appears to be YHWH (see v. 8). Imperatives warn the children of Benjamin to flee as trumpet and warning signals herald evil looming from the north (v. 1). Nostalgically, YHWH describes how lovely and safe Zion was thought to be (vv. 2–3). Voices of the enemy intrude, shouting preparations for attack among themselves (vv. 4–5). In a brilliant stroke of imagination that further indicts Zion, the poet portrays the enemy's thoughts. They believe they are acting on divine orders against a city deserving judgement (vv. 6–7). Warnings of v. 1 become a threat in v. 8 that YHWH will turn from Jerusalem in disgust. Divine abandonment will cause the city's collapse because she did not attend to her own inner sickness (v. 7). v. 9 returns to the vineyard metaphor that appeared in 5:9–10, where it is also connected to punishment of the faithless female. There the vineyard was simply to be pruned, but here the 'remnant of Israel' is to be gleaned thoroughly. Survivors of the destruction, the exiles perhaps, face still further suffering.

vv. 10–12, Jeremiah laments the people's recalcitrance. They are not even capable of hearing the prophetic warning. He is weary of holding back divine wrath (vv. 9–11). Only Jeremiah stands between them and destruction. YHWH responds with a command to pour divine wrath on the people, young and old, male and female (v. 12). vv. 13–15, 'no peace': a refrain that recurs in 8:10–13 distributes guilt throughout the community from the people to the leadership and justifies YHWH's punishment of them. Everyone is greedy and the leaders lie. Denial characterizes their speech. Though priests and prophets are particularly guilty, the whole people deserve punishment (v. 15), and by implication, YHWH appears fully justified in bringing it upon them. vv. 16–21, to vindicate YHWH's judgement and to embellish the significance of the people's sin, YHWH brings them before witnesses. Two parallel accusations open the poem (6:16c and 17). In both YHWH speaks to direct and to warn and then dramatically quotes the people's blanket refusal to co-operate (vv. 16–17). YHWH appears to have no choice but to assemble the nations and the earth itself as legal witnesses in a trial of cosmic import. The people bring the verdict upon themselves, despite rich liturgical offerings that merely reveal their duplicity (v. 20). All will perish (v. 21) in the cosmic battle to which the next poem returns.

vv. 22–6, the foe approaches. The voice of YHWH describes the advance of the mythic nation, a merciless military force crossing the earth, their sound 'like the roaring sea' (v. 23b). Their target is 'you, O daughter Zion!' (v. 23c). The people themselves speak, fearful and helpless. They urge each other to hide from the 'terror... on every side', māgôr missābīb (vv. 24–5, see Jer 20:3, 10). Jeremiah then speaks to the 'daughter of my people' (my tr.), urging her to begin ritual lamentation in sackcloth and ashes, as if on behalf of an only child, for the destroyer is coming with such certainty that lamentation must begin. Divine commands to lament link this section with 8:4–10:25. vv. 27–30, the collection dominated by the metaphor of the cosmic battle (4:5–6:30) closes with YHWH speaking to Jeremiah about his prophetic role. He is the assayer of fine silver with a hopeless task (McKane 1986: 154). The people have failed the refiner's test. Dross cannot be separated from the pure metal, so they become 'rejected silver' (v. 30). Divine, prophetic, and human speakers have voiced horror, resistance, and finally certitude that disaster is unavoidable.

(7:1–8:3) Temple Sermon The relationship of the temple sermon and other prose sermons to the rest of the book and to Deuteronomistic editors are troubling questions (see Holladay 1988: 244–82; Stulman 1986; McKane 1981; Nicholson 1970). Ascribed by Mowinckel to the Deuteronomists, this first lengthy prose segment disturbs the poetic flow of chs. 2–6. Those chapters confront readers with multiple images, metaphors, and poetic figures that intrude upon and interrupt each other to create a rich literary soup. By contrast, the prose sermons appear as a thin broth of repetitive and stereotypical language. The temple sermon focuses on worship practices, seeming to change the subject from the cosmic battle and broken marriage in chs. 2–6. The sermon, however, provides one more interpretative voice in the book's debate about the nation's collapse.

The temple sermon is not extrinsic to the poetry, but comments upon it, and in the view of Stulman (1995) simplifies and tames it. The nation's arrogant complacency depicted in the poetry receives precise focus in the sermon. Judah and Jerusalem, monarchy and temple fell to Babylon because of hypocritical and obscene worship practices that violated the nation's own symbolic and theological perspectives. From the time of David, monarchy and temple had been inextricably bound together in the symbolic order. God would establish David's throne forever, and David's son would build YHWH's temple (1 Sam 7:1–3). When Jerusalem was invaded by Assyria a century earlier, some Isaianic passages interpreted the Davidic promises as unconditional assurance of Jerusalem's safety (Isa 36–7; Ollenburger 1987; Brueggemann 1988: 74). Perhaps because Jerusalem avoided destruction at that time, Isaiah's message solidified in the national consciousness as a promise of eternal security for the temple and the entire religious-political system. They thought they were safe no matter what they did. Judah's temple ideology was based on wrong notions of God as eternally fixed by former promises no matter how the people acted.

In the temple sermon Jeremiah speaks a terrifying counterword that challenges an entire world-view and reveals why it had to fall. The sermon insists that YHWH is an untamed deity, a wild being not reducible to theological formulae, who can bring the temple to ruins like Shiloh, the destroyed northern sanctuary (Stulman 1986; see Keown, Scalise, and Smothers 1995: 16–19 on Shiloh). The temple sermon, therefore, draws on different theological and symbolic traditions to make claims similar to the poetry. Israel is guilty and divine judgement justified. The sermon adds to the poetry a specific charge that the people failed to 'listen' (7:13, 26, 27), a theme that appears frequently in the prose passages. By implication, if the people in exile are to regain their place, their land, their temple, they must 'listen' now (8:3).

Some interpreters limit the temple sermon to 7:1–15, seeing the rest as later accretions (Weiser 1960). Although the history of its composition remains obscure, the sermon (7:1–8:3) exhibits linguistic patterns and thematic links that create inner coherence (Isabell and Jackson 1980). It moves in a downward spiral to report and mock idolatry within legitimate temple worship (7:1–15) and across a range of foolish idolatrous practices (7:16–8:3).

(7:1–15) opens with an undated superscription that presents Jeremiah as the speaker of divine words. A principal motif of the sermon is the multivalent phrase 'in this place' (bammā-qôm hazzeh; Carroll 1986: 207). The phrase refers to the temple (7:3, 7, 10, 11), the land (3:7, 15), and perhaps also the city (cf. Jer 26). The 'place' is symbolic of false national pride, blind devotion to the monarchy, and complacent arrogance. Frequent use of the phrase in the sermon emphasizes displacement of trust from the deity to the place where the deity dwells (vv. 3, 7). The narrator places Jeremiah at the gates of the temple to announce that its fate will be like Shiloh, another 'place' where YHWH made the divine name to dwell (vv. 12, 15).

Exhortations to amend reveal the depth of the problem (vv. 4–7). The people trust in a lie, 'the temple of the Lord' (v. 4). Repeated three times like a mantra, this phrase parodies the people's confidence in the 'place'. The true threat identified in this sermon, therefore, is not the enemy from the north but the enemy within the community (Stulman 1995). Insiders oppress the alien, the widow, the orphan. They kill and follow after idols. They have made 'this place' a robbers' den (v. 11) where they hide from the truth of their behaviour. They will not listen (v. 13). Only if they amend can they avoid the fate of Shiloh and the northern kingdom (14, 15).

(7:16–17) No Intercession Before adding to Judah's cultic infractions, YHWH addresses Jeremiah, forbidding him to intercede on the people's behalf (vv. 16–17). Wilson (1989) argues that this prohibition protects Jeremiah from charges that he failed as intercessor to avert the fall of Jerusalem. The prophet's role included intercession to avoid disaster, and it was not avoided. Rather than see this as a failure of Jeremiah, the prose writer interprets Judah's fall as YHWH's unwillingness to hear the prophet's intercession. YHWH prohibits intercession because of the outrageous infidelities described in the sermon.

(7:18–8:3) Downward Spiral YHWH accuses the community of increasingly heinous offences. Entire families worship the queen of heaven, an astral deity. (See Ackerman 1987; O'Connor 1992; and cf. 44:15–19, 24–30.) The passage's insistence on the involvement even of the children in the worship may simply depict the all-pervasive nature of the sin, reaching even to the offspring. But it may also encode the exilic audience, the next generation who continue in the idolatry of the generation that was expelled from the land. 7:21–6, next YHWH rejects all burnt offerings on the grounds that they were never required. Instead, YHWH commanded obedience from the time they came out of Egypt, but they did not 'listen' (vv. 24–6). Their sins are even worse than those of their ancestors. 7:27–34, YHWH accuses them of even more horrible sins, of child sacrifice at Topheth in the valley of Hinnom. A poetic interruption orders the nation to begin ritual lamentation for the generation that will die (v. 29). This verse connects the sermon to the weeping and official lamentation that follows in 8:4–10:25. For the ritual sacrifice of children, the people deserve to die. Their corpses will remain unburied, and life in the land will end (v. 34). Jerusalem will become a silent, joyless place, a dead place, a wasteland of shame, where bodies of leaders and people are exhumed and spread like dung upon the ground (8:1–3).

The temple sermon interprets the national catastrophe as the result of injustice and idolatry within Judah and ultimately calls for repentance. It offers a theodicy that interprets the past and addresses the exiles (8:3). Justice and covenant living within the community, obedience and total allegiance to YHWH, expressed in proper worship, are the requirements for covenant relationship (7:23). That did not happen in the past, consequently only a remnant survive where YHWH has driven them (8:3). But for the exiles the call to 'listen', to obey the voice of YHWH spoken through the prophets, to heed the book itself, is still before them.

(8:4–10:25) Weeping The poems assembled here fall into four groupings: 8:4–17 continues to explain why the cosmic battle must come; 8:18–9:25 begins mourning rites in face of the siege and includes a prose comment; 10:1–16 is a communal liturgy that proclaims loyalty to YHWH and the foolishness of idols; 10:17–25 announces exile as the enemy from the north comes closer. A number of metaphors, themes, and poetic devices connect these poems with earlier poetic materials in the book. 8:10b–12 repeats the refrain of 6:13–15, and 8:13 returns to the metaphor of the vineyard (2:21; 5:10–11; 6:9). The cosmic battle, its sounds and approaching destructiveness (8:16–17; 10:17–18, 22) explicitly links this material with chs. 4–6. The approach of the foe provokes the only response possible, lamentation and weeping for the dying nation.

As in earlier chapters, multiple voices speak to announce, comment upon, or respond to the disaster. This section of the text acts as a conclusion to chs. 2–10, drawing together voices, themes, and perspectives from throughout the section. Voices of lamentation and weeping that appeared earlier (3:21; 4:19; 6:26; 7:29), erupt here into cascades of tears that envelop God, the prophet, and the people. Liturgical expressions of fidelity that mock other gods (10:1–16; and perhaps 8:14–15) repeat the form and themes used by the children in the marriage metaphor (3:22–5). If the first-person plural liturgical voice symbolizes the implied exilic audience, prayers dramatize their voice to offer them a model of proper confession of sin (Biddle 1996: 27).

(8:4–17) returns to poetry as if never interrupted by the temple sermon. YHWH speaks to Jeremiah in continued perplexity at the people's failure to return (šûb, 8:4–5) and compares their behaviour to that of wild creatures (vv. 6–7). They are like a horse plunging headlong into battle, blind to the dangers facing them. And unlike birds who know their times, the people are unnatural beings who 'do not know the justice (mišpat) of YHWH' (8:7, my tr.). YHWH quotes them to accuse them of arrogance and denial. They claim to be wise but they have rejected the word of YHWH (vv. 8–9). Then YHWH depicts their punishment, not by invasion but by naming an effect, the capture of wives and fields by others (v. 10). The refrain of accusation from 6:13–15, repeated here, explains why invasion must occur. Everyone is greedy; priests and prophets fail to see the depth of the wound; no one is ashamed. YHWH expresses bitter disappointment because the vineyard is barren (8:13; cf. 5:10–11; 6:9; and Isa 5:1–6).

In the midst of this crisis the people speak, using first-person plural forms (vv. 14–15). Befuddled and confused, they blame YHWH for poisoning the water they drink. Though they confess their sin (v. 14), they speak in a tone of innocent misgiving. They looked for peace and healing but found neither (v. 15). It is as if the community recognizes the truth of accusations against it but finds itself still in circumstances of terror. This voice may characterize the implied audience, set poetically before the invasion but also expressing the dilemma and theological confusion of exile. In reply, YHWH calls attention to the sounds of the approaching battle. The snorting and neighing of horses and the quaking of the land signal the close proximity of a huge cavalry (vv. 16–17). YHWH orchestrates the invasion, as if uncontrollable and deadly snakes are let loose.

(8:18–9:22) The weeping of God, the earth, and the mourning women signify the imminence and inevitability of the destruction, for 'death has come up into our windows' (9:21). But the poetry of weeping connotes something more. It joins God with the people and the earth in vulnerability, pain, and grief. Divine tears make healing possible.

(8:18–9:3) The speaker, the demarcation of units, and meaning of these verses bring no consensus among interpreters, yet these lines contain some of the most extraordinary poetry in the book. Particularly disputed is the speaker of 8:18–9:1. Because the English text numbers 8:23 of the Hebrew as 9:1, the English verse numbers are one ahead of the Hebrew throughout ch. 9. Who is the 'I', and who says 'my poor people' (8:19, 21, 22; 9:1, 2)? A sampling reveals vast disagreement. Carroll (1986: 235) assigns these verses to personified Jerusalem; Condamin (1920: 84) attributes them to the people; Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard (1991: 136), and Clements (1988: 59) believe Jeremiah is the speaker. Holladay (1986: 288–9) finds three voices including YHWH's in 19b and 22a.

There is a strong possibility, however, that the speaker throughout the lament is YHWH, weeping at the destruction of the people; 8:19c and 9:3 clearly identify YHWH as the poem's speaker. Elsewhere in Jeremiah, YHWH is most often the speaker of the words 'my people' ('ammi', cf. 2:11, 13, 32; 6:14, 30; 8:7, 11; 9:7; 15:7; 18:15; 23:22; less clearly, 6:26; 14:17). Brueggemann (1988: 88) observes that divine pathos structures 8:18–23. Roberts (1992) corroborates this view by observing that Mesopotamian laments use the motif of the weeping God and exhibit similarities to 8:18–9:3. Perhaps commentators avoid identifying YHWH as speaker because this tearful metaphor appears too contradictory of the powerful, wrathful warrior deity in much of the book; or perhaps they think weeping too vulnerable a characteristic to be attributed to the deity.

The decision as to the divine identity of the principal speaker, by no means certain, is theologically crucial. To recognize that YHWH speaks in this poem is to see a temporary but massive turning. The imagery returns to a portrait of divine suffering already begun in the broken-marriage metaphor, but rather than distancing YHWH from the people as in the divorce of his wife (2:1–3:25), this poem unites YHWH with the people in their weeping (9:17–22). God's tears mean that there may be a balm in Gilead, healing may be possible, for in such a metaphorical depiction, God joins in the people's suffering. Tears heal because they stir 'all living souls', bring people together in suffering, and reveal them to one another in their vulnerability (Song 1981: 40–5). YHWH's tears are more powerful even than the armies under divine command because, for a poetic moment at least, God, people, and cosmos articulate a common suffering. The pathos of God, as Heschel (1962) named God's intense suffering, offers an alternative interpretation of the suffering of the exiles. It puts aside punishment, eschews questions of causality, and understands God in radically different terms from much of the rest of the book.

The poem begins with divine proclamation of grief and joylessness (8:18; see Holladay 1986: 287–8 and McKane 1986: 194 on translation problems). YHWH quotes 'daughter of my people' (bat 'ammi, my tr., and in 8:21, 22, 23 Heb.), a term for the city. Her question expresses either smug confidence in YHWH's presence or a sense of abandonment at divine absence (8:19–20). YHWH questions in turn, expressing hurt and dismay at her idolatry. But it is the hurt of the daughter that overwhelms YHWH, not the provocation to anger (8:21). YHWH calls for healing. Is there no balm, no physician, no return to health? The implied answer is 'no'. But YHWH does not abandon her; he weeps with her. 'O that my head were waters and my eyes a fountain of tears that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people' (my tr.; 9:1; 8:23 MT). YHWH desires to become weeping, to turn into tears, to weep unceasingly over the slain.

9:2 changes the mood and may be a separate poem (Thompson 1980: 307) but similar phrasing links it to 9:1. YHWH now wants to escape the infidelities of the people. 'O that I had a lodging-place in the desert to escape their betrayal, their adultery, their lies, for they do not know me' (9:2–3, my paraphrase).

8:18–9:3 echoes the broken-marriage metaphor of 2:1–3:25, in its accusations of idolatry and adultery, in its attention to city personified as female, and in the grief of YHWH over the failure of people to know him. Though accusation is still part of the poetry, grief and tears predominate, bringing the reader again to side with YHWH, but here YHWH's grief joins him with the suffering woman, at least temporarily.

(9:4–9) continues divine speech. YHWH speaks to the people directly to warn them against treacherous neighbours and to announce that they will be tested and refined (cf. 6:27). The language of refinement and testing provides yet another interpretation of exile for it suggests something less than the complete destruction promised in the material in chs. 4–6 and would undermine the prophet's earlier message. Hence, the refinement and testing motifs suggest hope to the implied audience in exile. They will emerge purified. The question of v. 7, repeated from 5:9 and 27, however, indicates that divine hesitancy exists, as if YHWH needs confirmation of the appropriateness of punishment, and expects to receive it.

(9:10–11) Weeping Whether the speaker, who is probably YHWH, does the weeping or commands it is not clear (McKane 1986: 203). The weeping is on behalf of the earth itself, the mountains and the pastures of the wilderness, for their destruction and the absence of life upon them (v. 10). Lamentation is for the world that has been uncreated and returned to chaos (4:23–8). The world of Judah and Jerusalem will become a barren heap of ruins.

(9:12–16) A prose voice interjects a further interpretation of the tragedy with undisguised questions about the meaning of events. 'Who is wise enough' to interpret these happenings? 'Why is the land laid waste...?' (v. 12). Clearly the writer of these verses claims to be wise enough to answer them. The people did not obey tôrâ, they did not listen to YHWH's voice, and they worshipped the Baals. That is why they are in exile (v. 16).

(9:17–22) Official Weeping This two-stanza poem (9:17–19, 20–2) formalizes the weeping and makes it official, public, and massive. In the first stanza of the MT (vv. 17–19), YHWH commands that the mourning women be summoned. But it is the people or Jeremiah speaking in the rest of the stanza. The official task of the keeners was to begin the public rituals of mourning for funeral rites (O'Connor 1992). Their presence indicates that a death has occurred. Their wails will release the tears of the people whose eyes will 'run down with tears' and their eyelids 'flow with water' (v. 18). The people of Zion have already begun their keening over the death of the city (v. 19). In the second stanza (vv. 20–2), the speaker gives instructions to the women. The weeping will be so extensive that they must teach other women their professional skills. The community speaks again in v. 21 to announce that death like an invading force or an intruding person has 'come up into our windows'. The funeral to which the people are invited is their own. Life is over (v. 22).

(9:23–5) returns to the motif of wisdom in another prose comment which seems to take up the prose remarks of vv. 12–16 rather than the poem of vv. 17–22, where people are weeping, not boasting. The wise must not boast about wisdom but about the knowledge of God who is loving, righteous, and just. An eschatological future promises judgement against the worship of Israel's uncircumcised neighbours whom Israel resembles in heart.

(10:1–16) Confession of Sin These verses contain a hymn presented as prophetic word (vv. 1, 11), the subject of which is the foolishness of worshipping other gods and the loyalty of the speakers to YHWH the true God. This liturgical song, a many-voiced choir of witnesses (Seybold 1993) perplexes interpreters on a number of grounds (Margaliot 1980; Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard 1991: 157–61). v. 11 is in Aramaic; the order of the MT differs from the LXX, and the poem's themes of loyal monotheism intrude abruptly upon poems of accusation and weeping in the previous chapters. The order of the MT passage, however, makes sense as it stands (Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard 1991; Thompson 1980: 325), and, of greater interest, the sentiments of this hymn, loyal monotheism and derision of idols, as well as its liturgical style, evoke the voice of the repentant children in 3:21–5. It may be placed after the injunction to the people to weep for their imminent death (9:1–22) so as to serve as a model of repentance and reconciliation for the exilic survivors of that death. The exiles are brought into the text as the voice of the community that has been refined in the fire, and they are provided with language to reconcile them with the one true God. The hymn's location in the book transposes exilic conflict from the historical world to the divine. The gods of the nations are powerless and ridiculous, and so they and their people will be punished and perish (v. 15). Only the Creator God of Israel can give life, and by implication provide the community with a future.

The parody and disdain for the gods of the nations expressed here (vv. 1–5, 8–9, 14–15) have close parallels with other exilic texts (Isa 40–8, esp. 44:9–20; Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard 1991; Blank 1961: 243). Whereas syncretism and idolatry were always part of Israel's struggle in the land, idolatry was a particular temptation for the assimilating community in Babylon. These liturgical materials, moreover, draw on creation theology of the wisdom tradition rather than on covenant terminology. The hymn of praise (vv. 12–16) reverses the chaos of the cosmic battle, connecting it with the defeat of the mythic foe from the north (Perdue 1994: 141–50).

Brueggemann calls the text a 'litany of contrasts' between true and false gods (1988: 98). Commands not to learn from the nations nor to be afraid of their idols surround the first stanza (vv. 2–5). The people should not become like the nations among whom they live nor adopt their idolatrous customs. Those peoples and their deities are foolish and powerless (vv. 3–5b). The second stanza (vv. 6–10) begins and ends with praise and awe of the one true God. In direct address to YHWH, v. 6 declares the greatness of the divine name and the fear owed to the true King of the nations (vv. 6–7). By contrast, the gods of the nations are stupid, human productions (vv. 8–9). These gods will perish (v. 11), says the prose comment. The third stanza (vv. 12–16) provides the reason for their demise. YHWH is the Creator whose wisdom established the world, whose voice (Gen 1) brings potent upheaval (v. 13), while idols are delusions (vv. 14–15). In this poem of praise, relationship with the One who formed all things is re-established (v. 16). The Creator is unmatched by any pretenders to deity and chooses Israel for a special inheritance (v. 16).

(10:17–25) Exile We are brought back dramatically to the temporal threshold of exile through the voices of at least two speakers. YHWH (vv. 17–18 and probably in v. 22) announces the exile and the siege. Daughter Zion (vv. 19–21 and probably vv. 23–5) comments on the personal significance of the disaster for her and pleads for justice. YHWH's commanding voice (vv. 17–18) orders the people to pick up their bundles; the siege has begun. YHWH will 'fling away the inhabitants of the land' with relish, indeed, with vindictiveness, 'so that they shall feel it'.

vv. 19–21, in terminology of 'hurt' and 'wound' that makes her a figure of sympathy rather than scorn, Daughter Zion laments her fate (see Isa 54:1–3). She has no one to help expand her tent and no need to do so for she is bereft of children (v. 20). Her leaders have wounded her; her people are scattered (v. 21). She sees at last what faces her and humbly acknowledges the severity of her wound. Exile is a punishment she must bear. From her own words we learn again that YHWH is not the cause of the tragedy (v. 19). If the female character here is YHWH's divorced wife of 2:1–4:2, she has undergone a transformation from a silent, unreconciled cast-off to a repentant and long-suffering figure of lament, deprived of her children. But the cosmic battle approaches anyway: 'Hear', the noise of battle comes from the north (v. 22).

Daughter Zion appears to speak again in vv. 24–5, although Holladay (1986: 338) identifies the speaker as the people rather than as the personified city, and Brueggemann (1988: 103) thinks the speaker is Jeremiah. The speaker prays that God punish in 'just measure' and not in anger (cf. 10:19b). She begs, instead, for YHWH to pour anger on the nations that have laid waste and devoured Jacob (vv. 24–5). Clearly speaking from exile, this voice echoes the repentance themes of 3:21–5 and 10:1–16. Exile is punishment that must be borne, but YHWH, God of all nations, may, in turn, punish those who have devastated Israel, if Israel repents.

Covenant Destroyed (chs. 11–20)

A frame of curses surrounds these chapters. Covenant curses upon those who do not 'listen' to YHWH's word appear in the opening prose sermon (11:1–17), and Jeremiah's curses on his birth (20:14–18) conclude the section. Between the two curses, poetic threats and accusations, as well as prose sermons (11:1–16; 17:19–27), continue to appear, but new literary elements change the shape of the literature and give movement to the chapters. In contrast to chs. 2–10 where Jeremiah's prophetic pronouncements appear chiefly in poetry, these chapters add dimension to the character. Prose descriptions of symbolic events that feature Jeremiah (chs. 13, 18, 19, 20:1–6) and poetic laments or 'confessions' of Jeremiah (11:18–12:6; 15:10–21; 17:14–18; 18:18–23; 20:7–14) bring the prophet himself into the foreground as a significant character who had barely been visible in chs. 2–10. These new elements show him in action and portray his inner suffering.

By the end of ch. 20, Jeremiah's fate and the fate of the nation converge symbolically so that what happens to him evokes and mimics the suffering of the people. In this section Jeremiah represents both God and people. He stands as prophet against the people who reject him, yet he symbolically embodies their grief, doubt, anger, and finally their hope (Polk 1984) once they are in exile. The community's rejection of Jeremiah contributes to the massive theodicy this book is building. By rejecting Jeremiah as prophet and covenant mediator the people bring the tragedy upon themselves. But later, Jeremiah's suffering and lamentation become iconic of the pain and hopelessness of the exilic audience. Finally, disputation among voices, particularly between YHWH and Jeremiah, intensifies, offering dissenting interpretations of the catastrophe.

(11:1–17) Covenant Curse In the book's second major prose sermon, similar in language and style to the temple sermon (7:1–8:3), Jeremiah announces a curse upon anyone 'who does not heed the words' of the Mosaic covenant (vv. 3–4) (on the Deuteronomistic flavour of the sermon and for other views as to the identity of the covenant, see Stulman 1986: 63–6 and Carroll 1986: 267). If Jeremiah himself were the author of this sermon, then it would have prophesied the fall of the nation in advance of events. If the sermon is the work of later followers of Jeremiah, then it would explain the nation's fall after the fact. In either case, this sermon has one point and presents it with astonishing simplicity: possession of the land hinges entirely upon obedience to the covenant (v. 5).

Like the temple sermon (7:1–8:3), the covenant sermon demands that the people 'listen' to YHWH's voice (vv. 4, 7–8; cf. 7:13, 23–6), and prohibits Jeremiah's intercession on behalf of the people (v. 14; cf. 7:16). The covenant sermon, however, describes the people's failure to listen in vague formulaic terms different from those of the temple sermon which castigates the worshipping community for specific social and religious infractions. By contrast, the covenant sermon accuses the ancestors (vv. 6–8) and the present generation (vv. 9–13) of walking 'in the stubbornness of an evil will' (v. 8), and going after other gods to serve them (vv. 10, 12–13). Both sermons, however, undercut fundamental symbolic understandings of ancient Israel. The temple sermon proclaims the end of the royal temple ideology, and the covenant sermon announces the collapse of the Mosaic covenant because of human disloyalty. The covenant curse will fall upon them and Jeremiah is powerless to change it.

vv. 1–5, narrated in solemn ritualistic fashion, the announcement of the curse occurs in a prose dialogue between God and Jeremiah. YHWH explains what will activate the curse. It will fall upon those who disobey the covenant made with the ancestors brought from Egypt. The covenant formula, 'I will be your God and you will be my people' (v. 4), encapsulates the intimacy of covenant relationship and gains expression in YHWH's oath to give them a land 'flowing with milk and honey'. At stake in YHWH's pronouncement, therefore, is the entire future of the community in the land. Jeremiah's formal response, 'Amen' (v. 5, reading the Heb. literally) makes him legal witness to the solemn statement of the curse. vv. 6–13 continue the divine speech, narrated by Jeremiah, that recounts the nation's history as a failure to 'listen' (vv. 6–8), a failure of ancestors and of Jeremiah's contemporaries (vv. 9–13). In quid pro quo fashion, YHWH refuses to listen to them, nor will the idols to whom they cry (vv. 11–13). Not listening is all-pervasive, spreading like vindictiveness on a playground. No one will listen to anyone, and above all, YHWH will not listen to any word from Jeremiah on their behalf (v. 14).

Although the sermon's theme is simple, it contains a complex, artistic reperformance of Israel's history and serves as a comment upon the poetry that precedes it (Stulman 1995). The cosmic battle already underway and the weeping that marks it are, according to this sermon, the result of covenant infidelity by the insiders. Mosaic covenant language becomes another symbolic lens for interpreting the loss of the land. Other than 3:16, this is the first explicit mention of covenant in the book (Carroll 1986: 267). The absence of blessings that usually accompany covenant curses underscores the inevitability of the disaster ahead (O'Connor 1988). But why does the sermon simply announce the curse as an unalterable course of events? From the perspective of the book's exilic audience, the disaster has already happened. The sermon blames it on covenant disloyalty of their ancestors, distant and immediate. The implicit call to them as survivors is that they must hear and obey. Redactionally, the covenant sermon introduces chs. 11–20 within which the last appeals to 'turn' are made to the nation and by the end of which the curse is enacted.

vv. 15–17 are corrupt (see Holladay 1986: 354–6; Carroll 1986: 272–4). As translated in the NRSV, however, their language and imagery reach both forwards and backwards. YHWH's query about the beloved in v. 15 is echoed in his challenge to the beloved in 12:7, creating a frame around the confession of Jeremiah in 11:8–12:6. YHWH's rebuke of her activity in the temple sacrifice connects these verses with ch. 7, and the tree planted by YHWH evokes the planting language of Jeremiah's call (11:10) and the tree in Jeremiah's confession (11:19). The green tree that YHWH planted will be destroyed, as Jeremiah's enemies seek to destroy him. Linguistically, these difficult verses link the prophet's fate to that of the nation.

(11:18–12:25) Lament and Response The first lament or 'confession' of Jeremiah (11:18–12:4; see also 15:1–21; 17:14–18; 18:18–23; 20:7–13) gains a divine response (12:5–6). Akin to psalms of individual lament in form and style (Baumgartner 1987), these first-person prayers are more akin to psalms than to prophetic literature. In each lament an unidentified speaker addresses YHWH to complain bitterly about threats to his life, acute loneliness and isolation, and failure in his prophetic role. Only by deduction or from prose comments is it clear that the speaker is Jeremiah. Although many interpreters find in the confessions a window into the inner life of the prophet (von Rad 1984; Hubmann 1978; Ittmann 1981), the relationship of the poems to a historical person cannot be known (see Gunneweg 1970; Gerstenberger 1963; Reventlow 1963). None the less, the poems' intense portrayals of the prophet's inner life are immensely important on a number of levels.

The confessions defend Jeremiah against the charge of false prophecy (on which see Meyer 1977, Carroll 1981:

158–97). Like the call narrative (Jer 1), the confessions portray Jeremiah as one who spoke under divine compulsion, who stood in the council of YHWH to receive the message, and who faithfully executed his role as mediator at immense cost (Diamond 1987; O'Connor 1988). In potent language that portrays an inner anguished self, the confessions also portray Jeremiah in combat both with God whose word he speaks and with the people who reject that word. Identified with both God and people, yet distinct from them, Jeremiah embodies the pain and anger of both. By revealing an inner life, by 'going behind' the character into internal struggles, the confessions help create a character whose life symbolizes his message (Polk 1984: 125). Whatever else it is, Jeremiah's life is a metaphor of the pain of God and of the people. For the implied audience in exile, Jeremiah's life, with its anger and resistance, its suffering and captivity, is a symbol that interprets their reality.

(11:18–12:6) presents formal problems, for it is not certain whether the verses comprise one (O'Connor 1988) or two confessions (11:18–23 and 12:1–6; Diamond 1987; Smith 1990). In the present text, however, the two parts of the poem form two panels of complaint (11:18–20 and 12:1–4) and response (11:21–3 and 12:4–6) that interpret and nuance one another as a single composition (Hubmann 1978: 165–78). 11:18–23 opens with an unidentified voice. The speaker uses yāda' (to know), a covenant verb of intimate relationship (O'Connor 1988: 90–1), but he does not divulge the content of what YHWH has revealed to him (11:18). The point is that the prophet speaks on the authority of relationship with YHWH. The speaker is an innocent 'lamb led to the slaughter'. He quotes enemies who want to cut him down like a tree (11:19); he appeals to YHWH, who 'judge[s] righteously', to judge his case (rib). A prose voice interrupts the poet to identify the enemies as people from Jeremiah's home town, to explain why they attack him, and to promise their punishment (11:21–3).

The second panel (12:1–6) reuses images and themes from the first but inverts them. No longer confident that justice will be done, Jeremiah doubts his success in a legal case (rib) against YHWH (12:1). Why, Jeremiah asks, do 'the guilty prosper' and the 'treacherous thrive?' And Jeremiah answers his own question: because YHWH plants and nourishes them (12:2). Jeremiah protests his innocence and claims that YHWH knows (yāda') his innocence as well. He asks for vengeance against his enemies in terms that echo their plans for him in 11:19. Then he shifts to the cosmic consequence of their evil, 'How long will the land mourn?' (12:4), recalling the poetic uncreation of the world (4:23–8), as the land shrivels and grieves with Jeremiah. YHWH's response to Jeremiah's attack against divine justice brings neither resolution nor comfort (12:5–6). Instead, YHWH promises that things will get worse. Like 11:21–3, 12:6 personalizes the escalating difficulties for Jeremiah. Even his own family is treacherous.

This confession invites interpretation at more than one level. As a defence of the prophet, Jeremiah's resistance indicates that YHWH alone has designated him a prophet. As an indictment of the wicked, even his own kin, it shows that the people bring sword and famine upon themselves by rejecting the prophet (11:22). As an attack on the justice of God, it protests the suffering of the innocent and implicates God in that suffering. What is uncertain is who the innocent are. Surely it is Jeremiah, but for the exilic audience, it may appear that their suffering is out of proportion to their guilt. In that case, Jeremiah the rejected prophet also becomes the paradigm of the innocent sufferer (Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard 1991; Polk 1984), struggling to be faithful, yet uncomprehending. The primary issue in these verses is divine justice. The prominence of this theme evokes the conditions of exile where theodicy became the central theological question (Carroll 1986; Raitt 1977). YHWH's reply to the prophet (12:5–6) indicates that things will become harder before they improve. Treachery, conflict, and betrayal will continue in their midst, and no satisfactory explanation of their suffering emerges.

(12:7–13) YHWH's Lament YHWH continues to speak, first in a tone of 'exhausted grief' (Brueggemann 1988: 115), and then of destructive rage. In love language that suggests the broken marriage of 2:1–3:25, YHWH announces that he has forsaken his heritage (nahālā, vv. 7, 8; Habel 1995; Clements 1988: 84), the beloved of his heart (cf. 11:14). His heritage has again gone wild like the animals. Sexual overtones are absent here, but the turn in the relationship is no less shocking than was the beloved's behaviour in the marriage. 'Therefore I hate her', says YHWH, who calls for the animals to devour her (vv. 8–9). In vv. 10–13 YHWH continues to speak, but the object of indictment shifts from the beloved to the many shepherds of the vineyard. Their destructiveness (vv. 10–11a) and fruitless actions (v. 13) frame the mourning of the personified land, desolate, uncared for, and abandoned (v. 11). YHWH's sword devours (v. 12).

Like Jeremiah, YHWH also voices pain and fierce anger (v. 13) but in this case provoked by the intimate betrayal of a loved one, who 'has lifted up her voice against me', and by the feckless leadership of kings. The language of betrayed love (11:15 and vv. 7–8) surrounds Jeremiah's more cautious anger in a rhetorical battle between prophet and deity. YHWH's betrayal by the beloved, the most intimate of treacheries, is certain. Jeremiah merely asks indirectly if YHWH has betrayed him (12:1–2). Jeremiah's meek rebellion holds its ground but not without encroachment from the more justified divine fury.

(12:14–17) YHWH continues speaking, but now in prose and in a temporal shift to the exile. YHWH corrects the previous poems and looks toward the future (Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard 1991: 183). With language from the call narrative (1:10), YHWH promises to 'pluck up' those who touch his inheritance (nahālā). From amongst those plucked nations, YHWH will 'pluck up' Israel to return them to their inheritance. For the nations, too, there is hope, if they will learn to swear by YHWH's name. If they will not listen, a major theme of the prose materials, then YHWH will 'uproot and destroy'. This prose comment, therefore, qualifies YHWH's rage, hatred, and destruction from 12:7–13.

(13:1–27) Symbolic Acts Connections among the prose and poetry sections collected here are neither narrative nor formal but thematic; destruction must come on account of the nation's foolish pride. The certainty of destruction is expressed by Jeremiah's first 'symbolic action' (vv. 1–11), by a second symbolic act to be performed by the people (vv. 12–14), and by poetic pieces that announce the exile.

Symbolic acts are dramatized speech that involve more than the drama of street theatre (Carroll 1986: 293–7). Within ancient Israel symbolic prophetic acts were understood as enacted speech forms that embody the divine plan (Overholt 1989: 86–91). Many of the book's narratives portray Jeremiah engaging in symbolic acts (16:1–4; 19:1–2; 25:15–29; 27:1–3; 32:1–15; 43:8–13; 51:59–64), but others also perform acts for Jeremiah to interpret (13:12–14; 18:1–11; 51:59–64). Competing claimants to divine authority use symbolic acts to cancel Jeremiah's message (28:10–11; 36:20–4; Lundbom 1995: 191). So many narratives in Jeremiah describe events and deeds rife with symbolic meanings that the symbolic act as a specific genre of prophetic literature becomes a blurred category (cf. 20:1–6; 35:1–19). What seems important to note is that the ancient world, and some contemporary cultures, ascribe to events far more revelatory significance than do Western 'scientific' cultures.

(13:1–11) The Ruined Loincloth Two major problems bedevil interpretation of this passage. The first is the difficulty in determining the event's location and historical status. Because the Euphrates is a great distance away from Jerusalem, it becomes hard to imagine Jeremiah actually performing the act. Some interpreters, therefore, emend the text to name a site near Jerusalem or understand the narrative as entirely fictional. The problems are unresolvable (Condamin 1920: 114–17; Holladay 1986: 396; Carroll 1986).

The second, equally thorny problem concerns the meaning of the symbolic action. Jeremiah narrates the story in the first person and describes his obedient responses to a sequence of divine commands that result in the burial and disintegration of a loincloth (vv. 1–6). Apart from portraying him as an obedient servant, the action itself is nearly opaque. Who or what is being buried and destroyed? If Euphrates is the location of the event, then the text suggests that the exiles, symbolized by the loincloth and buried in Babylon, are ruined by the experience. The symbolic act, then, might be a critique of the exilic community, ruined in their captivity. Or, since burying a cloth by a river will undoubtedly destroy it, the act could stand as a protest against YHWH's abandonment and neglect of the community by burying them in exile. But the interpretative speech that follows (vv. 8–11) suppresses both these possibilities. What is being buried and destroyed is the pride of Judah and Jerusalem (v. 9). Because they would not listen and because they followed other gods, Israel and Judah have failed to realize their true identity (vv. 10–11; Brueggemann 1991: 121–3). They are utterly useless.

(13:12–14) The Wine-Jars A second symbolic and equally destructive event follows, though it is not Jeremiah but YHWH and the people, presumably of Judah and Jerusalem, who will perform the future act. And it is not Jeremiah but YHWH who interprets that act in a divinely scripted conversation. Jeremiah's role is to mediate between the two parties. The filling of the wine-jars does not, as expected, symbolize feasting and joy but drunkenness. The people's forced drunkenness leads to self-destruction of all the land's inhabitants, particularly royal and religious leadership (v. 13). YHWH will neither spare nor have compassion. By its juxtaposition with 13:1–11, this passage seems to describe Judah's punishment for its pride (13:9). It blames the national catastrophe on Judah, but it also places the fall within divine punishment of the nations by leading forward to 25:15–29 where all the nations drink of the same cup of destruction.

(13:15–19) Attack and Exile These verses explicate YHWH's announcement, 'I will not have pity...' (13:14). Announcements of exile and divine commands (vv. 15–16, 18, 20) unify the verses. vv. 15–19, Jeremiah orders the people to listen (v. 15) and announces the consequences of not listening (v. 17). By contrast with YHWH who has no compassion (13:14), Jeremiah will weep bitterly for their pride and captivity (v. 17). The king and queen mother must become 'lowly' for the attack is underway and the towns of the Negeb are cut off (vv. 18–19).

(13:20–7) Zion's Rape This poem addresses personified Jerusalem and returns to the theme of the cosmic battle, here imagined in terms of a rape. YHWH warns Jerusalem to look because the enemy from the north advances. (See Holladay 1986: 411 on gender of pronouns.) Rhetorical questions highlight Zion's plight and her guilt (vv. 20–3). As in the broken-marriage metaphor (2:19), YHWH quotes speech he imagines she might say. If she asks herself why these things have happened to her, he tells her it is because of her own sin that she is raped (v. 22). She cannot help herself (v. 23). Then in one of the most horrible lines in the book, YHWH tells her, 'I myself will lift up your skirts over your face' (v. 26). Her rape is punishment in kind for her animal-like adulteries (v. 27). Rape as a metaphor for military invasion is widespread (Washington and Gordon 1995) in the ancient and modern world. Here it is particularly awful because YHWH is credited with the deed (O'Connor 1992). Zion learns how truly without compassion and pity YHWH can be.

(14:1–22) Drought and Wound Various possibilities exist for dividing the chapter on formal and thematic grounds (Carroll 1986: 307–8). Many commentators find two communal laments, one on the drought (vv. 1–16) and one on the wounds of war (vv. 17–22), with thematic and formal links between the two (vv. 9, 22; Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard 1991: 200). Some see the drought and the war materials as referring to two separate historical catastrophes, but the two panels of poetry (vv. 1–10 and 17–22) interpret one another (Holladay 1986: 422) and speak of the same subject alternately imagined as meteorological and military events. Despite possible connections to an actual drought, the drought serves as a metaphor for the shattering of the nation in the cosmic battle and the uncreation of the world associated with it.

Both communal laments contain confessions of sin (vv. 7, 20) and statements of loyal praise (vv. 8–9, 22). The latter dramatize the voice of the implied exilic audience, children of the unfaithful wife of YHWH (3:22–5; 10:1–16; McKane 1986 also places these prayers in exile). The purpose of these liturgical pieces is to invite the audience to repent and to find in YHWH their only hope (vv. 8, 22). Wedged between the two panels of poetry is prose material (vv. 11–16) that explains the cause of grief and lamentation as the consequence of the prophets' false discernment of reality (Brueggemann 1988: 128). Together the laments summon the exilic community to learn from the disaster and repent, while simultaneously moving the narrative thread of the book towards the disaster.

vv. 1–10, an undated superscription identifies the setting of the poem and chapter as a drought (v. 1), but more than the absence of rain threatens the community. Israel has forsaken the ‘fountain of living waters’ and dug their own cisterns, broken cisterns that cannot hold water (2:13; 17:13). The drought symbolizes the consequences of Israel’s infidelity (Jer 4:27–8; 12:4; 23:10; O’Connor 1988: 20). A third-person narrator describes the drought’s impact (vv. 2–6). Animals, humans, and the earth suffer together. Affliction binds everyone from nobles to servants (v. 3; Brueggemann 1988). In first-person plural forms, vv. 7–9 introduce the voice of the people. They confess their sin and petition YHWH for help in repentant and humble terms. It is YHWH’s distance and inaction that perplexes them. ‘Why should you be like a stranger...like someone confused, like a mighty warrior who cannot give help?’ (vv. 8–9). They confess their loyalty, none the less, and beg YHWH not to forsake them.

Interpreted as a pre-exilic text, this first panel of lament implies that the community finally expresses repentance, but it is insincere or too late (McConville 1993: 68). As an exilic text however, the poem raises a theological phantom that haunted the defeated nation. Where is God in their pain? Is God absent, confused, powerless? By giving exiles dramatic voice, the poem models how the exilic community should respond to the crisis. The speakers confess their sins and turn to YHWH, their hope (v. 8). But YHWH rejects their repentance (vv. 10–11), switching back from the world of the reader to the pre-exilic world. Repentance is too late; punishment will come. vv. 11–16 remain in a pre-exilic time-frame, but they too address issues of exile. The first prose comment (vv. 11–12) prohibits Jeremiah’s mediation on behalf of the people no matter what liturgical rite they offer. Prohibition of Jeremiah’s intercession defends him against accusations of failed prophecy (Wilson 1989). His mediation did not fail; it was not even permitted, because YHWH had already decided to send the invasion. The second prose comment (vv. 13–16) derides speech of prophets who invent their word, send themselves, and by contrast to Jeremiah, promise šālôm ‘in this place’ (v. 13). Two prophetic views of reality compete, but it is clear which one should be chosen—the Jeremican interpretation of the tragedy.

vv. 17–22, this second lament panel also ridicules religious leadership (v. 18) and resumes the theme of weeping over destroyed daughter Zion. YHWH commands Jeremiah to express the divine ‘pathos’ (Seybold 1993: 134) at the destruction of virgin daughter Jerusalem who has been struck in war with a mortal wound (vv. 17–18; cf. 13:20–7). The people cry out again (vv. 19–22) to continue their protest against YHWH’s neglect of them. The implied audience faces its catastrophe and asks if YHWH hates Zion, why YHWH has struck them, why there is no healing. For their part, they accept their sin and the sins of their ancestors and beg YHWH to remember the covenant (v. 20). Unlike YHWH the idols cannot bring rain; YHWH is their only hope (v. 22).

Although this chapter and other communal liturgical fragments in the book have often been seen as secondary, they play a key role in bringing the audience into the Jeremican programme for the nation’s renewal. (For post-exilic dating, see Biddle 1996: 97–8.)

(15:1–16:21) No Future, Yet a Future 15:1–4 parallels 14:11–12 in its expression of divine rejection of Jeremiah’s intercession. In another defence of Jeremiah as a true mediator foiled in preventing disaster by divine command, the prose commentator announces that no mediation would work, not even by Moses or Samuel. The people’s fate is sealed. Terms of catastrophe are less mythic than in chs. 2–10 where the foe from the north was advancing upon Jerusalem. In chs. 11–20 the foe appears only in 13:20. Instead, the modes of tragedy become more realistically precise: pestilence and sword, famine and captivity (15:2; 11:22; 14:15; 21:8), as well as unburied bodies (14:16). The destroyers are no longer a mythic army whose noise can be heard from afar, but the sword that kills and the beasts and birds that scavenge upon corpses (15:3). Nor is it the people who are held responsible here, but former King Manasseh (2 Kings 21:10–15). Clements (1988: 94–6) discusses the dislike of Manasseh shared by the book of Jeremiah and the Deuteronomistic history.

(15:5–9) Divine Lament YHWH grieves over doomed Jerusalem with a poignant rhetorical question that brings readers into divine anguish and portrays Jerusalem’s pitiful isolation (v. 5). The subject of YHWH’s lament is divine reluctance to destroy the city, described after the fact. Personified Jerusalem is abandoned, but as pathetic as her condition is, she has brought it upon herself in a now familiar complaint against her. She rejected him, so he destroyed her (v. 6). YHWH and female Jerusalem cannot yet be reconciled (see Jer 2:1–3:25). He alone puts effort into the relationship and is ‘weary of relenting’ (v. 6). Although the poem does not comfort Jerusalem, it invites pity for her (vv. 7–9). In a reversal of promises to Abraham and Sarah (v. 8), Jerusalem’s widows and childless mothers augur the death of the nation, for they have no offspring to create a future.

(15:10–21) Jeremiah’s Lament The juxtaposition of Jeremiah’s second confession with YHWH’s lament over Jerusalem creates subtle interactions between them. As YHWH doomed the mothers to childlessness (15:9), Jeremiah’s mother doomed him to a life of suffering by giving him birth (v. 10). Prophetic anguish (v. 18) replaces divine weariness (15:6). Jeremiah’s lament identifies him with grieving YHWH by defending Jeremiah’s prophecy as divinely imposed. But the confession also identifies Jeremiah with the people against God (Polk 1984; McConville 1993). Jeremiah’s confession is an act of protest in which he embodies the questions of the exiles even as he complains about his people (v. 15). He challenges divine governance of the universe and ultimately charges YHWH with the destruction of daughter Jerusalem (Diamond 1987: 78). He suffers unjustly, his wound is incurable, YHWH has abandoned him, and if he repents (šûb, v. 19), he will be delivered from ‘the hand of the wicked’ (v. 21).

vv. 10–14 are problematic on textual and formal grounds, and many earlier commentators excised verses (Diamond 1987; O’Connor 1988; Hubmann 1978: 245; Ittmann 1981: 44–9). These prose verses introduce the confession, however, by showing Jeremiah’s resistance to a prophetic vocation imposed on him from before birth (v. 10, see 1:5). They distinguish him from false prophets from whom he did not borrow, and in YHWH’s voice, they restate the certainty of exile (vv. 13–14).

This confession begins like the previous one (11:18). Jeremiah reminds YHWH of divine knowledge (yāda'itā) and appeals for justice against persecutors (v. 15). He fears divine tolerance will result in disaster for himself. He claims to be so identified with the divine words that he ate them, and they became his joy (v. 16). By choice, he faced extreme loneliness for the sake of his vocation (v. 17). Then, trapped and betrayed, he asks, 'Why is my pain unceasing?' He answers his own question with anguished accusation of YHWH who is 'a deceitful brook . . . waters that fail' (v. 18). Jeremiah himself experiences abandonment like daughter Zion (15:5) and blames YHWH because Jeremiah is innocent. YHWH responds (vv. 19–21) by inviting him to return (šūb, 3:12, 14; 4:2). If he is faithful to his prophetic mission, he will remain YHWH's spokesperson, and though enemies fight against him, YHWH will deliver him (vv. 20–1).

This many-levelled poem depicts Jeremiah as a person who suffers because of his undesired prophetic vocation. It shows him to be a true prophet of YHWH, rejected by his own people. His persecution and sense of divine abandonment, however, resemble the suffering of the exiles, and the invitation for him to repent repeats the book's frequent invitation and expression of repentance voiced by the implied audience. YHWH's promise to deliver Jeremiah from the 'ruthless' (v. 21), therefore, implies hope for the audience.

(16:1–21) Jeremiah's Celibacy Ch. 16 is divine speech related largely in prose by Jeremiah. It opens with an account of Jeremiah's celibacy and its interpretation (vv. 1–9). vv. 10–21 comprise four units that raise the question of theodicy (vv. 10–13), promise restoration (vv. 14–15), reiterate promises of exile (vv. 16–18), express communal repentance in poetry (vv. 19–20), and end with a divine threat (v. 21). The chapter gives the impression of a conversation among many voices debating the meaning of exile, all presented through divine speech.

vv. 1–9, Smith (1990: 36) believes the superscription in v. 1 introduces a new unit, but the verse's purpose is merely to underscore divine origins of Jeremiah's celibacy. YHWH's command that Jeremiah neither marry nor beget children (v. 2) embellishes Jeremiah's complaint of social isolation in 15:17. The prophet's celibacy is symbolic action akin to the burying of the loincloth (13:1–11). Jeremiah's spouseless, childless life announces Judah's fate and continues his characterization as a symbol of the people's plight. Life in the land is over; there is no future. In the picture that unfolds here, all remnants of communal and domestic life cease. vv. 3–4 describe the fate of children and parents who die of sword, famine, and disease, unlamented and unburied. The scene resembles the aftermath of battle with corpses littered everywhere. The world has become utterly silent. There will be no mourning rituals, no feasting. There will no sound of mirth or gladness, no voice of bride or bridegroom (vv. 5–9). Jeremiah's celibacy signifies the total obliteration of daily domestic life.

vv. 10–13 ask the questions that lie at the heart of the book and belong to the experience of exile: why has God done this to us? What is our sin? In Deuteronomistically phrased prose, the answer is clear and familiar. They and their ancestors betrayed YHWH by following other gods and breaking tôrâ. This is why they are hurled out. vv. 14–15 interrupt threats of exile to announce hope to the implied audience. Their residence in the land of the north will not be permanent for the God of the exodus will return them to their land in the unspecified future. By retrieving the Exodus tradition, the text imaginatively links the audience's captivity to bondage in Egypt. God will again bring them to their land. vv. 16–18 return to the theme of exile and stress its inescapability. YHWH will send fisherfolk and hunters to drag off idolaters who have polluted the land and filled YHWH's inheritance (nahālā) with abominations.

In vv. 19–20, a first-person liturgical voice breaks into divine speech to address YHWH in loyalty and confidence (v. 19c). 'Our ancestors have inherited (nāḥ) nothing but lies' (v. 19). Again the liturgical voice brings the implied audience into the text and provides them with a model of repentance. They proclaim the gathering of all nations around YHWH and the futility of idols (v. 20). YHWH's response in v. 21 ignores the people's praise and repentance to interpret suffering as pedagogy that will at last succeed despite the people's recalcitrance. The entire chapter defends YHWH from charges of injustice.

(17:1–27) True Worship Many voices combine in this chapter. YHWH speaks in prose accusation (vv. 1–4) and wisdom sayings (vv. 5–11). The people speak in liturgical praise (vv. 12–13), Jeremiah speaks in his third confession (vv. 14–18), and then speaks on behalf of YHWH in a prose sermon on proper sabbath decorum (vv. 19–27). Most commentators view the chapter as a miscellaneous collection (Diamond 1987: 165), but recent scholarship has begun to locate unifying features. Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard (1991) find a chiasmic structure in vv. 1–13, and Polk (1984: 143–50) identifies links between vv. 1–13 and 14–18. Viewed synchronically, ch. 17 contains a collection of prose and poetic voices that attack false worship (vv. 1–4), exemplify proper worship (vv. 12–13, 14–18), and display attitudes of the heart (lēb, vv. 1, 5, 9) that underlie worship (vv. 5–11).

The text of vv. 1–4 is corrupt (Holladay 1986: 484) and its genre uncertain (prose, NRSV; poetry, NEB), but the general import of the verses is clear. Israel's sin has been written (k-t-b, see v. 13) with unusually hard and precise instruments and engraved ineradicably on heart and altar (v. 1). The horns of the altar, symbols of cultic protection (Carroll 1989: 349), here signify sins of idolatrous worship (v. 2). The people have provoked YHWH's fierce anger, so they will lose their heritage (nahālā) and go into exile (vv. 3–4).

vv. 5–8 contain a poem of two stanzas with strong resemblances to Ps 1, a wisdom psalm (Holladay 1962), recast in Deuteronomistic terms of covenant blessing and curse (Polk 1984: 145) and put in YHWH's mouth. In an unusual arrangement, curse precedes blessing (cf. Ps 1). Those who are cursed trust what is human and turn from YHWH. Although the poem does not mention idols explicitly, the attitude of the cursed heart (lēb) is idolatrous (v. 5). People with such a heart will die from lack of life-giving water. By contrast, those who trust in YHWH will flourish like a tree planted by water (vv. 7–8). vv. 9–11, YHWH adds comments in proverbial wisdom style on the mysterious and devious nature of the human heart. YHWH, Just Judge, tests and searches the heart and dispenses justice. The language of v. 10 plays upon and reinterprets Jeremiah's first confession (12:1–4) where he protests divine injustice and asks YHWH to test his heart (lēb) and establish his innocence (12:3). YHWH meets Jeremiah's demand (v. 10) by announcing a reversal of fortunes for the unjust (v. 11, cf. v. 3).

vv. 12–13, the divine promise brings forth praise from the congregation (Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard 1991: 230). Text and translation are difficult (O'Connor 1988; Diamond 1987), but the communal liturgical voice, in form and language similar to other communal liturgies in the book, gives expression to the implied exilic audience. The praise casts them as the blessed who trust in YHWH (vv. 7–8), their miqweh, meaning both 'hope' (see 14:8, 22) and 'pool' (Holladay 1986: 502). Their praise (v. 13) links them with the tree planted by the water (vv. 7–8) and with the ones who seek the fountain of living water (v. 13). They curse those, once among them, who have forsaken the fountain of living water (see 2:13). Those enemies will be recorded (written: k-t-b) in the underworld (v. 13; see 17:1). The cursed ones may suggest internal enemies or perhaps the previous generation whose infidelity led to exile.

vv. 14–18, Jeremiah's confession; next in the sequence of speakers, Jeremiah is at once distinct from, and identified with, the suffering audience. His tone changes from his earlier one where he challenged YHWH's fidelity and was urged to 'turn' (15:10–21). Instead of continuing the challenge here, Jeremiah begs for healing and salvation (v. 14). Like the people in vv. 12–13, he trusts YHWH and exemplifies true worship: 'you are my praise' (v. 14). Like the people, he is wounded and in need of healing, and like them, he has enemies (v. 15) upon whom he wishes vengeance (v. 18). But the prophet's chief complaint also separates him from the people and identifies him with YHWH. He has been a faithful prophet whose enemies doubt his word (v. 15). He pleads for the persecution of his persecutors. Jeremiah is a model worshipper and innocent sufferer who seeks refuge and justice from YHWH (vv. 17–18). Within the book's pre-exilic narrative movement towards the fall of the nation, his request for vengeance will result in the destruction of his people. For the implied audience already in exile, however, the confession invites wholehearted repentance as exemplified by Jeremiah's prayerful attitude.

vv. 19–27, the sabbath sermon: Jeremiah delivers this prose sermon as divine speech that appears to undermine earlier parts of the book (4:4; 7:1–8:3). Proper sabbath behaviour, rather than attitudes of heart, itself becomes a sign of obedience to YHWH. YHWH demands negatively that the people refrain from carrying a burden or working on the sabbath, and positively that they sanctify the sabbath (vv. 21–2, 24, 27). Failure to keep sabbath law will cause Jerusalem's destruction (v. 27), whereas keeping it will bring Davidic rule and the reunification of Israel as a worshipping community in Jerusalem (vv. 25–6).

In contrast to the temple sermon (Jer 7), this passage specifies proper cultic behaviour, but like the temple sermon and other prose passages (11:1–14; 13:1–14; 16:1–13; 18:1–12; 19:1–15), the central requirement is to 'listen' (17:23, 24, 27; Brueggemann 1988: 160). The sabbath sermon interprets Jerusalem's fall as a failure to obey, evidenced by breaking the sabbath. But the sermon is more concerned about the future than about the past. Restoration of monarchy and city hinges on obedience to sabbath tôrâ (O'Connor 1988: 141–3). Many see the passage as a post-exilic addition (Carroll 1986) because sabbath-keeping marked post-exilic life, but it may also have characterized life in exile (von Rad 1965: 79–84). The king's triumphant entrance through the city gates and the unification of Israel in common worship were surely an exilic hope.

(18:1–20:18) Captivity These chapters are more closely woven than previous units in chs. 11–20 (O'Connor 1988; Diamond 1987; Smith 1990: 56–60; Carroll 1986: 371) and form the climax of the first half of the book (Jer 1–25). Symbolic events and their sermonic interpretations (18:1–12; 19:1–15; 20:1–6), a divine lament (18:13b–17), laments of Jeremiah (18:18–23; 20:7–13), and a curse of his birth (20:14–18) create a symbolic narrative with multiple meanings. Jeremiah visits the potter whose work serves as a simile for divine power and occasions the final invitation to repent before the catastrophe. The people adamantly refuse to repent (18:12). God laments in horror and dismay (18:13–27); Jeremiah begs for fulfilment of the word (18:19–23) and breaks the potter's jug to signify the nation's imminent destruction (19:1–14). Babylon appears by name for the first time as the mythic foe from the north, concretized as a real historical invader. Just as Babylon is about to capture Jerusalem, Jeremiah is imprisoned in the temple and released. He utters his final confession in vindication (20:7–13) and then curses his birth (Jer 20:14–18). The covenant curse (11:1–13) has befallen the nation.

These chapters interpret the nation's fall as divine justice, a deserved punishment after relentless efforts by YHWH and Jeremiah to evoke repentance. Within the horizon of the implied exilic audience, however, the course of events offers a glint of hope. YHWH is not implacable. If they repent, divine building and planting are possible for their God is God of all nations (18:8–9). Jeremiah's own beating and imprisonment does not end in death but in release and in the proclamation of praise for YHWH who 'delivered the life of the needy from the hands of evildoers' (Jer 20:13).

(18:1–12) The Potter's Hand YHWH commands Jeremiah to go to the potter's house where the potter, not Jeremiah, performs a symbolic action (vv. 1–4) that Jeremiah interprets in his sermon (vv. 5–11). The event itself is rife with metaphorical connotations that vividly portray divine power. YHWH's hand and the potter's hand have symmetrical capabilities. Both can destroy their own creations at will (vv. 4, 6b). As the potter can crush the pot, so YHWH can destroy a nation or kingdom (v. 7). But YHWH's threat of destruction is conditional; repentance and obedience will induce YHWH to build and plant instead of destroying (vv. 9–11). The sermon concludes with YHWH's direct appeal to the nation: 'Turn now... from your evil way' (v. 11). But the people reply, 'It is no use!' (v. 12). Narratively, their emphatic refusal sets in motion further symbolic events.

(18:13–17) Divine Lament YHWH's lamentation is not grief-stricken but angry and appalled. Who can imagine behaviour like that of virgin Israel? (v. 13). YHWH's people, who are portrayed like the wife in 2:1–3:25, have forgotten him and gone after false gods (v. 15). As a result of their behaviour the land will become a horrifying example to others; they will go into exile. YHWH will turn from them and be beyond imprecation, beyond sympathy, beyond helping. For the exilic audience, this poem may convey their experience of God's absence, but it does not accuse God of abuse. It implies, instead, that God acted justly in scattering them before the enemy.

(18:18–23) Jeremiah's fourth confession corresponds to the spirit of YHWH's lament in the preceding poem. Like YHWH, Jeremiah has given up on the people after trying to avert divine wrath from them (v. 20b). Like YHWH, Jeremiah has been rejected by the people (vv. 20, 22, 23). And like YHWH, Jeremiah now wants war and its appalling consequences to come upon his enemies (vv. 21–2). He begs YHWH not to forgive, not to blot out their sin: 'deal with them while you are angry' (v. 23). Jeremiah's fourth lament, therefore, moves the larger narrative thread of the book forwards. In the scene at the potter's house, the people decisively refuse the final invitation to listen (18:12). Then both YHWH and Jeremiah utter laments that propel the narrative towards invasion by the still unnamed but no longer mythical enemy. They are of one mind; YHWH must act now.

At the same time, Jeremiah's confession marks him again as the innocent sufferer, one trapped by enemies who dug a pit to ensnare him (vv. 20, 22, 23). They entrap him because of his fidelity to the prophetic mission that he long resisted. He is a true prophet who does not send himself or speak for himself. If the implied audience is exilic, however, more is suggested in this portrayal. Jeremiah is the model of the faithful sufferer who, like his people, is entrapped by plots to destroy his life and who turns to YHWH for justice against enemies.

(19:1–15) The Broken Jug The story about the smashing of the potter's jug combines prose sermon and symbolic event to drive the book inexorably towards Jerusalem's destruction (v. 15). The chapter responds to Jeremiah's request for vengeance (18:18–23) and completes the punishment threatened in 18:13–17 and throughout the book thus far. Rather than narrate the actual invasion of the city (21:1–10; 39:1–10; 52:1–27), the text portrays it symbolically. YHWH commands Jeremiah to break the jug in front of the power structure of elders and priests (vv. 1–2; Brueggemann 1988: 167) to constitute the event as a legal act. YHWH then orders the invasion to be enacted symbolically. The jug's destruction signifies and embodies the smashing of the nation (v. 10; Carroll 1986: 386–7; O'Connor 1988: 144). The community's offences are cultic (see 13:1–11 and 7:1–8:3). Leaders and people alike have forsaken YHWH, profaned 'this place' and gone after the baals. They have killed the innocent and sacrificed children (vv. 4–5). Invasion by those 'who seek their life' (vv. 7, 9), therefore, will yield equally hideous results. Corpses will remain unburied; the city will be a horror (cf. 18:16); its people will become cannibals (vv. 7–9). A familiar accusation of the prose material concludes the chapter; the people refused to hear YHWH's word (v. 15). The end has come.

(20:1–18) Imprisonment In vv. 1–6 the chief priest Pashur beats Jeremiah and imprisons him in the stocks at the temple gate. Pashur's release of Jeremiah the next morning serves as the occasion for Jeremiah's brief prose sermon (vv. 4–6), his final confession (vv. 7–13), and his curse of the day of his birth (vv. 14–18).

vv. 1–6, the brief story of Jeremiah's incarceration is of decisive importance for narrative developments in the book. The chief officer of YHWH's house repudiates YHWH's message (v. 1) and abuses YHWH's messenger (v. 2; O'Connor 1988: 145); thus Pashur signifies the nation's total rejection of the divine word, and with great irony, he shows his disdain within the temple itself. As a consequence, he and all his allies will fall by the sword, go into captivity in Babylon, and lose their wealth (vv. 4–6). It is remarkable that the text names Babylon only now: in chs. 2–10, the threat came from the mythic 'enemy from the north', advancing for cosmic battle. In chs. 11–19, the enemy was less mythic, described by metonymy as sword, famine, pestilence, and captivity, but without historical specificity. In vv. 4–6 Babylon is mentioned four times. Historical identification has replaced mythic and poetic allusions.

Whereas Pashur represents both the people in their rejection of the prophet and the religious leaders who have led the people astray by prophesying falsely (v. 6), Jeremiah also represents more than the rejected prophet. Except for Jeremiah's confessions (11:18–12:6; 15:10–21; 17:14–18; 18:18–23; 20:7–13) and the call narrative (1:3–19), this is the first passage that portrays Jeremiah as a suffering prophet. Here his fate parallels that of his people; he is beaten and taken captive just as they will be, and he is released as they ultimately will be. Jeremiah's suffering and release portends their own. His captivity symbolizes their captivity and offers a glimpse of survival (McConville 1993; Polk 1984).

vv. 7–18, unlike Jeremiah's previous confessions, the final one is unaccompanied by divine speech. In ch. 20, YHWH does not speak because he has spoken insistently throughout the first twenty chapters either directly or through the prophet (but see von Rad 1984). In the symbolic accomplishment of the prophetic word, YHWH withdraws from the scene.

The literary limits of Jeremiah's confession are much disputed. Many interpreters include vv. 14–18 in the confession as a second complaint (von Rad 1936). Formally, however, they curse the prophet's birth and create an inclusio with the covenant curse (11:1–17; O'Connor 1988; Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard 1991). Without vv. 14–18, Jeremiah's confession contains all the elements of a conventional lament: complaint (vv. 7–10), statement of assurance (v. 11), petition (v. 12), and praise (v. 13; O'Connor 1988; Baumgartner 1987: 19–38).

Jeremiah accuses YHWH of enticing and overpowering, of seducing and raping him (v. 7; Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard 1991; O'Connor 1988; Diamond 1987). He complains again of rejection and mockery (vv. 7b–8). In anguish, he decides to stop speaking, but he cannot withhold the fire in his bones (v. 9). He quotes his enemies who call him the same name he gave Pashur, māgôr missābîb, 'terror all around' (20:3). His enemies use the same verbs against him that he used to accuse God of trickery; they want to 'entice' him and to 'prevail' over him (v. 11). But then Jeremiah remembers that YHWH is with him, a 'dread warrior'. His enemies will not 'prevail' (v. 11; cf. 15:20). His petition for vengeance appeals to God who tests and sees (v. 12, cf. 12:4). The confession closes with a statement of praise in which Jeremiah confidently announces that God has 'delivered the life of the needy from the hands of evildoers' (v. 13). In the narrative context of chs. 11–20, Jeremiah's trust rests in the confidence that the divine word, 'Violence and destruction!' (v. 8) is about to be realized. The prophetic mission is accomplished, and Jeremiah is vindicated as a true prophet.

From the perspective of the implied audience, however, Jeremiah's praise and confidence exemplify proper attitudes for captives. Just as some among the exiles begin to understand themselves as relatively innocent sufferers at the hand of Babylonian captors (Isa 40:1–2), so Jeremiah claims innocence and begs to be vindicated in face of enemies. His concluding praise voices not only confidence about his own fate but ultimately represents the trust to be evoked from the implied exilic audience who are the 'needy', seeking deliverance from the hands of evildoers.

Jeremiah's praise evaporates into a curse upon the day of his birth (vv. 14–18). This poem has long been recognized as similar to Job's curse (Job 3). Both biblical figures would prefer death in the womb to the toil, shame, and sorrow life brings them (v. 18). Jeremiah's curse makes sense in the pre-exilic temporal setting of the book's narrative thread where he faces the devastating consequences of his prophetic vindication. His nation, people, land, and way of life are destroyed. Had he never been born, he could not have delivered such a message. Because his prophetic vocation preceded his birth (1:5), it would have been better if his mother had aborted him, or if he had been stillborn (v. 17). In a kind of reverse symbolic action, he imagines a cancellation of his ministry. He wishes to unmake his life so that he would not have to deliver such a message and see it fulfilled. He wants the deliverer of the news of his birth to be like 'the cities the Lord overthrew without pity' (v. 16), a category that must include Jerusalem, symbolically destroyed already. The prophet's curse of his birth expresses horror and despair at the consequences of his message. Its closing questions extend beyond the prophet's own life to embrace the sorrow of the nation (v. 18).

Aftermath (chs. 21–5)

These loosely connected chapters assume that the nation has already fallen, although to this point it has been presented only in symbolic terms. Even when the invasion is finally reported (21:1–10), the focus is upon the choice facing survivors in the siege's aftermath. Prose narratives give them advice (21:1–10; 24:1–10). Poems explain how the invasion occurred by blaming the royal establishment of kings and prophets (21:11–23:40). Prose materials point beyond exile to a future of national survival (25:1–14) and ultimately of international justice (25:15–38).

The character of the literature changes markedly in 21:1 from that of the preceding chapters. Explicit conversation and debate by poetic and prose speakers is overtaken by a narrator's controlling voice that more obviously frames and orchestrates the speakers. And for the first time, the narrative is historically referential, although the material is no less interpretative than earlier symbolic and metaphoric passages. 21:1–10 dates to the reign of King Zedekiah during the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, the first such dating since 1:1–3 and 3:6. (See Holladay 1986: 571 on the Babylonian ruler's name and Seitz 1989b: 214 on Zedekiah's importance.) The book has moved from announcements of the cosmic battle with the mythic foe from the north, through symbolic enactments of the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem, to depictions of the historical siege and burning of the city (21:1–10). The point of 21:1–10 is not historical narration, however, but theological, political persuasion. (See Rudolph 1947 and Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard, 1991: 284–5 for different views of the contrast between chs. 20 and 21.)

(21:1–10) Life King Zedekiah sends two named messengers to ask Jeremiah to 'enquire of the Lord' in the hope that Nebuchadnezzar might be turned away from Jerusalem (vv. 1–2), as were the Assyrians during Hezekiah's time (Isa 36–7). (On the literary relationship of ch. 21 with chs. 24 and 37, see Pohlmann 1978: 44 and Seitz 1989b: 253.) Jeremiah returns a terrifying message. Instead of sending the Babylonians away, YHWH will bring them into the city, thwart Judah's defence, and fight against Judah. YHWH is indeed the dread warrior of Jeremiah's prayer (20:11). YHWH heads the attack (vv. 5–6, 10), and Nebuchadnezzar will kill survivors without pity (v. 7). In the face of this interpretation of events, the people have to choose, in Deuteronomistic terms (Deut 30:11–20), between life and death (v. 8). To survive, their only choice is surrender to Babylon.

Political and theological perspectives of the narrator are absolutely clear. Only one path will lead to life: surrender and co-operation with the invaders. This alone will enable the community to gain their lives as the 'prize of war' (v. 9). Any other political or military course will bring death, 'For I have set my face against this city', says YHWH (v. 10). While appearing to report history, the narrator seeks to persuade the audience that survival hinges upon right relationship with Babylonian invaders. Not to side with them is to choose death. There can be no confusion about loyalties because Babylon is acting as YHWH's agent. This means that those who escape to Egypt or remain in the land have chosen death. The truly faithful among surviving groups are the Babylonian exiles alone. More hidden in the text is its implicit criticism of Zedekiah whose question reveals his complacency regarding divine protection (v. 2). Zedekiah is only the first of the royal establishment to come under attack in these chapters.

(21:11–23:40) Collapse of Royal Elites Attention to the monarchy in chs. 1–20 is sparse and general (1:1–3; 3:6; 3:15; 4:9; 8:1; 13:18–19; 15:4; 17:19–25). This section, by contrast, gives sustained attention to the royal institution and interprets the national tragedy as the consequence of corrupt and unjust leadership by kings (21:11–22:30), as well as by prophets and priests (23:9–40; Carroll 1986: 404). Although the monarchy will be restored after exile by divine action (23:1–8), no such restoration is promised for priests and prophets.

Some of the poems in the section 21:11–23:8 appear to be associated with royalty by prose introductions and juxtaposition with material critical of the monarchy rather than by addressing kingship directly (21:12b–14; 22:6b–7; 22:10). 22:20–3 mentions kingship only briefly in an address to female Israel. The poems and prose pieces are short and concern the last kings of Judah. Together they charge the nation's collapse to the complete failure of the monarchy and describe its imminent demise. Only later will it be reconstituted by divine action in a new form (23:1–8; McConville 1993: 54–8).

(21:11–14) Do Justice A prose introduction addresses the entire house of David (vv. 11–12a). The poem itself turns the oblique attack on monarchy (vv. 1–10) into a devouring fire (vv. 12c, 14). YHWH is the speaker who describes the monarchy's primary responsibility and attacks it for complacency

(21:12–13). What the king should do is expressed in positive and negative terms, ‘execute justice’ and prevent oppression (v. 12). If kings fail in this duty, the fire of divine wrath will devour all around it (v. 14). YHWH is the angry critic whose address to the whole house of David (v. 12) implies that the entire dynasty of kings caused the national wreckage.

(22:1–6) is a prose elaboration of monarchical duties in which YHWH continues to speak. Addressees expand from the ‘house of David’ to include an unnamed present king, servants, and people (vv. 1–2). v. 3 adds to kingly responsibilities, prohibitions against oppression of the alien, widow, or orphan and against shedding innocent blood. The principal duty of the king that summarizes all others and joins this text with prose throughout the book is the king’s responsibility to ‘listen’ (vv. 4–5). The future of the monarchy depends upon obedience to the word, an appeal that has double meaning for the implied audience. Because the kings failed to listen, the kingdom was lost, but if kings, servants, and people listen, then kings will again sit on the throne (v. 4). The future depends upon the repentance of all.

(22:6–12) contains a loose collection of pieces associated with monarchy by prose directions to readers (vv. 6, 11). Like the rich forests of Gilead and Lebanon (Holladay 1986: 584), the kingship is about to be cut down. Prose verses (8–9) shift attention from monarchy to the destroyed city in an imagined conversation that blames the destruction on idolatry and abandonment of the covenant, presumably by the monarchy. vv. 10–11 combine poetry and prose to comment on the double tragedies of King Josiah and his son, Jehoahaz, also known as Shallum (Honeyman 1948). Beloved King Josiah died in battle (2 Kings 23:28–30), but more lamentable is the fate of his son, exiled forever from the land.

(22:13–19) contrasts actions of an unidentified bad king (vv. 13–14, 17) with that of a good king (vv. 15–16) who is the first king’s father. v. 18 identifies them as Josiah and his son Jehoikim. Jehoikim builds his house, that is, both his monarchy and his palace, without righteousness and justice, using the forced labour of his people. YHWH uses rhetorical questions to ask Jehoikim about the essence of monarchy: true kingship is not manifested in the display of wealth but in the doing of justice and righteousness as did Josiah (v. 15). This is what it means to ‘know God’ (v. 16; Brueggemann 1988: 193), precisely what is absent in Jehoikim’s rule (20:13, 17; cf. 21:12; 22:3; 2 Kings 23:31–24:6). Thus Jehoikim will not be mourned but buried like a beast (22:18–19; Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard 1991: 307–13 discuss literary features of this passage).

(22:20–3) addresses a female but her identity is uncertain. Carroll (1986: 434–5) believes this poem to be an oracle originally addressed to Lebanon, but some of the language echoes poems against the bride of 2:1–3:25, who has been unfaithful from her youth, though here her specific crime is ‘not listening’ (v. 21; Brueggemann 1988: 195; Carroll 1986: 436). Her trysts are over because her lovers are crushed, but why she lives in Lebanon is unclear (v. 23). v. 22 links the poem to the material on kings for her shepherds will be shepherded by the wind, referring either to Israel’s captivity or to punishment of the wife’s lovers-turned-enemies. (In the ancient Near East, shepherd imagery referred to leaders, particularly kings, whose task was to protect and guide their people as a shepherd cares for the flocks.)

(22:24–30) combines prose and poetry to portray YHWH’s attack on Coniah, also called Jehoiachin, and to announce the monarchy’s end. Even if he were a precious signet ring on YHWH’s hand, ‘I would tear you off, and hurl you away’, says YHWH (vv. 24–6). And in a sadder poetic voice, YHWH asks if the king is a despised and broken pot to be thrown away. Both Jehoiachin and his offspring will be hurled into a foreign land. A lamenting voice invites the personified land to witness the monarchy’s end (v. 29), for the house of David is finished (v. 30).

Chs. 21–2 announce and explain the end of the monarchy and provide a theo-political explanation for the fall of the nation. The kings failed to listen, oppressed the weak and vulnerable, and sought counsel from lying prophets. In the exilic search for causes and explanations of the national tragedy, the greed, injustice, and infidelity of the monarchy loom large. Because of kingly misdeeds, the Davidic dynasty is finished and with it the nation.

(23:1–8) But in the pattern of composition typical of the book of Jeremiah, here it contradicts the former picture of destruction, death, and definitive end, doing so without preparation or explanation. YHWH simply announces the future reconstitution of the dead monarchy. Both past and future continue to impinge on the exilic present. To the implied audience, divine promises of restoration and new shepherds may not have appeared to contradict Jeremiah’s prophecies of doom, for the latter had already been fulfilled. Jehoiachin was being held captive (Jer 52:31–4); other kings had died ignominious deaths; people were in exile. Temporally the audience was situated after the nation’s destruction and the seeming end of monarchy. The monarchy had failed them, and its re-establishment as an institution of wisdom and justice (v. 5) could occur only by divine intervention. In vv. 1–4, YHWH chastises the shepherds who have scattered the sheep and promises to raise up new shepherds for the remnant (v. 4) and a ‘righteous Branch’, who will embody the royal ideal (vv. 5–6). In that future day, all the dispersed community will return to their own land (vv. 7–8).

(23:9–40) Prophets This set of prose and poetic pieces attacks claimants to prophetic office who presume to have a divine word but, in the estimate of these poems, speak lies. (On false prophets, see Overholt 1970; Meyer 1977; and Osswald 1962.) That the book contains so much material about competing prophetic visions suggests great conflict in the rhetorical battle to envision the future. This chapter sets Jeremiah apart from false prophets. It belittles and demeans them in order to dismiss their interpretation of the national crisis in favour of Jeremiah’s (Carroll 1981: 196). Prophets and priests are as culpable as the kings in leading the people astray and bringing the community to its tragic demise. There is no promise of a renewed prophecy in the future because that role is already played by the Jeremiah tradition. Jeremiah’s word, the vision he creates with his prophecy alone, has power to create a new future.

(23:9–15) uses shocking and potent rhetoric to discredit priest and prophet in two poetic panels of accusation and punishment (vv. 9–12 and 13–15). In a dramatic lament Jeremiah describes his emotional state and claims the true prophetic message for himself. His heart is ‘crushed’ because of YHWH’s ‘dread’ words (v. 9, NEB). On account of unidentified adulterers, the land mourns and dries up. v. 11 announces the surprising source of evil. Priest and prophet are ungodly, so disaster will come upon them (v. 12). Equally harsh language appears in the second panel (vv. 13–15) where a first-person voice describes the ‘disgusting’ sight of prophets prophesying by Baal, but the prophets of Jerusalem are even more shocking. They are adulterers, liars, conspirators in evil, as bad as the legendary Sodom and Gomorrah (vv. 13–15). They will be poisoned for they have spread ‘ungodliness’ throughout the land.

(23:16–22) Prose verses (16–17) urge the audience to reject the prophets. They are bad leaders who delude the people and confect their own messages of pseudo-peace and complacency. The two-stanza poem that follows reveals the depth of their deceit. In vv. 18–20 Jeremiah appears to be the speaker who asks the central question that distinguishes prophets from one another: ‘Who has stood in the council of the LORD so as to see and to hear his word?’ Only such a one can proclaim the divine word, but YHWH’s wrath goes forth, presumably upon the false prophets (vv. 19–20). In the second stanza YHWH speaks to deny the prophets’ claims. If they had stood in the divine council, they would have proclaimed a truthful message (vv. 21–2). The ‘council of the LORD’ refers to a heavenly gathering of beings who surround YHWH. Prophets claim to have access to this divine council (1 Kings 22:19–23; Jer 23:18–22; Dan 7:9–14, 23–7).

(23:23–40) YHWH continues to deny claims of false prophets in a prose diatribe against them. Their dreams and their words are not divinely given but self-invented. YHWH is against them (vv. 23–31). These false prophets are no different from those of the pre-exilic period who prophesied by Baal, leading the people astray. vv. 33–40 continue the critique of false prophets with a play on words. A prophetic term for oracle, maṣṣāʾ, also means ‘burden’ (McKane 1980: 597–603). When they ask, ‘What is the burden of the LORD?’, meaning the prophetic message, Jeremiah is to reply, ‘You are the burden’, meaning that they impede the divine word (v. 33).

In this section, accusation undermines professional competitors who battle for the hearts of the people. Should any in the audience doubt the veracity and divine origin of Jeremiah’s message, this collection makes the case that Jeremiah alone can be trusted. It interprets the nation’s fall as caused by duplicity of priests and prophets who have lied to the people. But also at stake is the fidelity of the present generation. By implication, they must avoid listening to false prophets and, instead, follow the voice, visions, and dreams of Jeremiah, the one true prophet. Their survival hinges upon listening to his message alone.

(24:1–10) Figs Jeremiah appears as first-person narrator in this prose chapter, dated to the first deportation of exiles in 597 BCE. Jerusalem has been invaded, Jehoiachin is in captivity (v. 1), and Zedekiah rules in the not yet destroyed Judah (v. 8). Although the chapter is set ten years earlier than 21:1–10, it continues directions for survival begun there: co-operate with the invaders (Pohlmann 1978: 44). Jeremiah’s vision of two baskets of figs resembles his vision in 1:11–13. In both narratives, Jeremiah relates a vision that YHWH interprets to give both accounts the double authority of deity and prophet. The figs symbolize two groups of survivors. Those in captivity in Babylon are very good and those remaining in the land or who have escaped to Egypt are rotten. To the former is promised a future in language adopted from the call narrative (1:10). The exiles will be planted and built. They will receive a new heart, know YHWH, and return (šûb, vv. 6–7). This chapter honours the exilic community as the elect, the special, the carriers of true Yahwism. It is they who are obedient, repentant, and possess a future. Nicholson (1970: 81) notes the absence of conditional terms in the promise. Divine preference for the exiles is absolute. The vision of the fig baskets marks a major shift in the message thus far. This vision no longer warns the people to repent in order to avoid calamity, but instead addresses a community that has experienced and survived the tragedy, and in those circumstances offers them hope.

The chapter divides the survivors into two groups, exalting one and belittling the other. The bad figs who remain in the land or go to Egypt will be utterly destroyed (vv. 8–10). The effect of this vision is to delegitimize the rule of Zedekiah and those who remained in the land (Brueggemann 1988: 211). Carroll (1986: 487) places the chapter’s contest for supremacy among survivors in post-exilic times, but the chapter may be an attempt to bolster the confidence and responsibility of despondent exiles by identifying them as the chosen. Since the text describes restoration in vague theological and relational terms, omitting political or institutional arrangements, it appears to be urging an exilic audience towards an open future, albeit at the cost of their compatriots elsewhere.

(25:1–38) Babylon’s Fall Ch. 25 is an important but problematic chapter. It is here that divergences between the MT and LXX versions of the book are most marked, with LXX inserting the Oracles Against the Nations at v. 13 and omitting many of the references to Babylon found in the MT, to yield a shorter chapter (Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard 1991: 363). Fischer (1991), Holladay (1986: 665), and McKane (1986: 618–23) have thorough discussions of differences between the versions. Many commentators recognize links between this chapter and ch. 1 and understand ch. 25 to close off the first major division of the book. Kessler (1997) calls it a ‘hinge’ chapter that reaches backwards and forwards across the book. Here, for instance, Jeremiah acts at last as ‘prophet to the nations’, a task assigned him in the call narrative (1:5, 10) and completed in the Oracles Against the Nations (chs. 46–51). In its present shape ch. 25 announces punishment against Judah’s invaders (vv. 1–14), enacts the promise symbolically (vv. 25–9), and concludes the book with a poem on the devouring anger of the lion-like God (vv. 30–8).

(25:1–14) A Global View A third-person narrator dates the chapter to the fourth year of Jehoiakim and the first year of Nebuchadnezzar. The year is 605 when Babylon gained hegemony in the ancient Near East. The date’s significance in this passage is to show that Jeremiah prophesied the fall of Judah to Babylon well in advance of events and that his prophecy of the exile’s end is equally reliable. In v. 3 Jeremiah takes over as narrator, declaring in Deuteronomistic terms (Carroll 1986: 491) how persistently he has preached throughout his entire career from the thirteenth year of Josiah (v. 3, cf. 1:2) to the year 605. For twenty-three years Jeremiah continued the work of prophets before him (v. 4), calling Judah to repent of its idolatry. But they did not listen, provoking YHWH's anger (vv. 1–7). Many interpreters correctly understand these verses as a summary of Jeremiah's preaching in chs. 1–25 (Craigie, Kelley, and Drinkard 1991: 363), but they also serve other theological and literary purposes. They interpret the nation's fall as a refusal of Judah to listen to YHWH's prophets, and they introduce the broader global and temporal framework in which this chapter views the catastrophe.

In vv. 8–14 YHWH replaces Jeremiah as speaker to provide greater authority for the prophecy that follows. Expanding motifs from earlier passages, the divine voice spells out consequences of not listening (vv. 8–11). YHWH will again send the tribes of the north, but for the first time they are explicitly identified with Babylon (v. 9). As YHWH's agent of destruction, Nebuchadnezzar acquires the shocking sobriquet, 'my servant' (v. 9; 29:10; Thompson 1980: 512). Newly emphasized in this divine speech is that the invasion to come will not only be against 'this land' but against 'all these nations around' (v. 9). Remarkably, Judah's fate is not singular. Babylon will destroy domestic life, indeed, all life on an international scale (vv. 9–10). Nor will Judah serve Babylon alone, for all these nations will serve Babylon for seventy years, a symbolic number for 'many years' (v. 11; Thompson 1980: 515). The temporal frame extends even further into the future than previously. After seventy years, YHWH will also punish Babylon. The invader will be invaded and be repaid according to its deeds (v. 14). All the words 'written in this book' will be brought against them (v. 13).

Rhetorically, this passage gives hope to the exiles. It closes the first 'book' upon a promise—vague, indefinite, but certain—that the exilic community has a future. The three voices in this narrative—unknown narrator, Jeremiah, and YHWH—do not debate. Each builds upon the previous speaker with increasing authority, for it is, perhaps, the words of hope that most need bolstering for the exiles. The text does not call for political action or rebellion; it encourages endurance (Kessler 1997) until YHWH brings about a reversal of fortunes (v. 14). Why Babylon will meet the same fate it metes out is not explained; YHWH simply asserts it. A transformed, barely imaginable future will come to pass.

(25:15–29) The Cup of Wrath If readers should doubt the promises of 25:8–14, the following prose narrative enacts them symbolically, thereby setting the divine purpose in motion. Jeremiah is again cast as narrator who reports YHWH's command for him to act as wine steward. Instead of presiding over a joyous feast, Jeremiah delivers the cup of wrath to all nations beginning with Judah and Jerusalem (v. 18). They are the first to drink from the 'fiery wine' (NEB) of YHWH's anger; indeed, they have already drunk from it (13:12–14). Following Judah comes the list of Judah's enemies beginning with Egypt (v. 19) and concluding with Sheshach, a term for Babylon (v. 26; Holladay 1986: 675). All will drink of YHWH's wrath, and should they refuse, Jeremiah must insist (vv. 28–9). Reversal of fortunes, therefore, has already occurred in the symbolic sphere. All that remains is for events to unfold.

(25:30–8) Against the Nations Poetry replaces prose in an oracle against all the nations (v. 30). (See Carroll 1986: 497–508 for a thorough discussion of Oracles Against Nations.) Jeremiah continues as speaker of poems that focus on divine anger and judgement against unnamed nations. The metaphor of YHWH as roaring lion out to devour all the earth's inhabitants frames the poem (vv. 31, 38). No particular crimes are attributed to the nations who are merely 'guilty', or 'wicked' (v. 31 NEB). The poem attends, instead, to the certainty of their punishment. A prose comment uses language previously used for Judah to describe devastation of the entire earth (v. 33). vv. 34–8 then narrow the attack to the 'shepherds', the kings who are responsible for provoking divine anger (25:35–7). YHWH, the attacking lion, has already left his 'covert' to begin the attack.

Chs. 1–25 use mythic, metaphorical description to magnify the threat to Judah as superhuman and inexorable. They charge the people with heinous crimes and obscene infidelities. They portray Jeremiah as isolated and absolutely alone. All these facets of the text bolster its theodicy. The people were warned with dramatic visions of their foe, by constant reminders of their sins, but they rejected the prophet and his words. In effect, they forced YHWH to punish them. The complex collections of materials in chs. 1–25, therefore, attempt to explain why the tragedy happened. The second half of the book (chs. 26–52) focuses on how to survive the tragedy.

Introduction to Book Two (chs. 26–52)

Kessler (1968) views this second section of the book as a history of Israel's rejection of the prophetic message. Pohlmann (1978) finds evidence of conflict between hope and judgement upon those who went to Egypt. Seitz (1985) also sees conflict within the community after 597 in an exilic redaction. While these thematic elements are present in the second half of the book, they are subsumed into larger rhetorical purposes. Chs. 26–52 develop issues of survival and consider the place of Judah's tragedy in the divine plan for the future of the nations.

The prophetic message in contention in the second half of the book is no longer whether Judah will repent in time to avert collapse. The book's audience lives with Judah's failure to do so. In fits and starts, all the chapters in the second half address the community's survival. In doing so, they seek to evoke repentance from the exiles, to instruct them to endure through the unavoidable suffering they face (Kessler 1968), and to have confidence that God will bring them into a future they can barely imagine. In service of these purposes, Jeremiah appears as an iconic presence, not only as a prophet rejected, but as the model of the faithful sufferer whose behaviour exiles must emulate to gain their lives as 'the prize of war'. The chapters reveal enormous tensions within the communities of survivors over how to proceed (Seitz 1989b).

Although many different actual speakers may stand behind these texts (Reitzschel 1966), two 'implied' narrators appear in them. The first and most prominent is an omniscient third-person speaker who is authoritative and descriptive, often identified with Jeremiah's scribe Baruch, and who relates events in many of these chapters (26, 29, 32, 33, 36, 37–45; Holladay 1989: 16; but see Carroll 1986: 662–8; Clements 1988: 153; Nicholson 1970: 17). He describes events and quotes YHWH, Jeremiah, and other characters whose voices are filtered through his own. The theological, political, and ideological perspectives of this implied narrator are both obvious and conflictual. Jeremiah and his adherents alone carry YHWH's intentions for the survivors. Life will come through submission to Babylon. Sufferings of exile cannot be escaped but must be embraced. The second narrator is Jeremiah (chs. 27–8, 35). In the few chapters where he is principal speaker, additional authority accompanies the narrating voice by the impression that the prophet himself addresses readers.

Poetic voices reappear in a significant way in chs. 30–1 and in the Oracles Against the Nations (chs. 46–51). The sparsity of poetry sets it apart and gives it prominence. The poetic voices promise more than survival; they point to a radiant future and to divine overthrow of aggressive enemy nations. This part of the book, therefore, concerns hope, muted and distant, but as certain and ineluctable as tragedy was in chs. 1–25.

Chs. 26–36 concern blame and hope. Chs. 26 and 36 create a literary frame around sub-units devoted to prophetic conflict (chs. 27–9), the 'little book of consolation' (chs. 30–3), and an example and counter-example for faithful living (chs. 34–5). Chs. 26–9 are loosely connected chapters concerning prophetic discord, and address disputes over which prophetic vision of the future will ensure the nation's survival message is true. Ch. 26 defends Jeremiah as the true prophet whose credentials are reaffirmed in the face of rejection and threats upon his life. Chs. 27–8 make the same point through Jeremiah's confrontations with lying prophets, and ch. 29 affirms Jeremiah's advice to the exiles over that of lying prophets. Hananiah, Ahab, Zedekiah, and Shemaiah die for their false prophecy. By contrast, Jeremiah's mysterious escapes from death (26:24; 36:26) witness to the truthfulness of his prophecy. But discernment of the true prophetic word, a major issue in exile, is a means to an end, not the end itself. Only correct discernment of and obedience to true prophecy ensure the community's survival. The content of the prophetic word in this sequence of texts is as important, therefore, as the debate over the true messenger. Narratives progress logically from the proclamation of Jerusalem's destruction and Jeremiah's survival (ch. 26), to directions to submit to the invaders (chs. 27–8), to advice for settling in for a long exile (ch. 29). The primary issue, therefore, is not prophecy itself (contra Kessler 1968), but survival.

(26:1–24) A Second Commission Ch. 26 continues a mid-rashic reinterpretation of Jeremiah's temple sermon (7:1–8:3) and functions as a second call narrative (O'Connor 1989: 619). Some in the community accept Jeremiah's word, whereas priests, prophets, and especially King Jehoiakim reject it. A chronological note typical of the second half of the book dates the story to the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign (v. 1). Many interpreters use these dates to construct chronologies of the prophet's life but frequently overlook the date's symbolic import. The date indicates that, from the beginning of his reign, Jehoiakim rejected the prophetic word. Ch. 26 divides into three parts: vv. 1–16, the trial; vv. 17–23, the elders' intervention; v. 24, rescue. (On the many differences between LXX and MT, see Carroll 1986: 551.)

(26:1–16) The implied narrator reports a command to Jeremiah to preach in the temple (cf. 7:2) but adds that he is not 'to trim a word' from the prophetic message for the people might still 'listen' (v. 3). This divine command parallels commissions to Moses (Deut 4:2; 13:1), except that Moses was prohibited from adding to the message. Jeremiah receives no such prohibition because this narrative does precisely that; it adds to the message. It adapts Jeremiah's preaching to the circumstances of exile assumed in the second half of the book. A radically abridged version of the temple sermon follows the commission (vv. 4–6), revealing a process of selection and elaboration in the transmission and updating of prophecy, omitting the cultic delinquencies central to ch. 7, and attending, instead, to the consequence of the people's refusal to listen. For the audience that consequence has already occurred. The temple has become like Shiloh (see Jer 7). The exilic community itself must heed the call to repent (O'Connor 1989).

Multiple responses from the community follow in vv. 7–16 and culminate in Jeremiah's trial. Initially, priests, prophets, and all the people respond to Jeremiah's threats to temple and city (v. 6) by capturing him and pronouncing a death sentence upon him (vv. 7–9). A trial begins with priests and prophets acting as prosecutors and 'officials' and with the people acting as jury (vv. 10–11). To charges against him, Jeremiah courageously reaffirms that YHWH sent (š-l-h) him and calls again for repentance (vv. 12–13). He also comments on his own predicament. He is in their hands and they can do as they wish with him, but he is innocent for YHWH has sent him (vv. 14–15). The trial concludes with the 'officials and all the people' proclaiming his innocence (v. 16). Thus far, the narrative reaffirms Jeremiah's commission, reintroduces the call to repent, and reveals that Jeremiah has support among officials and people but not among religious leaders. Jeremiah himself, under a threat of death, remains steadfast and is vindicated.

(26:17–23) muddies the narrative. Though the trial is finished, new speakers appear, 'elders' who continue the debate by presenting examples of two other prophecies of Jerusalem's destruction and their contrasting reception by kings. The first prophet is Micah (Mic 3:12) whose message was received by Hezekiah as a call to repent (vv. 17–19). By contrast, the prophet Uriah's message was not simply rejected by Jehoiakim. The king sent a death squad into Egypt to extradite Uriah, killed him, and abused his corpse (vv. 20–3). This comparison between kings underscores Jehoiakim's heinous disregard for the prophetic word from the beginning of his rule (v. 1). Jehoiakim joins priests and prophets as enemies of the word, and by implication, they are together responsible for the fall of the nation.

Mysteriously Ahikam then rescues Jeremiah from death (v. 24). Some interpreters argue that the purpose of this verse is to illustrate the danger Jeremiah personally confronts as prophet (Hossfeld and Meyer 1973 35; Weiser 1960: 235; Thompson 1980: 528). But the people have already declared Jeremiah's innocence (v. 16) so that his rescue seems unnecessary. However, it creates a parallel to another account of Jeremiah's endangerment and rescue in ch. 36. These two chapters contain many similarities and thereby create a literary frame around chs. 27–35 (O'Connor 1988; Nicholson 1970: 55). Moreover, Ahikam is the first of a list of named rescuers in the 'second book', among whom the Shaphan family is central (Wilson 1989: 62–8; Boadt 1982b: 15). Jeremiah is no longer alone. Named supporters probably point to a group in the exilic community who stand firmly in the Jeremiah tradition and resist monarchic authority (Brueggemann 1991: 12). Their support and rescue of Jeremiah is also support and rescue of his tradition. His rescue indicates that he is a true prophet because he does not die after its announcement as do false prophets (Deut 18:20).

Ch. 26 introduces the second book, therefore, by announcing themes central to the following chapters. It blames King Jehoiakim, priests, and prophets for resisting the prophetic word and failing to repent. It invites the implied exilic audience to join supporters of the prophet against the leadership and invites them to repent now. It presents Jeremiah as a model of exilic obedience who, while in the hands of his captors, holds steadfast in his confidence in YHWH's word. His rescue symbolically heralds a mysterious and surprising future rescue of the repentant exilic community and contrasts him with numerous false prophets in chs. 27–9 who come under the sentence of death for their lying ways.

(27:1–28:17) The Yokes In a prose account of symbolic actions Jeremiah narrates his conflict with other prophetic groups. At issue is how Babylon will control Judah, the exiles, and captured temple vessels. Conflict over interpretation of the divine will for Judah and the nations crystallizes in the encounters between Jeremiah and Hananiah. What is at stake between Jeremiah and the prophets is the imaginative envisioning of the future in order to affect behaviour in the present. The text contains three narrative panels that increasingly narrow the conflict from an international disagreement to a personal dispute between two prophets. The first panel contains Jeremiah's message to the nations and the contrary view of their prophets (27:1–11); the second narrows to Jeremiah's message to King Zedekiah and the opposition of Judah's prophets (27:12–22); the third funnels further down to the specific clash between Jeremiah and Hananiah (28:1–17). (But see Carroll 1986: 523 for whom ch. 28 is a variant of ch. 27.)

(27:1–11) The story begins in the first year of Zedekiah's reign, immediately after the first invasion of Judah by Babylon in 597. The date signifies the truth of Jeremiah's words. At the time of the first invasion, Jeremiah prophesied Babylon's triumph and eventual overthrow. His word was reliable regarding Babylon's ascent to power and will be equally reliable regarding Babylon's fall. The story of the yokes enacts and dramatizes this message. Jeremiah himself relates that he put a yoke around his neck at YHWH's command and delivered a message to the envoys of neighbouring kings. The yoke symbolizes enslavement of the nations to Babylon. As Creator of the earth, YHWH can direct events at will (Clements 1988: 162). Describing YHWH's creative activity, Jeremiah announces that Babylonian rule will extend through three generations and then will end (vv. 2–7). Nations that do not comply with Babylon will lose their lands. They are forbidden to listen to their own prophets and mediators who counsel lies (vv. 8–11).

(27:12–22) Next Jeremiah interprets the yoke for Judah. He addresses the king but uses plural forms (v. 12), urging him to accept Babylon's yoke and not to listen to the prophets. They lie, for YHWH did not send them (vv. 12–15). The prophets' lies become specific in a dispute over temple vessels carried to Babylon in 597 (vv. 16–22; Seitz 1989b: 184–9). The prophets promised quick restoration of the vessels to the temple (v. 16), but Jeremiah contends that they and additional vessels and people will remain in Babylon indefinitely, until YHWH decides to think of them (vv. 19–22). Strong ideological claims are being made here with the authority of Jeremiah's own voice. Prophets who anticipate a quick end to exile and oppose Babylon are not only wrong, they are liars who stand against God. The community must resist their vision or it will not survive (v. 17; see 21:8).

(28:1–17) Interpretative conflict turns into a personal showdown in Jeremiah's encounter with Hananiah. In the same year, before priests, prophets, and all the people (vv. 1–2), Hananiah announces a countermesssage. YHWH will destroy the yoke of the king of Babylon and return vessels, king, and exiles within two years (vv. 3–4); captivity will be short. Jeremiah reports his own ambivalence in response. He wishes it were so, but tradition stands against Hananiah's interpretation. Only time will tell if the message of peace is from God (vv. 5–9). Hananiah parries with a symbolic act of his own. He breaks Jeremiah's yoke (vv. 10–11) in an action designed to cancel Jeremiah's word and set a different word inexorably towards fulfilment. Jeremiah himself indicates that the true word is difficult to discern. He departs for some time (v. 12), then YHWH sends him back with an iron yoke (vv. 13–14). Revelation cancels indecision. Hananiah's word is a lie and his death within the year stands as irrefutable Deuteronomistic proof (vv. 12–17; Deut 18:20). To Jeremiah, Hananiah's message is more than wishful thinking; it is a theological and political path to death. Only by accepting Babylonian rule and enduring the suffering that accompanies it will they ultimately escape exile and find a future. Babylonian hegemony will surely end but not quickly. The text labels the anti-Babylonian leanings in the surrounding nations, in Judah, and among exiles as vicious lies. For those living in exile, the story of Jeremiah's yoke offers instructions about survival. In their present circumstances, exiles must persist and endure, for the Creator who made the earth and its inhabitants will eventually bring about a reversal of fortunes. Hope, historically unspecific but theologically grounded, rests in the power of the Creator.

(29:1–32) Letters This chapter develops themes of the previous two, but takes the form of letters reported by the third-person narrator. From Jerusalem Jeremiah writes to the exiles (vv. 1–23) and responds to a letter about him from Shemaiah (vv. 24–32). The epistolary literary device allows Jeremiah to remain the authoritative source of the prophetic message even though he is not present among the exiles. He becomes the author of written prophecy addressed to elders, priests, and prophets, to everyone taken to Babylon after the deportation of 597 (vv. 1–2). Emissaries of Zedekiah, both among families of Jeremiah's supporters, are couriers (v. 3; Brueggemann 1991: 31). The letter's message is precise regarding the exiles' relationship to Babylon. Not only are they not to resist Babylon, they are actively to seek its welfare (šālôm). They are to settle there, to set up daily life and domestic relationships, and to seek the welfare of the city in which they are captive. In its shalom is their shalom (vv. 4–7). This surprising advice, delivered at the very beginning of exile (v. 2), indicates that there is no escape, no way out, despite contradictory interpretations of the prophets among them. The prophets are lying (vv. 8–9).

The letter encourages long-suffering and discourages rebellion or false confidence in an early release. Rescue will come, but only after seventy years (v. 10, cf. 25:11–12). Clements (1988) thinks that seventy years means one generation, but it probably means the symbolic long time of biblical numerology (Newsome 1984: 121), since 27:7 promises three generations of Babylonian rule. What the narrator claims to be Jeremiah's own view, however, is that Babylon is acting as YHWH's agent and therefore their only choice is to co-operate actively. Eventually their suffering will end because YHWH has plans for their shalom (v. 11). Then YHWH will relate to them differently, no longer hiding from them. YHWH will restore their fortunes and return them from the diaspora of exile (vv. 10–14).

In this letter, the exiles alone are the fortunate, the chosen. Jeremiah promises curses of 'sword, famine, and pestilence' upon those who stay in Judah (vv. 15–18; see 24:8–10). Two false prophets among the exiles, Ahab and Zedekiah, will die like Hananiah under the Deuteronomic curse (28:17). The letter totally discredits prophets of the anti-Babylonian group and of people who remained in the land. Nor will subsequent texts support those who stay in the land, a group that strangely includes Jeremiah himself (chs. 40–1). His choice to remain in the land (40:1–6) contradicts his advice to survivors.

vv. 24–32, Shemaiah's letter: the narrator relates the contents of a second letter, written by one of the exiles named Shemaiah to the high priest in Jerusalem. Shemaiah demands that the priest silence the madman Jeremiah because of his letter (29:1–23). When the high priest reads Shemaiah's letter aloud, Jeremiah curses Shemaiah and his family for false prophecy (vv. 31–2).

The altercations in chs. 26–9 create a marked contrast with the harmony and contentment envisioned in chs. 30–3.

(30:1–33:26) The Little Book of Consolation contains collections of poetry (chs. 30–1) and prose (chs. 32–3) that depict a complete reversal of fortune for the destroyed and exiled people. Using themes and motifs from previous parts of the book, these chapters envision an alternative future of healing, restoration, and renewed relationship between God and the people. Keown, Scalise, and Smothers (1995: 84–5) review efforts to determine and date core texts collected here. The placement of these chapters at the relative centre of the MT version of Jeremiah is puzzling. Texts that are largely accusatory and conflictual surround them, seeming to bury joyous hope in a cloud of terror and suffering, as if to dim the enthusiasm they are designed to inspire. The book's arrangement, however, like that of Lamentations, tempers hope for the exilic audience for whom restoration is not an imminent possibility (Kessler 1968). The universe imagined here does not offer a programme for escape. Rather, the text seeks to restore the community by recasting its narrative world. The 'narrative wreckage' (Frank 1995: 53) of their communal life begins to heal in the creation of a new future, a new narrative. Chs. 30–3 are not the book's conclusion, as modern readers might wish, but a glowing centre, a hidden life, yet to emerge in historical specificity.

(30:1–31:40) Restoration YHWH is principal speaker in these poetic passages. The convergence of divine voice, poetic genre, and themes of hope set the chapters apart from surrounding materials, and draw attention to their presence at the book's centre. Because of their frequent use of the names Jacob and Israel some scholars assume that these poems originally addressed the northern kingdom alone (Rudolph 1947: 159; Lohfink 1981; but see Carroll 1986: 571–2; McKane 1986: 752). In their present location, however, these titles contribute to a rhetoric of unity and harmony for a unified nation. Jacob/Israel was the eponymous ancestor of all twelve tribes (Gen 29–30). Whatever the original provenance of these poems, they are here closely linked with poems addressed to Judah and Zion (30:3, 4, 12–17; 31:6, 12, 27, 31). After an introduction (30:1–4), the poems depict reversals of fortune (30:5–17), celebration (30:18–24), the journey home (31:1–14), the garden of delights (30:10–14), and in poetry and prose, the comforting of Rachel and the restoration of the broken marriage and family (31:15–40).

(30:1–4) A narrator reports that Jeremiah wrote YHWH's words in a book or scroll. The device of the revelatory book allows the character of Jeremiah to speak to the implied exilic audience even though he is not among them, and it allows Jeremiah's traditionists to expand the message under his authority (25:13; 36:1–32; 45:1; 51:60; McKane 1986: 750 accepts the scroll's contents as 30:4–31:40). Using imagery from other parts of the book (Odashima 1989: 98–138), the 'little book' witnesses to the days when YHWH 'will restore the fortunes of Israel and Judah' (v. 3). The poems collected here shift between addressing male Jacob/Israel, and virgin/daughter Israel/Rachel in a manner reminiscent of the account of the broken-marriage metaphor (JER 2:1–3:25). Here that broken family is healed and renewed.

(30:5–17) Two poetic panels, the first addressed to male Israel and the second to daughter Zion, depict reversals of fortunes in literary movements from panic (vv. 5–7) to fearlessness (vv. 10–11) and from incurable wounds (vv. 12–15) to restored health (vv. 16–17). In both instances, the reversal occurs without transition or explanation. Both panels imagine reversal as a change within YHWH, not within Jacob or Zion.

vv. 5–11, in the opening verse a speaker announces the sound of a terrifying voice (qôl). Pain grips men as suddenly as it does a woman in labour. An 'awful' (NEB) day of distress is upon them (see Carroll 1986: 574–5 on the day of YHWH). A prose comment (vv. 8–9) inexplicably replaces terror with future hope and links this passage to the account of the two yokes (27:1–28:19). YHWH will remove the yoke of servitude, restore relationship with them, and raise up a king. In vv. 10–11, YHWH comforts Jacob in the second person and responds to the panic and terror of vv. 5–7. Like a woman who finally gives birth, male Jacob will survive. The appropriation of labour imagery for male terror appears elsewhere (4:31; 13:21; 49:24; 50:43), but only here does it lead to life rather than death (O'Connor 1992). From far away YHWH will save them and punish the nations. Rescue is a complete surprise, but it comes with sobering caution for YHWH will also punish them justly (v. 11). Exile still means just punishment for sin.

The second poetic panel (vv. 12–17) also moves unexpectedly from desperation to salvation, but the metaphor shifts from panic to woundedness, and the addressee changes from male Jacob to female Zion (v. 17). vv. 12–13 and 15 return to language of Zion's incurable wound (8:21–2) and to her isolation, for all her lovers have abandoned her (v. 14). Daughter Zion is YHWH's unfaithful wife (2:1–3:25), and her wound is the consequence of her guilt (3:15). Like the previous panel, this poem explains destruction and exile as punishment for sin (v. 15). But rather than continuing with the expected description of her punishment, the poem reverses itself. It is her destroyers who will be punished (v. 16), and she who will be healed and restored to health. YHWH pities her in her abandonment (v. 17).

In vv. 18–22 YHWH continues to speak, first about Jacob and then to him (v. 21, second-person masculine plural). Jerusalem may be included in the poem indirectly as the city and citadel rebuilt on the mound (v. 18; Thompson 1980: 561). If so, north and south are reunited in a burst of thanksgiving and new life. In a book particularly attuned to sounds, cries of battle, shouts of grief, panic, and terror, this poem creates a startling sonic reversal. A great crowd of merry-makers will make joyous noises of thanksgiving as they exchange shame for honour (v. 19). To counter fears that the people would dwindle and disappear in exile, YHWH promises to establish the children of merry-makers in the liturgical assembly. Besides signifying the certainty of a future for the community, mention of 'their children' also identifies the implied audience as children of the exiled generation (v. 20). Clements (1988: 176) points to the conspicuous absence of temple restoration in these promises of hope for the exiles. The community will, none the less, be restored as a worshipping people. YHWH will punish their oppressors; foreigners will no longer rule them. Divine initiative alone will restore covenant relationship for 'who would otherwise dare to approach' YHWH? (v. 21).

vv. 23–4 close the chapter with a summary interpretation of national tragedy. YHWH's wrath came upon them as a raging tempest that will accomplish YHWH's plan (cf. Isa 55:10–11). Addressed directly, readers learn that they will understand 'in the latter days'. These verses suggest that there is little present understanding, only continued conflict among exiles regarding the meaning of events.

(31:1–14) Return The next three poems (31:2–6, 7–9, 10–14) envision and celebrate the journey home as a utopian restoration of the entire people of Israel. A superscription (v. 1) links this chapter to the previous one by continuing the motif of the eschatological future (30:24c) and by reusing the covenant formula (30:22). v. 1 explicitly names the human covenant partners as 'all the families of Israel'.

The first poem (vv. 2–6) continues the expansive vision of the restored community in which people of Samaria and Ephraim (vv. 5–6) prepare to return to Zion (v. 6). Resonant with echoes of other texts, the poem continues divine speech from the previous chapter. The subject of the poem is the future survivors (v. 2), personified as female Israel (vv. 3–5, second-person feminine singular object pronouns). Using references to the journey out of Egypt and to Israel's devotion as a bride (Jer 2:2), YHWH reinterprets history. From 'far away', and despite having divorced her and her sister Judah (3:1–10), YHWH declares his 'everlasting love' and 'continued faithfulness' to her (v. 3). YHWH's words disregard her sordid past and transform her very being. She is no longer a faithless harlot but bēthūlat, (virgin) Israel (v. 4). YHWH promises to 'build' her and she will plant (vv. 4–5), recalling promises to Jeremiah (1:10). In joyous celebration, female Israel will sing and dance like Miriam and the women after the escape through the sea (31:4b, cf. Ex 15:20–1). Sentinels will call them and the people will return 'to the LORD our God' (v. 6). Before exile, female Israel refused to return, but at that time there had been conditions (Jer 3:11–13). Here there are none.

The second poem describes the procession home (vv. 7–9). YHWH invites song on behalf of, and perhaps by, Jacob (McKane 1986: 788) and provides words for intercession, 'Save, O LORD, your people, the remnant of Israel' (v. 7). This liturgical refrain may again dramatize the voice of the exilic community, bringing it into the text as expectant and hopeful. The poem assumes covenant relationship and YHWH's willingness to grant the request. Then YHWH announces the divine plan (vv. 8–9). YHWH will bring them back from the place to which they had been sent, the land of the north and the farthest parts of the earth. YHWH will gather them and lead them by water on easy pathways. What is most significant is the description of the company. Among them are the most vulnerable people, the blind, the lame, the pregnant, and those giving birth. As vulnerable or disabled, this procession embodies the whole community, humbled and broken yet bringing forth new life. On their journey, YHWH will accompany them as the father of Ephraim, his firstborn. The broken family of 2:1–3:25 reappears here, restored and made whole. Ephraim symbolizes the generation of exiles, the faithless children who have repented and returned (3:22–5).

The third poem (vv. 10–14), summed up by 'a watered garden' (v. 12), breaks out in lyrical celebration as the captive community returns to Zion. YHWH calls the nations as witnesses to, and proclaimers of, the new order imagined here. Gathering replaces scattering; bringing in overtakes thrusting away; the divine punisher becomes the redeemer who buys back the helpless slave (v. 11). The returnees will sing, radiant over divine goodness, unanticipated, hardly believable. In this imagined future, life will be a watered garden, an oasis of refreshment, an Eden of delights. Land and flocks will be fertile. Women and men, old and young shall dance and be merry. Priests and people, all will be satisfied. As YHWH turns mourning into joy, sorrow into comfort, the painful realities of the present world will be totally reversed.

The visions of these poems must have been shocking to exiles and their reversals barely conceivable to a people held under Babylonian sovereignty. But even if Babylonian hegemony had already begun to weaken under pressure from Persia, these poems envision more than mere survival for Israel. They speak of a prodigal transformation of reality, of an eschatological Utopia that restores divine-human relationship, reaffirms Israel as the chosen people, and recognizes that Israel itself has been changed by its suffering.

(31:15–30) Rachel's Comfort Rachel and her son, historically her grandson, Ephraim, symbolize this transformation on many levels. They appear in a poem (vv. 15–22; Trible 1978 140–50), which is followed by three prose comments that interpret its ambiguous conclusion (vv. 23–30). Many scholars argue for an original northern provenance of this text because Ephraim symbolizes the northern kingdom (Thompson 1980: 573). But whatever its origins, Rachel is the quintessential bereaved mother who cannot recover from the loss of her children (v. 15). As Jacob's most beloved wife (Gen 29), she is matriarch of all Israel, and her two sons, Joseph and Benjamin, become fathers of northern and southern tribes (Holladay 1989: 187). Rachel's motherhood of northern and southern offspring suggests that she weeps not only for Ephraim but for all the children of Israel for whom there is no future (Brueggemann 1991: 64). Her characterization recalls the 'faithless' (3:22) first wife of YHWH, the wife from the north (3:1–13) who fails to repent. In 3:6–25, it is her offspring, not she, who return to the father, as does Ephraim here. She signifies the generation whose children are in exile, who face extinction as a people. Ephraim personifies the next generation, the implied exilic audience who gain in his portrayal another model of true repentance. He is their imagined future, but mysteriously she, too, is included.

Like many other characters in this book, Rachel's grief is unceasing and her weeping voice (gôl) can be heard (v. 15). In the vignette created by this much discussed poem (Trible 1978; Anderson 1978; O'Connor 1992; Weems 1995), YHWH comforts her, seeks to dry her tears, recognizes her labour, and finally promises her a heart-stopping reward. The mother who believes her children are dead will see them return from the land of the enemy (vv. 16–17). A more poignant announcement can hardly be imagined as the poet climbs into the persona of the mother who learns that, miraculously, her children live.

YHWH hears another voice, a voice of shame and repentance, a voice of pleading (vv. 18–19). The mother weeps, but the child speaks. Ephraim interprets his suffering as his father's discipline of an untrained son. In the liturgical language that forms a leitmotif across the book (3:22–5; 8:14–15; 10:1–16, 22–5; 14:7–9, 19–22; 16:19–20; 17:12–23) Ephraim begs to be brought back 'for you are the Lord my God' (vv. 18–19). The stanza re-enacts and embellishes the scene where the children admit their shameful youth and return repentant to their Father (3:22–5). Unlike the earlier version, however, this account of repentance and return evokes a response from YHWH, who expresses delight in his son and insists with promises of mercy that he never forgot him (v. 20, Trible 1978; Anderson 1978).

Reversing the broken marriage (2:1–3:25), YHWH also invites grieving mother and still 'faithless' virgin Israel to return (vv. 21–2). YHWH will create yet another surprise, 'a new thing on the earth: a woman encompasses a man' (v. 22). This is a difficult and astonishing verse. Translation of tēsôbēb is only part of the difficulty. It can mean 'protect', 'encompass', 'surround'. Holladay (1989: 195); Carroll (1986: 602–4); and McKane (1986: 807) discuss the problems. In addition, there remains the problem of understanding the 'new thing' God has created. In part that decision rests on who the woman and man symbolize. In the context of the poem they seem to be Rachel and Ephraim. If so, then mother and son, the older unrepentant generation and the present exilic generation, are reunited; mother again surrounds, encompasses her child, thought dead but now living. Woman encompassing man is the mother and son reunited as she embraces her child. Alternatively this may be a biological promise in which bereaved Rachel encompasses a man sexually to give birth to a new generation (vv. 27–8). Or the woman may be Jerusalem encompassing the returned nation (vv. 23–6).

vv. 23–30 contain three prose pieces that, by juxtaposition, interpret the woman surrounding a man and continue promises for the days that are coming. Rather than pinpointing meaning, they accumulate multiple interpretations of v. 22. vv. 23–6 appear as a revelation in a dream of a restored Jerusalem, though the city is not named. It will be a place of rest and replenishment for the weary. By juxtaposition with v. 22, these verses suggest that the woman surrounding a man symbolizes Jerusalem, the holy hill that protects and encompasses her returned inhabitants. By contrast, vv. 27–8 promise human and animal fertility in the planting of seed, thus providing offspring and food for the nation. The woman encompassing a man to become pregnant personifies the future of the destroyed people. Finally, vv. 29–30 offer yet another interpretation of v. 22. The proverb comments on the generational divide by insisting that children are responsible for, and suffer for, their own sins. The exiles cannot blame their parents' generation exclusively for their predicament. They themselves are accountable for their behaviour and, by implication, they must repent. Woman does not encompass a man; mother does not include child in her guilt. The children's guilt is their own.

The prose comments of vv. 23–30 seek to tame the radical, open-ended poem that precedes them, but the power of the text still breaks out. Whatever it may denote, it also reverses gender imagery from earlier parts of the book. Rachel, weeping mother, virgin daughter, faithless daughter, is invited home again by God/husband who divorced her. She symbolizes a new future. She is the restored Israel, mother of north and south, reunited with her children, laughing, not weeping, protecting, surrounding, embracing them, and finally leading them into a utopian future of harmony and equality. The prose comment on the new covenant portrays that future.

(31:31–4) The New Covenant Following Ephraim's enactment of repentance, YHWH's acceptance of it, and the restoration of the broken family, YHWH proclaims a new covenant, a new way of relating within the reconstituted family. (For reviews of modern interpretations, see Herrmann 1986: 146–62 and McKane 1986: 817–27.) Among Christians, the new covenant passage is perhaps the most well-known and misread of Jeremianic texts. The new covenant prophecy does not cancel YHWH's covenant with Judaism in favour of Christianity (Brueggemann 1991: 69–71). Christians will, of course, place great significance on this short passage, using its language to express their faith that the newness of divine revelation in Jesus Christ stands in continuity with YHWH's covenant with Israel. When the book of Jeremiah speaks of the new covenant, however, it is referring to renewed relationship between Israel and YHWH.

That renewed relationship will differ from YHWH's covenant with Israel's ancestors rescued from Egypt (v. 32). They broke covenant even though, YHWH says, bā'altî: 'I was master over them' (Holladay 1989: 198), or 'I was their husband' (Carroll 1986: 609 cf. NRSV, NIV). This covenant language reaches back to the broken marriage and divorce between YHWH and his faithless wife (JER 2:1–3:25). The new relationship will be stronger than the previous marriages because YHWH will inscribe tôrâ on their hearts (v. 33; Polk 1984: 35–57). YHWH, not the community, will create love and fidelity so that everyone from the 'least...to the greatest' will know YHWH (v. 34). The new covenant, therefore, manifests itself as an egalitarian religious vision that embraces everyone in the community without hierarchical preferences of any kind. The new covenant restores the broken marriage, heals the wounded family, and creates a new story from Israel's narrative wreckage. Finally, the new covenant continues the development of the book's theodicy by inviting the implied audience to recognize their sufferings as discipline by a loving father and husband. YHWH will forgive them and remember their sins no more (v. 34).

(31:35–7) The Covenant's Endurance In a spectacular reversal of the cosmic undoing of creation caused by sin (JER 4:23–8), this brief poem finds, in the permanence of the created order, assurance that Israel's offspring will receive divine acceptance forever (v. 36). In images that echo Gen 1 and Job 38:4–7, the Creator threatens to reject Israel's offspring (zera', 'seed', vv. 36c, 37c), but not until the fixed order of creation fails and the cosmos can be measured. Since this will never happen, YHWH promises an eternal covenant with restored Israel.

(31:38–40) Jerusalem Rebuilt By returning to the image of the restored Jerusalem, this prose comment forms a frame with 31:23–6 (Keown, Scalise, and Smothers 1995). As the focus of exilic hope, the city will be rebuilt beyond its former borders to accommodate the population explosion among its inhabitants. Jerusalem will never again be uprooted or overthrown (v. 38).

(32:1–33:26) In these two chapters, prose narrative supplants poetry. Jeremiah replaces YHWH as main actor; a narrator replaces YHWH as speaker. Both prose chapters prophesy a radical change of fortunes for the exiles; both are set during Jeremiah's confinement as the Chaldeans (Babylonians) invade Jerusalem; and both appeal to YHWH as all-powerful Creator whose portrayal changes unexpectedly from angry punisher to loving redeemer and healer (Perdue 1994: 145).

(32:1–44) Jeremiah Redeems a Field In the previous two chapters Jeremiah appears only in the superscription (30:1–2) and as unnamed recipient of a revelatory dream (31:26). Both notices lend Jeremiah's prophetic authority to the message of renewal and restoration found there. In ch. 32, however, Jeremiah is chief agent and central character, and for the first time he has a companion, Baruch, to act as witness (v. 12; Brueggemann 1994). Jeremiah's symbolic action (vv. 1–5) and sermon-like prayer (vv. 16–25), to which YHWH responds (vv. 26–44), confirm and give concreteness to the hopeful poetic vision of the previous chapters. During Jeremiah's imprisonment in the palace, he again serves as an exemplar for exiles by acting with obedient hopefulness in the face of invasion and captivity. Clements (1996: 128) believes that the land purchase holds a central position in Jeremiah's vision of hope. To the extent that the story serves as first step towards restoration, the narrative begins the fulfilment of the visions of 30:1–31:40.

(32:1–15) The Purchase A superscription places Jeremiah's symbolic act in the reigns of Zedekiah and Nebuchadnezzar (v. 1), during Babylon's most devastating invasion of Jerusalem (588/87 BCE; on dating, see Holladay 1989: 212 and Keown Scalise, and Smothers 1995: 150; on historical inconsistencies, see Carroll 1986: 622; McKane 1986: clxi). The chief importance of this chronological note is symbolic. It places Jeremiah's foolhardy purchase at the nadir of Judah's history. During the bleakness of invasion, Jeremiah acts and prays in ways that embody and announce a new future (Seitz 1989b: 244). The dating of the narrative, therefore, assures the exilic audience that the seemingly unrealizable promises are already active in the divine plan.

The narrative itself is highly symbolic. Jeremiah prophesies Babylonian triumph and the resultant capture of Zedekiah for an indefinite period, until YHWH 'attends' to him (vv. 2–5; cf. 27:19–22). To repress this treacherous message, Zedekiah, himself about to be imprisoned, imprisons Jeremiah. YHWH tells Jeremiah that his cousin Hanamel will ask him to redeem his uncle's field in Anathoth (vv. 6–8). As next of kin, Jeremiah's responsibility is to redeem family property in case of debt (Lev 25:23–8; Ruth 4:1–10), but under the circumstances of the invasion such an act appears pointless. The narrative offers no details of the family predicament, but rushes, instead, to describe legal and monetary components of the transaction (vv. 9–15). These details underscore the public, legal nature of the event. As executor, Baruch places the deeds in a jar to preserve them (vv. 12–14). The last verse explains the meaning of the purchase. Life will resume in the land (v. 15), for YHWH will redeem it just as Jeremiah redeems the land of his kin.

The story of Jeremiah's land redemption affirms to the implied audience that life in the land will resume in a new future. Although the promise originated with Jeremiah, Baruch witnessed it, served as executor, and thus emerges as a reliable interpreter and developer of the Jeremiah tradition (Carroll 1986: 61–2). The narrative portrays no quick end to exile (v. 5), but only a promissory deed. In the meantime, Jeremiah emerges as a paragon of faithful obedience and hope in the midst of captivity.

(32:16–25) Jeremiah's prayer elaborates upon and parallels the story of the redemption of land. The prayer also revisits the grim hour of invasion as fulfilment of YHWH's word and finds in the reliability of earlier messages the basis for new hope. In first-person direct address, Jeremiah reminds YHWH of past divine treatment of Israel that distributed love prodigally and punishment sparingly (vv. 17–19). Jeremiah addresses YHWH as Creator of the earth and Sovereign of history (Perdue 1994: 144). The 'impossibilities' God performed on behalf of the people in the past (Brueggemann 1991: 83) brought no obedience from them (vv. 20–3). Jeremiah begs YHWH to 'see' that the promised invasion is underway (vv. 20–4). In the thick of the siege, YHWH orders Jeremiah to buy the field in front of witnesses (v. 25). Hints of conflict in the exilic community concerning the future float beneath the surface of this prayer. For some, resumption of life in the land is unthinkable. It is this hopelessness that the prayer seeks to overturn.

(31:26–44) Divine Assurance If readers are not yet convinced that they will return to the land, YHWH's reply to Jeremiah's prayer assures them that they will. A third-person narrator introduces the divine speaker who tells Jeremiah that the God of all can do anything (vv. 26–7). The passage parallels the narrative of land purchase and Jeremiah's prayer in describing the disaster (vv. 28–9a) and the sins that provoked it (vv. 29b–35, cf. 7:1–8:3), and in shifting to the good fortune ahead (vv. 37–44). Even as the city falls into the hand of Babylon, YHWH announces the gathering of exiles (vv. 36–7), their safe return, and the making of an everlasting covenant (cf. 31:31–4). YHWH's responsibility for the national tragedy is unusually explicit in this prayer (v. 42), but divine agency in the disaster provides confidence in promises regarding YHWH's new activities. YHWH will plant them, delight in them (v. 41), and restore their fields (vv. 43–4).

All three units of this chapter follow the same literary and theological movement. They plunge down into invasion and devastation before turning upwards in hope. Narratively they meet the exiles in their hopelessness and insist on a transformation grounded in divine initiative. YHWH commands the land redemption (32:1–5). YHWH is the mighty Creator who loves and does impossible things (32:16–25). YHWH will restore their fortunes (vv. 37–44). In its attack on the people's sin and failure to listen, the passage defends God against charges of injustice, but YHWH also accepts responsibility (v. 42). YHWH undergoes a change of heart, reaffirms loving fidelity to the people, and in this part of the text, asks for nothing in return.

(33:1–9) Restoration of Fortunes A superscription joins this chapter to the previous one for Jeremiah is still imprisoned (v. 1). Reversing earlier prohibitions against intercession (11:14; 15:1–15), the Creator now invites prophetic mediation and promises to reveal things hitherto hidden (v. 3). This invitation reopens relationship between YHWH and the people, and the new revelations suggest further development of the tradition. The cause of the invasion and destruction was divine anger at the people's sinfulness. YHWH turned the divine face away, a momentary lapse during which the enemy wreaked havoc upon the city. Though the people's sin remains the root cause of the tragedy, divine inattentiveness suggests that punishment for the people's sin became excessive. But after that turning away, YHWH has made a full reversal by promising recovery, healing, and abundance for north and south (vv. 6–7). YHWH will rebuild, cleanse, forgive. The city's glory will evoke awe from nations at the transformation YHWH will accomplish (v. 9).

(33:10–14) Two brief comments emphasize the drama of the future transformation by describing the land as an empty wasteland (vv. 10–11, 12–13). Because the land was never empty after the invasion nor at any point during exile, some commentators judge the depiction of the land as unpeopled to be propaganda on behalf of Babylonian exiles. The claim that they alone are left of Judah makes them heirs of the true Israel. Those remaining in the land become invisible. But the text's historical referents cannot be determined. Rather, the poetic evocation of an empty, hostile wasteland sharpens the contrast between the seemingly hopeless present reality and the bustling, noisy, domestic, and worshipful future (Carroll 1986: 636).

(33:14–26) Davidic Monarchy Restored The book of consolation closes with an eschatological promise that a descendant of David will once again rule all Israel, a rule characterized by justice and righteousness (vv. 14–16). The people will never again lack kings or levitical priesthood for eternal worship (vv. 16–17). The new covenant is as eternal as the created order (v. 19–22). Nor will YHWH ever again reject the two families of Israel.

(34:1–35:22) A Bad King and a Good Community The prose narratives of chs. 34 and 35 shift the temporal frame back abruptly from the eschatological, utopian future to the reality of the recent past. Both chapters are set during the Babylonian invasion, but the behaviour they describe concerns survival in the exilic present. Ch. 34 portrays the failures of king and all the people to obey the divine word wholeheartedly, and it underscores the desolate consequences of those failures. Ch. 35, by contrast, narrates the dogged obedience of a small group of faithful Rechabites whose righteousness gains them a future. Together these chapters set forth an implicit choice between attitudes and behaviours from which readers must choose. The rhetoric is not subtle. Half-hearted obedience of king and people caused the nation's destruction; only heroic obedience in the present will issue in the survival of the faithful few. In both chapters a third-person narrator presents the speech of Jeremiah who, in turn, uses divine speech.

(34:1–22) Half-hearted Obedience After Zedekiah makes a covenant with all the people (vv. 8–20), they first obey and then disobey YHWH's word. The king's fate (34:1–7, 21–2) frames the failure of the community (34:8–20) during the invasion, described in both hyperbolic (v. 1) and concrete terms (vv. 6–7). Jerusalem is under attack from 'all the kingdoms of the earth' and all the peoples under Nebuchadnezzar's dominion (v. 1). Only Lachish and Azekah remain among Judean cities (vv. 6–7). (Archaeologists have found letters at Lachish, dating to the time of the Babylonian invasion.) This time-frame is critical for Jeremiah's prophecy (v. 8) for, at a truly grim moment, YHWH commands Jeremiah to announce the city's destruction and Zedekiah's capture and exile (vv. 2–3). The story, however, modulates the terror for the king who will not be killed but will die in peace and be lamented with proper royal rituals (vv. 4–5; cf. 52:1–11). Holladay (1989: 233–4) and Brueggemann (1991: 105) believe the passage relates an implicit choice for Zedekiah to surrender or die, while Carroll argues that the passage must mean that the royal burial will occur in Jerusalem, not in exile, since such treatment of captives is unthinkable.

The text is not conditional in its prophecy of Zedekiah's survival, however, nor does it refer to burial in Jerusalem. Instead, the text offers a picture of a slightly mitigated disaster, discerning in the royal survival a glimpse of the community's survival. That is the 'word' that Jeremiah speaks (v. 5, cf. v. 4). This passage, therefore, treats Zedekiah somewhat differently from other texts (21:1–7; 37:1–38:28), not only form-critically (Keown, Scalise, and Smothers 1995: 178) but also narratively.

That Zedekiah might save his life by surrendering to Babylon is clearer elsewhere (Carroll 1986: 641–2). It is the certainty of his exile that this narrative stresses (vv. 3, 21). It emphasizes the reliability of the prophetic word. In the larger context of chs. 26–36, Jeremiah's words of muted hope are as reliable in the midst of the siege as were his words of exile before the invasion. In the rest of this passage Zedekiah makes an attempt at righteousness that is thwarted by the citizens remaining in the land.

vv. 8–22, a broken covenant: Zedekiah makes a covenant with the people of Jerusalem, apparently enforcing the release law for Hebrew slaves (Lev 25:10). The legal and historical backgrounds of this text are obscure (Keown, Scalise, and Smothers 1995: 185–8), but they are not the main concerns of the narrative. The story uses the law of release, first, to indict the people for failure to listen and, second, to interpret exile as a reversal of the release law. Rather than depicting Zedekiah's vacillation (37:1–38:28), this text portrays the people's fickleness. At first the officials and 'all the people' obey the covenant, signifying their repentance (v. 15), but they reverse their course by taking back their slaves. In a form of poetic justice, therefore, YHWH will release them to the sword, pestilence, and famine (v. 17).

YHWH then describes an enactment of covenant ritual in which all the officials and people (v. 19) walk between the parts of a butchered calf (see Gen 17). Because that act signifies commitment to the covenant and brings a curse upon all who break it, YHWH announces the curse's fulfilment. Everyone in the community will be butchered like the sacrificial calf (vv. 18–20). Although Zedekiah acts well in this story, vv. 21–2 reiterate his fate and the fate of the city. For the book's implied audience, the account illustrates the consequence of insincere repentance.

(35:1–19) The Rechabites By contrast to officials and people of Judah in ch. 34, the Rechabites are utterly steadfast. Their identity is uncertain (see Keown, Scalise, and Smothers 1995: 195–6), but what is clear is that they provide a counter-example to Judah's faithlessness in ch. 34. The narrative takes place during Jehoiakim's reign (v. 1), earlier than events in ch. 34. Sequential chronology is not what binds these chapters.

The Rechabite event follows the style of a symbolic act. Jeremiah receives a command to go to the house of the Rechabites and bring them to the temple. There he is to offer wine to a community that abstains from drinking (vv. 1–3) and that disdains urban, settled ways such as house-building and agriculture (vv. 6–10). Out of loyalty to their ancestor Jonadab, they refuse the wine and explain their presence in the city as a security measure during the Babylonian invasion (vv. 6–11).

vv. 12–19 explain the Rechabites' temperance. It teaches a lesson to the people of Judah and Jerusalem (v. 13). Stalwartly, the Rechabites refuse to break their traditions for the sake of loyalty to a mere human ancestor. By contrast, the people of Judah persistently disobey YHWH despite continual divine efforts to speak to them through the prophets. Their failure to listen will bring disaster (vv. 12–16), but the Rechabites will survive in God's presence for all time (vv. 18–19). The text unequivocally calls for repentance as the only path to survival.

(36:1–32) The Two Scrolls The long-held scholarly assumption that the story of the scrolls is a historical report of the origins of the book of Jeremiah led to a diligent search for the contents of the Urrolle, the original scroll. Efforts to reconstruct the scroll's contents and thus to recover Jeremiah's original words have yielded little consensus (Perdue 1984: 21–2; Holladay 1989: 253). Carroll (1986: 662–8) has broken the interpretative log-jam by proposing that the scrolls are fictional elements of a narrative, based on 2 Kings 22:8–13 and designed to legitimate Baruch's scribal authority. Baruch himself, in Carroll's view, represents Deuteronomistic scribes who expand the Jeremic tradition (see Dearman 1990 for a contrary view). Carroll is correct in insisting that the story's historical roots are not recoverable. The story's importance is symbolic, theological, and literary. Narrative parallels with ch. 26 suggest that the two chapters create a literary frame around chs. 27–35. Parallels between the two chapters include dating, the prophet's audience, lists of supporters, threats to Jeremiah's life and mysterious rescues, and virulent indictments of King Jehoiakim (O'Connor 1989: 626).

Ch. 36 authorizes developments in the Jeremic tradition begun in ch. 26, partly by portraying Baruch as a faithful agent of that development. It may be best to think of Baruch as a reader of an earlier Jeremiah tradition who writes himself into the narrative to continue the story for new circumstances. In ch. 36, Baruch broadcasts Jeremiah's message in the temple and faithfully excludes nothing from the preaching of Jeremiah's entire career (v. 2). He is a reliable conduit of Jeremiah's prophetic message (McKane 1986: 912). The goal of his activity, directed by Jeremiah, is to bring about repentance in the community (v. 3). Besides providing Baruch with credentials, ch. 36 also validates the writing of the book (Brueggemann 1991: 129), itself designed to evoke repentance in the community. Finally, the story indicts royalty for rejecting the word, interprets the nation's fall as the monarchy's failure to listen, and explains the monarchy's collapse.

The superscription (v. 1) sets the story in Jehoiakim's fourth year. The narrative, related by a third-person narrator, unfolds in four scenes of intensifying drama that attend closely to the production of the scrolls and their fate. In the first scene (vv. 4–10), Jeremiah dictates the scroll to Baruch, indicating that Jeremiah, not Baruch, was the source of the scroll's contents (cf. v. 17). Because Jeremiah is barred from the temple, Baruch must read on his behalf to 'all the people' on the chance they may repent and thereby avert the promised disaster (vv. 5–8). The second scene (vv. 9–18) occurs a year later. Baruch reads the scroll 'to all the people' in the temple chamber of Gemariah, a member of the Shaphan family of Jeremiah supporters (Jer 26:1–24). Another member of the Shaphan family hears the reading, seeks out named officials, and reads the scroll to them. Alarmed by the scroll's contents, they in turn decide to read it to the king, but not before sending Baruch and Jeremiah into hiding (vv. 11–18). The written text, that is, the book, must carry the full power of the prophetic message, since neither its speaker nor its writer are present.

The third scene (vv. 20–6) reveals that writing has not dulled the power of the prophetic word. The officials who are among Jeremiah's protectors leave the scroll and report to the king who, in turn, sends Jehudi to get it and read it to him. These minute arrangements for the king to hear the scroll highlight his agency in the unfolding events. The scroll must be brought to his attention, he must consent, and then he must send for the document (vv. 20–1). As it is read to him, he deliberately cuts off the columns and, despite efforts to stop him, casts them into the fire until the entire scroll is consumed. The king's cutting and burning of the scroll is a symbolic act designed to cancel the uncontrollable power of the written word by making it disappear. As further evidence of the king's disobedience, he orders the arrest of Jeremiah and Baruch, whom YHWH miraculously protects from discovery.

The final scene of the narrative (vv. 27–32) forms a frame with the first (vv. 4–10). Jeremiah receives a divine command to write a second scroll, containing the words of the first. Only now are the king's words upon the burning of the scroll revealed, and they provide the only clue as to the scroll's message. Babylon will destroy the land and the life in it (v. 29). This short verse summarizes 'all the former words' (v. 28), the entire prophetic message, in highly abstracted, reduced form. In this narrative, it is not the potent images, metaphors, calls for repentance, and lamentations that matter, but only the fact of invasion by Babylon. The king's rejection of the scroll means the end of the monarchy and disaster for all (vv. 30–1).

The king cannot cancel the prophetic word, for Jeremiah and Baruch create a second scroll and add 'many similar words' as well. Brueggemann (1991: 129) calls the scroll 'emblematic' of the canonical book. This story validates the scroll as scribal expansion of the tradition and keeps that tradition alive so that later generations can read it. Ch. 36 also introduces the narrative complex, traditionally ascribed to Baruch, that continues through ch. 45 (Reitzschel 1966: 95–110).

The Baruch Account (chs. 37–45)

In these chapters a third-person narrator, identified as Baruch (45:1), relates events that occur in the land during and after the Babylonian invasion. Chs. 37–8 contain two stories of Jeremiah's imprisonment and meetings with Zedekiah during the invasion, and ch. 39 describes the invasion and Jeremiah's release. Chs. 40–1 portray anarchy in the land under Gedaliah, and chs. 42–4 relate events surrounding the forced exile of Jeremiah and Baruch to Egypt. The chapters close with the commissioning and comforting of Baruch (ch. 45). Interpretation of the chapters has focused on historical matters of Baruch's authorship and the invasion and on the search for unifying themes of the chapters. Brueggemann (1991: 121–8) provides a succinct survey of viewpoints. The narratives, whatever their historical content, are richly symbolic.

Although Baruch is portrayed as writer of the tradition (45:1; 36:32), he receives little attention in the intervening chapters. In ch. 45, however, Jeremiah disappears from the story and Baruch replaces him as sufferer, survivor, and bearer of the community's hopes and traditions. Baruch is an underdeveloped character whose function is to interpret and preserve the Jeremiah tradition in the absence of Jeremiah (see Carroll 1986; Brueggemann 1994).

Efforts to find thematic unity in the chapters have not reached consensus because the collection of narratives is quite multifaceted. Kremers (1953) offered the most controversial interpretation by calling chs. 37–45 a 'passion narrative' of Jeremiah's suffering and rejection in the manner of Jesus' passion. Kremers's approach has been rightly criticized for imposing Christian language and thought on the OT without first letting the text stand on its own. Jeremiah's absence from chs. 40–1 and 45, moreover, make it difficult to see his portrayal as a primary key to the narratives. Opposition to Kremers's view, however, has obscured the immense symbolic import that stories of Jeremiah's suffering, imprisonment, and rescue would have had for an exilic audience.

Taken together, the chapters show the exilic audience how to survive the suffering brought on by the invasion and its aftermath. In doing so they provide a history of rejection and fulfilment of the prophetic word (Kessler 1968; Nicholson 1975) and reveal conflictual interpretations among survivors about both the nature of prophecy (Diamond 1993) and how to face the national crisis (Seitz 1989b). Jeremiah's instruction to submit to Babylon cuts through the political alternatives. Survival cannot be achieved in their own land nor in Egypt but only by submission to Babylon (Brueggemann 1991: 121–8). The stories characterize Jeremiah as a model of faithful submission who faces utter hopelessness but once again survives with his life (cf. 26:24; 36:26). His suffering is iconic of the suffering of the exilic people. His support and rescue by Ebed-melech and the Babylonians creates hope of rescue for exiles. Like them, Jeremiah is imprisoned and carted off to exile against his will. He keeps his life and promises those who submit to Babylon that they will keep their lives as a prize of war (38:2; 39:18; 45:5). Both his word and actions in the midst of suffering signify their possibilities of survival.

Holladay (1989: 286–7) notices the great amount of realistic detail found in these stories. He also observes that Jeremiah is not portrayed as a hero, nor his enemies as villains, nor is Jeremiah's death reported. If, however, the accounts are not biography in a modern sense but concerned with showing exiles a way into the future, a report of Jeremiah's death would destroy the narrative's effect. It is Jeremiah's survival in captivity and his confidence that justice will be done among the nations that are central to the prophet's portrayal in these final narrative sections of the book. Whereas the little book of consolation promises that future life will be radiantly idyllic, the Baruch document focuses on immediate problems of brute survival.

(37:1–39:18) Life as a Prize of War King Zedekiah imprisons Jeremiah on two separate occasions (chs. 37–8), but ironically the two characters exchange places when the Babylonians invade the city (ch. 39). Puzzling similarities between chs. 37 and 38 have led some interpreters to see them as duplicate accounts of the same story (Condamin 1920: 275). In both chapters Jeremiah is arrested, accused of treason before princes, imprisoned, and released, and in both he consults with Zedekiah in similar terms (Thompson 1980: 636). The chapters are not identical, however: ch. 38 advances the narrative by increasing the gulf separating king and prophet and by setting into motion the fulfilment of the prophetic word. An unidentified third-person narrator, presumably Baruch, relates events and portrays dialogues between characters but provides no lengthy speeches in the voices of either YHWH or Jeremiah. Although divine speech moves to the background in these stories, it is, none the less, the potent force behind events.

(37:1–21) The superscription (vv. 1–2) dates the two chapters to Zedekiah's rule during the siege. This date reveals that, from the beginning of his reign, Zedekiah was no better than his predecessor Jehoiakim. He neither obeys the prophetic word (Carroll 1986: 671) nor fulfils his responsibility to lead the nation to listen (v. 2). Ch. 37 contains three scenes: two of Zedekiah's consultations with Jeremiah (vv. 3–10, 17–21) frame the scene of Jeremiah's imprisonment (vv. 11–16). Even the chapter's literary structure, therefore, artistically hints at the king's efforts to squeeze a desirable word from the prophet and to suppress the true word.

vv. 3–10 (Consultation), on the occasion of Egyptian efforts to deflect the Babylonian army from Jerusalem, Zedekiah sends messengers to request prayer from Jeremiah. This international power struggle gives Zedekiah hope that Egypt will overcome Babylonian hegemony and avert the threat to Judah. Jeremiah's reply to Zedekiah is unequivocal. Babylon will prevail because that is YHWH's plan. Even if the Babylonian army had no one left but the wounded, they would miraculously rise up and burn the city (v. 10). vv. 11–16 (Captivity), after this emphatic crushing of false hope, Jeremiah attempts to leave Jerusalem to visit his property in Benjamin (JER 32). A sentinel believes Jeremiah is deserting (v. 13). When the sentinel refuses to listen, he illustrates the point made in 37:2. Officials, even more disrespectful of the prophet and the word, beat and imprison Jeremiah and thereby attempt to repress the divine word (vv. 15–16). vv. 17–21 (Consultation), Zedekiah's second consultation with the prophet is held in secret. The king claims to desire a word from YHWH but not the word Jeremiah offers. Faithful to his mission despite the danger he faces, Jeremiah does not waver in his message (v. 17). Instead, he protests his illegal imprisonment (v. 18; Diamond 1993), chides the king regarding his lying prophets, and survives with his life.

(38:1–28) does not flow easily from the previous chapter because there Jeremiah is captive, but here he is freely preaching to the people and taken captive again without being released in between. Although 38:9 implies a lapse of time between arrests, chronological depiction of events is clearly not a purpose of these chapters. Chapter 38 contains three scenes: capture, rescue, and consultation.

vv. 1–6 (Capture), four officials hear Jeremiah's admonitions to the people about survival. Any one who stays in the city will die, but those who surrender will save their lives 'as the prize of war' (v. 2). The officials charge Jeremiah with lowering morale and seeking harm instead of shalom (v. 4). Diamond (1993) observes that the story contains conflicting views of prophecy. The officials believe that the prophet's role is to secure the state's safety, but Jeremiah's intercession secures its doom. The king, in turn, listens to the officials rather than to the prophet and allows them to imprison Jeremiah in a cistern, where he sinks in the mud (v. 6). The literary detail of the mud reveals that Jeremiah has reached the nadir of suffering and humiliation. All is lost. Death awaits and future hopes are extinguished. vv. 7–13 (Rescue), inexplicably and with no prior narrative intimations, an Ethiopian servant of the king, named Ebed-melech, dramatically rescues Jeremiah from certain death. Using ropes made of rags from the king's wardrobe, perhaps a signal of the mon-archy's true condition, Ebed-melech gets help and lifts Jeremiah out of the cistern. Jeremiah does not gain immediate freedom but against all expectations has gained his life. Ebed-melech's name, meaning 'servant of the king', is probably ironic here. What king does he serve, Zedekiah or YHWH? As a non-Israelite and an African slave, without explanation Ebed-melech risks his own life to save Jeremiah. Does his intervention indicate the possibility of survival (Carroll 1986: 690) for the exiles? Does his deed signify that rescue of exilic captives will occur with equal surprise from quarters they can barely imagine?

vv. 14–28 (Consultation), prophet and king meet for secretive conversation. Both are in danger: Jeremiah from Zedekiah and Zedekiah from the invaders. Zedekiah secretly swears by the God who 'lives' to protect Jeremiah's life (nepeš, v. 16). Jeremiah, in turn, promises Zedekiah that he will save his own life (nepeš) and city, if he surrenders to Babylon (vv. 17–18). Zedekiah is afraid of the Babylonians and Jeremiah assures him of his safety (nepeš) if he surrenders (vv. 19–20). Jeremiah then reports a vision that reveals the consequences of refusal and foreshadows the reversal of fortunes that occurs in ch. 39. The women of the king's house will be captured and will taunt the king with poetry that echoes the language of Jeremiah's enemies. The king's friends have seduced and overcome him (cf. 20:7–11). Now the king's feet are stuck in the mud (v. 22). In Jeremiah's vision, he and Zedekiah exchange places. The one who caused Jeremiah's capture will himself be captured and sink in the mud. Consultation ends in a stalemate. The king orders Jeremiah to keep their exchange secret and Jeremiah obeys, remaining in the court of the guard until Jerusalem falls. At this point, the narrative appears to drift off in indecision, but in quiet understatement the last phrase announces the king's failure and the prophet's triumph (v. 28). The fall of the city results in Jeremiah's release, the king's capture, and the fulfilment of the prophetic word.

(39:1–18) The Fall of Jerusalem Ch. 39 follows ch. 38 chronologically and thematically. In unadorned prose it describes Babylon's invasion of Jerusalem and its consequences, particularly for Zedekiah (vv. 1–10) and Jeremiah (vv. 11–18). Anticipated role-reversals occur here. In this narrative the invasion serves as background to larger issues (Carroll 1986; see Jer 52:4–16 and 2 Kings 25:1–12).

vv. 1–10 (Zedekiah captured), vv. 1–3 telescope events from the invasion's beginning in the ninth year of Zedekiah to the capture and occupation of the city by Babylonian officials two years later. The narrative's main interest is not the battle but the king's cowardly behaviour, escape, and capture (vv. 4–5). The prophetic word proves inescapable. Zedekiah's offspring are killed and he is blinded, thus marking in his flesh what had already been true of his spirit. The fate of city and inhabitants follows that of the king. Houses are burned and people are exiled. Only the poor remain, and Nebuzaradan, captain of the guard, then gives them land (vv. 8–10). vv. 11–18 (Jeremiah freed), as Zedekiah is imprisoned by Nebuzaradan, Jeremiah simultaneously gains release and protection from the same captain at the command of Nebuchadnezzar (vv. 11–13). Jeremiah is put under the protection of Gedaliah, the Jewish governor appointed by Babylon, and son of Ahikam (see JER 26:24). Jeremiah goes home with his people (v. 14), contradicting the report that all but the poor were left in the land (v. 10). But the importance of Jeremiah's release and return home are symbolic. Jeremiah's behaviour illustrates how to survive. By submitting to Babylon, he has escaped with his life as the prize of war and returned home (vv. 11–14). The Ebed-melech sequel (vv. 15–18) lends strength to this interpretation. After his release, Jeremiah receives a divine message for his Ethiopian rescuer (see 38:7–13). Although the fate of the city is sealed, Ebed-melech will escape with his life as a prize of war because he trusted in YHWH (v. 18). It is that confidence that the exiles must emulate, and they too will gain a future. The many themes of these narratives unite in this rhetorical effort to persuade the exiles to submit to Babylon as the only avenue forward.

(40:1–41:18) The Monarchy's Perversity These chapters describe events in the land after the Babylonian invasion. They continue to urge submission to Babylon and depict chaos in the occupied land.

(40:1–6) retells the story of Jeremiah's release (39:11–14) with significant alteration and elaboration of detail, indicating again the narrative's lack of concern for precise biographical reporting. In this version, Jeremiah is released, not from the court of the guard (39:14) but from among the fettered captives in Ramah who are about to be exiled. With great prescience, Nebuzaradan interprets the fall of Judah in Jeremianic terms, treating Jeremiah as if he were one of the sinners responsible for the nation's fall rather than the one who called for repentance (vv. 2–3). This passage fully identifies Jeremiah with the exiles. Nebuzaradan gives him the choice of remaining in the land or going into exile, but if he stays in the land he must give his loyalty to the Babylonian appointee, Gedaliah (vv. 4–5). Unlike ch. 24 where Jeremiah portrays those who stay in the land as bad figs, here Jeremiah chooses to be among them, and they are portrayed as faithful people, except for the remnants of the royal family and followers. Submission to Babylon, however, remains a constant requirement for survival.

(40:7–12) Peace in the Land Numbers of people, poor and notable, as well as a remnant of the troops, come under Gedaliah's protection and experience temporary prosperity and peace in the land (vv. 7–9). In terms reminiscent of Jeremiah's letter to the exiles (29:4–6), Gedaliah urges the survivors to serve the Chaldeans without fear. Returnees from neighbouring countries gather under Gedaliah's protection and live with abundance of wine and summer fruit (vv. 10–12). Once again survival and a future depend upon submission to Babylon whether in the land or out. But Ishmael, a descendent of the royal family, destroys the possibility of peace in the land (vv. 13–16). When Gedaliah learns about Ishmael's plot against him, he shows himself to be trusting and loyal. He disbelieves the threat and defends Ishmael. The contrast between the Babylonian appointee and the monarchical family survivor could not be more pointed, lending credence to Pohlmann's view that these narratives support the Babylonian exiles over those who remain in the land.

(41:1–17) Chaos in the Land In graphic terms, this chapter portrays treachery, conflict, and betrayal within the Jewish community after the fall. Details of the narrative reveal Ishmael's craven wickedness as he brutally assassinates Gedaliah and massacres pilgrims on the way to offer worship (vv. 4–7). Although Jeremiah is under the protection of Gedaliah, he is conspicuously absent from this narrative and appears again only in ch. 42. Were the narrative to portray Jeremiah's death, he would not save his life as a prize of war, and would not function as a clear model for the exiles. Whatever historical memories underlie this narrative of conflict among survivors, the intentions of the text are to ridicule the anti-Babylonian survivor of the royal family whose 'crimes' (v. 11) reveal his brutal resistance to the prophetic word.

Ishmael and his followers assassinate Gedaliah and his companions at Mizpah. They choose a mealtime for their deed, when covenant community is celebrated and the guard is down (vv. 1–2). Next they murder 'all the Judeans' and Babylonian soldiers at Mizpah (v. 3). Then they slaughter eighty Israelites on pilgrimage to the temple and desecrate their bodies by dumping them in a cistern with an ancient sacred tradition, thus also desecrating the cistern (vv. 4–9). Opportunist that he is, Ishmael spares only men with food stores (v. 8). After making hostages of people remaining at Mizpah, the royal claimant tries to escape to his foreign supporters in neighbouring Ammon (v. 10; cf. 40:11). Johanan son of Kareah and military forces pursue him and rescue the happy hostages (v. 13), but Ishmael escapes to Ammon (v. 15). The bloodbath leaves its survivors in terror of the Chaldeans (v. 18) and sets in motion forces that are played out in the next chapters. The remnant intends to escape to Egypt (v. 17).

(42:1–44:30) Emigration to Egypt Divine rejection of emigration to Egypt unifies these chapters. Paradoxically, Jeremiah and Baruch are forced to join the condemned group. Pohlmann (1978); Nicholson (1975); and Carroll (1986) view these chapters as propaganda in favour of the Babylonian exiles over against groups that remained in Judah or went to Egypt. McKane (1986: 1064) proposes that the text attacks Egypt, not the exiles, but ch. 44 argues against that view. These chapters create close parallels between the fate of the Egyptian émigrés and the fate of the citizens of Judah before the fall (Keown, Scalise, and Smothers 1995: 250–2). They refuse to listen, engage in idolatry, and serve the queen of heaven, and they are promised a dreadful fate even as they search for safety. At the same time Jeremiah and Baruch, though faithful, suffer forced exile. Ch. 42 portrays the survivors' rejection of the prophetic word (Brueggemann 1988: 174–5); ch. 43 portrays Jeremiah's forced emigration, and ch. 44 denounces idolatry.

(42:1–22) Jeremiah's Intercession All the survivors of Ishmael's bloody devastation, 'from the least to the greatest', including Johanan, go to Jeremiah for advice regarding their planned escape to Egypt. The story begins with the survivors' request that Jeremiah intercede on their behalf. They make a dramatic oath to 'obey' whatever message they receive, setting a curse upon themselves if they do not (vv. 1–6) and underscoring their subsequent disobedience.

Jeremiah does not reply hastily to the request but goes away for ten days and returns with the divine response (vv. 7–22). The response repeats themes and motifs that occur earlier in the book but which are used here in the new conflict between life in the land and escape to Egypt. YHWH promises to 'build' and to 'plant' the survivors only if they remain in the land. Since Jeremiah had previously advised exiles that they would prosper only in Babylon, this is puzzling counsel. Now life in the land under Babylon is a preferred alternative to escape to Egypt. And another new element enters the narrative. YHWH grieves over the disaster 'I... brought upon you' (v. 10). This verse portrays YHWH as repentant of divine action against the people and uses YHWH's empathy to further motivate submission to Babylon. Submission will gain mercy and restoration to their native soil (vv. 11–12). But if the Judeans go to Egypt where they expect to escape suffering, they will find sword, famine, and pestilence (vv. 13–15). vv. 18–22 continue divine advice to the remnant of Judah against the fatal mistake of escape to Egypt. There is no escape from Babylon.

(43:1–13) Jeremiah and Baruch Become Exiles Suddenly Johanan, who acted heroically in ch. 42, speaks insolently. He and other leaders of the remnant accuse Jeremiah of lying, and they charge Baruch with inciting Jeremiah to betray them to the Babylonians (vv. 1–3). In Brueggemann's terms (1994), the opponents accuse Baruch, not Jeremiah, of socio-political bias in favour of Babylon. This suggests that Jeremiah's memory is too sacred to attack but that his scribal successors, represented by Baruch, are in open contest over the control of the future. Then Johanan, the leaders, and the remnant, described in terms that seem to ignore the massacres of ch. 42, disobey Jeremiah, forcing him and Baruch to escape with them to Egypt (vv. 4–7). In a massive contradiction of his own preaching, Jeremiah meets a fate similar to the Babylonian exiles. He and Baruch are taken from the land against their will and forced where they do not wish to go. They escape none of the pain of their people. They disappear with their lives to a place already condemned.

In Egypt Jeremiah continues to prophesy, and directs rather than performs a symbolic action (vv. 8–13). In full view of the Judeans, the directee, presumably Baruch, is to bury stones at the gate to Pharaoh's palace at Tahpanhes (vv. 8–9) and then explain the action. The dreaded King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon will come to Egypt and establish his throne over those buried stones. What YHWH promised in 42:15–17, 22 will happen at the hand of Nebuchadnezzar (v. 11) who will destroy the Egyptian deities (vv. 12–13).

(44:1–30) Idolatry in Egypt Jeremiah delivers a final message to Judeans living in Egypt. A preamble explains the recent disaster that befell Jerusalem and Judah as the consequence of the wickedness of its inhabitants (vv. 1–6). vv. 7–10 continue the harangue but speak directly to the circumstances of the remnant in Egypt who are threatened with extinction because of idolatry and forgetfulness of their history of sin. Their sin will cause all but a few fugitives to perish (vv. 11–14). vv. 15–30, worship of the queen of heaven exemplifies the idolatry that causes the destruction of the Egyptian refugees. (On the identity of the queen of heaven see Ackerman 1987; Keown, Scalise, and Smothers 1995: 266–7; and Smith 1990: 145, 55). Jeremiah accuses the people of Jerusalem of this crime in the temple sermon (7:1–8:3), but in that text it is entire families that are engaged in idolatry. Here women are the chief practitioners and defenders of idolatrous practices. The narrative intends to reveal the depth of idolatrous thinking, but it also shows women with minds of their own and spiritual resources to which they hold fast (O'Connor 1992). The women speak for themselves reporting that life collapsed when they stopped worshipping the queen of heaven. They would, therefore, continue to make cakes for her and offer libations. The text portrays the women as brazen violators of the covenant who implicate their husbands in their practices, revealing the husbands to be weak but not idolators themselves (vv. 15–19).

Jeremiah replies that it is exactly that history of idolatry that led to the destruction of the city (vv. 2–23; see Keown, Scalise, and Smothers 1995: 263 on parallels with Ezekiel). Furthermore, they can surely continue these wicked practices in Egypt and with the same certainty of extinction. Upon them will settle the curses of YHWH. Pharaoh will meet the same fate as Zedekiah at the hands of Nebuchadnezzar (vv. 24–30). This chapter announces the end of Judean life in Egypt. The believing community will disappear, for YHWH's name will never again be pronounced on their lips (v. 26). They have no future because they have turned from YHWH, disregarded the prophets, and engaged in deliberate, calculated idolatry. They are inheritors of idolatry and their departure from the land plunges them further into the family perversity. They, not YHWH, have created the end of their own history. The divine word will triumph (Carroll 1986: 743). Despite Jeremiah's attacks on the Egyptian exiles, a thriving and productive Jewish community continued.

(45:1–5) Baruch and the Scroll Ch. 45 concludes chs. 26–44 by asserting that the prophetic word will survive because Baruch will 'gain his life as a prize of war' (v. 5). The chapter contains a lament by Baruch and reassurance by Jeremiah. The date is the fourth year of Jehoiakim 'when he wrote these words in a scroll at the dictation of Jeremiah' (v. 1). The scroll probably refers to the second scroll that Jeremiah and Baruch created after Jehoiakim burned the first (36:32). The scroll contains Jeremiah's original message and additional words as well. As the written expansion of Jeremiah's message for later audiences, the scroll survives and Jeremiah's prophetic mantle has been handed on.

Like Jeremiah, Baruch utters a lament of sorrow, pain, and weariness (vv. 2–3) that follows upon the utterances of curses upon his own people (ch. 44). Through Jeremiah, YHWH replies, using the principal motifs of the book, 'I am going to break down... and pluck up... the whole land' (v. 4). Deconstruction and demolition of the land, of the way of life, of the symbolic world of Judah cannot be avoided, not even by escape to Egypt. The only way out of suffering is through its very centre. Baruch is then admonished not to seek 'great things' for himself. This probably means that he should not consider himself to be Jeremiah's replacement but only the conduit of Jeremiah's message. Baruch's reward is not grand but it is precious. He will survive. He will gain his life 'as a prize of war', wherever he goes (v. 5).

With this lament and response, the main part of the book closes on a sombre note. Baruch is the world-weary survivor who is promised only his life, not escape, not return, not restoration of fortunes. Only life, endurance through difficulties, that is the prize in the midst of exhaustion from the disaster that will come 'upon all flesh' (v. 5). The Baruch narratives end with a most chastened hope that leaves the lyrical utopian vision of chs. 30–3 far from sight. The mood is of subdued trauma, emotional devastation after cascading catastrophes, quiet after the passing of divine wrath. There is not yet energy for rebuilding or planting. There is little space for dancing or laughing. Now there is only waiting.

But survival is assured by the stories in chs. 37–45. Jeremiah, Baruch, Ebed-melech, and a remnant survive. Yet survivors must still obey Jeremiah's message or further destruction awaits. The next section of the book, the Oracles Against the Nations, confirms survival of the faithful who wait in obedience. It implies a reversal of fortunes for them because YHWH is 'going to bring disaster upon all flesh' (v. 5). Israel and Judah are no longer the target as all present power arrangements are about to be overthrown (Brueggemann 1991: 210).

(46:1–51:64) Oracles Against the Nations Common in prophetic literature (Isa 13–23; Ezek 25–32; Am 1–2; and Zeph 2:2–15), the Oracles proclaim unequivocally that YHWH is ruler of the nations. In the book of Jeremiah, this complex genre gains special importance from Jeremiah's title, 'prophet to the nations' (1:10; McKane 1986: clxv). The LXX places the Oracles at 25:13 in the centre of the book, following the drinking of the poisoned cup by Israel and the nations. By contrast, the MT makes the Oracles the penultimate section of the book and presents them in a different order from the LXX. Carroll (1986: 751–9) and Herrmann (1986: 163–5) have good discussions of these differences as well as genre and themes, and Clements (1988: 245–7) draws attention to the significant differences in tone, theme, and theology among the Oracles.

Despite modern resistance to theological themes of vengeance, anger, and retribution, Bellis (1995) shows that the Oracles in Jeremiah, particularly those against Babylon, serve important rhetorical, literary, and theological functions. They seek to build up the weak faith of Israel, and they defend God against charges of injustice. Located at the book's conclusion, they bring satisfactory closure to the captive nation's hopes. YHWH is the principal speaker throughout the poems, giving them the authority of divine speech. YHWH's voice announces that foreign nations had been instruments of divine punishment of Israel and Judah, but soon tables will turn to create a different future. The Oracles address Judah's neighbours first (chs. 46–9) and culminate in oracles against Babylon (50–1).

(Chs. 46–9) Oracles Against Judah's Neighbours The predominant metaphor across these texts is that of the cosmic battle. As Carroll (1986: 754) points out, this is one of many shared poetic elements between the Oracles and chs. 4–6, 8–10. Now the mythic enemy from the north will stalk Israel's neighbours.

(46:1–25) Oracles Against Egypt This chapter contains poems against Egypt that bring to fulfilment Jeremiah's prophecies to the Judean remnant that escaped to Egypt (chs. 43–4). Babylon will destroy their safe refuge. v. 1 introduces the entire collection of Oracles Against the Nations. The remainder of the chapter comprises three poems, two concerning Egypt (vv. 3–12, 14–24) and one concerning Israel (vv. 27–8). Prose comments link the poems (46:2, 13, 25–6).

v. 2 dates the first poem (vv. 3–12) to the year 605, the fourth year of Jehoiakim and a code for the year of judgement (Taylor 1987). In that year Babylon defeated Egypt at Carchemish, gaining control of Syria–Palestine and destroying Egypt's power in the region. This dating, therefore, places Jeremiah's interpretation of Egypt's history well in advance of events about which it prophesies. It implies that YHWH has plans, long known and foretold, that will determine the fate of nations and reverse Israel's fate. For an exilic audience, the oracle's date confirms its reliability and offers hope that their enemies will be defeated and their God will triumph. vv. 3–12, the day of YHWH begins with a battle scene (vv. 3–6) in which a voice, presumably YHWH's, calls to military troops to prepare for battle. It is not clear which army is being addressed, the Egyptian for the defence or the Babylonian for the attack. Parallel commands in the second stanza (v. 9) suggest that Egypt is called to battle only to face defeat. Babylon is never named in this poem because, as Carroll (1986: 763) points out, the real enemy is YHWH. A few vivid words describe defeat in the north as they stumble and fall (vv. 5–6).

vv. 7–12, the famed swelling and waning of the Nile describes the rise and fall of Egypt, the foreign power that intended to 'cover the earth' with destruction, but which is now under attack in the day of YHWH. Egypt again prepares for battle but has no possibility of defending itself. The enemy is not human but divine. YHWH gains 'vindication' for foes, offering a sacrifice in the 'land of the north' (vv. 9–10). In mocking reuse of the poem of Judah's wound (8:22), Egypt is sent to Gilead for a healing balm, but there is no healing for her (v. 11). Female imagery reappears in describing the wounded nation's reversal of fortunes. Egypt is 'virgin daughter', vulnerable and shameful (vv. 11–12). vv. 13–25, Egypt's exile: a prose frame that specifies Egypt's human assailant as Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon (vv. 13, 25) encompasses the second oracle against Egypt. Because the battle is in the divine sphere, the human agent Babylon remains in the margins of both power and poem (vv. 13, 25). In the poetry itself the battle is cosmic and heavenly. On the mythic day of YHWH the deities of Egypt and Israel enact the siege. A command to announce the battle in Egypt's major cities opens the poem (v. 14). Egypt's defeat is certain, for YHWH has 'thrust down' Egypt's bull-god, Apis (v. 15; on Egyptian deities and cities, see Thompson 1980: 691–4). Nor is the deified Pharaoh, called 'King Bombast' (NEB), a match for the true king YHWH (v. 18). Pharaoh's power is mere braggadocio; YHWH's power is genuine and international. YHWH sends the agent of destruction to advance upon Memphis and send Egypt into exile (v. 19). Female metaphors again describe Egypt's vulnerability and shame (vv. 20–4). She is a beautiful heifer, and like her, her soldiers are fat and well-paid. They cannot withstand 'the gadfly from the north' (vv. 20–1). Egypt makes a noise like a retreating snake in front of her enemies (vv. 22–3). Daughter Egypt is shamed and taken captive by the mythic enemy from the north (v. 24).

The historical prose frame makes no promise of Egypt's survival (v. 25). Egypt's great crime in these poems is not equivalent to the crimes of Israel and Judah in the book of Jeremiah. Its offences are hubris, personified in its pharaoh (v. 17), and false claims to power over the earth and its civilizations (v. 8). Its gods are not declared false, but before powerful YHWH they are powerless. YHWH rules the world (v. 18). For exiles, these would be hope-restoring words. vv. 27–8, comfort for Israel: Israel/Jacob, by contrast to exiled Egypt, will return. This poem promises comfort, restoration, and a quiet, fearless future for the dismayed exiles of Israel (v. 27). Jacob is YHWH's servant; YHWH is with him (v. 28). Retribution and the turning of the tables is at hand, for YHWH will make an end of all the nations 'among which I banished you' for punishment (v. 28). This short poem of reversal offers redactional clues to the interpretation of the whole collection of Oracles Against Nations. The poem assumes restoration of covenant relationship between YHWH and Israel and interprets the national tragedy as divine punishment that will soon end. It affirms that YHWH is just. The poem promises an international reversal of fortunes, punishment for the punishers. It asserts divine control of history and obliquely suggests that the nations were out of hand and now, in turn, deserve punishment. Hence, the audience of the oracles is Judah, not the nations themselves. The oracles function to give hope, encourage endurance, and reassert the justice of God who continues to elect them as a special people among all the nations. What is at stake here is identity politics, a global vision that places the survivors of the destroyed nation of Israel at the head of YHWH's people.

(47:1–7) Oracle Against the Philistines This poem presents historical perplexities, not the least of which relates to the superscription that describes the attack as coming from Egypt in the south (v. 1), whereas the poem describes the mythic attack from the north (Carroll 1986: 777). Why Philistia is included at all in the list of enemies is not clear (Keown, Scalise, and Smothers 1995: 299). What is certain is that the attack ultimately comes from warrior YHWH. The invasion is like an overflowing, raging river that will destroy all in its path (v. 2; cf. 46:7–8). The day of YHWH has come. People scatter at the noise of the army and abandon children in fear. The poem provides no clear reason for the attack, but it ends with the 'song of the sword'. In a poignant personification of YHWH's weapon, an unidentified speaker begs the sword to be still but recognizes that the sword is unable to countermand YHWH's plans for it (vv. 6–7).

(48:1–47) Oracles Against Moab This chapter, comprising a loose collection of prose and poetry, contains the book's second lengthiest description of attack against a foreign nation. Only the poems about the destruction of Babylon are longer (chs. 50–1). (See Keown, Scalise, and Smothers (1995: 308–10) for a discussion of literary forms, division of passages, and Moabite place-names.) Moab's status as a traditional and bitter enemy of Israel may explain the rancorous tone of these Oracles. There is significant echoing of texts from several other OT passages in this chapter, and numerous parallels with Isa 15–16 (Holladay 1989: 346; Thompson 1980: 700). Despite textual difficulties, the general argument of the chapter is clear. YHWH will visit punishment upon Moab.

In vv. 1–2 YHWH announces the invasion of Moab's major cities, plots against the nation, and destruction by the sword. Another voice cries out in alarm that great desolation, destruction, and wild fleeing for safety is occurring in Moab (vv. 3–6). Moab's crime arises from its own arrogance concerning its power and wealth (Brueggemann 1988: 243). For this idolatrous hubris, its god Chemosh will go into exile (v. 7). There will be no escape and salt will cover the desolate country to make it a barren place (v. 9). Known for its viniculture (Keown, Scalise, and Smothers, 1995), Moab has a history of complacency described in terms of a wine that will soon be decanted (vv. 11–12). v. 14 returns to language of warfare. Soldiers speak through the ventriloquism of the poet who mocks them. They think they are mighty warriors but YHWH, 'LORD of Hosts', the head of armies, has sent the destroyer (v. 15). Readers are to mourn over Moab for its great power is broken (v. 17).

In vv. 18–20, YHWH addresses the city, daughter Dibon, for she too is under attack and put to shame. A prose comment in vv. 21–7 names the destroyed cities to illustrate the destruction of Moab's power. In retaliation for its mockery of innocent Israel, Moab will be forced to drink until sick with drunkenness (cf. 25:22).

YHWH next speaks to Moab's inhabitants, urging them to flee and accusing them, with repetitive insistence, of false pride (vv. 28–33). YHWH wails for Moab as gladness, joy, and wine presses are removed from the land (vv. 31–3). In prose, vv. 34–9 elaborate on YHWH's lament by naming the cities crying out in the disaster. In poetry again, YHWH announces that an eagle will swoop down on Moab to terrify and destroy 'because he magnified himself against the LORD' (vv. 40–2). No one among them can escape the pit (vv. 43–4); all will perish (vv. 45–6). But the oracles against Moab come to a truly surprising conclusion for, in the last line, YHWH promises to restore the fortunes of Moab (v. 47). Carroll (1986: 796) interprets this reversal of fortune as a simple recognition that Moab survives. Theologically the verse affirms divine desires for the well-being of nations beyond Judah.

(49:1–39) contains a series of short Oracles against several peoples: Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Arab tribes, and Elam.

(49:1–6) Against the Ammonites The history of relations between Israel and Ammon was bitter. The book of Jeremiah implicates the Ammonites in Gedaliah's assassination (40:13–41:3; Thompson 1980: 715–16 provides a history of the relationship). The major theme of the poem is punishment of Ammon for land-grabbing. In a disingenuous rhetorical question, YHWH asks if Israel is without an heir. The next verse provides motivation for the question: why has Ammon's capital city taken over Gad, presumably from Israel? For the crime of wrongful land acquisition, YHWH will invade the city of Rabbah, reduce it to ruin, and give the land back to Israel (vv. 1–2). Mourning and exile will follow as Ammonite locations are destroyed. Like other nations, Ammon's pride and false boasting will bring disaster upon the 'faithless daughter' (v. 4). Female imagery again underscores the terror and vulnerability of a people about to be attacked. But like Moab (48:47), Ammon will later have its fortunes restored (v. 6).

(49:7–22) Against Edom Two poems (vv. 7–11, 14–16) and two prose comments (vv. 12–13, 17–22; but see Thompson 1980: 719) portray YHWH's obliterating punishment of Edom. On the troubled history of relations between Israel and Edom, see the book of Obadiah and ibid. 720. The Edomites are the offspring of Jacob's brother Esau (Gen 36). YHWH questions the disappearance of wisdom from Edom, perhaps a wisdom derived from its ancestral connection to Jacob. YHWH will be the one to bring calamity upon them (vv. 7–8). Unlike grape-gatherers or thieves who leave something after they work, YHWH will completely pillage Edom, here called Esau (vv. 9–10). Orphans and widows alone will remain, signifying the end of the people (v. 11). vv. 12–13 are a prose comment that links this text with the destructive drinking bout (25:21). If even the innocent must drink the cup of punishment, how can Edom expect to escape? Who might be innocent is not revealed, but perhaps the prose writer believes that Judah's exiles are innocent of the totality of the disaster that befell them.

vv. 14–16 announce in poetry the sending of an unnamed messenger among the nations. By implication, Jeremiah is the messenger, sent to announce the cosmic battle in which YHWH will reduce Edom to the least among the nations. A lengthy prose comment compares Edom's destruction to the ruin of the wicked Sodom and Gomorrah (v. 18, cf. Gen 19) and to the decimation of a flock (vv. 20–1). The agent of this apocalyptic catastrophe (v. 29) is YHWH who will attack like a lion (v. 19) and swoop down like an eagle, turning warriors into frightened women (v. 22). The poem never names Edom's sin.

(49:23–7) Against Damascus The poem against Damascus also uses female imagery to reveal the weakness, panic, and grief that will befall Syria's capital city. This poem also omits the sin that provokes the destroying fire (v. 27).

(49:28–33) Against Kedar and Hazor In the list of Nebuchadnezzar's triumphs in the Oracles (v. 28), Kedar and Hazor join Egypt among those attacked (46:2; see Thompson 1980: 726–7 on peoples and places). The superscription identifies Nebuchadnezzar as the addressee of the poem's commands to attack. He is to 'rise up, advance' against both the tribe of Kedar (v. 29) and the people of Hazor (v. 31). As the human agent of the attack, Nebuchadnezzar merely followed YHWH's commands (v. 30). Kedar and Hazor will lose their herds of camels and cattle (vv. 29, 32) and both peoples will be dispersed (vv. 30, 33). No reasons for their fate appear in the poem, unless being at ease (v. 31) implies a profligate arrogance.

(49:34–9) Against Elam A prose passage interprets theologically the international turmoil created by Babylon's imperialism. The comment is set in the reign of Zedekiah, just after Babylon's first invasion of Judah in 597, and describes Elam's devastation in cosmic and meteorological terms. The four winds of heaven, not historical agents, will be YHWH's instruments in Elam's destruction. After this colossal disaster, YHWH will restore its fortunes (v. 39).

(50:1–51:64) Against Babylon Long thought to be misplaced, derivative, and monotonous, these two chapters contain Oracles that form a fitting theological conclusion to the book (Bellis 1995; Reimer 1993). Here the punisher is punished; the destroyer is destroyed; the inflicter of pain receives pain. Although previous texts understood Babylon as YHWH's agent and Nebuchadnezzar as YHWH's servant, these chapters see them as perpetrators of evil against innocent, oppressed Israel. No longer does the text emphasize Israel's sinfulness, though that theme does not disappear entirely (50:7; 51:5).

Chs. 50–1 portray the deity as a God of recompense, the warrior God, who sets right the world's injustices and restores the well-being of the chosen people. Despite the vengeful nature of the material and theological difficulties created by a seemingly fickle divine reversal in relation to Babylon, these passages are good news for the exiles. They no longer explain why Judah's tragedy occurred, but, like chs. 30–3, they look beyond the tragedy to a new future. In them is expressed a biblical hope, a glimpsed confidence, that the present reality does not exhaust reality, that just out of sight, beyond comprehension, dwells the God of justice (Brueggemann 1991).

Keown, Scalise, and Smothers (1995) summarize problems in interpretation, particularly in delimiting literary units. Carroll (1986) dates the poems to the post-exilic period and suggests that they may have functioned as songs of celebration upon Babylon's defeat. Bellis (1995) and Aitken (1984) find structural and thematic unity among the poems. Bellis (1995: 216–27) and Keown, Scalise, and Smothers (1995) identify similar poetic units: 50:2–20, 21–32, 33–46; 51:1–33 (Bellis divides at v. 19); 34–58 (Keown, Scalise, and Smothers divide at v. 44). The great difficulty in agreeing upon a structure reveals the complicated nature of the collection. It is perhaps best viewed as a loose unity of voices, an interpretative conversation that moves from promises of attack on Babylon, through preparations for military onslaught, to a portrayal of Babylon's ultimate doom. The cosmic battle, this time between the enemy from the north and Babylon, between YHWH and the Babylonian deity Bel/Merodach, serves as an organizing metaphor for the chapters. Interwoven with poetic imaginings of Babylon's fate, are poetic and prose accounts of Israel's escape from captivity. Rhetorically, the chapters seek to create hope by inverting the fate of the exiles over that of Babylon.

(50:1–46) The Enemy from the North An undated superscription emphatically relates 50:2–51:64 to Babylon (v. 1). vv. 2–20, whether this material is all poetry (Bellis 1995, Keown, Scalise, and Smothers 1995), or partly prose (NRSV; Carroll 1986) is not certain. A simple declaration of celebration by YHWH opens the poem. Coming after this long book in which Babylon has dominated Judah and the nations around it, the words compress immense feeling. Babylon is taken; her gods are shamed (v. 2). Using verbs of completed action, the text pictures already accomplished destruction. The agent of that destruction is the mythic foe from the north, an unnamed enemy that will reduce Babylon to a wasteland (v. 3).

In vv. 4–10 YHWH continues to speak but shifts the subject from Babylon to Israel. The fates of Israel and Babylon are connected, for the coming attack on Babylon will signal the return of Israel and Judah. They will come weeping to seal the everlasting covenant with YHWH (cf. Jer 30–3). YHWH refers to the people with empathy. They are lost sheep, led astray by their shepherds/rulers, and attacked by enemies who think themselves guiltless as they punish sinful Israel (vv. 6–7). But now the exiles must flee from Babylon. The enemy from the north comes again as a company of plundering nations that YHWH will bring against Babylon (vv. 8–10). vv. 11–16, direct address shifts to the plunderers of YHWH's heritage. Though they 'frisk about' now, their mother will be shamed, made desolate, and left without inhabitants. YHWH commands the cosmic army to take position for the attack, to raise the shout, to cut off from Babylon the sower and the harvester. In the world of poetry, Babylon's destruction is accomplished and celebration has begun (vv. 14–16).

vv. 17–20, YHWH again speaks about Israel, reinterpreting its history as a series of destructive attacks upon hunted sheep. Perhaps as sheep they are innocent or stupid, but certainly they are helpless and vulnerable, despite guilt ascribed to them by enemies (v. 7). In a reinterpretation of invasions by Assyria and Babylon, YHWH will prevent any one from finding sin among the remnant. They will be pardoned. Earlier interpretations of tragedies of Israel and Judah as the result of sin are not denied, but they are transcended by divine fiat. vv. 21–34, preparations for battle continue and descriptions become more vivid (vv. 20–2). Babylon, ‘the hammer of the whole earth’, is itself cut down. YHWH addresses Babylon directly. The nation is caught in a snare of its own devising (vv. 23–4), so YHWH will conduct the military campaign against it (vv. 25–7), making Babylon’s fall inevitable. v. 28 shifts attention from Babylon and the armies attacking it to the fugitives escaping from it. Already approaching Zion to announce the achievement of divine vengeance, they act as a chorus commenting upon the action. vv. 29–32 return to the scene of battle preparations. Babylon has arrogantly defied the Holy One of Israel so YHWH plans retaliation. Speaking directly to Babylon, YHWH takes a stand against it, the arrogant one (vv. 31–2). Babylon has exceeded its divine commission. Israel’s suffering is no longer entirely of its own making.

Interpretation of international events has come full circle within the book itself. History has a different face in these chapters, for here Israel and Judah are oppressed people, not guilty people. They have a future, unexpected and barely imaginable. Their strong Redeemer, the one who buys back captives, will take their side and give ‘rest’ to the whole earth (v. 34).

vv. 35–40 (The Sword), this curse-like poem gloats over the reversal of fortunes about to take place, as if an incantation of the sword would activate thrusts into the heart of Babylon. The song of the sword involves intricate literary weaving of phrases and forms. The phrase, ‘a sword against’, appears five times and its object is always an element of Chaldean society: the inhabitants, officials, diviners, the military, and the nation’s treasures (vv. 35–7). The second and third verses of the poem (vv. 36, 37) break the monotony of sword imprecations by adding curses that continue through v. 38a. The final verse changes the instrument of attack from sword to drought. The artistically crafted poem concludes with a motive for the devastation to come. For its rampant idolatry, Babylon deserves the sword (v. 38b). A prose comment (vv. 39–40) finds in the poem cause for the destruction that will reduce Babylon to an uninhabited land like Sodom and Gomorrah.

vv. 41–6 (The Foe from the North), the sword approaches in this poem that uses imagery familiar from earlier parts of the book and forms a frame with v. 3. A speaker announces the imminent approach of a people from the north. They are cruel, noisy, and arrayed for battle against daughter Babylon. The king is like a terrified and pain-struck woman in labour (v. 43). Prose verses (44–6) divulge the identity of the agent of destruction. It is YHWH, coming like a lion, sovereign and unbiddable, coming with a divine plan that will make the earth tremble.

(51:1–64) Opposing fates of Babylon and Israel continue to interweave and echo one another in this chapter. For the first time in the book YHWH orders the implied exilic audience to flee Babylon and return to Zion (vv. 6–10, 45–51). Divine power dominates the passages. YHWH, creator of all the earth, alone has the power and wisdom to set the world aright for Israel and all the earth’s peoples. The vengeful violence of captives and their gloating delight at the fall of their vanquishers converge in a theology of divine governance of nations and of divine power to create a future out of nothing which will overturn systems of domination.

vv. 1–5, military preparation: underscoring divine agency, YHWH uses first-person verbs to plan the siege against Babylon. Cosmic and human elements will participate in the invasion (vv. 1–2) to destroy utterly the military power of the Chaldeans (vv. 3–4). Although the poem’s final verse appears to change the subject, it announces the conclusion to be drawn from the promised attack. Despite the guilt of Israel and Judah, YHWH has not abandoned them (v. 5). vv. 6–10, urgent appeals to the exiles follow. To save their lives from the divine vengeance about to engulf Babylon, exiles must flee. Now Babylon, not Judah, is guilty. Although Babylon had been a golden cup in YHWH’s hand (cf. 25:15–29), she has fallen from her insider status (vv. 6–7; Stulman 1995). A voice calls for balm to heal the nation’s wound (cf. 8:23–9). The exiles themselves speak. They had tried to heal Babylon, but it is too late; the patient is dying (v. 9). In a poetic crescendo of urgency and excitement, the captives advise each other to flee to Zion where they will declare their vindication by their God (v. 10).

vv. 11–14, war preparations continue with divine commands that echo preparations for the cosmic battle against Judah in chs. 4–10. YHWH orders the armies to sharpen arrows, raise the standard, post sentinels, and prepare ambushes (vv. 11–12), but here the nameless, perhaps mythic, armies receive historical identification in a prose comment. The Medes will destroy Babylon in YHWH’s retaliation for the temple (v. 11). Victory is assured (v. 14). vv. 15–19, praise of the Creator: perhaps the hymnic language of this poem is voiced by the exiles. The divine agent of battle is the Creator, wise and understanding, whose powerful voice creates tumult and pyrotechnic meteorological events (vv. 15–16). Compared to the Creator, the idols are worthless, a delusion (cf. 3:23; 10:15). The battle between Jacob’s God and the lifeless gods of goldsmiths is already over (vv. 17–19). vv. 20–3, this poem repeats the violent first-person verb and preposition, ‘I smash with you’ (wēnippaštī bēkā) eight times to create a staccato rhythm of destruction. Babylon is the assumed addressee, the divine hammer used to destroy kingdoms, warriors, and ordinary people (McKane 1986: 1310). vv. 24–33, war planning and preparations continue. In first-person speech, YHWH declares divine opposition to superpower Babylon, the ‘destroying mountain’ (vv. 24–5). Nations muster for war (vv. 27–9) and Babylon trembles in panic and fear (vv. 29–33).

vv. 34–44, accusations of Babylonian wrongdoing accelerate. YHWH imagines the speech of the people in Zion describing Nebuchadnezzar’s violence against them and their request for vengeance (vv. 34–5). YHWH promises to take vengeance, drying up Babylon, sending lion-like attackers, making Babylon drunk for its arrogance, and punishing the engorged Babylonian god, Bel. vv. 45–58, again YHWH calls the exiles to depart, to save themselves. They must overcome the fear created by the rumours among them (vv. 45–6). In the eschatological future, YHWH will destroy Babylon. The cosmos will shout for joy (vv. 47–8). But now it is urgent that the exiles do not linger but remember YHWH in Jerusalem (v. 50). The people speak of their shame and the desecration of the temple (v. 51), and YHWH promises punishment of Babylon no matter how mighty it becomes (vv. 52–3).

vv. 54–8, the poetry of the book closes with an imagined portrayal of the attack. There is a cry, a crashing, massive noise, for the destroyer has come against Babylon (v. 56). Her leaders will be made drunk, will sleep never to wake, and Babylon will fall to the ground. vv. 59–64, a symbolic act, described in prose by a third-person narrator, closes the Oracles Against the Nations. The action is performed neither by Jeremiah nor by Baruch but by Baruch's brother Seraiah. Jeremiah sends Seraiah to Babylon with the scroll containing the prophecies against it. Seraiah is to read the scroll aloud, attach a stone to it, and sink the scroll in the Euphrates. The sinking of the scroll mimics the way Babylon itself will sink from its high position. The symbolic act embodies the divine will. It waits only to come to completion.

(52:1–34) The End The end of the book reports in prose the end of national life in Judah, but curiously, neither Jeremiah nor YHWH appears in it. The temporal and geographical setting is exile, and Babylonian defeat is far from sight. The chapter is nearly identical to the account of the nation's fall that concludes the second book of Kings, the final book of the Deuteronomistic history (2 Kings 24:18–25:30). The Jeremiah chapter substitutes an enumeration of exiles for the description of Gedaliah's governorship and assassination (2 Kings 25:22–6). Jer 40:5–41:8 describes the Gedaliah era far more fully. Keown, Scalise, and Smothers (1995) propose that the book of Jeremiah uses a pre-existing narrative because it would have more authority than a newly minted one. Carroll (1986) and Clements (1988) see in the borrowing the signature of Deuteronomistic editors.

The narrative divides into six vignettes: failure of kings (vv. 1–3); Zedekiah's failed escape (vv. 3b–11); deportation of people (vv. 12–16) and of temple vessels (vv. 17–23); execution of officials (vv. 24–7); numbers of exiles (vv. 28–30); Jehoiachin's survival (vv. 31–4).

At first the chapter appears to be a superfluous addition to the book, but it actually functions as vindication of Jeremiah's message (Carroll 1986: 858; Clements 1988: 268). In it Jeremiah's words of judgement against kings, priests, temple, and people find tragic fulfilment. The closing chapter, moreover, describes the destruction of the regnant symbols of the nation. The holy city is invaded. The cowardly king and 'all the soldiers' escape only to be caught; the king's sons are murdered; the king, blind to the word, is himself blinded; and the temple is burned. Many citizens and temple vessels are deported. Officials are executed. The numbers of exiled are listed. The counting of exiles in Jeremiah differs markedly from the enumeration in 2 Kings 24:14 where 10,000 people are said to have been deported rather than the 4,600 in v. 28. The numbers in Kings may be inflated, or the numbers in Jeremiah may count only men (Keown, Scalise, and Smothers 1995: 381). Whatever historical data underlie the account, the narrative simply and vividly depicts the collapse of the nation just as Jeremiah promised. Every element of life that supported and sustained community identity is destroyed by this catastrophe. The promises of Jeremiah's call (Jer 1) have been accomplished.

The bleak narrative of this chapter implies that Israel and Judah will disappear from history, but perhaps a glimmer of hope remains. King Jehoiachin gains his life as a prize of war. Though still captive, he receives honour at the king's table, and an allowance. Like the exiles in Babylon, he survives. The king's release may be symbolic. The book does not end with a triumphal procession back to Zion but with dignified existence in captivity. How to survive the tragedy has been the subject of the book. Its many conflicting voices—of warning and accusation, defending and attacking divine justice, urging submission or resistance to Babylon, blaming the people for their sufferings, and of brief but translucent hope—all give the exiles instructions for survival. They must endure for the future day. Jeremiah's words will not fail.

24. Lamentations

P. M. JOYCE

INTRODUCTION

A. Subject-Matter and Literary Genre. The English title of the book, Lamentations, sums up very well its subject-matter. As is commonly the case, the Hebrew title is taken from its first word, ʾēkā, meaning 'how!' The book consists of a series of complaints about a disaster, which has struck the city of Jerusalem and her people. It comprises five poetic laments, in style similar to many in the psalter. The qinā or lament metre (classically three beats followed by two) characterizes much of the poetry of the book, and is best seen in ch. 3 (Shea 1979). Four of the five chapters are acrostic poems; acrostics typically begin each verse with a different letter of the alphabet, in sequence (Freedman 1986). Some have thought that this elaborate literary form reflects a long development and prolonged polishing (cf. Kaiser 1992). However, it is more likely that this feature is evidence of the drive to establish order in a time of traumatic loss, and so is quite compatible with composition during the immediate aftermath of a great catastrophe.

B. Authorship, Date, and Place of Composition. 1. The work is traditionally ascribed to the prophet Jeremiah (cf. 2 Chr 35:25, and affinities with the so-called 'Confessions of Jeremiah'). We read in the Babylonian Talmud (B. Bat. 14b–15a) that 'Jeremiah wrote the book which bears his name, the book of Kings and Lamentations'. This view is rarely defended today, since the style and thought are somewhat different from the book of Jeremiah. Nevertheless, the consensus view remains that the work takes its starting-point from the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians in 587 BCE. A minority of scholars have looked to the Maccabean period (e.g. Treves 1963), whilst Morgenstern (1956, 1957, 1960) proposed a date of 485 BCE. More recently, Provan has adopted an agnostic view with regard to dating (Provan 1991a: 7–19; cf. S. J. D. Cohen 1982).

2. The work was probably written in Jerusalem during the months and years immediately following the destruction of the temple in 587. There is evidence that people gathered to mourn on the site of the ruined temple during this period (Jer 41:5; cf. Jones 1963; Ackroyd 1968: 26, 47); it is likely that the work was shaped by liturgical use in such a setting (cf. Zech 7:2–5; Joel 2:15–17).

C. Theological Themes. 1. It is clear that the work expresses many questions about the recent disaster and its meaning. There have been various attempts to present the religious teaching of the book in a systematic way. The most influential have been those of N. K. Gottwald and B. Albrektson. Gottwald (1962) proposed that the theological key to the work is provided by Deuteronomistic theology, which presented a 'just deserts' pattern; he argued that the problem in Lamentations is that the disaster, coming so soon after the reforms of the ideal king, Josiah, is perceived as undeserved (cf. 2:20; 5:7). Albrektson (1963), on the other hand, interpreted the book in the light of the old belief in the inviolability of the city of Jerusalem, a belief apparently falsified by the present disaster (cf. 2:15; 4:12). He found this dilemma resolved in the Deuteronomistic view of the catastrophe as a divine judgement (cf. Deut 28:64–5). Both Gottwald and Albrektson gave a clear place to hope in their overall interpretations, and Gerstenberger (1971) argued that the complaint (in contrast to the lament of resignation) is in fact an act of hope. However, it must be recognized that the place of hope is at best ambiguous and fleeting (the clearest cases are found in 3:19–39 and 4:22).

2. The inconsistencies of theme prompt the question as to whether the book will indeed yield a coherent overall message. This (together with inconsistencies of form, especially in chs. 3 and 5) has led some, such as Brandscheidt (1988), to assert that the book is composite. Joyce (1993) has argued that the book's lack of theological consistency is not surprising, drawing upon the insights of pastoral psychology to show that such lack of coherence is typical of human reaction to the perennial experience of radical loss.

D. Text. The received Hebrew text (MT) of Lamentations is relatively well preserved and raises fewer problems than much OT poetry (examples are found in 1:14; 3:22; 5:5). The evidence of the ancient versions, such as the Greek LXX, is rarely very helpful, since for the most part they seem to reflect a Hebrew text close to the MT. The Dead Sea scrolls have yielded a range of remains from Lamentations (Fitzmyer 1990: 232), of which the most important is 4QLam^a (Hillers 1992: 41–8). For detailed discussion of the text of Lamentations, see especially Albrektson (1963) and Gottlieb (1978).

E. Scriptural Status. This has never been a matter of dispute. This short work is found with four others (Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Ruth, and Esther) comprising the Megillot ('little scrolls'), which occur among the Writings of the HB. In the order found in the English Bibles used by Christians (deriving from LXX, which was followed by the Latin Vulgate), the book is placed among the Prophets, after Jeremiah, in recognition of its traditional association with him. That supposed link may well have played its part in securing scriptural status. The primary factor, however, appears to have been its liturgical use, particularly in the annual commemoration of the fall of the first temple, on the 9th day of Ab, in the late summer. The profound impact of the fall of the second temple to the Romans in 70 CE would have consolidated the book's place in a period when the process towards closure of a scriptural canon was under way in Judaism. Mintz (1984) has explored the ongoing role of the book in the long story of Jewish response to catastrophe, and this is mirrored in the important role played by the book in Christian liturgy down the centuries.

F. Ancient Near-Eastern Parallels. However important the immediate crisis for shaping the biblical book, it is profoundly conditioned also by existing oral and literary convention, not only within Israel itself but also in the wider ancient Near-Eastern world. Particularly important are comparative materials from Mesopotamia (Pritchard 1969: 455–63, 611–19; M. E. Cohen 1988). Assessments range from McDaniel (1968), who plays down the alleged Sumerian influence, to Gwaltney (1983), who argues that returning exiles brought back and applied Mesopotamian models.

COMMENTARY

(1:1–11a) A Dirge over the Ruined City We are immediately introduced to the city, Zion, the major focus of the book. The Hebrew word for 'city' is feminine, and this encourages the use of female personification—though the language of humiliation (as in v. 8) raises pressing ethical questions for some readers (O'Connor 1992). The city is often presented as the wife of YHWH in the OT (cf. Galambush 1992), and the motif of the 'widowed city' (v. 1) is found outside Israel too (C. Cohen 1973); it is not unreasonable to understand Zion here as bereaved of YHWH himself. 'Daughter Zion' (v. 6) is a key phrase in the book, as also in Isaiah (e.g. 1:8; 52:2; cf. Sawyer 1989). The Hebrew has 'daughter of Zion' (as in RSV), but the NRSV's 'daughter Zion' captures well the sense, namely the city personified. The formula is used also of Jerusalem and Judah, sometimes designated as 'virgin' (e.g. 1:15; 2:13).

As is commonplace in such dirges (cf. Isa 1:21–3), v. 1 contains several contrasts between a former positive situation ('full', 'great', 'princess') and the present negative one ('lonely', 'widow', 'vassal'), and in this it sets a pattern for the whole book. The language of grief pervades the work, vv. 2 and 16 providing notable examples. That Zion 'has no one to comfort her' (v. 2) is a recurrent theme (cf. vv. 16, 17, 21). Reference to Zion's deceptive lovers (vv. 2, 19) probably stands, as often, for false political allies (cf. 4:17). The chapter features two related motifs: 'The foe looked on mocking' (v. 7; cf. v. 21; the historical circumstances described in 2 Kings 24:2 may be in mind); and 'all you who pass by' (v. 12; cf. 2:15, where passers-by mock).

v. 3 provides the first mention of exile. Some have noted that explicit reference to the actual destruction of the temple (in 587) seems to be lacking in this chapter; indeed Rudolph argued that ch. 1 was written shortly after the first capture of Jerusalem in 597 (Rudolph 1962: 209–11). Provan (1990) contends that the precise historical background to ch. 1 is unclear, but that this is not crucial for its theological interpretation. The references to festivals and priests (v. 4) highlight the cultic concern which will mark the whole book. As we learn in v. 10, the nations have invaded the sanctuary (the theme is similar to Psalms such as 74 and 79). 'Her priests groan; her young girls grieve' (v. 4): the emphasis here is on the reaction to events; RSV's 'her maidens have been dragged away' unnecessarily follows LXX, presupposing a different Hebrew verb. v. 5 provides the first of many theological explanations of the disaster. In the course of the book as a whole some inconsistent accounts are given, but in ch. 1 it is made clear that YHWH is in charge (vv. 12, 14) and that he has acted on account of Judah's sin (vv. 8, 18). v. 9b introduces the first use of the first person. In this it anticipates the section which begins at v. 11b, and for this reason NRSV presents these words as a quotation. However, such movement from one grammatical person to another, found throughout the book, is not at all unusual in Hebrew poetry. Lanahan (1974) reflects imaginatively on the 'voices' that speak at various points in the book.

(1:11b–22) A Lament Uttered by Zion With 11b, there begins a passage consistently in the first person (through to the end of the chapter, with the exception of v. 17). 'Is it nothing to you?' (v. 12): the Hebrew has merely 'not to you'. It is perhaps preferable to take this as an assertion, 'This is none of your business', part of Zion's inconsistent emotional reaction to her tragedy. The end of v. 12 echoes 'day of the Lord' language, as does v. 15 (cf. 2:1, 21, 22); in the present circumstances, it is clear that the day of the Lord means bad news for Israel (cf. Am 5:18). In a bloody image, 'The Lord has trodden as in a wine press the virgin daughter Judah' (v. 15; cf. Isa 63:1–6). 'My transgressions were bound into a yoke' (v. 14): the Hebrew word translated 'were bound' here is found nowhere else in the OT, but the context (esp. the following words) seems to demand some such sense. It is unnecessary to follow those, ancient and modern, who have suggested significant alternatives, e.g. LXX, 'watch was kept over my sins'. The chapter ends with a call for vengeance upon Zion's enemies; it is noteworthy that the same theme is found at the end of chs. 3 and 4. 'Bring on the day' (v. 21): the Hebrew actually has 'You have brought on the day', which makes perfect sense as a reference to Zion's fate, before the appeal that the same should befall her enemies is introduced in the following clause, 'let them be as I am'.

(2:1–22) The chapter begins with the exclamation 'How!', as do chs. 1 and 4, and takes the form of another dirge over the ruined city. The divine anger is a recurrent theme, found here in vv. 1–4, as is the statement that YHWH acts 'without mercy' (cf. vv. 17, 21). He has 'humiliated' daughter Zion: the Hebrew verb is found only here in the OT and its meaning is uncertain; the main alternative interpretation is represented by the RSV's 'set under a cloud'. His 'footstool' is the Jerusalem temple (cf. Ps 99:5); 'he has broken down his booth like a garden' (cf. Isa 1:8) and 'has destroyed his tabernacle' (v. 6): a truly shocking claim! In other ways too expectations are overturned. In v. 3 'he has withdrawn his right hand from them', the hand of protection in this case, whilst in v. 4 he has 'his right hand set like a foe' against Israel, in an apparent inversion of the holy war tradition. In v. 7 festal acclamations are turned into the shouts of war within the temple itself (cf. v. 22).

In vv. 7–9, the physical features of the city are listed; rampart and wall 'languish together', a strange image perhaps, but not so unusual for the poetry of the OT! YHWH has stretched the measuring line in judgement (v. 8; cf. Job 38:5; Am 7:7–9). All sources of authority are removed: kings, princes, prophets, elders (vv. 9–10); 'guidance is no more', that is, the teaching given by the priests (as in Jer 18:18; Mal 2:5–8). v. 10 illustrates Judean mourning rites (cf. Bloch-Smith 1992), whilst vv. 11–12 highlight another central issue of the book, hunger (1:11, 19; 4:4–5, 9–10; cf. 2 Kings 25:3). Wine is mentioned in v. 12 because water would have been too polluted to drink. The famine theme culminates in the grim reality of cannibalism, here in v. 20 and at 4:10 (cf. 2 Kings 6:28–9).

'What can I say for you, to what compare you?': these moving words of v. 13 recall the comparison in 1:12, but the voice is different here, possibly even that of mocking irony, for the question 'who can heal you?' implies of course the answer 'no one' (cf. Isa 1:5–6). Certainly the prophets cannot help; as in v. 9, so now in v. 14 they are the butt of stern criticism (cf. Ezek 13:1–16; Jer 23:9–32). We should not worry about whether Jeremiah himself has been overlooked, even if he was a contemporary of the poet, for these words are the stuff of rhetorical hyperbole. Mockers 'clap their hands' (v. 15): in ancient Israel, this was a sign of derision; they 'hiss and wag their heads' (cf. Ps 69:9–12, 19–21). 'Is this the city that was called the perfection of beauty?': a poignant question indeed; we are reminded of Zion Psalms such as 46 and 48. 'The Lord has done what he purposed' (v. 17): he is indeed responsible for the catastrophe, which 'he ordained long ago' (cf. Deut 28:64–5; 1 Kings 9:6–9).

'Cry aloud' (v. 18): this is an emendation followed by many modern translations and commentators; the Hebrew actually has 'Their heart cried'. v. 19 introduces the language of prayer, even repentance; and in this anticipates themes of ch. 3. And yet in v. 20 even God is rebuked, anger towards God being one of the many inconsistent reactions to events in this book. 'Should priest and prophet be killed in the sanctuary of the Lord?': a terrible fate, but 4:13 implies that they deserve to be!

The chapter culminates in v. 22 with reference to an invitation to the enemies to come and slaughter the Judeans (the language shares something with Ezek 38), a judgement so total that 'no one escaped or survived' (cf. Am 5:19).

This is the most elaborate chapter in the book, and the most important. One way in which this is signalled is in the intensification of the acrostic form, with three verses to each letter of the Hebrew alphabet. This chapter is characterized by the frequent use of the first person singular voice. It is a unit, but may be read in four parts.

(3:1–18) An Individual Lament This section has many similarities to Ps 56. There is little specific reference to the fall of Jerusalem or the sufferings which followed. It opens with the puzzling words 'I am one who has seen affliction': NRSV here masks the decidedly masculine Hebrew word geber, 'man', and indeed also a definite article (RSV: 'I am the man'). The identity of the speaker here is much disputed. Is the 'I' who speaks a collective personality who represents the people as a whole (similar to Zion in chs. 1–2) or an individual? And if an individual is intended, who is it? Suggestions have included Jeremiah, Jehoiachin, the poet himself, or an anonymous typical sufferer (Hillers 1992: 120–3). There are parallels here with the debate over the identity of the 'servant' in Isa 40–55; and, as in that case, it may be wrong to seek one consistent identity (see the rhetorical reading in Mintz 1984: 32–3). A grim picture is painted of the man's suffering, with many parallels with Job (e.g. v. 4, 'He has made my flesh and my skin waste away'; cf. Job 7:5; 30:30). He sinks to a despairing low point (v. 17). All hope has gone: 'Gone is my glory, and all that I had hoped for (RSV: "my expectation") from the LORD' (v. 18).

(3:19–39) A Glimmer of Hope It is interesting that it is in the middle sections of the middle chapter of this book that the most positive material is to be found. Many have puzzled over the lack of closure at the end of the book and over the ambiguous place of hope. Johnson (1985) argued that here in the middle of ch. 3 we have the keystone to the work, the section which provides the positive answer to the theological questions it raises. v. 21 is where the positive note is first struck, but vv. 19–20 serve as an introduction (and indeed the zayin section of the acrostic begins at v. 19). In affirming hope, v. 21 (like v. 24) uses the same Hebrew root as was used in the denial of hope in v. 18. 'This I call to mind' (v. 21): 'this' refers to the grounds for hope to be detailed in vv. 22–4. The text of v. 22 is disputed: NRSV has it that the steadfast love of the Lord 'never ceases', following the Syriac and the Aramaic Targum (and a single Heb. MS). But the Hebrew MT actually has 'we are not cut off' (rather than '[it] never ceases'); this does yield tolerable sense, for it can be understood as a celebration of survival in spite of all. 'The LORD is good to those who wait for him'... 'wait quietly for the salvation of the LORD': the idea here in vv. 25–6 is similar to Isa 30:18, which may well itself be exilic (so Clements 1980: 250). 'It is good for one to bear the yoke in youth' (v. 27): 'one' here translates geber (man), as in v. 1, to which there may well be an allusion. The 'yoke' refers to suffering; 'to put one's mouth to the dust' (v. 29) was a sign of submission. 'Although he causes grief, he will have compassion according to the abundance of his steadfast love' (v. 32): as in v. 22, the important Hebrew word hesed, 'steadfast love', is used. 'For he does not willingly afflict or grieve anyone' (v. 33): 'willingly' here is literally 'from his heart'.

NRSV is right to regard vv. 34–9 as continuing the positive theme, in the voice of the same speaker. The disasters listed in vv. 34–6 are followed by a rhetorical question 'does the Lord not see it?' (v. 36). In contrast, some (such as Rudolph 1962: 240–1) have taken vv. 34–6 as an objection from an interlocutor, culminating in the statement 'the Lord does not see'. A similar issue arises in vv. 37–9: NRSV rightly has three rhetorical questions, rather than the three assertions (denying divine involvement) proposed by Gordis (1974a: 181–3). The first of the questions 'Who can command and have it done, if the Lord has not ordained it?' is strikingly similar to Am 3:6: 'Does disaster befall a city, unless the LORD has done it?' The second, 'Is it not from the mouth of the Most High that good and bad come?', reminiscent of Isa 45:7, raises profound theological questions (cf. Lindström 1983: 214–36). The last question, 'Why should any who draw breath complain about the punishment of their sins?' (v. 39) carries the theme of accepting catastrophe to its conclusion, but, like vv. 25–33, prompts the question whether there is not here the danger of a naïve, even masochistic, denial of the reality of tragedy (a line powerfully pursued by Miller 1991).

(3:40–51) A New Start v. 40 marks a fresh departure: 'Let us test and examine our ways, and return to the LORD'. The 'us' in question must be the nation Israel. For Mintz (1984: 37), this first use in ch. 3 of such a plural 'stunningly enacts the very moment of release from aloneness'. v. 41 introduces a summons to prayer, as in 2:19; the contrast between externals and the 'heart' is a familiar one in the OT, e.g. Joel 2:13. A summary explanation of events is given in v. 42: 'We have transgressed and rebelled, and you have not forgiven'; and then in vv. 43–4 a darker note is again struck, as is typical in this ambiguous book, the words 'you have wrapped yourself with a cloud so that no prayer can pass through' recalling v. 8 (cf. Isa 45:15).

(3:52–66) An Individual Prayer for Vindication There are many features here typical of the laments of the psalter, for example the enemies of vv. 52–3, 60–3, and the appeals of vv. 55 and 64–6. v. 54 reminds one of Jonah's cry from the belly of the fish (cf. Jon 2:3–6). NRSV (like RSV) takes the perfect tenses in vv. 56–61 to refer to the past, recalling blessings received. But Provan (1991b) argues, probably correctly, that the perfects in this passage are better rendered by imperatives in English (known as the 'precativ perfect'), e.g. in v. 56, not 'you heard' but 'hear', or again, in v. 60, not 'you have seen' but 'see'. Such plaintive appeals imply a situation very close to that of vv. 1–18 and so, after the lighter interlude provided by the central sections of the chapter, we are brought full circle, as is further indicated by the way v. 59 stands in sharp contrast to v. 39. The chapter ends on a vengeful note (vv. 64–6), echoing again the language of the psalter (e.g. Ps 17:13, 14; 35:26).

This dirge over the ruined city begins with the temple treasures, now desecrated, another example of the cultic emphasis of this book. 'The precious children of Zion' are said to be 'worth their weight in fine gold', a lovely statement with human values transcending cultic ones; yet now even these are as earthen pots. Such a contrast (as again in vv. 5, 7–8) reminds us of ch. 1. Compared to the jackals, ‘my people has become cruel’ (v. 3; cf. Isa 1:3), as exemplified by the cannibalism of v. 10. A grim situation—indeed ‘the chastisement of my people has been greater than the punishment of Sodom’ (v. 6). The words used here for ‘chastisement’ and ‘punishment’ could instead mean ‘iniquity’ and ‘sin’, but the context suggests that NRSV is right to take them to refer to the people’s tragic state. Sodom is said to have been overthrown in a moment, ‘though no hand was laid on it’. The meaning of the Hebrew here is uncertain: the basic idea of the verb is ‘turn’, but it could be ‘turn against’, as in NRSV’s ‘no hand was laid on it’ (implying that God acted directly), or ‘turn towards’, as in the NIV’s ‘without a hand turned to help her’. A similar problem arises in v. 7: the meaning of the rare Hebrew noun translated ‘[their] hair’ by NRSV is uncertain. The root has to do with cutting: RSV has ‘the beauty of their form’, based on the idea of a carved object, whereas NRSV envisages the cutting of hair. The latter is the more likely since lapis lazuli (to be preferred to ‘sapphire’) was used in the art of the ancient Near East to represent hair.

‘The kings of the earth did not believe . . . that foe or enemy could enter the gates of Jerusalem’ (v. 12; cf. 2:15). The perceptions of the nations are highlighted again in v. 15 (cf. Ps 79:10). According to Albrektson (1963) the fall of the supposedly inviolable city is the central theological problem of the book. vv. 13–16 give a clear explanation of this disaster as the result of Judah’s sin, presenting the nation’s leaders as moral lepers. As so often in the OT prophets, moral and cultic sins occur side by side: they ‘shed the blood of the righteous’, they are ‘defiled with blood’. v. 17 makes reference to ‘watching eagerly for a nation that could not save’: ironically ‘watching eagerly’ is just the kind of attitude one should have towards God himself, according to 3:25–6. Instead, the people have looked vainly to political alliances, as also in 5:6. It is possible that Egypt is in view here (cf. Jer 37:5–10). In spite of all, ‘The LORD’s anointed, the breath of our life, was taken in their pits’ (v. 20; perhaps the capture of Zedekiah by the Babylonians is in mind; cf. 2 Kings 25:4–7). The poignant v. 20b is reminiscent of royal psalms such as Ps 72; judgement upon the monarchy is mentioned also at 2:6, 9 and 5:16.

v. 21 declares: ‘Edom . . . to you also the cup shall pass’: Edom is often regarded with particular enmity in the OT, especially it seems in relation to the events of 587 (cf. Ps 137:7; Ob 8–14). For the cup of judgement, cf. Isa 51:17–23 (esp. vv. 22–3); Jer 25:15–29. v. 22 announces good news of a kind unparalleled elsewhere in the book: ‘The punishment of your iniquity, O daughter Zion, is accomplished, he will keep you in exile no longer’ (cf. Isa 40:1–2). The OT elsewhere too features a see-saw motif whereby the fortunes of Israel rise as those of the nations decline (and indeed vice versa), as in Ezek 35–6, which again concerns Edom. As before in Lamentations (cf. 1:22; 3:64), the fate of the enemies is related to their sins and is thus not in any way merely arbitrary.

This relatively short chapter is in the form of a communal lament and has affinities with Ps 44, 74, and 79, usually seen as liturgies for times of national calamity. Alone of the five chapters, it is not an acrostic, though its twenty-two verses perhaps echo that form. It is treated by some as separate from the rest of the book (e.g. Lachs 1966–7 assigned it a 2nd-cent. date); but there is no overwhelming reason to regard the chapter as anything but integral to the book.

The poem begins with a classic lament formula, ‘Remember, O LORD!’, and goes on to paint a sorry picture of the nation’s disgrace. This is done in part by reference to the loss of some of the very special gifts of God: ‘Our inheritance’—the land granted to Israel in ancient times—‘has been turned over to strangers’ (v. 2; cf. Num 26:53). One of the great things about living in the promised land was rest from enemies (cf. Deut 12:10), but now ‘we are given no rest’ (v. 5; cf. 1:3). The NRSV’s words ‘With a yoke’ (v. 5) are supplied from the Greek of Symmachus; the Hebrew in fact lacks them, but yields adequate sense none the less: ‘on our necks we are hard driven’. Provan (1991a: 126–7) finds hunting imagery here, the metaphor being one of close pursuit (which has a place in the second half of ch. 4). v. 6 speaks of political alliances (as did 4:17). ‘Egypt and Assyria’, being to the south and north of Judah respectively (at least in terms of travel routes), represent all nations, rather than referring to a precise historical circumstance. The reason for such pacts is said to be ‘to get enough bread’, straitened circumstances further indicated in v. 4 (‘We must pay for the water we drink; the wood we get must be bought’) and v. 9 (‘We get our bread at the peril of our lives’). If Lamentations comes, as is probable, from the period immediately after 587, the reference to alliances is likely to be retrospective, alluding to events leading up to the fall of the city.

v. 7 declares: ‘Our ancestors sinned; they are no more, and we bear their iniquities.’ It would be possible to take the word used here (lit. fathers) to mean leaders rather than ancestors, which would cohere with the blaming of leaders in 4:13–16, but it is more likely that ‘ancestors’ are indeed meant. Such an idea of suffering for the sins of one’s forebears is assumed elsewhere in the OT (e.g. 2 Kings 23:26), but interestingly this is precisely the belief rejected in Ezek 18:1–4, which could well be contemporary with these words. The verse also stands at odds with the acknowledgements of responsibility found elsewhere in Lamentations (e.g. 1:8; 3:42, and, strikingly, v. 16 here). ‘Slaves rule over us’ (v. 8): important posts were sometimes given to the slaves of kings, but the real point is similar to that in Isa 3:4–7, namely that the proper ordering of society has been destroyed. Further dimensions of the tragedy are spelled out in vv. 15–16: ‘The joy of our hearts has ceased’ (cf. 3:17–18). ‘The crown has fallen from our head’: as before, judgement on the monarchy is in view (LAM 4:20), and perhaps also an allusion to the dancer’s garland (cf. Isa 28:1), picking up the reference to dancing having ‘been turned to mourning’. Zion has been the focus of the book, and as we approach its end v. 18 portrays the once noble city lying desolate, with jackals prowling over it (cf. Mic 3:12; Jer 26:18).

‘But you, O LORD, reign forever; your throne endures to all generations’ (v. 19): it is hard to know how to take these very affirmative words, coming so close to the downbeat conclusion of the book. Could this be an ironic, even cynical, snatch of quotation from the temple liturgy (cf. Ps 93:1–2; 103:19)? In v. 20, we are straight back to pessimistic questioning, then in v. 21 comes the final appeal, which echoes Jerusalem's recalling of her former days of glory (1:7): 'Restore us to yourself, O LORD, that we may be restored; renew our days as of old'. The word 'unless', with which NRSV introduces the final verse, conveys perfectly (far better than the 'even though' proposed by Gordis 1974b) the way in which this perplexing book tails away into renewed doubt: 'you have utterly rejected us, and are angry with us beyond measure'. The book ends on anything but a confident note (contrary to Kraus 1968: 91); in fact, such is the bleakness of this conclusion that it is difficult to follow Johnson (1985) in judging even the book as a whole as essentially positive. Rather its greatness is to be found precisely in the honesty with which it articulates the ambiguities of the fate of Zion and indeed of the human condition itself.

25. Ezekiel

J. GALAMBUSH

INTRODUCTION

A. Composition and Style. 1. Commonly considered the most difficult of the major prophets, Ezekiel's perceived obscurity actually reflects a tantalizing combination of obscurity and clarity. The book combines precise dating and clear, logical structure with bizarre imagery, opaque historical references, abrupt changes in subject-matter and literary style, and numerous grammatical and textual difficulties. Anchored in a specific historical context and well-documented events, but presented via a series of weird visions and grotesque metaphors, the book is above all, tantalizing. Whereas a reader might easily despair of comprehending every reference in Hosea or Jeremiah, Ezekiel continually holds out the elusive potential for order and precision.

2. As early as the first century CE, Ezekiel's structure impressed the historian Josephus, who commented that the prophet had left behind 'two books', probably the oracles of chs. 1–39 and the temple vision of 40–8. Ezekiel's structure and composition have continued to be debated by commentators up to the present day. Recurring themes and key words and a readily apparent overall structure give the work a striking appearance of unity (see Greenberg 1983). At the same time repetitions, the use of a broad range of genres and literary styles, and seeming anachronisms have raised the question of whether the book's apparent unity is simply the work of an especially talented redactor of earlier fragments or even of a succession of such redactors (see esp. Zimmerli 1979).

3. Writing in 1924, Gustav Hölscher concluded that only 144 of the book's 1,273 verses (all of them poetry) were attributable to the ecstatic prophet Ezekiel, while the rest of the book derived from a tedious and legalistic post-exilic priest. Such radical minimalism represented the form-critical conventions that (1) all prophecy was originally oral; (2) the original oracles consisted of brief, formulaic utterances; and (3) a change in genre could generally be taken to indicate a change in author. In addition, anti-Jewish sentiment tended to idealize the Israelite prophets while decrying the 'decline' represented by early Judaism. Brief, poetic oracles were considered 'authentic' prophetic utterances, and thus superior to legal or didactic material, all of which was considered late and spurious. As academic assumptions changed over the course of the twentieth century, particularly the rejection of strict form-critical categories and heightened awareness of literary techniques, scholarly assessment of Ezekiel underwent a marked change, so that in 1983 Greenberg could create what he called a 'holistic' reading of the prophet and Davis (1989) explore Ezekiel as the first writing prophet. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, focusing on the book's complex and interlocking literary patterns, tend to attribute as much as possible to the original prophet. While additions are acknowledged (all of chs. 40–8 are frequently considered an addition), the book's substantial unity is widely accepted. Agreement on Ezekiel's unity, however, does not settle the question of authorship. Relative literary unity may indicate that the book derives substantially from the sixth-century prophet Ezekiel or that the work is largely the achievement of a later redactor so thoroughgoing as virtually to have authored the book.

4. Ezekiel displays a wide range of literary styles, from the intense disjointedness of Ezekiel's first vision (chs. 1–3) to the systematic dryness of his last (chs. 40–8). Perhaps its most striking literary feature, however, is its use of symbolic language. In addition to visions comprising approximately a third of the book, Ezekiel employs vivid extended metaphors to bring his charges against Judah and its neighbours. The metaphors are chiefly ironic, playing on and subverting commonly used symbols of national pride and identity (see EZEK 15:1–8). Thus, the lion of Judah becomes a rabid man-eater; Judah the luxuriant vine a dried-up twig; Jerusalem the faithful bride a perverse prostitute; and Tyre the merchant ship a foundering wreck. Throughout Ezekiel a strong visual sensibility predominates. Ezekiel sees visions that in turn contain seeing eyes and old men gazing at pictures, while he himself is instructed to observe carefully all that he sees. The extended metaphors are graphically intense, with the depictions of Jerusalem (exposing herself to all passers-by) and her lovers bordering on the pornographic. The emphasis on seeing builds on Ezekiel's role as witness to Judah's depravity and to YHWH's acts of self-vindication, and enlists the reader as witness alongside the prophet.

B. Historical Background. 1. Ezekiel is set in Babylon, beginning in the fifth year of Judah's Babylonian exile (593 BCE). Ezekiel was apparently brought to Babylon with the first group of exiles following Nebuchadnezzar's 597 BCE capture of Jerusalem. Zedekiah, the monarch chosen in 597 by Nebuchadnezzar to replace the rebellious and now exiled Jehoiachin, remained loyal to Babylon for only a few years, and in 594 BCE hosted an international meeting of regional leaders in Jerusalem, apparently to plan rebellion against Babylon. In 593 BCE Zedekiah was summoned by Nebuchadnezzar to Babylon, presumably to account for his actions and to renew his loyalty oath. Zedekiah's planned rebellion and subsequent reprimand by Nebuchadnezzar may have formed the occasion for Ezekiel's inaugural vision and call to speak against the 'rebellious nation' of Israel (2:3). Ezekiel considered Zedekiah's oath of loyalty to Babylon binding. According to 2 Chr 36:13, the oath had been sworn in the name of God (YHWH), and thus its abrogation violated YHWH's honour and constituted rebellion against YHWH.

2. Zedekiah seems to have continued to court illicit alliances, and in 592 BCE the Egyptian Pharaoh Psammetichus II (595–589 BCE) toured Palestine in a show of military power, clearly violating the Judean–Babylonian covenant. In addition to violating Zedekiah's covenant with Nebuchadnezzar (the covenant described in Ezek 17 as YHWH's own covenant), evidence from the Rylands IX Papyrus (Griffith 1909) indicates that Psammetichus stationed Egyptian priests in the land of Israel, thus compounding Judah's treaty violation with ritual abomination. The defilement of both name and temple represented by Psammetichus's 592 visit may have occasioned Ezekiel's vision, dated to the same year, of abominations taking place in the Jerusalem temple (chs. 8–11). Sometime following Psammetichus's visit Zedekiah withheld tribute from Babylon, relying on an Egyptian alliance for protection. In 588 BCE Nebuchadnezzar campaigned through Judah, destroying several large towns before laying siege to Jerusalem. The Egyptian army under the command of Pharaoh Apries (Hophra; 589–570 BCE) offered token resistance before withdrawing, leaving Jerusalem to the Babylonians, who in 586 BCE captured and burned the city. Zedekiah escaped by night, but was overtaken by the Babylonians at Riblah and forced to witness the killing of his two sons before being himself blinded. Massive deportations followed Nebuchadnezzar's victory, and Zedekiah was replaced by Gedaliah, a non-Davidic overseer whose title is not specified in either Israelite or Babylonian sources. Nebuchadnezzar continued his attempt to subdue the eastern Mediterranean seaboard, undertaking a siege of Tyre that was to last thirteen years (586–573) and ultimately fail. The latest dated oracle in Ezek (29:17–21, dated to 571 BCE) promises Nebuchadrezzar Egypt as compensation for his ill-fated efforts in besieging Tyre. Nebuchadrezzar apparently shared Ezekiel's hopes regarding Egypt; Babylonian texts report a battle between the Babylonian and Egyptian armies in Egypt in 568 or 567 BCE, but no more is known about Nebuchadrezzar's Egyptian campaign(s).

3. The living conditions of the exiled Israelites are widely debated. Scholars have tended to emphasize either the individual and communal trauma entailed in the loss of family members and homeland or the exiles' ability to maintain their communal identity and social structures while in Babylonia. Both aspects of the exilic experience must be held in tension: the community was allowed to preserve its language, religion, and some forms of internal governance (i.e. elders). This same community, however, bore the scars of war and displacement, and many in Babylon were conscripted into forced labour corvées. Ezekiel, a priest of sufficient prominence to have been included in the deportation of the 'upper stratum' in 597, appears to have retained some status within the exiled community, as evidenced by the formal visits from the elders described in 8:1; 14:1; and 20:1. Ezekiel's primary concern is with theology rather than with subsistence, and his oracles tend to be directed to (or against) elders, princes, and other prophets. Even the likelihood that Ezekiel was a writing prophet would suggest that he lived in relative security and stability.

The relationship between the exiled community and those in the homeland seems to have been a complex one. Ezekiel's preoccupation with Jerusalem and Judah reveals not only his priestly concern over the temple and its destruction, but also the people's questions as to how to understand their own experiences vis-à-vis those of the population still in Israel. Popular concern for the welfare of family and friends back home was tempered by a sense of competition over which segment of the divided community now held hegemony over the Israelite land and cultural identity. Ezekiel, though critical of both the exiles and those in the land, sees the exiles, whose number includes figures such as himself who represent the status quo ante, as retaining God's favour and thus a claim to prominence in any future reconstruction of Israel.

C. The Person of the Prophet. 1. Ezekiel is identified in the book's superscription as a priest, and his deportation with the first exiles to Babylon in 597 BCE suggests his prominence, either because of family connections or because he was a priest of some importance. Whether Ezekiel functioned as a prophet as well as a priest before his vision of 593 BCE (chs. 1–3) is unknown. Ezekiel was recognized as a prophet by the Judean community in exile, and was apparently highly enough regarded that the elders assembled before him, perhaps even on a regular basis, to enquire of YHWH (Ezek 8:1; 20:1). Although the book provides some autobiographical information it is difficult to form a clear picture of the prophet or of how he was perceived by his contemporaries. To the modern reader Ezekiel seems to exhibit symptoms typical of mental illness. He experiences disorienting and overwhelming visions, undergoes paralysis and muteness, and attributes these debilitating occurrences to YHWH's direct intervention in his life. Attempts to diagnose the prophet's condition (see esp. Halperin 1993), while intriguing, fail to engage the question of how such a figure, however bizarre by modern standards, would have functioned or have been understood within his own society. Ezekiel himself expresses misgivings about his role as prophet (20:49 [MT 21:5]; cf. 9:8), but his concern seems to stem from people not taking his words seriously enough, rather than from resistance to taking on the prophetic role per se.

2. Ezekiel is remarkable for his personal involvement in accomplishing numerous symbolic actions. At times playing the role of the people (eating meagre food as if during a siege; 4:9–15), Ezekiel more often plays the part of YHWH himself, setting his face against Jerusalem (4:3), and even experiencing his own wife's death as a sign of YHWH's temple's demise (24:15–24). Most frequently, however, Ezekiel is called upon to act as YHWH's witness, observing and certifying, first the people's abominations (thereby justifying their destruction; 8:1–18), then YHWH's command for Jerusalem's annihilation (9:5), and finally, each detail of YHWH's new and purified temple (chs. 40–8). Ezekiel is a witness in an almost legal sense, noting and attesting YHWH's actions (cf. the calls for Ezekiel to 'judge' in Ezek 20:4; 22:2). In this regard Ezekiel's appointment as sentinel over Israel in 3:16–21 is apt. Ezekiel is literally appointed to 'look out', to warn Israel against YHWH's wrathful approach, and he is told that his own life depends on his watchfulness.

D. Ezekiel and the Prophetic Tradition. 1. Ezekiel shows a number of affinities with earlier prophetic texts. Depiction of the prophet's personal experience most closely parallels descriptions of the early prophets Elijah and Elisha (see Carley 1975). In particular his experience of the 'hand of the Lord' as a compelling force (1:3; 3:22; etc.; cf. 1 Kings 18:46; 2 Kings 3:15) links him with this earlier tradition, as do reports of being physically transported by the spirit (3:12–14; 8:3; cf. 1 Kings 18:12; 2 Kings 2:16). Ezekiel's vivid sign-acts lend his persona a dramatic intensity similar to that of Elijah and Elisha, but whereas the earlier prophets' symbolic actions are generally depicted as having immediate, visible effects (e.g. calling fire from heaven in 1 Kings 18:30–9), Ezekiel's actions (with the possible exception of 11:13) are not transmuted into external events. Ezekiel's sign-acts, while clearly understood as setting in motion the events they portray, often precede their fulfilment by a period of years. Though presumed to be efficacious, Ezekiel's actions are not miraculous in the same sense as the deeds of Elijah and Elisha.

2. While Ezekiel's experience seems most directly modelled on that of Elijah and Elisha, the content of his prophecy owes more to the prophets of the eighth to the sixth centuries. Thus Ezekiel's announcement in ch. 7 that 'the end (qēs) has come' depends on Am 8:2 and the smelting of Israel in 22:17–22 reflects Isa 1:22–5. It is Jeremiah, however, with which Ezekiel is most intimately connected, to the extent that many of Ezekiel's most striking images seem like extended meditations on themes introduced in Jeremiah. Like Jeremiah, Ezekiel opens with a vision coming 'from the north' (1:4; Jer 1:13), a vision followed in Ezekiel's case by the eating of a divine scroll (3:1–3), an action styled on the metaphor of Jer 15:16. YHWH must then fortify each prophet against Israel's angry resistance to his words (Ezek 3:8–9; Jer 1:18–19).

Ezekiel's condemnation in ch. 13 of prophets whom YHWH never called seems to draw on Jeremiah's oracles against false prophets in 23:23–40; 29; the compelling image in Ezek 16 and 23 of Jerusalem and Samaria as degenerate sister-cities expands on the conceit introduced in Jer 3:6–14; the 'sour grapes' proverb cited in Jer 31:29, in Ezek 18 forms the basis for an extended debate over individual responsibility and the possibility of repentance; YHWH's claim in Jer 21:5 to fight with outstretched arm against his own people reappears in Ezek 20:33; and the depiction of YHWH as shepherd in Jer 23:1–8 is expanded upon in Ezek 34. Finally, Ezekiel appropriates Jeremiah's promise of renewal in 31:31–3, but with a characteristically ironic twist. Whereas Jeremiah shows YHWH inscribing his law onto the people's hearts as if onto so many stone tablets, in Ezek 11:19–20 and 36:26–7 YHWH must remove the people's hard, stony hearts altogether, replacing them with hearts of flesh before endowing them with his spirit. The question of how Ezekiel came to have such extensive knowledge of Jeremiah's words remains unresolved. It is entirely possible that a written edition of Jeremiah's prophecies was available to him in Babylon (cf. Jer 29:24–32 in which Jeremiah counters an exiled prophet's response to his letter), though this raises the further question of why, despite his detailed commentary on the situation in Jerusalem, Ezekiel makes no mention of Jeremiah.

E. Textual Problems. 1. The MT of Ezekiel is unarguably replete with grammatical lapses, repetitions, and inconsistencies. On the question of how to deal with these difficulties, however, little agreement has been reached, largely because no clearly superior text exists. LXX, while smoother, clearer, and containing fewer repetitions, can easily be interpreted as responding to the difficulties presented by MT rather than preceding them. In addition, LXX itself appears not to be a homogeneous translation but a composite text, and one that exists in widely differing versions. The Ezekiel scroll from Qumran cave 11 cannot be unrolled, and additional fragments of text cannot be argued conclusively to favour either LXX or MT. The Targum follows MT closely, thereby offering early interpretations of MT's difficult passages but no assistance in reconstructing a Vorlage. MT generally serves as a scholarly 'default text' with the versions used sparingly as correctives.

2. Divergent stands regarding Ezekiel's composition history have also affected the way commentators have viewed the book's textual difficulties. Zimmerli (1979; 1983), for example, who considered Ezekiel the product of several generations' accrued reflections, could assign many doublets to the hands of Ezekiel's earliest interpreters. Greenberg (1983: 275–6), however, exploring the complexities of a presumed literary prophet, considered even an awkward repetition such as the doubled 'I said to you, "In your blood, live!"' of 16:6 not dittography, but a deliberate stylistic device.

F. Themes. 1. The Temple. Ezekiel's passionate concern with the Jerusalem temple—its defilement and destruction—has long been considered a central focus of the book. As a priest of sufficient stature to have been among the first exiled, Ezekiel may be assumed to have had more than a passing interest in both worship practices within and the ultimate fate of the Jerusalem sanctuary. In fact, both the structure and content of the book point to the temple's centrality in Ezekiel's thought. A growing horror at the temple's defilement dominates the oracles of doom in chs. 1–24, and the temple's destruction, symbolized by the death of Ezekiel's wife (24:15–24), marks the ultimate satisfaction of YHWH's rage against Jerusalem and the beginning of his forgiveness. In the book's final chapters YHWH's eventual restoration of Israel is signified by the building of a new temple and YHWH's renewed residence within it (43:1–5). The existence or destruction of the Jerusalem temple serves as a cipher for the existence or non-existence of Israel. Israel's life is defined for Ezekiel, not by political independence, the Davidic monarchy (which receives scant notice in the book), or even the people's possession of the land (the second, more extensive exile of 586 BCE is barely mentioned in Ezekiel), but by the presence or absence of the temple, and by YHWH's acceptance or rejection of the temple as his home. The temple thus forms the emotional core of the book, representing Israel's ritual purity or impurity, its political and theological fidelity or infidelity, and YHWH's presence or absence among his people.

2. The Divine Name. The exile of YHWH's chosen people to Babylon, as well as their own flagrant disobedience to his laws, could easily be seen as compromising YHWH's reputation as a god worthy of the name. Ezekiel, like other exilic authors, is concerned to vindicate YHWH's offended honour. Exile in itself was sufficient to defile YHWH's divine name, as it implied either YHWH's impotence or his violation of his covenant oath made to Israel. As recorded in 36:20, the nations' observation that 'These are the people of the Lord, yet they had to leave His land' (NJPS) impels YHWH to act in defence of his holy name. The violation of Zedekiah's vassal oath sworn in YHWH's name similarly amounted to defilement of the name, and so YHWH in Ezekiel appears caught between the need to avenge himself against Judah and the competing need to manifest his power by bringing the people back from exile, both of which seem necessary to defend the sanctity of his name. Ezek 20 retells the entire history of Israel as a struggle between YHWH's desire to punish Israel's disobedience and his unwillingness to defile his own name by destroying the covenant people. Ezek 16 and 23 cast YHWH's defilement in the emotionally charged terms of male sexual honour, depicting YHWH as a sexually shamed husband whose honour has been devastated by his wife's (the personified Jerusalem's) infidelity. YHWH's vindication of his honour, first by punishing Israel for its infidelity and then by re-establishing his potency and authority over the people, emerges as a dominant theme over the course of the book. The repeated phrase, 'Then they will know that I am YHWH' (my tr.; see inter alia 6:7, 10, 14), sometimes employed as a threat of punishment and sometimes as a promise of restoration, emphasizes the concern for the divine name that motivates YHWH throughout Ezekiel. This 'recognition formula' (Zimmerli 1979: 37–41) occurs with variations some seventy-two times. In Ezekiel, to 'know YHWH' denotes not merely recognizing the deity, but specifically acknowledging his sovereignty. Not only the Judeans but ultimately all nations must come to 'know the LORD', that is, to recognize his dominion over all the earth. The climax of Ezekiel thus comes at the moment when YHWH is fully 'recognized'. After vanquishing his ultimate enemy and so vindicating his holy name in chs. 38–9, YHWH is at last enthroned in 43:1–5 on his holy mountain, overlooking the city whose name declares his sovereign presence at the centre of the world: YHWH is There (48:35).

3. The Divine Warrior. Ezekiel's concern with the sanctity of both temple and divine name manifests itself in the book via the symbolic complex associated with the Israelite celebration of YHWH as Divine Warrior (see ABD, 'Warrior, Divine'). In Israel, the New Year celebration apparently included a ritual in which YHWH (symbolized by the ark) went forth from the temple in an annual battle against cosmic enemies. While the ritual battle was taking place the temple was cleansed, and upon YHWH's victory a triumphant procession celebrated the renewal of the temple and reaffirmed YHWH's reign as well as that of his regent, the earthly monarch (see ABD, 'King and Kingship'). In the opening chapter of Ezekiel the prophet reports seeing a vision of YHWH as Divine Warrior, seated on his chariot-throne. Ezekiel then looks on in chs. 10–11 as YHWH mounts his chariot and rides forth from the temple to the Mount of Olives, the traditional goal of the New Year's ark procession. YHWH then engages in battle, first against Jerusalem itself, and then against the enemies of Judah. The wars of YHWH culminate in chs. 38–9 with the battle against Gog, depicted as a cosmic foe. Following his victory over Gog YHWH calls for the purification of the land and a sacrificial banquet, after which he returns in triumph to take his throne as king in a renewed and purified temple. For Ezekiel, writing in Babylon during a period when YHWH's power and kingship could not be affirmed by military, political, or ritual means, the visionary mode provides a venue through which to vindicate YHWH's honour and assert his continued sovereignty.

4. Sin and Repentance. Ezekiel is widely noted for his assertions, primarily set forth in ch. 18 (cf. 33:10–20) that, contrary to the perspective expressed in Ex 34:7 and elsewhere, YHWH does not visit the sins of the parents upon the children; rather, each person is judged on the basis of individual merit. Moreover, each person's merit is determined solely by their current actions. Past sins do not count against a repentant individual, nor does past righteousness count in favour of a person who has turned to evil ways. Ezekiel thus presents a distinctive perspective on the individual as a moral agent and on the present moment as the moment of moral significance. YHWH stresses that he takes no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but desires repentance and life for each person (18:23, 32).

5. In contrast to the focus on the ongoing responsibility of each individual, YHWH's actions toward the community are designed solely to punish past sins and to purify the people as a whole, regardless of their present moral inclinations. At the communal level YHWH's concern is with the ritual defilement created by Israel's sins and his goal is to vindicate his name and his holiness (see EZEK 1:2; ABD, 'Holiness (OT)'). The community must at all costs be fitted to these ends. Thus, much of Ezekiel describes YHWH's plans precisely to visit the consequences of the community's sins upon it so as to purify people, land, and temple and re-establish YHWH as sovereign. In his wholesale purgation of land and people YHWH will punish 'both righteous and wicked' (21:3–4 [MT 21:8–9]). Regardless of whether they choose repentance YHWH will replace their corrupt hearts with organs inclined to obedience

(11:19–20; 36:26–7), thus ensuring his ability to rule undefiled by the people's sins. Here purification and return (the word 'forgiveness', slh, does not occur in Ezekiel) take place not as an act of grace, but of necessity, a required step in the vindication of YHWH's sovereignty. Ezekiel's concern presses far beyond the restoration of the people, to climax in ch. 43 with YHWH's own restoration as king. Within this overarching and impersonal scheme focused on YHWH's vindication, however, rests Ezekiel's almost pastoral attention to the moral life of the individual. In the midst of the calamity of the exile comes a firm rejection of despair and moral defeatism. Righteous action is far from pointless, as some in the exilic community claim (33:10), nor does hope lie in the vague notion that the righteousness of the ancestors will suffice for the present (14:12–20). Instead, even as he announces YHWH's inevitable destruction of Israel Ezekiel articulates a responsibility and opportunity for each person to 'turn and live' on the basis of new choices and righteous acts.

COMMENTARY

Oracles of Destruction against Judah (1:1–24:27)

Ezekiel's Inaugural Vision and Commissioning (1:1–3:27)

(1:1–3) Superscription The book begins with a superscription informing the reader of the identity of the prophet and the time and place that the prophecy was received and delivered. Ezek 1–3 actually includes two such introductions, one in the first person (v. 1) and one in the third (vv. 2–3). vv. 2–3 are the only two verses in the book written in the third person, and the first-person superscription of v. 1 is probably the original. v. 1 announces that the writer saw 'visions of God' while among the exiles 'by the river Chebar' in 'the thirtieth year'. The introduction is obscure, assuming the reader's knowledge of which year is 'the thirtieth' and who it was who were exiled 'by the river Chebar'. The second superscription (vv. 2–3) seems designed to clarify the first, identifying the speaker and the location of the Chebar, and restating the date in terminology consistent with that employed elsewhere in the book. vv. 2–3 follow the typical form of prophetic superscriptions, providing a date in terms of the reigning monarch, identifying the prophet both by his own name (Ezekiel) and his father's name (son of Buzi), and announcing that 'the word of the Lord came' at this time. In this case Ezekiel's profession as a priest is also noted (cf. Jer 1:1), as well as the location in which he prophesied: in the land of the Chaldeans (Babylonia), by the river Chebar. Finally, the superscription contains the notice that 'the hand of the Lord' was upon him there (v. 3).

The significance of the 'hand of the Lord' (cf. 8:1), and how this term differs from the 'word of the Lord' in the same verse or the 'visions of God' mentioned in v. 1, is not clear, although the terminology seems to link Ezekiel's experience with that of earlier prophets such as Elijah (1 Kings 18:46) and Elisha (2 Kings 2:15; see EZEK D.1). The correlation between the year specified in v. 2 (593 BCE) and the thirtieth year of v. 1 has long puzzled interpreters. Speculation has included the possibility that Ezekiel himself was 30 years old (in his thirtieth year) when he began to prophesy, or that the call actually occurred (or the book was composed) in the thirtieth year of the exile, 568 BCE. The Targum of Ezekiel, however, suggests that Ezekiel received his call in the thirtieth year after Josiah's reform, a dating that would yield 593, and so correlate with the date given in v. 2. This early understanding has gained little credence among scholars, but given that Josiah's reform took place in a Jubilee year (cf. Hayes and Hooker 1988), Ezekiel might well be reckoning his vision according to the Jubilee. In this case, both his initial and his final vision are dated according to their relation to the Jubilee (EZEK 40:1).

(1:4–2:8a) The Vision of the Throne-Chariot Ezekiel watches as a stormy wind blows in from the north, bringing with it a shiny cloud that in turn contains YHWH's chariot borne by supernatural creatures (identified in 10:20 as cherubim). YHWH's approach from the north carries implications ranging from the mundane to the mythical. Although summer storms do in fact come into Babylon from the north, Ezekiel more probably reflects the Ugaritic traditions according to which the storm-god Baal made his home in the far north (cf. Ps 48:2 [MT v. 3]) or to a tradition describing an unnamed 'enemy from the north' (cf. Jer 1:13; Ezek 39:2) arriving to destroy Israel. In the light of YHWH's appearance riding his war chariot and Ezekiel's role warning Israel of YHWH's approach, the northerly storm wind of 1:4 probably foreshadows the approaching destruction of Israel. Ezekiel sees in the storm a shining cloud containing fire and 'something like ḥašmal' (v. 4). The identity of ḥašmal is not known, though the Akkadian cognate elmešu is also used in describing a god's shining appearance (see Greenberg 1983: 43). The details of Ezekiel's vision, while tantalizing, are also intentionally obscure. Ezekiel claims only to see 'the appearance of the likeness of the glory' of YHWH (v. 28), and while the vision is described in minute detail, it is likewise understood that what the prophet describes so fully remains essentially indescribable.

In vv. 5–14 Ezekiel sees 'something like four living creatures' in the midst of the cloud. The designation of the creatures as ḥayyôt, living beings, may emphasize that he is not experiencing a vision of the temple furniture, the carved cherubim bearing the ark, but of the living original (cf. the seraphim of Isa 6:1–8). The description of the four creatures is garbled in MT, with repetitions, sentence fragments, and even changes in the creatures' gender. While the uncertain prose creates translational difficulties, and may well reflect a corrupt text, the result is a strangely enhanced sense of awe and bedazzlement built up over the course of the vision. The creatures have four faces—each face having the likeness of a different animal, with a human face in the front—and four wings. The effect is that the creatures face in all directions simultaneously, and are thus able both to move in any direction and to guard the blazing substance around which they stand. In vv. 15–21 Ezekiel describes four shining wheels accompanying the four creatures. The construction of the wheels, 'a wheel within a wheel', may indicate either concentric circles in the same plane or wheels at right angles to one another, thus facing, like the living creatures, in all directions at once. The wheel rims are full of eyes so that, like the creatures, they may be both omnipresent and all-seeing. Whereas the living creatures move at the impulse of 'the spirit' (of YHWH) the wheels are themselves moved (vertically as well as horizontally) by the spirit of the creatures.

In vv. 22–8a Ezekiel sees a crystalline dome stretching over the creatures' heads (cf. Gen 1:6), and notes the sound made by the creatures' wings as they move, 'like the sound of mighty waters, like the thunder of the Almighty' (v. 24). A voice sounds from over the firmament; the creatures halt and let down their wings. Ezekiel now looks above the dome to see the 'likeness of a throne' with what appears to be 'something that seemed like a human form' (v. 26). The form shines as if with ḥašmal, fire, and even a rainbow (vv. 27–8), and upon seeing it Ezekiel falls prostrate, recognizing 'the appearance of the likeness of the glory' of YHWH (v. 28).

Ezekiel's vision report, for all its claims to describe only the remotest representations of things divine, employs what for an Israelite reader would have been unmistakable symbols of YHWH's presence. Zoomorphic throne guardians formed part of both Israelite and Babylonian iconography, as did the transformation of the divine throne into a war chariot, borne by its winged guardians and accompanied by fire, storm, and the thundering voice of the god (Ps 68; 77:16–19 [MT vv. 17–20]). The throne's location above the crystalline dome reflects YHWH's location 'above the heavens' (Ps 8:1 [MT 8:2]; 11:4; 57:11 [MT v. 12]), while the repeated emphasis on the mobility of the creatures and wheels may serve to explain YHWH's unexpected presence in Babylonia.

(1:28b–3:15) Ezekiel's Commissioning Ezekiel hears a voice addressing him, commanding him to rise. Ezekiel is called 'son of man' (2:1 RSV) here and throughout the remainder of the book, not as an honorific title, but as a mark of the distance between this 'mere mortal' and his divine interlocutor (see Vermes 1981: ABD, 'Son of Man'). The prophet is then set on his feet by the spirit (cf. 37:10), moving, like the living creatures, only at YHWH's behest. Ezekiel receives a commission to go to the 'rebellious house' of Israel and speak for YHWH. YHWH's emphasis on Israel's stubborn rebellion, and even his reassurance that Ezekiel need not fear the people's words and looks, suggest that Ezekiel's message will be rejected; none the less he will serve as evidence of YHWH's will, so that the people 'will know that there has been a prophet among them' (2:5). Ezekiel is now shown a scroll containing 'words of lamentation and mourning and woe' (2:10) and instructed to eat it (cf. Jer 15:16). Henceforth, Ezekiel speaks YHWH's words, which have literally been put into the prophet's mouth. The scroll's contents, lamentation and woe, confirm the earlier suggestion that YHWH has come as an enemy from the north: Ezekiel will prophesy destruction to Israel. In 3:4–11 YHWH offers Ezekiel the ironic consolation that he will not be sent to foreigners whose speech he cannot understand. Rather than going to foreigners, who might listen despite the language barrier, Ezekiel will go to his fellow exiles, who, understanding his words, will simply refuse to listen.

Ezekiel then reports that as the divine chariot departed he himself was lifted up by the spirit and returned to the exiles living at the Babylonian settlement of Tel Abib (3:12–15). Ezekiel depicts his visionary experience as entailing pain and consternation. The intensity of YHWH's hand upon him causes Ezekiel 'bitterness' and 'rage' (3:14, my tr.). Following the vision Ezekiel sits stunned for seven days. Ezekiel is not unique in experiencing the prophetic role as galling (cf. Moses in Ex 4; and Jeremiah in Jer 15:15–18); Ezekiel feels the burden even before receiving orders or learning the community's response. 'Rage' (hēmā) in Ezekiel is most often characteristic of YHWH (see inter alia 5:13, 15; 6:12; 7:8) and it may be that Ezekiel is overwhelmed by his empathic experience of YHWH's fierce emotion. In his later sign-acts (beginning with 4:1–3) the prophet frequently takes on YHWH's role. Ezekiel is thus stunned not only by the fact of his encounter with the divine glory, but also by his internalization of divine rage.

(3:16–21) The Sentinel (See also EZEK 33:1–9.) After his seven days' recuperation, Ezekiel receives in effect a second commissioning, this time couched in metaphoric language. Ezekiel is to serve as the sentinel for Israel. The sentinel is posted on the city wall to watch for and give warning of enemies without. The metaphor refers obliquely to Jerusalem, the walled capital whose 'rebelliousness' (2:5) should give it reason to expect retaliation by Babylon. In fact, however, YHWH is the enemy approaching the city, and although YHWH, speaking through Ezekiel, warns the people, it is also YHWH against whom the people must be warned. The image of YHWH attacking the city is consistent with Ezekiel's vision in ch. 1 of YHWH riding on his war chariot, confirming the uneasy possibility that it is Israel against whom the Divine Warrior rides. Ezekiel's commission as sentinel employs military imagery to convey Israel's moral accountability. As sentinel Ezekiel is responsible for conveying YHWH's warning to the people. While it is the people who will be judged, the passage focuses on Ezekiel and his own accountability as sentinel. Thus, if Ezekiel warns the wicked to repent but they do not, they bear responsibility for their own sins. Should Ezekiel fail to warn them, however, they will receive the death sentence for their actions, but he will be held responsible for their death. Regardless, then, of the people's response, Ezekiel's own life is at stake as he is charged with a message of life-and-death importance.

(3:22–7) Binding and Dumbness In the final episode of Ezekiel's call the prophet is sent out to 'the valley', where he again sees the divine glory. As in the earlier vision, Ezekiel falls prostrate but the spirit stands him upright. YHWH now restricts both Ezekiel's mobility and his speech. He is to confine himself to his house, where he will be bound with cords, and YHWH will strike him dumb and thus unable to reprove the people. YHWH's command is puzzling, as its effect is to render Ezekiel incapable of communicating with the people, and thus seemingly to negate his commission as prophet. The restriction is particularly alarming in the light of 3:16–21 in which Ezekiel is told that he must warn the people on peril of his life. The problem is compounded by the fact that immediately following the announcement of his binding and dumbness YHWH commands Ezekiel to perform symbolic actions requiring both mobility and speech. While Ezekiel rarely reports his own fulfilment of YHWH's command the problem remains as to why YHWH would command actions he himself has rendered impossible to perform. One traditional solution has been to label vv. 22–7 a late addition, or out of place in its current setting. Such a solution merely introduces the new problem of what the difficult passage is in fact doing out of place—how it got there and how it functions now. One less radical possibility is that Ezekiel's confinement and dumbness symbolize his status as a writing prophet. If in fact Ezekiel's prophecies were produced substantially in writing (while seated, silent and immobile, indoors) rather than orally, this novel practice might have required both explanation and theological justification in a culture regarding prophecy as primarily an oral genre. In v. 27 YHWH declares that when he addresses Ezekiel he will open the prophet's mouth to tell the people, 'Thus says the Lord God'. This emendation could refer to YHWH's removal of the dumbness in 33:21–2 but more likely means that YHWH will relieve the prophet's dumbness whenever YHWH gives Ezekiel oracles to deliver in YHWH's name.

Signs and Oracles of Doom (4:1–7:27)

(4:1–8) The Siege of Jerusalem Ezekiel is commanded to perform his first sign-act, a symbolic representation of Jerusalem under siege. After inscribing a map of Jerusalem on a mud brick (examples of mud maps are known from the ancient Near East) Ezekiel is to construct a model siege apparatus surrounding the model city. Finally, he is to set up an iron plate as a wall between himself and the city, set his face against the city, and lay siege to it. Ezekiel's action straightforwardly predicts a siege against Jerusalem, but the siege is not initiated by Babylon. Rather, it is YHWH, as represented by Ezekiel, who is setting his face against the city, and, intent on Israel's destruction, erecting a barrier between himself and them. Ezekiel, appointed in 3:16–21 as lookout against YHWH's attack, now changes roles, playing the part of YHWH. The iron plate between Ezekiel's face and the city recalls the hardening of the prophet's face in 2:8–9. The hardness that kept Ezekiel from being harmed by the people's rejection apparently also keeps YHWH from being softened by their pleas. YHWH now commands Ezekiel to lie, first on his left side and then on his right, symbolically bearing the punishment of Israel and Judah respectively (vv. 4–6). The prophet is to lie 390 days on his left side, signifying 390 years of punishment for the Northern Kingdom, and 40 days on his right side, signifying 40 years of punishment for Judah. The numbers are baffling. While Judah's 40 days may predict 40 years of exile (cf. Jeremiah's prediction of 70 years, Jer 25:11; 29:10), creating a symbolic correlation to the wilderness wanderings (cf. Ezek 20:36), a corresponding 390-year exile for Israel (beginning in 722 and lasting until 332 BCE?) is not easily explained. In vv. 7–8 YHWH recapitulates 4:1–3 and 3:25, namely that Ezekiel is to set his face against Jerusalem and that YHWH will bind and so immobilize him during the siege. This summary implies that it is the siege, not the exile, that will last 40 days (a day for each of forty years' iniquity), corresponding to a 390-day siege of Samaria. Unfortunately, neither Assyrian nor Israelite records permit the kind of close dating that would prove or disprove this possibility.

(4:9–17) Famine Ezekiel, now acting out the part of Jerusalem's citizens, is commanded to eat meagre rations during the time that he lies on his side. He is to bake cakes made of a mixture of poor grains, baking them on defiling human excrement in public as a sign of the coming siege conditions. The discrepancy between the public actions prescribed in 4:9–17 and the seclusion and immobility commanded in 3:24–5 and 4:8 may be the result of editorial insertions here or may simply reflect modern scholarship's continued failure to penetrate the meaning of Ezekiel's dumbness and binding. In v. 14 Ezekiel emerges briefly as a character independent of YHWH's actions and words, to resist carrying out YHWH's defiling commands. YHWH relents, allowing Ezekiel to bake the cakes on animal dung instead of human, thereby maintaining his ritual purity.

(5:1–17) The Coming Judgement In ch. 5 Ezekiel is assigned a sign-act that both summarizes the eventual fate of Jerusalem and introduces the theological questions to be worked out over the remainder of the book. The prophet is told to shave his hair, an action that in itself symbolizes wartime captivity (cf. Isa 7:20) and then to divide the hair into three sections, one for burning, one for destruction by sword, and one for scattering. From the third section a tiny remnant is to be preserved, though some even from this will be burned. vv. 5–17 explain that the hair represents the citizens of Jerusalem, some of whom will be consumed by plague and famine within the besieged city, others of whom will be slain after the city falls, and the rest of whom will be 'scattered' in exile where further destruction will pursue them. Although YHWH gives no explanation of the preserved fragments of hair, they presumably represent some small fraction of those sent into exile who will be kept safe throughout the ordeal. Jerusalem, meanwhile, will be subjected to famine, plague, wild beasts, and the death of children, the punishments prescribed in Lev 26 for breaking YHWH's covenant. YHWH's description of Jerusalem's rejection of the law and of its shame at being punished in sight of other nations prefigures the lengthy account in EZEK 20:1–44 of YHWH's futile attempts to establish his rule over Israel and his ultimate decision to expose the nation to public humiliation in order to vindicate his divine name. v. 13 marks the first occurrence of YHWH's assertion repeated in various forms throughout Ezekiel, that the goal of Jerusalem's destruction is recognition of YHWH and his name: 'They will know that I, the LORD, have spoken' (see EZEK F.2).

(6:1–14) Judgement against Israel's Mountains In ch. 6 Ezekiel is directed to prophesy against the mountains of Israel, a message of destruction that will be mirrored by promises of restoration directed to the mountains in 36:1–15. Ch. 6 consists of variations on themes introduced in ch. 5, as the earlier judgement against Jerusalem is extended throughout the Israelite countryside, in which idols are worshipped 'on every high hill, on all the mountaintops, under every green tree and under every leafy oak' (v. 13; cf. e.g. Jer 2:20; for discussion of these practices see Ackerman 1992). As in 5:13, YHWH will spend his rage against the people (v. 12), dividing them as in 5:1–4 into three parts (vv. 11–12) to be destroyed by famine, by plague, and by the sword (cf. Jer 14:12; Lev 26). The judgements against the mountains (and the people who worship there) continue to be depicted, like those of ch. 5, as a fulfilment of the covenant curses set forth in Lev 26. In addition to the levitical stipulation of punishment by famine, sword, and plague, ch. 6 predicts the fulfilment of the prediction in Lev 26 that the idolaters will be slain at the feet of the very idols they serve (vv. 5, 13), thus simultaneously destroying the worshippers and defiling the idolatrous altars (cf. 2 Kings 23:20).

YHWH stretches forth his hand (v. 14), a gesture invoking his triumph over Pharaoh in the Exodus (see e.g. Ex 3:20; Deut 4:34), but here emphasizing that YHWH will fight not for, but against, his own people (cf. Jer 21:5; see EZEK 20:33). As in ch. 5, the goal of YHWH's punishment is acknowledgment of YHWH's person and sovereignty. The recognition formula (they/you shall know that I am YHWH) appears four times in this brief chapter (see EZEK F.2). Structurally, ch. 6 provides an excellent example of the 'halving' technique described by Greenberg (1983: 25–6) with vv. 1–10 forming the primary and 11–14 the related, secondary section of a two-part oracle.

(7:1–27) Judgement against the Land Judgement by sword, pestilence, and famine, pronounced against Jerusalem in ch. 5 and against the mountains of Israel in ch. 6, is extended to every corner of the land in Ezek 7. Building on the emotional intensity of the previous two chapters, Ezek 7 announces urgently that the expected judgement has now arrived. The MT is difficult, written in strong but sometimes erratic poetic metre, riddled with hapax legomena, repetitions, and untranslatable phrases. As with the chariot vision of Ezek 1, however, so also here the disjointed syntax lends an uncanny urgency to the passage, so that both form and content express Ezekiel's (and the people's) panic at YHWH's approach.

The chapter consists of three sections, vv. 1–4, 5–9, and 10–27, each announcing Israel's doom and concluding with the recognition formula. The three sections seem to build on Amos's announcement (Am 8:1–10) of the day of YHWH (ABD, 'Day of the Lord'), a day traditionally celebrating the Divine Warrior's conquest of his enemies, but which the prophets re-envisioned as a day of judgement against Israel. Thus, Amos's declaration that 'the end' (qēṣ) had come upon Israel (8:2) reappears in Ezek 7:2. The second doom saying begins in v. 5 with the addition of 'disaster after disaster' before the repeated notice that 'the end' has arrived. Images drawn from Ezek 5 and 6 are built into a concatenated recital of YHWH spending his anger, spilling out rage against the people (v. 8; cf. 5:13; 6:12), mercilessly punishing their abominations (v. 4, 8–9; cf. 5:9, 11; 6:9, 11). 'Then,' says YHWH, 'you will know that it is I, the Lord, who strike' (v. 9). God's revelation is one of naked power, a warrior unleashed in battle. The final section, vv. 10–27, opens with the explicit announcement of 'the day' (v. 10). People are paralysed with fear as YHWH brings the sword, plague, and famine upon them (vv. 14–18).

vv. 19–23 predict in veiled language the Babylonian capture and desecration of the Jerusalem temple. YHWH speaks first of silver and gold which were the occasion of the people's sin, out of which they had made 'abominable images' and šiqqūšim (in this context 'idols', v. 20), using YHWH's treasures for idolatry. YHWH will make these objects 'like a menstruant woman' (l'enniddā, v. 20; cf. v. 19), that is, repulsively unclean to the people, a prefiguration of YHWH's rejection of Jerusalem as an unclean wife in ch. 16 (and cf. 36:17). YHWH will bring foreigners into his 'treasured place' to profane it (vv. 21–2), an oblique reference to the Babylonian destruction of YHWH's private abode within the Jerusalem temple. YHWH explains in v. 23 that destruction will occur because of the people's violent crimes (not their idolatry), and goes on in vv. 26–7 to describe the breakdown of established order. In vain will people seek a vision from the prophet, law from priests, or advice from elders. This triad of religious leaders in v. 26, all now defunct, is paralleled in v. 27 by a secular order, similarly dismantled: the king mourns, the prince despairs, and the people of the land shake with fear. All of society is in chaos. Ezekiel's mention of the people of the land is intriguing, as they are structurally parallel to 'the elders' in the list of religious authorities, a usage suggesting that the term meant 'petty officials' rather than the more widely accepted meanings of either 'peasantry' or 'landed gentry' (see ABD, 'Am Ha'arez'). The third section of the chapter, like the two preceding, concludes with the recognition formula: YHWH's violent attack against people and temple will ultimately result in acknowledgment of YHWH (v. 27).

The Vision of the Defiled Temple (8:1–11:25)

(8:1–18) The Temple Tour Ezek 8 begins with a date formula, introducing a new section of the book. The date is September 592 BCE. The timing, approximately three weeks after the 390 days of immobility prescribed in 4:5, may indicate the prophet's release from confinement and renewed ability to prophesy, although the 40 days prescribed in 4:6 would not yet have elapsed. Historical circumstances may also have provided the occasion for the oracle (see EZEK B.2). Pharaoh Psammetichus's victory tour of Palestine, bringing along the priests of the 'great gods' of Egypt, took place during the second half of 592, and this violation of both cultic and political loyalties may lie behind Ezekiel's vision of depravity at the heart of Jerusalem.

Ezekiel is depicted sitting in his house with the elders of Judah seated before him, a scenario repeated in 14:1 and 20:1; apparently the community recognized Ezekiel's prophetic status and regularly sought YHWH's oracles through him. On this occasion Ezekiel experiences 'the hand of the Lord' in much the same form as in his inaugural vision. A form made of gleaming hašmal (MT's עֵשׂ 'fire' is probably an error, corrected by LXX's reflection of 'is, 'human') appears, reaches out, and lifts Ezekiel by the hair, transporting him within the vision to the Jerusalem temple (vv. 2–3). Physical translocation seems to have been an accepted element of prophetic experience in some Israelite circles (cf. 2 Kings 2:16 and Obadiah's complaint to Elijah in 1 Kings 18:12). In Ezekiel's case the divine spirit's actions range from merely setting the prophet upright (Ezek 3:24) to transporting him into exclusively visionary realms (37:1; 40:1–2). Here Ezekiel's experience is ambiguous since he seems to describe both actual conditions and activities in the Jerusalem temple (8:5–16) and also divine responses such as the work of the heavenly executioners in 9:5–8, that seem to be occurring only at a visionary level.

Ezekiel's vision begins just outside the north gate of the temple's 'inner court', a phrase reflecting the double courtyard of the late monarchic temple (see ABD, 'Temple, Jerusalem'). Ezekiel identifies the spot as the location of 'the image of jealousy which provokes to jealousy' (v. 3). The idol's identity is uncertain, though Asherah (see Olyan 1988; ABD, 'Asherah') is generally assumed (and cf. 2 Chr 33:7, 15). The fact that Ezekiel need not name the idol, but refers to its location as a means of orienting the reader, suggests that this figure was not a shocking innovation, but a familiar and perhaps longstanding feature of the Jerusalem temple (cf. NJPS 'that infuriating image').

Ezekiel notes that 'the glory of the God of Israel was there' (v. 4). The precise relationship between the hašmal figure, the glory of YHWH, and YHWH himself is not entirely clear, though the former two figures seem to make visible the invisible presence of YHWH. As in the inaugural vision (1:28), however, the voice of YHWH himself addresses Ezekiel, in this case describing four scenes in different parts of the temple, each more offensive than the last. YHWH begins in v. 5 by directing Ezekiel's attention to the 'image of jealousy' Ezekiel himself had just noted. This statue, according to YHWH, is among Israel's 'great abominations' that 'create distance' (my tr.) from YHWH's sanctuary (v. 6). The object of the verb rhq (to make distant) is not specified, and the phrase could suggest that the people are distancing themselves (either spiritually, through idolatry or literally, via their exile) from YHWH's temple, or that YHWH will distance himself from his temple, i.e. by his departure in chs. 10 and 11. Interpretation is further complicated by the apparent inclusio formed with 11:15–16, in which the current exiles are described as 'distanced' from YHWH.

Having condemned the jealousy-provoking statue, YHWH informs Ezekiel that he will see 'still greater abominations' (v. 6) and leads him into the north gateway. Ezekiel now burrows through a hole in the outer wall of the inner court, into a room (or series of rooms) whose walls are covered with engravings depicting unclean animals. Seventy elders, symbolically representing all Israel (cf. Ex 24:1, 9) offer incense before the images. The hidden rooms engraved with animal figures recall the iconography of Egyptian tombs but the reference in 23:14 to Judah's infatuation with engraved images of Babylonians may indicate that the elders are in fact practising a Babylonian ritual. Among the seventy elders Jaazaniah ben Shaphan is named, probably because of his family's prominence (2 Kings 22:3; Jer 29:3; 36:12). YHWH now brings the prophet to 'the entrance of the north temple gate' (v. 14), a location not otherwise known (for an attempt at reconstructing the temple layout assumed in 8:1–18 see Zimmerli 1979: 237–43), but clearly another step closer to the temple itself. The sanctity of the location and the gravity of the abomination progress simultaneously, so that the worst offences take place in the holiest areas. The third abomination consists of women weeping for Tammuz (ABD, 'Tammuz'), the Sumerian god whose descent into the underworld and subsequent return to life represented the annual renewal of the earth's fertility. The cult of Tammuz was widespread throughout the ancient Near East, though the god's death and rebirth were re-enacted during the fourth month, not the sixth, as represented in Ezekiel's vision.

The final abomination takes place between the sacrifice altar and the temple entrance, where men are worshipping the sun in the east, thus presenting their backsides to YHWH. Sun worship could be either Egyptian or Babylonian in provenience (see ABD, 'Sun'; Smith 1990). YHWH emphasizes to Ezekiel the gravity of all Judah's abominations, and adds the unexpected charge of violence. Finally, YHWH concludes, 'they are putting the branch to my nose' (v. 17). This last accusation is entirely enigmatic, but clearly represents the ultimate affront to YHWH. MT reads (and NRSV follows) 'they put the branch to their nose', but this almost certainly reflects a tiqqûn sôpêrim (see ABD, 'Scribal Emendations'), a scribal emendation, apparently intended to defend YHWH against the insulting gesture. While the specific rituals alluded to in ch. 8 remain obscure, the overall effect is that the full gamut of religious cults is present in the Jerusalem temple, from the local Canaanite Asherah (presented as the least offensive) to Mesopotamian and Egyptian rituals. As a result, YHWH will show no mercy in punishing the people.

(9:1–11) The Divine Avengers As Ezekiel looks on, YHWH summons seven executioners to carry out his sentence against the city. Meanwhile, the divine glory moves from the holy of holies out to the threshold of the temple. In a recapitulation of the Exodus narrative, those to be spared are given an identifying mark (the Hebrew letter taw) to protect them as the destroyers pass through the city. The destroyers are explicitly told to defile the temple with corpses and then proceed outwards, killing throughout the city (vv. 5–6). In a rare instance of self-expression Ezekiel protests (v. 8) that YHWH will destroy all that remains of Israel, but YHWH remains implacable. This vision of Jerusalem's destruction is a symbolic, not literal, fulfilment of YHWH's judgement. It may be, however, that here the prophetic vision has the same efficacy elsewhere attributed to the prophetic word (cf. Isa 55:11), so that the vision itself seals the fate of Jerusalem.

(10:1–22) Reappearance of the Chariot After the avengers have completed their killing, Ezekiel sees again the chariot vision that he earlier received by the Chebar river. While occasional details differ from those of ch. 1, the living creatures, now explicitly called cherubim, the wheels, and their motion are again described in exhaustive detail. Now, however, the divine throne chariot assumes a role in the ongoing drama of Ezekiel's temple vision. One of the destroyers is instructed to bring coals from the midst of the cherubim and scatter them over the city. The coals may represent either the city's destruction following the death of its inhabitants or the beginning of purification (cf. Isa 6:6–7). The avenger takes the coals but no account of the city's destruction (or purification) follows. Instead, the prophet focuses on the cherubim bearing the divine throne and on the movement of YHWH's glory out of the temple. The details of this second chariot vision are confusing, making it impossible to follow precisely where the glory is (if the glory begins its journey in the holy of holies, who is seated above the firmament carried by the cherubim?), and the relative movements of the glory and cherubim. The overall effect of the vision is clear: the glory leaves its seat within the holy of holies and mounts the living chariot, departing in stages from the temple. By the chapter's end the glory of YHWH is mounted over the cherubim, stationed at the door of the temple's east gate, and poised to depart.

(11:1–25) The Glory Departs The Twenty-five Men (vv. 1–13): the spirit now carries Ezekiel to the temple's east gate, following the progress of the divine glory on its chariot. At the gateway Ezekiel sees twenty-five men (v. 1), apparently a separate group from those described in 8:16. These are accused of giving 'wicked counsel' (v. 2), probably advocating revolt against Babylon and reliance on Egypt. They are quoted as saying, 'It is not time for building houses; the city is the pot and we are the meat' (v. 3). The second half of the saying is given as the reason not to build houses and the metaphor seems to have clear implications for Ezekiel's original audience. Unfortunately, the meaning is no longer self-evident. Some interpret the meat as the choice portions chosen for inclusion. In this case the speakers would disdain to build more housing for the less 'select' members of society, since they themselves, having been spared exile, are now the élite of the city. Such an interpretation is precarious given the metaphor's obvious extension (made explicit in 24:1–5), that even the most select cuts are in the pot only to be cooked, clearly not a desirable fate. The saying, then, must reflect the men's dismay at inhabiting a 'cauldron'. No time now for building houses or any other peacetime pursuit (cf. Jer 29:4–6); all energy must go to defence lest they be 'cooked' in an upcoming siege. YHWH answers in effect that cooking is too mild a fate for these men. The city is indeed a pot, but it is the bodies of those whom the speakers have killed (whether as a result of their 'wicked counsel' or through some other abuse) that will be the meat. Whether Ezekiel is here holding the twenty-five men responsible for people already killed or anticipates the people's death during the siege (for which the 'counsellors' are indirectly responsible) is uncertain. The men, however, will be removed from the city and judged at the border of Israel (v. 11). The reference to judgement at the border may be a later addition, reflecting Nebuchadnezzar's punishment of Zedekiah and his entourage at Riblah following the siege of Jerusalem in 586 BCE. Ezekiel then reports that even as he was delivering this prophecy Pelatiah, one of the twenty-five men, fell dead, at which point Ezekiel again (v. 13, cf. 9:8) objects that YHWH seems to be destroying even the remnant of Israel.

The Chariot Departs (vv. 14–25). YHWH responds to Ezekiel's protest of v. 13 with an oracle directed to the exiles. Although all Ezekiel's oracles are perforce delivered to the exilic community, this is the first directly addressing their fate. The current residents of Jerusalem, says YHWH, claim that having been spared the exile they are the (righteous) inheritors of the land, while the (unrighteous) exiles have been removed from YHWH's presence (v. 15; cf. 8:6; cf. Jer 24). YHWH, however, refers to the exiles as 'the whole house of Israel', and says that though the exiles have been removed, he has in fact been to some extent their sanctuary in exile (v. 16). The image is striking. Not only does YHWH claim to have been present outside the land of Israel, but he identifies his presence as itself a sanctuary (miqdāš) in the temple's absence. YHWH then promises that the exiles will in fact return and be given the land. Moreover, YHWH will replace their heart of stone with a new and unified heart, a heart of flesh willing to follow YHWH's covenants and ordinances (vv. 19–20; cf. 36:26). YHWH then invokes the covenant formula, 'They will be my people and I will be their God', promising a new covenant with Israel upon their return. The promise combines elements from Jer 31:31–4 and 32:36–41. Strikingly, while YHWH in Jer 32:39 gives the people a 'single', i.e. unified, heart and in Jer 31:33 inscribes the law on the people's hearts, in Ezekiel YHWH must replace the people's heart altogether. Humankind must be recreated if they are to be capable of obedience.

Following this complete repudiation of Jerusalem and the corresponding promises to the exiles, in vv. 22–3 YHWH departs the temple and city altogether, flying to 'the mountain east of the city', the Mount of Olives. Commentators widely assume that the divine glory merely pauses at the Mount of Olives on its way to Babylonia, but such an assumption is without textual support. On the contrary, the Mount of Olives was the traditional goal of the ark's procession at the New Year Festival and the site from which the Divine Warrior waged his battles (see ABD, 'Olives, Mount of'). YHWH has left the Jerusalem temple riding on his war chariot, having effectively declared war against Judah and Jerusalem. Ezekiel concludes with the notice that after the glory's departure the spirit returned Ezekiel to Babylon, the vision ended, and he reported to the exiles what he had seen (v. 25).

Rulers, Elders, Prophets, and a Few Virtuous Individuals (12:1–14:23)

(12:1–16) Escaping the City Ezekiel is now commanded to perform a sign-act directed at 'the rebellious house who have eyes to see but do not see and ears to hear but do not hear' (v. 2). The reference to the people's wilful incomprehension recalls similar characteristics in Isa 6:9 and Jer 5:21. Ezekiel is to prepare 'baggage for exile', presumably the barest necessities, then dig through the wall and depart at night, covering his face so as not to see the land. In v. 7 Ezekiel carries out the symbolic action. The action seems to represent a resident of Jerusalem during a siege who has decided to escape the city by night rather than suffer siege conditions or be forcibly removed by the attacking army. The symbolism of covering the face so as not to see the land is enigmatic, especially since the action is undertaken at night, when the land would not be visible in any event. Most likely the gesture represents the successful escapee's new condition—safe, but no longer able to see the land.

In vv. 8–16 Ezekiel responds to the people's questions regarding his actions. Ezekiel explains, 'As I have done, so shall it be done' to the residents of Jerusalem (v. 11). This response deviates somewhat from the action itself, since Ezekiel has represented someone escaping the city furtively, while the niphāl yē'āšeh ('it shall be done') indicates that the exile will be imposed upon the people. Ezekiel's response focuses on 'the prince in Jerusalem' (v. 10), that is, Zedekiah, who will pack a bag, dig through the wall, and cover his face

(v. 12). YHWH will capture him, however; he will be taken to Babylon 'but shall not see it' (v. 13). The prophecy gives a substantially accurate description of Zedekiah's fate in the upcoming siege of Jerusalem. According to 2 Kings 25:4–7 (Jer 52:4–11), after the Babylonians took the city Zedekiah escaped via a gate near the palace. He was captured, taken to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, and witnessed his own sons' execution before being blinded and taken to Babylon. The details of Zedekiah first escaping, then being captured and taken to Babylon, but unable to see, match the actual events of 586 BCE so closely that the passage is commonly considered 'prophecy after the event', a later addition posing as a prediction. The case, however, is far from simple, since in fact Zedekiah did not burrow through the wall, and the blinding of rebellious vassals was common and perhaps even stipulated in Zedekiah's vassal treaty. The oracle gives a plausible description of what might happen should Zedekiah attempt to escape the impending siege. The sign-act ends with the recognition formula: those who survive will acknowledge YHWH in their exile (v. 16).

(12:17–20) Quaking with Fear Ezekiel performs a second sign depicting the siege of Jerusalem: this time not an escape scene but a symbolic portrayal of those remaining during the siege. He is to eat bread and drink water while trembling. Similar to the sign-act of 4:9–17 demonstrating the people's deprivation, eating and drinking while trembling shows the extent to which all of life will be dominated by fear of the upcoming destruction. Here, as in 8:17 and 9:9, it is violence rather than cultic or treaty infidelity for which YHWH will punish Judah (v. 19).

(12:21–8) Prophecy and Fulfilment The final section of ch. 12 addresses the people's self-serving belief that prophetic oracles and visions are fulfilled only in the distant future if at all, and their resulting complacency in the face of Ezekiel's prophecy. Twice YHWH cites the people's words: first, a proverb indicating that longstanding prophecies remain (and presumably will continue to remain) unfulfilled (v. 22), and second, the opinion that Ezekiel's prophecies deal only with the distant future (v. 27). The two sayings dovetail conveniently, allowing people to write off new prophecy as not yet due for fulfilment and ancient prophecy as having 'expired'. YHWH responds to both sayings with the grim assurance that no prophecy will be delayed any longer; all will soon be performed.

(13:1–23) Varieties of False Prophecy Following YHWH's defence of authentic prophecies that remain embarrassingly unfulfilled, in Ezek 13 he condemns three separate groups of false prophets in Israel: self-appointed men who prophesy despite having heard nothing from YHWH; men who create a false sense of security through platitudinous promises of well-being; and women whose magical practices endanger their clients' lives. vv. 2–9 are directed against men who prophesy 'from their own imagination' (v. 2), who fabricate prophecies, having in fact seen nothing. In implicit contrast to Ezekiel, stationed in 3:16–21 as lookout on the city walls, these prophets are scavengers in the ruins of Jerusalem, having neither filled in the breaches nor erected a wall on which to stand on the 'day of the Lord' when the Divine Warrior attacks. Instead they announce, 'Says the Lord', when YHWH has not spoken (v. 6). These prophets receive ironically fitting punishment. YHWH responds to their false prophecy with a genuine oracle (appropriately beginning, 'thus says the LORD'; v. 8), announcing that his hand is against ('el') these prophets (not, as in Ezekiel's case, 'upon them'; cf. 1:3), and they will be expelled from both the people and the land of Israel. The recognition formula in v. 9 wryly attests that only after their complete rejection will these prophets 'know the LORD'.

The second group of prophets (vv. 10–16) predict only peace when in fact destruction awaits the people. These so-called 'peace prophets' are documented throughout the book of Jeremiah as a major presence in Jerusalem, a group whose message is understandably better received than are Jeremiah's predictions of disaster (Jer 6:14; 8:11; 14:13–16, et passim). These prophets, like the deluded prophets of vv. 2–9, are also depicted via imagery contrasting their actions with Ezekiel's role as lookout on the city wall. In this case the people build a patently insubstantial wall, namely their hope of successful rebellion, and the prophets, whitewashing the mud-brick wall, validate the people's false hopes. YHWH counters by declaring that he will bring rain and wind, attributes of the Divine Warrior, and wash away the wall and the prophets with it. Only in their death will these prophets acknowledge YHWH, who will shower, not peace, but rage upon the city (vv. 13, 15).

Finally, in vv. 17–23 YHWH directs Ezekiel to prophesy against a group of women charged, like the men of vv. 2–9, with making up their own prophecies and also with practising divination. The women sew items of fabric to be placed on the people's arms and heads, either as amulets or for divination. The women are further accused of 'profaning' YHWH by means of barley and bread (v. 19). The exact nature of the women's activities is debated; whether the grain represents a payment for divination or an offering, and if an offering, to what deity. Because the grains are able to 'profane' (hll) YHWH, they were probably offered to him, but in a manner capable of profaning his name. Divination, a practice forbidden in Ex 22:18 and Deut 18:10, might have been understood to defile YHWH if performed in his name. The women who in Jer 44:17–19 report having offered cakes to the queen of heaven (probably Astarte) during this period may provide a parallel. Not only is this divination a forbidden practice; it also serves the opposite purpose from Ezekiel's own prophecy. While he is commissioned to warn the wicked and support the righteous (3:16–21), the female prophets' divination encourages the wicked while discouraging the righteous (vv. 19, 22). If Ezekiel's authentic prophetic calling places his own life at stake (EZEK 3:16–21), how much more so the lives of these diviners who work at cross-purposes to YHWH. YHWH announces that he will tear off the female prophets' magical coverings and release the people whose lives have been captured by these false prophets (vv. 20–1). Then, says YHWH, they will acknowledge him.

The prophets currently in Israel are uniformly depicted by means of a negative comparison with Ezekiel, prophesying in Babylon. Whereas in his commissioning in 3:16–21 Ezekiel is posted on the wall to deliver YHWH's word, these prophets refuse either to build or to stand on the wall, and have received no word from YHWH. While Ezekiel must warn the wicked to repent and the righteous to stand firm, Israel's prophets reassure the wicked and dishearten the righteous. Ironically, it is the prophet farthest from Jerusalem's walls and apparently in the least danger who must stand guard on the walls and risk his life.

(14:1–11) The Idolatrous Elders Ezekiel is approached, as in 8:1 (and cf. 20:1) by a group of elders, this time having come to 'enquire' of YHWH. That is, rather than simply receiving whatever word of YHWH Ezekiel might speak, here the elders engage in the traditional practice of using the prophet as mediator to convey specific questions to YHWH (cf. Judg 18:5). YHWH, however, refuses to co-operate in the enquiry because of the seriousness of the elders' idolatry (cf. 20:3–4). Remarkably, the elders are not condemned simply for idolatry, but for 'lifting up' their idols 'into their hearts' (v. 4, my tr.). This accusation is far from clear, but seems to focus on the depth of the elders' attachment to idolatrous images (cf. the Jerusalem elders described in 8:9–12, who maintained secret 'picture rooms' inside the temple itself). YHWH's only response to the elders' enquiry is to warn them to turn back from idolatry or suffer death at his hands (vv. 6–8). When the idolater is 'cut off', an expression denoting sudden death as a punishment for sin, then the people will acknowledge YHWH (v. 8). YHWH goes on to say that if a prophet should in fact deliver a response to the idolater's enquiry, that response would be a deceitful one, planted by YHWH. The oracle thus serves as a warning to the prophet as well as a rebuke to the elders. Should a prophet persist in presenting the idolatrous elders' enquiry, which YHWH has already refused to hear, then that prophet would in fact receive a word in response, but the word would be an intentional lie sent by YHWH. YHWH would then destroy the prophet as well as the enquirer. YHWH's threat to entrap the people by sending deceitful oracles foreshadows the 'bad laws' of 20:25. Here and in ch. 20, however, YHWH's deceit and punishment of the people is not absolute, but preparation for his renewed rule over the covenant people (cf. 20:33, 40–4; 11:20).

(14:12–23) Noah, Dan'el, and Job In the second half of the chapter YHWH addresses the question of individual responsibility for sin. The issue was touched on in ch. 9 when the righteous Jerusalemites were marked so as to escape the city's destruction (9:4; and see EZEK 18:1–30). The number of citizens to be spared was apparently quite small, as Ezekiel protests that YHWH is destroying the last remnant of Israel (9:8). Now the question arises of whether a few righteous individuals might not suffice to save an entire city (as proposed by Abraham in Gen 18:22–33) or at least members of their own family (as Abraham was able to do; Gen 19:29). YHWH therefore puts forward for consideration the hypothetical example of a land inhabited by three legendary paragons of virtue: Noah, Dan'el, and Job. Noah was the most (or only) righteous person of his generation (Gen 6:9), and was consequently spared along with his family in the Flood. Dan'el is known from the Ugaritic Epic of Aqhat (the biblical Daniel's name does not occur in Ezekiel), in which Dan'el is a king famed for his wisdom and righteousness (see ABD, 'Daniel, Book of'). Job was 'blameless and upright, one who feared God' (Job 1:1), but his offerings on his children's behalf failed to save them. YHWH next posits a hypothetical land that has committed trespass (m'l, v. 13) against him, that is, defiled sancta (objects dedicated to temple service and therefore holy; see ABD, 'Holiness, OT') or broken an oath sworn in YHWH's name (see Milgrom 1976). YHWH further posits that should the three aforementioned paragons of virtue inhabit this land, even they would be helpless to save their own children from YHWH's punishment of famine, wild beasts, sword, and plague. It is allowed to go without saying that the prospects for anyone saving the current generation are slim indeed.

The scenario recalls YHWH's predictions in ch. 5 and 7 that he is about to bring these four levitically prescribed punishments against Jerusalem and Israel. The use of the technical term for trespass against sancta (m'l, translated 'acting faithlessly' in NRSV) suggests Jerusalem's own defilement of YHWH's sanctuary by idolatry and his name by treaty violation. The chapter's conclusion thus comes as no surprise: Jerusalem (which is patently not inhabited by Noah, Dan²el, or Job) will not be spared, whether for the sake of some few righteous citizens, or by the righteousness of those exiles whose children will now share in the city's doom (v. 21). YHWH adds the ironic note that some will in fact survive the city's destruction and be brought into exile. These will serve as consolation to the exiles, not because they were spared, but because their obvious wickedness will make it clear that YHWH did not destroy the city without reason (vv. 22–3).

The Twisted Symbols of Judah's Pride (15:1–20:44)

(15:1–8) The Useless Vine Ch. 15 ironically subverts the traditional metaphor of Israel as a luxuriant vine, lovingly tended by YHWH (cf. Isa 5:1–7; Gen 49:22; Jer 2:21). The chapter marks the first in a series of bitter parodies based on Israel's national symbols: Israel as a vine (here and in ch. 17), as the bride of YHWH (chs. 16 and 23), and as a proud lion (ch. 19). This deconstruction of Israel's national identity climaxes in ch. 20, where even the Exodus story is transformed into a history of Israel's degradation and YHWH's rejection. YHWH begins in 15:2 by posing a riddle to Ezekiel: how does the vine wood differ from any other wood? He continues with a series of rhetorical questions, proving that vine wood is distinctive only in its utter uselessness. Thus, this inferior wood serves only to be burned, or perhaps merely charred, a process rendering it even less useful than it had been initially. The figure of the vine wood's complete inutility patently contradicts Israel's self-styling as a fruitful vine. YHWH's comment on the further uselessness of charred vinewood is explained in vv. 6–8 as a metaphor for Jerusalem which has now been partially burned by Babylonia. Like the charred vinewood, Jerusalem will be burned again. The punishment, says YHWH, will result from the people's trespass (m'l). v. 8, the defilement of holy objects or of the divine name already condemned in 14:13.

(16:1–63) YHWH's Unfaithful Wife In Ezek 16 YHWH takes up the metaphor of Jerusalem as the bride of YHWH, declares her to be thoroughly unfaithful, and passes the death sentence upon her. Thus, as in the metaphor of the vine in ch. 15, so here too a symbol of national pride is transformed into a symbol of national shame. The chapter is divided into three sections: vv. 1–43, a biography of Jerusalem; vv. 44–52, an unfavourable comparison of Jerusalem to Samaria and Sodom; and vv. 59–63, in which YHWH promises at last to forgive Jerusalem. The metaphor of the city as wife has deep roots in the ancient Near East. Capital cities were routinely considered goddesses, often the consorts of resident male deities and mothers to their inhabitants. The Israelite prophets continued to personify both Israelite and foreign capitals, but ordinarily presented them as debauched and unfaithful (Galambush 1992; cf. Hos 1–4; Isa 1:21–6; 23; 54; Jer 2; et passim).

YHWH commands Ezekiel to inform Jerusalem of the accusation brought against her, and in vv. 3–34 provides a 'biography' for his bride. Jerusalem, he says, is Canaanite, the daughter of an Amorite and a Hittite (v. 3; Jerusalem's Canaanite origins are well attested in OT: Jebusites, as per Judg 1:21; 2 Sam 5:6–10). The reference to Amorites and Hittites is best taken as in apposition to 'Canaanite' (and thus referring to the Hittites of Palestine (Gen 15:20), not those of Anatolia), an example of Canaanite peoples generally rather than a specific claim about the city's founders. As an infant Jerusalem was abandoned in a field, a common method in antiquity for disposing of unwanted children. YHWH finds her lying in the field, still covered with placental blood. His command for her to live apparently constitutes legal adoption (see Malul 1990), though he gives her no care until she reaches adolescence. When YHWH visits the girl again she has reached puberty; YHWH provides a graphic description of the still-naked and still-bloody girl's breasts and pubic hair (v. 7). YHWH now covers and bathes the girl, entering a marriage covenant. The imagery is disturbing to the modern reader; YHWH's behaviour seems lecherous, even incestuous, and the reader, like the prophet, is enlisted as a witness to Jerusalem's perverse sexual history. YHWH adorns his new bride lavishly, and her clothing of linen and tāḥās, a material mentioned elsewhere only as a covering for the tabernacle, reflects the true significance of the city as bride: she is home to YHWH's holy of holies, the sanctuary in which YHWH's honour will be either maintained or defiled.

YHWH bestows perfect beauty upon his regal bride, but she has plans of her own. In vv. 15–22 Jerusalem systematically takes YHWH's gifts—clothing, food, gold, even children—and uses them for idolatrous purposes, described in the metaphor as prostitution. The charge of child-sacrifice is supported by similar charges in Jeremiah (e.g. 7:31, and see Ezek 20:25–6). In addition to 'adulterous' relations with other gods, Jerusalem seeks liaisons with other nations, the sexually potent Egyptians and the Babylonians. The charge that Jerusalem's foreign alliances constituted infidelity to YHWH is rooted, not in the marriage metaphor, but in the metaphor of YHWH as king. Israel has entered a vassal treaty (see ABD, 'Covenant') with YHWH and is therefore forbidden to give loyalty to any other king. Here the competing kings are pictured as Jerusalem's lovers, copulating with YHWH's bride and thereby violating his sexual honour. Jerusalem, meanwhile, is portrayed as a 'perverted prostitute' who pays her clients; that is, she pays tribute to the foreign nations with which she consorts (v. 34). The sequence of events roughly corresponds to Jerusalem's political history. Jerusalem entered an anti-Assyrian alliance with Egypt in 705 BCE (v. 26), after which Sennacherib in 701 BCE awarded Judahite territory to Philistia (v. 27). 'Unsatisfied' by the Assyrians (v. 28), Judah became a Babylonian vassal in 605 BCE (v. 29), but remained unsatisfied (v. 29), as witnessed by her numerous attempts at revolt.

In vv. 35–43 YHWH announces his wife's punishment: exposure and stoning, common punishments for adultery in the Bible and ancient Near East (Hos 2:10 [MT v.12]; Jer 13:22; and cf. Westerbrook 1990). The punishing agents, however, are not the husband or community as would be expected, but Jerusalem's former lovers. Here Ezekiel must shape the metaphor to suit historical reality. YHWH's rivals, the foreign nations, now become his agents in Jerusalem's destruction. In addition to being exposed and stoned, Jerusalem is hacked with swords and her houses burned (vv. 40–1), actions reflecting actual warfare. This, says YHWH, will satisfy his rage, ease his jealousy, and leave him calm. The husband's visceral satisfaction over his wife's death is presumably appropriate in its ancient Near-Eastern context, and the vocabulary parallels that used elsewhere in Ezekiel to describe YHWH's satisfied rage (cf. 5:13). To the modern reader, however, the scene is horrifying, the more so because the wife-killing husband is God.

In vv. 44–58 YHWH describes Jerusalem's place within an entire family of sinful women (cf. Jer 3:6–11). Her Canaanite mother, says YHWH, hated her own husband and children, just as Jerusalem has hated hers. YHWH goes on to claim that Jerusalem is the second of three sister cities, of which Samaria is the eldest and Sodom the youngest. The anachronism of portraying Sodom as 'younger' than Jerusalem may reflect the former city's relative unimportance or may be an adjustment necessary to preserve Samaria as Jerusalem's immediate role model (cf. ch. 23). Compared with two infamously wicked cities Jerusalem is found to be the worst. Contrary to the account of Gen 19, here the sin of Sodom is described as neglect of the poor despite the city's prosperity (cf. Isa 1:10–17), while Samaria is accused simply of 'abominations' (v. 51). Both sisters, however, look righteous in comparison to Jerusalem. Surprisingly, YHWH goes on to say he will restore all three cities and their daughters (suburbs or dependent towns), but that Jerusalem will be shamed before her two sisters (v. 54). Just as Sodom had been a byword connoting wickedness in the past, so now Jerusalem serves as an infamous object-lesson to her neighbours (vv. 56–7).

In vv. 59–63 YHWH summarizes Jerusalem's sin and both his punishment and his restoration of the city. Here Jerusalem's sin is described simply as 'showing contempt for the oath by breaking covenant' (v. 59, my tr.). All Jerusalem's sin fits under the rubric of covenant-breaking, but the specific charge of contempt for the oath introduces an issue that will be more fully explored in Ezek 17, namely, that in breaking his treaty oath to Nebuchadnezzar, Zedekiah has committed a trespass (m'?) against YHWH. 'I will deal with you as you have done', says YHWH (v. 59), that is, ignore his own covenant obligations to Jerusalem just as she has ignored hers to him. Yet, he goes on, he will ultimately establish an eternal covenant with Jerusalem. Although Samaria and Sodom will become her 'daughters', Jerusalem herself will be overcome with shame when at last she acknowledges YHWH (vv. 61–3).

(17:1–24) The Allegory of the Cedar In this chapter Ezekiel is instructed to 'propound a riddle', another in a series of extended metaphors. The metaphor is easily understood already in vv. 1–10, but a point-by-point explanation in vv. 11–21 becomes the occasion for YHWH to give his own perspective on the events described. Finally, in vv. 22–4 YHWH provides a new ending for the story, an allegory predicting YHWH's restoration of Judah.

In the allegory of vv. 1–10 a great eagle takes the top off a cedar of Lebanon and transports it to another land. He then takes some of the local seed and plants and waters it until it grows into a luxuriant vine spreading towards him. When a second eagle arrives, however, the vine turns and grows towards him, and he in turn transplants and waters the vine. Ezekiel's original audience would have had no trouble following the story. The first eagle is Nebuchadnezzar and the head of the cedar (considered a royal tree) is Jehoiachin, taken to Babylonia. Meanwhile, some of the royal 'seed', Zedekiah, is planted in Jerusalem. Zedekiah initially shows loyalty to Babylon (growing in his direction), but when Psammetichus of Egypt arrives he abandons Babylon for Egypt (see Ezek B.2). Ironically, whereas Jehoiachin was depicted as the top of a cedar, Zedekiah remains a creeping vine (cf. ch. 15). YHWH asks rhetorically whether such a vine will survive or be pulled out by its planter and desiccated by the harsh 'east wind'.

In vv. 11–21 YHWH explains the oracle as depicting Nebuchadnezzar's capture of Jehoiachin and Zedekiah's wavering loyalty, again concluding with a series of rhetorical questions: Can Zedekiah succeed, breaking covenant and yet escaping? Now YHWH gives explicit answers to his questions. Zedekiah will die in Babylon, the land of the king for whose oath he had contempt by breaking covenant (vv. 16, 18; cf. 16:59). Indeed, says YHWH, it was my oath that he despised, and my covenant that he broke' (v. 19, emph. added), committing trespass (m'?, v. 20; cf. 14:13, et passim) against YHWH. It is YHWH whose honour has been defiled and he who will avenge it. Finally (vv. 22–4), YHWH adds his own ending to the story: he himself will take a sprig from the top of the cedar and plant it on a high mountain of Israel. This plant will at once bear fruit (as the vine, Zedekiah, did not) and grow into a towering cedar (like Jehoiachin). What earthly kings attempted YHWH will accomplish, and Israel will thrive under an upright ruler of the Davidic house. If Israel's destruction vindicated YHWH's power before his own people (v. 21), Israel's restoration will demonstrate his sovereignty before the world (v. 24). This idyllic ending to the allegory, while unexpected in the midst of oracles of punishment, may none the less be original to Ezekiel, as it fits the pattern that will be repeated over the entire course of the book: YHWH will first destroy and then restore, both destroying and restoring in order that his sovereignty might be acknowledged (v. 24; cf. 20:1–44; 36:16–32).

(18:1–30) On Individual Responsibility In this chapter Ezekiel responds to the Israelite tradition that 'the sins of the parents are visited upon the children' (cf. Ex 34:7; Jer 32:18), arguing instead that each individual is responsible for his or her own sins. The question of responsibility would have been crucial during the Exile, and Ezekiel has already touched on the subject in the commissioning in 3:16–21 where the relative responsibility of Ezekiel and his hearers is discussed, and in ch. 14, in which YHWH denies that one person's virtue might save another. The chapter is a rhetorical tour de force formulated in response to a proverb current in Israel (see Jeremiah's citation of it in 31:29) and presumably among the exiles as well: 'The parents have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge' (v. 2). The proverb deflects responsibility for the exile away from the current generation and into the past, a view of history shared by the editors of 2 Kings, who held both Manasseh (ch. 21) and Hezekiah (20:17–18) responsible for the Babylonian Exile. The proverb, whether used by those still in the land or by the exiles, serves simultaneously as complaint and reassurance; YHWH may be punishing us for sins we did not commit, but at least we are not to blame for our condition. The prevailing tone is one of complacent self-pity.

YHWH responds with an oath, forbidding the proverb's use and announcing that only 'the person who sins shall die' (v. 4). He then (vv. 5–20) describes a family of three generations: a righteous father, an evil son, and a righteous grandson. The righteous father, says YHWH, having kept the commandments, shall live; the violent, idolatrous son shall die bearing sole responsibility for his own death; the righteous grandson shall live, free from responsibility for his father's sins. Ezekiel's audience challenges this distribution of justice, asking, 'Why shouldn't the son suffer for the father's sin?' (v. 19, my tr.). The objection reflects both the people's comfort with the tradition of retribution and their discomfort at the most obvious application of YHWH's words: if the exile does not reflect their parents' sins, it must reflect their own. YHWH, however, reiterates that if the son has done what is right, then he shall live; the person that sins shall die (vv. 19b–20).

YHWH next changes the terms of the argument, taking up in vv. 21–4 the question of how a person is to be judged who turns within their own lifetime from wickedness to righteousness or from righteousness to wickedness. That is, instead of discussing retribution from generation to generation YHWH moves to the case of a single generation. Within a culture focused not on individuality but on tribal continuity YHWH's separation of the generations in vv. 5–20 might well have raised the question of how and when, if not from generation to generation, YHWH did in fact parcel out retribution for sins (cf. Job 18:19; 20:10; 21:7–13, 19). In the specific context of the exile, however, the change in topic from cross-generational behaviour to sin and repentance within a single lifetime effectively ends the people's speculation about who sinned in the past and focuses the argument squarely on their own choices in the present. A wicked person, says YHWH, who repents, keeping YHWH's laws and statutes, shall not die but live (v. 21). YHWH's goal is not the death of the wicked but their repentance. A righteous person, however, who turns from righteousness to sin will be held responsible for their trespass (m'ḏ, v. 24) and shall die.

The people complain in v. 25 that YHWH's conduct as set forth in this passage is 'unruly' (lō yittakēn, my tr.), presumably because it does not conform to established standards governing sin and its punishment. YHWH responds that it is not his conduct but theirs that is unruly. Re-emphasizing the logic of punishing a righteous person who turns to evil but sparing a wicked person who turns to righteousness, YHWH repeats that it is not his conduct, in judging the people, that is unruly, but theirs (v. 29). The people's discomfort reflects only their suspicion that judged by these standards they deserve not only exile but death. In vv. 30–2 YHWH abandons theoretical discourse about hypothetical behaviour—whether each person should be judged by their own actions—and announces that he will now judge his hearers, each according to their deeds. The rhetorical shift marks the climax of a speech that has progressed from discussion of multiple generations to evaluation of individuals within a generation, and finally to the current behaviour of the specific individuals at hand. 'Turn', says YHWH, 'from all your evil deeds... Why would you die, O house of Israel?' (vv. 30–1, my tr.). Whereas the people have implicated themselves by their own objections to YHWH's judgements, YHWH has proved not only his justice but Israel's guilt and the very real danger of punishment facing the people. Urging them to get themselves 'a new heart' (v. 31; note the contrast with 11:19 and 36:26 in which YHWH himself must replace the people's heart), YHWH reminds them that he has no stake in their death, which now seems inevitable according to the standards he has just delineated. Like the wicked person of vv. 21–2, however, YHWH's hearers face not simple condemnation but a decision. 'I have no pleasure in the death of anyone,' says YHWH (v. 32). 'Turn, then, and live.'

(19:1–19) The Dirge for the Rulers of Israel In ch. 19 Ezekiel is instructed to sing a dirge for Israel's ruler (emending MT's nšš'ē to sing. with LXX). Israelite prophets frequently employed the dirge (qînā) form, with its distinctive 3–2 metre (cf. Am 5:2), addressing the dirge directly to the person being 'mourned', thus simultaneously predicting his or her downfall and lamenting it as an accomplished fact (cf. Ezek 26:17; 27:2, et passim). This dirge has two sections, each describing the ruler's mother. In vv. 2–9 she is presented as a lioness and in 10–14 as a vine, both common symbols for Judah and the Davidic dynasty.

The 'prince' addressed is probably Zedekiah, not Jehoiachin, as Ezekiel ordinarily calls Jehoiachin 'king' (melek) and Zedekiah 'prince' (nāšī'). The dirge focuses on the prince's mother, probably the city of Jerusalem as seat of the royal family and 'mother' to her inhabitants (cf. Ezek 16:1–63) rather than on an actual or idealized queen mother. The dirge depicts the Judean royal house as lions, a tradition established in Gen 49:9. The mother lion raises a cub to maturity; he learns to hunt and, we learn, becomes a man-eater. This grotesque distortion of Judah's national symbol follows the pattern set in chs. 15–17. The luxuriant vine is worthless and charred (Ezek 15:1–8); the bride sleeps with every passer-by (Ezek 16:1–63); and the proud lion now devours human beings. The lion, having turned man-eater, is captured and led off to Egypt. The lioness now takes another cub and raises him to maturity, at which point he, too, becomes a man-eater. Indeed, this lion ravages cities (the difficult term 'widows' in v. 7 occurs in parallel with 'cities', and probably reflects application of this term to devastated cities; cf. Cohen 1973) and terrorizes the countryside. Soon he, too, is apprehended and taken to Babylon (v. 9). The identity of the first lion cub is clear: Jehoahaz, the son of Josiah, crowned by the people in 609 BCE but immediately deposed and deported by Pharaoh Necho II (610–595 BCE) is the only Judean monarch exiled to Egypt. The second cub is more difficult to identify; Jehoiachin and Zedekiah are both possibilities, but Jehoiachin is the more likely candidate. Jehoiachin had indeed been led before the king of Babylon, though he ruled only three months during which time he was hardly the international threat depicted here. Commentators who seek a literal queen of Judah as the two cubs' mother rather than the personified Jerusalem identify the second cub as Zedekiah because his mother, Hamutal, was also mother of Jehoahaz (2 Kings 24:17–18).

The second half of the dirge (vv. 10–14) is based, like chs. 15 and 17, on the vine as a symbol of Israel. Now the prince is told that his mother was like a vine, fruitful and lush, bearing boughs from which sceptres were made (unlike the useless wood of ch. 15). The vine climbed to a tremendous height, but was then uprooted, thrown to the ground, desiccated by the east wind, and then burned. Now, says YHWH, she has been transplanted in the wilderness and no bough remains from which to make a sceptre. As in vv. 2–9, the mother is Jerusalem. Her strong boughs, made into sceptres, represent the Davidic dynasty. The proud city, however, has now been torn down, stripped, and burnt with fire. Her prominent citizens exiled, she has been 'transplanted' to Babylon. The figure could describe Jerusalem's condition following the Babylonian capture in 597 BCE or could look forward to devastation yet to come. The prophetic convention of 'mourning in advance' allows either possibility, though the references to the devastating east wind (v. 12) predicted in 17:10 and to a time when no Davidic ruler remains (v. 14) suggest that the dirge predicts Zedekiah's downfall and the destruction of Jerusalem.

(20:1–44) Israel's Perverse Exodus Ezek 20 opens with a date formula (v. 1), the first since 8:1, dating the oracle to August 591 BCE, just over a year after the temple vision of chs. 8–11. As in 14:1 (and implied in 8:1) a group of elders has approached Ezekiel, hoping to enquire of YHWH. As before, YHWH refuses, this time by solemn oath (v. 3), to participate in their enquiry. Instead, he commands Ezekiel to judge them. YHWH proceeds by retelling the story of Israel's sojourn in and exodus from Egypt. The story forms a climax to the allegories in chs. 15–17 and 19, in which symbols of Israelite national identity are ironically recast into emblems of national shame. In ch. 20 the nation's founding myth, the Exodus narrative, undergoes an analogous subversion, becoming a tale of YHWH's endless rage against an Israel that cannot be ruled. The narrative is framed by YHWH's solemn oath in vv. 5 and 31 that he will not allow the elders to enquire of him. The problem of YHWH's oath and the honour of his name, prominent throughout Ezekiel, forms the core of this twisted history of Israel.

The history of Israel is depicted as a repetitious cycle in which YHWH first acts on the people's behalf and then sets out laws for them to follow. The people, however, rebel against YHWH, who considers destroying them, but instead acts for his 'name's sake', that is, for the sake of his honour, bound by the covenant with Israel. The history begins in v. 5, on the day YHWH chose Israel. Remarkably, Israel's election is said to have taken place in Egypt. The earlier covenants with Abraham, Israel, and Jacob are not mentioned, suggesting either that Ezekiel deliberately changes the traditional story or, equally likely, that he is acquainted with an alternative version, still current in the period before the Pentateuch's canonization. YHWH emphasizes his early vow to Israel, repeating three times in two verses (5–6) that he took an oath (lit. raised my hand) declaring that he was their God and would bring them out of Egypt into their own land. YHWH demanded that his people discard their Egyptian idols, but his demands were ignored. Ezekiel's claim of Israel's initial election and subsequent rebellion while still in Egypt is unique, but consistent with strands in the Exodus narrative suggesting that the Israelites in Egypt were not acquainted with YHWH as their god and were reluctant to follow him, even in exchange for freedom (Ex 6:9; 14:11–12).

YHWH, faced with Israel's rebellion, decides to destroy the people already in Egypt (v. 8). Upon realizing, however, that by breaking his oath he would profane his own name—and that in plain sight of all the surrounding nations—he instead leads Israel out into the wilderness, where he provides statutes and ordinances for Israel's benefit (vv. 10–12). Israel shamelessly violates YHWH's statutes; YHWH again considers destroying them but again chooses not to profane his own name by doing so. Instead, he swears a new oath, namely, that he would not bring the people into the land (v. 15). This decision to reject the wilderness generation parallels the punishment decreed in Num 14, though the causes for YHWH's anger differ there. YHWH next commands the generation of the children not to emulate their parents, but to follow his statutes. The children also rebel, and once again YHWH considers destroying them but relents because of the danger to his own honour. Instead, YHWH devises a solution to the difficulty in which his loyalty oath has placed him. First, YHWH swears that rather than giving the people the land he will actually scatter them into exile in other lands (v. 23). YHWH then gives the people bad—even deadly—statutes. YHWH entraps the people by commanding them to sacrifice their firstborn to him, thereby justifying his destruction of Israel (vv. 25–6). The logic is not entirely clear, but seems to argue that child-sacrifice to YHWH was such a grave offence that it justified YHWH's violation of his covenant with Israel. The historical data is incomplete, but supports Ezekiel's claim here and elsewhere (16:20–1; 23:39) that child-sacrifice was practised in Jerusalem during this period. The ambiguous wording of Ex 22:29 [MT v. 28] may reflect a period in which Israelite law demanded or at least permitted such sacrifices, and YHWH's passionately repeated denial in Jeremiah (7:31; 19:5; and 32:35) that he ever commanded (or even dreamt of commanding) child-sacrifice seems calculated to respond to worshippers' claims that YHWH had indeed commanded the sacrifices they offered. YHWH's description of the sacrifice in Ezek 20:25–6 serves as the ironic climax to a perverse retelling of the Exodus. Instead of sparing Israel's firstborn YHWH now commands their slaughter; in place of liberation he decrees new enslavement for the people.

In vv. 27–38 YHWH concludes his bitter historical survey by addressing the current generation of Israel. Despite his vow not to bring the people into the land (v. 15), YHWH here describes the behaviour of those whom he did in fact bring into the land of Israel. This apparently is the generation who received the 'bad laws' of vv. 25–6, and the charge of child-sacrifice is repeated in v. 31. The current generation, says YHWH, continue their parents' sins, and YHWH vows, as he did at the recital's beginning (v. 31; cf. v. 3), not to honour their enquiries. Nevertheless, Israel's involvement with YHWH is far from ended. On the contrary, any fantasy on Israel's part that they can now freely engage in idolatry is rejected. YHWH once again enters a solemn oath, swearing that 'with a mighty hand and outstretched arm', in rage he will at last rule over Israel (v. 33). Israel's joyful acclamation of YHWH's rule announced in Ex 15:18 now becomes the Warrior's conquest of his own people. In a reversal of the first Exodus YHWH will gather the people out of exile and judge them in the wilderness. Those who rebel against YHWH will be purged, but the rest included in YHWH's covenant (vv. 37–8; cf. Lev 27:32).

In vv. 39–44 YHWH portrays Israel's future after YHWH has established his reign. YHWH harshly dismisses those who persist in idolatry: 'Go serve your idols... if you will not listen to me; but my holy name you shall no more profane with your gifts and your idols' (v. 39). Those continuing to practice idolatry will no longer defile YHWH's name in so doing, having been excluded from the covenant. This expulsion of the idolaters seemingly contradicts YHWH's insistence in v. 32 that he will never allow Israel simply to 'be like the nations... [worshipping] wood and stone', and may mark v. 39 as a late addition to the book. Faithful Israel is described in vv. 40–4, serving YHWH with acceptable offerings on his 'holy mountain', Zion. YHWH's sanctity (not, as before, his dishonour) will be revealed before the nations after he has vindicated his name (cf. Ezek 39). Indeed, YHWH will act, not for Israel's sake, but for the sanctity of his name (cf. 36:22). Israel will be overwhelmed with shame (cf. 16:59–63) as it acknowledges YHWH.

The End Approaches (20:45–24:27; MT 21:1–24:27)

(20:45–21:32; MT 21:1–37) Fire and Sword against the Land A series of four brief oracles all announce the impending destruction of Judah and Jerusalem. The description of YHWH's punishment as a raging fire in 20:45–9 (MT 21:1–5) is followed by three oracles focusing on the sword by which YHWH will destroy the people. In 20:45–9 (MT 21:1–5) Ezekiel is commanded to set his face and prophesy against the forests of the Negeb ('Negeb' here refers to southern Palestine generally, rather than the modern Negeb). YHWH is sending a fire that will consume the green and the dry trees alike; that is, every tree. Ezekiel objects, pointing out that the people call him a 'metaphor maker' (v. 49; MT v. 5; my tr.; cf. NJPS, 'riddlemonger'). The prophet's complaint may be that people do not take his oracles seriously; Ezekiel is 'only' making metaphors, which will not come to pass. Such a complaint would be consistent with the people's earlier attitude towards prophecy expressed in 12:22 and with YHWH's observation in 33:31–2 that Ezekiel is treated as a mere singer of love songs. Alternatively, Ezekiel may be expressing the people's complaint that since he speaks only metaphors he cannot be understood.

The oracle of 21:1–7 (MT vv. 6–12) seems to come in response to Ezekiel's complaint in 20:45–9 (MT 21:1–5), whether to enforce the seriousness of the prophet's words or to explain their subtlety. Ezekiel is instructed to prophesy against the sanctuaries of Jerusalem and the land ('āḏāmā, not 'ereš') of Israel, announcing that YHWH himself is drawing his sword to kill both the righteous and the wicked, 'all flesh', from south to north. The image of YHWH wielding his sword recalls again the mythology of YHWH as Warrior, introduced in the vision of chs. 1–3. YHWH will destroy righteous and wicked alike, a startling inversion of the judicious discrimination promised in ch. 18 (and cf. Gen 18). Here, however, Ezekiel draws an image of cosmic war, in which 'all flesh', that is, all creation must be subdued before coming to acknowledge YHWH (cf. Gen 6:12–13). The puzzling image of YHWH destroying people in order to gain their fealty is presumably not to be taken literally, but assumes a scenario in which 'all flesh' as a whole suffers divine retribution, after which 'all [remaining] flesh' acknowledges YHWH's sovereignty (cf. the analogous claims in Ex 14:17–18; Ezek 25:7, inter alia). As in 12:17–20, Ezekiel is instructed in vv. 6–7 (MT vv. 11–12) to act out the response to YHWH's actions, in this case moaning pitifully in order to provoke the people's curiosity and so provide further opportunity to warn them of the coming disaster.

In 21:8–17 (MT vv. 13–22) Ezekiel is commanded to deliver an oracle in the form of a poem describing a sharpened sword. Israel has despised the rod, the traditional punishment for disobedient children (Prov 13:24; Isa 1:5–6). The sword is presumably YHWH's own, and it is handed over to a 'slayer' (understood as Nebuchadnezzar). Ezekiel is to wail over Israel (v. 12; MT v. 17) but also to clap his hands together and to chop and slash with the sword (v. 14; MT v. 19), acting out the enemy's satisfaction (cf. 6:11; 25:6) as he slaughters the people. Israel's true enemy, however, is not the 'slayer' to whom the sword is given, but YHWH himself, who in v. 17 (MT v. 22) joins Israel's attacker in clapping his hands as he satisfies his rage against Israel.

In 21:18–32 (MT vv. 23–37) Ezekiel is commanded to erect a signpost designating two roads: one to the Ammonite capital of Rabbah and the other to Jerusalem. The signpost represents the decision currently faced by Nebuchadnezzar of which of these two capitals to attack. Nebuchadnezzar engages in divination to determine his course, shaking arrows, consulting teraphim, and inspecting a sheep's liver (v. 21; MT v. 26). The arrows apparently functioned like lots, first labelled and then shaken together in a quiver, after which one was drawn out. The exact use of teraphim, though attested in the OT (Gen 31:19; 1 Sam 19:13–16; Hos 3:4), is unknown. Hepatoscopy, divination based on the analysis of sheep livers, was widespread in the ancient Near East (see ABD, 'Omens in the Ancient Near East'). Jerusalem is chosen for destruction. v. 23 (MT v. 28) is difficult, claiming that some unspecified group ('they') will doubt the results of divination, having sworn oaths. Most likely, this describes the Babylonians' initial reluctance to believe that they are in fact to destroy Jerusalem, 'having sworn oaths', i.e. entered a covenant with Zedekiah. However, says YHWH, Israel's guilt will be remembered, an event that will result in their capture. YHWH then addresses the Jerusalemites in v. 24 (MT v. 29), repeating to them that their transgression (presumably their violation of the vassal oath with Nebuchadnezzar) will indeed become known and they will be taken.

A brief oracle (vv. 25–7; MT vv. 30–2) is then directed specifically against the 'prince' (Zedekiah), whose downfall is foretold (cf. 17:24). A final note in v. 27 (MT v. 32) hints at a post-exilic restoration of the Davidic dynasty, a promise made explicitly in 37:24–5. Following the oracles against Judah and Jerusalem, the sword song of vv. 9–12 (MT vv. 14–17) is recapitulated in vv. 28–32 (MT vv. 33–7), but this time in an oracle addressed to Ammon, predicting that the Ammonites, too, will be destroyed. The oracle, which may be a later addition, recalls the divination performed in vv. 18–22 (MT vv. 23–7) in which Jerusalem was designated for the Babylonian attack. Ammon's reprieve was temporary; it will now be so utterly devastated as to be 'remembered no more' (v. 32; MT v. 37). In fact, Nebuchadnezzar destroyed Ammon shortly after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 BCE. The oracle against Ammon prefigures the Oracles Against the Nations in chs. 25–32, describing YHWH's destruction of a nation that was spared momentarily during Judah's destruction, but now will feel the full weight of YHWH's wrath.

(22:1–16) Indictment of the Bloody City Ezekiel is called upon in v. 2 to indict Jerusalem for her abominations (cf. 20:4). A general announcement of the city's crime and punishment appears in vv. 3–5, followed by a detailed list of accusations in vv. 6–12, and the city's sentences in vv. 13–16. All the crimes of the 'bloody city' are described in terms of bloodshed: social injustice (vv. 6–7); cultic impurity (vv. 8–11); and abusive financial practices (v. 12). The list of Jerusalem's wrongs resembles the list of sins committed by the evil man and avoided by the righteous in the legal test case of ch. 18. Jerusalem is accused of the entire gamut of social and cultic sins. Consequently, YHWH will scatter the people in exile, purifying Jerusalem but in the process defiling himself. The reading of the versions in v. 16, 'I shall be profaned', is almost certainly preferable to the MT's 'you (fem. sing.) shall be profaned'. The niph'al form should probably be translated even more strongly as a reflexive: 'I shall profane myself'. By exiling Israel YHWH can purify land, temple, and people, but the concomitant violation of his covenant oath defiles the divine name even as it vindicates and ultimately purifies it (cf. EZEK 16:59–60; 36:16–38).

(22:17–22) The Smelting of Israel The image of YHWH as smelter and refiner was used as early as Isa 1:21–5 to describe YHWH's purification of the corrupt city (and cf. Jer 6:27–30). This oracle, apparently delivered shortly before the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem (24:1–2), employs the image of a smelting furnace, in which metals are brought together and heated to the melting-point, to describe the populace crowded into the city, which is about to undergo the Babylonian attack (cf. the image of the city as a cooking pot in 11:3–7; 24:3–13). The metaphor, which aptly depicts the upcoming ordeal, is ironic, since YHWH announces at the outset that all the people have become dross (v. 18), the base metals discarded at the end of the process. They will be heated to the melting-point, but no silver will emerge. The recognition formula in v. 22 provides the oracle's only positive note; in their own destruction the people will recognize YHWH's wrath at work.

(22:23–31) Jerusalem's Destructive Leaders YHWH condemns Jerusalem's offences as committed by various groups of leaders: princes, priests, rulers, prophets, and people of the land (cf. the similar list in 7:26–7). The princes (reading, with LXX, 'whose princes' for MT's 'a conspiracy of its prophets') are the ravening man-eaters described in 19:1–9. The priests have defiled YHWH's sancta and failed to teach his ways. The rulers prey like wolves upon the people (v. 27). The prophets embody the faults described in ch. 13, covering over reality with whitewash, seeing and divining messages YHWH never sent (v. 28). The people of the land (see EZEK 7:27) have oppressed the powerless (v. 29). No one has built up or stood in defence on the wall (see EZEK 13) to stave off the coming disasters. YHWH now claims that his rage has been poured out upon Jerusalem; Jerusalem's destruction is no longer a threat, but has already been set in motion.

(23:1–49) Oholah and Oholibah: YHWH's Faithless Wives Like ch. 16, Ezek 23 catalogues the behaviour of YHWH's unfaithful wife. Here, however, the conceit of 16:44–63 (also used by Jeremiah, 3:6–10) that Samaria is Jerusalem's elder sister is developed at length. The two cities are portrayed as 'daughters of one mother' who spent their youth in Egypt, where they were sexually molested. The verb znh, used extensively throughout the chapter, should not be understood in its literal sense, 'to act as a prostitute', but as a pejorative describing any illicit sexual behaviour, and thus secondarily, as a metaphor for cultic infidelity to YHWH. The two girls, already accustomed to illicit sexual practices in their youth, become YHWH's wives and bear him children. The women's Egyptian origin and history of illicit behaviour predating YHWH's election accords with the account of Israelite origins provided in 20:5–7.

The two sisters are given names: Samaria is Oholah and Jerusalem Oholibah. The names probably refer to the women's 'tents', that is, the cities' sanctuaries. Oholah ('she has a tent') represents the northern kingdom, with its own worship centres, and Oholibah ('my tent is in her') represents the southern kingdom, which contained YHWH's chosen dwelling in Jerusalem (cf. the renaming of the city as YHWH šammâ, 'YHWH is There', in 48:35). Oholah was unfaithful to YHWH, becoming infatuated with the Assyrians and their gods, a reference to Samaria's alliance with Assyria beginning in 842 BCE. As in ch. 16, both foreign alliances and idolatry are considered 'infidelity', though here the emphasis is on the political liaisons. Idolatry is described as merely a side-effect of these alliances, while the strong and handsome foreigners are described with a tone bordering on envy. Egypt, which for centuries encouraged both Samaria and Jerusalem to revolt against their Mesopotamian overlords, is depicted as a constant temptation to the two women. Their early experiences of abuse are seen as addictive, creating a constant desire for repeated encounters with Egypt. Thus, Oholah is unfaithful to Assyria, having continued her sexual contact with Egypt (on whom the northern kingdom did in fact rely in Hoshea's 725 BCE revolt against Assyria), and YHWH hands Oholah over to her offended Assyrian lovers for revenge. The death of Oholah and her children recapitulates Samaria's destruction by Assyria in 722/20 BCE.

Oholibah (Jerusalem) witnesses her sister's fate, but instead of amending her ways becomes even worse than Oholah had been (vv. 11–35). Oholibah continues to lust after the handsome Assyrians, but soon becomes distracted by etchings depicting Babylonians from Chaldea. Oholibah invites the Babylonians to her bed, but soon tires of them also. The description of Oholibah's liaison with Chaldeans is reminiscent of the Chaldean Merodach-Baladan's visit of 714 BCE, cited in 2 Kings 20:12–18 as the cause of the temple's destruction in 586 BCE. The following description of Oholibah's return to the Egyptians (vv. 19–21), however, represents Jerusalem's illicit alliance with Egypt both before and after the Exile of 597 BCE. In retaliation YHWH will now enlist both Babylonians and Assyrians along with their allies to punish Oholibah's infidelity. Like ch. 16, so also ch. 23 is alarming to the modern reader. Sexually abused young women are labelled tainted, and their later sexual deviance punished by still further sexual violence against them.

In vv. 32–4 Oholibah is sentenced to drink from Oholah's cup, i.e. to undergo her punishment (cf. Jer 25:15–19; Hab 2:16). YHWH then begins a new indictment (vv. 36–49), now directed simultaneously against Oholah and Oholibah. Oholah's inclusion is unexpected within the terms of the metaphor (she was killed in v. 10), but may reflect the historical reality of displaced northerners present in Jerusalem and active in the cult. The crimes described in vv. 36–49 are primarily cultic, defined as adultery (n'p, the technical term for adultery, is used) and bloodshed. The women are said to have committed adultery with their idols, sacrificing their children to them. Moreover, the child-sacrifices were carried out in conjunction with worship in the Jerusalem temple (vv. 38–9), thus defiling the sanctuary. YHWH then describes a scene in which foreign men were invited into the sanctuary (vv. 39b–42) and lavishly entertained by the women, probably a reference to Psammeticus's entourage (see EZEK B.2; EZEK 44:7), whose presence in the Jerusalem sanctuary simultaneously defiled the temple and violated YHWH's covenant. In v. 46 YHWH calls for the avenging Babylonians to advance, thus setting the stage for the announcement in 24:1–2 that the siege of Jerusalem has begun. The notice (v. 48) that Oholah and Oholibah will serve as warnings to 'all women' should be understood within the terms of the metaphor; other cities will be warned against rebellion.

(24:1–27) Jerusalem under Siege The Cooking Pot (24:1–14). The chapter opens with a date formula, January 588 BCE, the beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's siege of Jerusalem. Ezekiel is instructed to record the date, either to underscore its significance, or as evidence of his prescience. He then delivers an oracle in which the besieged city is figured as a pot on the fire (vv. 3–14), after which he performs the sign-act of stifling his grief when his wife is stricken dead (vv. 15–27).

Ezekiel is commissioned to recite a song for the exiles, in which a pot is filled with choice meat and water and then boiled (vv. 3–5). The context of Jerusalem's siege makes the song's meaning self-evident: the residents of Jerusalem are currently being 'pressure cooked' within the city walls (cf. 11:3). YHWH next announces doom to the pot itself (vv. 6–13), that is, the destruction of the personified city rather than the death of its inhabitants. The 'bloody city' is described as a 'diseased' pot (v. 6). Whether the disease symbolizes mere corrosion or an actual infirmity such as the leprosy that infects clothing and houses in Lev 13:47–59 and 14:34–53, the pot is ritually unclean, and so the meat must be removed from it. YHWH identifies bloodshed as the source of Jerusalem's impurity, and he now exposes the shed blood and punishes the city for its crimes (cf. Lev 17:11–13; see ABD 'Blood'). In vv. 9–14 YHWH describes the pot's purification. After its contents

(the residents of Jerusalem) have been cooked and burned, then the pot itself must be purified in the fire. The gruesome metaphor aptly describes YHWH's double concern: the punishment of Jerusalem's sinful inhabitants and the purification of the holy city and its sanctuary. YHWH laments in vv. 12–13 that previous attempts to purify the sanctuary have failed; only after his rage has been fully spent upon it will the city again be cleansed.

Ezekiel's Wife's Death (24:15–27). YHWH now informs Ezekiel that 'the delight of [Ezekiel's] eyes' is to be taken away, in response to which Ezekiel is to refrain from mourning. Ezekiel relates this word to the people 'in the morning' and that evening his wife, the delight of his eyes, dies. The people ask for an interpretation of Ezekiel's sign-act and YHWH responds that he is about to profane his own sanctuary and kill the exiles' children in Jerusalem (v. 21). Ezekiel thus acts out both YHWH's and the people's loss. The use of Ezekiel's wife to symbolize the Jerusalem sanctuary recalls the personification of Jerusalem as YHWH's wife, as depicted in chs. 16 and 23, where the death sentence has already been passed upon her. With Jerusalem's destruction the people will suffer both the loss of the temple and the death of beloved children, yet they are commanded not to mourn. Ezekiel's sign-act, including the countermand against mourning (v. 22) implies that it is not only the prophet and the people but also YHWH who will stifle his natural grief over the city, knowing the justice of its fall. The sign-act simultaneously evokes both the intimacy of YHWH's loss and his implacable determination. With the exception of a simile in 36:38 recalling the temple flocks, Jerusalem is never again mentioned by name in Ezekiel.

Finally (vv. 25–7), YHWH informs Ezekiel that after the city and temple have been destroyed a fugitive will bring him the news, after which the prophet's dumbness will be removed. The motif of dumbness connects the passage with Ezekiel's call in 3:24–7, creating a loose inclusio and concluding the first half of the book. The prediction regarding the fugitive similarly creates a bridge to ch. 33, which relates the fugitive's arrival and marks the resumption of prophecies regarding Israel after the oracles against the nations in chs. 25–32.

Hope for the Future (25:1–48:35)

Oracles against Foreign Nations (25:1–32:32)

Collections of oracles against foreign nations appear in all three major prophets (cf. Isa 13–23; Jer 46–51) as well as some minor prophets (e.g. Am 1–2). Such oracles, delivered before an Israelite audience and announcing YHWH's judgement on enemy nations, served primarily as oracles of reassurance for Israel (see ABD, 'Nations'): YHWH could and would act on Israel's behalf to punish his people's enemies. In Ezekiel the oracles serve as a transition between the first half of the book (chs. 1–24), which is preoccupied with YHWH's judgement against Judah and Jerusalem, and the second half (chs. 33–48), in which promises of restoration predominate. Spanning the gap between the announcement in 24:1–2 that Jerusalem is under siege and the notice of the city's fall in 33:21, the oracles reveal the universal reach of YHWH's power. Having first gone forth against his own people, the Divine Warrior will not stop until all nations have been brought to justice. The oracles thus place Jerusalem's destruction within the larger context of YHWH's authority over all the earth. Each of the oracles against a foreign nation includes YHWH's claim, 'You shall know that I am YHWH'; each nation in turn will be brought to acknowledge his sovereignty.

Of the seven nations singled out in chs. 25–32, five (Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, Sidon), are known to have participated in rebellion against Babylon, while a sixth, Egypt, provided support for this rebellious activity. Ezekiel's concern not to defile YHWH's honour by a revolt violating 'YHWH's covenant' with Nebuchadnezzar (EZEK 17) is often considered sufficient justification for labelling all the rebellious nations enemies of YHWH and appropriate objects of his wrath. Two problems mar this interpretation. First, in their rebellion against Babylon, the foreign nations do not violate YHWH's covenant as Judah does, but covenants presumably sworn in the names of their own gods. Second, nowhere in chs. 25–32 are the foreign nations condemned for joining in rebellion against Babylon; rather, they are punished for their misconduct towards Judah and Jerusalem. Even as he orchestrates Jerusalem's destruction by Babylon, YHWH is shown avenging the scorn shown to his people (and, presumably, himself) by their lesser enemies, who gloat over the city's fall.

(25:1–7) Against Ammon Ezekiel delivers a two-part oracle against Ammon (vv. 3–5, 6–7; cf. 21:28–32). In each, Ammon is accused of malicious glee at the temple's destruction and the exiles' deportation. Ammon, itself a Babylonian vassal, will therefore also be utterly destroyed by these 'people of the East'. Each section of the oracle concludes with the recognition formula; after being themselves vanquished, the Ammonites will acknowledge YHWH. Note that the reference to the temple's desecration (v. 3) requires that the oracle be dated to 586 BCE or thereafter.

(25:8–11) Against Moab Moab is accused simply of considering Judah to be 'like all the other nations' (v. 8). The claim may represent a Moabite response to the destruction of the Jerusalem temple: the Davidide claim to YHWH's special protection of Zion (see ABD, 'Zion Traditions') has been proved false. As punishment for its gloating, Moab will be given along with Ammon to 'the people of the East' (v. 10). Particularly, the area of northern Moab (Beth-jeshimoth, Baal-meon, and Kiriathaim) whose possession was a subject of dispute between Moab and Judah, here referred to as 'the glory of the country' (v. 9), will now belong to foreigners. Having denied Judah's special status, Moab will lose its own 'glory'. Even its punishment will not be unique to it, but shared with Ammon, its neighbour. Then, says YHWH, the Moabites will recognize his sovereignty.

(25:12–14) Against Edom The oracle against Edom is especially vehement (cf. an additional condemnation of Edom in ch. 35). Edom is apparently singled out because, having joined with Judah in rebellion against Babylon (Jer 27:3), it then acted as a Babylonian ally, perhaps taking over Judean holdings in the Negeb (cf. Jer 49:7–22, Ob 1–14; but see the discussion in ABD, 'Edom'). The 'āšām (grievous offence) referred to in v. 12 presumably refers to Edom's violation of the oath forming the anti-Babylonian alliance. YHWH thus hands Edom over, not to the Babylonians (whose newly loyal vassal they have become), but to the Israelites themselves. Israel will act as YHWH's agents in devastating Edom, after which they will 'know my vengeance' (v. 14), says YHWH.

(25:15–17) Against the Philistines Like the Edomites, the Philistines are accused of 'taking vengeance' against Judah. The Philistines are not recorded in Jer 27 as participating in the anti-Babylonian alliance nor is their vengeance against Judah described, like Edom's, as an 'āšām (see EZEK 25:12–14). It is therefore likely that the Philistines had continued as loyal Babylonian vassals (they had been conquered by Nebuchadnezzar as recently as 601 BCE) and had been rewarded for this loyalty with a gift of Judean territory. In any case, their treatment of Judah is described as vicious, and YHWH swears to take vengeance against them. The mention of the Cherethites in v. 16 probably refers to the Philistines' origins from the island of Crete (see ABD, 'Philistines'). After he takes vengeance on them, says YHWH, the Philistines also will acknowledge his sovereignty.

(26:1–28:19) Against Tyre Tyre's Downfall (26:1–21). Ezekiel devotes nearly three chapters to oracles against the Phoenician city-state of Tyre. An island fortress located off the coast of Lebanon, Tyre was the immensely prosperous centre of a vast Mediterranean trade network. Although paying tribute to Babylon, Tyre had thus far avoided outright conquest by Nebuchadnezzar. Nevertheless, Tyre was among those plotting rebellion as per Jer 27 against even this nominal submission. Tyre's apparent exemption from the harshest consequences of Babylonian rule and its continued prosperity, both due to its commercially and strategically favourable location, seem to have singled Tyre out (along with Egypt) for Ezekiel's particularly harsh judgement.

Ezek 26 consists of a four-part oracle in which the first two sections (vv. 1–14) describe the city's destruction while the latter two (vv. 15–21) describe the aftermath of Tyre's fall. The oracle opens with an incomplete date formula, placing the oracle sometime in 587/6 BCE. A date towards the end of the year would be appropriate since the oracle implies (v. 2) Nebuchadnezzar's successful capture of Jerusalem, and probably anticipates his siege of Tyre, begun around this time. Nebuchadnezzar maintained his siege for thirteen years before reaching a negotiated settlement (see Jos. Ant. 10.11.1).

The oracle opens quoting Tyre's satisfaction with Jerusalem's capture. The merchant city sees Jerusalem's destruction in strictly economic terms; Jerusalem's loss will become Tyre's gain. YHWH responds that he will hurl ships like so many waves against the island fortress. Tyre (Heb. šōr) will be scraped down to the bare rock, a punishment that plays indirectly on the Hebrew šûr, 'rock', after which Tyre will acknowledge YHWH's sovereignty (v. 6). YHWH continues in vv. 7–14 with a more detailed and literal prediction of Nebuchadnezzar's siege of the city. After destroying Tyre's coastal dependencies, the Babylonian monarch will muster his impressive battery of horses, troops, and siege equipment. The city will be taken and plundered; the comparison between Tyre and a bare rock reappears to conclude the oracle (v. 14).

In vv. 15–18 YHWH describes the horror of the coastlands and 'the princes of the sea' (v. 16), probably Tyre's coastal settlements and its Mediterranean outposts. Tyre's bereaved allies raise a lament (vv. 17–18) over the ruin of the once-glorious city. Finally, in vv. 19–21 YHWH explains Tyre's demise in cosmic terms. It is he who has vanquished the city, covering the maritime capital with 'the great waters' (v. 19) of chaos and bringing it down to Sheol. Thus, not only will Tyre 'never again be rebuilt' (v. 14); it will vanish and 'be no more' (v. 21).

The Shipwreck of Tyre (27:1–36). The whole of ch. 27 constitutes a single oracle, an extended allegory describing Tyre as a ship. Like the allegories against Judah in Ezek 15, 16, 17, and 19, so also in the case of Tyre Ezekiel employs stock symbols of national identity, ironically transforming them into symbols of national shame. The city, bordered on all sides by the sea, making its living by commerce, is depicted as a merchant ship, setting forth on a voyage. As Tyre enjoyed luxury goods from all corners of the world, so also the ship is fitted out with the finest materials from Senir, Lebanon, Bashan, Cyprus, and Egypt (vv. 5–7). An international crew sails the ship, which is 'perfect' in its beauty. The ship trades with numerous lands, from Tarshish to Arabia, and carries a cargo of exotic wares. After lovingly describing the Good Ship Tyre's embarkation Ezekiel abruptly informs her that her rowers have brought her into deep water, where she has been shipwrecked (v. 26). Riches, crew, army, and cargo sink together into the sea. All the mariners on shore lament the great ship's utter devastation.

Against the Ruler of Tyre (28:1–19). Ezekiel delivers an oracle against the ruler (nēgīd) of Tyre (vv. 1–10) followed by a lament over the destruction of the king (melek) (vv. 11–19). In the initial oracle the prince is accused of calling himself a god (perhaps playing on the theophoric name of Ittoba'al III (man of Baal), who ruled Tyre from 590–575 BCE). Although he is indeed wiser than the legendary king Dan'el (v. 3; see EZEK 14:14) and has prospered through his wisdom, yet YHWH will bring 'the most terrible of the nations' (Babylonia, v. 7) against him. Tyre's prince will be relegated to Sheol, where he will be unable to boast divine status. The ensuing lament over the king of Tyre strikingly combines imagery drawn from the Israelite cult and from the Eden tradition, depicting the monarch simultaneously as the first man and as high priest. Like the primordial man (cf. Gen 2:4b–3:24) he was in Eden, until, having become corrupted, he was cast out by the guardian cherub. Like the Israelite high priest (Ex 28:6–14; 24:13), he wore a breastplate encrusted with precious stones and resided on the holy 'mountain of God'. Having profaned his sanctuaries, however, he was consumed by fire. The king of Tyre is thus depicted as having enjoyed God's favour to an unprecedented degree, having become corrupted by his immense wealth, and finally being destroyed forever. The oracle's symbolism is puzzling, as no known tradition links Tyre directly with either the Eden or the priestly traditions.

(28:20–3) Against Sidon A brief oracle announces YHWH's judgement against Sidon, another member of the anti-Babylonian alliance mentioned in Jer 27. No direct accusation against Sidon is made, and its punishment is described in the most general terms. More significant than either Sidon's sin or its punishment, however, is YHWH's ultimate goal, repeated twice in this brief oracle: they shall acknowledge YHWH's sovereignty.

(28:24–6) Promises to Israel The catalogue of Israel's smaller neighbours concludes with two brief oracles of promise to Israel. First (v. 24), Israel will cease to be provoked by these contemptuous neighbours. Second (vv. 25–6), having punished Israel's neighbours, YHWH will then restore Israel to its land and his presence to Israel. As in vv. 20–3, YHWH twice repeats his goal: that the nations will acknowledge his sovereignty. This first group of oracles against the nations thus fulfils the traditional role of reassuring Israel of YHWH's favour. At the same time the oracles reaffirm that Judah's current humiliation is taking place within the wider context of YHWH's self-vindication before all the world.

(29:1–32:32) Against Egypt The seven oracles against Israel's smaller neighbours in chs. 25–8 are balanced in chs. 29–32 by seven oracles directed against Egypt. The object of condemnation equal to that directed against all other nations combined, Egypt is represented as the great enemy of Israel and of YHWH. Unlike the other nations, however, Egypt is nowhere accused of mocking Israel or of taking advantage of its destruction. Rather, Egypt is condemned for its grandiose pretensions—the power that rendered it a fatal lure for Israel (see EZEK 8). As described in chs. 20 and 23, Israel had since earliest times demonstrated a weakness for 'the idols of Egypt' (20:7; cf. 23:8, 19). More recently, Judah had repeatedly depended on Egypt to support rebellion against Babylon. Egypt, then, is the enemy making possible Judah's violation of YHWH's covenant with Nebuchadrezzar. Egypt has presented itself as protection against the wrath of Nebuchadrezzar and of YHWH, and YHWH must therefore avenge his honour against the challenge of Egypt.

Pharaoh the Sea-Serpent (29:1–16). In an oracle dated to January of 587 BCE, YHWH addresses Pharaoh as a great sea-serpent (tanīn; reading sing. for MT's pl.) stretched out in the Nile surrounded by fish (vv. 3–4). Like the king of Tyre, Pharaoh is condemned for claiming divine status (in this case, as the Nile's creator), and YHWH announces that he will fish out the serpent along with its dependent fishes (Egypt's allies) and fling them out to rot in the field (vv. 4–5). Thus, says YHWH, the Egyptians will acknowledge YHWH's sovereignty.

In vv. 6b–9a a new metaphor describes the political background for the oracle. Egypt is a reed on which Israel has leant for support, but which has broken and injured those who trusted its strength (cf. Isa 36:6). The image encapsulates Israel's political and military situation. The January 587 BCE date locates the oracle in the aftermath of Pharaoh Hophra's aborted attempt of 588 BCE to lift Nebuchadrezzar's siege of Jerusalem. The staff on which Judah had depended for support had broken easily under Babylonian pressure. YHWH will punish Egypt for the harm done to Judah, with the result that the Egyptians will acknowledge YHWH. In vv. 9b–16 YHWH repeats Pharaoh's pretensions as the Nile's creator, responding that Egypt and the Nile will be devastated, and the land made uninhabitable. Like Judah (4:6; cf. Num 14:34), Egypt will be exiled for forty years and then restored as only a minor kingdom (vv. 13–15). Israel, recalling its former reliance on this now humble nation, will then acknowledge YHWH's sovereignty.

Nebuchadrezzar's Consolation Prize (29:17–21). This oracle, dated to January 571 BCE, is the latest-dated oracle in Ezekiel (the 573 BCE date assigned to the concluding vision of chs. 40–8 is the next latest). Separating oracles dated to January 587 BCE (29:1–16) and April 587 BCE (30:20–6), 29:17–21 seems to disrupt the chronology thus far established in Ezekiel. The oracle can, however, be dated with some certainty to 571. The oracle's message is peculiar in that it depends on the inaccuracy of Ezekiel's earlier oracles against Tyre. In chs. 26–8 (dated to 586 BCE) Ezekiel had predicted Tyre's downfall in a series of oracles, including specific notice in 26:7–14 that YHWH's agent for Tyre's destruction would be Nebuchadrezzar of Babylon. Nebuchadrezzar had in fact mounted a prolonged siege against Tyre following his successful campaign against Jerusalem. After a thirteen-year siege, however, in 572 Nebuchadrezzar proved unable to take the island fortress. Apparently in response to Nebuchadrezzar's failure (and so also the failure of his own earlier predictions), Ezekiel now offers Egypt to the Babylonian king as compensation for his fruitless efforts on YHWH's behalf in the aborted siege of Tyre. Egypt, says YHWH, will serve as Nebuchadrezzar's payment for services rendered during the siege of Tyre (v. 20). Egypt's demise will bring honour to Israel, who in turn will recognize YHWH. Ezek 29:17–21 is remarkable for its open acknowledgement of unfulfilled prophecy. In fact, Nebuchadrezzar did invade Egypt in 568 BCE (ANET 308), but even his own annals do not claim victory. While disrupting Ezekiel's overall chronology, the oracle's contents—predicting Nebuchadrezzar's conquest of Egypt—explain its insertion into a collection of oracles condemning Egypt and announcing Nebuchadrezzar's triumph over Pharaoh.

The Day of YHWH against Egypt (30:1–19). This oracle announces YHWH's judgement on Egypt in three sections. In vv. 1–5 YHWH announces that the day of YHWH (see EZEK 7:10) has come for Egypt. YHWH's sword will be unsheathed and the nation will be utterly destroyed. The final section, vv. 13–19, presents YHWH as an ancient Near Eastern monarch publishing his conquest list—the list of cities vanquished during a successful military campaign. The oracle's central section, vv. 6–12, announces the instrument by which YHWH will devastate Egypt; YHWH will conquer Egypt 'by the hand of King Nebuchadrezzar of Babylon' (v. 10). This central section combines the cosmic imagery of vv. 1–5 (YHWH will dry up the life-sustaining waters of the Nile; v. 12a) with descriptions of normal, human warfare and its consequences (vv. 11, 12b). The oracle thus reinforces its claim that victory over Egypt belongs to the Divine Warrior. Nebuchadrezzar's army represents merely the human aspect of YHWH's triumphant day.

Pharaoh's Broken Arm and Nebuchadrezzar's Strong Arm (30:20–6). In an oracle dated to April 587 BCE YHWH reiterates both his condemnations of Pharaoh (see ch. 29) and his announcement that he will place his own divine sword in Nebuchadrezzar's hand (cf. 30:10–11; ch. 21). The date, like that of 29:1, locates the oracle in the aftermath of Apries's withdrawal from Jerusalem. The current oracle may reflect Nebuchadrezzar's renewal of the siege. YHWH claims that, having already broken one of Pharaoh's arms, he will now shatter the other. By contrast, he will strengthen Nebuchadrezzar's arms, arming him with YHWH's own sword. As Babylon is fortified and Egypt dispersed into exile, the nations will acknowledge the sovereignty of YHWH.

The Fall of the Great Cedar (31:1–18). This oracle, dated to June of 587 BCE, consists of an extended metaphor comparing Pharaoh to a great cedar. The point of comparison is actually between Egypt and Assyria, depicted here as a cedar of cosmic proportions. Despite the common scholarly practice of emending 'aššūr (Assyria) to 'aššûr (cypress tree) with the result that Pharaoh is likened to the cosmic cedar tree, MT's 'aššûr should be maintained; Pharaoh's power is compared to that of Assyria, which despite its former glory has now been laid low by Babylon. The comparison between Egypt and Assyria is intriguing, since towards the end of the sixth century BCE Egypt had gained influence on the eastern Mediterranean seaboard as Assyria's influence in the region waned (see Miller and Hayes 1986: 383–5). Egypt could therefore style itself as heir to the western portion of the Assyrian empire. Ezekiel plays out this flattering comparison. Assyria, he says, was not only great among all other 'trees'; it surpassed even the trees of Eden (v. 8). Assyria is depicted as the 'world tree', known from Babylonian and Sumerian sources as a tree connecting heaven and earth, with roots extending down into the cosmic waters. Beautiful and fruitful, this tree provided shade in which all the nations flourished. The tree's greatness, says YHWH, was its downfall. Because of its excessive pride, YHWH handed over this greatest of all trees to 'the most terrible of nations' (v. 12), Babylon. Now the tree lies broken, stretched out across the countryside. Indeed, says YHWH, the tree has descended into Sheol, along with all its allies (vv. 14–17). The unrivalled splendour of Assyria is matched only by the shock felt among the nations over its utter collapse. The moral of the story is tersely stated in v. 18: And you, asks YHWH, which of the trees of Eden were you like in your splendour? No matter; you will have plenty of company among the many trees of Eden in Sheol. 'This', says YHWH, 'is Pharaoh and all his horde.'

Concluding Laments over Egypt (32:1–32). Ezekiel's final oracles against Egypt are assigned a range of dates in the various MSS, with most locating them in March of 586 or 585 BCE. The oracles thus address Egypt in the context of Jerusalem's destruction, whether immediately following the event, or on the first anniversary of the city's fall. In either case, Ezekiel's oracles against Egypt cover a span of over two years (excluding 29:17–21, which reflects the situation over a decade later). The oracles thus begin during the siege of Jerusalem, condemning Egypt for misleading Israel into rebellion (29:6–7), and conclude after the city's fall with two 'laments' (32:1–16, 17–31), one summarizing all the preceding oracles, the other celebrating in advance Egypt's arrival in Sheol. The concluding oracles address an Egypt that has apparently emerged unscathed after luring Israel to its destruction, and express the prophet's determination that YHWH (and therefore Nebuchadrezzar) has yet to conclude his dealings with Pharaoh.

vv. 1–16 present a recapitulation of the punishments designated for Egypt over the course of the previous three chapters. YHWH begins in vv. 1–6 by saying that although Pharaoh considers himself a lion, he is in fact a sea-serpent, fouling the waters of the Nile. As in 29:1–5, YHWH will trap the serpent and fling it out to die in the open field. The earlier image of animals feeding on Pharaoh's corpse appears here in even greater detail. YHWH's victory over Pharaoh will, like the day of YHWH described in 30:2–5, reverberate throughout the cosmos, as YHWH blots out the light of the sun, moon, and stars (vv. 7–8). Egypt, as predicted in 29:9b–12, will be exiled from its land (vv. 9, 13) because of YHWH's sword and the sword of Nebuchadnezzar (vv. 10–12; cf. 29:8; 30:2–12, 20–6). In the aftermath of Jerusalem's destruction YHWH renews his earlier threats against Judah's attractive but deceitful ally. The oracle departs from the course set by earlier condemnations of Egypt only in its depiction of Egypt's restoration. Whereas the oracle dated to 587 BCE could envision Egypt's humble return following its forty-year 'exile' (29:13–16), in the aftermath of Jerusalem's destruction Ezekiel promises only that the land itself will be restored. After Egypt's land has been 'stripped' of its inhabitants, YHWH will restore its luxuriant streams (vv. 14–16). The oracle concludes with the recognition formula (v. 16), the seventh and final declaration within the oracles against Egypt that finally, in their utter devastation, the Egyptians will recognize YHWH.

In vv. 17–32 Ezekiel laments Egypt's descent into Sheol (see ABD, 'Dead, Abode of the'). No longer a great sea-serpent or a mighty tree, Egypt is assigned to share the fate of all other former military powers; namely, the leaders and warriors who fill the vast underworld, each in its assigned corner of the Pit. After introducing in vv. 18–21 the theme of Egypt's descent, in vv. 22–30 Ezekiel enumerates the nations with whom Egypt will share the grave: Assyria, Elam, Meshech and Tubal, Edom, and Sidon. Each of these nations was once able to create terror in the land of the living. Now they populate the land of the dead, their graves laid out in orderly array, rank upon rank, shamed, murdered, sharing an unclean grave. Pharaoh, the most recent arrival in this realm (vv. 31–2), will be 'consoled' for the loss of his army, presumably when he perceives that his fate is not unique, but shared with many who were once proud and powerful. Ezekiel's final oracles against Egypt, 'lamenting' Egypt's downfall at a period when Egypt appeared impervious to Babylonian incursions, serve as predictions, celebrating in advance the destruction YHWH would finally bring against Egypt, the power whose alliance with Judah had proved disastrous for the smaller nation.

Images of Restoration and Return (33:1–39:29)

(33:1–33) Ezekiel's New Commission Following Ezekiel's condemnations of Judah and Jerusalem in chs. 1–24 and his announcement in chs. 25–32 of YHWH's wrath against nations variously implicated in Judah's destruction, in ch. 33 Ezekiel begins a series of oracles (chs. 33–9) promising YHWH's restoration of the people and land of Israel. This new beginning is signalled in ch. 33 by a complex interweaving of themes imported from the first twenty-four chapters of the book. Specifically, the chapter addresses in various forms the question of responsibility, both Ezekiel's responsibility as prophet and the people's responsibility for their own moral and religious choices. The question of how to assign moral responsibility takes on special poignancy in the light of the announcement in the middle of the chapter (vv. 21–2): the city has fallen.

Ezekiel as Sentinel over Israel (33:1–9). Ezekiel was first commissioned in 3:16–21 as sentinel over Israel in the context of Judah's rebellion against Nebuchadnezzar (and thus also against YHWH). The prophet's role was to warn the people against YHWH's impending attack in hopes that they would abandon their sins in time to avert YHWH's judgement against them. In ch. 33 YHWH again asserts, now in the aftermath of Jerusalem's destruction, that Ezekiel is to stand as sentinel over Israel (v. 7). Ezekiel must warn the people to repent, lest when destruction comes he should bear responsibility for their death, having failed to warn them. The people, for their part, must heed the sentinel's warning and repent, lest they die and, having been forewarned, bear responsibility for their own deaths (vv. 8–9). The image of Ezekiel as sentinel is startling in context, since it assumes that the sentinel will be posted on the wall of a city that has already been destroyed. Some scholars assume the oracle is intended for an audience that does not yet know of Jerusalem's destruction, an event not announced until 33:21. The large block of oracles against foreign nations, however, which immediately precede ch. 33, depend on the reader's knowledge of Jerusalem's fall (see e.g. 25:3; 26:2). Thus, in the current arrangement of chapters, whether Ezekiel's own or an editor's, the reader hears Ezekiel commissioned to watch over a city that has already been destroyed. Such a commission is ironically apt for Ezekiel, who even while Jerusalem and its temple were standing could deliver his prophecies only to those who had already been exiled. In ch. 33 Ezekiel hears that just as earlier he was called to prophesy despite his distant location in Babylon, so now he must continue in his calling despite the city and temple's destruction. Israel's moral responsibility and Ezekiel's prophetic role remain, even in exile, even after Jerusalem's fall.

The Possibility of Repentance (33:10–20). Ezekiel is given specific instructions on how to warn the wicked; in effect, the content of the warning he was commissioned to deliver as sentinel in vv. 1–9. The warning rephrases the argument of ch. 18 regarding individual responsibility for moral behaviour. In ch. 33, however, the implicit debate concerns not whether one generation bears the punishment for another's sins, but whether repentance has any effect. 'Our transgressions and our sins weigh upon us', say the people, 'and we waste away because of them' (v. 10). The Judeans now accept that they are being punished for their own sins. Acknowledging the justice of their punishment, however, they continue to see no use in repentance. If judgement has already been passed, then repentance must be futile. As in ch. 18, YHWH asserts that his goal is not the death of the wicked but precisely their repentance. 'Turn back, turn back!' YHWH calls (v. 11), assuring the people that although prior righteousness will not help righteous people who turn to wickedness, neither will past wickedness trip up the wicked who turn to the path of righteousness. As in ch. 18, so here also YHWH attempts to shake the people out of moral lassitude and awaken belief in their present accountability. Despite YHWH's obvious judgement against Judah and Jerusalem, he urgently claims, 'I will judge all of you according to your ways!' (v. 20). YHWH's judgement is ongoing and so, therefore, is Israel's responsibility.

Jerusalem's Fall (33:21–2). Following the notices in vv. 1–9 and vv. 10–20 of Israel's continued moral responsibility—and hence its ongoing relationship with YHWH—in vv. 21–2 Ezekiel learns of Jerusalem's destruction. In January 585 BCE, nearly six months after Nebuchadnezzar had breached the city walls and five months after the city's burning (cf. Jer 52:12–13; 2 Kings 25:8–9), a refugee reaches Ezekiel to inform him of the city's fall. Babylonian messengers would presumably have carried the news back to Babylon prior to this date, but the refugee's arrival and report of events fulfils the prophecy of 24:26. Also in accordance with the earlier prophecy, Ezekiel's mouth is 'opened' after the refugee's arrival. The meaning of Ezekiel's newly regained speech is no more clear than the meaning of the dumbness imposed on him in 3:26–7. The strongest possibility remains that now the prophet is able to speak in his own right, rather than uttering exclusively oracles relayed to him by YHWH (see EZEK 3:26–7).

The Sinful Remnant in Judah (33:23–9). In vv. 23–9 YHWH responds to the Judean survivors' claim to be the new heirs to the land of Israel. Just as Abraham, though only one man, was given the entire land, so now the few remaining Judeans have been given the land to possess (v. 24). The survivors' claim is the logical extension of the argument reported in 11:14–21 that YHWH had expelled the exiles from the land, rejecting them in favour of those who remained. Whereas earlier YHWH had responded with an oracle of promise to the exiles, now he pronounces its converse: judgement against the Judean remnant. Enumerating their various sins, YHWH swears that even those who have survived thus far by hiding in the desert or in caves, he will now hand over to be killed by sword, plague, and wild animals (v. 27). The sins of the Judean survivors—bloodshed, idolatry, adultery, eating blood—recall the list of abominations committed by the 'wicked son' of 18:10–13, who is condemned to die for his sins. YHWH's judgement against the Judean remnant in vv. 23–9 thus mirrors his call in vv. 10–20 for the remnant of Israel to avert further condemnation by turning from their sins.

Ezekiel the Minstrel of Israel (33:30–3). These verses afford an unusual glimpse (albeit from the hand of Ezekiel or his sympathetic editors) of how an Israelite prophet was perceived by the people. Remarkably, Ezekiel was popular among the people, even a source of gossip (v. 30), and a trip to sit and hear a word of YHWH takes on the flavour of a social event. The problem with this amiable state of affairs is that the people 'hear [Ezekiel's] words, but they will not obey them' (v. 31, NJPS). Indeed, the prophet who was commissioned in vv. 1–9 to blow the warning trumpet for his people finds that the people enjoy his musicianship (v. 32) but ignore his message. None the less, says YHWH, when judgement comes, then the people will realize the prophetic significance of Ezekiel's word.

Ch. 33 displays a chiasmic pattern:

A (vv. 1–9) Ezekiel, as sentry, warns the people, who may or may not listen.

B (vv. 10–20) The wicked can escape judgement if they abandon their sins.

C (vv. 21–2) Ezekiel receives word of Jerusalem's fall.

B' (vv. 23–9) The wicked Judeans continue to sin.

A' (vv. 30–3) The exiles fail to hear Ezekiel's warning.

News of Jerusalem's fall in vv. 21–2 is thus surrounded by oracles relating that the people, both the exiles and those remaining in the land, have been fully warned but have refused to listen. They thus bear full responsibility for Jerusalem's destruction, an accountability that continues beyond the city's fall.

(34:1–31) Judgement of Shepherds and of Sheep This chapter combines several oracles based on the metaphor of Israel as a flock and its leaders as shepherds. The image of a god, king, or other ruler as shepherd was traditional throughout the ancient Near East, and is extended in the OT to include YHWH as shepherd of his people (see Ps 23:1–4; 95:7; ABD, 'Sheep, Shepherd').

Against the Shepherds of Israel (34:1–16). Ezekiel is instructed to prophesy against the shepherds of Israel; that is, the leaders, now presumably in exile in Babylon. Ezekiel distorts the traditional metaphor to highlight the Israelite leaders' abuse of their power (cf. his use of the same technique in chs. 15–17; 19–20). Far from caring for the sheep, these shepherds have slaughtered and eaten them (v. 5). The Israelite leaders' callous harshness left the people with 'no shepherd', and in consequence they were scattered, first on to 'every high hill' as idolaters (see 6:13; Jer 2:20) and then 'over the face of the earth' in exile (v. 6). YHWH, meanwhile, casts himself as the owner of the sheep, who will demand from the shepherds an accounting for their neglect and loss of the sheep (vv. 8–10). The rulers will be held accountable for Israel's destruction, and will be removed from leadership. Instead, YHWH will himself act as shepherd, seeking the lost and scattered sheep and returning them to their own land. The metaphor is a complex one, combining images of YHWH as shepherd with the implicit, underlying image of YHWH as king. The reference in v. 12 to a day of clouds and thick darkness recalls the day of YHWH with its imagery of YHWH as Warrior (cf. 32:7–8; Ps 77:17–18 (MT 18–19); 97:2–5). Finally, literal language clearly anticipates a return from exile to the land of Israel (v. 16).

Israel as YHWH's Flock (34:17–31). Having dismissed Israel's previous shepherds in vv. 1–16, YHWH addresses his flock in vv. 17–31. Speaking now not as shepherd but as judge, YHWH announces that he is about to judge the sheep for their abuse of one another (v. 17). The fat sheep have taken the best pasture, trampled the remainder, and shoved out the weaker sheep to be scattered (vv. 18–21). The location of this mixed flock of weak and strong sheep, whether Judah or Babylon, is uncertain. The metaphor is often taken to describe inequities within the exilic community; if this is accurate, then 34:17–31 is the sole occasion upon which Ezekiel addresses struggles among the exiles. Imagery depicting YHWH feeding and watering his flock, however, is strongly associated with the land of Israel as YHWH's pasture (Ps 78:52–5; Isa 49:9–13; Mic 7:14; cf. Jer 13:17), and the passage is probably best understood in this sense. Thus, in vv. 23–4 YHWH promises to restore (a descendant of) David as Israel's shepherd, and in vv. 25–31 pledges to provide blessings and security for the sheep in the land, rather than return to the land. The consequent picture of conditions within the land of Israel is bleak, with the stronger citizens bullying the poor, who wander homeless (cf. vv. 21, 27), 'consumed with hunger' (v. 29). YHWH claims only the weak as his 'flock', and pledges a bērit šālôm (v. 25) with them. In context, this 'covenant of peace' assures šālôm in the sense of general well-being and prosperity. When those who remain homeless in Judah can dwell secure in their land, they will acknowledge YHWH (v. 27), that he is among them, and that they, his flock, live under his care (vv. 30–1).

(35:1–36:15) Mount Seir and the Mountains of Israel Two oracles in chs. 35–6 pair judgement against Mt. Seir in Edom with promises of restoration to the mountains of Israel. The oracles effectively reverse the judgements pronounced against Israel's mountains in Ezek 6. The choice of Mt. Seir (35:1–15) as the counterpart to the mountains of Israel is puzzling. Ezekiel's oracle against Edom in 25:12–14 is a brief, virtually pro forma condemnation of Israel's neighbour for taking advantage of Israel's broken condition. The motivation for locating a second, more vehement condemnation here is obscure. Edom is accused in ch. 25 of 'handing over' Israel to its enemies, a possible reference to a last-minute shift in Edomite loyalties (see Ezek 25:12–14). Edom is here further berated for planning to take possession of YHWH's own homeland following the Israelites' deportation. YHWH's reminder that he has been present in Israel all along (v. 10) may provide a clue as to why Mt. Seir is singled out for condemnation. Ancient traditions, both biblical and extrabiblical, associate YHWH with Seir as his residence (see Judg 5:4; ABD, 'Seir') and YHWH's emphatic rejection of Seir and blessing of Israel's mountains (36:1–15) may serve to refute any Edomite claim to YHWH (or to his land). YHWH's determination to 'desolate' Seir is repeated five times in this brief oracle, reflecting an acute awareness that in fact it is Israel's mountains that have been desolated (vv. 12, 15; cf. 6:14), while Seir remains inviolate. The Edomites are informed that once they too have been desolated, they will then acknowledge YHWH (v. 15).

In 36:1–15 Ezekiel is instructed to deliver an oracle of consolation to the mountains of Israel. YHWH cites the humiliation endured by Israel's mountains as the reason for his special promise to restore them. Specifically, Edom's gloating and its encroachment on Israel's territory are cited. Whether or not Edom annexed parts of Israel following Jerusalem's destruction is debated (see Ezek 25:12–14), but YHWH's point is clear; whatever humiliations the land suffered will now be turned against those who celebrated Israel's fall. Israel's mountains, by contrast, will grow luxuriant and fruitful branches to sustain the people soon to return. In a final promise (vv. 13–15) YHWH assures the personified mountains that they will no longer cause Israel to stumble by devouring the nation's children. The reference is awkward, but seems to recall Ezekiel's charge elsewhere (16:20–1; 20:25–6; 23:37–9) of child-sacrifice practised in the period immediately preceding Jerusalem's destruction.

(36:16–38) YHWH's Honour Restored In vv. 16–38 YHWH moves from a bitter reminiscence on Israel's pre-exilic sinfulness to promises of its restoration. The predominant concern voiced throughout the passage, however, is not for Israel's history, but for YHWH's. Whether punishing or forgiving, YHWH acts, not for Israel's sake, but to protect the sanctity of his name. In v. 17 YHWH summarizes Israel's past behaviour with a single phrase: they acted l'ennidâ, like a menstruant woman. The simile is intended to capture the intense defilement characterizing all of Israel's actions (cf. 7:20), but the image also recalls the striking personification of ch. 16 in which Jerusalem begins life weltering in placental blood (v. 6), matures to menarche (vv. 7–9), and finally sheds the blood of her own children (vv. 20–2). The designation 'like a menstruant' thus aptly recapitulates the deeds of the 'bloody city' (22:2) Jerusalem.

YHWH then explains (v. 19) that he punished the people for their sins by scattering them in exile. Unfortunately, this punishment itself involved additional defilement of the divine name, in that YHWH was made to appear either weak or unfaithful in allowing his own people to be exiled (cf. Ezek 1:2). 'These', say the nations, 'are the people of the Lord, and yet they had to go out of his land' (v. 20). YHWH is therefore forced to act yet again to vindicate his name.

In vv. 22–32 YHWH enunciates not only his promise to restore Israel to the land, but also his motives for doing so: 'It is not for your sake, O house of Israel, that I am about to act, but for the sake of my holy name' (v. 22). YHWH's assertion that he is not acting for Israel's sake is repeated in v. 32, creating an inclusio framing YHWH's discussion of his motives. YHWH's holy name—his honour—has been profaned 'among the nations' by Israel's exile (v. 21); therefore he will now display his holiness before the nations by bringing Israel back from exile and restoring a purified people to a fruitful land. The underlying logic is consistent with the discussion of Israel's history in ch. 20 (and cf. 22:16): by allowing Israel to be exiled YHWH violates his own covenant and injures his reputation. YHWH is apparently incapable of protecting his people or even his own temple, and his land has been devastated. It is therefore imperative that YHWH restore land, temple, and people, not for their sake, but for his own. Here Ezekiel's overriding concern with the divine honour (Ezek 1:2) comes to the fore. Whatever tenderness might be evident in images such as the 'good shepherd' of Ezek 34, Ezekiel's urgent task remains the vindication of YHWH's honour, power, and holiness. Just as in 20:33–5 YHWH announces that he will rule over the people whether they will or no, so here YHWH re-establishes his people, not only regardless of their worthiness, but, indeed, regardless of their needs or desires. It is YHWH's stature, not theirs, that is at stake and that must be confirmed. YHWH will bring back his people from exile and, before returning them to the land, will first purify them and then render them incapable of defiling his name further (vv. 25–7). Whereas Jeremiah had promised that God's law would be inscribed on the people's hearts (31:33), Ezekiel requires that the people's hearts be replaced altogether (cf. 11:19). YHWH will make the people obey his laws by means of new hearts directed by YHWH's spirit (v. 27). Then Israel will again become YHWH's covenant people (v. 28), and inhabit a land blessed with fertility (vv. 29–30). The restoration that vindicates YHWH's name, however, will cause shame for Israel (cf. 16:63) as they realize the gravity of their sins.

Proof that Israel's cleansing and restoration have been effective is found in the new reputation YHWH enjoys among 'the nations that are left' (v. 36), presumably those remaining after the day of YHWH described in the preceding oracles against the nations. The nations will credit YHWH with making the desolate land 'like the garden of Eden' (v. 35) and so will acknowledge his sovereignty. YHWH will favour Israel by increasing its population, making it 'like the flock at Jerusalem during her appointed festivals'—that is, both multitudinous and holy—so that Israel also may acknowledge YHWH's sovereignty (v. 38).

(37:1–14) The Vision of the Dry Bones As in Ezekiel's earlier visions (1:3; 3:22; 8:1–3) the prophet experiences the 'hand of the Lord' and is transported in a vision. The vision of 37:1–14 is unique in that YHWH's chariot does not appear. The focus is not on heavenly realities but on Israel's despair and God's response. Ezekiel is placed in a valley (or 'plain'; cf. 3:22) filled with bones. As in his vision of the defiled temple in chs. 8–11 (and cf. chs. 40–8) Ezekiel is led about as a witness, in this instance a witness to the number of bones and their desiccated condition. YHWH asks the prophet whether the bones can live; given Ezekiel's role certifying the bones' utter lifelessness, the obvious answer is 'no'. Ezekiel, however, answers, 'O Lord God, you know' (v. 3), an ambiguous response that can signify either, 'You already know they cannot', or more likely a more open-ended deference to YHWH's sovereignty: 'You alone know what is possible.' YHWH then instructs Ezekiel to prophesy to the already dead and desiccated bones, assuring them that YHWH will cause them to live, and, living, to acknowledge YHWH (vv. 4–6). The prophecy has ironic overtones in context: for years Ezekiel prophesied to living Israelites who proved as unable to respond as any dry bones. Now he must prophesy to the bones themselves.

Ezekiel prophesies and at once the bones come rattling together. Sinews, flesh, and skin cover them, effectively reversing their decayed state (vv. 7–8). The bodies are still lifeless, however, and YHWH commands Ezekiel to prophesy now to 'the breath' (v. 9), calling it to bring life to the corpses before him. Again Ezekiel prophesies, the breath enters the bodies, and they stand, alive, before him. Wordplay based on the word rûah (breath, wind, spirit) lends a mystical ambiguity to the scene. A wind blowing across the valley floor enters the bodies to endow them with breath. This breath, however, is in fact YHWH's own spirit, which will not only enliven the Israelites, but make possible their fidelity to YHWH (vv. 13–14; cf. 36:27; 39:29). In vv. 11–14 YHWH explains the vision to Ezekiel. The bones are Israel in its current, hopeless condition (v. 11; cf. 33:10). The image of unburied corpses, now turned to parched, dislocated, and scattered bones, simultaneously evokes the remains of Israelites killed in the Babylonian invasions, the dislocated and disoriented Israelites still living in the land, and the exiles whose hopes have at last been utterly crushed. To this devastated people YHWH promises that he will act beyond their despair; he will open their very graves in order to give them life and restore them to their land (vv. 13–14). Although later interpreters, both Jewish and Christian, saw in Ezek 37:1–14 a promise of the resurrection of the dead (see ABD, 'Resurrection (OT)'), here the image is clearly metaphorical. The people who find themselves 'cut off completely' (v. 11) will be rejoined and given a new life in the land.

(37:15–28) The Two Sticks Connected YHWH commands Ezekiel to take two sticks, inscribing one 'for Judah' and the other 'for Joseph', that is, one for the southern and one for the northern kingdom, and to join the sticks in his hand. YHWH goes on in vv. 19–28 to explain the meaning of the symbolic action and to deliver further promises to Israel. The two sticks represent the northern and southern kingdoms of Israel. Though both kingdoms have now been destroyed, YHWH says he is about to make them one 'in my hand' (v. 19). The sticks are thus sceptres. YHWH will not only restore the two kingdoms, but will rule over both. He will appoint David (that is, a descendant of the Davidic house) as 'shepherd', reigning over the reunited kingdom of Israel. The purified people will follow YHWH's laws and inhabit the land (v. 25). YHWH will establish an eternal covenant of peace with the people and will dwell in his sanctuary in their midst (v. 26). The oracle combines images from previous oracles of promise and then extends those promises still further: the appointment of David as 'shepherd' and the promise of the covenant of peace echo YHWH's promise of ch. 34. The cleansing of the people, who will then follow YHWH's laws, recalls 36:25–7 (and cf. 11:19–20). YHWH's promised restoration of northern Israel as well as Judah is foreshadowed in the restoration of Oholah (Samaria) in 16:53–5 and perhaps already in the instructions for Ezekiel to 'bear the punishment' of both kingdoms in 4:4–6. YHWH's promise to restore the northern tribes none the less comes as a surprise here, it being nearly 150 years since the northern kingdom's destruction. YHWH's restoration, however, is primarily the restoration of his own kingdom, not Judah's, and he will reign over his entire land and his entire people. The final sign of YHWH's renewed sovereignty is the re-establishment of his sanctuary, the throne-room from which he will reign over the land. The promise of a new sanctuary looks forward to the vision of chs. 40–8, in which YHWH is at last re-enthroned forever over an obedient Israel.

(38:1–39:29) Gog of Magog Chs. 38–9 form the climax of Ezekiel's promises of restoration in chs. 33–9. Vividly depicting the Divine Warrior's victory over his ultimate enemy, the triumph of Ezek 38–9 paves the way for YHWH's re-enthronement in the restored temple of chs. 40–8. The two chapters comprise two related oracles (38:1–23 and 39:1–29) against Gog of Magog, a figure otherwise unknown from biblical or extrabiblical sources (though providing the basis for the Gog and Magog of Rev 20:7–10). The oracles envision a period after Israel has been restored to the land, at which point YHWH will incite Gog to attack them (38:4; 39:2). YHWH will then engage and defeat Gog in battle, thus displaying his glory and holiness before the nations. Once the land has been cleansed following the carnage a sacrificial feast will be celebrated, the people will receive YHWH's long-promised spirit, and the nations will recognize YHWH.

One of the most vexed questions in the interpretation of Ezekiel remains the identity of Gog. The seventh-century king Gyges of Lydia has often been suggested but is not a convincing candidate. Gyges had been dead over a century by Ezekiel's time and had never commanded power anything like that attributed to Gog. The only points of connection are the similarity in names and the location of each in (different areas of) Anatolia. Recent scholarship prefers to see Gog as an embodiment of chaos, a designation that suits his role as the ultimate force opposing YHWH's people and defying his universal sovereignty. A third possibility is that Gog represents Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon, elevated here into an enemy of cosmic significance. Several factors support reading Gog as a cipher for Nebuchadnezzar. First, the role played by Nebuchadnezzar elsewhere in Ezekiel poses serious dissonances within Ezekiel's overall theological outlook. Nebuchadnezzar is depicted in exclusively positive terms in Ezekiel, as YHWH's covenant partner (see Ezek 17) and his agent in destroying both Israel and its smaller neighbours (see e.g. Ezek 21:18–23; 26:7–14; 29:17–20). Nebuchadrezzar's role parallels that played in Isaiah by Assyria, who is employed by YHWH as 'the rod of [YHWH's] anger' against Israel (Isa 10:5–11). In Ezekiel, Babylon's role as ally and agent of YHWH reflects the reality of YHWH's invocation as guarantor of Zedekiah's vassal-treaty, as well as providing YHWH with a human agent to carry out his warfare in the world. Nebuchadrezzar's capture of YHWH's land and destruction of his temple, however, imply the de facto superiority of the Babylonian god Marduk over the Israelite YHWH. 'These', say the nations, 'are the people of the Lord, but they had to leave his land' (NJPS), a situation that in and of itself defiles YHWH's holy name (Ezek 36:20). Nebuchadrezzar's military superiority together with the implicit supremacy of Marduk over YHWH thus continue to compromise YHWH's honour despite all claims that the Babylonian monarch acts only as YHWH's ally or agent. Isaiah had faced the same theological problem in his use of Assyria and resolved it by claiming that ultimately YHWH would punish the over-proud king of Assyria for believing himself YHWH's conqueror rather than his servant (Isa 10:12–19; 30:19–33). Ezekiel, writing in Babylon, would have had strong reasons to seek a means of predicting YHWH's triumph over Nebuchadrezzar. As a Babylonian vassal living in Babylonian territory, however, he would have had equally strong reasons for predicting this triumph covertly rather than, as Isaiah had, overtly.

Gog's true identity as Nebuchadrezzar of Babylon is supported by strong verbal parallels between the description of Gog in chs. 38–9 and depictions of the Babylonian monarch elsewhere in Ezekiel. Like Gog, Nebuchadrezzar is described as coming from 'the north' (23:24; 26:7; cf. 38:6, 15; 39:2; Jer 25:9). Both monarchs are rulers over 'many peoples' (26:3; 31:11; cf. 38:6, 9) and arrive with horses and riders bearing shield, buckler, and helmet (23:23–4; 26:10; cf. 38:4–5) to terrify and devastate their enemies. For Ezekiel the 'king of kings' (26:7), leader of 'the worst of the nations' (7:24) is Nebuchadrezzar of Babylon. Gog's title of nēšī' rōš' mešek wētūbāl (38:2; NRSV 'the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal') may point indirectly to Nebuchadrezzar. Traditional designation of Gog as 'chief prince' ignores the construct relation, nēšī' rōš', that literally yields 'prince of the head', that is, ruler over the leader of Meshech and Tubal. The location of Gog's home, Magog (cf. Gen 10:2), is unknown, but Meshech and Tubal were regions of north-central Anatolia. Early in the sixth century Nebuchadrezzar gained control over Cilicia in southern Anatolia, and so functioned as a leader in the region. When a dispute broke out between the Lydians and Medes over control of Meshech and Tubal Nebuchadrezzar's deputy successfully brokered a peace in the region (Wiseman 1956). Gog's designation as 'prince over the leader' of Meshech and Tubal could thus covertly designate the Babylonian Nebuchadrezzar in his role as the principal powerbroker in northern Anatolia.

The final factor pointing to Gog as a cipher for Nebuchadrezzar is the former's role in YHWH's vindication and in paving the way for his enthronement in Ezek 43. In 36:20–32 YHWH admits that Israel's exile has caused defilement of the divine name. He therefore announces his intention to act for his name's sake, to sanctify his name, display his holiness, and gain recognition from the nations. He will then cleanse his people and put a new spirit within them, thereby creating a people worthy of his name. In Ezek 38–9 it is precisely Gog's defeat that will accomplish YHWH's self-vindication, removing the stigma of the exile. YHWH will display his holiness (38:16, 23; 39:7, 21–3, 27–8), causing nations to acknowledge his sovereignty. Israel will be cleansed (39:11–16) and gifted with YHWH's spirit (39:28–9). Gog is the monarch whose power continues to defile YHWH's name and whose destruction opens the way for YHWH's re-enthronement. Gog is the enemy who cannot be named but must be overcome: Nebuchadrezzar of Babylon.

Both Ezek 38 and 39 depict Gog's destruction; ch. 38 focuses on events leading up to YHWH's battle with Gog while ch. 39 centres on the aftermath of YHWH's victory. In 38:1–16 YHWH informs Gog as to the circumstances surrounding Gog's attack against Israel. Even before the predicted battle Gog will be YHWH's vassal; YHWH will put a hook through Gog's nose to lead him and his minions out to war. At the time of Gog's invasion Israel will already have been 'restored from war', a land where people have been 'gathered from many nations' (v. 8). This gathering of Israel from 'many nations' may well envision the restoration of the scattered northern tribes (cf. 37:15–23; 48:1–7) as well as Judah. The restoration is apparently not contingent on the prior destruction of Israel's enemies, and so YHWH's final battle against Israel's enemies and his own takes place in the land of Israel, 'at the centre of the earth' (v. 12). Like Pharaoh in the Exodus narrative (Ex 14:4, 17–18), Gog will serve as a foil whose real purpose is to demonstrate YHWH's prowess. YHWH himself will instigate Gog's attack in order to gain renown and display his holiness by crushing the enemy. YHWH announces that Gog is the enemy whom YHWH had for years prophesied that he would bring against Israel (v. 17). If Gog is to be understood as Babylon, then Ezekiel may in part be referring to his own earlier prophecies. Now the battle with Gog is revealed as 'that day', the day of YHWH's wrath, on which the earth will quake and YHWH will rain down fire and sulphur (vv. 17–23). Gog's defeat is thus not so much a literal, military victory as the day of YHWH, the triumph of the Divine Warrior.

Ezek 39 opens as did ch. 38 with an announcement to Gog that YHWH is about to lead him 'against the mountains of Israel' (v. 2), where he and his troops will die and be devoured by wild beasts. This, says YHWH, will remove the defilement from YHWH's holy name and vindicate him before both Israel and the nations. 'This', says YHWH, 'is the day of which I have spoken' (v. 8). The day of YHWH is no longer a 'distant vision' (12:27); 'It has come! It has happened' (v. 8; cf. 7:2, 5–6). YHWH's announcement has rendered Gog as good as dead. In vv. 9–16 YHWH describes the aftermath of Gog's defeat. The invaders' weapons will suffice for firewood for seven years, not only providing for the people's needs, but also sparing the trees (cf. Lev 19:23–5; 26:34–5). Meanwhile, seven months will be required to cleanse the land from the pollution created by the slaughtered army's corpses (vv. 11–16). The people will search out the corpses and bury them in a mass grave in the 'Valley of Gog's Multitude' (v. 11, NJPS).

In vv. 17–20 Ezekiel is commanded to assemble the birds and animals, inviting them to a sacrificial banquet to be held on the mountains of Israel. The animals will eat and drink their fill of human flesh and human blood—the flesh and blood of YHWH's slaughtered enemies. The victorious god's sacrificial banquet on the mountain was a stock element of the Divine Warrior traditions of both Canaan and Mesopotamia. Here, however, the image is distorted to make human sacrifices, not animal, the main course. At first glance YHWH's grisly banquet would seem to defile both the participants and the land, as it violates the levitical prohibition against 'eating blood' (see Lev 17:11). In this case, however, the utter defilement of YHWH's enemies (whose corpses are fed to the birds and animals; cf. 32:4) serves to restore the mountains that earlier had been defiled by idolatrous sacrifices (6:1–7). Textually, the banquet of vv. 17–20 seems out of place since the corpses of Gog's army are already burned in vv. 11–16. It is possible that either vv. 11–16 or vv. 17–20 are later additions, as is commonly assumed. It is equally possible that logical consistency is set aside here in order to depict the events normally preceding the god's enthronement: the cleansing of the land (vv. 11–16); the sacrificial banquet (vv. 17–20); the triumphant procession into the temple (43:1–5); and last, the enthronement (43:6). The description of YHWH's triumph over Gog concludes (vv. 21–9) with YHWH's explanation of the theological significance of his triumph. YHWH's victory manifests his glory (v. 21) and holiness (v. 27) before all nations; both the nations and Israel will acknowledge YHWH's sovereignty. Moreover, with Gog's defeat the nations will at last understand that 'Israel went into captivity for their iniquity', because of their treachery (m'î) against YHWH (v. 23) and not because of weakness or infidelity on YHWH's part. After YHWH has restored Israel to its land and displayed his holiness by destroying Gog, then the people will be allowed to forget their sins and their shame (vv. 25–8). When the people fully understand YHWH's control over both exile and restoration, then he will pour out his spirit upon Israel (vv. 28–9), promising never again to abandon them.

YHWH's Re-enthronement (40:1–48:35)

The last nine chapters of Ezekiel comprise a single vision, the last of Ezekiel's three visions of YHWH on his chariot (cf. chs. 1; 8–11). The vision parallels the vision of chs. 8–11 in which Ezekiel is led on a tour of the defiled temple before watching the Divine Warrior's departure. In chs. 40–8 Ezekiel tours the restored, pure temple and then watches the Warrior's return and re-enthronement. In each case Ezekiel seems to serve as a witness, certifying both the abominations committed in the old temple and the purity maintained in the new, and then perceiving YHWH's response as he first departs warlike from the old and finally returns victorious to the new temple. Sometimes considered Ezekiel's blueprint for a new, post-exilic Jerusalem temple and cult (a blueprint ignored or rejected by the post-exilic community), in fact the vision gives no instructions for building the temple. Rather, the new temple is revealed as completed, whole and pristine, awaiting only YHWH's formal accession to his throne. Israel's role will be to observe the 'law of the temple' (43:12), not to build it. While the vision's arid details of architecture and ritual praxis often lead commentators to consider chs. 40–8 a secondary addition, the vision's crucial role in completing the plot of YHWH's return and re-enthronement argues for its original congruence with the rest of the book (see EZEK A.3).

(40:1–42:20) The Temple Measurements Ezekiel reports receiving his final vision 'in the twenty-fifth year of our exile' (40:1), 573 BCE. Although often interpreted as a 'half-Jubilee' (that is, half of a theoretical jubilee cycle taking the exile as its starting-point), the year should be understood as a Jubilee year. Just as the vision of ch. 1 was dated according to the Jubilee ('in the thirtieth year' (of the Jubilee) = the fifth year of the exile; see EZEK 1:1), so this climactic vision of restoration takes place in the Jubilee year, the twenty-fifth year of Judah's exile. The further specification, 'the beginning of the year, on the tenth day of the month' (v. 1) confirms the year's Jubilee status, the Jubilee being the only year beginning on the tenth rather than the first of the month (see Lev 25:9), that is, on the Day of Atonement. The date, in October of 573, is thus the proper moment to declare both the enthronement of YHWH as king and Israel's restoration to the land according to the law of Jubilee (Lev 25:10).

As in 8:3 Ezekiel is transported in his vision to the land of Israel. He is placed on 'a very high mountain, on which was a structure like a city to the south' (v. 2). The mountain is evidently Mount Zion, now exalted as in the prophecies of Isa 2:2 and Mic 4:1. The unnamed city replaces the devastated Jerusalem. A man gleaming 'like bronze' (v. 3; cf. 1:7 and the figure of hašmal in 1:27; 8:2), evidently the heavenly guide from the vision of chs. 8–11, appears with a measuring rod and instructs Ezekiel to pay close attention so as to be able to pass on what he sees to the Israelites. The whole of 40:5–42:20 comprises a tour in which Ezekiel witnesses as his guide measures the various dimensions of the temple complex, beginning at the outer wall, proceeding inwards to the holy of holies, and then returning to the complex's outer wall. Unlike the Solomonic temple, Ezekiel's is provided with two courtyards, thus allowing an additional buffer-zone separating the holy from the common. Both the outer and inner courtyards include gates on the north, east, and south sides. Within the inner courtyard are various chambers for the washing and slaughter of sacrificial animals and for the use of Levites and other temple servants. Ezekiel's tour of the new temple, witnessing its structures and dimensions, parallels his tour of the defiled temple in ch. 8. Now, however, he watches as his guide measures and thus certifies the perfection of the new structure. Everything is quite literally in order, creating a physical boundary between sacred and profane space (42:20).

(43:1–12) The Enthronement of YHWH Following his tour of the temple precincts Ezekiel is brought to the outer east gate, where he sees the glory of YHWH coming from the east. Ezekiel identifies this vision specifically as being 'like the vision that I had seen when [YHWH] came to destroy the city, and like the vision that I had seen by the river Chebar' (v. 3), that is, like his earlier visions of YHWH as Warrior. Following the pattern of the Israelite enthronement ritual, the triumphant Warrior returns in procession to take his throne within the holy of holies. Ezekiel is brought only as far as the inner court, while, recapitulating YHWH's first possession of the newly built wilderness sanctuary (Ex 40:34–35; cf. 1 Kings 8:10; Isa 6:1), the glory of YHWH fills the temple.

In v. 6 Ezekiel is addressed by YHWH himself, who proclaims his own enthronement within his eternal dwelling, the place of his footstool (v. 7; cf. Ps 99:5). YHWH announces both his eternal presence among the people and the condition making that presence possible: Israel will cease to defile YHWH's holy name. Israel's past offences are described as its 'whoring' (zēnūt, cf. chs. 16; 23) and its royal ṭēgārīm, both in close proximity to the temple (v. 8). The ṭēgārīm are probably not royal corpses (as e.g. in NRSV) but royal memorial stelae (see Neiman 1948), perceived as threatening YHWH's exclusive kingship over Israel. Israel's 'whoring' comprised idolatry and foreign alliances, both of which violated YHWH's honour (cf. Ezek 16). Here Israel's exaltation of its own (former?) kings is grouped with idolatry and foreign alliances; all are seen as compromising YHWH's sovereignty and thus his honour; none may be allowed in the restored temple precincts.

In vv. 10–12 YHWH instructs Ezekiel to explain the temple's layout to the house of Israel in order to bring about their repentant shame. The causal relation posited between knowing the temple plan and obedience, seemingly implies that the people (perhaps as a result of YHWH's outpoured spirit; 39:29) are now fully ready to obey and need only instruction as to 'the law of the temple' (v. 12).

(43:13–46:24) Laws Governing Land and Cult Following the sequence displayed by Exodus and Leviticus, Ezekiel first describes the temple itself and then witnesses the arrival of the divine glory before detailing the routine of ritual observance (much as the laws of Leviticus follow immediately upon Ex 40:34). With YHWH enthroned in his new sanctuary, Ezekiel proceeds in 43:13–17 to describe the sacrificial altar and in vv. 18–27 to detail the procedures for its purification. The altar consists of three square tiers with 'horns' at its four corners (see ABD, 'Altar'). Its purification, performed by Zadokite priests, follows the procedures set out in Lev 8:14–15 and Ex 29:36–7.

Ezekiel is next (44:1–3) brought from the inner court to the east gate of the outer court. Here he is informed that the east gate is to remain closed because YHWH, 'the God of Israel, has entered by it' (v. 2). Although the commandment suggests the special holiness attributed to, so to speak, YHWH's private entrance, the permanently locked gate also symbolizes the permanence of YHWH's presence in the temple. Having vanquished his final enemy and established an obedient people, YHWH will have no further need either to conduct full-scale purification of the temple or to re-establish his supremacy in an annual battle beginning with his departure from the temple. The 'ruler' (nāšī', or prince), who is never called 'king' in Ezek 40–8, is alone permitted to enter the east gate (from the courtyard side) in order to 'eat food', presumably taking part in a ritual meal (v. 3).

In 44:4 Ezekiel again approaches the temple and is again overwhelmed by the glory of YHWH present in the sanctuary. This additional notice of YHWH's presence probably serves to reinforce the instructions of vv. 1–3; YHWH no longer processes out or in; his location is known and it is eternal (cf. 43:7).

In 44:5–9 YHWH prescribes that no foreigners are to be admitted to the temple. This prohibition is specifically in response to Israel's former 'abominations', including breaking YHWH's covenant and failing to watch over the temple sancta, instead giving foreigners charge of the temple. The charge is obscure, but may refer to the Egyptian ruler Psam-meticus II, who in 592 BCE visited Palestine and stationed his priests there, thereby breaking YHWH's covenant with Nebuchadnezzar (see Ezek 17; Galambush 1992).

YHWH goes on in 44:10–31 to outline the respective duties of the Levites and Zadokites (see ABD, 'Levites and Priests'). The Levites, designated as priests in Deut 18:1–18 but 'given' as assistants to Aaron and his descendants in Num 3:5–10, are here presented as being demoted to the rank of servant as punishment for previous idolatry. The Zadokites, however, are designated 'levitical' priests (v. 15) and alone are authorized to present offerings and to enter the temple proper. Regulations governing the dress and conduct of the priests generally follow the prescriptions of Lev 10 and 21, though with some variation. The priests are charged with teaching the people the distinction between clean and unclean, and with maintaining the holiness of feasts and sabbaths (vv. 23–4). As also specified in the Priestly legislation, the priests will inherit no land but will be maintained from temple offerings.

In 45:1–8 the land surrounding the temple is allocated; the Zadokite priests live in a 'most holy' area immediately adjacent to the temple with the Levites to their north and the city to their south. The areas to the east and west of these holdings will be royal property. The royal holdings are strictly limited by a sharp command in v. 8 for the prince to allow the people their land. The prince is commanded to establish justice and righteousness, the traditional responsibility of divine and human rulers. Legislation in vv. 10–17 specifying legal weights and measures as well as the prince's duty to supply various offerings seems aimed at curbing abuses by the ruler.

The ritual calendar is set forth in 45:18–25, beginning with the cleansing of the temple in 'the first month' (v. 18), apparently assuming a spring new year. This annual cleansing of the temple is similar to the Yom Kippur of Lev 16, but with important differences. First, the cleansing is confined to the court and exterior of the temple, perhaps indicating that grave sins that would contaminate the temple proper are not committed in the restored community. Second, the cleansing is linked to the observance of the Passover two weeks later (vv. 21–4) rather than to the New Year or enthronement festival. In v. 25 offerings are prescribed for 'the seven days of the festival' in the seventh month (cf. 1 Kings 8:2–11), apparently a reference to the old New Year/enthronement festival. No Yom Kippur cleansing of the temple is envisioned, and no ark procession (indeed, the east, processional gate was sealed in 44:1–3). The Autumn Festival's apparent truncation may reflect simultaneously the desire to de-emphasize the role played by the human king (cf. 43:6–9) and to accentuate the unchallenged kingship of YHWH. Following Gog's defeat in chs. 38–9 YHWH no longer needs annually to re-establish his reign by subduing his enemies. YHWH is now enthroned continuously within the temple.

In 46:1–18 the logistics governing the access of ruler and people to the temple are laid out. On occasions when the ruler is required to offer sacrifice he is allowed to enter the east gate of the inner courtyard (not the outer, as in 44:3) and stand 'by the post of the gate' (v. 2; cf. 2 Kings 11:14; 23:3) while the priests present his offering. While the east gate is standing open the 'people of the land' (v. 9) are to pass by it and so (albeit obliquely) 'come before the Lord'. vv. 16–18 provide for royal property to remain in royal hands, meanwhile prohibiting the ruler from 'thrusting' the people off their own property. The various rules in Ezek 40–8 prohibiting the ruler from abusing the people (45:8–9) and limiting his cultic function (43:8; 44:3) as well as the avoidance of the title 'king', suggest Ezekiel's distrust of the monarch and his determination not to allow secular authority to erode YHWH's sovereign power. Concern to advance cultic over secular authority may, of course, also have motivated this priest-in-exile.

(47:1–12) The Life-Giving River In 46:19–24 Ezekiel is shown various outbuildings in the inner and outer courts and in 47:1 he is returned to the temple door. Water flows out from the south side of the temple threshold and then heads eastward from the temple complex, deepening into a great river that finally empties into the Dead Sea. Along the river's banks grow trees always laden with fruit and medicinal leaves (v. 12; cf. Rev 22:1–2). The river itself 'heals' the Dead Sea (v. 8) so that it becomes full of fish and thus able also to sustain human life. This life-giving river recalls not only the rivers of Eden in Gen 2:10–14 and the Gihon spring originating from the Jerusalem temple mount (1 Kings 1:33), but also the widespread ancient Near Eastern traditions of rivers flowing from a cosmic mountain to the ends of the earth (see Clifford 1972). As in the Psalms, YHWH sits enthroned 'above the waters' (Ps 29:3; 104:3), having both defeated chaos and ordered the fruitful world. Fruitful trees similarly characterize Eden (Gen 2:9) as well as the gardens of ancient Near-Eastern gods generally (see ABD, 'Garden of God'; Levenson 1976).

(47:13–48:35) Boundaries and Tribal Allotments Following the outward movement of the miraculous river, the vision's focus turns outwards. Like the plan of the temple complex in chs. 40–2, the regular division of the land expresses the rule of divine order. In 47:13–23 the boundaries for all of Israel are laid out: the Brook of Egypt (Wadi el-'Arish) on the south, the river Jordan on the east, the Mediterranean on the west, and a line running through Lebo Hamath on the north (cf. the similar boundaries of Num 34:1–12). No trans-Jordanian holdings are envisioned and the northern border is drawn not far north of Dan (see ABD, 'Hamath, Entrance of'). The borders are apparently realistic rather than idealized, as is often asserted. That is, if the location of Lebo Hamath at the southern end of the Anti-Lebanon mountains is accepted, then the territory outlined is considerably smaller than that claimed in various other texts (Gen 15:18; 1 Kings 4:21 (MT 5:1)).

The land is divided into twelve equal portions, excluding that allocated for the temple, Zadokites, Levites, and ruler (45:1–7). Each of the tribes is to receive a strip of territory extending across the entire land from west to east, with seven to the north and five to the south of the central, holy portions. Judah, located immediately north of the Levites' territory, occupies the holiest position among the twelve tribes, followed by Benjamin to the immediate south of the city and its territory. The city itself is described last (vv. 30–5). The fate of the holy city, which preoccupied Ezekiel throughout the first twenty-four chapters of the book, returns to centre stage at the book's conclusion. The restored city, however, is not given the name 'Jerusalem', a name made infamous by the wild infidelities of YHWH's earlier 'bride' (Ezek 16; 23). The purified city is as far removed as possible from the defilement of its pre-exilic counterpart. The city's twelve gates, one for each of the twelve tribes, are described in vv. 30–4. Here the tribes of Manasseh and Ephraim, listed as separate tribes in the boundary list (48:4–5), are replaced by Joseph in order to allow for the inclusion of Levi as one of the twelve tribes. This apparent inconsistency may reflect the very practical need for the Levites and Zadokite priests (considered descendants of Levi in 44:15) to enter and exit the city despite their lack of tribal inheritances per se.

Ezekiel concludes with the naming of the city in 48:35. The new name, 'YHWH is There', plays on the name 'Jerusalem' (YHWH šāmmā instead of yērūšā'āim), but proclaims the central triumph of the temple vision: YHWH is present, reigning from his temple and dwelling amid his people forever.

26. Daniel

P. R. DAVIES

INTRODUCTION

A. The Two Forms of the Book of Daniel. 1. Daniel exists in a Hebrew–Aramaic version, that of the Hebrew (Jewish) Bible which forms the basis of most modern English translations; and also in Greek versions: an Old Greek translation and the one which became the standard Christian text, ascribed to Theodotion. The HB, of which fragments have been found among the Dead Sea scrolls, does not include certain passages and stories that are found in the Greek versions. These Greek additions are usually found in English Bibles in the Apocrypha, as three separate books, under the names Prayer of Azariah, Susannah, and Bel and the Dragon. In the Greek versions, however, Azariah's prayer comes after what is 3:23 in the canonical book of Daniel, while Susannah and Bel and the Dragon form chs. 13 and 14. Apart from these, however, the Old Greek text often differs significantly from the HB (e.g. in chs. 4 and 5) implying more than one Hebrew–Aramaic text of Daniel at some stage.

2. Another major difference between the two forms of Daniel is that the (canonical) HB version belongs with the third section, Writings, while in the Greek (and Eng.) Bibles it occupies a pivotal point in the prophetic section of the canon, between the three major prophetic books and the twelve minor prophets. It is the shorter HB version that is being dealt with here.

B. Original Language. The HB version of Daniel opens in Hebrew, the original language of the Old Testament, but switches in 2:4 to Aramaic, a related language increasingly spoken and written by Jews from the Persian period onwards (from the middle of the 7th cent. BCE). But chs. 8–12 revert to Hebrew. It is unclear whether the book was originally written in one language only and partly translated; if so, then the Aramaic is more likely to be the original because chs. 2–7 seem to contain the older parts of the book. But no one explanation of this curious feature has yet been generally accepted.

C. Literary Form and Structure. 1. Two genres are contained in Daniel. One is the story, narrated in the third person, represented by chs. 2–6; the other is the vision report, narrated in the first person (with Daniel the speaker). Ch. 4 is unusual in being a story narrated in the first person by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, and ch. 1, which contains a little story about Daniel and his friends, seems to have been composed especially to link Daniel with the biblical history and to introduce the characters in the following stories.

2. The stories fall into two types: deliverance stories and interpretation stories. Deliverance stories (chs. 1, 3, 6) relate some miraculous preservation or rescue of the hero or heroes. Interpretation stories (chs. 2, 4, 5) focus on the hero's remarkable ability to explain a puzzling sign, whether a dream or writing on a wall. The two genres combine in important ways to present a single theme: the God of Daniel is the omnipotent lord who controls history, setting up and removing earthly rulers and empires, but also rescuing his people from the power of those kings and teaching them the limits of their sovereignty. He is thus the only sure source of knowledge about the future, and through him Daniel can predict what will happen in the future. All these stories, set in a foreign court and concerning the success of a wise courtier over his rivals, represent a well-known genre in the ancient Near East (see Wills 1990). In the Bible the genre is also represented in the stories of Esther and Joseph.

3. The visions of chs. 7–12 focus on that future. Already in ch. 2 Daniel has foretold a sequence of four mighty kingdoms which will culminate in a great and everlasting kingdom. In four visions (chs. 7, 8, 9, and 10–12) he narrates how he saw visions which are subsequently interpreted to him by a heavenly being as being symbolic of the rise and destruction of these kingdoms. The one exception here is ch. 9, where Daniel is puzzled not by a vision but by a word of the prophet Jeremiah concerning the length of the desolation of Jerusalem. The final vision consists for the most part of a monologue from the interpreting heavenly messenger, Gabriel, about the history of the last kingdom, which will culminate in great distress for Daniel's people, though they will in the end be saved—or at least the righteous of them.

4. The visions, at any rate, may accurately be called 'apocalypses', the main feature of which is the revelation of heavenly secrets, usually to a great figure of the past. These secrets may be about the origin of evil, the workings of the universe (sun, stars, winds), or the future. The prime example of this in the Bible is Revelation, which draws some of its inspiration from Daniel. However, Daniel as a whole is not an apocalypse.

5. Of the history of the composition of the book we have numerous clues but little consensus. Most of the stories appear once to have been independent compositions. One attractive theory is that chs. 2–7 formed an Aramaic collection (in a concentric pattern, ch. 2 matching ch. 7, ch. 3 matching ch. 6, and ch. 5 as a centre). There are signs of editorial expansion in most chapters, and linking between them, such as the addition of ch. 1, and the provision of datings to each chapter, so that both stories and visions run from Nebuchadnezzar to Cyrus. Chs. 8–12 must have come from a fairly narrow period, between the desecration of the Temple (167 BCE) and its restoration (163).

D. Historical Context. 1. After the Exile, and the return of exiles to Judah, the Judeans lived under Persians (until 331) then under Alexander the Great and the Hellenistic–Egyptian kingdom of the Ptolemies. In 199 Judah was captured by the Hellenistic–Syrian kingdom of the Seleucids. Daniel deals simultaneously with the beginning and end of that timespan. Daniel's lifetime lasts from the beginning of the exile of Judeans under Nebuchadnezzar (always called Nebuchadnezzar in Daniel) until the reign of Cyrus. Daniel's actual dates of birth and death are not given, but the fact that his life coincides with the exile of the Judeans is the significant point. The other period is that which the visions clearly point to: the time of the last kingdom, the final persecution and ultimate deliverance of the righteous: in other words, the end of history. Is the book, then, a prediction of events centuries ahead of its time, or a history veiled in the form of prediction? Those who dislike the idea of what one commentator called a 'fraud' argue for a sixth-century BCE date, and a real Daniel as the author. The majority of scholars, however, accept that the visions, at least, betray a knowledge of the time at which the 'end' is set, which can be deduced as the reign of the Seleucid (Syrian) king Antiochus IV, known as Epiphanes. Antiochus banned Jewish practices, desecrated the temple, and provoked a war of resistance under the leadership of the Maccabees which, after his death, succeeded in restoring the temple and traditional Jewish religious practices.

2. The main reasons for assigning a Maccabean date to the book (at least in its final form) are (a) some inaccuracies that a sixth-century writer ought not to have made, (b) the presence of a genuine prediction at the end of the book which we now know to be incorrect, and (c) the popularity of a kind of pseudo-historical writing among Jews of the Maccabean period and later, in which figures of antiquity were made to foretell the future (e.g. Enoch, Noah, the twelve sons of Jacob).

3. However, it seems probable that while the visions come from the second century BCE, the stories (chs. 2–6) may be a good deal earlier. For they represent foreign kings as foolish but ultimately persuaded, while Jews are promoted to high office at court. The climax of the tale is usually the king learning his lesson. In the visions, however, we are presented with an ever-increasing hostility towards the Jewish God and his people, which only their total destruction will solve. The perspective of the stories seems to be that of Jews living under a relatively benign rule (the Persians?) while that of the visions suggests Jews in Judah under a malign ruler. It is therefore likely that the book of Daniel has a long and complex history. This possibility is supported by the discovery of a story about an unknown Jewish exile and the Babylonian king Nabonidus, found among the Dead Sea scrolls and remarkably similar to the story of Daniel and Nebuchadnezzar in Daniel ch. 3 (4QPrNab). Yet, the story of Belshazzar's feast (ch. 5) marks a contrast to the theme of the other stories with its negative portrayal of the king who dies for his insolence, and may well have been inspired by the figure of Antiochus.

4. Finally, it is worth contrasting the relatively serene and optimistic mood of the stories, in which one High God is in supreme control and succession from one kingdom to another passes smoothly with the very different world-view of the visions, where the succession of power is violent—not just on earth but in the heavenly realm too, as the celestial patrons of each nation fight it out among themselves. The departure of the one supreme God from participation in this scenario (marked by ch. 7 where he hands power to another figure) is both remarkable and disturbing, suggesting an underlying view of the world's subsequent history that is rather pessimistic.

E. Structure. Despite the differences between the two halves of the book (language, form, setting, mood), there are features that bind the book together. The two most obvious are the chronological settings: the stories are assigned individually to the kings from Nebuchadnezzar to Cyrus, and the visions recapitulate this sequence. An important structural role is also played by ch. 7, which is bound to the preceding stories through its language (Aramaic) and its similarities with ch. 2, while it shares the same form as chs. 8–12 and indeed sets the agenda for the visions that follow. Hence the HB book of Daniel seems to have an intentional unity—obscured by the Greek book with its closing 'detective stories'.

COMMENTARY

Setting the Scene (1:1–21)

(1:1–7) The 'third year of the reign of Jehoiakim' is hard to reconcile with 2 Kings 24:1–6, Jer 25:1, and the Babylonian Chronicle, and may be based on a misunderstanding of other biblical texts. But the point here is to note the vessels taken (ch. 5), the Babylonian names of the four youths (ch. 3), and their introduction to the court, thus anticipating key elements of the stories, as well as Daniel's knowledge of Aramaic. Note also how the theme of 'the Lord' (Heb. 'ādōnāy: 'YHWH' is used in Daniel only in ch. 9) giving kings into the power of other kings is introduced immediately.

(1:8–21) Many scholars think that the issue here is the observance of Jewish dietary laws, but no Jewish laws prescribe vegetarian diet. Either meat (and wine) are avoided for fear that it has been offered to Babylonian gods (thus implicating the youths in idolatry) or as a demonstration that the youths do not need the favours of the king, for they serve another heavenly king. Note how, although they have been educated in the Babylonian school (v. 5), they are said to have learned from God (v. 17), and in the case of Daniel, specifically the understanding of 'visions and dreams'. Thus, the theme of conflict between earthly and divine kingship and wisdom is neatly brought out, and the chapter has served its purpose as an introduction either to the whole book of Daniel or at least to a cycle of Daniel stories that may have once existed independently.

Daniel's First Success (2:1–49)

This story does not quite hang together. Is Daniel known to the king or not? And why does Daniel's interpretation of the dream introduce new details? Is it the original interpretation? The story shows signs of some editing (Davies 1976).

(2:1–12) In Daniel dreams typically leave the dreamer troubled (cf. 4:5; 5:6; 5:9; 7:15, 28). The list of interpreting professions is also often repeated (cf. 1:20; 2:27; 4:7; 5:11), perhaps to contrast the single figure of Daniel. The requirement to tell the dream as well as the interpretation is a unique element, and the underlying message, that this cannot be done through human wisdom but only through 'the gods', is emphasized in vv. 10–11; the Babylonian interpreters are made to confess that they are not truly inspired from heaven.

(2:13–23) According to this section, Daniel is one of the royal wise men, and a companion of Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah. He is thus sought to be killed with the rest, presupposing the events of ch. 1. But why was he not summoned at first or, if he was, could not give the interpretation? And why does v. 24 repeat v. 14.² The reason is probably that the writer of ch. 1 has inserted vv. 13–23. The original story presented Daniel as a hitherto unknown Jewish exile who had to be introduced to the king by one of his officers. It seems, then, that this story was once an independent tale, which has been integrated by means of this inserted passage. As the story now stands, Daniel and his friends act to preserve their lives and those of the wise men, and to pray for the ‘mystery’ from God. ‘Mystery’ here refers to the secret message (given by dream or any other means) which needs interpreting, and such a scheme reflects the mantic culture of Babylonia in which various guilds of diviners attempted to learn the will of the gods by means of the interpretation of natural phenomena taken as signs. Although the book of Daniel apparently opposes Babylonian mantic practices, it in fact adopts them. The prayer (20–3) nevertheless stresses that such interpretation is not an art but is possible only by direct intervention from the true God.

(2:24–45) Presented now as a hitherto unknown ‘exile of Judah’, Daniel surprises the king by telling him both dream and interpretation. The sequence of metals may reflect an ancient belief in which the ages of the world were symbolized by metal, the course of time showing a gradual deterioration in quality. Interpreting the successively baser metals as kingdoms contrasts with chs. 7–8 where each kingdom is more powerful than its predecessor. The interpretation flatters Nebuchadnezzar, and the statue may originally have referred to his own dynasty, which degenerated quickly under his successors until it fell to Cyrus. That makes better sense of the destruction of the statue in one moment. If so, the story is indeed an old one. As it stands, the interpretation offers the only hint in the story part of the book that human kingdoms will eventually be supplanted by a final eternal one. But it also shows some differences from the account of the dream, such as ‘and the toes’ (v. 41) and the stone being cut from a mountain instead of becoming one.

(2:46–9) It is characteristic of wise-courtier stories that the hero’s success leads to advancement at court. Such an ending in the Daniel stories serves to show (a) that Jews may legitimately seek high office in foreign courts, (b) Jews can contribute to the welfare of non-Jewish regimes, and (c) Jews will be rewarded by their God for loyalty to him (a theme taken up on a grander scale in ch. 12). The use of the Babylonian names (contrast v. 17) is an editorial device to prepare us for these names in the next chapter.

The Golden Image and the Fiery Furnace (3:1–30)

This is not a story about Daniel. His inexplicable exclusion is probably due to this being originally an independent story adapted for the Daniel cycle. v. 12 may indicate its having been edited for this purpose.

(3:1–18) The golden image resumes the golden-headed statue of ch. 2. The lists of officials in vv. 2–3 echo the lists of interpreters in other stories. The phrase ‘all . . . peoples, nations, and languages’ (vv. 4 and 7) is picked up in subsequent stories (4:1; 5:19; 6:25; 7:14) and emphasizes the Babylonian kingdom as the first of several world empires. The king is depicted here as a foolish and arrogant self-idolater, but the enmity of rivals is also a factor, as in ch. 6. ‘Chaldeans’ originally meant the Babylonians of Nebuchadnezzar’s time, but under the Persians came to mean a class of mantic interpreter. It is generally used in this later sense in Daniel (1:4; 2:2, 4, 5, 10; 4:7; 5:7, 11) but in 5:30 and 9:1 has its earlier meaning. vv. 17–18 are important in raising the uncertainty of being rescued, perhaps hinting that the story arose or was applied to a time of persecution when not every loyal Jew could be sure of escaping suffering and death. (It is perhaps to meet this case that the hope of resurrection is finally raised in ch. 12.)

(3:19–27) v. 22, punishment of persecutors also needs to be included! Cf. 6:24 and Esth 7:9–10. v. 25, the fourth person having the ‘appearance of a god’ suggests one of the heavenly emissaries such as found in the visions (the Greek text here has an angel quenching the flames). Note that it is this fourth person (whom Nebuchadnezzar identifies as an angel), as much as the preservation of the other three, that amazes the king and prompts him to summon the youths out.

(3:28–30) The king’s reaction is told in as exaggerated a manner as the rest of the account. He does not yet convert to the Jewish God (see the end of ch. 4), but makes another royal decree, involving equally violent sanctions—for he remains a typical foreign king!—prohibiting offences against the God of the youths. Their promotion to even higher office is part of the genre (see DAN 2:46–9).

Nebuchadnezzar Learns a Lesson (4:1–37)

Written in the form of a royal decree, this story may well have its origin in the activities of Nabonidus, the last king of Babylon, who withdrew to the desert oasis of Teima, provoking strange rumours about him in Babylon. A text from Qumran called the Prayer of Nabonidus, also written in the first person, tells how the king had a disturbing dream, and how he was ‘afflicted . . . for seven years . . . and an exorcist pardoned my sins. He was a Jew . . .’ When the story was incorporated into the Daniel cycle, and expanded, the lesser-known king was replaced by a better-known one, and the anonymous Jew became Belteshazzar and then Daniel.

The story contains two episodes: the king’s dream with its interpretation (vv. 1–27), and the fulfilment of the interpretation (vv. 28–37).

(4:1–27) The opening doxology starts where the stories usually end, with the king praising the power of the Jewish God (usually given the title Most High, ‘ēlyōn). v. 8, the story presumably originally featured another hero named Belteshazzar, whose name occurs in this chapter 6 times, 4 times on its own without ‘Daniel’; elsewhere, the two names (always together) are to be found once in each of chs. 1, 2, 5, and 10. Belteshazzar has the position of ‘chief of the dream interpreters’ (2:48 uses entirely different terms of Daniel). ‘Spirit of the holy gods’ (vv. 8, 9, 18) is also confined to this story, except for 5:11 (which recapitulates this story). v. 10, the ‘tree at the centre of the earth’ is a well-known and worldwide mythic motif, here perhaps representing the power of the king who rules the world, providing for his subjects (animals, birds). Cf. Ezek 31:3–9, which likens Pharaoh to a cedar of Lebanon, or 17:10, similarly of the Davidic dynasty. v. 11, ‘reaching to heaven’ invokes the tower of Babel and human ambition, the reason for Nebuchadnezzar’s collapse. v. 13, ‘a holy watcher’: both ‘holy’ and ‘watcher’ are terms for heavenly beings in Jewish writings of the Hellenistic period, especially the 'Book of the Watchers', 1 Enoch 1–36. 'Decree of the watchers' reinforces the deterministic outlook of the book of Daniel as a whole: all that happens in human history is the result of heavenly dictates. This is the basis of both mantic lore and apocalyptic writing. vv. 19–27, the interpretation makes it clear that Nebuchadnezzar's kingdom is not to be destroyed (v. 19, and the meaning of the stump, vv. 26–7), but the king needs to learn a lesson; the summons to atone for his pride (v. 27) recalls the Nabonidus text. As with the previous stories, the aim and outcome is the conversion of the king from arrogance to recognition of the complete power of the god 'elyôn. During this interpretation, the image of the tree fades and the focus moves to the animal-like fate of the king.

(4:28–37) The decree comes about at the moment when Nebuchadnezzar, apparently forgetful of the dream, is at his most arrogant. Appropriately he comes to resemble the very opposite of power and splendour, losing his human form and his human reason, his palace, his food. The lesson is learned when the king 'lifts his eyes' (v. 34) and his reason returns; also 'when the period was over' exactly! The coincidence of human free action and divine decree, the core difficulty of any theory of predestination, is glossed over. Does Nebuchadnezzar confess his arrogance because his reason is restored, or vice versa? The repetition in v. 36 'my reason returned' creates the ambiguity. In v. 37 the king appears at last to become a worshipper of the 'king of heaven' (a term found only here in the OT, but cf. the NT expression 'kingdom of heaven').

Desecration Brings Death (5:1–31)

This story's allusions to preceding chapters (borrowing the same phrases), in vv. 10–12 and 17–21 may be editorial passages intended to integrate this story into the cycle. But they go well beyond what is required, and this factor, together with the killing, rather than persuading or converting, of the king and also the clear allusion to temple desecration suggest it may have been composed after the story cycle was in existence (with or without ch. 6), in the time of Antiochus IV who desecrated the temple and whose death is predicted in 11:45.

(5:1–4) For a long time Belshazzar was regarded as one of the fictions of this book. But he is now known from Babylonian texts as the son of Nabonidus the last king of Babylon, who ruled in the city while his father was in Teima (see ch. 4), though he was apparently not ever the king as he is named here. The impious act of the king is cleverly and economically set out. The plunder of the vessels alludes to the opening of Daniel, and the gold and silver vessels are used in the worship of gods of gold and silver but also of bronze, iron, wood, and stone, consciously or not invoking the idolatrous statue of ch. 2. The mention of women touching these holy Jewish vessels only compounds the horror!

(5:5–12) 'Next to the lampstand' suggests the illuminated spectre in a semi-darkened room but also perhaps hints at the temple lampstand, the menorah, symbol of the presence of God in the Holy of Holies. There is a wonderfully comic pun (in Aramaic) in the phrase 'his limbs loosened' (lit.), since the same phrase means 'solving riddles' and is so used in vv. 12 and 16. Thereafter we are given the familiar ingredients: the king summons all the varieties of interpreter and promises political advancement; but they are unable to deliver. The queen (his mother and wife of Nebuchadnezzar, who, as said, was not the father of Belshazzar) is the vehicle for the reintroduction of Daniel, who is presumably no longer among the court favourites. The interpreters (v. 8) are unable even to read the writing, let alone interpret it. Here is an echo of ch. 2; both sign and meaning have to be constructed.

(5:13–30) In vv. 17–23 Daniel rejects the king's offer of reward (but see v. 29!), and before he interprets the writing proceeds to admonish the king by comparing him with Nebuchadnezzar, whose story (ch. 4) he relates. The writing is deciphered as MENE, MENE, TEKEL, and PARSIN. The words are Aramaic but their meanings are ambiguous. All three terms might denote measures of weight. It is interesting to speculate about meanings other than those given; the authors may well be playing (as in vv. 12 and 16) with multiple meanings. Daniel's interpretation is linguistically possible: the verb m-n- can mean 'number'; t-q-l (Heb. 'shekel') 'weigh'; and p-r-s can mean 'divide'. But other allusions may also be present: t-q-l, for instance, might suggest q-l, which means '(s)light' and hence 'wanting'; while parsin also means 'Persians'. The king's reaction seems untypical of a despot: he rewards the bearer of the bad news as promised! We are not told how Belshazzar was killed, whether by human or divine means. 'Darius the Mede', despite ingenious attempts by some scholars to identify him with some other historical character, is a mistake. Darius was the name borne by several kings of Persia. It is not a Median name. There was a Median empire, which Cyrus incorporated in his own Persian realm (we might accurately speak of a Medo-Persian empire). In the four-kingdom scheme of Daniel Media comes between Babylon and Persia, which is chronologically correct. But the Medes never ruled Babylon, and the city passed from Belshazzar directly to Cyrus. This notice is therefore not from the hand of a contemporary, or even a reliable historian. But that hardly matters; the point being made is that the one divine kingdom has been transferred by its owner from one king and nation to another, and all Darius has to do is 'receive' it.

The Den of Lions (6:1–28)

The last of the stories about Daniel introduces a benign king deceived by jealous officials (as in Esther), who is delighted when Daniel is rescued. Hence the political setting of this story is of a benevolent regime, where the only danger to Jews comes from those resentful of their success. The Darius of this story looks more like a Persian monarch (see v. 1—his description as 'the Mede' (5:31) is not mentioned in this chapter). If so, his portrait conforms to that of Persian kings throughout the OT (Isaiah, Nehemiah, Ezra, Esther): neither they nor their gods are attacked, and they are consistently well-disposed towards the Jews.

(6:1–9) According to Herodotus, Darius organized the Persian empire into twenty satrapies (later enlarged by Xerxes; see Esth 1:1). A position such as Daniel's is implausible, since the empire was centrally governed by a small number of families. But Daniel's ever higher office is a uniting thread in the stories. The word for 'law' in v. 5 does not mean the Torah, the book of Moses, but is a general word for 'religion' or 'religious custom'. 'Prays for thirty days': 'pray' here is better translated as 'make a request', whether of gods or humans. Why not a permanent ban? Presumably because Jews were known to pray daily in any case, while a permanent ban on requests to gods or humans besides the king would be impractical. We know nothing about any practice of keeping lions in dens to kill people under any ancient Near-Eastern regime.

(6:10–28) v. 10 describes Daniel as praying three times a day in an upper room, facing Jerusalem. We have little information about Jewish praying customs from the Persian period. The Mishnah prescribes three times a day, and synagogue architecture suggests an orientation of prayer and worship towards Jerusalem. But the point is that Daniel did not make his habit secret; the conspirators knew when and where to find him. vv. 14–15, the portrait of a benign king duped into making an edict which, according to the 'law of the Medes and Persians' is irrevocable, recurs in Esther. The issue presented here, then, is a conflict between two sets of irrevocable laws, one Medo-Persian, the other the law of 'the God of Daniel'. Prominent in Esther, too, is the theme of the 'law of the Medes and Persians' by which the king is trapped into acting. In vv. 16–20, the king's virtue is strongly emphasized: he prays for Daniel's deliverance by his God, spends the night fasting, and hurries back, calling out as if he expects Daniel to be delivered. vv. 22–4 repeat the motifs of the rescuing angel and the punishment of the instigators (see 3:22, 28), with the added ingredient of the wives and children. The final decree (vv. 25–7) is a feature of chs. 2–6; a comparison will show that they successively broaden their acclaim of the Jewish God. This doxology is a fitting climax to the sequence of stories, encapsulating its recurrent theme: eternal kingship, power to deliver. v. 28 extends Daniel's lifetime into the next kingdom (according to the book's historical scheme), that of the Persians. No story, but the final vision (chs. 10–12) is set under Cyrus.

The Vision of the Four Beasts and the Final Judgement (7:1–28)

In this chapter the narrative passes from third person to first, and instead of interpreting signs given to others, Daniel receives the signs and has them interpreted by a heavenly being, in the manner of the book of Zechariah. The first vision takes up the four-kingdoms sequence of Dan 2 and focuses on the final judgement and annihilation of these kings/kingdoms. Again, however, we find signs of an earlier account being revised, particularly with regard to the 'little horn' on the fourth beast, suggesting a more ancient story being updated to fit the time of Antiochus IV. The chapter utilizes many mythical themes, possibly of Judean rather than Babylonian origin.

(7:1–8) v. 1 links the vision to the preceding stories with its smooth transition to first person, and its reuse of the phrases 'visions of your head as you lay in bed' (see 2:28; 4:5, 10, 13). Since the apocalyptic visions of chs. 7–12 are pseudonymous, due care must be taken to explain how Daniel's words were preserved, so 'he wrote down the dream'; see 12:4 also. The four winds . . . the great sea' (v. 2): the sea symbolizes chaos before creation (see Gen 1:2), and the winds may represent (a) the four corners of the earth, from which the kingdoms come, (b) forces stirring up a storm, and/or (c) a divine creative force

(see Gen 1:2). We are perhaps meant to be witnessing the beginning of time and history (as well as, later, their end). The description of the four beasts (vv. 3–8) no doubt also draws on mythological resources. The myth of dragon(s) in the sea is alluded to in Isa 27:1, 51:9–11, and is pre-Israelite in origin. Hos 13:7–8, mentioning a lion, a leopard, a bear, and a 'wild beast', has been noticed by Collins (1993: 295). Hellenistic astrology is another suggestion (Caquot 1955).

(7:9–14) 'Ancient One' (lit. ancient of days) is a title used of the 'father of the gods' El in the Ugaritic texts. His description fits closely with that of the deity in Ezekiel's vision (Ezek 1), and was possibly drawn from older mythology (see Emerton (1958), and for the mythological motifs in general, Day (1985: 151–78)). The heavenly king sits enthroned in the court surrounded by the other gods and by attendant heavenly servants. The 'books' are those in which sins (and good deeds) are recorded (see 12:1). The last and most vicious beast is condemned to immediate death, while the others have a stay of execution. The implication of this judgement is unclear. 'One like a human being' receives the kingdom from the 'Ancient One'. Is this second figure a symbol of the nation that will exercise the dominion (the Jewish people), depicted as a human rather than an animal? Or is he a divine figure (such figures represented as in human form, Dan 8:15; 10:5)? If so, is he Michael, who 'stands' for the Jews in 12:1? The title (lit. son of man) was adopted in the NT as a title for Jesus Christ, though how far it derives from Daniel alone is disputed. Since we are dealing with a book that has a long literary history, both interpretations may be valid; and in any event the ambiguities of this book are not always best served by insisting on one exclusive meaning. Surrealism is no respecter of logic.

(7:15–28) In the visions it is Daniel's turn to be perplexed and dismayed and to seek the interpretation. The beasts are said to be kings and not kingdoms—whereas the 'little horn' on the fourth beast is clearly one king and the beast a kingdom! Is this a sign of an earlier story about kings (as suggested for ch. 2)? Another question is whether the 'holy ones of the Most High' who 'receive the kingdom' are human or heavenly. 'Holy one' is often applied in biblical and post-biblical writings to angelic beings. Is the envisaged final kingdom earthly or heavenly? Chs. 10–12 portray each nation as having its own angelic 'prince', suggesting that kingdoms have both heavenly and earthly aspects. What would a kingdom of all the angels mean in this context? But Daniel is not consistent throughout and plays with different conceptions of the government of the earth and also of the final state of affairs. The focus quickly moves to the fourth beast (v. 19). Several discrepancies with the vision report also appear. The beast has now acquired bronze claws, and the 'little horn' wages war with the 'holy ones' (v. 21). In v. 26 it is the little horn that is judged, not the fourth beast. We have details of this king's career intended, no doubt, to identify him as Antiochus IV. There are many candidates for the 'three kings' of v. 24 depending on whether succession or conquest is meant; the 'changing of sacred seasons and the law' presumably refers to Antiochus' imposed reforms of the Jerusalem cult, and the 'time, two times and half a time' (the first of a series of oblique reckonings in the book) predicates three and a half years for his domination of the 'holy ones'.

The Vision of the Ram and Goat (8:1–27)

(8:1–14) Curiously, although dated to the reign of Belshazzar, ruler of Babylon, the vision is set in the capital of the subsequent Persian empire (see Esth 1:2, 5; 2:3, 5), and describes conflict between two beasts, one with two horns from the east (?) charging north, west, and south, the other from the west. The goat overcomes the ram (vv. 5–7), and, following ch. 7, horns representing kings sprout from its head, with one little horn distinguished for its aggression, especially towards the ‘beautiful land’, i.e. Judah (vv. 8–9). It defies the ‘host’ (the heavenly beings). In particular this horn confronts the ‘prince of the host’, removes his daily sacrifice and overthrows his sanctuary: a clear reference to the Jerusalem cult, of which the twice-daily offering (the tāmīd) was the regular basis—and which figures prominently in the remainder of the book. Also prominent will be the question of the duration of the desecration, here defined in an angelic conversation (vv. 13–14). The calculation is expressed in tāmīd sacrifices (which were offered morning and evening): 2,300 means 1,150 days, or three years and about three months (not quite the three and a half years of 7:25, and different from subsequent calculations in ch. 12).

(8:15–27) The interpreting angel is now named as Gabriel, depicted in human form (g-b-r in Hebrew can mean ‘man’, though the whole name means ‘God is my strength’). As in Zech 2:8 he is instructed to speak by a second voice. The two animals are interpreted as the kingdoms of (Media-)Persia and Greece, who warred from the sixth to the fourth centuries, until Alexander the Great (d. 323; the goat’s one horn) conquered the whole Persian empire. He had four successors, reducing to three and finally two kingdoms, Egypt (Ptolemies) and Syria (Seleucids). The ‘prince of the host’ of v. 11, interpreted as the ‘prince of princes’ is probably Michael, not the High God himself (see 10:21–11:1; 12:1); see also v. 25 ‘prince of princes’. Two meanings of ‘people of the holy ones’ are possible: (a) the nation belonging to the angels (angels = ‘holy ones’) or, more probably, since all the nations have their angels, (b) nation of holy people. But in attacking the Jews he rises up against their patron Michael and will be destroyed by heavenly force (v. 25). The vision is referred to (v. 26) as ‘the vision of the evenings and mornings’, alluding to the twice-daily tāmīd sacrifice, and Daniel is told to ‘seal up’ the vision, i.e. to roll up the scroll on which it is written and fasten it, to be opened only at the time to which it refers (see 12:9).

The Mystery of Jeremiah’s Prophecy (9:1–27)

(9:1–3) In 5:31 ‘Darius the Mede’ takes the kingdom from Belshazzar; here he is said merely to be Median ‘by descent’ and succeeds Xerxes (Ahasuerus), the name borne by several Persian kings (as was Darius). Nevertheless, since ch. 10 dates from Cyrus, the first Persian king, the book is still dealing with a Median empire between the Babylonian and the Persian. The mystery to be solved here lies not in a vision but in a scroll of Jeremiah’s prophecies which Daniel is studying and which contains a prediction that Jerusalem’s devastation will last seven years (see Jer 25:11–12; 29:10). Daniel seeks an answer by praying, using symbols of penitence.

(9:4–20) The prayer is thought by many scholars to be a later insertion because its theological attitude is unique in Daniel, and deals with confession of sin rather than a request for illumination. Here distress appears to be due not to a pre-ordained plan but to Israel’s sin, and divine intervention will occur not when the timetable prescribes but once Israel has repented. The importance of the dating (v. 1) is that Darius comes to the throne after seventy years have passed from Jerusalem’s destruction. The prayer, in better biblical Hebrew than found in the rest of Daniel, is similar in content and structure to the prayer contained in 1 Kings 8:15–53, Ezra 9:6–15, Neh 9:6–37, and in other early non-biblical Jewish texts as well as in the present Jewish Day of Atonement liturgy. Apart from 1:3 ‘Israel’ occurs in Daniel only in this prayer. However, vv. 3, 21, and 23 make it clear that a prayer (whether or not actually recorded) belonged to the story. Whether originally incorporated or inserted later, it was probably composed independently. The prayer expresses a typical Deuteronomic theology: Israel has ignored the warnings of prophets, abandoned the covenant, and been exiled accordingly. The curses of Deut 27 are referred to in v. 11. The reference to the Exodus (v. 15) is also a Deuteronomic theme, as is the notion of the divine ‘name’ being present (v. 18).

(9:21–3) Again, ‘the man’ Gabriel is the messenger and as in ch. 8 comes at the time of the second twice-daily temple sacrifice. The explanation involves interpreting a week of seven days as a ‘week’ of seven years. The total period is thus 490 years. This formula is implicit in the notion (Deut 15, Lev 25) of a ‘sabbath year’ in every seven. Calculations of epochs in history according to sabbath-years are found in other contemporary Jewish literature such as Jubilees (a jubilee is seven such cycles, forty-nine or fifty years).

(9:24–7) marks the seventy years with crucial events: a problem is that the calculation that follows begins only with the decree of Cyrus (by which time Jerusalem had been desolate for about fifty years. Even then the total number of weeks is seventy and a half (493½ years)! The end of seven weeks (forty-nine years) pass before a high priest (‘anointed prince’) is installed (since there were no kings, only high priests were anointed). After 434 more years a high priest is killed (this would seem to refer to the murder of Onias III, recorded in 2 Macc 4:23–8), and the sanctuary destroyed. For seven years the destroyer, who is to be identified with Antiochus IV (Epiphanes) makes a pact with ‘many’ and for three and a half years the temple is desolated. The ‘abomination that desolates’ is the altar to Zeus that Antiochus has erected in place of the altar. 9:27, the end itself is not described, but it represents the end of Jerusalem’s desolation, and of the sin that brought it, the beginning of eternal goodness, the fulfilment of prophecy, and the reconsecration of the temple: this is equivalent to the end of the historical sequence foreseen in chs. 2 and 7, but focused on temple, holiness, and Jerusalem, not on world empires.

The History of the World as a Heavenly Conflict (10:1–12:13)

This final section is in poor Hebrew, and may represent a rather poor translation from an Aramaic original. Several difficulties in interpretation may be due to translational errors. The section, covering three chapters, barely sustains the vision-interpretation scheme, and runs more like a lightly disguised narrative of historical events, which the modern historian (and ancient reader, no doubt) can identify. But it also offers an interpretation of history as a 'great conflict' (10:1) that combines the idea of a preordained sequence and a struggle between nations: heavenly beings representing each nation fight for the supremacy of their people. The idea of each nation having its own divine patron is found in Deut 32:8–9 (following, with most scholars, the reading of the LXX 'sons of God' rather than 'sons of Israel'), and the idea that heavenly politics determine events on earth is also found in several Jewish writings of the Graeco-Roman period. For example, according to 1 Enoch 1–6 and Jubilees 5:1–11, sin came into the world as a result of rebellion in heaven and the descent (voluntary or enforced) of some angels to the earth (see also Gen 6:1–4). That human fate is determined by heavenly events is in any case generally a common notion in the ancient world, though in monotheistic Judaism it acquired particular features, such as the emergence of an arch-rebel or opponent, variously called Satan, Mastema, and Belial. But in Daniel this figure makes no appearance; his role is taken by the rebellious human king. However, the effective agent on Israel's behalf is now no longer God but its own angel, Michael.

(10:1–9) vv. 1–4 date the final vision from the first Persian king, Cyrus (see 1:21 and 6:28) after a three-week fast. The bank of the river as the site of revelation may depend on Ezek 1:1. The description of the heavenly messenger (vv. 5–9) is influenced by various texts in Ezekiel (especially chs. 1 and 9); Acts 9:7 may in turn be influenced by the account of Daniel's reaction here.

(10:10–11:1) vv. 10–12 point out that understanding of mysteries is given only to those who desire it and prepare for it, whether by praying or fasting. It is not bestowed without merit. Even though wisdom according to Daniel does not mean acquisition of knowledge by study or instruction (as in Proverbs) but by revelation of heavenly secrets, it none the less demands a religious discipline (as already shown in ch. 9). The first hint of heavenly warfare comes in v. 13: the angel (Gabriel, according to 11:1) was prevented from coming (for the same time Daniel was fasting!) by the Persian 'prince' (angel), now fighting against Israel's patron Michael (who appears only here in the OT). Thus, while in chs. 1–6 the one divine kingdom is that which passes from nation to nation, here sovereignty is continually contested, now between Jews and Persians and soon between Jews and Greeks (v. 20). vv. 15–20 perhaps relate a commissioning of Daniel in a quasi-prophetic role (cf. Isa 6:7 for the touching of lips). Daniel is to assume a prophetic role as writer of a book of predictions (12:4). 'Do not fear' and 'be strong' are frequently reassurances in time of war (e.g. Deut 31:6, Josh 10:25); war, as Daniel learns, is now the perpetual state of things until the end. v. 21 introduces the 'book of truth' in which all preordained history is inscribed (see 12:1).

(11:2–4) mentions three more Persian kings after Cyrus: although historically there were many more, the OT mentions only four in all. The last, who campaigns against Greece, may be Xerxes.

(11:3–9) clearly refers to Alexander the Great, who died in 323 and from whose empire evolved (v. 4) the two kingdoms of the Seleucids (Syria) and Ptolemies (Egypt), whose kings Daniel refers to as respectively the 'king of the north' and 'king of the south'. Judah was first ruled by Ptolemies, though the Seleucid kingdom was larger (v. 5); in about 250 BCE an alliance by marriage of the two kingdoms was made (v. 6) but later Ptolemy III (called Euergetes) made huge inroads into the Seleucid territory (vv. 7–8). Seleucus II recovered the territory (v. 9).

(11:10–13) describes the efforts of Seleucus II and Antiochus II ('the Great') to conquer the Ptolemaic kingdom. In 200 BCE Antiochus defeated the Ptolemies and took Samaria and Judah.

(11:14–19) In the struggle over control of Judah, Judeans were divided in their allegiance. Who the 'violent' or 'lawless' of v. 14 are is unclear, and what they tried to do ('fulfil the vision'); but the writers of Daniel (who may have been pro-Ptolemaic) presumably opposed them. vv. 16–17 allude to Antiochus' arrival in Jerusalem as its ruler and another marriage alliance with Egypt. Antiochus' ambitions were frustrated by the Romans who forced him to leave Asia Minor (the 'coastlands', v. 19).

(11:21–9) Antiochus IV is the 'contemptible person' of v. 21, who tries to restore the kingdom reduced by the Romans. The 'ruler/prince of the covenant' (v. 22) is probably the high priest Onias III, murdered by a pro-Seleucid rival (see 9:26). His campaign against Egypt is referred to in v. 25, and the abortive peace negotiations in vv. 26–7. Peace will not come because the allotted time for the denouement of history has not come (v. 27). At the centre of this denouement is the 'holy covenant' (v. 28). But the final events are taking place as and when decreed: 'at the time appointed' (v. 29).

(11:30–5) records Antiochus' measures against Judah. After being driven from Egypt by the Romans (Kittim, v. 30), he stopped the twice-daily burnt-offering sacrifice, dismantled the altar and replaced it with one to Zeus (the 'abominating desolation', as in 9:27), and forbade practice of traditional Jewish religion, making alliances with like-minded Jews (whom the writer calls 'violators of the covenant', v. 32). However, those who remained loyal, led by 'the wise' (who must include the writers of Daniel), would resist, suffering punishment and death (vv. 32–4). The 'little help' they received (v. 34) may have been the violent (and ultimately successful) resistance led by the Maccabees. But the writers are not interested in such military actions. The end would come about by divine intervention, and meanwhile the 'wise' suffered so as to be 'purified' (v. 35). The goal of history, earlier in the book identified with the supremacy of the nation (ch. 2) is now focused on the destiny of righteous individuals.

(11:36–45) merely summarizes the preceding account. The account of the end of Antiochus' career (vv. 40–5) does not correspond to the actual course of events. 'At the time of the end' (v. 40) appears to denote what for the authors still lies immediately ahead. It envisages an attack from the 'king of the south' (Egypt), with huge retaliation. The 'king of the north' will enter the 'beautiful land' (Judah, v. 41), and though Judah's traditional enemies will be spared, he will extend his power into and beyond Egypt (vv. 42–3), but reports of trouble from the north and east will force him angrily to retrace his steps. Pitching his war-tent in Judah, between the Mediterranean and Jerusalem (v. 45) he will meet his end. In fact Antiochus died campaigning in Persia and did not conquer Egypt. On the basis of this passage scholars assign the composition of Daniel to between 167, when the 'desolating abomination' was set up, and 163, when Antiochus' death must have been known in Jerusalem. (But for evidence that the book was updated during this period, see DAN 12:5–13.)

(12:1) The death of the great and final oppressor and the end of the last kingdom is no longer of interest. Rather, the final resolution now concerns the respective fates of righteous and wicked and the calculation of the time when the end will come. On the death of Antiochus, the patron angel Michael will 'stand' or 'arise', which may mean not more than 'appear' or 'act'. Reference to a 'time of distress' following this is curious, but may refer to prophecies of such a time in Isa 33:2; Jer 14:8; 15:11; 30:7, all of which associate the phrase with a decisive divine rescue, and intend to identify Michael's rise with that promised divine intervention rather than predict fresh misery. But the deliverance will only be for some, not all: 'everyone found written in the book', presumably in a heavenly record of the names of the righteous. The possibility that these names were written beforehand, the righteous being predestined, cannot be ruled out, given Daniel's strong attraction to predetermination.

(12:2–4) Resurrection is explicitly affirmed only here in the OT, though belief subsequently spread, until it finally became orthodox Jewish doctrine. But who is to be revived? 'Many' appears to mean only 'some', but it includes righteous and wicked. The scenario makes best sense if we see the problem being addressed as one of justice. There are those who have suffered undeservedly and those who have sinned without punishment. Both groups must be revived so that justice can be administered. But those outside these two categories will remain dead. The 'land of dust' (as the Heb. has it) may be a poetic expression for the grave (Gen 3:19 has both words) or mean Sheol, the place where the dead exist as shadowy spirits (see Ps 16:10; 55:15; 86:13). Among those to live forever the 'wise' have a special place, for they are the religious leaders. The language of 'wise' (Heb. maskil) and 'making many righteous' is derived from the description of the Servant in Isa 52–3. Wisdom and righteousness are virtually equated (Daniel being the paragon of each). 'Like the stars' is probably a metaphor rather than indicating an angelic status, since it is parallel to 'shine like the brightness of the sky'—though the idea of the righteous dead being like angels is found in 12:25 (Mt 22:30; Lk 20:35). The notion of a hidden book, revealed just before the end time, is a common feature of apocalyptic and apocryphal literature in which books attributed to authors of antiquity appear only recently to have been publicized. Hence the author is commanded to hide the book until its contents need to be known, and thus is Daniel commanded in v. 4 (and v. 9). In the meantime, evil will increase, and few will understand what is happening; if 'run to and fro' is taken from Am 8:12, it probably refers to a lack of divine guidance.

(12:5–13) The other theme of ch. 12, 'how long?', occupies most of vv. 5–13. Ch. 9 suggested three and a half years from the 'desolating abomination'. In vv. 5–13 Daniel witnesses, then joins, a conversation about the calculation of the remaining time. At first he overhears it (as if it were a secret not to be directly told to humans, even to him). Although only one of the persons he sees is explicitly said to be 'clothed in linen' (angelic dress, see 10:5) both are presumably heavenly beings. For the 'bank of the stream' see DAN 10:4. The formula 'a time, two times, and half a time', repeats 7:25 and corresponds to the last half-week (three and a half years) of ch. 9. True to the character of the book, Daniel does not understand this (fairly transparent!) calculation and so yet another interpretation is asked for. The rather puzzling question (we would expect him to ask for the 'explanation' rather than the 'outcome') is one possible instance of a defective translation from an original Aramaic text into Hebrew. In fact we get a repeat, though not just of the conversation in vv. 6–7. First come the contents of v. 4, reiterating the sealing of the book (v. 9), then a repetition of the 'refining' of 11:35, then a resumption of 12:4 where the 'running back and forth' and increase of evil is changed so that now the wise do understand, but not the wicked, while the wicked continue to act wickedly. Finally comes a more detailed calculation of the time of the end, in terms of days, and dating from the day on which the tāmīd sacrifice was abolished and the 'abominating desolation' set up. But there are two different answers in vv. 11 and 12, and both differ from the 1,150 days of 8:14 and at least one differs from the three and a half years of 9:27 (and 12:7). An obvious explanation is that someone, after 1,290 days had elapsed, recalculated, while still hoping (or insisting) that the time was near. The sense of a disappointment is perhaps conveyed by the phrasing of v. 12: 'Happy is the one who waits' (cf. Ps 111).

(12:13) The exilic past with its author Daniel, and the future are finally sewn together in v. 13 as Daniel himself is told to go and die, awaiting his reward as he rises along with his successors, the 'wise' of the present (i.e. end) time. For Daniel, of course, serves throughout this book as the archetype of the authors, the maskilīm, of the time of distress under Antiochus, who saw their duty, as had Daniel, in withstanding persecution and 'making many righteous'.

The book of Daniel is generally thought to have bequeathed to its obviously literate and knowledgeable second-century BCE readers, whether or not they were supposed to accept its ancient origin and recent 'discovery', an affirmation that an end had been set and that suffering was not in vain. Yet the lack of specific information about the manner and time of the end, the disappearance of the orderly regime of chs. 1–6, and with it the High God who made and sustained order, and the retreat from historical triumph into trans-historical vindication all seem to betray an anxiety that suggests hope, rather than conviction, in an imminent happy ending. Paradoxically, in a book compiled in the middle of a confrontation between Hellenistic and traditional models of Judaism, the notion of a personal ethical responsibility, an interest in the meaning (or lack of it) of history, and a hope for personal survival beyond death mark it as anything but a reactionary and conservative book; its authors were learned and innovative, and very much a product of the age of cultural change which Hellenism brought to Judah as well as to the rest of the ancient world.

JOHN DAY

INTRODUCTION

A. Historical Background. 1. Hosea prophesied in the second half of the eighth century BCE from the reign of Jeroboam II of Israel (c.787–747) to that of Hoshea (c.731–722), the last king of Israel. Although ch. 1 and perhaps ch. 4 reflect the long, peaceful reign of Jeroboam II, much of the book dates from the period of coups d'état which afflicted the northern kingdom in its last decades following his death. Cf. 7:7, 'All of them are hot as an oven, and they devour their rulers'.

2. Jeroboam II was succeeded by his son Zechariah, who was murdered after only six months' rule (c.747–746) and this ended the dynasty of Jehu, which had ruled for almost a century. His slayer Shallum was himself struck down after only one month (c.746) and was succeeded by Menahem (c.746–737), who paid tribute to the newly aggressive Assyrian ruler Tiglath-pileser III (745–727). His son Pekahiah ruled c.737–736, but was assassinated by his captain Pekah, who reigned c.736–731. This event is probably reflected in 6:7–9, with its reference to bloodshed in Gilead, since Gilead is where the rebellion started.

3. Pekah made an alliance with Rezin, king of Syria (the Syro-Ephraimite alliance) in order to besiege Jerusalem under King Ahaz with the intention of putting on the throne one willing to join an anti-Assyrian alliance. Ahaz (rejecting Isaiah's advice, cf. Isa 7) appealed to Tiglath-pileser III, who intervened, annexing Galilee, Gilead, and much of the coastal plain from Israel and exiling part of the population in c.733, as well as destroying Damascus in 732. The internecine strife between Judah and Israel then is reflected in 5:8–15.

4. Next Hoshea (c.731–722) assassinated Pekah, and pursued a pro-Assyrian policy for a few years, paying tribute to the Assyrian king, Shalmaneser V (727–722), but later paid tribute to 'So king of Egypt' instead (2 Kings 17:4). Consequently, the Assyrians invaded Israel, imprisoned Hoshea (possibly alluded to in 13:10), and besieged Samaria for three years, capturing it in 722. Thus ended the northern kingdom of Israel; 27,290 prisoners were exiled by Shalmaneser V's successor, Sargon II, in 720. These last years of the northern kingdom are echoed in Hosea's references to the changing shift of alliances between pro-Assyrian and pro-Egyptian policies, e.g. 7:11, 'Ephraim has become like a dove, silly and without sense, they call upon Egypt, they go to Assyria'.

5. The northern kingdom's end was predicted by Hosea, who saw this as YHWH's judgement on Israel's sin. Hosea has often been compared with Amos, who a little earlier (c.760–750) likewise prophesied judgement on Israel. Whereas Amos had little hope for the future (Amos 9:11–15 is a later addition) and concentrated his invective on social injustice, corruption, and hypocritical religiosity, Hosea hoped for restoration after judgement and concentrated his anger on the religious syncretism of the Baalized YHWH cult and the political follies of coups d'état and foreign alliances. Whilst the differing historical circumstances of the two prophets partly explain these differences, some of them are attributable to their differing temperaments.

B. Hosea's Marriage and its Meaning. 1. One important question the book of Hosea raises is the problem of the prophet's marriage: how do chs. 1 and 3 relate to one another? Ch. 1 is a third-person narrative in which God commands Hosea to take a wife of whoredom and have children of whoredom. He subsequently marries Gomer, who bears three children, their sign-names symbolizing judgement for Israel. Ch. 3 is a first-person narrative in which Hosea is told to 'love a woman who is beloved of a paramour and is an adulteress, just as the Lord loves the people of Israel, though they turn to other gods and love cakes of raisins' (RSV). The woman is unnamed. We then read that the prophet bought her and put her under discipline for a while (prior to the full restoration of the relationship).

2. An explanation common among the Church Fathers and medieval Jewish rabbis, but no longer followed, was that Hosea's marriage was not a literal event, but purely symbolic, either an allegory or a dream. However, it does not read like an allegory or a dream, and some details, such as the name Gomer, have no obvious symbolic significance.

3. One minority view maintains that chs. 1 and 3 are parallel narratives, one concentrating on the children, the other on the wife. But against this (1) 3:1 seems to represent this chapter as the sequel to ch. 1. Whether we read 'The LORD said to me again, "Go, love a woman . . ."' (NRSV) or 'The LORD said to me, "Go again, love a woman . . ."' (RSV), we seem to have a reference back to ch. 1, suggesting that ch. 3 follows on from it. (2) The analogy between YHWH's love for Israel, though the people have been faithless to him, and Hosea's love for the woman in 3:1, makes sense only if the woman had previously been his wife and subsequently been unfaithful to him. This implies that 3:1 is not describing the beginning of the marriage, which the view that it is parallel to ch. 1 requires. (3) In 3:3–4 the woman undergoes a period of discipline before the marriage is (re)consummated, which does not fit ch. 1 (cf. 1:2–3, which reads as if sexual relations were established immediately).

4. Another minority view holds that Hos 3 describes Hosea's relations with a woman other than Gomer (Rudolph 1966; Davies 1992). This seems unlikely, again in view of 3:1. Hosea's loving the woman is parallel to YHWH's loving Israel, though they turn to other gods. Therefore, for the symbolism to work, the woman must have been Hosea's wife and previously unfaithful to him.

5. The most commonly accepted and natural view is that ch. 3 is the sequel to ch. 1 (Rowley 1963; Mays 1969; Wolff 1974; Macintosh 1997). Hosea, we are to understand, married Gomer and had one or more children by her. At some stage she committed adultery, but eventually Hosea succeeded in wooing her back, though the marriage was not reconsummated until after a period of discipline. The theological significance of these events for Israel is spelled out in ch. 2, which depicts Israel as YHWH's wife, who goes whoring after her lovers (the Baals), bearing children of whoredom, but eventually YHWH succeeds in wooing her back, whilst imposing a disciplinary period before the relationship is fully restored.

6. Hosea has been much studied recently by feminist scholars (see Brenner 1995). The prophet's references to 'whoring' have been much criticized, but his use of this image is not anti-women, since it is applied to the nation as a whole (e.g. Hos 5:3, 6:10), and presumably had particular reference to the male political and religious leaders.

C. The Book and its Redaction. 1. Probably most of the book of Hosea goes back to the prophet himself, his words having been first gathered together either by himself or his disciples. The book is in the form of poetic oracles apart from the two narratives about Hosea's marriage in 1:2–9 and 3:1–5, and the introductory and concluding verses 1:1 and 14:9. The third-person narrative in ch. 1 clearly betrays the hand of an editor. The book falls into two broad sections, chs. 1–3 relating to the prophet's marriage and what it symbolized for Israel, and chs. 4–14, which contain oracles of judgement (and later salvation) for Israel. Chs. 4–14 may have some broad chronological basis for their ordering.

2. After the fall of Samaria Hosea's words were preserved and edited in Judah. A first stage of redaction was added, probably sometime after 700 BCE, indicating that unlike Israel, Judah was still faithful and would be preserved (1:7; 11:12b). Then, either after or just before the fall of Judah in 586, a few glosses were added proclaiming that Judah too would fall because of its sins. Hosea's original words of judgement were thus given a new lease of life by being applied specifically to the southern kingdom (4:15a; 5:5b; 6:11a; 10:11b; 12:2a). Other glosses envisage a future united kingdom of Judah and Israel under a Davidic monarchy, clearly betraying a Judean outlook (Hos 3:5; cf. 1:10–2:1, esp. 1:11), and were presumably added in the sixth century or later. Other additions are the superscription (1:1), believed to derive from Deuteronomistic circles; 11:10c, predicting the return of the western exiles, an idea surprising in the eighth century; and the Wisdom-type saying concluding the book in 14:9. It has occasionally been supposed that passages expressing future hope for northern Israel after judgement in Hosea are also later editorial additions, and not authentic to the prophet himself. However, the passages do not stand out awkwardly like the happy ending in Amos or the pro- and anti-Judean glosses in Hosea itself. (For some different ideas on the redaction of Hosea see Emmerson 1984.)

3. The Hebrew text of Hosea has often been thought one of the most corrupt in the OT. Nowadays, the amount of emendation thought necessary is less than was often believed in the past. However, we should not go to the other extreme, like Macintosh (1997), who avoids emendation at all costs.

COMMENTARY

(1:1) Superscription This is a typical editorial addition to the beginning of a prophetic book. The divine origin of Hosea's message is affirmed, and Hosea's ministry is dated to the reigns of Judean and Israelite kings. The Judean kings are listed first, even though Hosea was a northerner, suggesting Judean redaction. Strangely, Jeroboam (II) is the only northern king listed; Hosea prophesied many years after his death down to the 720s. But Jeroboam's successors had short reigns and to have listed them all would have required adding another six names.

(1:2–9) The Children of Hosea's Marriage with Gomer Here Hosea marries Gomer and three children are born bearing sign-names of judgement for Israel. Gomer is described (v. 2) as a wife of whoredom bearing children of whoredom. v. 2, probably the description of Gomer as 'a wife of whoredom' is proleptic and describes her future behaviour. Cf. 2:4, where the term is applied to Israel following her abandonment of YHWH. Another view is that Hosea married a common or cult prostitute. In 1:3 Hosea's wife is called Gomer, the daughter of Diblaim. Neither name has any apparent symbolic significance, which supports their historicity and argues against a merely allegorical or visionary understanding of the events. The first child, Jezreel, is the only one explicitly stated to be Hosea's (cf. vv. 6, 8), which may or may not be significant. Jezreel, the first son (v. 4), is named after the city of Jezreel, the scene of Jehu's bloody massacres, c.842, that ended Omri's dynasty (2 Kings 9:1–37; 10:1–11). Jehu's actions were supported by the prophet Elisha and his followers, but Hosea condemns this sanctified murder. Jezreel (modern Zer'in) has been excavated.

Lo-ruhamah, the name of the daughter, means 'not pitied' (v. 6). v. 7 is a pro-Judean gloss. Its reference to God's saving Judah without military force may well reflect Jerusalem's deliverance from the Assyrians in 701 (cf. 2 Kings 19:35–7). Lo-ammi, the name of the second son, means 'not my people' (v. 9).

(1:10–2:1 (MT 2:1–3)) Oracle of Salvation: The Reversal of Judgement These verses primarily reverse the negative meanings of the names of Hosea's children and apply them to the nation. They resemble the hopeful message of 2:21–3, though, unlike the latter, are generally considered redactional. The promise in 1:10 of numerous progeny echoes the promises to the patriarchs (Gen 22:17; 32:12). The name of Hosea's son, Lo-ammi, 'not my people', is now reversed and the people are to be 'children of the living God'; cf. 2:23. v. 11 predicts 'one head' for Judah and Israel. Cf. 3:5, where another Judean redactional addition anticipates a future united Davidic monarchy, which could be in mind here. Although it is sometimes supposed that v. 11 reflects Hosea's own ideas, it is more probably redactional, since Judah is mentioned first and the idea is absent in Hosea's salvation oracles in chs. 11 and 14. 'For great shall be the day of Jezreel' reflects Hosea's reversal of the negative implications of the name for the nation—cf. 2:22–3. In 2:1 the names Lo-ammi, 'not my people', and Lo-ruhamah, 'not pitied', are reversed to Ammi, 'my people', and Ruhamah, 'pitied', and applied to the people as a whole; cf. 2:23. The people addressed, following LXX, are 'your brothers' and 'your sisters', i.e. the nation, not 'your brother' and 'your sister' (NRSV, etc.), which might suggest simply Hosea's children.

(2:2–15 (MT 4–17)) Indictment of Israel, the Unfaithful Wife YHWH's relationship to Israel is here depicted as one of husband and wife. Israel has been unfaithful to YHWH and gone whoring after her lovers, the Baals, from whom she expects to receive grain, wine, oil, and other products, not realizing these come from YHWH (vv. 5, 8). Consequently, YHWH will strip her naked (vv. 3, 9–10), block the way to her lovers so she cannot find them (vv. 6–7), withdraw the grain, wine, etc. (v. 9), and put an end to her religious festivities (vv. 11, 13). She will then seek to return to him and YHWH will allure her in the wilderness, cause her to respond to him there, as at the Exodus, and bring her into Canaan anew (vv. 14–15). Some think the more hopeful note in vv. 14–15 implies that it belongs rather with vv. 16–23, but against this stand the third-person form of address found also in v. 2–13 and the 'Therefore' in v. 14 (cf. vv. 6, 9). Furthermore, hope is already anticipated in v. 7. The words of v. 2, 'for she is not my wife, and I am not her husband', are not a divorce formula, contrary to the view of some. There would be no point in divorce, since the point of the proceedings was to regain the wife (v. 2b, 'that she put away her whoring from her face').

Stripping a wife naked (v. 3) was a punishment the wronged husband could inflict, mentioned also in vv. 9–10. The phrase 'children of whoredom' (v. 4) occurs at 1:2, of Gomer's children, but now it refers to the Israelites. Some scholars place vv. 6–7 between vv. 13 and 14, but though this position might seem more logical, it is unjustified; Hosea's thought sometimes flits around.

Grain, wine, and oil (v. 8) were the chief agricultural products of Israel but the people did not realize they came from YHWH, attributing them rather to Baal who was the great Canaanite storm and fertility god, believed to be dead during the hot, dry summer season and risen from the dead in the wet, winter season. The words 'that they used for Baal' are probably a gloss, because we have 'Baal', not 'Baals' here, and the third-person plural verb is foreign to the context. The Baals (v. 13) were local manifestations of the god Baal, also mentioned in 2:17, 11:2. This is the first time Hosea alludes to Israel's 'lovers' as the Baals. v. 15, the Valley of Achor (lit. trouble) was associated with the stoning of Achan (Josh 7:24–6). Its precise location is uncertain, but it was near Jericho, at the entrance into Canaan, and is perhaps at Wadi Qilt.

(2:16–23 (MT 18–25)) YHWH's Remarriage with Israel and the Restoration of Well-being Here, the imagery of YHWH and Israel as husband and wife continues, but the dominant note is hope. YHWH will renew his marriage bond with Israel and everything will be well. There are three units here, each containing the words 'on that day'. The first predicts that Israel will no longer call YHWH 'my Baal', but 'my husband', and the names of the Baals will be mentioned no more (vv. 16–17). The second speaks of YHWH as the mediator of a covenant with the animals and the abolition of war from the land, when YHWH will take Israel as his wife forever (vv. 18–20). Finally, the implications of the names of Gomer's three children are reversed, thus signifying the restoration of fertility to the land, YHWH's pity, and Israel as YHWH's people (vv. 21–3).

In v. 16 the future Israel will call YHWH 'my husband' ('îšî), not 'my Baal' (ba'ālî). This indicates that in Hosea's time YHWH could be called 'Baal' and was in danger of being confused with him. Cf. the personal name Bealiah, 'Baal is YHWH' (1 Chr 12:5). In v. 18 YHWH is the mediator of a new covenant with the animal world. This could imply either the banishment of wild animals from the land (Ezek 34:25–8; Lev 26:6), or the paradisaical transformation of wild animals (Isa 11:6–9). 'Take as wife for ever...', v. 19: the verb refers to the legally binding agreement that preceded the wedding. In vv. 22–3 the significance of the names of Hosea's three children is reversed, so as to symbolize hope for Israel (cf. 1:10–2:1). Jezreel ('God sows') will betoken fertility for the land. YHWH will have pity on Lo-ruhamah ('not pitied'), and will say to Lo-ammi ('not my people'), 'You are my people'.

(3:1–5) Hosea and his Wife This chapter is a first-person narrative (unlike the third-person ch. 1) in which Hosea is told to love an adulterous woman, just as the Lord loves Israel, though they turn to other gods. As noted (Hos 3:3, 4), the parallelism here only makes sense if the woman had previously been married to Hosea and gone astray from him, i.e. she was Gomer. That she is unnamed, unlike in ch. 1, is not significant, since the first-person ch. 3 comes from a different hand from the third-person ch. 1. Hosea bought the woman and put her under discipline for a while, symbolizing Israel's lack of cultic paraphernalia (cf. God's luring Israel, bringing her into the wilderness in 2:14).

v. 1 can be translated either 'The Lord said to me again, "Go love a woman..."' (NRSV) or 'The Lord said to me, "Go again, love a woman..."' (RSV). Either way there is a clear reference back to ch. 1. 'Other gods' corresponds to 'Baals' in 2:13, 17; 11:2, whilst the raisin cakes that Hosea condemns must have been associated with Baal worship. In 2 Sam 6:19 they are eaten in a Yahwistic cultic context. The reference in v. 2 to Hosea buying the woman probably alludes to the bride-price. A homer equalled 10 ephahs (between 15 and 40 litres). NRSV, REB, NEB 'a measure of wine' is based on LXX; MT has 'a lethech of barley' (RSV etc.). A lethech was half a homer. v. 4 describes Israel's temporary deprivation of king, prince, sacrifice, pillar, ephod, and teraphim. Scholars debate whether Hosea considered them legitimate or not, but the parallel deprivation of God's good gifts (2:9, 11) suggests that at least some, and maybe all, were held legitimate. The ephod is here probably an object used in divination (cf. 1 Sam 23:6; 30:7). Elsewhere it can be the name of a priestly garment (1 Sam 2:18; 22:18), and eventually it became part of the high priest's dress (Ex 25:7). Teraphim were figurines of gods in human form used in divination, at first regarded as legitimate (1 Sam 19:13, 16), but later disapproved (2 Kings 23:24). v. 5 finally describes Israel's return to YHWH, and corresponds to the hopeful conclusion of ch. 2. Israel's return to 'David their king' is probably a Judean redactional addition, since the northerner Hosea is unlikely to have supported the Davidic monarchy. Also, 'in the latter days' probably reflects later Judean eschatology.

(4:1–19) YHWH's Indictment of Priest and People This chapter begins (vv. 1–3) with a general divine indictment against Israel for its lack of knowledge of God. The indictment is continued in vv. 4–6 specifically against the priests, who are blamed for the people's lack of knowledge of God, and a further oracle against the priests continues in vv. 7–10. vv. 11–14 focus on the cult, which is condemned for being pervaded by a spirit of whoredom as well as literal cult prostitution. vv. 15–19 also condemn Israel's whoredom, manifested in the cult and idolatry.

'Indictment', v. 1 (rib) is a legal term. The absence of knowledge of God in the land is an important theme in Hosea (4:6; 5:4; 6:6). 'Knowledge of God' is not mystical knowledge of God (as in the NT), but an awareness of his basic moral laws, and a practical keeping of them—summed up in hesed, 'steadfast love'. v. 2 castigates 'murder', 'stealing', and 'adultery', the same terms used in the sixth, eighth, and seventh commandments of the Decalogue (Ex 20, Deut 5); also mentioned are 'swearing' and 'lying', equivalent to the sins found in the third and ninth commandments. Scholars debate whether Hosea refers specifically to the Decalogue. If it is older than Hosea (and Ex 20 has traditionally been ascribed to the Elohist source, c.750), he could have done so, but recently some scholars have dated it later. By way of judgement 'the land dries up'—'dries up' is a better translation of the verb 'bl' here than the usual 'mourns'. v. 5, 'the prophet also shall stumble with you by night' is probably a gloss; prophets are nowhere else mentioned in this chapter and some other glosses contain 'also' (5:5; 6:11).

'Thing of wood' or 'staff', v. 12 (RSV) is probably an abusive description of a wooden idol used in divination, possibly the Asherah. Though sometimes seen as rhabdomancy (divination by sticks), this is unlikely since it is only rarely attested in the ancient Near East. REB 'diviner's wand' and NRSV 'divining rod' are unlikely. v. 13 alludes to the sanctuaries known in the OT as 'high places' (Hos 10:8) and the description of sacrifices taking place on mountains and under trees recalls the frequent phrase 'on every high hill and under every luxuriant tree' (cf. Jer 2:20; NRSV's 'green tree' is incorrect). Continuing with the high places, v. 14 alludes to 'cult prostitutes' (RSV) there. The word literally means 'holy ones' (qēdēšôt) and the parallelism with 'harlots' (zōnôt) here and elsewhere (Deut 23:17–18; Gen 38:15, 21–2) establishes the meaning as 'cult prostitutes'. We cannot say much about their precise role, but they seem to have had some connection with the Baal fertility cult. There is no reason to doubt their existence, as some scholars have done recently—in addition to the OT we have references to them in many (admittedly mostly late) classical sources, as well as in Mesopotamia, where they were particularly associated with the goddess Ishtar. In v. 15 Hosea rejects Gilgal and Beth-aven (i.e. Bethel), both sites of sanctuaries. Gilgal (Khirbet el-Mefjir, near Jericho) is also condemned in 9:15 and 12:11, there specifically in connection with sacrifices. Beth-aven, literally 'house of evil', is a derogatory name for Bethel (modern Beitin; cf. 5:8, 10:5), the leading sanctuary associated with the calf-cult (10:5). The words 'Do not let Judah become guilty' are probably a gloss. In v. 16 Israel is like a stubborn heifer: this is one of a number of Hosea's sayings employing nature imagery. The text of vv. 17–19 is uncertain in parts.

(5:1–7) Judgement on a Faithless Nation and its Leaders vv. 1–7 continue ch. 4's description of the apostasy of the leaders and nation. vv. 1–2 condemn not only the priests (mentioned in ch. 4), but also the 'house of the king'. vv. 3–7 then describe the apostasy of the whole nation.

v. 1 oddly includes the 'house of Israel' between the specific groups of the 'priests' and the 'house of the king'. vv. 1–2 employ hunting images to describe the leaders' entrapping the people at Mizpah, Tabor, and Shittim. Probably there were sanctuaries at these sites and cultic sin is alluded to, though precise information is lacking. Mizpah is probably Tell en-Nasbeh in Benjamin. Tabor is a striking dome-shaped mountain in Galilee. Shittim in Transjordan was associated with apostasy to Baal of Peor (Num 25:1–5), with which Hosea was familiar (9:10). vv. 3–7, the leaders having set a bad example (vv. 1–2), Hosea now describes apostasy amongst the whole people. v. 5b extends the judgement to Judah, and is doubtless a gloss.

(5:8–6:3) Israel's Sickness unto Death and Hosea's Exhortation to Repentance This section concerns the period of the Syro-Ephraimite war (735–733 BCE) and its aftermath (733–731) (see Hos A.3). In 5:8–15 Hosea describes the internecine strife of that period between Judah and Israel and expresses divine judgement on both. YHWH will inflict sickness and death on the nation, but in 6:1–3 predicts it will revive if they accept his exhortation to repent.

5:8–10 reflects the movement north of Judean troops into northern-Israelite/Benjaminite territory during the Syro-Ephraimite crisis, and this is condemned. At the same time, the northern kingdom is condemned for its self-inflicted wound in going after 'vanity' (Heb. uncertain), which refers to its attack under Pekah (with the Syrians under Rezin) on Judah in the time of Ahaz. At 5:12 translate 'Therefore I am like a moth to Ephraim', as traditionally (RSV), not 'maggots' (NRSV) or 'festering sore' (NEB, REB), which have been proposed for 'āš on the basis of an alleged Arabic cognate. Certainly 'āš means 'moth' in Job 13:28, where it is parallel with rāqāb, 'rottenness', as here. The thought is compressed: just as a moth is to a garment, so will YHWH be to Israel. 5:13 mentions Ephraim's going to Assyria, which refers to Hosea's submission to Tiglath-pileser III in 731. Judah under Ahaz appealed to the Assyrians too (even though this is not explicit here), following the northern Israelite and Syrian invasion of Judah (2 Kings 16:7–8; cf. Isa 7). The Assyrian ruler is referred to as 'the great king' (similarly Hos 10:6): the Hebrew is unusual (melek yārēb), rendered incorrectly by AV and RV as 'King Jareb'.

Israel's hoped-for restoration is depicted in 6:1–3, which raises two highly debated questions. First, with regard to who is speaking it has been suggested: (1) that these are the words of the Israelites, but that they are insincere. However, the language is so full of genuine Hoseanic images and the sentiments so similar to Hosea's exhortation to repentance in ch. 14, that it is difficult to regard the words as insincere. (2)

Some suppose these are the words that Hosea hopes the Israelites will say, but 'saying' (RSV) is lacking in the Hebrew at the end of 5:15 and the parallel with ch. 14 also tells against it. So (3) is most likely—this is Hosea's own exhortation to the people, like 14:1–3.

The second debated question is whether Hosea's imagery is of resurrection from death or simply healing of the sick. In favour of the former are: (1) elsewhere when the verbs 'revive' (hiphil of ḥyh) and 'raise up' (hiphil of qûm) appear together, they denote resurrection (Isa 26:14, 19; Job 14:12, 14); (2) 6:5 speaks of Israel as slain; (3) there are impressive parallels between chs. 5–6 and 13–14 (lion image, 5:14, 13:7–8; exhortation to return, 6:1; 14:1; dew or rain imagery, 6:3; 14:4), and since in ch. 13 it is clearly a case of death (vv. 1, 9, 14), this should also be the case in chs. 5–6 (cf. Ezek 37 for death and resurrection as symbolic of exile and restoration). Probably Hosea has appropriated the imagery of Israel's death and resurrection from the dying and rising god Baal. This is supported by 13:1, 'he incurred guilt through Baal and died', and the association of the resurrection with rain in 6:3. 'After two days ... on the third day' means 'after a short while'; cf. 'etmôl šilšôm, 'formerly', literally, 'yesterday, the third day'.

(6:4–7:16) Israel's Corruption, Political and Religious This section contains loosely connected oracles mostly concerned with Israel's political, but also religious, corruption. 6:4–6 enunciates Israel's failure to live up to YHWH's demand for steadfast love and knowledge of God; 6:7–10 recalls crimes perhaps associated with Pekah's rebellion; 6:11a is a Judean gloss, applying YHWH's judgement to the southern kingdom; 6:11b–7:2 explains how Israel's corrupt deeds prevent YHWH from restoring her; 7:3–7 describes vividly the court intrigues leading to the overthrow of a king; 7:8–12 rejects foreign alliances; finally, 7:13–16 condemns religious apostasy.

The statement at 6:4–6 has often been thought to be YHWH's response to Israel's insincere repentance in 6:1–3, but, as noted, it is not insincere, but contains Hosea's own exhortation to repentance. Rather, 6:4–6 reflects Hosea's response to the people's current plight prior to any possible repentance such as that depicted in 6:1–3. Hosea's famous words in 6:6 elevate the importance of right moral behaviour above ritual. As in similar passages in other prophets (Isa 1:10–17; Jer 7:21–3; Mic 6:6–8), it is probably not sacrifice per se that is rejected, but hollow and meaningless worship (and syncretistic worship in Hosea's case). 'Not this but that' can mean, 'That is more important than this'. Obscure allusions to crimes at various locations are contained in 6:7–10. Gilead (v. 8) was in Transjordan and Adam (v. 7, read with NRSV 'at Adam', not 'like Adam') was a town in the Jordan valley in the region of Gilead. Since Pekah's rebellion in c.735 started in Gilead (2 Kings 15:25), we may have allusions to it here. v. 7's words, 'But at Adam they transgressed the covenant' are significant, since, together with 8:1, we have here the only explicit reference to YHWH's covenant with Israel in any of the eighth-century prophets. It has sometimes been supposed that the covenant referred to here is rather a political treaty, but against this note that elsewhere 'transgress a (political) treaty' is ḥēpērû bērit, not 'ābērû bērit as here. (See Day 1986.) v. 11a is an anti-Judean gloss. Other glosses also contain 'also' (cf. 4:5 and 5:5) and its lame brevity challenges its genuineness. The words reapply Hosea's message to Judah at a later date. 'Harvest' is an image for judgement. In 6:11b–7:2 YHWH states his willingness to restore the fortunes of Israel, but cannot because of their wickedness. Samaria (7:1), first mentioned here in Hosea, was the capital of the northern kingdom since the ninth-century King Omri (it has been excavated); sometimes it stands for the remaining rump northern kingdom (cf. 10:5).

The treachery involved in one of the coups d'état is reflected in 7:3–7, possibly when Hoshea overthrew Pekah (c.731). The passionate intrigue of the conspirators is compared to the heat of a baker's oven (cf. 7:4, 6, 7). It has sometimes been supposed that Hosea was opposed to kingship in principle, but it is more likely that it was the behaviour of contemporary kings that he opposed.

The section 7:8–12 returns to condemning Israel's foreign alliances. These devour Israel's strength (7:8), a probable allusion to Assyria's annexing some of Israel's territory in 733. The fact that Israel calls upon Egypt as well as Assyria (7:11) probably indicates a date after Hoshea's appeal to Egypt in c.725. At 7:13–16 Israel's religious apostasy is again condemned. There is an interesting reference in 7:14 to the ritual practice of people gashing themselves for grain and wine. (The translation 'they gash themselves' follows LXX and some Heb. MSS instead of MT, 'they assemble themselves'.) Lacerating oneself is prohibited in Deut 14:1 (cf. 1 Kings 18:28), but was part of the Baalistic cult. The beginning of 7:16 is unclear: perhaps emend to 'They turn to Baal', which fits the context, though other suggestions have been made.

(8:1–14) A Catalogue of Israel's Sins Here Hosea recounts the sins which will lead to judgement on Israel. vv. 1–3 begin in general terms, proclaiming that Israel has broken God's covenant and transgressed his law. The specific sins are unauthorized changes of rulers (v. 4a), making of images, especially the (golden) calf cult (vv. 4b–6), Israel's foreign alliances (vv. 8–10), sacrificial worship (vv. 11–13), and trust in fortifications rather than YHWH (v. 14).

v. 1 is significant because, along with Hos 6:7, it contains the only explicit mention of the word 'covenant' (Heb. bērit) to describe YHWH's relationship with Israel in the eighth-century prophets. Although some have argued that the notion of covenant was a later invention of the Deuteronomists, there are good grounds for seeing it as authentic to Hosea here and in 6:7 (Day 1986). Also in v. 1 'trumpet' is better rendered 'ram's horn'. 'One like a vulture' is the probable translation (retaining MT) and seems to be an image for the invader's swiftness. v. 4a refers to the frequent coups d'état of Israel's final years after the death of Jeroboam II. Then, in 8:4b–6, in condemning images, Hosea focuses especially on the calf cult, claiming that the calf is not a god and will be destroyed (cf. 10:5–6; 13:2). In referring to the calf as Samaria's (vv. 5, 6) the prophet probably means the province of Samaria (i.e. the northern kingdom), not the capital city (cf. 10:5). Jeroboam I had set up golden calves in Bethel and Dan in c.930 (1 Kings 12:28–30) to lure the north away from the Jerusalem temple. The calf cult at Dan probably ended in 733 when Assyria annexed part of the northern kingdom. Probably the golden calves were originally symbols of YHWH, not a pagan god, and had been acceptable to many Israelites. It is sometimes maintained that they were merely pedestals of the deity, but this is unlikely. Hosea insists, 'it is not God', which would be meaningless if everyone regarded it as simply a pedestal. Probably the calf image goes back to the supreme Canaanite god El (called 'Bull El' in the Ugaritic texts) with whom YHWH was equated (cf. Bethel, 'house of El'). Aaron's golden calf (Ex 32) is probably a back projection from 1 Kings 12:28–30.

vv. 8–11 condemn Israel's foreign alliances, a repeated theme of Hosea's (5:13; 7:8–9, 11; 12:1; 14:3). In particular he condemns the alliance with the Assyrians: this probably refers to Hoshea's submission to the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser III in 731. This fits v. 9, 'Israel is swallowed up; now they are among the nations as a useless vessel', as Tiglath-pileser III exiled part of Israel in 733 (2 Kings 15:29). The translation of 8:10b is uncertain: RSV follows LXX, 'And they shall cease for a little while from anointing king and princes.' vv. 11–13 reject Israel's sacrifices on account of the people's sin; probably sacrifices are not rejected per se (cf. Hos 6:6). Finally, v. 14 rejects Israel's trust in fortifications rather than in YHWH.

(9:1–9) Exile will Bring an End to Israel's Festal Worship

These verses form a prophetic diatribe, unlike 9:10–13, 15–16 and most of ch. 8, where YHWH speaks in the first person. The prophet condemns the festal worship and predicts that exile in Assyria and Egypt will bring it to an end. Hosea's words lead the people to think he is a mad prophet (v. 7), to which he replies in v. 8. Israel's return to Assyria and Egypt is predicted in v. 3, whilst v. 6 emphasizes simply the return to Egypt. This latter verse's detail suggests it is meant literally, not symbolically. In the light of Hosea's message of doom, v. 7b quotes the popular view of him as a mad prophet. (Cf. 2 Kings 9:11 and Jer 29:16 for the perception of other prophets as 'mad'.) v. 8 then presents Hosea's response to this charge with his claim that, as a prophet, he is rather God's watchman over Ephraim. Interestingly, this passage challenges the proposal of some recent scholars that the pre-exilic prophets did not actually see themselves as prophets and that this was a later Deuteronomistic understanding. The reference at v. 7 to Hosea as 'the man of the spirit' is also of interest, since unlike the 'word' of God, the 'spirit' is mentioned only rarely in the pre-exilic canonical prophets.

The reference to the people as corrupt 'as in the days of Gibeah' (v. 9, cf. 10:9) probably alludes to the outrage in Judg 19–20, when a Levite's concubine was raped and murdered in Gibeah, which made a notable impression (Judg 19:30). The combination of violence and sexual sin makes it appropriate for this to be paradigmatic for Hosea. A reference to Saul, whose capital was at Gibeah, is less likely.

(9:10–17) Israel's Sinful History Begets a Barren Future

These verses are primarily in first-person divine speech, unlike the preceding and following sections. They describe how, though YHWH found Israel in the wilderness like grapes or the first ripe figs, they committed apostasy with Baal-peor (v. 10), and following in the same train ever since, they are destined to infertility (cf. vv. 11–14, 16). Since Baal was a fertility god, there is evident irony here.

v. 10 speaks of Israel's apostasy to Baal-peor, recalling Num 25:1–5. 'Shame' (Heb. bōšet) is a euphemism for 'Baal'. v. 13a is difficult and various renderings have been given. v. 15, 'Every evil of theirs began at Gilgal; there I came to hate them.' It is uncertain whether we should translate as past tense (as NRSV) or with present tense. Also, the evil referred to at Gilgal is unclear. Elsewhere Hosea refers to cultic misdemeanours there (4:15; 12:11) so that may be the case here. If the tense is past, the reference may be to the Baal-peor incident alluded to in v. 10, which Mic 6:5 says extended 'from Shittim to Gilgal'. Others envisage political misdemeanours, whether referring in the past to Saul, who was made king at Gilgal (1 Sam 11:14–15), or to some contemporary event, as might be suggested by 'all their officials are rebels'.

(10:1–8) The Coming Downfall of Cult and King Hosea here anticipates the downfall of the nation's institutions, both religious and political. Characteristically, he flits from one to the other: vv. 1–2, 5–6, 8 envisage the end of the cult and vv. 3–4, 7 highlight the futility of the monarchy and its foreign alliances and anticipate the end of Israel's king.

For the image of Israel as a vine (v. 1), cf. Isa 5:1–7, Ps 80:8–16 (MT 9–17). The 'pillars' (maššēbôt) of vv. 1–2 were sacred pillars at the high places, and symbolic of the male deity. Originally they were acceptable (Gen 28:22), but later they were condemned (Deut 16:22). The covenants opposed in v. 4 are probably treaties made with foreign nations (cf. 12:2). vv. 5–6 predict judgement on the calf of Beth-aven, i.e. Bethel (see Hos 8:5–6). 'Calf' (v. 5) follows Greek and Syriac—Hebrew, strangely, has feminine plural, 'ēglôt. For v. 6's 'great king', see Hos 5:13. The 'high places' (Heb. bāmôt) of v. 8 were local sanctuaries where the syncretistic practices condemned by Hosea took place. Strangely, in Hosea the term occurs only here. Some (e.g. NRSV) take 'āwen as a place-name (Aven, short for Beth-aven, i.e. Bethel), but more likely it has its normal meaning 'wickedness', because of the plural 'high places'.

(10:9–15) Predictions of War and Disaster This section begins and ends with judgement oracles (vv. 9–10, 13b–15); in between are sayings about Israel, using agricultural imagery (vv. 11–13a).

For 'the day of Gibeah' (v. 9) see Hos 9:9. vv. 11–13a illustrate Hosea's fondness for agricultural images. Within v. 11 the reference to 'Judah' is probably a gloss, extending the words to the southern kingdom. Some think v. 14 refers to an invasion of Irbid (Arbela) in Transjordan by King Salamanu of Moab, whilst others identify Beth-arbel with a place in northern Israel and see Shalman as the Assyrian King Shalmaneser V. The latter would be a more effective image, since Shalmaneser V eventually destroyed the northern kingdom as anticipated by Hosea (Hos A.4). In v. 15 MT has 'Bethel', but the context of vv. 13–15 supports 'house of Israel' with LXX. 'At dawn' (NRSV follows MT): RSV 'in the storm' is based on debatable emendation.

(11:1–11) YHWH's Inextinguishable Love for Israel and Israel's Ingratitude

This is one of the high points in the OT, depicting God's love in the face of Israel's continued ingratitude. vv. 1–11 appear to be a unity, apart from v. 10, which is probably a later addition. vv. 1–4 depict YHWH's love for Israel from the Exodus and Israel's ingratitude, sacrificing to the Baals. vv. 5–7 prophesy the divine judgement and Israel's exile. vv. 8–9 then mark a shift, not only in the move from YHWH's speaking of Israel in the third person to addressing it directly, but in its poignant depiction of the anguish of YHWH's love so that he cannot totally destroy Israel. Finally, vv. 10–11 depict Israel's subsequent deliverance from exile.

v. 1 speaks of YHWH's call of Israel, his son, at the time of the Exodus (cf. Ex 4:22; Deut 14:1). In vv. 3–4 YHWH's tender care for the infant Israel is more characteristic of a mother, and feminist scholars have suggested YHWH is depicted with female imagery (cf. Isa 66:12–13). This may be, though the OT never directly calls YHWH mother, but only father. v. 5, the threat of exile in Egypt and Assyria is a repeated theme in Hosea (7:16; 8:8–10, 13; 9:3, 6). v. 7 contains a textual problem: NRSV has 'To the Most High ('al) they call', but 'al' is possibly a corruption from ba'al (Baal).

In vv. 8–9, one of the most moving passages in the OT, YHWH struggles with himself, and the anguish of his love finally dictates that he cannot totally destroy Israel as he did Admah and Zeboiim (these being two cities of the plain destroyed alongside Sodom and Gomorrah: Deut. 29:22–3; cf. Gen 10:19; 14:2, 8). This does not negate the promise of judgement, but means that Hosea foresees it as not final; rather it has a chastening effect on Israel. In the literal sense this contradicts some other passages where YHWH says he will destroy Israel (13:9, 16), but even there subsequent restoration is envisaged (ch. 14). Interestingly, Hosea implies a degree of divine suffering; contrast the denial of divine suffering in some early Church Fathers. v. 10 is probably a later addition, alluding to a return of Israel's western exiles: other prophetic references to an ingathering of western exiles are post-exilic (Isa 11:11; 60:9; Joel 3:6–7; Ob 20). v. 10 is probably a later amplification of Hosea's authentic prophecy of return from exile in v. 11 (reversing the threat of v. 5).

(11:12–12:14 (MT 12:1–15)) Israel's Perfidy and Kinship with its Ancestor Jacob In the MT ch. 12 begins with 11:12 of the English versions and this represents a better chapter division. Allusions to Israel's lies and deceit in 11:12 clearly belong with ch. 12 (cf. vv. 1, 3, 7). Much of ch. 12 is pervaded by Israel's deceit and unfaithfulness, and interestingly, Hosea associates this with the character of Israel's ancestor, Jacob (vv. 2–4, 12). Hosea here shows knowledge of traditions about Jacob very similar to those contained in the J source in Genesis. In contrast stand God's prophets (12:10), including Moses, who led Israel out of Egypt (12:13). The chapter is essentially a unity, though there are later glosses, both pre- and anti-Judean, in 11:12b and 12:2a. The translation of 11:12b is uncertain, but it seems to contrast Judah's faithfulness with Israel's infidelity. That 'Judah' is a gloss in 12:2 is supported by the play on the name Israel as well as Jacob in v. 3, which supports 'Israel', not 'Judah' being original in v. 2. In 12:1 the oil carried to Egypt probably alludes to an Israelite gift to induce Egyptian support, rather than being part of the ritual of treaty-making. 12:2 introduces the verses about Jacob with 'The Lord... will punish Jacob according to his ways', indicating the remarks about Jacob are intended to be critical. Jacob's overweening ambition was first manifested in the womb when he sought to supplant his brother Esau (12:3a). The word 'supplant' (ya'āqōb) here plays on the name of Jacob. Cf. Gen 25:26 (J), where Jacob takes Esau by the heel (āqēb), and āqab (supplant) is used rather in connection with Jacob's taking Esau's birthright and blessing in Gen 27:36

(J). A second allusion to Jacob's ambition comes in 12:3b–4a, recalling Jacob's wrestling with God/an angel at Peniel (Gen. 32:22–32), though Hosea's reference to Jacob's weeping there is unattested in Genesis. The third allusion is to God's meeting with Jacob at Bethel (12:4b), attested in both Gen. 28:10–22 (J) and 35:9–15 (P).

At 12:7–8 the theme of Israel's deceit is continued, but without explicit allusion to Jacob. With their condemnation of Israel's commercial corruption these verses are reminiscent of Amos. 12:11 condemns two sites, Gilead, perhaps as in 6:8 for its part in Pekah's rebellion, and Gilgal for its sacrificial cult. 12:12 returns to citing the tradition about Jacob, this time in connection with his flight to Aram (Syria), where he served for his wives (Rachel and Leah—cf. Gen 29:15–30). The point is not wholly clear, but it probably hints at Israel's embroilment in foreign alliances and exile, since 12:13 contrasts Moses' leading of Israel out of Egypt. Moses is called a 'prophet' (taking up the theme of prophets in 12:10), the first time in the OT he is so called. Moses is later called a prophet in Deut 18:15, 18; 34:10, one of a number of instances in which Deuteronomy stands in the tradition of Hosea.

(13:1–16 (MT 14:1)) Death for Israel Ch. 13 is pervaded by Israel's death. This is primarily future, but in v. 1 is already present. This is a metaphor for Israel's end, specifically with reference to exile. The chapter divides into three sections, vv. 1–3, 4–8, and 12–16, beginning with a historical retrospect establishing Israel's guilt (vv. 1–2, 4–6, 12–13) and concluding with a declaration of judgement (vv. 3, 7–8, 14–16). To the second oracle is appended a mocking condemnation of the monarchy (vv. 9–11).

The statement in v. 1 that Israel 'incurred guilt through Baal and died' is ironic. Baal was a dying and rising fertility god, and Israel has died through worshipping him (to be followed, after repentance in ch. 14, by resurrection). The current 'death' probably alludes to Tiglath-pileser III's exile of part of the northern kingdom in 733. The end of v. 2 is a little uncertain: NRSV is probably right, with partial LXX support, to read "'Sacrifice to these", they say. People are kissing calves!" For the calf cult, cf. 8:5–6 and 10:5–6. In devouring Israel (vv. 7–8) YHWH is compared with various wild beasts. YHWH as a lion (vv. 7–8) is found also in the similar passage in 5:14. v. 10 possibly refers to the period after c.725 when King Hoshea was imprisoned by the Assyrians. There may be a play on his name (meaning 'salvation') in the words 'that he may save you'.

In v. 14 YHWH declares he will hand Israel over to the power of Death (Sheol). The interrogative particle hā is lacking, so the ancient versions (followed by Paul in 1 Cor 15:33) understood the sentiments positively: 'I shall ransom them from the power of Sheol...', but this does not fit the context (cf. 'compassion is hid from my eyes' at end of verse). In v. 14 Israel is in the grip of Death (māwet) and Sheol, whilst in v. 15 Israel's 'fountain will dry up, his spring will be parched'. This ultimately reflects Baal mythology, for in the Ugaritic Baal myth, after Baal goes down into the realm of Mot (Death), the land becomes dry and parched.

In v. 15, read probably 'among the rushes' (āhū) with NRSV rather than MT's 'among the brothers' (ahīm), as it fits the nature-based imagery better.

(14:1–8 (MT 2–9)) Repentance and Restoration As is characteristic of OT prophetic books, the final chapter of Hosea ends happily, anticipating Israel's future repentance and restoration. vv. 1–3 are the prophet's exhortation to the people to repent. Following this, in vv. 4–8 YHWH promises to restore Israel; the passage employs striking images from the blossoming of nature to depict this.
